Next, we submit, that as far as this is an appeal [22] from the Orders and certificates of the Sudder Court, the certificate of Mr. Simson, of the 8th of December, 1847, as amended by Mr. Le Geyt on the 24th of August, 1849, was final and conclusive, and excluded from the grounds of special appeal any question affecting the liability of this Respondent. The effect of the certificate of Mr. Simson was to reject the appeal as against him, and to confine the ground of appeal to the claim for a refund of the purchase money as against the Respondent, Nusserwanjee Pestonjee. Now, the Act, No. XVI. of 1853, does not give the Sudder Court power to entertain the question of his liability. Neither had the Sudder Court, under Bom Reg. IV. of 1827, power to make a second revision of the decree of the 19th of December, 1849: the former revision having expressly excluded all question of this Respondent's liability. The Act, No. XVI. of 1853, did not alter the rights of this Respondent on a special appeal, as, owing to the effect of the certificate as amended by Mr. Le Geyt, there was no question of his liability before the Sudder Court, which Court had in fact no power to entertain any question as against him.

Mr. Gifford, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Respondent, Nusserwanjee Pestonjee, the execution creditor.—According to the rules and procedure of the native Courts in Bombay, this Respondent, as execution creditor, has been improperly made a party to the suit. No privity exists between the Appellant and this Respondent. No fraud has been alleged against him to justify the Appellant joining him with the Collector of Surat as a Defendant. So far as regarded this Respondent, as execution creditor, it is immaterial [23] whether the Tora garas huk is or is not, liable to attachment and sale by the Sheriff, or whether any property passed to the Appellant by that sale, there being nothing in the facts, or by law, to distinguish the case of the Appellant from that of an ordinary purchaser at a Sheriff's sale. He virtually purchased only the right and interest of the Defendant in the original suit in the Tora garas, the subject of the attachment and sale. If a party buys, whether it is real estate, a chattel, or a chose in action, Courts of law and equity recognise the maxim "caveat emptor." There is no fraud in the case, nor even an implied warranty of title. Early v. Garrett (9 Bar. and Cr. 928), Cripps v. Reade (6 Term. Rep. 606), Thomas v. Powell (2 Cox. 394), Morley v. Attenborough (3 Exch. Rep. 500), Chapman v. Speller (14 Q. Ben. Rep. 621). When the Appellant paid his money and got his conveyance there was an end of the matter so far as affects this Respondent, and the decree of the Sudder Court was, therefore, right in deciding that the Appellant had no legal claim on this Respondent in respect of the money received by him through the Court at Surat in satisfaction of his decree, even if the Tora garas be held inalienable. Another ground we insist upon is, that the Appellant ought to have appealed direct to England against the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of the 20th of April, 1853, which annulled the former decree of the same Court, dated the 19th of December, 1849, and that it is now too late to question it.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., was heard in reply.

The case stood over for consideration.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (Feb. 8, 1860).—This is an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bombay, by which it has been decided that a certain annual payment called a Tora garas huk, is not by law capable of alienation, and that the purchaser of this interest at a judicial sale is not entitled either to have the sale enforced, or to have his purchase-money refunded to him by the individual who has received it.

The case is one, in many respects, of a remarkable character, and it appears to their Lordships to be advisable to state the circumstances in some detail.

Tora garas huks, whatever may have been their origin, are payments which, for many years before the period of the transactions which have given rise to the present suit, had been made by the Bombay Government through their Collectors in the different Zillahs of Guzerat. The names of the persons receiving such payments, with the amount to be paid to them, were entered in the books of the Collector, and the payments were made according to the entries in such books out of the moneys received by the Collectors.

Amongst other such entries in the books of the Collector of Surat, was a sum of Rs. 347. 13a., payable out of the Pergunnah of Orpad, and which in the year 1839, was payable, and had for some years been paid to a person named Bharmulsungjee. This annual sum is the subject of the present suit; Bharmulsungjee was also in the receipt of another Tora garas, payable out of another Pergunnah within [25] the same Collectorate, of Rs. 883. It appears that these two Huks had previously belonged to a person named Koonsurwanjee; that he had died, leaving two widows named Kasooba and Omedba, who had succeeded to this property; that these ladies had adopted Bharmulsungjee as their son, and that thereupon these Huks had been transferred into his name in the books of the Collector.

In the year 1839, a suit was instituted in the Court of the Sudder Ameen of Surat by the Respondent, Nusserwanjee against Bharmulsungjee, and against Kasooba and Omedba, in order to recover a debt due from these parties to that Respondent, and which debt was secured by a mortgage of the two sums of Tora garas standing in the name of Bharmulsungjee.

Pending the proceedings in this suit, Nusserwanjee caused a sequestration to be laid on these Tora garas huks in the office of the Collector of Surat, the nature and object of which could not be known to the Collector.

On the 23rd of July, 1839, Nusserwanjee obtained a decree in his suit for the sum of Rs. 12,745. with interest, against the mortgaged property, and against the Defendants personally. Regulation IV. of 1827 of the Bombay Code of procedure directs the mode in which the attachment and sale of any of the immoveable property of the debtor against whom a decree has been obtained are to be effected. It is thereby provided, that on a petition for such sale, the property shall be distinctly specified, with the probable value thereof; that the Court, on hearing the application, shall issue such order as may be requisite towards the enforcement of the decree; that whenever a sale takes place under a decree, it shall be by public auction, after public notice, by a proclamation [26] in a specified form, intimating that the property will be sold on a day named, unless the sale shall be objected to by another claimant, who, within fifteen days after the date of the proclamation, shall establish, to the satisfaction of the creditor, or of the Court, a right or interest in the property under attachment, or shall enter into an engagement to prosecute his claim within a limited time.

In order to recover the amount awarded to him by the decree in the manner pointed out in this Regulation, Nusserwanjee, on the 21st of September, 1839, presented a petition to the Judge of the Zillah Court, and thereby, after stating the decree which he had obtained, and the sequestration which he had issued, he prayed that the Sheriff might be ordered to attach and sell the produce of the undermentioned Tora gas belonging to the Defendant, according to the usual custom.

The Tora gas (which included the particular sum now in dispute) was thus described:—"The Defendants, Kasooba and Omedba, used to receive the produce of the Tora gas haks, belonging to their husband, Koowursungjee, payable from the Tannahs of the Pergunnah of Orpad and the Talook of Koorsaid. In the Sunyut year 1887, the said Defendants, Kasooba and Omedba, adopted the Defendant, Bharmedsungjee, as their son. From that day forward, the amount of the produce from the said Pergunnahs has been received by the Defendant, Bharmedsungjee. The value thereof is about Rs. 11,000."

On the same day, the 21st of September, 1839, an order was issued by Mr. Herbert, the Assistant Judge of the Court, to the Sheriff, directing him to proceed according to the usual practice, and to make a return in thirty-five days.

[27] Under this order the Tora gas in question was attached by the Sheriff: proclamations of sale were issued, and the sale was fixed for the 19th of October.

Before, however, the day fixed for the sale, Bharmulsungjee presented a petition to the Court, praying that the sale might be delayed for six months, in order to give him an opportunity of satisfying the Plaintiff's demand, which he promised to do within six months.

The sale accordingly was stayed by an Order of the Court, till Nusserwanjee Pestonjee should have answered the petition. He objected to any further delay, and on the 14th of November, 1839, applied to the Court that the sale might be completed; that fresh proclamations might be issued, and that, as the property was likely to sell better at Surat than in the village in which it was situated, the sale might be made at Surat.

On the same day the Judge made an order directing the Sheriff to enter into an investigation of the proceedings which had already taken place in this matter, and to make a report, and to inquire whether there was any objection or not to selling the property in Surat. The Sheriff made his report, stating the proceedings which had already taken place, and that there appeared to be no objection to the sale being made in Surat.

On the 27th of November, 1839, Mr. Elliott made an order upon this report, that the Sheriff should sell the Tora gas of the Defendant in Surat, but that he should give notice of the sale of this Tora gas to the inhabitants of the Zillah in which the Tora gas was, as also to the inhabitants of the city of Surat, and should take care that no fraud or mistake was permitted to take place in the sale.

[28] Proclamation was accordingly issued for sale of this Tora gas in Surat, on the 24th of December, 1839. The proclamation required any person making any claim to the property to come in and object to the sale.

No objection was made, and on the 24th of December, 1839, the property was accordingly put up for sale, and the Appellant in this case was the highest bidder, and he became the purchaser of the Tora gas now in dispute, for the sum of Rs. 3430. He paid his purchase-money into Court, and the amount, after deducting the expenses, was paid to Nusserwanjee; and on the 23rd of January, 1840, Mr. Elliott, the Judge of the Court of Adawlut, executed a bill of sale of the Tora gas to the Appellant. This instrument, after reciting the facts already stated, concluded in these words:—"Now, as you have paid that amount (Rs. 3430) into Government, you have become the owner of the Tora gas huk belonging to the above-mentioned Defendant, Bharmulsungjee, and the right to receive the amount of the Tora gas huk from the Tannah has been vested in you. Therefore the Defendant's right to the Tora gas huk (Rs. 347. 13a.) has been sold for Rs. 3430, by the Government Adawlut, through the medium of the Nazir, in conformity with the usual custom in sales by auction, in this matter, viz.: You may continue to take every year, according to the rules of the Pergunnah, the amount of the aforesaid allowance of Tora gas belonging to the above-mentioned Defendant, Bharmulsungjee, from the Tannah of Orpad. In so doing, there shall be no objection."

We have thought it desirable to go into this detail, because it shows very distinctly that the Bombay Government, through its officers, had abundant notice of [29] what was taking place with respect to this sale, and had ample opportunity, if it meant to object to the alienability of property of this description, to interpose to prevent it; or, at all events, to give public notice that, as far as the Government was concerned, the validity of the sale would not be recognised.

But the Government did nothing of the sort; it made no objection to the attachment of the property which its officer was to pay; and it permitted the Respondent, Nusserwanjee Pestonjee, to sell, and the Appellant to purchase, and the one to pay, and the other to receive, the purchase-money, without giving the least intimation to either that any obstacle would be raised to the enjoyment by the purchaser of what he had bought.

The Appellant having thus completed his purchase, applied to the Collector of Surat to have his name substituted for that of Bharmulsungjee in the Collector's books, and to have the Tora garas regularly paid to him accordingly. With this application the Collector seems at first to have been disposed to comply. He afterwards, however, declined to enter the Appellant's name in his book, and order that the name of Bharmulsungjee should be retained, but that the money should every year be paid to the Appellant.

The Appellant was not satisfied with this order; and on the 22nd of July, 1840, presented a petition to the Court in which the sale had been made, in which he alleged that other Tora garas haks had been sold by order of the Court, and that the names of the purchasers had been duly inscribed in the Collector's books; that all property sold through the instrumentality of the Adawlut is caused to be given into the possession of the purchaser, through the assistance [30] of the Adawlut, and he, therefore, prayed that the Judge would address a letter to the Principal Collector, directing him to erase the name of this Grasia from the records, and to enter the Tora garas in the Appellant's name in the records, and to continue to pay him the amount of the Tora garas every year, as mentioned in the bill of sale.

On the 27th of July, 1840, the Judge made an Order in which, after reciting that the Appellant was the owner of the Huk, and that of this fact the Court had no doubt, he ordered the Sheriff to write a letter to the Principal Collector, directing that gentleman to enter the Petitioner's name in the Garas huk of Bharmulsungjee, which the Petitioner had purchased, and to continue to pay the amount of the Huk to the Petitioner.

Such a letter was accordingly sent, and, thereupon, the Collector seems to have communicated with the Revenue Commissioner, and to have reported his opinion, either that the Tora garas should be appropriated by the Government, and the purchase-money repaid, with interest, to the Appellant, or that his name should be entered in the Collector's books.

The matter, however, was referred to the Bombay Government, and the Appellant was informed that as soon as any decision was come to a communication would be made to him. No communication having been made, the Appellant in the year 1842, again applied to the Revenue Commissioner praying that his name might be entered in the books of the Collector, or that, at all events, the three years' arrears then in the hands of the Collector might be paid to him in order that he might not suffer loss in interest and compound interest. The answer returned to him was, that his name would not be [31] entered, neither would the money be paid; but that if he instituted a suit in the Adawlut, the money would be sent there during the lifetime of the Grasia, and that if he had any claim he should file a suit.

The Appellant seems to have entertained a very natural reluctance to adopt a course attended with so much expense and delay, and the Revenue Commissioner having been soon after changed, he attempted once more to obtain redress by a petition to the new Revenue Commissioner, but without any success.

On the 21st of November, 1842, the Appellant presented his petition to the Judges of the Sudder Adawlut, stating the facts of the case, and praying either that the Collector might be ordered to enter the Appellant's name in his books, and to pay him the Huk regularly, or that the purchase-money which he had paid into the Adawlut of Surat might be refunded to him with interest.

This case seems to have been several times under the consideration of the Court. At length on the 28th of February, 1843, an Order was made by which the Petitioner was left to file a suit in the civil side of the Court.

It was under these circumstances that the Appellant filed his plaint in the Court of the Assistant Judge of Surat on the 16th of October, 1843. This suit was instituted against the Collector of Surat, and also against the Respondent, Nusserwanjee Pestonjee. As against the Collector it prayed that the Tora garas in question might be entered in the name of the Appellant, and that the Collector might be ordered to pay him the four years' arrears then due, amounting to Rs. 1391. 4a. As against Nusserwanjee Pestonjee, [32] it prayed that if it should appear to the Court that Nusserwanjee Pestonjee had caused the Tora garas to be improperly sold, he might be ordered to refund the purchase-money with the profits for four years.

The Collector was authorized to defend the suit on the part of the Bombay Government, and he filed his answer on the 19th of February, 1844. He did not dispute any of the facts stated by the Appellant in his plaint. The substance of his answer was, that Bharmulsungjee, to whom this Tora garas huk had belonged, was a Grasia; that, before the English Government took possession of the country, the Grasia people used to levy certain Huks and necessities from the villagers as the price of their abstaining from plundering the villages; that, after the English Government took possession, an agreement was entered into with these people that they should receive this Huk from the Government treasury, and not from the villagers, in order that thereby the villagers should not suffer any oppression; that the custom had always obtained to pay this Huk to the Grasias only; that the Government had never agreed to pay this Huk to outsiders; that if the payment were made to other persons than Grasias, the agreement would be broken, because if the Grasias got nothing to eat, they would begin to plunder; that Government would then suffer loss, and the villagers would suffer oppression. Then followed this sentence, which we confess ourselves unable to understand: "The Government have settled the personal property of the Grasias, and if this property does not reach them, the claim of the Government to the same is going on."

With respect to the Appellant's allegation, that Tora garas had been previously sold by the Courts [33] without any objection, the answer stated, that if this had happened, it had happened without investigation, and that the right of the Government was not done away with, because it was agreed to pay this Huk to the Grasias alone.

The Defendant, Nusserwanjee Pestonjee, put in an answer, insisting that his proceedings had been entirely regular, and that he was under no circumstances liable to any demand on the part of the Appellant. But the view which their Lordships take of this case makes it unnecessary for them to go into the particulars of his defence.

On the 14th of September, 1844, the Appellant filed his replication, in which he insisted, that if the Government had any objection to make to this sale, the Collector might and ought to have interposed to stop it, and to remove the attachment which had been previously laid upon the property, and that he was bound to adopt this course by the effect of the Regulation under which the sale had been made, and of the proclamation which had been issued in pursuance of it; that the tax of the Huks of the Grasias and of the Moguls used to be levied from the villages in the same way as the Government Revenue; that these Huks were incorporated in the revenue, and that the Tora was fixed by the Government; that many Tora huks, and other Huks, had been sold by the Government Adawlut, and by the Collector; and that the names of the purchasers had been entered by the late Collector in the Government records, and the money for the same had been paid by the late Collectors, and was paid by the Defendant, the then Collector, up to this day.

There does not appear to have been any rejoinder, [34] and upon this state of the record the parties went into evidence.

The Appellant proved the several proceedings which had taken place previous to the institution of the suit which have already been detailed: he proved some instances, and one in the Pergunnah of Orpad in which Tora garas had been the subject of sale, and the purchaser had been put into possession of the property, and was then in possession; and he specified several other instances in which, as he stated, the same thing had been done with respect to Tara garas, and other Garas huks, and of which he alleged that entries had been made in the books of the Defendant, the Collector, and he required the production of these books, and summoned witnesses, who were record-keepers in the office of the Collector, to attend and produce these documents.

It is with great regret that their Lordships are compelled to observe that on looking at the depositions of two of these witnesses, it appears that these documents were not produced, and that it is impossible to avoid the inference that they were purposely withheld by the agents of the Government defending the suit on its behalf. It is, however, in the opinion of their Lordships, sufficiently established that up to the period of this sale these Huks had been the subject of sale, and had been considered and treated by the Courts of Justice and by the Government, in this Collectorate at least, as liable to be dealt with like any other species of property. That this had been done without investigation, as the Collector in his answer alleges, is certainly not the fact.

For many years before 1839, inquiries into this subject had been made by different officers of the [35] Indian Government. The origin and character of these payments; the question whether the Government was bound to continue them, even to Grasiyas, or was at liberty to resume them at its pleasure; the expediency of exercising that right if it existed; the question whether the Grasiyas, if he had any right to receive them, enjoyed more than a life interest, and whether such interest as he had was capable of alienation; whether the collection of these payments by the Government was voluntary on their part, and could be discontinued at pleasure, or whether they were charges on the revenue, which the Government receiving the revenue was bound to pay;—all these questions appear to have excited the attention of the Government; many of them as early as the year 1817, and to have been the subject of discussion and consideration for many years subsequently.

It further appears that in 1836, the liability of these Huks to sale, under the process of the Court, had come under the consideration of Mr. Lumsden, then Acting Assistant-Judge at Broach, another Zillah in this Province; that he had consulted Mr. Sutherland, a very high authority, who was then or had been Assistant-Judge at Surat, and that he received from that gentleman the following answer, dated the 29th of December, 1836:—"Sir,—In regard to your letter of the 19th instant, I have the honour to inform you there are very few instances of the attachment and sale of Tora garas; but there is no doubt when such description of property is possessed, a party having a decree against the property may attach and sell, in satisfaction thereof, Tora garas in like manner as any other description of property. Tora garas, like every other description of garas, is [36] Wuttun, but is entirely unconnected with hereditary or other office, and is consequently distinct from the Regulations and Orders you have quoted. Tora garas is money-payment of a fixed nature on a village jumpa, and being usually the most secure description of garas, would be, no doubt, of the highest value in the market."

The Collector put in evidence, on the part of the Government, the certificates which had been returned by various Collectors as to the practice in their Collectorates, and the opinions entertained by them of the nature of these Garas huks; and two agreements, one entered into by Captain Robertson with the Grasiyas of the Pergunnah of Atrolea in the year 1818, and the other by Mr. Crawford with the Thakoors of Dehejaun in the year 1825; but with respect to the origin of the particular Tora garas in dispute, or of Huks of the same description in the same Pergunnah, no evidence was offered. The proceedings which had taken place in some suits after the institution of the present, were also put in evidence.

The case came for hearing before two Judges of the Zillah Court in succession, who were both of opinion that the Tora garas in question could not be enjoyed by any but Grasiyas; and that no decree could be made, either against the Collector or against Nusserwanjee Pestonjee.

It was then brought by appeal before the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bombay, and after various proceedings which their Lordships do not think it necessary to go through in detail, a decree was pronounced by the Sudder Court on the 19th of December, 1849, by which the decree of the Court below was reversed, and a decree pronounced in favour of the [37] Appellant against the Collector, by whom all costs were ordered to be paid.

In October, 1851, the then Collector applied for a review of the decree: first, on the ground that according to the course of procedure then in force the question of the non-alienability of the Tora garas was not properly open to the consideration of the Sudder Court, but had been conclusively settled by the judgment of the Zillah; and secondly, that if such question was open, it had been erroneously decided.

This review appears to have been granted as a matter of course, without argument or reasons assigned by the Court; but nothing was done upon it till the month of April, 1853. At this time all the Judges of the Court who had heard the case argued, had been changed.

It is impossible to view, without jealousy, such a proceeding as this. The Government, which appoints the Judges, and removes them at pleasure, had raised a question of great general importance, which had been decided against it. Two years elapse before any application is made to the Court for a review of the judgment, and two more years elapse before the cause is brought on for rehearing before a new set of Judges.

Upon the matter being brought before them, these Judges were of opinion that the only question open to the Court was, whether, assuming the Tora garas not to be alienable, which they held to have been concluded by the decree of the Zillah Court, any demand could be made against Nusserwanjee Pestonjee to refund the purchase-money. The decision of the Sudder Court of 1849 was reversed [38] by an Order of the 20th of April, 1853, and the case was returned to the full Court to decide the last point.

Before, however, the cause came on again for hearing, an alteration was made in the law of special appeals by an Act of the Indian Legislative Council, which, in the opinion of the Judges, left the consideration of both questions open to them, and accordingly both questions were argued; and on the 16th of February, 1857, the Court pronounced the following decree:—"The Court are of opinion and decide, that Tora garas is not alienable, and that, therefore, Sumbhoolall took nothing by his purchase; and that his claim against the Collector must be thrown out; that Nusserwanjee Pestonjee guaranteed nothing, and, therefore, Sumbhoolall cannot come upon him to be reimbursed the amount of his purchase money, and, therefore, that his claim against Nusserwanjee Pestonjee must also be rejected. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed, with all costs against the Appellant."

The propriety of this decree we have now to consider.

Whatever may be the nature of the payments called Tora garas, and the right of the Bombay Government to refuse to treat them in ordinary cases as the subject of sale or mortgage, like other species of property, their Lordships cannot but entertain serious doubts whether it is consistent with justice to permit the Government to raise such a defence in this case, and as against the present Appellant.

As we have observed in going through the proceedings, the Government had recognized the rights of inheritance and succession in this identical pro-[39]-perty: it had authorized its subjects to consider that property of this description was the subject of sale; and it had had full and distinct notice of all the proceedings which took place in this particular sale. The purchase-money was paid into Court, and paid out to the creditor, and a conveyance of the property executed by the Judge of the Court to the Appellant, the Collector, that is, the officer of the Government, standing by and acquiescing in the proceedings, with full knowledge of the objection to the sale, if any objection existed.

That, after all this had taken place, the Government should insist, and that the Court should decide, that the purchaser took nothing by his conveyance, and that he should not only lose all his purchase-money, but pay all the costs which had been incurred in his attempt to obtain redress, seems hardly consistent with ordinary notions of justice.

But, if there were not this objection to the defence, their Lordships are of opinion, that the onus lies upon the Government to prove that there is something in the nature of this payment which makes it incapable of alienation, and that the Government has failed to give such proof.

Of any evidence of the origin of the particular payment in question, there is no trace to be found in the case. The investigations into this subject to which we have alluded, have led persons of great learning and ability to different conclusions. It is very probable that Tora garas huks had not all the same origin. Assuming, however, that they all began in wrong and violence, still, that which had a vicious origin may, in course of time, have been [40] legalized, since long enjoyment is itself a title, as well in favour of the recipient of an annual payment out of land, as of the possession of land itself.

The question here is, not whether the Government can be compelled to receive and hand over these sums, but, whether, actually receiving them, and having been in the receipt of them for very many years, it is entitled to say that it will not pay them to the alienee of the person to whom, but for the alienation, they would be paid.

The creditor in this case has sold, and the Appellant has purchased, such interest as the debtor had in the property sold. He will be by the transfer, in no better situation than the debtor. If this payment be conditional on the good conduct of the Grasias generally, or subject to any other condition; and if any circumstances should occur which would justify the Government in withholding the payment from Bharmulsungjee, they will equally justify the withholding it from the Appellant.

Whatever this payment may be, it clearly is not in the present case, on the evidence before us, at all analogous to the pay of a military officer, to which it was attempted at the Bar to liken it. It is not a personal payment in consideration of services to be personally performed. There is not the slightest trace of any services being claimable from Bharmulsungjee, and the mode in which he acquired the property seems to show that this is not the nature of the payment. The defence here raised by the Collector is not so much that the Huk is incapable of alienation, as that it cannot be alienated except to Grasias; but we are quite unable to find in the evi-[41]-dence, or, indeed, in any other source of information to which we have had access, any distinct account of what is meant by the term "Grasias." They do not appear to be any distinct class or tribe. If the term be used to describe freebooters, or lawless people generally, it makes the defence a very singular one.

Upon the whole, their Lordships are of opinion, that the Government has failed to establish its defence, even supposing such defence, under the circumstances, to be competent to it, and that the decree complained of must be reversed, and a decree pronounced in favour of the Appellant, with all the costs to which he has been put in the course of these proceedings.

With respect to Nusserwanjee Pestonjee, the Appellant must pay his costs, and have them over against the Collector.

A point is suggested in the appeal papers that the non-liability of this Toragaras to alienation had been established by the decree of the Zillah Court, and that this decision was not, according to the Regulations, subject to review by the Sudder Court.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the Order of the 20th of April, 1853, could be sustained as the law of procedure then stood, for however that may be, their Lordships are of opinion, that the subsequent Act of the Indian Legislature was rightly construed, and that the Court properly decided at the last hearing that the whole subject was open to their consideration.

The Appellant in this case has been kept for more than twenty years out of the possession of the annual payment to which he became entitled, and [42] has lost during the whole of that time, the interest on his purchase-money. Their Lordships think that they should do justice but very imperfectly if they were to award to him only the arrears of his annuity. The Government has been in the receipt of these sums which belonged to the Appellant. In 1842, the Government undertook to pay the money annually to the Adawlut, if a suit were instituted; if this had been done, and the fund has been invested, the Appellant will receive the amount. If the money has not been paid in (and we do not observe any allusion to such payment in the subsequent papers), we think that the Appellant must receive simple interest at the rate allowed by the Court on the arrears due when the suit was instituted, and on each subsequent payment as it accrued due.

Their Lordships will make a report to Her Majesty in conformity with the opinion which they have expressed.

A freehold interest cannot be created by parol or by an informal written instrument [8 Moo. Ind. App. 64, 65].

Disputes arose between the Indian Government and an adjacent proprietor, M. S., respecting a piece of alluvial land gained by accretion, of which M. S. was then in possession. The Indian Government required the land for public improvements. After some correspondence between the Government and M. S., an agreement was entered into, by which M. S. undertook to relinquish all claim to the proprietary right, and to rent the land from the Government, upon condition of the latter allowing him to remain in possession until the projected public improvements rendered it necessary for him to vacate the land. Possession was given to Government, M. S. holding the land from the Government at a fixed rent, and undertaking to quit possession at a month's notice. Improvements in the neighbourhood having been made by the Government, and M. S. being dead, notice to quit was served on M. S.'s representatives, who refused to quit, on the ground that the improvements were not such public improvements as were contemplated by the correspondence and agreement. In ejectment by the Government, Held:—

First; that M. S. was, under the agreement, a mere tenant at will [8 Moo. Ind. App. 64, 65].

Second; that ejectment was maintainable by the Government for recovery of the land, and that M. S.'s representatives had no defence at law to the action [8 Moo. Ind. App. 65].

Judgment of the Supreme Court affirmed, without prejudice to such equitable rights as M. S. might have under the correspondence and agreement [8 Moo. Ind. App. 65].

Ejectment by the lessors of the Respondent to recover possession of two pieces or parcels of land, situate between the Strand road and the river [44] Hooghly, in the town of Calcutta; one piece of land containing eleven cottahs, and one thirty forty-fifths of a chuttack, bounded on the South by Jackson's Ghaut; on the north by the land formerly in the occupation of Messrs. Jessop and Co., and unoccupied; on the west by the river Hooghly; and on the east by the Strand road; and the parcel of land containing one beegah, three cottahs, and eleven thirty-five forty-fifths of a chuttack; and bounded on the south by the Strand Mill Pucka Ghaut; on the north by certain lands in the occupation of Baboo Ramohun Mullick; on the west by the river Hooghly; and on the east by the Strand road.

The circumstances of the case were as follows:—

In the year 1841, the land in question, which was formed from the river Hooghly by accretion to the Strand road, was claimed by the East India Company, and by Baboo Muttylohl Seal, who was in possession. His right being disputed, Muttylohl Seal offered to lease the land from Government, so long as the Government did not require possession of the same.

In the year 1850, the Government being engaged in making arrangements with a view to improvements in connection with the Strand road, were, for that purpose, desirous of obtaining possession of the land on the river-bank between the Strand road and the river Hooghly. In accordance with the instructions of the Deputy-Governor of Bengal, Mr. W. H. Smoult, the then Solicitor to the East India Company at Calcutta, by a letter dated the 2nd of November, 1850, applied to Muttyloll Seal to surrender any right he had in the lands on the river-bank in order that he might not be an obstacle to the improvement [45] to be carried out; and in reply to such letter, Muttyloll Seal, on the 31st of March, 1851, sent a letter to Mr. Smoult, expressing his readiness to surrender all his interest in the property on two conditions—the first being, that he should not be required to surrender the land until the Government were prepared and actually began to carry out the proposed improvement on the Strand road; and the second had reference to the construction of a Ghaut on the banks of the river, in a manner therein mentioned.

It appeared that upon further consideration, Muttyloll Seal resolved not to insist upon these conditions, and, on the 10th of May, 1851, he sent a letter to Mr. A. Grant, the then Solicitor of the East India Company, which was as follows: “Sir,—In reference to an official letter from M. W. H. Smoult, then officiating Solicitor of the Honourable Company, of date the 2nd of November last, relating to the newly-formed land in front of the Strand Mills, of which I hold possession, I am quite ready to comply with the wishes of his Honour the Deputy-Governor, and to surrender all my interest in the property. I make this surrender in the full belief that it is the intention of the Government to reconstruct the Strand road; and that to obtain this most desirable purpose, it is necessary that they should be put in immediate possession of the land which I now hold; at the same time, I have to request that if any delay should take place, that the land which I now surrender may not in the meantime be let to other parties, or applied to any other purposes than that of a road, as it might, in such case, become a serious injury to my property immediately abutting on it to the eastward. I have also to request that the Government should [46] erect and build a Ghaut at their own expense on the banks of the river, precisely similar to that which is now erected and built at my own expense (only extending the Ghaut steps to the south side), as will appear by the enclosed plan. The columns, roof, and ornamental parts of the Ghaut I am to be allowed to build at my own cost and expense, should the Government be pleased to approve of the above proposals. I beg to be favoured with the honour of an answer.”

A copy of this letter was forwarded by Mr. A. Grant to Mr. J. P. Grant, Secretary to the Government of Bengal, and in conformity with the instructions of Government conveyed in a letter from Mr. J. P. Grant, of the 13th of June, 1851, Mr. A. Grant, on the 19th of June, 1851, sent the following letter to Muttyloll Seal:—“Sir,—I had the honour of receiving your letter of the 10th of May last, unconditionally surrendering your interest in the newly-formed land on the Strand bank of the river fronting the Strand Mills, and enclosing the ‘plan of the Flour Mill Ghaut,’ which letter and plan I had the honour to forward to the Bengal Government in copies. I am directed by the Deputy-Governor of Bengal to communicate to you, in reply to your letter, that His Honour is gratified by the course adopted by you. I am directed to say, you may be assured that, pending the execution of the project of the new Strand road, which has been for several years in the contemplation of Government, the land now surrendered by you will not be let to any other party. Respecting your request for the building of a Ghaut on the banks of the river, the columns, roof, and ornamental parts of which building you liberally offer to construct [47] at your own expense, the Deputy-Governor desires me to say that the erection of a proper number of Ghauts, at suitable places, is a part of the proposed plan of improvement, and the Government will gladly avail itself of your public-spirited offer when the time comes.”

On the 26th of July, 1851, Mr. L. Clarke, acting on behalf of Muttyloll Seal, wrote to Mr. C. R. M. Jackson, the then Advocate-General, as follows:—“In Mr. Secretary Grant’s letter to Baboo Muttyloll Seal, of the 19th June last, it is not distinctly stated, that the Ghaut which the Government undertake to construct in place of that which he built, and now surrenders, will be erected on the present site. I have explained to you why this is of consequence to Muttyloll, and you tell me that such is the intention of the present arrangement. Will you get a few lines from Mr. Grant to this effect, to remedy any misconception, should there be another incumbent in his office when the new Ghaut may be built?

Mr. Jackson showed this letter to Mr. Grant, the Secretary to the Government, and on the 4th of August, 1851, Mr. Grant wrote to Mr. Jackson a letter of that date, which was as follows:—“Sir,—With reference to the communication from Mr. L.

Clarke, of the 26th instant, made to you on the part of Baboo Muttylohl Seal, which you showed to me a few days ago, and which I have laid before the Honourable the Deputy-Governor of Bengal, I am directed by his Honour to say, that you can assure the Baboo that if the bank of the river and the Strand road remain as at present, the Ghaut, whereof he has announced his desire of erecting the columns, roof, and ornamental part alluded to in my letter to the [48] Company's solicitor, No. 1235, dated the 13th ult., will be erected where the Ghaut upon the land of which the Baboo now gives up possession, at present stands; but if, as is anticipated, a new road be made running in a line nearer to the river than the present line, the Ghaut will be erected on the river-bank immediately opposite the existing Ghaut aforesaid.

This letter was communicated to Muttylohl Seal and to Mr. L. Clarke, his professional adviser.

On the 27th of October, 1851, Mr. W. H. Elliot, the Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, proceeded to the premises with Muttylohl Seal, and possession was formally made over to Mr. Elliot on behalf of the Government, as proprietor of the soil, by Muttylohl Seal, and restored to Muttylohl Seal as a tenant at a fixed rent, removable at the pleasure of Government on one month's notice.

Previously to this transaction, personal interviews had taken place between Mr. Elliot and Muttylohl Seal, who had stated to Mr. Elliot his readiness to give up the land for "the purpose of a public road;" an expression which Mr. Elliot required to be corrected for that "of any public improvement," which was acceded to by Muttylohl Seal.

On the 11th of October, 1852, Muttylohl Seal executed an agreement which, after reciting that a dispute had long been pending between the Government of Bengal on the one part, and Muttylohl Seal on the other part, regarding the two parcels of land in question, proceeded as follows:—"And whereas it has been declared that the Government desire the land for the purpose of public improvements; and whereas it has been agreed between me and the Government, that on my giving up all claim to the proprietary [49] right and title in the land aforesaid, the Government will leave me in undisturbed possession thereof till such time as the projected improvements above alluded to shall render it necessary for me to vacate that land, and whereas I did, in the presence of many witnesses, on the 27th day of October last, proceed to the land aforesaid, and then and there make over my right and title in the said land to the Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, on behalf of the Government, and did afterwards receive from him possession of the land as a tenant, at the rent of Rs. 10 per annum: Now, I, being in good health of body and of sound mind, do hereby acknowledge that I have no claim whatever to the proprietary right of the land aforesaid, and that I will, year by year, and kist by kist, pay on demand, the sum of Company's Rs. 10 per annum for the rent of that land; and that when the projected improvements hereinbefore alluded to shall have been commenced, and shall have progressed so far as to render it necessary, for the further extension and continuation of such improvements, that I should vacate the said land, according to the true intent and meaning of these presents and of the agreement between me and Government, as appears in the correspondence with Mr. Secretary Grant relating to the subject, that then, and on receiving one month's notice to quit from the Chief Magistrate of Calcutta for the time being, or other officer duly authorised by Government to issue such notice, I will entirely give up and vacate possession of the said land, and remove from it all buildings and all goods and chattels of every kind whatsoever which to me and my undertenants may pertain, and will thenceforward utterly renounce all claim for myself, [50] my heirs and successors, to the possession, as I have already done to the right and title of the said land."

After the date of the above agreement, the improvements were commenced, under the authority of Government: and in the course of such improvements the Strand road was increased in width, and the land remaining between the road and the river was macadamised, so as to form an open quay, accessible from the Strand road, on which goods might be landed and conveyed in hackeries, and so as to be available for the relief of the traffic on the Strand road, one of the greatest thoroughfares in Calcutta.

In the year 1856, the improvements on and along the Strand road had extended up to the land in question, and it became necessary to obtain possession of the land for the further progress of the improvements. Muttyloll Seal was dead, and the Appellants, his executrix and executors, were then in possession.

On the 11th of September, 1856, a notice to quit at the expiration of one month from the time of service, was issued by the Chief Magistrate of Calcutta, and served upon the Appellants.

The Appellants refused to comply with the terms of the notice, when the East India Company brought an action of ejectment in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, on the plea side, against the Appellants to recover possession; and they afterwards obtained the common rule to defend their title to the land, as landlords, and a new plaint in ejectment was filed against the Appellants, who pleaded not guilty.

The action was tried before Sir James W. Colville, Knt., Chief Justice; and Sir Arthur Buller, Knt., [51] Puisne Judge. On the part of the lessors of the Respondent the evidence adduced proved, in substance, the facts and circumstances above detailed. The ground of defence set up by the Appellants was, that the "public improvements, referred to in the agreement, dated the 11th of October, 1852, were confined to the construction of a new Strand road; and that Muttyloll Seal thereby agreed to give up possession of the land for that purpose only; and that, inasmuch as in the course of the improvements that were being made, the land in question would not, as they alleged, be applied for the purposes of the road, they were not bound to give up possession of the land. At the conclusion of the trial the Court found and declared as a jury, amongst other things, first, that if it was part of the essence of the contract that a new Strand road should be made, and that the road should have attained a certain degree of progress to authorize the giving of the notice, then the Court found and declared that this had not been done, as there was clearly no road made, either in substitution or extension of the Strand road. Secondly, assuming that the work done on the ground which the Court were of opinion was in the nature of a wharf, was a public improvement, the Court held, that it had progressed so far as to entitle the lessors of the Respondent to demand possession of the two parcels of land, and found for the lessors of the Respondent. Thirdly, as to the agreement, the Court found that it referred to public improvements generally, and that improvements other than a new road were contemplated, and that the lessors of the Respondent were not bound to any particular improve-[52]-ment. The Court accordingly gave a verdict for the lessors of the Respondent.

The Appellants applied for and obtained a rule nisi calling on the lessors of the Respondent to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial had, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, and also on the ground of misdirection. The rule came on to be argued on the 13th of May, 1857, before the same Judges, and, after argument, was discharged.

The present appeal was from the verdict and judgment of the Supreme Court, and the Order made upon the rule nisi for setting aside the verdict.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellants.—This case turns upon the construction and effect to be given to the informal instrument of the 11th of October, 1852, by which Muttyloll Seal agreed to give up and vacate the two parcels of alluvial land in question, coupled with the correspondence imported by express reference into that agreement. The principal question will be, whether the lessors of the Respondent have brought themselves within the terms of the agreement, so as to be entitled to eject the Appellants. Our contention is, that the Government have not constructed a public road, which we submit, was one of the conditions on which the two parcels of land were agreed to be surrendered. Except under this agreement, there is no evidence of title in the East India Company to the land. By the agreement, Muttyloll Seal abandoned his proprietary rights upon three conditions: first, that the land should be ap-[53]-plied to no other purpose than the construction of a new road; secondly, that the Government should erect a Ghaut upon the banks of the river at a certain place; and, thirdly, that he should not be required to vacate possession until the works agreed to be carried out had progressed so far as to complete the new road. The terms "projective improvements" and "public improvements" mentioned in the agreement can only refer to those mentioned or projected in the correspondence. Now, there is nothing in the agreement itself which would enable it to be enforced: the terms being too vague and too general. The Government must, therefore, stand upon their original title, and try the question whether Muttyl-loll Seal's representatives are entitled to the land, as if no surrender had been made by him of his proprietary rights: for, we submit, that the agreement of October 1852 passed a freehold interest to Muttyloll Seal which was continued in the Appellants. The Government must certainly show that the work in progress at the date of the notice to quit was a projected improvement within the meaning of the agreement and the correspondence. Now, it was found by the Court, acting as a jury, that the work in progress was not in the nature of a road; and, it appears from the evidence, that the construction of a new public road between the old Strand road and the river Hooghly, was the improvement contemplated and agreed on at the date of the agreement, and that such new road and a new Ghaut were the only improvements projected or contemplated at that period. The verdict, therefore, ought not to have been for the lessors of the Respondent. The Court ought to have directed itself, sitting as a jury, to inquire and find what particular [54] improvements were projected or contemplated, and if the improvements contemplated by one of the parties differed from those contemplated by the others, then the improvement contemplated by Muttyloll Seal, which was the construction of the new public road, ought to have been held by the Court to be the improvement contemplated by the agreement, and this construction is clear from the correspondence, imported into the agreement by express words of reference—[Lord Chelmsford: Let me put the view of the case which has been suggested by one of their Lordships, and a very important one it is. Muttyloll Seal was a proprietor, under some sort of title to the land in question. He was a Hindoo, and he could by the Hindoo law pass land without writing. He has actually done so in this case, without delivery of possession. Now, what character was he clothed with in respect to that land? He was not a tenant from year to year, because I think the terms of the agreement show that a tenancy from year to year is excluded. He could not be a tenant at will, because a month's notice is inconsistent with the idea of a tenancy at will. A tenant at will is liable to be turned out without any notice at all. The agreement could not imply a licence to occupy the ground, because the East India Company, who must have given the licence, are a corporation, and the licence could only be given under their seal. What defence, therefore, to an action of ejectment could the Appellants have against the claim of the East India Company? If the Appellants have been induced to enter into the agreement by improper practices and suggestions, it might be set aside, or relief given in a Court of Equity; but so far as the agree-[55]-ment is concerned, we must look to the legal rights of the parties in ejectment. What defence then have you to the action?—The Appellants were entitled to hold possession until the public improvements had been completed and a month's notice had been given to require them to vacate. The verdict, we contend, is bad, first, as it is against evidence; and secondly, on the ground of misdirection, that the improvements made were not the contemplated improvements, and there ought, therefore, to be a new trial.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., Mr. Maule, and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the East India Company.—Under the terms of the agreement of the 11th of October, 1852, and the correspondence therein referred to, the works in progress on the Strand road were public improvements within the meaning of that instrument. It was no part of the agreement between Muttyloll Seal and the Government, that the land should be taken by the Government, only if required for the purpose of a new road, nor was there any such understanding on the part of Muttyloll Seal. The purposes for which the land was required by Government were in accordance with the understanding of the parties as well as the words of the agreement. Muttyloll Seal must be considered as holding under a title from the Government. The surrender of such interest as he had in the land was unconditional. That being so, and the notice to quit the land in question being properly issued and served upon the Appellants, they were not justified in refusing to comply with the notice, and there was, therefore, no defence in ejectment to this action. As the verdict [56] was fully warranted in law and by the evidence, it would be useless, considering the title of the Appellants to the land in question, to refer the case back for a new trial.

by the lessors of the Respondent against the Appellants, and also from an Order of that Court discharging a rule non subsequently obtained, to set aside the verdict and for a new trial.

This ejectment was brought to recover two pieces of land lying between the Strand road and the river Hooghly, in the town of Calcutta. This land had been gained from the river Hooghly by accretion, and, at the time of the transactions out of which the ejectment arose, was in the possession of Muttyloll Seal, since deceased, as the ostensible owner. His claim was, however, disputed by the East India Company; and Muttyloll Seal, in the year 1841, appears to have been willing to have admitted their right to the land, for in two letters of the dates respectively of the 25th of August and the 4th of November, 1841, he proposed to take it on a lease, "or, if Government were not agreeable to that, he wished them to give him a written assurance that he was to keep possession so long as they did not require the said plots for some other purposes themselves." Whether anything took place upon these letters nowhere appears; but Muttyloll Seal continued in the undisturbed possession of the two pieces of land from that time down to the year 1851. The Government, for [57] many years before 1851, had it in contemplation to construct a new road in lieu of the old Strand road; and in that year the project seems to have been seriously taken up, and application was made to Muttyloll Seal to give up the land in question for this purpose. These two pieces of land were immediately in front of other land the undoubted property of Muttyloll Seal, from which they were only separated by the public highway called the Strand road, so that by the possession of them he and his tenants had immediate and uninterrupted access to the river. Muttyloll Seal had also built a Ghaut, with steps leading down to the river upon other alluvial land abutting on one of the two pieces of land in question.

There can be no doubt that when application was first made to Muttyloll Seal to surrender the land, he believed that the project of the Government was to make a new Strand road, and, also, that this was the improvement originally contemplated by them. His expectation appears clearly from the first letter upon the subject, written by him to Mr. Smout, the Solicitor of the East India Company, on the 31st of March, 1851, in which one of the conditions for which he stipulates is, that "he shall not be required to surrender the land until the Government are prepared, and do actually begin to carry out the proposed improvement on the Strand road." It is true that in his subsequent letter, written to Mr. Archibald Grant, the new Solicitor to the East India Company, on the 10th of May, 1851, he does not insist upon this condition; but he states explicitly—"I make this surrender in the full belief that it is the intention of the Government to reconstruct the Strand road, and that to obtain this most desirable purpose [58] it is necessary that they should be put in immediate possession of the land which I now hold; at the same time I have to request that if any delay should take place, that the land which I now surrender may not, in the mean time, be let to other parties, or applied to any other purposes than that of a road, as it might, in such case, become a serious injury to my property immediately abutting on it to the eastward."

What was the improvement which was contemplated by the Government at this time is shown by the answer of Mr. Archibald Grant to Muttyloll Seal of the 13th of June, 1851, after a communication from the Secretary to the Government, in which, treating the letter of Muttyloll Seal as an unconditional surrender of his interest in the newly-formed land on the Strand bank of the river, he adds:—"I am directed by the Deputy-Governor of Bengal to communicate to you, in reply to your letter, that his Honour is gratified by the course adopted by you. I am directed to say you may be assured that, pending the execution of the project of a new Strand road, which has been for several years in the contemplation of Government, the land now surrendered by you will not be let to any other party."

It has been observed in argument, that Muttyloll Seal, imposes no condition upon the Government that they shall "reconstruct" the Strand road, but merely makes the surrender "in the full belief" that this is their intention: that although he requests that, if any delay takes place, the land shall not be applied to any other purposes than a road, as well as that it shall not be let to other parties, the letter accepting the surrender is confined to an assurance that, pend-[59]-ing the execution of the project, the land will not be let to any other party, and that the surrender of his interest is, to his own knowledge, treated as having been made unconditionally from all which it is inferred that Muttyloll Seal must have known, or at least have had strong grounds for believing, that the plan of the Government was not necessarily confined to the formation of a new Strand road.

Down to this period of the correspondence, however, there does not appear to have been any other improvement in contemplation; nor was there anything to lead Muttyloll Seal to believe that the land in question was wanted for any other purpose than for a road.

But before the actual surrender took place, some intimation was given, which might have been sufficient to lead him (in some degree at least) to expect some alteration of the original Government scheme of improvement. In his letter to Mr. Archibald Grant, containing his offer to surrender the land, he says:—"I have also to request that the Government should erect and build a Ghaut at their own expense, on the banks of the river, precisely similar to that which is now erected and built at my own expense (only extending the Ghaut steps to the south side), as will appear by the inclosed plan. The columns, roof and ornamental parts of the Ghaut I am to be allowed to build at my own cost and expense, should the Government be pleased to approve of the above proposals. I beg to be favoured with the honour of an answer.

And, in answer, he had been told:—"Respecting your request for the building of a Ghaut on the banks of the river, the columns, roof and ornamental parts [60] of which building you liberally offer to construct at your own expense, the Deputy-Governor desires me to say that the erection of a proper number of Ghauts at suitable places is a part of the proposed plan of improvement, and the Government will gladly avail itself of your public-spirited offer when the time comes."

Mr. Longueville Clarke, who was the adviser of Muttyloll Seal, on the 26th of July, 1851, wrote for an explanation to the then Advocate-General, as follows:—"My dear Jackson,—In Mr. Secretary Grant's letter to Baboo Muttyloll Seal, of the 19th of June last, it is not distinctly stated that the Ghaut which the Government undertake to construct in place of that which he built, and now surrenders, will be erected on the present site. I have explained to you why this is of consequence to Muttyloll, and you tell me that such is the intention of the present arrangement. Will you get a few lines from Mr. Grant to this effect, to remedy any misconception, should there be another incumbent in his office when the new Ghaut may be built?"

To which the Secretary of the Government returned this answer on the 4th of August, 1851:—"Sir,—With reference to the communication from Mr. Longueville Clarke of the 26th instant, made to you on the part of Baboo Muttyloll Seal, which you showed to me a few days ago, and which I have laid before the Honourable the Deputy-Governor of Bengal, I am directed by His Honour to say, that you can assure the Baboo that if the bank of the river and the Strand road remain as at present, the Ghaut whereof he has announced his desire of erecting the columns, roof and ornamental part alluded to in my letter to the [61] Company's solicitor, No. 1235, dated the 13th ult., will be erected when the Ghaut upon the land of which the Baboo now gives up possession at present stands: but if, as is anticipated, a new road be made, running in a line nearer to the river than the present line, the Ghaut will be erected on the river bank, immediately opposite the existing Ghaut aforesaid. I have, etc., J. P. Grant, Secretary to the Government of Bengal."

This letter was not only communicated to Muttyloll Seal, but it is referred to expressly in the agreement of the 11th of October, 1852, which was signed by him after his actual surrender of the land, and which agreement was prepared by Mr. Clarke on his behalf.

It certainly does appear extraordinary, if it was intended that the land should be surrendered only upon condition that a new Strand road should be made, that they did not at once reject the idea of there being the least uncertainty upon that subject, and insist upon a literal compliance with this condition, as the price of the surrender of the land.

It is to be observed, that this letter was written nearly three months before the actual surrender, which took place on the 27th of October, 1851. Before this event Muttyloll Seal had conversations with Mr. Elliot; but although he states that in one of them "the Baboo said he would give up the land only for a public road," and Mr.

Elliot insisted upon the alteration of the terms to any "public improvement," yet as he cannot fix the time of this particular conversation, but can only say it was "before signing the agreement B" (the agreement of the 11th of October, 1852), it cannot fairly be taken to have occurred before the delivery of possession.

[62] However, on the 27th of October, 1851, Mr. Elliot says:—"I proceeded to the premises with Muttyloll Seal after the verbal agreement: possession was formally made over to me on behalf of Government, as proprietor of the soil on the 27th of October, 1851, by Baboo Muttyloll Seal in person, in presence of numerous witnesses, and restored to the Baboo as a tenant removeable at the pleasure of Government on one month's notice, as per separate agreement; a previous day had been fixed, and it was postponed to Monday, the 27th of October, 1851."

Some little difficulty has arisen as to the meaning of the words used by Mr. Elliot, "as per separate agreement." Upon turning, however, to the evidence of Mr. Clarke, who was present at the delivery of possession, after speaking of the Bengalee Kaboolat signed at the time, he says, "There was also an agreement to be signed"; so that Mr. Elliot, by the words "as per separate agreement," must be understood to refer to an agreement to be afterwards made, which was to contain the terms upon which Muttyloll Seal was to be allowed to remain in possession. It can hardly be contended, that before this agreement was entered into, Muttyloll Seal had any interest in the land which could have been available against an ejectment brought by the East India Company upon the legal title acquired by his formal delivery to them.

Then, did the agreement of the 11th of October, 1852, place him in a better situation for resisting the enforcement of their rights in a Court of law? The Appellants contend that the proper construction of this agreement is, that they are entitled to hold possession until a month's notice has been given, [63] after the new Strand road should have progressed so far as to render it necessary, for its further extension and continuation, that they should vacate the land; and that although there is no express mention of the road in the agreement, yet that the words "public improvements" and "projected improvements" hereinbefore alluded to, must be interpreted by reference to the correspondence with Mr. Secretary Grant, to mean nothing else but the new Strand road.

But against this construction must be set the reference to the letter to Mr. Secretary Grant of the 4th of August, 1851, showing that the alteration of the Strand road was not definitively decided upon, and the conversation with Mr. Elliot before this agreement was signed, in which he insisted upon the general words "public improvements" being inserted, for the very purpose of preventing its being alleged that Muttyloll Seal had given up his land only for a public road. Now, construing the agreement by the aid which these circumstances afford, it would rather appear that whatever interest Muttyloll Seal had in the possession, was contingent, not upon the formation of the new Strand road, but upon the public improvements, of whatever nature the Government might ultimately determine to execute in this direction.

Of course, if this is the correct construction, then, even if Muttyloll Seal's interest under the agreement was a legal one, it was determined by the notice given on behalf of the East India Company. But the real question upon the agreement is, whether it created any legal interest of any description. For the purpose of this consideration let it be assumed that the "public [64] improvements" intended by the agreement, were the formation of a new Strand road, and that, consequently, Muttyloll Seal's possession was contingent upon the progress of that road. The lessors of the Plaintiff had become the absolute owners of the land, and, upon the proposed assumption, they would have let Muttyloll Seal into possession under an agreement that they would not disturb him until after a month from a contingent uncertain event. What was the nature of this interest? Did it create any tenancy between the parties? If so, of what description? It certainly was not a tenancy for years; nor from year to year; nor for a year certain; nor for a month; nor for any other certain time. In the course of the argument for the Appellants, it was suggested that the agreement passed a freehold interest, and, certainly, from the indefinite character of the interest given, it seems best to answer this description. If the agreement could have created such an interest, there being no measure assigned by years or by any portion of time, although the stipulated rent was to be payable yearly, it could be nothing less than a freehold, and a freehold which would not end with Muttyloll Seal's life, because, as he was a Hindoo, no words of inheritance were requisite to continue his interest to his heirs. The consequence would be, that his death not determining it, it would enure to their benefit, and have an indefinite duration till determined by a notice on the occurrence of the event contemplated. Now, an interest of this nature could not be created by parol, or by a mere writing, such as the instrument of the 11th of October, 1852, which, therefore, could operate only as an agreement. Muttyloll Seal having been admitted, or holding, under this agreement, and the same sort of possession being [65] continued by the Appellants, he and they after him could not be treated as trespassers, but were in as tenants at-will; of course, such a tenancy was determinable by the mere bringing of an ejectment.

This appears to be the correct construction of the agreement, so far as the legal rights of the parties flowing out of it are concerned. It passed no legal interest out of the East India Company to Muttyloll Seal. The Company did not grant, nor did they intend to grant, as Hindoos; if they had so intended, they must have failed in their intention, for they could only grant according to law. Yet the instrument was binding upon them as an agreement, and a Court of equity would have protected the Appellants against any attempt to dispossess them contrary to its stipulations. Notwithstanding the provision which it contains for a month's notice, the East India Company might have maintained an ejectment the day after the agreement was entered into, because it passed no legal interest, but they could have been instantly restrained from proceeding by a Court of equity.

Their Lordships, in determining this case, have confined themselves strictly to the legal rights of the parties, and have purposely abstained from expressing any opinion upon the equitable considerations which may be involved in it. They decide only that the ejectment was maintainable, and that the Appellants had no defence to it at law; and this decision is made without prejudice to any equitable rights of the Appellants, which must be understood to be fully reserved to them.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Judicature be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

[66] SONATUN BYSACK,—Appellant; SREEMUTTY JUGGUTSOONDREE DOSSEE,—Respondent * [Nov. 30, Dec. 2, 1859].

On Appeal from the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

Although the Courts in India recognize the power of a Hindoo to make a Will, yet the extent of the power of disposition by a Testator is to be regulated by the Hindoo law, and cannot interfere with a widow's right to a proper maintenance.

A Hindoo by Will, gave all his moveable and immoveable property to his family idol; and after stating that he had four sons, he directed that his property should never be divided by them, their sons, or grandsons in succession, but that they should enjoy "the surplus proceeds only"; and the Will, after appointing one of the sons manager to the estate, to attend to the festivals and ceremonies of the idol and maintain the family, further directed, that whatever might be the surplus, after deducting the whole of the expenditure, the same should be added to the corpus, and in the event of a disagreement between the sons and family, the Testator directed, that after the expenses attending the estate, the idol, and maintenance of the members of the family, whatever net produce and surplus there might be, should be divided annually in certain proportions among the members of the family. At the date of the Will the family were joint in estate, food, and worship. The accumulations of the income were divided as directed by the Will. Held,—

First, that the bequest to the idol was not an absolute gift, but was to be construed as a gift to the Testator's four sons and their offspring in the male line, as a joint family, so long as the family remained joint, and that the four sons were entitled to the surplus of the property, after providing for the performance of the ceremonies and festivals of the idol, and the provisions in the Will for maintenance [8 Moo. Ind. App. 85-88].

Second, that the fact of the division of the income arising out of the Testator's estate among the members of the family after the Testator's death did not constitute a division of the family [8 Moo. Ind. App. 86].

One of the sons of the Testator died, leaving three sons, one of whom also died without issue, leaving a widow.

Held further, that the direction contained in the Will that the property should go in the male line did not exclude the widow of the grandson of the Testator, and that the widow was entitled to a third share of a fourth part of the property and accumulation, without prejudice to her rights as a Hindoo widow when the property should be divided [8 Moo. Ind. App. 87].

Randoss Bysack, a Hindoo inhabitant of Decca, in Bengal, died in the year 1848, leaving large self-acquired estate, consisting of moveable and im-[67]-moveable property, situate in that Province, having, on the 13th of February, 1848, made a Will in the Bengalee language, of which the following is a translation:—

"Being now far advanced in age, and being about making preparations to proceed to the holy place of Eshshor Sree Brindabun, I have (of my own free will in sound health and settled mind) with the view of making a Will of the whole of whatever properties I possess and the same being in future brought into operation specified below the distribution of all my properties which will accordingly be carried into effect. First.—Independently of my paternal concerns I having by my own earnings acquired in this district of Dacca and in the town of Calcutta etc. brick-built houses Zemindary and Talooks or landed estates and rent-free lands and Company's promissory notes and divers other mercantile transactions and cloth merchandize and gold and silver and precious stones and shawls and roomals etc. various self-acquired properties in my own name and in the names of my own sons and also in the fictitious names of other persons have been passing my time wherein none of my paternal property or money etc. was concerned the whole of the said properties I have obtained by my own exertions. Whatever has been produced and increased (through the means of my [68] funds) by the labours of my two sons namely Sree Krishnomungle and Sree Manikchund Bysack the whole of that too being blended together has been applied to the banking and mercantile transactions etc. and the purchase of lands and tenures. The acquisitions of even the sons are not held separate. Second.—The whole of my aforesaid moveable and immoveable properties I have granted to Sree Sree Joot Eshshore Muddunmohun Thakoor (the idol so called) which I have established in the house of which he is the Malik or proprietor. I am not indebted to any person at present. I have four sons, that is Sree Krishnomungle and Sree Manikchund, and Sree Shamchund and Sree Juggurnauth Bysack are in existence. Among these my above-mentioned properties shall never be divided and partitioned and the said sons or their offspring etc., that is to say, their sons and grandsons, heirs in succession, shall not have the power of alienating any one of my aforesaid properties by gift or sale, etc. If they do so the same shall be inadmissible before the administrator of justice and neither the whole of the above-mentioned properties nor any part thereof shall be liable to sequestration or auction sale for the debts of the heirs and successors. After my demise, my sons, grandsons, et cetera, heirs, shall have the power of enjoying the surplus proceeds only. Third.—From the time present my eldest son, Sree Krishnomungle Bysack shall as a servant of the Eshshore Thakoor control over and manage the entire estate and maintain the members of the family and whenever and whatsoever acts and business and the ceremonies and festivals etc. of the Thakoors or the deities [69] shall occur he shall perform some according to his own discretion. Whatever may be the overplus after the deduction of the whole of the expenditures the same shall be added to my said estates and other properties, or Company's papers shall be purchased, or any mercantile speculation which may be advantageous shall be entered into therewith. Fourth.—After the death of Sree Krishnomungle, in accordance with the provisions specified in the 3rd clause, Sree Manikchund Bysack being director and performer of the divine services and manager shall exercise his control over all. In the like manner in the event of Manikchund's departing this life, amongst my heirs, whoever may exist and be the oldest in age he shall exercise similar control and shall perform the whole of the affairs. Fifth.—Should no agreement and unanimity at all exist among my heirs then the profits of the mercantile transactions and traffics and banking and of the landed estates and rents of houses and on account of various interests of description etc. whatever money shall be received belonging to my estate from that first of all the public revenue and the charges of the interior and the expenses of the repairs of the houses being deducted whatever surplus may remain out of that the expenses of the idols and of the established and contingent affairs of the family and occasional acts and ceremonies and the expenses on account of the maintenance of the members of the family and connection etc. being deducted whatever nett-produce and overplus there may be the same being adjusted annually six annas portion of the said overplus money Sree Krishnomungle Bysack and his children and six annas share Sree Manikchund Bysack and his [70] children and two annas share Sree Shamchund Bysack and his children and two annas share Sree Juggernauth Bysack and his children shall be entitled to receive having the same apportioned. With the exception of these none of my children shall have (upon any plea) the power of claiming any increased share. Should they ever do so they shall be inadmissible. In consideration of the increase of the capital fortune which has been effected by the labors of Krishnomungle and Manikchund somewhat increased shares have been given to them. None shall have any power of raising any objection thereto. And after the demise of my sons their respective male issues down to sons and sons' sons etc. heirs in succession, shall be entitled to the share of the aforesaid amount of the surplus profits belonging to their respective fathers. And whatever portion of the father's share shall (according to the Shastra or Hindoo law) be lawfully due to whomsoever of the heirs he shall receive such portion of the profits. Should (owing to the non-existence of heirs in the lineage of male issue) a daughter or daughter's son be empowered to receive any share then such person shall receive a stipend which may be merely enough for food clothes and shall have no power of claiming the share of the profits. Sixth.—To whomsoever whatever streedhan has been given and to whomsoever whatever may in future be given that woman is the rightful owner of the same none else have any power of laying the hands of an heir thereupon. With the exception thereof all other whatever personal properties of gold and silver etc. there are, all the children shall have the power of using them with discretion [71] and as occasion may require and when should they be compelled to be separate then they shall receive them according to the above-mentioned proportions. Seventh.—In the event of any property out of the whole of my properties above enumerated (by becoming old or damaged have the appearance of being injured or otherwise owing to any irresistible cause) be likely to become deteriorated then the clauses above specified shall not be a bar against making a sale or exchange of such property."

Probate was granted to this Will by the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

The testator left four sons; Krishnomungle Bysack, Manikchund Bysack, Shamchund Bysack and Juggurnauth Bysack, and one widow, him surviving, and constituted a joint and undivided Hindoo family.

Krishnomungle Bysack died intestate in June, 1850, leaving three sons, the Appellant, Sonatun Bysack, Hurrymohun Bysack and Kistodoss Bysack, and a widow.

In the year 1849, Hurrymohun Bysack, one of the grandsons of the Testator, married the Respondent, and afterwards died, intestate and childless, leaving the Respondent his widow and heir him surviving.

The Respondent, then an infant, by her next friend, filed a Bill in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, against Manickhund Bysack, Shamchund Bysack, Juggurnauth Bysack, the Appellant, and Kistodoss Bysack. The Bill set forth the principal facts above stated, and charged that the Respondent, as the widow and legal representative of Hurrymohun Bysack, deceased, was entitled to an interest for life in his estate, and that such interest extended to a third of six annas of [72] the estate of the Testator under the Will, and to a third of the estate of Krishnomungle Bysack, that might have accrued since the death of the Testator; and the Bill charged that the limitation and restriction in the Will as to none but males inheriting was too remote, and, therefore, void, and that her father-in-law, Krishnomungle Bysack, was upon a true construction of the Will entitled to an absolute six annas share in the estate of Ramdoss Bysack, and that Krishnomungle Bysack and his son were in like manner entitled to a six annas share of the accumulations thereof since the death of Ramdoss Bysack. That, even if the Court should be of opinion that the estate to which the Plaintiff's husband was entitled became divested, by his dying without male issue, still the limitations in the Will of Ramdoss Bysack could not in any way control or alter any of the accumulations made since his death; that under no circumstances whatsoever could a Will operate so as to deprive a Hindoo widow of such a maintenance out of the estate of her husband as would be suitable to his means; and the Plaintiff submitted, that although the Company's Courts, as well as the Supreme Court, had declared the power of Hindoos to make Wills, yet that such Wills must not be in derogation of any rights of parties entitled to maintenance or otherwise under the Hindoo law. And the Bill further charged that the descendants of Ramdoss Bysack were a Hindoo family, joint in estate, food and worship, and that no partition had ever been made of the same; and that the disposal of the Testator's moveable and immoveable property to the idol, Sree Joot Esshore Muddenmohun Thakoor, was [73] void; and that the restriction upon alienation contained also in the second clause was void, as tending to create a perpetuity; and, lastly, that having regard to the whole of the Will, the trust, if any, in favour of the idol could only be construed as a trust to the extent of what is sufficient to keep up the worship of the idol in a proper and becoming manner, having regard to the position of the Testator's family; and the Bill prayed, first, that the Will of Ramdoss Bysack might be carried out under the Order and direction of the Court, and that the rights of the Plaintiff and Defendants, the parties interested therein, also of the idol, might be ascertained and declared; secondly, that an account might be taken of the estate of Ramdoss Bysack, at the time of his death; thirdly, that an account also might be taken of the estate of Krishnomungle Bysack; fourthly, that as far as the Plaintiff was concerned, a partition might take place, and that she might be decreed to be entitled to hold her share, whatever that may be, in severalty for her life; fifthly, that if the Court should be of opinion that the husband of the Plaintiff was not entitled to any interest either in the estate of Ramdoss Bysack, or of the accumulation since his death, then that she might be declared entitled to a suitable maintenance out of the estate of Ramdoss Bysack and the accumulations thereof. And lastly, for an account of what amount of property was requisite to be set aside and appropriated for the due performance of the worship of the idol.

The Defendant, Manickhund Bysack, and the Appellant, filed a joint answer to the Bill. The answer stated, that some accumulations were made of the income of the property left by the Testator, first by his two eldest [74] sons, and subsequently to the death of Krishnomungle by Manickhund alone; and that such accumulations, up to the death of Hurrymohun, in the year 1258, B.E., from the death of the Testator, amounted to a nett sum of Rs. 21,512 2, and that further accumulations had been made since the death of Hurrymohun up to the end of the year 1261, B.E., amounting to the nett sum of Rs. 54,401 3. 6, and that the accumulations made up to the year 1259, B.E., estimated at Rs. 47,792 2. 6, had been divided among the whole of the Defendants, the Respondent having resided with them up to the last-mentioned date, and accordingly received her maintenance from them; and that the remainder of such accumulations had been received, and were then in the possession of the Defendant, Manickhund, as manager and executor under the Will; and that the descendants of the Testator had always been and still were a Hindoo family, joint in estate, food, and worship, excepting as to the Defendants, Shamchund Bysack and Juggurnauth Bysack, who had become separate in food only from the other members of the joint family, and that no partition had ever been made among the descendants of the Testator of the joint estate, except so far as such accumulations up to the end of the Bengalee year 1259, which had been divided among them as aforesaid, could be called a partition; and the answer submitted to the Court the points of law raised and charged by the Bill in regard to the rights of the Respondent, as widow and heiress-at-law of Hurrymohun Bysack, in respect to the joint estate of the Testator, and the accumulations aforesaid: and it was by the answer contended, that she was only entitled to maintenance, which the Respondent had received [75] from the Defendants, as long as she had remained in their house; and that they had all along been ready and willing and had offered to maintain the Respondent. The answer of the Defendant, Shamchund Bysack, was similar in its statements to the above answer. The other two Defendants, Juggurnauth Bysack and Kistodoss Bysack, infants, by their guardian, filed the usual infants' answer.

An Order was made by the Supreme Court on the 28th of July, 1857, with the consent of the Defendants, that the Plaintiff should be allowed Rs. 100 per mensem for her maintenance.

The cause was heard on the 4th of August, 1857, and the Court by a decretal Order of that date declared and decreed, that the Respondent, as the widow and heiress of Hurrymohun Bysack, was entitled to a share in the estate formerly belonging to the Testator, but the Court reserved the question as to what should be the amount of such share until the Master had made his report upon the inquiries therein directed; and the decretal Order then directed accounts to be taken of the moveable and immoveable estate of the Testator, and of the rents and profits of the immoveable estate, and of the accumulations of the moveable and immoveable estate; and the decretal Order directed the Master to inquire and report what parts of the estate were outstanding and undisposed of, and whether any division of the accumulations, or of the surplus income of the estate, had taken place; and between whom and in what shares and proportions, and what portion of the income of the Testator's estate had been applied in or towards the support of the family idol, or for the performance of the religious and other ceremonies connected with the worship of [76] such idol; and what provision should be made, and what part of the estate should be set apart for the future maintenance of such family worship. All further directions and the costs of the suit were reserved until after the Master had made his report.

The judgment pronounced by the Court, consisting of the Chief Justice, Sir James W. Colville, Sir Arthur Buller, and Sir Charles R. M. Jackson, Puisne Judges, in making the above decretal Order was as follows:—"The question in this cause is, how far the rights of the Plaintiff, as the widow and heiress of Hurrymohun Bysack, in the ancestral estate which was left by Ramdoss Bysack, her husband's grandfather, are affected or varied by the document which is admitted to be the last Will and Testament of Ramdoss Bysack. The effect of the earlier dispositive clauses is to give nominally the whole of the Testator's property to his family Thakoor, but not by way of a religious endowment, properly so called. On the contrary, the Testator's plain intention is, that, subject to a proper provision for the performance of the ceremonies in favour of this idol, the amount of which seems to be left to the discretion of the managing member, his family should, as a joint Hindoo family, continue to enjoy his property, not only drawing the income from land and other fixed investments, but continuing to carry on his banking business, or embarking his capital in other mercantile speculations. It is, therefore, almost conceded, that no effect can be given to the last sentence in the second clause, which denies to the sons and other remoter descendants the power of alienation, and seeks to withdraw the property from liability to their debts, even though incurred in carrying on the trade authorized, if not enjoined, by the Testator. Such [77] provisions are obviously inconsistent with the nature of the interest in the property given, and with the use to be made of it. It would be strange if under colour of a bequest in favour of an idol, a man could not only enjoy property, but trade with it, without subjecting his beneficial interest in it to the just demands of his creditors. The utmost effect that can be given to such a disposition, is to treat the religious trust as over-riding the beneficial interest of the party in possession, and constituting a prior charge upon the property. Such was the view taken of a similar disposition by the late Chief Justice in his judgment in Doe dem. Sibchunder Doss v. Sibkissen Bannerjee

(1 Boulnois, p. 72). In the fifth clause of the Will, the Testator provides for a different state of things, namely, that in which 'no agreement and unanimity at all exist among my heirs.' We are inclined to think that he meant the provisions in restraint of alienation to over-ride this clause, but contemplated a state of things in which his heirs would be unable to agree in the application of the surplus income, and would cease to enjoy it as an undivided Hindoo family. To meet that state of things, he provides that his two eldest sons by whose personal exertions the fortune had, in part, been made, and their respective children, shall each have a six annas share; whilst the two younger sons and their respective descendants shall each take only a two annas share. And this provision is followed by the clause upon which the present contention arises; the effect of which seems to us to be, that the shares so given are to pass not in the course of legal succession, but perpetually in the male line, daughters and daughter's sons being excluded and declared entitled to maintenance only. It seems to [78] be agreed that this disposition, if effectual in law, would by implication, though it does not so expressly, exclude the Plaintiff who claims as widow and heiress of a childless grandson. If the question were untouched by authority, we should be of opinion that the testamentary power, engrafted upon the general Hindoo law by the custom of Bengal, which has been recognised and established by repeated decisions, must be taken to exist, subject to those restraints which the general policy of the law imposes on the exercise of testamentary power in general; and in particular that it cannot enable a Hindoo Testator to alter perpetually the legal course of succession to his property by making it pass for all time to those who, taking not as a legal but as substituted heirs, would, according to our phrase, take not by descent but by purchase. But, in truth we are bound to hold this, unless we are prepared to overrule the decision of the Court when presided over by the late Chief Justice in Luckunchunder Seal v. Kooramoney Dossee (1 Boulnois). In that case, the Court, in the first instance, dismissed the Bill of the Plaintiffs, who claimed by virtue of a disposition very similar in its terms to the present; and ultimately and on a re-hearing, upheld the disposition only in respect of the property which was to be governed by the law of the Testator's domicile; it having been proved that he died domiciled at Chinsurah whilst Chinsurah was still a Dutch Factory, and that the Roman-Dutch law which had been introduced into the settlement recognised the validity of such a disposition. It is, however, contended, that we can mould the clause so as to give effect to the Testator's intentions within the limits in which, without trenching on the rule against per-[79]-petuities, he might alter the course of succession; and that we ought to do so by construing the clause as one giving estates for life only to his son, Krishnomungul, and after him to his three sons, of whom all, including the Plaintiff's husband, are admitted to have been born in the lifetime of the Testator. But this would be a very arbitrary proceeding, and tantamount to making a new Will for the Testator. Nor do we see how it could be done according to the doctrine of Cy-pres, or any of the other English rules of construction which are so much discussed in the case of Monypenny v. Dering, supposing that authority to be applicable to the construction of a Hindoo Will. There is nothing here which in terms cuts down the interest to be taken by the grandsons to a life-estate; and the observations of Lord St. Leonards in the report of Monypenny v. Dering (2 De G. Mac. and Gor. 176), upon the third point submitted to him are very applicable to the argument addressed to us. Again, it is to be observed, that the gift to grandsons is a gift not to the son's, Krishnomungul's, nomination, but to a class of which many members might have been born after the Testator's death; and to such a gift, if we are to decide this case by English rules of construction, the principle established by Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363), would apply. We could not split into portions the bequest to the class, and say that those members of it who were born in the Testator's lifetime should take for life only, and that other members of the same class should take a different estate. We are, however, always exceedingly unwilling to apply the technical rules of construction derived from the English law to a Hindoo Will. We would embarrass ourselves neither with those invoked for the De-[80]-fendants and supposed to be supported by the case of Monypenny v. Dering; nor with the rule in Shelley's case which was called in aid by the learned Counsel for the Plaintiff. We would endeavour to collect the Testator's intention from the terms used by him; and then consider, whether it is within the testamentary power, limited, as we think that must be by the general policy of the law. We cannot see that the Testator has made any distinction between his grandsons, his great-grandsons, or the remoter descendants comprised in the terms, 'et cetera heirs.' All are to inherit their ancestor's share according to the Shasters, or Hindoo law, modified only by the exclusion of the females or the descendants of females. Therefore, the object which he has in view is to create for his own property as long as he has any descendants in the strict male line, a new course of descent. That object is, we think, beyond the scope of the testamentary power recognized by law, and must, therefore, fail. The only other admissible construction would be one which would confine the operation of the provision in question to the demise of the sons (the first takers). But on that, as upon the former construction of the Will, Hurrymohun would take an interest in his grandfather's estate which is descendable to the Plaintiff as his widow and heiress. The remaining question is, what is the amount of her share? On her part it is contended that she is entitled to one-third of six-tenths. On the other side it is contended that if the disposition contained in the fifth clause fails in part, it must fail altogether, and that she can claim only one-third of one-fourth. It appears to us that the disposition in favour of the two elder sons may well take effect, [81] although the attempt to make the shares descend otherwise than according to the course of legal descent has failed. The inequality of the shares is altogether independent of the manner in which they are limited to descend. The intention which dictated the one disposition is wholly distinct from the intention which dictated the other. We have had more doubt whether this division was to take effect, except in the case in which no agreement and unanimity should exist among his heirs; and, therefore, whether, if it appeared that his sons and grandsons had continued in all respects a joint and undivided Hindoo family, the widow of a grandson could come in and insist, under this clause, upon having a larger share than that which the law would have given her had the Testator left his estate to descend to his sons in equal shares. It is, however, suggested in the answer, though not proved, that there has been a partial division of the accumulations, and that the status of the family is not exactly that of an undivided Hindoo family. We think it desirable before we finally decide to what share the Plaintiff is entitled, to ascertain by the inquiries which we shall direct, what, if anything, has been done under the clause in question."

Some time after this decree, Manickchand Bysack died intestate, and, by an Order of the Supreme Court, the suit was revived against Koonjobeharry Bysack, Goverdhone Bysack, Choytundoss Bysack, Shadoochurn Bysack, and Gobind Doss Bysack, his sons and heirs.

The present appeal was brought from the decretal Order of the Supreme Court of the 4th of August, 1857.

No appearance having been put in for the Respondent, the appeal was heard ex parte.

[82] Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—As the parties to the suit are Hindoos, the Court below was bound to decide the questions of law raised according to the principles of Hindoo law and usage in force in Bengal. By Statute, 21st Geo. III., c. 70, the Hindoo law is made a part of the law of Bengal. This proposition is admitted by the Court in their judgment in establishing the power of a Hindoo in Bengal to make a Testamentary disposition of real and personal estate, ancestral or self-acquired, a fact which cannot now, whatever doubt formerly existed, be questioned, as the Courts in India and this Tribunal have recognized such a power. F. Macnaghten's "Cons. on the Hindoo Law," pp. 77, 316, 331 and 361. Strange's "Hindoo Law," vol. i. p. 254, vol. ii. p. 438 (Edit. 1830). W. H. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Hindoo Law," p. 34. Juggomohun Ray v. Sreemutty (Clarke's Rules and Orders of Sup. Court of Calcutta, p. 105). Rewun Persad v. Mussumat Radha Beeby (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 137). Mullick v. Mullick (1 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 245). Bahoo Janokey Doss v. Binabun Doss (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 197). Sreemutty Soorjeemoney Dossee v. Denobundoo Mullick (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 526). It is true this proposition was admitted by the Court in their judgment, yet the Court in establishing the Will in fact, though perhaps inadvertently, indirectly applied to it the peculiar doctrines of the English law against perpetuities; doctrines of a technical character, and not founded on any principle of general jurisprudence. But, we insist such a doctrine is unknown to the Hindoo law, as it is, reasoning by analogy to the Civil law prevailing in Holland or Scot-[83]-land. No rule of English law, which is jus positivi, is to be applied for convenience' sake, to restrict or restrain the operation of the Hindoo law. It cannot be urged that, because the English law in Bengal is administered to British-born subjects, there is any reason to apply its technical rules to Hindoos. As the Supreme Court was dealing with the Will of a Hindoo, the limitations contained in that instrument ought to have been considered by the Court without reference to the doctrine of the English law against perpetuities. But, assuming that the Will is to be construed with reference to the particular doctrines of English law regarding perpetuities in a limitation under a Will, the devise, we submit, is not too remote, and the Court ought to have construed the Will as giving estates for life to Krishnomungle Bysack, and after him to his other three sons, who were all, including the Respondent's husband, born in the Testator's lifetime. Now, if the sons took only a life estate, how could the Respondent's husband take more than a life estate? The true question really is, whether it was a good bequest to the idol. The Testator's moveable and immoveable estates are by the Will settled on the family idol by way of religious trust. An endowment for religious objects is valid by the Hindoo law, and will be carried into effect by the Courts in India. Elder widow of Raja Chutter Sein v. The younger widow of Raja Chutter Sein (1 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 180), Radha Bullubh Chund v. Juggut Chunder Chowdree (4 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 151), Bhovanee Purshad Chowdree v. Rancee Jugudrumbha (4 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 343), Ram Sunder Ray v. Heirs of Raja Udwant Singh (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 210), [84] Mullick v. Mullick (1 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 245), Sibchunder Mullick v. Sreemutty Treeporah Soondry Dossee (1 Fulton, 98), Mohunt Gopal Dass v. Mohunt Kerssaram Dass (10 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 250). If the question is to be decided by English law, it would be hardly possible, reading the fifth clause in connection with the other clauses in the Will, to doubt, that the Testator gave estates for life inter se to his sons with cross remainders to the survivors, if any one died without male issue; therefore, on the death of the Respondent's husband his share would go to his surviving brothers to the exclusion of the Respondent as his heir. The Respondent, as widow of Hurrymohun, one of the Testator's grandchildren, is not entitled under the Will to any share of the estate of the Testator, either in the corpus as it stood at the time of her husband's decease, or to any part of the accumulations or surplus income thereof; and the declaration of the Court to that effect was erroneous, as she was only entitled to maintenance. Sreemutty Soorjeemoney Dosse v. Denobundoo Mullick (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 526) is distinguishable from the present case. There the widow was held entitled to the profits of an estate which had accumulated during the life of her husband; but in that case there was no direction in the Will that the family was to remain joint in estate, and, therefore, nothing to imply that the accumulations should become increment to the corpus. Here, on the contrary, the surplus profits are to be added to the corpus, and the Testator provides that in case of disagreement the surplus profits should be divided, [85] which state of things did not exist in that case. Lastly, we contend that directions as to taking the accounts were improper.

The Lord Justice Turner.—The question in this case ultimately resolves itself, as their Lordships think, into a question of the construction to be put upon a Hindoo Will; and it may not be improper to observe that, with reference to the testamentary power of disposition by Hindoos, that the extent of this power must be regulated by the Hindoo law.

The first point which arises on the construction of this Will, is, whether, according to the true intent of the Will, the idol for whom the property is granted was intended to take absolutely.

Now, a reference to the second, third, and fifth clauses of the Will lead us to the conclusion, that although the Will purports to begin with an absolute gift in favour of the idol, it is plain that the Testator contemplated that there was to be some distribution of the property according as events might turn out; and that he did not intend to give this property absolutely to the idol seems to their Lordships to be clear from the directions which are contained in the third clause, that after the expenses of the idol are paid, the surplus shall be accumulated; and still more so from the fifth clause, by which the Testator has provided for whatever surplus should remain out of the interest of the property, the expenses of the idol being first deducted. It is plain, that the Testator, looking at the expenses of the idol, was not con-[86]-templating an absolute and entire gift in favour of the idol.

The rights, therefore, of the idol being thus disposed of, the question then arises, what was to become of the property, subject to the payments which were to be made for the expenses of the idol. And here we have two divisions of the Will. The Testator evidently contemplated two events: one, in which the family was to continue joint and undivided, and the other, in the event of the family becoming divided. Now, with reference to the second branch of this Will, the event of the family becoming divided, that state of circumstances does not appear to have arisen. There has been no division at all of this family, unless the division of the income during the few years which followed upon the death of the Testator up to a short period after the death of Hurrymohun Bysack constituted a division of the family, and their Lordships are very clearly of opinion, that the mere division of income, for the convenience probably of the different members of the family, did not amount to the division of the family.

In considering the case, therefore, we may for the present (whatever questions may hereafter arise upon it) consider this family as an undivided family; and the point for determination is, what are the rights of these parties in the property? Considering the family as a joint and undivided family. Now, in that case, it is plain, that the Testator contemplated that the property was to go in the male line. He says, that he has four sons, that his property shall never be divided and partitioned amongst them, and that the sons and their offspring, that is to say, their "sons and grandsons, heirs in succession," shall not have the power of [87] alienating any of the property by deed or gift, nor shall the property be liable to sequestration for their debts. The Testator, then, having intended that the property should pass from the four sons to their sons and to their grandsons, the event which has happened is this, one of the sons died leaving three sons, who accordingly came into his share, and one of those three sons afterwards died leaving no male issue.

Now, what is the consequence of that? There are directions in the Will that the property is to go in the male line to the sons and their descendants, but one of them dies leaving no issue in the male line, and the Will is silent as to what the disposition of the property is to be in that event. It is a share of the property of the joint family, descendable, therefore, to the heir to whom that property would go in the absence of any provision made by the Will. The consequence, therefore, as it appears to their Lordships, must be, that upon the death of Hurrymohun, this property must have descended, and that the one-third of one-fourth passed to Hurrymohun's heir, his widow, so far as she is entitled to her widow's estate.

What their Lordships propose to do is, to declare that, according to the true construction of the Will, the property granted to the idol is effectually granted for the benefit of the Testator's four sons and their offspring in the male line as a joint family, subject to the performance of acts, business, ceremonies, and festivals, and to the provisions for maintenance in the Will contained, and that the surplus income, after answering the performance of such provisions, is in like manner well and effectually given for the benefit of the four sons and their offspring in the [88] male line, as a joint family. It appearing that Krishnomungle, one of the sons, died, leaving three sons, and that Hurrymohun died leaving no male offspring, the family continuing joint up to the death of Hurrymohun; their Lordships also propose to declare, that upon the death of Hurrymohun, his share of the joint estate, subject as aforesaid, passed to the Respondent, his widow and heir, and she is entitled to one-third of one-fourth as widow and heir. Their Lordships think that, under the circumstances of this case, it would be better not to direct the accounts to be taken in the mode in which the Court has done, but simply to give liberty to apply, in order that the parties may, as they probably will do if they are well advised, come to some arrangement upon the subject of the amount. There will be liberty to apply as to the amount, or otherwise as the parties may be advised. And, it appearing, that there has already been an Order made for the maintenance of this lady of

Rs. 100, a month, that Order must be continued, and she will account for what she has received under that Order as against what may be coming to her upon the account to be taken. The better course would be, to discharge the Order which has been made by the Court below, and simply to make the declarations which I have suggested with a limit and a direction to continue the maintenance, and that she shall account for what she may have received under it.

Their Lordships think that the costs of the appeal may very properly be given out of the estate.

The following report was made by the Judicial Committee, and confirmed by Her Majesty's Order [89] in Council. "Their Lordships are of opinion that it ought to be declared that, according to the true construction of the Will of the Testator, the whole of the Testator's moveable and immoveable property was, and is, well and effectually given for the benefit of the Testator's four sons in his Will named, and their offspring in the male line, as a joint family, so long as the family continues joint, subject, however, to the performance of the acts, business, ceremonies and festivals, and to the provisions for maintenance in the Will contained, and that the surplus income of the property after answering such performance and provision was and is, in like manner, well and effectually given for the benefit of the four sons and their offspring in the male line, as a joint family, so long as the family continues joint. And, it appearing, that Krishnomungle Bysack, one of the four sons, died leaving three sons, their Lordships report as their opinion, that it ought to be declared by Your Majesty, that each of the three sons became entitled to a third part of one-fourth part of the property, and of the accumulation thereof. And, it appearing, that Hurrymohun Bysack, one of the three sons of Krishnomungle Bysack, died leaving no male offspring, and that the family continued joint up to the time of his death and still continues joint: their Lordships do further report as their opinion, that it ought to be declared by Your Majesty, that upon the death of Hurrymohun Bysack, the third part of the fourth part of the property and accumulations to which he became entitled as aforesaid passed to the Respondent, Sreemutty Juggutsoondree Dossee, as his widow and heir, and Sreemutty Juggutsoondree Dossee accordingly became and is entitled as such widow and [90] heir, to the third part of the fourth part of the property and accumulations. And their Lordships are further of opinion, that Sreemutty Juggutsoondree Dossee ought to be at liberty to apply to the Supreme Court at Calcutta as to the accounts and otherwise as she may be advised; and their Lordships are of opinion, that the Order made in this cause by the Supreme Court of Calcutta, bearing date the 28th of July, 1857, ought to be continued until further order. And their Lordships do further report, that in case Your Majesty should be pleased to approve of this report and to Order accordingly, such Order ought to be without prejudice to any question as to the rights of Sreemutty Juggutsoondree Dossee of and when the joint family shall be separated."

[91] RAJMOHUN GOSSAIN and JUGMOHUN GOSSAIN.—Appellants: GOURMOHUN GOSSAIN,—Respondent * [Dec. 2 and 3, 1859].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Calcutta.

In a Ruffanamah, or deed of compromise of a suit between three sons, members of a Hindoo family, respecting the distribution of their father's estate, it was stipulated, that all "ancestral" property should be equally divided into four shares. Held, that the sense in which the word "ancestral" was employed was not confined to such property as the father had derived from his ancestors, but included "paternal" property, or such as had been acquired by the father by whatever title, and was possessed by him at the time of his decease.

A decree of an appellate Court in India, obtained after a compromise, held, in the circumstances, fraudulent, and set aside with costs.

The facts of this case, and the arguments, sufficiently appear in the judgment.

The appeal was argued by Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Maule, for the Appellants; and Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith for the Respondent.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce. -The parties to this litigation are three brothers, [92] the surviving sons of a Hindoo named Raghub Ram Gossain of Serampore, who appears to have been a person of considerable wealth. The Appellants here are the two younger of those three sons, the Respondent being the eldest. The object of the suit in which the appeal arises was to obtain possession of two-fourths of a landed property, called Lot Harit, which, at the time when Serampore was a Danish settlement, was out of that jurisdiction, and was, as it still is, within the jurisdiction of the Calcutta Courts, the deceased having had considerable property, and probably the bulk of his property, within the jurisdiction of the then Danish Court of Serampore.

The Respondent, the eldest son, admits the title of the Appellants to two-fourths of this estate which they claim, subject only to the important qualification that he claims to have a pecuniary charge on the property to a considerable amount, in respect of having, as he says, paid the price of it, the fact being that the estate was purchased by the father in the name of the eldest son; and the question raised is, whether the money, which was in fact paid to the seller, was or was not advanced by the eldest son (in whose name the purchase was made) for the father.

He alleges that the money was paid by him, and that he is still a creditor of the father for it; and the alleged charge in respect of it, is, as has been said, the only objection which he makes to the claim of the appellants. The Appellants deny that the money was paid by the Respondent, and further insist that, whether it was or was not paid by him, all questions relating to that alleged payment were formerly the subject of dispute, and settled by adjudication; and, [93] therefore, that if anything was ever due to him on the security of that property, nothing has remained due.

This, the only substantial point in dispute, was decided, in the first instance, in favour of the Appellants, by the proper Court of original jurisdiction, the Zillah Court of Hooghly; but on appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, that decision was reversed, and judgment given in favour of the Respondent, which has brought the Appellants here.

The circumstances in which the claim arose were these. The eldest son, the Respondent here, appears on the death of his father, which took place some time before the year 1840, to have taken possession of all his property; at least, he was believed to have done so, and treated as having done so. In consequence, litigation of various kinds arose in the family, on the part of the present Appellants, on their own behalf, and also on behalf of the widow of a brother, and probably of their sisters also, on one side, and the present Respondent, the eldest son, on the other. Two of these suits were brought in the Danish jurisdiction at Serampore; the third, relating to the immoveable property out of that jurisdiction, namely, the property now in dispute, Lot Harit, was within the Calcutta jurisdiction. The result of these three litigations were three decrees, one in the Danish Court at Serampore, of the 6th of November, 1840, another in the same jurisdiction of the 14th of May, 1841, and the other in the Zillah Court of Calcutta, of the 31st of August, 1841. They were all in favour of the present Appellants, including not only the adjudication that a large sum of money was due from the eldest son, but also deciding for their title to [94] shares of Lot Harit, the estate within the Calcutta jurisdiction.

One of these decrees, that of the 14th of May, 1841, relating, it seems, to family jewels and other such specific goods, was not capable of appeal, or was not appealed from, and is out of the question; but the eldest son, the Respondent here, did appeal from the decree of the 6th of November, 1840, to the proper Court in Denmark, and did appeal from the decree of the Zillah Court of the 31st of August, 1841, to the proper Sudder Court at Calcutta.

A family quarrel on so extensive a scale excited general attention, and an endeavour was made in a friendly and kind manner by the Governor of Serampore then under the Danish rule, or a gentleman of considerable station there, to effect a settlement of the disputes, and at last it was done. The settlement was effected by an agreement, or Ruffanamah, made on the 4th of August, 1842, in these words:—
 "Serampore, August 4th, 1842.—The long-pending dispute between Baboo Gourmohun Gossain and his brothers having occasioned great scandal and inconvenience, the Honourable Mr. Hansen, the Governor of Serampore, being exceedingly anxious to terminate these differences, called both parties before him on the above-mentioned date, and having required them mutually to explain their wishes, prevailed upon them to agree to a settlement in the following terms:—

"1. That all ancestral property should be equally divided into four shares.

"2. That the sum of Rs. 15,000, be paid to the elder brother, Rajmohun.

"3. That the sum of Rs. 15,000, be paid to the [95] third brother, Jugmohun, from which is to be deducted the sum of Rs. 5640, already paid him for the purchase of a house.

"4. That in reference to the share of the fourth brother, deceased, which amounts to Rs. 15,000, Gourmohun agrees to pay his widow monthly interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, and also to give a bond in the Serampore Court for the payment of the principal of Rs. 15,000, if she should adopt a son, when that son comes of age. Should she die without adopting a son, the sum of Rs. 15,000 will be divided according to law into three parts among the three brothers, or their surviving families; and as security for this bond, will pledge property in Serampore to the satisfaction of the Court.

"5. That the sum of C. Rs. 10,000, be paid to the widow of the late Raghob Ram Gossain, to be disposed of according to her own wishes, in full of all claim; and in case of her dying without making any disposition of it, Gourmohun relinquishes all claim to it.

"6. That the sum of C. Rs. 12,500, be paid by Gourmohun Gossain, on account of the house built by him after the death of his father; and that the house, together with the piece of ground in front of the house, do, after the payment of this sum, remain his sole and entire property; his brothers and their family agreeing to quit it, including Hurree Chootar's ground, consisting of fourteen cottahs.

"The sum which Gourmohun Gossain thus engages to pay, to settle all differences with his family, stands thus:—

	Rs.
"To Rajmohun Gossain	15,000
"To Jugmohun Gossain	15,000
"Less for the house according to the deed of sale	5640
	<hr/> 9360
"To the widow of the late Raghob Ram Gossain	10,000
"To the sisters	10,000
"For the house in full	12,000

"Of this sum Gourmohun Gossain engages to pay in cash the sum of Rs. 35,000, within thirty days from the signing of this document, and the remainder of this sum, namely, Rs. 21,860, at the end of eighteen months from this date, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, giving security for the same.

"In witness thereof the parties have hereunto set their hands this 4th of August, 1842, Gourmohun Gossain, Rajmohun Gossain, Jugmohun Gossain. Signed in our presence, P. Hansen, John Marshman, Hurchunder Laheree, Krishno Comar Laheree."

Before proceeding to mention the next document, it should be observed as to the remarks which have been made upon the word "ancestral," contained in the first clause after the introductory part of the Ruffanamah, that their Lordships are of opinion that "ancestral," as here used, is not confined to such property, if any, as the father had derived from his father, or from any ancestor; but that "ancestral" is here employed (and so the Respondent himself, upon more than one occasion, has shown that he [97] understood it), in the sense of "paternal," that is, as meaning property of the father, in whatsoever manner, or by whatsoever title, the father had acquired it; and, therefore, that "ancestral property" means property derived from the father; at least, immoveable property.

Some months after this agreement, namely, in February of the year 1843, mortgage bonds, as we may call them, were executed by the Respondent, to his brothers respectively: one (in the same form, mutatis mutandis, as the other) was thus:—"Know all men by these presents, that according to agreement concluded on the 4th August, 1842, between me and my brother, Jugmohun Gossain and others, I have been bound to pay to Jugmohun Gossain, as his share of ready money belonging to our late father's estate, the sum of Rs. 15,000, besides one-third of a sum of Rs. 12,500, that according to the agreement was to be paid by me on account of the dwelling-house in this town; and Jugmohun Gossain having on the 15th January, this year, from the Court of Serampore, received this one-third of the above sum of Rs. 12,500 on account of the dwelling-house, and in part of the above Rs. 15,000, the sum of Rs. 8442, partly by value of a house, and partly out of the sum of Rs. 35,000, deposited by me in Court on the 2nd of September, 1842. I herewith, in conformity with the agreement, execute to him the present deed of mortgage, whereby I promise to pay to him the remaining part of the last mentioned sum, being Rs. 6558, on or before the 4th of February, 1844, together with interest at five per cent. from the date of the agreement, 4th August, 1842, and until the day of payment; and to secure him the payment [98] thereof, I pledge and mortgage to him, as second mortgage, the whole of my landed property, with building and appurtenances, situated within this settlement, next after the sum of Rs. 6558, for which I have this day executed a deed, a mortgage to Rajmohun Gossain. Further, I do herewith, in conformity with the agreement, bind myself to allot to him, Jugmohun Gossain, before the 4th of August, 1843, his one-fourth share of our ancestral landed property, with appurtenances and buildings, that is to say:—

"1st. All property situated within the settlement of Serampore, which at present stands registered in the joint name of mine and either of my brothers, Rajmohun Gossain and Jugmohun Gossain, or the late Nundomohun Gossain, including the services of the family deity, Sree Sree Radhamadhubjee Thakoor, with the exception of the dwelling-house mentioned in the agreement, together with the ground belonging thereto, as per pottah No. 1379, and also the ground formerly belonging to Hurry Chootar, obtained by the decree of the Serampore Court of the 28th of August, 1841.

"2nd. The ancestral Talook, called Hooda Gopaulsingapore, in Umursee in the Zillah of Midnapore.

"3rd. The patrimonial Talook, called Lot Harit, in the Zileah of Hooghly, together with the profits from the 4th of August, 1842.

"4th. Our patrimonial share of the house called Bassabautee, in Burabazar, Calcutta. (Signed) Gourmohun Gossain. Serampore, February 6, 1843."

It need not be said that the property named in clause 3, Lot Harit, is that of which two-fourths are now in dispute; and by the effect of the agreement, [99] and these two mortgage bonds, two fourths of that property, among others, were allotted to the two younger sons.

It seems that some time after this, the Respondent was desirous of obtaining, and, almost of course, perhaps, for that reason, the Appellants were desirous of not giving, a release, and accordingly, the Respondent instituted a suit for the purpose of compelling them to give it; and he obtained a decree against them in the Court of First instance. The adjudicating part of the decree being in these words:—

"It is, therefore, directed, that when the Plaintiff, Gourmohun Gossain, complies with the conditions of the Ruffanamah, of the 4th of August, of the year 1842, filed in the present suit, and besides pays to Puddomonee Dabee, Rs. 438. 14a., the costs of suit, No. 109, of the year 1838, and pays to Oornopoorno Dabee, Rajmohun Gossain, Jugmohun Gossain, Ruddumbenee Dabee, Dimla Dabee, Madhobee Dabee, Proshunno Dabee, C. Rs. 2003. 2a., the costs of civil suit, No. 969, of the year 1838, then he will be exonerated from the claims of the said individuals on account of the paternal property which they have inherited as the heirs of their father, Raghub Ram Gossain, deceased. Both the parties will pay their respective costs of the present suit."

The present Appellants appealed from that decision, and the decision was affirmed in the year 1849. The judgment of the Court is in these words:—"No attempt has been made to show that the settlement was partial or unfair. The mere fact of compromise for a less amount than was legally due, cannot of itself impugn the settlement: for it is in evidence that great difficulty was experienced in [100] executing the decree, and an appeal from it to Denmark, attended with ruinous expense, had been preferred; and it was ordered, that the decision of the Court of Serampore should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed; and in consideration of the special circumstances of this case, each party pays his own costs of the suit."

Now, it is with documents such as these, altogether unimpeached, before us, that the Respondent contends that the true meaning of what took place in the years 1842 and 1843 was this: that though he was to divide Lot Harit, yet he was to divide it without prejudice to his claim as an alleged mortgagee, or holder of a lien, as we should call it, and that all that he was to give up was what we should call the equity of redemption, subject to that. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion, that the documents themselves, whether the rest of the evidence be or be not considered, afford a plain and complete contradiction to that allegation.

If, therefore, there were no other difficulty in the case, the title of the Appellants would be plain and clear, viz., to have two-fourths of Lot Harit, and an account of the wassilat in consequence, as originally decreed. But this difficulty has arisen. Notwithstanding the arrangements of August, 1842, and February, 1843, the Respondent thought fit, but as their Lordships think against all propriety, to prosecute an appeal against the Zillah decree of the 31st of August, 1841, which had given to the Appellant's shares of [101] Lot Harit. Accordingly, that appeal having been brought up, and substantially unopposed, the Respondent obtained from the Sudder Court, on the 30th of March, 1843, a decree, the ordering part of which is in these words:—

"Therefore it is finally ordered, that the Appellant's appeal be decreed, and the decision of the Judge amended; and the Plaintiffs, Respondents, on the condition that if they deposit in the treasury of the Court from this date, within the period of six months, the purchase-money of a 12 annas share of Talook Harit, then they are to be put in possession of a 12 annas share, without wassilat, and the whole of the costs of this Court, according to the account of Khurcha Nuves (Accountant of costs), with interest thereon, from this date up to the date of realization, be entered against Respondents. And if the Appellant has deposited the costs of the Zillah Court, then he is to present a petition for its return, and the order for its payment, with interest, up to the date of realization, according to the general Order of this Court dated the 3rd of June, 1837, will be passed."

Of course the money was not paid, and the contention of the present Respondent is, that the decree of 1843, established the title which he alleges, and that as the money was not paid within the period prescribed by the decree, he is entitled to claim the property as his own in a manner analogous to a title by foreclosure; but, he says, that he is willing to submit to what we should call redemption.

Their Lordships, however, are of opinion, that the claim is entirely untenable.

Assuming (though their Lordships do not decide) that the decree of 1843, amounted to an adjudication [102] against the present Appellant's title, we think, that it was an adjudication obtained not only with great impropriety, but, in effect, by fraud; for it was plainly the duty, in every sense the duty of the present Respondent after the compromise (a compromise insisted upon by him) not to prosecute that appeal. Doing so, he did it at his own peril, for success could by no possibility benefit him, if his title, by reason of that success, should be properly impeached.

It is said that, on the assumption that the decree of 1843, is an adjudication against the present Appellant's title, the fraudulent nature of the decree has not been put in issue, and it has not been in a proper manner sought to be set aside.

Their Lordships are not of that opinion. They are of opinion, that the fraudulent nature of the Respondent's conduct in obtaining the adjudication is sufficiently put in issue by the original plaint in the case, and by the replication, in both of which it is impeached, and, as their Lordships view the matter, in a proper manner impeached, for fraud: and the decree of the Zillah Court treating it as a nullity against the title of the present Appellants was, as their Lordships consider, properly made, with costs, and ought to be restored.

If the Appellants have paid any costs under the decision of the Sudder Court, those costs should be repaid: and the present Appellants should have their costs of the proceedings in the Sudder Court, and of the appeal here, from the Respondent.

The humble recommendation of their Lordships to Her Majesty will be made accordingly.

[103] THOMAS EALES ROGERS.—Appellant. RAJENDRO DUTT, and Others.—Respondents * [June 27, 28, 1860].

In the case of damage occasioned by a wrongful act, though such as the law esteems an injury, malice is not a necessary ingredient to the maintenance of an action [8 Moo. Ind. App. 131].

It is essential to an action in tort that the act complained of should be legally wrongful as regards the party complaining, i.e., it must prejudicially affect him in some legal right. The fact that it will, however directly do him harm in his interests is not enough [8 Moo. Ind. App. 135, 136].

An order issued by the Superintendent of marine, in his official capacity, to the Bengal Pilot service, employed by the East India Company on the Hooghly river prohibiting them from allowing a particular steam tug to take any ship in tow of which such pilots should have pilotage charge, made in consequence of what the Superintendent deemed an exorbitant demand on the part of the owner of the steam tug, whereby such owner was deprived for a time of the profits of being employed by the pilots in charge of ships going up or down the river Hooghly; in the absence of malice, alleged or to be inferred, is not such a wrong as would sustain an action by the owner of the tug against the Superintendent of marine, the officer of the Government, issuing such order.

Upon appeal the judgment of the Supreme Court at Calcutta maintaining the action, reversed, on the ground that the Government had the same rights as a private individual in declining to employ the tug if the charges were too high [8 Moo. Ind. App. 133, 134].

In the action, the Court at Calcutta gave damages, the amount of which was under the appealable value prescribed, by the Calcutta charter. As an important point of law was involved, special leave to appeal was upon petition, granted [8 Moo. Ind. App. 120].

This was an action brought in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, by the Respondents against the Appellant, under the following circumstances:—

The appellant was the Superintendent of marine at Calcutta, an official Government situation under [104] the East India Company, and in that capacity had the control of the whole of the Marine department under Government, including the superintendence and control of the Bengal pilots employed by the Government, who were the only pilots who are engaged in piloting vessels on the river Hooghly. There was no legal obligation to employ a pilot, but from the dangerous nature of the river no ship could be safely navigated up or down unless in charge of a pilot. Tugs were required for bringing vessels up the river. The Respondents were the owners, or part owners, of a steam tug called the Underwriter, which was employed in towing vessels on that river. It appeared that there were two rates of payment for the steam-tugs employed, the first called the Government certificate, according to a tariff, for the time employed, and the second by a special contract.

On the 20th of September, 1857, whilst the Indian mutiny was raging in full force, and every exertion of the Indian Government and its officers was being made to face the difficulties in which they were placed, Her Majesty's ship "with Belleisle," with troops on board destined for Calcutta, arrived at the mouth of the river Hooghly; and on the 19th of that month, the Captain of the Underwriter, having understood that she wanted steam, went on board the Belleisle, and entered into a negotiation with the Captain of that ship as to the terms upon which she should be taken in tow. The Captain of the Underwriter required at first Rs. 3000 and then Rs. 2500, and produced a contract ready prepared, for the Captain of the Belleisle to sign. This, however, he refused to agree to: when the Underwriter left the Belleisle, and carried on shore a [105] telegram from the Captain of the Belleisle to Mr. Beadon, the Secretary to the Government of India, asking to be allowed to employ the Underwriter, but without stating the terms demanded by her Captain. Beadon replied to this communication, authorising Captain Rodd of the Belleisle, to employ the Underwriter under Government certificate, which would have entitled her to a certain fixed rate per diem, according to the work done; and, on the morning of the 20th, the Captain of the Underwriter having proceeded on board the Belleisle, was informed of this by Captain Rodd. He, however, refused to tow upon certificate, and still required a contract for Rs. 2500: and thereupon Captain Rodd again telegraphed to Beadon, and requested instructions. This message Beadon sent at once to the Appellant, with a note, telling him shortly what had happened, and asking what, in the circumstances, had better be done, when the Appellant, considering the charge exorbitant, and that it was an attempt to make a market of the necessities of the Government, at so critical a period, and that it was of great importance that some step should be taken to prevent the recurrence of similar attempts, went to Beadon and expressed this to him, as his opinion, and that he thought the better course was to inform the agents of the Underwriter, that if they declined to take the Belleisle in tow, an order would be issued, prohibiting the pilots of the port, who should be in charge of any vessel, from taking steam of the Underwriter. Beadon, having approved of this course, Hill, the officiating first assistant, made a communication to that effect to the agent of the Underwriter at Calcutta, and the Captain of the Belleisle, [106] in the circumstances, refused to take steam of the Underwriter, except under Government certificate.

On the 22nd of September, 1857, the Appellant, in his official capacity, directed an order to be issued in the terms stated by him to Beadon. This order was as follows:—"Steamer Underwriter. No. 2629.—For general information. Memo.—Officers of the Pilot service are, under orders of the Superintendent of marine, prohibited from allowing the steamer Underwriter to take any ship in tow of which they have pilotage charge. (Signed) J. S."

Upon the issuing of the order, the Respondents applied to the Government upon the subject, complaining of the order, and after some correspondence, the Government, on the 19th of October, 1857, directed the order to be withdrawn. On the 13th of November, 1857, an action was brought by the Respondents in the Supreme Court at Calcutta against the Appellant.

The plaint was in form, an action on the case, and pleaded, in substance, the facts above stated, charging the Appellant with wrongfully and injuriously issuing the order in question. It did not contain any averment of malice; but damages were claimed for the alleged non-employment of the Underwriter during the period the order was in force. The Appellant pleaded not guilty, and other pleas not material to mention. The cause came on for trial in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, on the 3rd of March, 1858, before Sir James W. Colville, Chief Justice, and Sir Charles M. Jackson, Puisne Judge: when the above facts were in substance proved, all malice on the part of the Appellant being negatived. Evidence was given that, during the period the order was in force, the Un[107]-derwriter had not been engaged in towing vessels in the course of her ordinary business, but on the occasion of the refusal to tow the Belleisle, she afterwards took in tow a private ship drawing nine inches less water than that ship for Rs. 1600. At the close of the Respondents' case, the Appellant's Counsel applied for a nonsuit on the ground that no cause of action was disclosed: the Court found a verdict for the Respondents on all the issues, with Rs. 6624 damages, leave being reserved to the Appellant to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that no action was maintainable, or to reduce the damages to a nominal sum. A rule nisi was afterwards granted, when the questions reserved came on for argument, and the rule was discharged on the 19th of March, 1858, with costs: the Court holding that the plaint was established by the evidence, and that it disclosed a good cause of action.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by the Chief Justice, Sir James W. Colvile, as follows:—"In this action on the case, the Plaintiffs have recovered a verdict for Rs. 6624, subject to the questions raised by the rule of which we have now to dispose. These questions are, first, whether judgment ought not to be arrested, on the ground that the plaint does not disclose a legal cause of action? Secondly, whether the verdict entered for the Plaintiffs ought not to be set aside, and a nonsuit entered, on the ground that the Plaintiffs have not proved any legal cause of action? Thirdly, whether, assuming a legal cause of action to be alleged and proved, the Court was justified in giving more than nominal damages? The first question, of course, arises on the record: the others, on [108] the evidence given to meet the plea of not guilty. Besides that plea, there are only two traverses on the record raising issues on which the finding for the Plaintiffs is not impeached by the rule; if, therefore, a legal cause of action has been alleged and proved, the Plaintiffs are necessarily entitled to recover something, since nothing is pleaded by way of confession and avoidance. I have somewhat changed the order of the questions raised by the rule, because it is more convenient to consider, first, that which arises on the record, since, if that is determined in the Defendant's favour, it will be unnecessary to consider the effect of the evidence. The plaint is in case. It states, by way of inducement, first, that, at the time of committing the grievance, the Plaintiffs were the owners of the steam-vessel the Underwriter, which had theretofore been, and then was, profitably employed by them as a steam-tug between the mouth of the river Hooghly and the port of Calcutta. Secondly, that the Defendant, as a Superintendent of marine, was invested with and possessed of the chief authority and control over all the officers of the Bengal pilot service employed by the East India Company on the said river, for the purpose of piloting vessels thereon to and from the port of Calcutta. Thirdly, that the officers of the Bengal pilot service are the only pilots who upon the river exercise the trade and calling of pilots, and take pilotage charge of inward and outward bound ships; and that, in consequence of the perils of the navigation of the said river, no ship can with safety proceed inwards or outwards thereon, or be duly navigated, except the same be in charge of a competent pilot. It then alleges that the Defendant, contriving and intending to injure the Plaintiffs, and [109] to prevent them from continuing to employ their vessel in the manner before mentioned, and to deprive them of the profits resulting therefrom, wrongfully and injuriously issued and published a certain order, addressed to the officers of the Bengal pilot service, whereby the Defendant, as such Superintendent of marine, strictly prohibited them from allowing the said steam-vessel the Underwriter to take any ship in tow of which they, the officers of the Bengal pilot service, should have charge. It further alleges, that this order continued in force and unrevoked, and was obeyed by the officers of the Bengal pilot service, for a long space of time, to wit, from the 22nd of September to the 19th of October—and that, during all that space of time, the masters and owners of divers ships were desirous of employing the Plaintiffs' steam-vessel to tow their ships inwards and outwards on the river Hooghly, and would so have employed the same, but that they were prevented from so doing by the continuance of the said order, and the obedience thereto of the officers of the pilot service, so long as the same remained in force. Per quod, the Plaintiffs were for a long time, to wit, twenty-five days, and until the recall of the order, prevented from continuing to employ their said vessel in towing ships, and had been thereby deprived of the large profits which they would otherwise have made from such employment. It may be well to admit at once, because it will clear the ground of some of the arguments used, that this plaint does not allege either that the Defendant was under a legal obligation to furnish a pilot to every ship that required one, or that there was any contract between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant, or that any contract [110] subsisting between the Plaintiffs and any other persons had been broken by the procurement of the Defendant. Therefore, the right of action, if it exist, cannot be rested on the breach of any public duty imposed by Statute or otherwise, or on the breach of any duty flowing from a contract between the parties, or upon the grounds recognized in Lumley v. Gye (2 Ell. and Bla., 216). But wrongs falling within one or other of these classes are not the only wrongs for which an action on the case will lie. Gerhard v. Bates (2 Ell. and Bla., 476), is a clear authority for the position, that if the wrong and the consequential loss are, to use Lord Campbell's phrase (ib. 490), 'clearly concatenated as cause and effect,' the action is maintainable, although it does not arise from any public wrong, or the neglect of any public duty, and the parties are entire strangers to each other, no privity subsisting between them. Have we, then, here alleged a tort, occasioning a loss to the Plaintiffs? The loss is clearly stated, but it may be damnum sine injuriâ; or, if the tort be established, the loss may not be sufficiently 'concatenated with it as cause and effect'; or, in other words, may be too remote to be the subject of an action. Now, if we turn to the definition of a tort in Broom's Comms., so often cited at the bar, we find that, if not founded on the violation of some special duty, public or private, it may be founded simply on the invasion of a legal right; and the fallacy in some of the arguments used for the Defendant, consisted in the erroneous statement, or in the absence of a clear perception, of the right which the Plaintiffs say the Defendant has invaded. That right is not the right to have a pilot, but the right to employ their vessels in towage: in other words, the right of exercising their [111] lawful trade or calling without undue hindrance or obstruction from others; and surely it cannot be contended that this is not one of the rights which the common law recognizes and protects! The contest between the House of Commons and the Crown, in the times of the Tudors and the Stuarts, which resulted in the Statute of Monopolies, and all the learned arguments in the great case of The Monopolies, in the reign of Charles the Second (10 State Trials, 312), assume the existence of the right. The only question was, the degree in which the asserted prerogative of the Crown could override it. Lord Coke's definition of a monopoly is, 'An allowance by the King, by his grant or otherwise, to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, of or for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using, anything whereby any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade.' The resolutions in The case of the Taylors, etc., of Ipswich (11 Co. Rep. 53), and in The case of the Monopolies (11 Co. Rep. 84), also assume the right of the subject to be protected in the exercise of his lawful trade. Again: if this right is not recognized and protected by law, on what principle do words spoken, though not actionable in themselves, become actionable if spoken of a man in his trade or calling? Therefore, that the Plaintiffs had a common law right to contract with the master of any vessel on the river who might be willing to engage the Underwriter, and to perform that contract by towing his vessel, cannot, we think, be denied. The difficulty in the case lies in the nature of the alleged invasion. The invasion, to be actionable, must, of course, be wrongful. Interference [112] with a man's trade by fair competition; as in the instance found in the authorities, of a new school established so as to draw away the scholars from an old school; is not actionable. The loss in such a case is, in fact, not caused by wrong, but by another's exercise of his undoubted right; and, in every complicated society, the exercise, however legitimate, by each member of his particular rights; or the discharge, however legitimate, by each member, of his particular duties; can hardly fail occasionally to cause conflicts of interest which will be detrimental to some. The question here is whether enough is stated on the face of this plaint to show that the Defendant's interference with the Plaintiff's trade was wrongful? Now, what appears on the face of the plaint? That the Defendant, by virtue of his office, had the power to control the pilots of the Bengal pilot service; but there were no other pilots on the river; that no ships can be safely navigated up or down the river unless it be in charge of a pilot; that the Defendant, with the intention of preventing the Underwriter's employment, issued an order forbidding the pilots from allowing that steamer to take any vessel in tow of which they should have charge; that the order was obeyed and remained in force a certain time, during which the Plaintiffs were, by reason of the order, prevented from employing their steamer as a tug, and so hindered in their trade. It may be said that it is not the pilot but the Master whose business it is to engage towage, and, therefore, that the employment of the Plaintiff's vessel was not prevented by an order addressed to the pilot. But if this objection arise in arrest of judgment, the fair intendment from the third statement in the inducement is, we think, [113] that the order being operative upon, and obeyed by, the pilot, was necessarily operative upon the Master, because he, though not under a legal obligation to take a pilot, could not safely navigate his vessel without one, and could not get a pilot other than one of the Bengal service. Therefore, upon the plaint, we must assume that the Defendant, intending to injure the Plaintiffs in their trade, and having a power over the pilots of the port which he could effectually use for that purpose, did consciously use that power to that end, and so invaded the Plaintiffs' legal right. It cannot, by any fair intendment, be collected from the statements of the plaint that this was in the necessary or ordinary exercise of the Defendant's power as Superintendent of marine, or in the regular discharge of his duty as a public officer. Prima facie, it can matter nothing to the pilot, or the officer who supplies the pilot, by what steamer the vessel is towed to sea; and the injurious intention here alleged is, as it is in many other cases, of the essence of the action. Thus Baron Parke, in Langridge v. Lory (2 Mee and Wels. 531), speaking of actions on the case founded on deceit, says:—'A mere naked falsehood is not enough to give a right of action; but if it be a falsehood told with an intention that it should be acted upon by the party injured, and that act produce damage to him, there is no question but that an action would lie. It may be said fraud and falsehood are mala in se; but the arbitrary abuse of power, to the wilful injury of another, is also malum in se. Assuredly, such a wanton exercise of power is less innocent than the act of shooting, which, in the ancient, as well as the more modern cases, reported in 11 East, pp. 571-4, became wrongful because done [114] with the intention of disturbing the Plaintiff's decoy. The judgment of Gibbs C. J., in Sutton v. Clarke (6 Taunt. 29), shows how a public officer, acting wantonly and oppressively in the exercise of an undoubted power, may become liable in an action on the case. But then it is said, that the damage is too remote; or, in other words, that the damage and the loss are not, in Lord Campbell's phrase, sufficiently 'concatenated as cause and effect'; and Ashley v. Harrison, and Taylor v. Neri (both reported in 1 Esp., p. 48 and p. 386) were relied upon. But the real principle of those cases, as of Vicars v. Wilcocks (2 Smith's L.C. 299), and of the other cases of slander collected by Mr. Smith, in his note on Vicars v. Wilcocks (2 Leading Cases, 299), is, whether the damage is the natural result of the thing done, or whether it is not capable of being attributed to some other cause. In Lumley v. Gye (2 Ell. and Bla. 216), Erle, J., also remarks on the absence of intention in those cases to cause the damage complained of; and, assuredly, the Defendant in one of those cases may well have libelled the actress, and the Defendant in the other may well have beaten the actor, without intending to injure the manager; and, therefore, though some doubt has been thrown on their authority by Lumley v. Gye, those cases may be good law, and yet not govern this case. For it is difficult to conceive a more necessary connection, as cause and effect, than that which here exists between the damage done to the Plaintiffs and the Defendant's act. The order, moreover, is insensible, if it is supposed to have been issued with any intention but that of causing the damage; the damage followed upon it, and there is no other assignable cause which will account for that damage. Then it [115] is urged that the intervention of the pilot between Captain Rogers and the Master of the ship, and of both pilot and Master between Captain Rogers and the Plaintiffs, makes the damage too remote. But we are not dealing with a case like that of Ward v. Weeks (7 Bingham. 211), in which A. used slanderous words to B., which B. repeated to C., and thereby caused the damage to the Plaintiff; and, it was, therefore, held, that the Plaintiff could not sue A. Even in a case of slander, the rule is different if the repetition of the words is in the course of duty, as is shown in Kendillon v. Maltby (1 Cro. and M., 402). Here the pilot is but the officer, compelled by the rules of his service to obey the Defendant, his superior. The Master acts under the necessity imposed upon him by the Defendant, through the pilot; and the case seems to us to fall within the principle which is thus expressed by Erle, J., in his judgment in Lumley v. Gye: 'It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action, in all instances where the violation is an actionable wrong'; and he goes on to say, 'He who procures the wrong is a joint wrong doer, and may be sued, either alone or jointly with the agent, in the appropriate action for the wrong complained of.' The liability is still clearer, where, as in this case, the agent is an innocent agent. Upon the whole, therefore, though this action is in many respects of a novel character, and we have been unable to find any case which is exactly in point, we are of opinion that, on principle, it is maintainable, and that some authority for it is to be found in the old case cited by the Plaintiff's Counsel—Garret v. Taylor (2 Rolles' Rep. 162); and Carrington v. Taylor, and Keble v. Hockingill, [116] both reported in 11th East, pp. 571, 574. We cannot think, with the Defendant's Counsel, that the two latter cases are distinguishable from the present by the circumstance that the decoy in the one was parcel of a manor, and, in the other, is described as an ancient decoy; for the difficulty here, as we said before, does not arise from the nature of the right, but from the nature of its invasion. Again, we think, upon the authority of these cases, and of Ferguson v. The Earl of Kinnoull (9 Cl. and Fin. 251), that the action is maintainable, without any allegation or of proof of malice. This being so, we have next to consider whether the cause of action laid has been sufficiently proved; or, rather, for that is the form of the rule, whether there is, on any material point, that absence of evidence which can entitle the Defendant to insist on a nonsuit. The issues, as to the ownership of the vessel and the authority of the Defendant over the officers of the Bengal pilot service, have been found for the Plaintiffs; nor is it now contended that there was not evidence to support that finding. The other material statements in the inducements were not traversed, and we must, therefore, take it to be admitted, on the pleadings, that there were no pilots but those of the Bengal pilot service, and that no ship can be safely navigated in the Hooghly without a pilot. On this record, therefore, we have not to consider whether the existence of five or six licensed pilots would in any degree affect the right to maintain the action; and the admission seems also to exclude the hypothesis that the Plaintiffs were not hindered in their trade, because Masters of vessels might have taken their tug and gone up or down the river without a [117] pilot. The question remains, whether the Plaintiffs have proved all they were bound to prove under the plea of not guilty. They have proved that the Defendant issued the order in question; that he issued it with the avowed object of punishing the Plaintiffs for their refusal to comply with certain conditions which he had no right to impose upon them. They have proved its continuance for a certain time. They have put in the final orders of Government on this proceeding, which prove that, in issuing the order, the Defendant was so far from acting in the regular discharge of his duty, that his act was, in the opinion of his superiors, unjustifiable and an improper exercise of power. They have proved that, by the rules of the service, the pilots were bound to obey that order of their superior officer so long as it was unrevoked. They have proved that the order emanated from, and was issued on the responsibility of, the Defendant; for the conversation with the Secretary (if the purport of it was what the Defendant represents it to be) is not tantamount to the authority of Government, supposing that the authority of Government (if given) could have relieved the Defendant from liability, or done more than give him a claim to be identified by his superiors. Then, as to the damage, the Plaintiffs have, unquestionably, proved that damage did result to them in consequence of the order. But the nature and effect of that evidence will be best considered with reference to the only question that remains to be determined on this rule: namely, whether that evidence justified the award of more than nominal damages. We can see no reason why the damages which the Court gave on the trial should be reduced. We then disclaimed any intention to give those penal damages [118] by which the learned Counsel for the Plaintiffs insisted the Court ought to mark its sense of the arbitrary conduct of the Defendant; but we thought (and we endeavoured to measure the damages according to this principle) that, if the act of the Defendant was wrongful, the Plaintiffs were entitled to recover the actual loss which they had sustained in consequence of it. We had clear and positive proof of the continuance of the order, and that immediately after its issue the pilot in charge refused to unmoor a vessel if the Underwriter, which had been engaged to tow, took her in tow. The Captain also has sworn that, but for the order, he might have had other engagements, but that in consequence of the order his vessel remained idle. This is entirely confirmed by every inference to be drawn from the state of trade in the port, the ordinary principles on which men act, and by the acts of the Plaintiffs, as shown in their remonstrance and appeal to Government. We gave, therefore, what, upon the evidence of the average nett earnings of the steamer when in work, would have been its probable earnings if it had been allowed to work during its period of enforced idleness. We continue to think that the evidence given of the refusal to unmoor the Daniel Webster, though objected to at the time, was properly received; but we must observe, that the proper mode of persevering in the objection would have been by moving for a new trial, on the ground of the improper reception of evidence, and that the point is not regularly raised by this rule. It may, however, be open to the Defendant to insist, in arrest of judgment, that the special damage is not alleged with sufficient particularity; that, as in certain well known class of action for [119] slander, the names of the persons who would, but for the order, have employed the Plaintiff's steamer, ought to have been stated. But we would observe, that the question here is, not whether customers who have been wont regularly to deal at a particular shop, and whose names are necessarily known to the person who keeps that shop, have been driven from that shop; we have to deal with the case of a steamer plying for hire in a port to which ships from all quarters of the world resort, many of them for the first time. Again: the notorious existence of the order, and the first act of obedience to it, would necessarily prevent Masters of vessels from coming to hire the Underwriter in the port, and the Underwriter from making what are termed in the evidence, 'seeking trips' to the Sand Heads. It seems to us, therefore, that this case falls within the principle of Hartly v. Herring (8 Term, Rep. 130), that the plaintiff alleges the special damage with as much certainty as the subject-matter is capable of, and that the damages have been correctly assessed. We repeat our regret that the delay in the rescission of the order has increased the Plaintiff's loss and the Defendant's liability; nay, more, we are sorry that the Defendant should suffer at all, because, although we think that he took an erroneous view of the Plaintiffs' conduct, and a still more erroneous view of his own position and powers, we doubt not that he acted honestly on the notions which he says prompted his conduct. But though we regret that Captain Rogers has not escaped the fate which generally attends on those who, without measuring their own powers or authority, Quixotically undertake to be the redressors of grievances, real or imaginary, [120] this cannot influence our decision as Judges. If in our judgment the Plaintiffs have suffered a certain pecuniary loss, in consequence of an actionable wrong done to them by the Defendant, we must declare them entitled to recover that loss from him. The rule must be discharged."

The amount of the damages recovered, Rs. 6624, being under the appealable value, the Appellant presented a special petition to Her Majesty for leave to appeal, in which, amongst other things, he stated that he had issued the order in question, with the sanction and approval of the Secretary of the Government in the Home Department in Calcutta, believing that the exigencies of the public service demanded the same; that the action was brought for the wrong alleged to have been done by him to the Respondents by such order, and he submitted, that as an important principle of law was involved in the decision in the action, the amount of damages ought not to deprive him of the benefit of an appeal, and prayed that the judgment might be reversed, altered, or varied, and the verdict found for the Respondents in the action set aside, and a verdict, or a nonsuit, entered on his behalf.

Mr. W. Field for the Petitioner, cited Spooner v. Juddoo (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 257).

(July 11, 1859 *) Their Lordships gave leave to appeal on security being given to the amount of £100, for costs.

[121] The appeal now came on for hearing.

Mr. Macaulay, Q.C., and Mr. W. Field, for the Appellant.—This is a case of first impression, arising from a prohibition issued by a public servant in the proper discharge of his duty, and without malice, to the officers of the Bengal pilot service employed by the Government on the river Hooghly, not to use the Respondents' steam-tug; or, in other words, not to deal with the Respondents in their trade or calling of steam-tug owners; and the first question is, whether the action is, in the circumstances, maintainable. To sustain such an action, there must have been either a violation by the Appellant of a legal right or a wrongful act done by him in violation of a legal right or private duty, productive of damage to the Respondents. We contend there is neither of these requisites. The alleged right of the Respondents is not a legal right at all; it is simply a right, as owners of a steam-tug, to trade like the owners of other steam-tugs, on the river Hooghly, which is an open river. The wrong complained of is an order by a Government officer to the pilots under his control not to use the Respondents' steam-tug. In Lumley v. Gye (2 Ell. and Bla. 232), Mr. Justice Erle says that "the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action." That case is relied on by the Chief Justice in the Court below, on the assumption that there was a legal right in the Respondents to be employed, it may be in their turn, by the pilot service. If they had only a claim to be employed, there is no ground of action; but we deny that even any such claim existed. It is [122] admitted that there was no legal obligation on the Appellant to furnish pilots for all the vessels navigating the Hooghly in the service of the Government. Nor is it pretended that there was any contract between the Respondents and any other parties which the Appellant procured to be broken. The Chief Justice in the Court below states this broadly. It is admitted, also, that there was no malice; it is not charged, or alleged, or attempted to be proved; and yet, without such averment, or proof, the Court below, on the authority of Ferguson v. The Earl of Kinnoull (9 Clk. and Fin. 251), has held that this action could be maintained. But that case differed materially from the present, and really decided only, that when the law casts a duty upon a person, which he refuses or fails to perform, he is answerable in damages, though no malice is proved to those whom his refusal or failure injured; his neglect of duty, and its consequential injury to the party, is the ground of action. There is no such case here. Gerhard v. Bates (2 Ell. and Bla. 476), also relied on by the Court below, was an action for false representation, by which the Plaintiff was induced to take shares in a joint stock Company; and it was held, that the damage to the Plaintiff being shown to be the direct result of the Defendant's fraud, the Plaintiff was entitled to recover against the Defendant as for tort. The dictum of Lord Campbell in that case, that if the wrong and consequential loss "are clearly concatenated as cause and effect," an action is maintainable, is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. The case of the Taylors, etc., of Ipswich (11 Co. Rep. 53), and The case of the Monopolies (11 Co. Rep. 146), only, [123] assume the right of the subject to be protected in the exercise of his lawful trade, which we don't deny; but that is very different from an assumed right to be employed in such trade. Langridge v. Levy (2 Mee. and Wels. 519, and 4 Mee. and Wels. 337) was a case of false representations and fraud. In Winterbottom v. Wright (10 Mee. and Wels. 115), Baron Alderson, referring to that case, refused to carry the principle of that decision further. So in Howard v. Shepherd (11 East's Rep. 571). The cases of Carrington v. Taylor (9 Com. Ben. Rep. 297, 322), and Keeble v. Hickeringill (11 East's Rep. 574), are, we submit, misapplied by the Judges in the Court below. In those cases there was a disturbance of the enjoyment of a legal right; there is no legal claim at all here. In Sutton v. Clarke (6 Taunt. 29), also cited in the Court below, it was held that if a person in the exercise of a public function without emolument which he is compellable to execute, acts without malice, and according to the best of his skill and diligence, and upon the best information he can obtain, does an act which occasions consequential damage, he is not liable to an action for such damage. The action must be on tort, or for breach of contract; here there is neither. The action is for an alleged damage, which was simply a refusal to allow dealing with the Respondents on their own terms. As the act complained of was done by a Government officer on behalf of, and with the sanction, of the Government, it may be a question whether an action against such officer could be entertained by a Municipal Court. Elphinstone v. Bedreechund (1 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 316), The Secretary of State in Council of India v. Kamachee [124] Boye Sahaba (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 476), Baron v. Denman (2 Exch. Rep. 167), Dohree v. Napier (2 Bingham, N.C. 781). We submit, therefore, that the declaration discloses no cause for action, and, even if such existed, which we deny, a further insist that the damages are excessive; and that they ought only to have been nominal.

Mr. Montague Smith, Q.C., and Mr. H. Mills, for the Respondents. — If the order of the Appellant was a wrongful act, it is actionable. He had the control of all the pilots in the Government service upon the river Hooghly, and it is impracticable for ships to navigate that river without a pilot. If the pilots disobeyed the order of the Appellant, they were liable to be punished; the obedience of the pilots to this order rendered also that of Masters of vessels necessary. The effect of their obeying the order was to prevent the owners of the Underwriter obtaining any employment in their lawful trade or calling. This the Appellant knew, his avowed object being punishment of the Respondents for refusal to tow under Government certificate. Now, the issuing such an order was an improper exercise of his power, and a tortious act as against the Respondents; being done without lawful justification and with the intention of damaging them. The plaint which sets forth these facts discloses a good cause of action, and is sufficient in law. It avers that the Respondents were damaged in their trade, and in the lawful use of their property, by the order issued by the Appellant, who, as against them, is thereby a wrong doer, and that such order was [125] issued intentionally, authoritatively, and with the design of damaging the Respondents. The judgment, we submit, was well founded upon these grounds.

First, the damage was the effect of the act of the Appellant; that is quite clear, and is sufficiently averred. Now, the great principle of law is, that every man must be considered to contemplate the probable consequences of his own act, Townsend v. Walker (9 East, 296), Ferguson v. The Earl of Kinnoull (9 Clk. and Fin. 251), or the act of his agent. Jarman v. Hooper (6 Man. and Gr. 827), Bowles v. Senior (15 Law J. Q.B. 231), Childers v. Woodler (29 Law J. Q.B. 129). The damage here was immediate, and, therefore, actionable; it is not, as in the case of a slander, Fears v. Wilcocks (2 Smith's L.C. 300; 8 East, 1), too remote. In Parkhurst v. Foster (1 Ld. Raym. 480), Lord Holt says, "If a man does an unlawful act, he shall be answerable for the consequences of it, especially where the act is done with intent that consequential damage shall be done."

Secondly, the damage was done to the legal right of the Respondents to prosecute a lawful trade, namely, the hire and use of their steam tug; and this is prima facie actionable. He that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action, else slander affecting a man's trade would not be actionable. Keeble v. Hickeringill (11 East, 575-6). And, though no action may lie for a public nuisance, yet if a private injury is sustained thereby, an action will lie. Iveson v. Moore (1 Ld. Raym. 486), Rose v. Groves (5 Man. and Gr. 613), Wilkes v. Hungerford Market Co. (2 Bingh. N.C. 281), [126] Dobson v. Blackmore (16 Law J. Q.B. 233). These authorities show that the law recognizes that description of right in individuals, in respect of which the special damage is claimed, and that it was actionably wrong to inflict that sort of damage.

Thirdly, as the damage done flowed from the Appellant's acts, by which he intended to damage the Respondents in their use of a lawful right, such act was wrongful on the part of the Appellant, and made him liable to an action. Gregory v. The Duke of Brunswick (6 Man. and Gr. 205), Millar v. Taylor (1 Burr. 2303), Pasley v. Freeman (2 Smith's L.C. 62), Langridge v. Levy (2 Moo. and Wels. 579), Mostyn v. Fabrigas (1 Smith's L.C. 528), Keeble v. Hickeringill (11 East, 574). Com. Dig., tit. "action on the case for misfeasance," A. Every loss or damage occasioned by the wrongful act of another is actionable. Ashby v. White (Ld. Ray. 938, 1 Smith's L.C. 105), Perring v. Harris (2 Moo. and Rob. 5), Dean v. Clayton (7 Taunt. 489, 495), Bird v. Holdbrook (4 Bingh. 628), Ferguson v. The Earl of Kinnoull (9 Clk. and Fin. 251, 310, 321). This is not a case of dammum absque injuria: if the Appellant so contends he must make out such position. It is not as where a Defendant carrying on an offensive trade, but in a proper manner, and in a proper place, in pursuance of a previous right acquired, is protected. Rich v. Basterfield (16 Law J. C.P. 273), Hole v. Barlow (27 Law J. C.P. 207). Nor is this a case where some other maxim of law comes into play and prevents the Appellant from being actionable. Revis v. [127] Smith (18 Com. Ben. Rep. 126), Henderson v. Broomhead (28 Law J. Exch. 360), Barber v. Lessiter (29 Law J. C.P. 161), Lumley v. Gye (2 Ell. and Bla. 216).

Lastly, no averment of malice was necessary; it is not like the case of Judge acting or alleged to have acted, from corrupt motives, but of a wrong committed which has worked damage to the Respondents. Ferguson v. The Earl of Kinnoull (9 Clk. and Fin. 321), Saxon v. Castle (6 Ad. and Ell. 652), and with regard to the amount of damages, the special damage averred is sufficient to let in the proof of loss of trade given; there is no ground for saying they are excessive.

Mr. Macaulay, Q.C., in reply.

The Right Hon. Dr. Lushington (July 30, 1860).—This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Calcutta. The Respondents were the Plaintiffs in that Court, and their plaint recited that they, before the committing of the grievances complained of, had been, and then were, the owners of a steam-tug called the Underwriter employed for hire in towing ships to and from the port of Calcutta, and in the receipt of large profits from such employment; and that the Defendant was an officer in the public service of the East India Company, having the name and style of the Superintendent of marine, and that, as such, he was invested with the chief authority and control over all the officers of the Bengal Pilot service employed by the Company on the Hooghly river for the purpose [128] of piloting vessels thereon to and from the said port; and that the said officers of the Bengal pilot service were the only pilots who, upon the said river, exercise the calling of pilots, and take pilotage charge of inward and outward bound ships; and that in consequence of the perils of the navigation, no ship can with safety proceed inwards or outwards, or be duly navigated, except in charge of a competent pilot. After these recitals, the plaint charged that the Defendant wrongfully and unjustly contriving and intending to injure the Plaintiffs, and to prevent them from continuing to employ their said steam-tug, wrongfully and injuriously issued and published a certain order addressed to the said officers of the Bengal pilot service, whereby he, as such Superintendent of marine, strictly prohibited them from allowing the said steam-tug to take any ship in tow of which they should have charge. It then stated the period during which the order remained in force; the deprivation of employment during that time; and the consequent loss of profit, laying the damage at Rs. 20,000. To this plaint the Appellant pleaded three pleas, on the first only of which, being the plea of not guilty, the question before their Lordships arises. The allegations in the inducement by way of recitals must be taken to have been admitted by the Defendant; and supposing the direct allegations which are in issue to have been proved, in such sense as to make the action maintainable, no question was made before us as to the amount of the damages awarded: the point for consideration, therefore, is, whether upon the evidence in the case this action is maintainable.

As their Lordships view the evidence, the facts appear to be the following:—The Bengal pilots are [129] an organised body, under the control of the Superintendent of marine, which office, at the time in question, was filled by the Defendant. They form by far the larger part of the Calcutta pilots, and on them devolves the almost indispensable duty of piloting vessels up and down the Hooghly to and from the sea and port of Calcutta. Tugs are constantly required for bringing vessels up; and the Plaintiffs were owners of one, a steam-tug, the Underwriter employed in this service. For such service there are two rates of payment, one called the Government certificate, in which the amount is regulated by a tariff according to the time employed; the other depending on the special contract between the parties. On the 20th of September, 1857, when the mutiny in India was in full vigour, Her Majesty's ship Belleisle entered the Hooghly, bringing troops for the public service. The Captain of the Underwriter, Fox, who was seeking employment, went on board and offered to take her up. At this time a Bengal pilot was in charge of her. Fox declined to take her on the terms of the Government certificate, and asked a much larger sum, first Rs. 3000, and finally Rs. 2500. The Captain, not choosing to incur the responsibility of agreeing to this demand, telegraphed once and again to Beadon, the Secretary to the Government of India, stating, on the second occasion, the demand, that his pilot required a powerful tug, and asked what amount he might offer. On the receipt of this second application, Mr. Beadon communicated to the Defendant, with a letter stating what had passed, and concluding with these words: - "What had better be done?" The Defendant immediately went to Beadon, and gave him his opinion that the charge was exorbitant; that [130] it was Beadon's duty to take steps to prevent such charges being made for ships coming in with troops; that the rate of charge might otherwise increase from day to day with the increasing necessities of the Government; and added, that if he left the matter to him, he would proceed to The Bankshall (the place of rendezvous for the Bengal pilots) and direct one of the officers to see the owners of the tug, and tell them that if they did not send down immediately an order to take the troops in tow, he would issue an order to the officers of the pilot service, strictly prohibiting them from allowing the Underwriter to take any ship in tow of which they had pilotage charge. To this Beadon answered, "I think you would do right;" and so left it with the Defendant to dispose of the matter. What the Defendant said he would do, he immediately did. The Government terms were still refused by the Plaintiffs, and the service was unperformed by them. Whereupon, on the 22nd of September, by the direction of the Defendant, the order complained of was issued, and remained in force until the 19th of October, when, by the direction of the Government, it was rescinded; and it is for the loss of employment during this interval, that the action has been brought and the damages awarded.

On this state of facts it does not appear to their Lordships material to consider whether the demand made on the part of the Plaintiffs was exorbitant or not, nor whether the opinion expressed by the Defendant, and on which he subsequently acted, was founded in good policy, or otherwise. Neither does it seem to them to conclude the question in the action, that the act complained of is to be considered as the act of the Government, and that in the part which [131] the Defendant took in it he acted only as the officer of the Government, intending to discharge his duty as a public servant with perfect good faith, and with an entire absence of any malice, particular or general, against the Plaintiffs. For if the act which he did was in itself wrongful, as against the Plaintiffs, and produced damage to them, they must have the same remedy by action against the doer, whether the act was his own, spontaneous and unauthorized, or whether it were done by the order of the superior power. The civil irresponsibility of the Supreme power for tortuous acts could not be maintained with any show of justice, if its agents were not personally responsible for them; in such cases the Government is morally bound to indemnify its agent, and it is hard on such agent when this obligation is not satisfied; but the right to compensation in the party injured is paramount to this consideration. Neither in the case of damage occasioned by a wrongful act, that is, an act which the law esteems an injury, is malice a necessary ingredient to the maintenance of the action: an imprisonment of the person, a battery, a trespass on land, are instances, and only instances, in which the act may be quite innocent, even laudable, as to the intention of the doer, and yet, if any damage, even in legal contemplation, be the consequence, an action will lie.

But the foundation of every action of tort, apart from the question of malice, is an act wrongful, and which may be qualified legally as an injury. This position is not contravened in the very able and learned judgment of the Court below: indeed, it is assumed as the principle of decision, and the wrongful act relied on is stated to be, the invasion of "the right [132] of the Plaintiffs to employ their vessels in towage; in other words, the right of exercising their lawful trade or calling, without undue hindrance or obstruction from others." No doubt an act which, prima facie, would appear to be innocent and rightful, may become tortious if it invades the right of third person. A familiar instance is, the erection on one's own land of anything which obstructs the light of a neighbour's house: prima facie, it is lawful to erect what one pleases on one's own land; but if by twenty years' enjoyment, the neighbour has acquired the right to the unobstructed transmission of the light across that land, the erection of any building which substantially obstructs it, is an invasion of the right, and so not only does damage, but is unlawful and injurious.

The question then is, whether, in this sense, the Defendant has been guilty of a wrongful act. On the one hand, the Government has frequent occasion to have vessels towed up the river, and it desires to have this done by the owners of towing-vessels on certain terms which it believes to be just; and it keeps in its service a body of pilots, who have the charge of vessels coming up the river; and it is assumed that practically, the discretion, for the time being, of employing the particular towing vessel that is to bring up a ship, is vested in the pilot who has her in charge. The Plaintiffs decline to deal with the Government on the terms which it desires to deal on, and in a particular case insist on what appears to the Government not only to be an unreasonable demand in itself, but likely, as a precedent, to be injurious to the public interests, if yielded to in this particular interest. If the Plaintiffs have the right, as undoubtedly they have, of prescribing what terms they please for the [133] services they are to render, it cannot be doubted that the Government has an equal right to accept or refuse to deal with the Plaintiffs on those terms: to say, "We will employ you only if you will accept such or such a remuneration." And, if the prohibition complained of had been limited to pilots in charge of vessels in the public service, we suppose no one would have imagined for a moment that there was anything wrongful in it, or that any action could be maintained on account of it, however prejudicial its consequences might have been to the Plaintiffs' business: nor could it have made any difference if there were no vessels to be towed up but those in the service of the Government, although the consequence would have been directly a total loss of employment by the Plaintiffs; for their right to exercise their calling must be understood only as co-extensive with, and not as overriding, the right of the public or of individuals to deal with them or not, at their pleasure: the right to buy or to refuse to buy is as much to be regarded as the right to sell or to refuse to sell.

But the prohibition certainly goes beyond this: it forbids the officers of the pilot service from allowing the Underwriter to take any ship in tow of which they have pilotage charge: and the question is, whether this difference in extent makes it, as against the Plaintiffs, wrongful. Their Lordships are of opinion that it does not. For the interests of the community, and without any legal obligation, the Government has organized a body of pilots: it does not appear that any law forbids the employment of a pilot who is not of that body, and, indeed, it was proved that there were other pilots exercising their calling in the port of Calcutta on whom the Government prohibition [134] would have had no effect. The Government certainly, as any other master, may lawfully restrict its own servants as to those whom they shall employ under them, or co-operate with in performing the services for the due performance of which they are enrolled and taken into its service. Supposing it had been believed, that the Underwriter was an ill-found vessel, or in any way unfit for the service, might not the pilots have been lawfully forbidden to employ her until these objections were removed? Would it not, indeed, have been the duty of the Government to do so? And, is it not equally lawful and right when it is honestly believed that her owners will only render their services on exorbitant terms? As regards individual owners of vessels, of all but those employed on its own account, the Government, by its pilots, co-operates with the Plaintiffs in the service of bringing their vessels safely into port; may it not refuse that co-operation so long as it believes the demand made by them unreasonable, and likely to be prejudicial to its own interests, that is, the interests of the public? Their Lordships think this question can admit of only one answer, and if so, the prohibition issued by the Defendant in its whole extent was a lawful act, and did not interfere injuriously with any right of the Plaintiffs.

It will be observed that their Lordships are only dealing with a case in which no malice, in the most general sense of the term, is imputed, or proved against the Defendant. It is unnecessary to consider what would have been their judgment in a case in which the Defendant had given the same advice to the Government, and done the same act towards the Plaintiffs from any indirect motive, or with direct [135] malice against them. It is enough to say, that the decision of such a case would turn on totally different principles from the present.

It will be observed also that their Lordships' reasoning identifies the act of the Defendant with the approbation of the Secretary to the Government; and they do this, not forgetting his letter to the Defendant, dated on the 15th October, in which the Defendant is censured for his act, and directed to recall it; for their Lordships think that the evidence of the Defendant, uncontradicted by the evidence of Beadon, clearly establishes that the Defendant acted with his approbation. To him application had first been made for directions by the Captain of the Belleisle, and he sought advice of the Defendant, accepted the advice which was given in good faith, and could not have been withheld without breach of duty; and if so, the character of the act cannot be changed by the change of opinion subsequently manifested, or by the censure which it was thought right to inflict upon the agent.

This case was disposed of in the Court below in a very learned and elaborate judgment, to which their Lordships have given the full consideration it deserves, though they cannot accede to all the conclusions of that judgment. The appeal has been very ably argued at the Bar; but their Lordships have not thought it necessary to review and distinguish the many cases cited, either in the judgment of the Court below or in the argument. It seems to them that when the legal principles to which they have adverted are applied to the facts of this case, its decision turns on a very plain and elementary point: it is essential to an action in tort that the act complained of should, [136] under the circumstances, be legally wrongful as regards the party complaining; that is, it must prejudicially affect him in some legal right; merely that it will, however, directly, do him harm in his interests, is not enough. Cases are of daily occurrence in which the lawful exercise of a right operates to the detriment of another, necessarily and directly without being actionable. The present case appears to their Lordships to be no more, and they will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed, and that the costs of the appeal should be borne by the Respondents.

MAHOMED BAUKER HOOSSAIN KHAN BAHADOOR.—Appellant: SHURFOON NISSA BEGUM,—Respondents * [Feb. 3 and 4, 1860].

On appeal from the Supreme Court at Madras.

By the Mahomedan law the legitimacy of a child of Mahomedan parents may be presumed or inferred from circumstances, without any direct proof either of a marriage between the parents, or of any formal act of legitimation.

In the absence of evidence or circumstances sufficient to found such a presumption, or inference, a claim by a party as a legitimate son to share in an intestate's estate dismissed.

The question in this case was one of legitimacy, and related to the right of the Appellant to three-[137]-eighths of the estate of Shasavar Jang Bahadoor, deceased. The parties were Mahomedans, and inhabitants of Madras, and the Appellant claimed as the brother of the deceased. The case of the Respondent, the infant daughter and only child of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, was, that the Appellant was not his legitimate brother, but was the offspring of a slave girl, brought up by one of the Nicka wives of the father of the deceased, Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, and, as such, was not entitled to a share of his estate.

The Bill was filed by Syed Fareed, the Respondent's grandfather and next friend in the Supreme Court at Madras against Mayroon Nissa Begum and Madar Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, alleging that Shasavar Jung Bahadoor died on the 24th May, 1856, intestate, leaving the Defendant, Mayroon Nissa Begum, his nicka and only wife, and the Respondent, his daughter by Mayroon Nissa Begum, an infant, him surviving; that the Appellant claimed to be a brother of the intestate, and a sharer in his estate, which right was denied, and that after certain proceedings had been taken on the Ecclesiastical side of the Supreme Court, letters of administration to the estate of the intestate were granted by that Court to the Defendant, Mayroon Nissa Begum, as his widow; and the Bill prayed, that the usual accounts might be taken of the intestate's estate, and that the Defendant, Maroon Nissa Begum, as such widow, might be declared entitled to receive one-eighth, and the Respondent, as such daughter, might be declared entitled to receive one-half of the estate and effects of the intestate; and that it might be referred to the Master to inquire whether there were any other relatives of the intestate entitled to the remaining three-eighths of the [138] residue: and in default thereof, that the Respondent and the Defendant, Mayroon Nissa Begum, might be declared entitled to such remaining three eighths in proportion to their respective shares as aforesaid.

The defendants, by their answers, admitted the facts stated in the Bill.

The suit came on to be heard on the 9th of February, 1858, when the Supreme Court referred it to the Master to inquire and report, whether the Appellant was a brother of the intestate; and for that purpose the Appellant was to be at liberty to go before the Master.

The Appellant left with the Master a state of facts, which alleged that, Shasavar Jung Bahadoor was the son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, a former Nawab of the Carnatic, then deceased; that Oomdut Ool Oomrah married, in the form usual amongst Mahomedans for performing Nicka marriages, to one Ameen Sahiba, alias Buddee Beebee; that the Appellant was the only issue of that marriage and was the son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, by Ameen Sahiba, his nicka wife, and was, therefore, the brother of the intestate; that the Appellant had, from the date of his birth, been acknowledged, treated, and received by the Governors in Council in Madras, by the Nawabs of the Carnatic, his relations, and by the intestate in his life, and by his relations and friends, as the son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and as the brother of the intestate. That the Appellant and the intestate were, on the death of their father, Oomdut Ool Oomrah, on the representation of the family of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, on the 29th of September, 1801, acknowledged by Lord Clive, the then Governor of Madras, to be the sons of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and a pension of Rs. 10,000, [139] was granted to each of them, Shasavar Jung Bahadoor and the Appellant, as the nicka sons of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, which pension was still paid to the Appellant; and it further alleged that the Appellant had been admitted by the Defendants, Mayroon Nissa Begum and Madar Ool Oomrah, to be the brother of the intestate, on the hearing of an Ecclesiastical suit in the Supreme Court, in which her right as widow of the intestate was established and declared, and also by Madar Ool Oomrah.

The Respondent also left a state of facts with the Master, which stated that the Appellant was not the brother of the intestate, and was not one of the legitimate sons of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, formerly Nawab of the Carnatic. That the Appellant was the son of a slave girl, named Nurgees, otherwise called Ameen Sahiba, by Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and was brought up by Chattoore Begum, one of the nicka wives of Oomdut Ool Oomrah; that Ameen Sahiba was a slave girl in the establishment of Chattoore Begum, and always lived with her; was not the nicka wife of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and never had any establishment of her own; while all the other wives of Oomdut Ool Oomrah had. That the intestate never acknowledged the Appellant as his brother. That he kept himself aloof from the other members of the family. That Oomdut Ool Oomrah had one shadee wife, Doolary Begum, and four nicka wives, namely Coolsoom Begum, Chattoore Begum, Mahtaub Begum, and Hyath Begum, and no others. That on the death of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, Doolary Begum, as the shadee wife of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, received a pension of Rs. 24,000, annually, from the Government of Madras: and Coolsoom Begum, Chattoore Begum, Mahtaub Begum, and Hyath [140] Begum, as the nicka wives of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, received a pension of Rs. 5,000, each annually from the Government of Madras. That Ameen Sahiba was maintained and supported by the Appellant for some time, but that he afterwards refused to support her, in consequence of which refusal Ameen Sahiba complained to the Government agent that the Appellant, who was in the receipt of Rs. 833, from Government, did not support her, and prayed that the Government would order him to maintain her. That the Government agent, in a letter dated the 8th of December, 1810, addressed to the Appellant, directed him to pay his mother, Ameen Sahiba, the sum of Rs. 50, monthly.

The evidence was contradictory. The Appellant adduced evidence before the Master in support of his state of facts, and, amongst other documents, put in an extract from the records of the Government, containing a copy of a letter, dated the 3rd of October, 1801, from the then Governor General to Uzeen ul Dowlah, the Nawab of Arcot, transmitting a statement of the allowance to be made to the family, and requesting the Nawab to furnish him with a statement of the different receipts to be granted for the allowances, and the statement sent in return, in which statement it was insisted that the Appellant's name was returned as a nicka son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah. It was deposed by two of the witnesses, sisters of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, who were examined viva voce in support of the Appellant's state of facts, that they were present at the nicka marriage of Ameen Sahiba with Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and that the Appellant was the issue of that marriage, and that he was always treated by Oomdut Ool Oomrah as his legitimate son, and had [141] as such been received by the witnesses and other members of the family. The Government agent and paymaster of the Carnatic stipends was also examined by the Appellant, and he stated that the Appellant and Shasavar Jung Bahadoor had both the same yearly allowance as nicka sons of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and that the Appellant had been treated as a nicka son by the British Government.

The Respondent adduced evidence in support of her counter state of facts, and relied upon a document, being the reply of the Nawab of Arcot to the letter of the Governor General, forwarding a memorandum of the receipts to be taken, in which the Appellant was thus described:—"Receipt under the seal of Raulul ul Nissa, alias Chattore Begum, with her sons as follows:—"For Bauker Hoossain Khan (the Appellant) Rs. 834 5½a.; for Chattore Begum, Rs. 416 10½a." The Respondent also tendered an extract from the records of Government, being a copy of a letter dated the 7th of October, 1820 (see post [7 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 150), from Nawab Azeem Jah, deceased, the then Nawab of the Carnatic, to the Government, stating that Chattore Begum, who received the Government stipend of Rs. 416 10½a., had died on the 15th of September, and that the stipend and that of Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan (the Appellant), son by a concubine of the late Nawab, had been paid on one receipt, and that then the stipend of Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan, amounting to Rs. 833. 5½a., would be payable on his separate receipt. This document was objected to, and was not admitted, the Master considering it irrelevant, and the Appellant no party to it. Evidence was also adduced by her to the effect that the Ap-[142]-pellant might have been regarded as the nicka son of the Oomdut Ool Oomrah, as he had been adopted by Chattore Begum, the childless nicka wife of the Nawab, and brought up by her as her own son, but that he was the offspring of a slave of Chattore Begum named Ameen Sahiba.

The Master by his report found that the Appellant was the son of the Oomdut Ool Oomrah by his nicka wife, Ameen Sahiba, and that he was the legitimate brother of the intestate.

The Respondent filed two exceptions to this report: first, that the Master had rejected the letter of the 7th of October, 1820, whereas he ought to have admitted it as evidence for the Respondent; and secondly, that the Master had found the Appellant to be the brother of the intestate, whereas the Master ought to have found that the Appellant was not the brother of the intestate.

These exceptions were argued on the 2nd of July, 1858, before the Chief Justice, Sir Christopher Rawlinson, and allowed. The reasons of the Chief Justice for making the Order allowing the exceptions, transmitted to the Privy Council, were as follows:—"First exception, as to the document purporting to be a translation of a letter or note from the late Nawab Azeem Jah to the Government, bearing date 7th of October, 1820, was tendered on behalf of the Plaintiff as a declaration by the head of the family concerning pedigree, in the same way as the other letters of the Nawab in 1801 had been admitted on the other side. It was admitted before the Master to be a true translation; it came from its proper custody, namely, the Government office. No objection was taken that a further search for the original [143] Persian note was necessary. Upon the above state of facts, I was of opinion that the document should have been admitted, whatever might have been the case, had other objections been taken: but I added, that when deciding the second exception, I would consider the document as not before the Court. Second exception.—The allowance of this exception turned on the fact, whether the claimant, Mahomed Bauker, was the legitimate brother of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased; or, in other words, whether his mother the girl Buddee Beebee, alias Ameen, was the lawful wife of the Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor. To establish this fact, two old female witnesses, relatives of the Nawab, deposed to the fact of a marriage having taken place as far back as 1800, if at all; they gave no dates. There was no other witness to, or any other evidence of the marriage, save the above direct testimony. There was not any evidence, as is usual, and might have been expected in the case of a Nawab's marriage, such as the attendance of the Cazeer or some other Mahomedan officer, no fixing of the dowry, etc., while all the facts and circumstances which were beyond dispute since 1800, instead of supporting the fact of a marriage, tended most strongly to the opposite conclusion. It was proved on both sides that the alleged wife, Ameen Sahiba, was a poor girl, a protege and servant of Chattore Begum, one of the wives of the Oomdut Ool Oomrah; that after the time of the supposed marriage she continued to live with her mistress, instead of having a separate house and establishment of her own, as all the other wives of the Nawab had. That on the birth of her child (in 1800 or 1801) he was given to Chattore Begum; that on the death of the Nawab shortly after, in 1801, [144] when the list of his family was sent in to the Government by his successor for pensions, the name of this woman nowhere appeared, either in the list of wives or of other persons entitled to any payment (see Lord Clive's letter of October the 3rd, 1801, and the Nawab Azcen-ool-Dowlah's answer of the 17th of October, 1801). It was not proved that she either received any pension or did any act claiming to be a wife from 1800 down to the day of her death, about fifty years afterwards, but that she was dependent on what she could obtain from her son Mahomed Bauker. In support of the claimant's case, it was also urged that his name appears in the Nawab's list of the 3rd of October, 1801, as a 'nicka son' of the late Nawab. True it is that it does, but the letter of October 3rd, taken as it should be, together with the answer of the 17th of October, destroys rather than strengthens his case; for though in the first list of October 3rd, Mahomed Bauker's name appears in the list of Nicka sons, the name of his mother nowhere appears either in the list of wives or elsewhere; while in the list of October 17th, he is described as the son of Chattore Begum, under whose seal the receipt for his and her pension is to be given, thus explaining how the Nawab came to insert his name in the first list as a 'nicka son,' viz., because he considered Chattore Begum, to be his mother. On weighing the whole of the above evidence I could not come to the conclusion that the claimant had established the marriage of his mother Ameen, or his own legitimacy. The girl, Ameen Sahiba, I consider never was the wife of the Nawab, though the Nawab was probably the father of her illegitimate child; that Chattore Begum not having any children of her own, took to it soon after its [145] birth, a proceeding to which a humble attendant would gladly consent, and would not object to his name being sent, in 1801, as a 'Nicka son' of the Nawab, entitled to a pension; while the improbability of the name of a wife of a Nawab not being returned in the list of the family in 1801, and of her remaining, during a long life, content with such exclusion and consequent loss of all pension, the equally great, if not greater, improbability of a Mahomedan wife giving up her only son (if legitimate) to another wife,—pressed so strongly on my mind as altogether to outweigh the not very clear and wholly unsupported testimony of the two female witnesses to the marriage. In support also of the case of Mahomed Bauker being a brother, some evidence was adduced before the Master of admissions by Mayroon Nissa (the Defendant and infant Plaintiff's mother) both in this and the Maukamah Court, though this class of evidence was not much, if at all, relied on, when the case was before the Court. I refer to it lest it should be supposed that it had escaped my notice.

Supposing, however, that such evidence could be made admissible against the infant Plaintiff, I do not think it was entitled to any weight under the circumstances of this case. The Defendant, Mayroon Nissa, a person of low origin, had only been married four or five years before the death of her husband, Shasavar Jung Bahadoor. She was, as is unfortunately too frequently the case in the East, immediately after the death of her husband surrounded by claimants, who, after disagreeing amongst themselves as to the division of the property of the infant, commenced law suits, some as friends of the infant, some for administration, etc. : no less than two or three on the present [146] occasion were so commenced, one by the claimant himself, Mahomed Bauker, in the Maukamah Court. The finding in this last Court, I will only observe, is rested solely on the admissions of the claimants, none of whom had any claim except the widow, and on the fact of his name appearing in the first list of the Nawab of 3rd of October, 1801, as a 'Nicka son': on the small weight this is entitled to when read with the second letter of 17th of October, 1801, I have already remarked."

From the Order allowing the exceptions the present appeal was brought.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellant. As the parties are Mahomedans, their rights are to be regulated by the Mahomedan law. By that law, a marriage, in circumstances of reputation and acknowledgment, like the present, will be presumed, and, consequently, the legitimacy of the Appellant, Ujuz Ali Khan v. Mussaumaut Fatima Khatoon (1 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 357), Khan Bahadur Hidayat Oollah v. Rai Jan Khanum (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 295), Jeswant Singjee Ubbhy Singjee v. Jet Singjee Ubbhy Singjee (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 245), Mirza Quaim Ali Beg v. Mussaumaut Hingun (3 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 152), Macnaghten "On Mahomedan law," Introd. p. xxiv. and ch. vii. par. 33 ib. and pp. 132, 376. Baillie, Muh. law of Ind. 35. But, here the evidence of the witnesses to the marriage examined by the Appellant, two of whom were members of the family, satisfactorily establish both in law and in fact the Nicka marriage of Ameen Sahiba with Oom-[147]-dut Ool Oomrah. Hearsay evidence is admissible by the Mahomedan law, if there be no formal proof of the marriage, Macnaghten "On Mahomedan law," Introd. p. xxiii. and ch. xii. par. 14. p. 77. At all events, we submit, that the evidence, after so long a lapse of time, was sufficient to raise a legal presumption in favour of the marriage and of the legitimacy of the Appellant, which presumption, we submit, has not been rebutted. The rule in such a case is, Semper presumuntur pro matrimonio, which is admitted in English Courts, Piers v. Piers (2 H.L. Cases, 331). It is shown that the Appellant was acknowledged and treated by Oomdut Ool Oomrah as his legitimate son, and that he was recognized as such by the family, and by the Government of Madras. The statement that Ameen Sahiba was a slave is unfounded in fact.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Ayrton, for the Respondent.—There are no circumstances in this case to raise the presumption of legitimacy contended for. The authorities relied upon by the Appellant's Counsel in support of their propositions do not apply. Here there is no satisfactory evidence that the Appellant's mother was the Nicka wife of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, or of any acknowledgment by him, that the Appellant was his child; on the contrary, the Respondent's evidence establishes the fact, that he was adopted by Chattore Begum, one of the Nicka wives of the Nawab, she being childless, and was the son of Ameen Sahiba, a protege, or dependant, living with her. The Master improperly rejected the letter dated the 7th of October, 1820, which was a statement of a deceased member of the intestate's family respecting his pedigree and, therefore, relevant to the inquiry.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (June 20, 1860).—The question in the present appeal from the Supreme Court of Judicature at Madras, between Mahomedans, is, whether upon the evidence in the case, the Appellant ought to be considered as the lawful brother of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, that is to say, the lawful son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, a Mahomedan, formerly Nawab of the Carnatic, the father of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, who having survived Oomdut Ool Oomrah for more than half a century died at Madras in the year 1856.

The point arose in a suit, in the Court already mentioned, for administering the estate of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, the decree in which, dated the 9th of February, 1858, directed among other things, a reference to the Master of the Court, to inquire and report whether the Appellant was a brother of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, and directed that for that purpose the Appellant (not a party to the cause) should be at liberty to go before the Master.

The Appellant, availing himself of this permission, carried in a state of facts and charge before the Master, which is in these terms:—"That the Master be directed to inquire and report to the Court whether the said Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor is a brother of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, the intestate in the pleadings of this cause named. That Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, the said intestate, was the son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, Nawab of the Carnatic, now deceased. That the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, Nawab of the Carnatic, the father of the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased, was, some three or four years prior to his death, on or [149] about the month of December, married, in the form usual amongst the Mahomedans for performing nicka marriages to one Ameen Sahiba, alias Buddee Beebee. That the said Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor was the only issue of the said marriage, and was the son of the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, Nawab of the Carnatic, by his nicka wife, the said Ameen Sahiba, alias Buddee Beebee, and was born on the 10th of June, 1800, and is, therefore, the brother of the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased. That the said Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor has, from the date of his birth up to the present time, been acknowledged, treated, and received by the Governor in Council in Madras, by the Nawabs of the Carnatic, his relations, and by the late Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased, in his life, and by his relations and friends, as the son of the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, Nawab of the Carnatic, and as the brother of the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased. That the said Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor, and Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased, were, on the death of their father, the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, Nawab of the Carnatic, on the representation of the family of the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, the Nawab of the Carnatic, on the 29th of September, 1801, acknowledged by Lord Clive, then Governor of Madras, to be the sons of the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, the Nawab of the Carnatic; and a pension of Rs. 10,000, was granted to each of them, the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased, and the said Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor, as the nicka sons of the said Oomdut Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, the Nawab of the Carnatic, deceased, which pension has since been and still is paid to the said [150] Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor. That the said Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor has been admitted by the Defendants, Mayroon Nissa Begum and Madar Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, to be the brother of the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, the former by her Counsel and Proctor on the hearing of the Ecclesiastical suit in the Supreme Court, in which her right as widow of the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased, was established and declared, and by the said Madar Ool Oomrah Bahadoor, in the late Nawab's Maukamah Court, and in certain writings under his hand."

The claim was opposed on behalf of the Respondent, the daughter and only child of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, and evidence was adduced on each side in support of it and against it. Upon the whole of the evidence, the Master reported in the Appellant's favour, finding that the Appellant was the son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, by "his nicka wife" Ameen Sahiba, and was the brother of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor. But exceptions to the Master's report were taken by the Respondent, and, upon argument, decided in her favour by the Supreme Court; a decision that produced the appeal now before their Lordships, and which was argued here fully and very well.

The exceptions are thus:—"First exception.—For that the said Master hath, in and by the said separate report, rejected the Exhibit C (a), mentioned and set

(a) Exhibit C.—Deposed to by P. Nullatomby Moody. "From his Highness the Nawab Azum Jah, dated 7th October, 1820. On the 15th September died Chatoor Begum (Nicka wife of the late Nawab Oomdut Ool Oomrah), who received from the honourable company a stipend of rupees 416 10^g. Her stipend, and that of Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan, son by a concubine of the late Nawab, have been paid on one receipt, and now the stipend of Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan, [151] forth in his said report, and offered as evidence on behalf of the Plaintiff, in support of her state of facts and charge left in this cause on the 23rd of April, 1858, whereas the said Master ought not to have rejected such exhibit C, but ought to have admitted it as evidence for the said Plaintiff. Second exception.—For that the said Master hath, in and by the said separate report, found that Mahomed Banker Hossain Khan Bahadoor is the brother of Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, the intestate, in the pleadings of this cause named: whereas the said Master ought to have found that the said Mahomed Banker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor is not the brother of the said Shasavar Jung Bahadoor, deceased. Wherefore the said Plaintiff doth except to the said Master's separate report, and appeals therefrom to the judgment of this Honourable Court." And the order allowing these exceptions is in these terms:—"The matter upon the exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the separate report of Charles Martin Teed, Esquire, the Master of this Honourable Court, dated the 10th of June last, made in pursuance of the decree made on the hearing of this cause, and bearing date the 9th of February last, coming on to be argued this present day before the Honourable the Supreme Court of Judicature at Madras, in the presence of Counsel on behalf of the said Plaintiff and Mahomed Banker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor; and the said exceptions and report being opened, upon debate of the matter, and hearing what was alleged by the Counsel on both sides; this Court doth Order that the said exceptions be allowed, with costs of the proceedings had before the said Master, and of this application and Order."

In the view that their Lordships take of the matter, [152] the first exception is unimportant; for, whether the document to which it relates be considered or not considered as part of the evidence, the conclusion as to the question of legitimacy must, according to their Lordships' opinion, be the same; and with regard to that question, their Lordships find it to be, if not established, at least highly probable, that the Appellant, who seems now to be between fifty-eight and sixty-two years of age, was born in the house of Chattore Begum, a Nicka wife of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, and it appears to be clear that he (the Appellant) is the son of a woman who was a protégé, or dependant, if not a servant, of that lady. She seems to have brought up the Appellant's mother, Ameen Sahiba, mentioned in the report, and to have taken an interest in her. It appears likely that Ameen Sahiba, from a time preceding her adolescence until the death of Chattore, had no other home than the residence of Chattore, and that Oomdut Ool Oomrah, whether legitimately or illegitimately, was the father of the Appellant, and so, from the time of his birth, reputed generally to be; their Lordships, by using the term "reputed generally," not, however, meaning to affirm or deny that there ever was any acknowledgment of the paternity by Oomdut Ool Oomrah. He (Oomdut Ool Oomrah) died before the year 1802, and was survived for several years by Chattore. She was survived for several years by Ameen Sahiba, and since the death of Ameen Sahiba some years have elapsed.

More than once in the proceedings before us, Ameen Sahiba is described as a slave. Their Lordships, however, believe, and it has been, by the Counsel on each side, at the bar, expressly and distinctly admitted, that she was not so. Their Lordships, accordingly, for [153] every purpose of the present litigation, assume that Ameen Sahiba, during her whole life, was free.

Chattore Begum, who seems not to have had any child of her own, appears to have adopted the Appellant from the time of his early childhood, if not from the time of his birth, and thenceforth during the whole of her life to have treated him as her son; and both the Appellant and his mother lived continually, as it seems, with Chattore until her death—the Appellant from his birth, his mother from a time preceding that event. The Appellant's examination in support of his state of facts contains but an indistinct and indirect, if it contains any, allegation that his mother was the wife of Oomdut Ool Oomrah.

Proceeding on the basis of these remarks, their Lordships deem it necessary or convenient now to divide the evidence into two portions: the first consisting of the testimony of two widow ladies, named Shurfoon Nissa Begum, and Fakroon Nissa Begum, and the second consisting of all the rest of the evidence: and to consider the second portion previously to considering the first; and, in considering the second portion, to deal with it as if the first were not existing. So viewing the evidence, their Lordships are of opinion that what has just been described as the second portion of it is insufficient to support the Appellant's contention that he is the legitimate or legitimated, son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah. By the second portion of the evidence it is not shown that there was at any time a ceremony of marriage between him and Ameen Sahiba, or that she at any time claimed or professed, or represented herself to be his wife or widow, or was at any time acknowledged by him as his wife, or was by the Government or other-[154]-wise at any time recognised or treated as his wife or widow. Though five other ladies, as his widows, had allowances from the Government, she had none.

The case, too, thus regarded, there is no proof that Oomdut Ool Oomrah at any time treated, recognized, or acknowledged the Appellant as his son, and it does not (we think) help the Appellant that, soon after his alleged father's death, the Appellant, as a member of Oomdut Ool Oomrah's family, had a pension from the Government, which the Appellant still enjoys, and which there seems to their Lordships to be no reason in point of justice, fairness, or propriety, why he should not continue to enjoy. That pension was, with the assent and concurrence of the family of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, certainly allotted to the Appellant, then a minor, in very early childhood, as a son of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, but also as the son of Chattore, which, by adoption, though by adoption alone, as already mentioned, the Appellant was: nor can he, in our opinion, be taken to have had, or to be enjoying, any Government pension or Government allowance whatever, in the character of a son of Ameen Sahiba. It was for the pecuniary interest of Chattore, with whom the mother and the son were living, to represent the Appellant as Chattore's son, and if Ameen Sahiba was not a widow of Oomdut Ool Oomrah, it was for her interest also, and that of the Appellant, that he should not be represented as her son. Their Lordships are of opinion, that unless the testimony forming what their Lordships term the first portion of the evidence ought to be deemed credible and of some weight, the Appellant's claim fails. Is, then, Shurfoon Nissa Begum, or Fakroon Nissa Begum, a credible witness? They have deposed thus:—[155] Shurfoon Nissa Begum, a widow, residing at No. 25, in Amyapah Modelly Street, at Royapettah, deposed: "I know Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan. I knew his mother and his father, who was my brother. There was a girl inside the house; he married her by Nicka. The Nabob Oomdut Ool Oomrah married by Nicka, Ameen Sahiba. Some time after the Nicka marriage Bauker Hoossain was born. Immediately on the birth of the child he was given in adoption to Chattore Begum. I was present at the Nicka. The Nicka was read outside. The people came in, tied a Lutchu, and put a nose ornament. The Lutchu was tied on Ameen Sahiba, and the nose ornament was put on her; I cannot say who by, there were so many persons present. I do not know if any of the people are alive except us two. After the Nicka ceremony, Oomdut Ool Oomrah and Ameen Sahiba lived as husband and wife. After Bauker Hoossain Khan's birth Ameen Sahiba was in the Chattore Begum's house. Bauker Hoossain Khan has been treated by myself as my brother's son, as my nephew. I knew Shasavar Jung; he was the son of my brother, Oomdut Ool Oomrah. Shasavar Jung's mother was Koolsoon Begum, who brought him up, and Bauker Hoossain was brought up by Chattore Begum." Cross examined by Mr. Wilkins.—"Ameen Sahiba was a child of a poor man; I do not know his name. Ameen Sahiba was not a slave girl in the family; she was a child of a poor nobleman, who, being unable to support his child, he gave the child to be supported by Chattore Begum. I know this because we were in the habit of going to Chattore Begum's house, and she in the habit of coming to us. Upon asking Chattore Begum, she said it was a poor nobleman's [156] child, and I bring her up; she did not say who the poor nobleman was, and we did not ask." I was present when the Nicka took place. I was not in the Dewanah Khanah when the Nicka was read and took place. I was among the assembly of the females. Ameen Sahiba died lately, about seven or eight years ago." Re-examined by Mr. Ritchie.—"Ameen Sahiba lived in Chattore Begum's house up to the time of her death."

Then Fakroon Nissa Begum, is examined. She deposed as follows: "I know Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan Bahadoor. I knew his mother: she was called Ameen Sahiba, but commonly known by the name of Buddee Beebee; she married Oomdut Ool Oomrah by a Nicka ceremony. Oomdut Ool Oomrah was my brother. I was present at the ceremony. This was many years ago. It took place in the Chepauk garden. I cannot say when Mahomed Bauker Hoosain Khan Bahadoor was born, but he was about a year or a year and a quarter old when his father died. I knew the late Shasavar Jung Bahadoor: he was my nephew; he was the step brother of Mahomed Bauker; when they were young they were received as brothers and played together; when they grew up they remained separate. Mahomed Bauker was brought up by Chattore Begum, who was the mother of Shasavar Jung. Mahomed Bauker was born after the Nicka marriage of Ameen Sahiba. Oomdut Ool Oomrah used to call the child to him, see it and caress it, and treated him as he did Shasavar Jung. Mahomed Bauker has been received by myself and other members of Oomdut Ool Oomrah's family as his son." Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkins.—"I am 75 years old. Ameen Sahiba was the [157] daughter of a poor woman, who was not a slave girl; I do not know who the father of Ameen Sahiba was. I do not know if the Cazee was present at the time of the Nicka marriage. The ceremony took place outside, and the ladies were all collected inside of the house on occasion of the ceremony. I was in the assembly. I saw the Nicka was read; it was read in the Dewan Khanah: afterwards the people came where the ladies were, and congratulated each other. I was not present in the Dewan Khanah when the Nicka ceremony was read. After this was read outside, the people came in where the ladies were, and tied the Lutcha and put the Nuttoo. The Nuttoo was put in the nose of Ameen Sahiba; I do not recollect who did this. The Lutcha was tied on the neck of Ameen Sahiba; I do not recollect who tied the Lutcha. Before her marriage Ameen Sahiba was a Mussulman's child, a poor man's child; and was brought up in the house of Chattore Begum. Ameen Sahiba is dead; she lived many years after Mahomed Bauker's birth. I do not know any thing more of the Nicka than I have said. I know nothing about the dowry." Re-examined by Mr. Ritchie.—"I did not hear the Nicka read. Ameen Sahiba was inside the Zenanah with the females during the whole of the marriage ceremony. Ameen Sahiba was of a marriageable age at the time of the ceremony. After the ceremony Ameen Sahiba lived in the house of Chattore Begum. Chattore Begum was the wife of Oomdut Ool Oomrah."

Whatever may have induced the ladies to give this testimony, their Lordships find themselves unable to credit it. They think it very highly improbable that [158] if a ceremony of marriage between Oomdut Ool Oomrah and the Appellant's mother of any such kind as that stated, or of any kind, had taken place with such a degree of publicity as that alleged by the two ladies, or with anything like it, the fact would not have been proved also by some other witnesses or witness, notwithstanding the lapse of time. Nor do their Lordships believe that Chattore or Ameen Sahiba would so have conducted herself, or so acted, as they respectively appear to have done, if there had been any such marriage. The conduct of both is so strongly opposed to the notion of a marriage between the protégé, dependant, or servant, and the husband of the protectress, patroness, or mistress, as to render it impossible for their Lordships to think that such a marriage took place, upon the foundation merely of the evidence before them. Why had not Ameen Sahiba, why did she not claim, a house or establishment of her own? Why did she continue in that of Chattore? Why not have, why not claim, an allowance from the Government? Why concede, as she seems to have conceded, her son to Chattore? Why rest contented or discontented in the humble and dependent, and almost, if not altogether, ignominious position in which she remained, when five wives of the Prince (her husband as now alleged) had establishments and allowances agreeing with his rank? Their Lordships think that not a single portion of the evidence of either of these two ladies can be trusted; and if that is so, there is (it cannot be necessary to repeat) no proof that Ameen Sahiba was ever married, nor proof that she ever represented herself as a married woman, or as a widow, nor proof [159] of any acknowledgment on the part of the alleged father by word or deed, by language or conduct, that he was her husband, or the father of her son.

Their Lordships, therefore, hold that the judgment under appeal is right, unless as to costs. But in arriving at this conclusion, they wish to be distinctly understood as not denying or questioning the position that, according to the Mahometan law, the law which regulates the rights of the parties before us, the legitimacy or legitimation of a child of Mahomedan parents may properly be presumed or inferred from circumstances without proof, or at least without any direct proof, either of a marriage between the parents, or of any formal act of legitimation.

Here there is, in their Lordships' judgment, an absence of circumstances sufficient to found or justify such a presumption or such an inference.

With regard to cost, however, their Lordships do not impute to the Appellant either wilful or corrupt perjury, or subornation of perjury; and therefore, not merely from the Master's opinion, but from the circumstances of the case also, they consider the Appellant's claim, though untenable, so excusable that they will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the Appellant should not be subjected to any costs (except his own) of the proceedings before the Master, or of those before the Supreme Court; that the Order before them should so far, and only so far, be varied; and that there should be no costs of the present appeal.

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Appeal dismissed for want of prosecution, under Rule V. of the Order in Council of the 13th of June, 1853, restored, under circumstances showing that the interest of infants was materially affected; but upon condition, that the appeal should be prosecuted within a given time.

The security entered into in the Sudder Court for the costs of appeal to England is vacated by the dismissal consequent upon non-prosecution of the appeal within the prescribed time.

When an appeal is restored fresh security will be required to be deposited in England.

This was an application to restore an appeal which stood dismissed in consequence of no effective steps having been taken to prosecute the appeal as required by Rule V. of the Order in Council of the 13th of June, 1853 (see Order in Council, 5 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, App. p. ix.).

The petition set forth that the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, at Calcutta, appealed from, was made on the 13th of August, 1855; that the transcript was forwarded to the Registrar of the Privy [161] Council, on the 8th of March, 1859, and registered. That no steps having been taken in England to prosecute the appeal, and six months having elapsed from the lodging of the transcript record, the appeal was under Rule V. of Her Majesty's Order in Council of the 13th of June, 1853, dismissed without further order. The petition then stated, that the neglect to prosecute the appeal arose from the delay in the execution of a power of attorney by the Appellants to prosecute the same. That the Appellants represented the interest of infants, and having regard to the magnitude of the sum at stake, and the desire to prosecute the appeal, it was submitted, that the Appellants, or their attorneys, had not been guilty of any wilful negligence or delay, and the petition further stated that the Appellants were prepared to prosecute the appeal in due course. An affidavit by one of the attorneys engaged in the case in India confirmed the statements in the petition as to the delay in the execution of the power of attorney being occasioned by the death of his partner who had the conduct of the appeal.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., in support of the petition.

Mr. Leith, opposed.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The decision proposed to be brought under appeal was ripe for hearing in the year 1856, if not in the year 1855, and the delay, in various ways, has been so considerable that, notwithstanding the state of India, especially that part of India where this matter arises, in and since the year 1857, it is probable, to say the least, that if Baboonan's personal interests had been alone concerned in this matter, the application now made would have been wholly unsuccessful. Their [162] Lordships, however, cannot but give some degree of consideration to the circumstance that there are infants concerned whose interests were confided to him. Now, their Lordships do not mean to go the length of saying, that where infants are concerned any degree of delay may be considered justifiable, or excusable, or such as may be passed over; as there may be circumstances so strong as even to prevent infancy from being an apology or an excuse. Their Lordships, however, after much consideration, do not view the present case in that light, and considering the apology, or excuse of infancy, and considering the manner in which the interest of minors are involved, and the state in which the part of India from whence the case comes was, in and after the year 1857, they are of opinion, that on certain terms this application may be acceded to.

The Applicants, their Lordships think, must pay the costs of the present application. The Applicants, their Lordships also think, must find security to the amount of £600, to be made on or before the 1st of December next, and must undertake to have the appeal set down so as to be in their Lordships' list for hearing at the sittings after Hilary term next.

Mr. Rolt.—That will enable us to communicate to the parties in India.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—One of their Lordships' reasons in thus deciding has been, that the security given in India is gone by the dismissal of the appeal. Security was given to the amount of Rs. 4000, in India; that is gone: therefore, if that money was deposited, you would be able to get it back.

[163] Mr. Rolt.—I was not aware that it would have actually gone by the dismissal of the appeal.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—We fix the amount of £600, on the hypothesis that that security is gone, and that you will obtain it back.

Mr. Rolt.—If the security stands, it would be £200, in addition: that would answer your Lordships' purpose.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—That, I suppose, would be so, if that security stands; but we do not think it can stand.

The Lord Justice Turner.—I do not see how it can stand.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The authorities in India will be informed that we proceed upon the hypothesis that you will be entitled to have the security-money back.

By an Order in Council, it was ordered, that the appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, of the 19th of August, 1855, should be restored, and that leave should be granted to the Appellants to enter and prosecute the same, upon condition that the sum of £600, sterling, be lodged by the Appellants, or their agents, in the Registry of the Privy Council, as security for the costs of the Respondents, to stand and abide the determination or Order of Her Majesty upon the appeal, on or before the 1st of December next; and likewise upon condition of the Appellants undertaking to set down the appeal for hearing at the sittings of Judicial Committee, after Hilary term, 1861, and that, upon failure of these conditions, the appeal should stand dismissed, at the sittings after Hilary term, 1861, with costs, to be paid by the Appellants.

The Appellant not having complied with the above [164] conditions, either by depositing the security, or prosecuting the appeal within the prescribed time, the appeal was dismissed.

Principles upon which the Courts in India are to estimate the appealable value, Rs. 10,000, prescribed by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838.

By a decree of the Sudder Court the principal sum decreed was under Rs. 10,000; but the Court also decreed interest. Held, that in calculating the appealable value, interest was to be added to the principal.

This petition was for special leave to appeal. By the final decree of the Sudder Court, that Court awarded the Plaintiff the sum of Rs. 5041, with interest. The Petitioner submitted, that if the interest awarded on the principal sum by such decree, was calculated at the Court rate of interest, namely, 12 per cent per annum, and such interest added to the principal, the aggregate amount of principal and interest would, without costs, amount to a sum considerably beyond Rs. 10,000, the prescribed appealable amount.

The petition was heard ex parte.

Mr. Leith appeared for the Petitioner.

As the same point was, in substance, involved in [165] the two next petitions, a joint judgment was given by their Lordships in the three petitions. See judgment, post [8 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 167.

On Petition from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

An estate, the subject of the suit, was charged with a fixed annual quit-rent of Rs. 64, which the Sudder Court decreed with a declaration of the right of the Plaintiff to an enhanced rent of Rs. 822. 13a. Held, that the value of the subject-matter in suit, in the circumstances, ought to be estimated as amounting to Rs. 10,000, and, upon special petition, leave to appeal granted.

In this petition the application was for special leave to appeal. The petition alleged that the Petitioner's husband and his ancestors had been in possession of land in the Zillah Nuddea, and held the same as a heritable tenure, at a fixed quit-rent of Rs. 64. 12a., from the successive Zemindars of Pergunnah, Ockrah, in which the lands in question were included. That in a suit brought in the Zillah Court at Nuddea, for the purpose of obtaining a decree for enhancement of the rent, the Principal Sudder Ameen decreed that the Petitioner was liable to pay the sum of Rs. 822. 13a. as an enhanced rent. That, as the matter was under Rs. 5000, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut refused to admit a special appeal. That the effect of the decree was, that the Petitioner [166] would be compelled to pay annually Rs. 822. 13a. in lieu of the quit-rent of Rs. 64. 12a., which enhanced rent would necessarily exceed the sum of Rs. 10,000, and, it was submitted, that the whole value of the lands in dispute came within the meaning of "value of the matter in dispute" in the Order in Council, of the 10th of April, 1838.

This petition was heard ex parte.

On Petition from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Mode of estimating the appealable value. Interest given by decree to be added to the principal.

Whether interest subsequent to the date of the decree can be added, is a question for the discretion of the Judicial Committee.

Petition for special leave to appeal. By the final decree of the Sudder Court, the Petitioner was decreed to pay Rs. 5000, with interest. The petition alleged, that if the interest awarded on the principal moneys was calculated at the Court rate, namely, [167] 12 per cent per annum, from the time it became due, and the amount added to the principal, the aggregate amount, without costs, would amount to a sum beyond Rs. 10,000.

Mr. Leith, in support of the petition.

Judgment in this and the two preceding petitions was delivered by

The Lord Justice Turner.—The question in each of these three petitions is, whether leave should be given to appeal from the Sudder Court to Her Majesty in Council.

In none of the petitions has there been any application to the Sudder Court for such leave. The reason of there having been no such application to the Sudder Court, in two at least of the cases, is stated to have been, that the Sudder Court has proceeded upon a certain rule as to cases in which leave would be given to appeal, and that, according to the rule on which they have proceeded, leave would not have been given in those two particular cases.

It is not very clear to their Lordships on what particular grounds the Sudder Courts have proceeded with reference to giving or refusing leave to appeal. But their Lordships feel no doubt upon what grounds the Sudder Court ought to proceed in such cases. It is quite clear, in their Lordships' judgment, that the matter must be regulated by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, and by that

Order the Sudder Courts are not to give leave to appeal unless the petition be presented within the time limited by the Order, and unless the value of the matter in dispute in such appeal shall amount to the sum of Rs. 10,000, [168] at least; importing, therefore, that leave to appeal is to be given in cases where the petition is presented within the prescribed period, and the value of the matter in dispute in the appeal amounts to the specified sum of Rs. 10,000.

Now, where the appeal is from the whole decree, and the decree has given an amount, including interest up to the date of the decree, which exceeds Rs. 10,000, it is clear, that the matter which is in dispute in the appeal must exceed the sum of Rs. 10,000; for the question to be tried upon the appeal must be whether the decree is or is not right, that is to say, whether the decree has or has not properly ordered payment of a sum exceeding Rs. 10,000. Where, therefore, at the date of the judgment the sum which is recoverable under the decree of the Sudder Court is an amount exceeding Rs. 10,000, there, in their Lordships' judgment, the case clearly falls within the terms of the Order in Council.

That, in their Lordships' understanding, disposes of the first and third of these petitions.

The second petition is somewhat different in its circumstances. It appears to be a case in which the party applying for leave to appeal claims to be entitled to an estate, subject only, as he contends, to the payment of a fixed annual rent of Rs. 64; but the Plaintiff in the suit, who is in possession of the judgment of the Court below, and would be the Respondent upon the appeal, claims the right to set upon the estate any rate which he may think fit. In this case it appears to their Lordships, either that the value in dispute in the appeal must be considered to be Rs. 10,000, within the meaning of [169] the Order in Council, or if not that it must be within the discretion of their Lordships, whether leave to appeal should or should not be given. Taking the case to be within the meaning of the Order in Council, it is clear that the value of the matter in dispute will exceed the sum of Rs. 10,000; for, of course, an estate held at a quit-rent of Rs. 64, must be increased in value to an amount far exceeding Rs. 10,000, if it be chargeable with a rent of Rs. 822, the amount of the enhanced rent given by the decree. Their Lordships, however, do not think it necessary to decide whether the case falls within the meaning of the Order in Council or not. They think that, whether it falls within the Order in Council, or within their discretion, the leave to appeal ought to be given.

Their Lordships have thus stated the reasons on which they have proceeded in these three cases, because they consider it of importance that the Sudder Courts should understand the rules which ought to be proceeded on in giving leave to appeal, as a contrary practice on their part drives parties into this Court to obtain the leave. They desire, therefore, that the rules which have been mentioned should be observed, and are of opinion, that in all these three cases leave should be given to appeal, and that in each case security should be given to the amount of £300. Their Lordships must not, of course, be understood to intimate that the Sudder Courts ought to give leave to appeal in cases in which the specified amount of Rs. 10,000 can only be reached by the addition of interest subsequent to the decree. Such cases must, in their Lordships' opinion, rest in their discretion.

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Madras.

The Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, dismissed a suit on the ground, that the facts disclosed a case of champerty: a question not raised by the pleadings, or in the Court below. Held by the Judicial Committee, that as that objection was not raised, or the points recorded by the Court, as required by Madras Reg. XV. of 1816, sec. 10, cl. 3, the dismissal upon such ground could not be maintained, as the objection, founded upon the English doctrine of champerty, ought not to be noticed by the Court upon a mere inference arising incidentally from the evidence in the suit.

K. being in urgent want of money entered into an agreement in writing with N. acting as the agent of F., for an advance of Rs. 19,000. The agreement recited that N. had undertaken to procure this amount from F., on his return, he being then absent from the place where the agreement was executed, and K. promised, in consideration of the loan, to grant N. a lease of his Zemindary, and it was provided that K. should, on F.'s arrival, execute a regular deed. N. could only accommodate K. with a part of the proposed loan, and as the matter was urgent, and F.'s return was expected to be within a few days, it was verbally agreed, that the remaining portion of the loan should be advanced within eight days. F. did not return till nineteen days after, when he was willing to make the advance required; but in the interim, and after fifteen days from the date of the agreement, K., from pressure for money had been obliged to get the advance from another party, and had, thereupon, granted him a lease of his Zemindary. N. then brought a suit for specific performance of the agreement. He afterwards died, when his heir assigned N.'s interest under the agreement to F., who thereupon brought an action against K. for breach of contract. The Civil Court awarded damages for the breach, but, upon appeal, the Sudder Court dismissed the suit, on the ground that the assignment by N.'s heir to F. was void for champerty.

Held: that as N. was only the agent of F., the party really interested in the performance of the agreement, the assignment by his heir of his interest under the agreement, for the purpose of enabling F. to bring the suit, was not champerty or maintenance, as it was wholly unnecessary, as F. was suing in respect of his own interest for a breach of contract [8 Moo. Ind. App. 188].

Held further, that as the agreement to grant the lease was incomplete in itself and conditional upon the advance by F. within eight days, a delay of nineteen days, in the circumstances of the want of money by K. to meet his pressing demands, was an unreasonable delay, which defeated the object of the loan, and avoided the agreement to grant the lease [8 Moo. Ind. App. 192].

By the English law, to maintain an action for champerty or maintenance, it is necessary to establish that the transaction was against good policy and justice, or tending to promote unnecessary litigation.

Where an appeal was affirmed upon wholly different grounds from those relied upon by the Court below, the dismissal was ordered to be without costs [8 Moo. Ind. App. 192].

This was an action brought by the Appellant against the Respondent to recover the sum of Rs. 50,000, as damages for a breach of a contract entered into by the Respondent with one Narasihma Chetty, as the Appellant's agent, to grant him a lease of the Respondent's Zemindary.

The facts of this case which give rise to the action were these:—

[171] The Respondent was the Zemindar of Amanaicknoor, near Madura, and in the month of October, 1846, being in greatly embarrassed circumstances, and having pressing demands upon him to a large extent, he applied to one Narasihma Chetty, who was connected in business transactions with the Appellant, in order to obtain the loan of an immediate sum of money to procure his release from prison, and also for a loan of a further sum of money within a very short period. The total sum required by the Zemindar was Rs. 19,035. 2a. 7p., and Narasihma Chetty engaged to procure that sum on the security of a lease of the Zemindary, consisting of sixteen villages, and their hamlets, for ten years, at an annual rent of Rs. 19,000, out of which the lessee was to pay all the outgoings, and allow the Zemindar Rs. 2000, annually for his [172] maintenance. Narasihma Chetty had not, however, the immediate command of more than Rs. 1000, and it was, therefore, agreed that he should advance that sum at once upon a bond, and should procure the balance from the Appellant, for whom Narasihma Chetty acted, and as the Appellant was not at the time in Madura, where this agreement was made, being then at Ramnad, a short distance off, but his return being immediately expected, it was arranged that a provisional agreement should be executed, by which Narasihma Chetty should engage to procure the advance from the Appellant on his return, when the Rs. 1000, secured by the bond, were to be deducted, the bond cancelled, and the Respondent was to execute the lease of the Zemindary. The Respondent's necessities were, however, so urgent that he verbally stipulated that if the Appellant did not return within seven or eight days he should be at liberty to procure the money elsewhere.

In pursuance with this arrangement, and on the 25th of October, 1846, the following agreement was entered into between Respondent and Narasihma Chetty:—
 “An agreement executed by Kamala Naicker, the present Zemindar of Ammayanaikanoor, son of Ramaswamy Naicker, residing at Pottisettepatty, attached to the Zemindary of Ammayanaikanoor, in the Zillah of Madura, to Narasihma Chettyar, a dealer in silk thread, an agent of Mr. Fischer, residing at Salem, now but on circuit at Ramnad. Whereas I have to pay to my creditors Rs. 19,035. 2a. 7p., made up of these items, viz., Rs. 8385. 2a. 7p., amount of the Razenamah filed in favour of Moottoosamy Pillay, the Plaintiff, in O. S. No. 15 of 1845, on the file of [173] the Sub-Court of Madura; Rs. 1000, due, under a Razenamah, to Adiyappa Chettiar, late Sheristadar of the Court, and Plaintiff in O. S. No. 59 of 1844, on the file of the Moofly Sudder Ameen's Court; Rs. 3400, remaining over and above the partial payment of Rs. 1000, out of Rs. 4400, amount of the Razenamah filed in O. S. No. 133 of 1845, before the Moofly Sudder Ameen's Court; Rs. 1000, paid this day by you, under bond, in satisfaction of the warrant of execution issued in suit No. 216 of 1836, before the late Zillah Court; Rs. 1000, borrowed of Ramakristnan Chetty, of Madura, on the security of my jewels and bond, in order to satisfy the amount of the Razenamah in O. S. No. 47 of 1845, on the file of the Sub-Court; Rs. 250, borrowed of the same person for sundry purposes, and for satisfying the balance of the amount of the warrant issued in O. S. No. 256 of 1836, on the file of the late Zillah Court; and Rs. 2000, required, among other purposes, for the costs of the suit pending before the Court. And, whereas, you have promised to procure the said sum from the said gentleman on his return to Madura, in the event of your getting the sum accordingly, I shall lease to you the sixteen villages attached to my Zemindary, and the hamlets thereof, for ten years, commencing with the current year, for annual rent of Rs. 19,000; out of the said rent of Rs. 19,000, you should forward to the Circar an annual peshkush of Rs. 13,966. 8a. 6p. accompanied by an arzee and Iroosalamah, and procure a receipt for me. You should pay me annually Rs. 2000, either in coins or in kind, for my household expenses, and take a receipt from me. In consideration for the amount to [174] be advanced by you to me, you shall take Rs. 2500, annually, and enter the same upon the bond granted to you, in addition to furnishing a receipt to me for the sum. You shall, in the presence of my people, carry on the repairs of tanks of the villages to the extent of Rs. 500 and odd, and render account to me, obtaining receipt from me every year. As there are arrears of revenue due for the last Fusly from the villages, you shall realize the same in the presence of my people, and appropriate it to the liquidation of the debt and the arrears of peshkush, granting receipts to me for the same. You shall permit me to manage the taxes, contributions, and maniyams fixed by the Circular for charitable purposes, such as pagodas, choultries, etc. You shall continue the service maniyams granted by the circular. You shall realize from the villages and pay to me the taxes and contributions usually allowed to me for such annual festivities as Adi, Kartikai, Depavali, Sankranti, etc. You shall not exact from the Ryots a greater amount of assessment than is fixed upon by Government, but shall treat me, my people, and Ryots with due respect. As the gentleman aforesaid is not here at present, I shall, on his arrival, execute a document in detail, on a stamped vadjan, in the manner dictated to by him. Thus have I executed this agreement of my own free will and accord.—Kamala Naicker, Zemindar.”

The Rs. 1000, were thereupon advanced on the same 25th of October, 1846, and a bond and conditional mortgage of a village belonging to his Zemindary to Narasihma Chetty, dated on that day, for securing the repayment, with interest, on the 1st November following, was executed. The Appellant did not, however, return by the stipulated time, nor until nineteen days [175] from the date of the above mentioned instrument, when he at once offered to advance the money, but the Respondent's necessities being urgent, he had, in the interim, and on the 9th of November, in that year, after communicating with Narasihma Chetty, obtained the required advance from a Mr. Fondeclair, to whom he executed a lease of the Zemindary.

Upon this Narasihma Chetty instituted a suit in the Civil Court of Madura for a specific performance, by which he claimed the execution of a lease to himself in accordance with the above agreement. The Judge of the Civil Court, however, on the 16th of February, 1848, dismissed the suit, on the ground, that the agreement of the 25th of October, 1846, was not, under the circumstances, binding on the Respondent, and on the 21st of October, 1851, the Sudder Court upon appeal confirmed this decision, although upon different grounds, the Court intimating an opinion that the agreement was still binding.

In the year 1855, Narasihma Chetty died, and thereupon Condiah Chetty, his son and heir, executed a deed of assignment, dated the 11th of September, 1855, transferring to the Appellant all his title under the agreement of the 25th of October, 1846.

This assignment was in these terms: —“Whereas, instead of giving possession to my father of the Zemindary of Ammayanaikanoor, under the lease executed by him, to my father in relation thereto, under date the 25th October, 1846, Kamala Naicker, the Zemindar of Ammayanaikanoor, attached to the talook of Nelakottah, Zillah Madura, fraudulently demised it under a lease to Mr. Fondeclair, whereas my father filed an action in consequence, and in the appeal pre-[176]-ferred to the Sudder Adawlut from it was finally decreed that the lease aforesaid was good and valid, and that as the enjoyment thereof was anticipated by the fraudulent execution of a lease in favour of Mr. Fondeclair by the first Defendant in that suit, the income derivable up to the term of the lease might be sued for and recovered: whereas if my father had possession as per the lease an annual income of not less than Rs. 5000 would have been derived, exclusive of all charges of the Zemindary: and whereas my father is dead and I am unable to sue for and recover the sum of Rs. 50,000, derivable during the ten years of the lease at the rate aforesaid, I execute this deed of assignment to you, making over to you all right and title conferred upon me by the lease and confirmed by the decrees of the Sudder Adawlut regarding it, for adequate valuable consideration, inclusive of the sundry sums borrowed of you by my father on different occasions for the purpose of prosecuting the suit, and of the Rs. 2000, borrowed likewise of you by my father under a deed of assignment on stamped paper, executed by my father on the 22nd of October, 1853, but which became inoperative; and accordingly put you in possession of all the documents relating thereto, authorising you to recover the amount of the profit aforesaid either by a civil action or by any other means. Thus do I execute this deed of assignment by my own free will and accord.”

The Appellant on the 7th of November, 1855, filed a plaint in the Civil Court of Madura, to recover from Respondents Rs. 50,000, as damages for breach of contract.

The Respondent by his answer to the plaint, con-[177]-tended that the suit was untenable, inasmuch as the agreement of the 25th October, 1846, was an incomplete arrangement, and that on its execution it had been verbally agreed that within eight days after the return of the Appellant from Ramnad, where he was staying at that time, Rs. 19,035. 2a. 7p. was to be paid to the Respondent by the Appellant, and if so advanced a detailed lease was to be executed on a stamped paper, and in default of such payment the contract was to be null and void; and that the Appellant having failed to advance that sum, the Respondent had rented out the Zemindary to the late Mr. Fondeclair, and thereby discharged his debts; that the suit brought by Narasihma Chetty, founded on the agreement, had been dismissed; that the present claim had no basis, and was vague; and lastly that the suit was opposed to sec. IX., Reg. II., of 1802, and to the principle laid down in Macpherson's "Civil Procedure." p. 49.

On the 7th of August, 1856, Mr. A. W. Phillips, the Judge of the Civil Court of Madura, recorded the following points for proof by the Appellant. To file the deed of assignment, dated the 11th of September, 1854, and prove the same. Prove the assignees' right and title to claim for the damages. Prove the damages in detail which the assignee has sustained by the non-fulfilment of the Defendant's contract. The Respondent was to prove that the assignee possessed no right and claim for damages, and to adduce proof to combat the claim of the Plaintiff to the extent sued for, or to any portion thereof.

Witnesses were examined on both sides. The evidence was contradictory upon the point whether the period of seven or eight days mentioned in the answer [178] was the time specifically agreed to by the parties to the agreement of the 25th of October, 1846, as the term beyond which the Respondent was not to wait for the Appellant's return to Madura.

The Acting Civil Judge, Mr. A. W. Phillips, pronounced the Court's decree on the 11th of December, 1856, the material part of which was in these terms:—"The Court of Sudder Adawlut has already declared, that as the Defendant in this case did not wait for the Plaintiff's return to Madura, which took place within what they considered a reasonable period, that the document of the 25th of October, 1846, was a valid contract, and as such binding on the Defendant, but that as he had divested himself of the power to fulfil that contract with the Plaintiff, the latter should seek his remedy, not by a suit to obtain what could not be awarded to him, but by an action for damages sustained by the non-fulfilment of the contract. The validity of the document, therefore, which the Defendant protests against, must be looked upon as an established fact no longer a subject for discussion, and all the Court has to do in the present case is to ascertain what damages the Plaintiff has sustained by its non-fulfilment;" and the Court assessed the damages at Rs. 40,000, with costs.

The Respondent appealed from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Court at Madras, and that Court delivered judgment on the appeal on the 20th of March, 1858. After stating the facts of the case the judgment proceeded as follows:—"The Judges of the Sudder Adawlut consider that they are responsible for upholding the law in its integrity, whether a suitor may have challenged or not an attempted violation of the law. The Court are bound to see that their decisions [179] rest upon unexceptional and legal grounds, and they cannot pass a decree in this case without first ascertaining whether the serious imputation of champerty attaches to the action. They resolved consequently to give hearing in this matter, and have confined the addresses of the Pleaders on either side to this one question, upon the decision of which any further question would depend. It is argued on the Plaintiff's behalf that the transaction with Narasihma Chetty's heir, as described in the assignment, is not champerty, from the circumstance that the parties had not arranged to divide the gains of the suit. But it has been satisfactorily shown on the other side that however true, that there should be such agreement to constitute champerty as originally defined, the existing and uniform practice of the Courts is to discourage all that savors of champerty, and that the purchase of a mere right of action is now distinctly viewed as champerty. Again, it is argued that the right purchased was not a mere right of action, but that as in the disposal of the former suit by Narasihma Chetty, it was held that a suit for damages such as are now in question might lie, there was in effect an adjudication that Narasihma Chetty had a title to the damages, and the thing purchased was a judgment. The Court considers this argument to be a futile one; a suggestion that there might be a suit for damages is a very different thing from a declaration of right to damages; nor had there been any attempt to estimate such damages, or to represent as vested in Narasihma

Chetty any title of ascertained value, admitting of transfer by sale. Narasihma Chetty had still to establish by suit his right to damages, and the sum of such damages, and the only thing sold under the assignment was his [180] right so to sue. It is finally argued that Plaintiff only went through a form of purchase for the better assurance of his position, while in reality the contract between Narasihma Chetty and the Defendant was on the Plaintiff's behalf, Narasihma Chetty acting simply as his agent. The contract certainly contains much to countenance the idea of such agency. In the title of the deed, Narasihma Chetty is described as the agent of Mr. Fischer, of whom it is further specified, as if to account for his not being personally dealt with, that he was then at Ramnad. In the body of the deed it is agreed that the money to be advanced under the contract should be obtained from that gentleman on his return from Madura, and at the close of the deed the Defendant uses the following remarkable expression: "As the gentleman aforesaid is not here at present, I shall, on his arrival, execute a document in detail, on a stamp Cadjan, in the manner dictated to by him. In the suit brought by Narasihma Chetty to enforce the contract, he again described himself as the Plaintiff's agent. On the other hand, the assignment does not set out as it should have done, that the contract was made by the agent under authority from his principal and for his benefit. On the contrary, the lease of the Zemindary contracted for was to be conferred upon Narasihma Chetty, and when this person was asked by the Civil Judge of Madura to explain the particular object of his suit, whether he wished to have the contract enforced for his own benefit, or that of the Plaintiff, whom he described as his master, he put in a motion declaring his desire to be, that the lease of the Zemindary should be made to him individually. It is not alleged that Narasihma [181] Chetty acted thus in fraud of the Plaintiff. The suit was allowed to run its course from 1847 to 1851, through several remands, re-hearings, and re-appeals, without any such representation being made by Plaintiff, and in this suit he has explicitly subscribed to Narasihma Chetty's action. He says, that the lease was to have been to Narasihma Chetty, that the sum advanced by Narasihma Chetty in consideration for the contract was borrowed from him, not that it was advanced on his account, and that the interest in the deed of contract having descended to Narasihma Chetty's heir, the latter had sold the same to him 'on the receipt of adequate consideration.' And he puts in the assignment as the groundwork of his suit, in which the said purchase for 'full consideration' is set forth, none of the items making up the consideration being described. The plea of agency is only now set up, and for the specific purpose of meeting the charge of champerty. The Court hold the plea to be utterly untenable in the face of the Plaintiff's formal acts and declarations against the existence of such agency. They must take the suit as presented by the Plaintiff, and he having therein based his claim upon purchase made by him of a right to sue, by that representation he must stand or fall. The Judges are of opinion, that such a purchase constitutes champerty, and the practice being one they are bound to discourage as promoting litigation, which otherwise might not arise, and the fostering of hazardous and questionable claims, they resolve to reverse the original decree, and dismiss the suit with costs."

[182] Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Coryton, for the Appellant. First, the Sudder Court, in dismissing the suit on the ground of champerty, departed from the issues raised by the pleadings. No such defence was pleaded, and, therefore, cannot be noticed by the Court. Best "On Evidence," sec. 254 (3rd Edit.). It certainly could not in England under the Common Law Procedure Act, 15th and 16th Vict., c. 76. Nor had the Appellant an opportunity of meeting the case upon that point, or of showing as he might have done, if his title had been impeached on that ground, the true state of the circumstances under which the title was acquired. Another fatal objection is, that this question was not put in issue by the points recorded by the Judge of the Civil Court of Madura. The terms of Madras Reg. XV. of 1816, sec. 10, cl. 3, are imperative, and declare that the Court is to record the points necessary to be established by the parties to enable the Court to take notice of an objection. A point not recorded cannot be noticed. Srimut Mootoo Vijaya Raghavanatha Gounder Vallabha Perria Woodia Taver v. Rany Anga Moottoo Natchier (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 278). Neither was it competent to the Sudder Court to decide the question of champerty, as being a "question of fact" within the meaning of cl. 4, sec. 1, of Act, No. XVI., of 1853.—[Sir John Coleridge: If their Lordships should be of opinion that there was champerty, or more properly speaking, maintenance, what course ought to be taken; to remit the case or hear it upon the merits!—Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., for the Respondent: The proper course would be to remit the case.]—That would [183] cause delay. There are sufficient materials before the Court to decide upon the merits.

As to the question of champerty or maintenance, we submit, that the deed, dated the 11th of September, 1855, was in the nature of an assignment from a trustee to a cestui que trust, and was not in the nature of champerty or maintenance. Sugden, Ven. and Pur. 299 (13th Edit.), Byrne v. Frere (2 Molloy, 157), Hartley v. Russell (2 Sim. and Stu. 244), Findon v. Parker (11 Mee. and Wels. 675), Wood v. Downes (18 Ves. 120). The agency of Narasihma Chetty, for the Appellant, in the original transaction, is apparent throughout the whole of the proceedings in the suit, and, as a fact, is so recited in the agreement of the 25th October, 1846, and has never yet been controverted by the Respondent. Now, the Sudder Court, in relying upon the alleged title asserted by Narasihma Chetty to sue in his own name for specific performance as being inconsistent with such agency, has given an undue weight to the form and totally disregarded the substance of the transaction. The money to be advanced was the Appellant's, and the lease of the Zemindary, if granted to Narasihma Chetty, would have been for the Appellant's sole benefit.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. W. Field, for the Respondent.—The Sudder Court was in principle correct in holding that the agreement between the Appellant and Condiah Chetty and the assignment of Narasihma Chetty's interest in the suit brought by him against the Respondent, was illegal and void for champerty, as it in law conferred no right upon the Appellant to maintain this [184] action. Andrews v. Maharajah Sreesh Chunder Rhee (S.D. A. Decis. Ben. 1849, p. 340). In Prossor v. Edmonds (1 You. and Call. 481), Lord Abinger held, that a Court of Equity would give no encouragement to contracts which savoured of maintenance or champerty, though such contracts might not be within the strict legal limits assigned to such offences. Reynell v. Sprye (1 De G. Mac. and Gor. 660), and in Doe dem. Witham v. Evans (1 Com. Ben. Rep. 717), a sale by an administrator of a pretended title to certain premises was set aside, and the conveyance held void as well at Common Law, as by Statute, 32nd Hen. VIII., c. 9.

But, secondly, upon the merits. The Respondent was not bound by the agreement of the 25th of October, 1846, in the event which happened. The Respondent's necessities were so urgent that he stipulated that if the Appellant did not return within seven or eight days, he was to be at liberty to procure the money elsewhere; and as the Appellant did not return within such stipulated time, indeed, not until nineteen days after, such unreasonable delay obliged the Respondent to obtain the required advances from Fondeclair, and he, therefore, determined the agreement with Narasihma Chetty, as representing the Appellant, and leased the Zemindary to Fondeclair. The fact that the contract was broken by the Appellant was lost sight of by the Acting Judge of the Civil Court, who was also wrong in holding that the liability of the Respondent under the agreement was concluded by the judgment of the Sudder Court in the suit in that Court between Narasihma Chetty and the Respondent.

The Right Hon. Sir John Coleridge (March 7, 1860).—This was a suit brought in the Civil Court of [185] Madura, to recover damages from the Respondent for the breach of an agreement. Judgment passed in that Court for the Appellant, and this judgment was reversed in the Sudder Adawlut. The present appeal is brought for the purpose of procuring a reversal of that decree.

The facts on which the case arise are in substance these:—On the 25th of October, 1846, the agreement in question was entered into between the Respondent on the one hand, and Narasihma Chetty on the other, who is thus described in the commencement of it: "A dealer in silk thread, an agent of Mr. Fischer, residing at Salem, but now on circuit at Rannad." Narasihma Chetty was in truth acting as Fischer's (the Appellant's) agent, whose residence was at Salem, and he was at the time absent on circuit as described.—[His Lordship read the agreement, ante [8 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 172, and proceeded.]

On the day of the execution of this instrument the Respondent also executed a Bond and a conditional mortgage of a village attached to his Zemindary, for a loan of Rs. 1000, from Narasilma Chetty, which were then advanced, and were to be repaid on the 1st of November following. This was to meet one of the debts enumerated in the preceding agreement. In this transaction also Narasilma Chetty was acting as, and was described in the instrument to be, the "agent of Mr. Fischer, residing at Salem, but now on circuit at Ramnad."

The Appellant did not return by the 1st of November, nor until some days after the 9th, on which day, in violation, as the Appellant alleges, of the agreement to which he claims to have been the principal party, the Respondent executed a lease of the Zemindary to one Fondeclair.

[186] This led to proceedings in which Narasilma Chetty was made the Plaintiff, for the purpose of enforcing the performance of the agreement. These proceedings failed, and the lease to Fondeclair was supported; whereupon the Appellant determined to institute the present action for damages, and Narasilma Chetty being dead, it was thought desirable for him to institute it in his own name; but the original agreement having provided that the lease should be made to Narasilma Chetty, and he having been the ostensible party to the previous proceeding, the following assignment was procured from his son, Condiah Chetty. "[His Lordship read it, ante [8 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 157.]—The action and appeal then followed, which have been already mentioned.

The decree of the Sudder Adawlut did not pass on the merits, nor on any point raised in the Court below; but it having been objected that the suit disclosed a case of champerty, the Court resolved to entertain the objection; because, as they say, they thought themselves "responsible for upholding the law in its integrity;" (see [8 Moo. Ind. App.] p. 178) they confined the addresses of the Pleaders on either side to that one question, and decided the case against the present Appellant on that point only.

Their Lordships are clearly of opinion, that the decree of the Sudder Adawlut in this respect cannot be supported. The grounds on which they arrive at this conclusion make it unnecessary to decide whether, under the law which the Court was administering, those acts which in the English law are denominated either maintenance or champerty, and are punishable as offences, partly by the Common Law, and partly by Statute, are forbidden; and also, if so forbidden, [187] whether the point was in this case so raised by the pleadings, or the points for proof recorded by the Court, that it could be properly entered into. They will observe, however, in passing, that though it may be admitted that the Court would have the right, perhaps even lay under an obligation, to take cognizance, mutu proprio, of any objection, manifestly apparent on the face of the proceeding, which showed that it was against morality or public policy; yet where, as here, that was only to be collected from the evidence by inference, and was capable of explanation, or answer by counter-evidence, it is highly inconvenient, as well as contrary to the Regulation, XV. of 1816, which regulates the practice of the Court, and may lead to the most direct injustice, to enter into the inquiry, if the issue has not been presented by the pleadings, or the points recorded for proof. But, assuming that in the present case the Court properly instituted the inquiry, their Lordships do not agree with them in the conclusion to which they conducted it.

The Court seem very properly to have considered that the champerty, or, more properly, the maintenance into which they were inquiring, was something which must have the qualities attributed to champerty or maintenance by the English law: it must be something against good policy and justice, something tending to promote unnecessary litigation, something that in a legal sense is immoral, and to the constitution of which a bad motive in the same sense is necessary. It was necessary, therefore, to look at the substance of the transaction, and not merely the language of the instruments. Now, here it is clear, that the Appellant was the real party to the [188] original agreement, and the person really interested in its performance; he was to advance the loan; the profits that were expected to result from the loan were to be his; he might have intervened in the first instance, and conducted the litigation, which first ensued, in his own name. Narasilma Chetty was but an agent, contracting for the Appellant in his own name, but avowedly as agent only, not undertaking to borrow from the Appellant the money, and then lend it to the Respondent, but to procure for him the loan of it from the Appellant. All this was perfectly consistent with his being put forward as the ostensible party, with the full knowledge of the Respondent. This was the substance of the contract, and the Court should have treated the assignment from Condia Chetty as merely an unnecessary precaution, unwisely adopted, perhaps, and furnishing an argument for an objector, yet not really altering the quality of the transaction, nor affecting that point on which the whole question of maintenance depended, which was this: Was the Appellant suing in respect of his own interest for a violation of a contract made with himself, or was he representing another man's interest, and suing on a contract to which he had been originally a stranger, in virtue only of the objectionable assignment? If this had been borne in mind, their Lordships think that the Court would have arrived at a different conclusion from that which they in fact came to.

Here, therefore, their Lordships would have stopped, simply recommending that the judgment should be reversed; but in the commencement of the argument it was arranged, with the consent of the Counsel on both sides, that if their Lordships [189] should be of opinion that the decision of the Court below could not be sustained on the grounds on which it had been based, they should proceed to consider the whole case on its merits, and finally dispose of it; a course by which it was probable that much litigation and expense might be saved to the parties.

Their Lordships have, therefore, examined the facts of this case as they appeared before the Civil Court of Madura. As it is indisputable that a lease of the Zemindary has not been granted to the Appellant, or his agent, Narasihma Chetty, it is clear that the Appellant ought to recover if there was ever a binding contract between the parties to grant one, unless the non-performance of that contract be in any way justifiable. The first of these must be ascertained by an examination of the agreement of the 25th of October, 1846, of the circumstances attending its execution, and of the remaining facts of the case. The instrument commences with a recital, that the Respondent was under an obligation to pay his creditors the sum of Re. 19,035. 2a. 7p., made up of items of which an enumeration follows, and this enumeration shows that the money was wanted without the least loss of time, that the pressure on him was urgent. It then recites a promise from Narasihma Chetty to procure the amount from the Appellant on his return to Madura, and then it promises to grant the lease; but only "in the event of Narasihma Chetty getting the said sum accordingly." It then proceeds to stipulate for a number of payments to be made, things to be done, and conditions to be observed by the lessee, after the lease granted, and during the continuance of the term; and it concludes thus: [190] "As the gentleman aforesaid (the Appellant) is not here at present, I shall, on his arrival, execute a document in detail, on stamped cadjan in the manner dictated by him."

On the face of the instrument, it is obviously a contract incomplete in itself and conditional; nothing in it binds the Respondent to the granting of the lease, unless the money was procured for him from the Appellant on his return to Madura, and it is clear also that nothing in it binds the Respondent to advance the money, when he should return. Further, it is obvious that no time being specified for this return, the parties must either by some collateral agreement have fixed a day for that return, or must be taken to have contemplated, what the law would imply from their language, a return within a reasonable time, all the circumstances considered. For the Respondent setting out his urgent necessities, showing the pressure that was on him, and professedly borrowing the money, not to meet future casual or uncertain expenses, but to liquidate the debts which occasioned the pressure then upon him, it would be highly unreasonable to suppose that a return after any indefinite period, however long, could have been in the contemplation of the parties. And this conclusion is strengthened by the circumstance that there is no evidence of any previous authority from the Appellant constituting Narasihma Chetty his agent to make the contract; indeed, the instrument itself shows that he was not bound, that it was uncertain whether he would on his return adopt and ratify the act of Narasihma Chetty; and the conclusion is therefore irresistible, that the Respondent was bound to wait only for that ratification and performance until the Appel-[191]-lant's return on a specified day, or a return within a reasonable time.

The Respondent contends that the time was fixed by a collateral parol contract, and limited to the 1st of November, or to eight days from the 25th of October; the Appellant, that the return was to be within a reasonable time, that he did not return within such reasonable time, and forthwith ratified the act of his agent, but that the Respondent had in the meantime put it out of his power to fulfil the contract, by granting the lease to Fondecclair.

The undisputed facts of the case are these:—

On the 25th of October, the date of the agreement in question, the Respondent executed the mortgage and bond to Narasimma, as already stated. This appears to their Lordships to have been substantially part of the principal transaction, and to be most material on the point now under consideration; it was a loan of Rs. 1000, to meet one of the demands specified in the agreement, which may be presumed to have been peculiarly pressing, and the Rs. 1000, are stipulated to be repaid on the 1st of November, in default of which the mortgage of a single village was to take effect. Their Lordships think there is every reason for presuming that the repayment was intended to be made out of the Rs. 19,000, to be advanced by the Appellant on his return to Madura; and if that be so, it is clear that his return was contemplated to take place on or before that day.

The next fact is that, on the 9th or 10th of November, the lease was executed to Fondecclair; and the remaining fact is the return of the Appellant on the 13th of November, as their Lordships understand the [192] evidence: this would be nineteen days after the execution of the agreement.

There is a good deal of parol evidence to the effect, either that a period of eight days, or that the 1st of November, was agreed to specifically by the parties as the term beyond which the Respondent was not to be bound to wait for the Appellant's return; and their Lordships are disposed to give credit to the evidence: they do not think that the variation in regard to the eight days and the 1st of November makes the testimony unworthy of belief. But, it appears to them unnecessary to decide the case on this point; for they are clearly of opinion, looking at all the circumstances which appear on the face of the documents, the first of which discloses the nature of the debts due from the Respondent, which were mostly judgment debts, or debts on which the execution was pending, or for which warrants had issued; and the second that a portion of the money contracted for was advanced at once, and to be repaid on the 1st of November: that it was understood by both parties that a reasonable time for the Appellant's return would be within a few days, and that the delay of nineteen days was unreasonable. Such a delay would probably defeat the whole purpose of the loan: and there is not the slightest evidence that either by reason of distance, difficulty of conveyance, or the necessary or usual business of the circuit, a delay of nineteen days could have been considered probable.

On this ground their Lordships are prepared to recommend to Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed: but as they do this on wholly different grounds from those relied on by the Court below, that the dismissal should be without costs.

[193] MOHUN LALL SOOKUL and Another.—Appellants: BEBEE DOSS and Others,—Respondents * [June 14, 1861].

On petition from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat, Calcutta.

By Ben. Reg. X. of 1829, the test of the value of the property in suit is the selling or market value.

An order in Council made upon an ex parte application granting special leave to appeal upon an allegation as to the value of the property in dispute rescinded.

there being omissions in the petition, of proceedings in the suit, which showed the true value of the property.

In ordinary circumstances, an Order in Council obtained upon an ex parte petition, which omitted to state the true facts, will be discharged with costs, but if there has been laches in applying to discharge the Order on the part of the Respondent, no costs will be given.

In this case special leave to appeal had been granted upon an ex parte application of the Appellants (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 428), upon an allegation as to the value of the subject matter in dispute in the suit.

A petition was now presented by the Respondents to rescind the Order in Council granting leave to appeal, alleging, that in the petition for leave to appeal, several important omissions had been made, namely, first that the answer of the Respondents to the plaint, whereby the question at issue, whether by Ben. Reg. X. of 1829, the value of the subject matter was to be computed according to the real or market value, had been omitted; [194] and, secondly, that a supplementary plaint filed by the Appellants, which stated that the suit had by mistake been valued at three times the Sudder jumma instead of Rs. 4300, the real or market value of the property had also been omitted. The petition further alleged, that throughout the proceedings it was treated by the Appellants as a case regarding mortgaged premises, valued at Rs. 4300; that the Respondents had applied to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, and to the Officiating Judge of Chittagong, to whom the enquiry had been by the Order in Council delegated, to give evidence of the value, but that such application had been refused by that Court, upon the ground that by the Order in Council, evidence of that fact was to be supplied by the Appellants, and the petition prayed, that the order in Council granting leave to appeal might be rescinded, or that an Order might be made, directing an enquiry as to the real or market value of the property in dispute.

Mr. W. Field, for the Respondents, in support of the application, cited Ben. Reg. X. of 1829, schedule B, 8.

Mr. Leith, for the Appellants, opposed.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—This is an application to discharge an Order in Council made by Her Majesty at the recommendation of their Lordships, on the 16th of February, 1860. By that Order liberty was given to the Appellants to appeal, notwithstanding that the property which was the subject of the suit, was of less value, as appeared upon the proceedings in the case, than Rs. 10,000, which is the sum limited by the Order in Council of the 13th of June, 1838.

[195] A petition of this nature, be ex parte, it is a universal and a most important rule of this Court, that every fact which is material to the determination of the question raised upon the petition should be truly and fairly stated; and where there is an omission of any material facts, whether it arises from improper intention on the part of the Petitioner, or whether it arises from accident or negligence, still the effect is just the same; if this Court has been induced to make an Order, which if the facts were fully before it, it would not, or might not, have been induced to make.

Now, in this case, their Lordships were of opinion, that in order to justify an appeal to this country it should be satisfactorily proved that the property in dispute really was of the value of Rs. 10,000. They did not think that there were any special circumstances in the case which would justify the Court in taking it out of the ordinary rule. There were no particular questions of law or indeed anything which would prevent the application of the strict general rule, which requires that the property in dispute should be of that value.

It was stated in the petition for leave to appeal, that the Plaintiffs had in the plaint represented the property to be of the value of Rs. 3572, and that the suit was instituted to recover possession of certain mortgaged premises, of which the value was so estimated, but only for the purpose of complying with the rules of the East India Company's Courts for fixing the amount of the stamp upon the plaint; and then, after stating the proceedings in the case, the petition concluded with assigning as a ground for making the application here, that the value of the property having been represented by the Plaintiff as [196] Rs. 3572, the Court below had no authority to grant an appeal. The petition also alleged that although it appeared from the statements in the plaint that the real or market value of the land in question in the suit must be taken to exceed the amount of Rs. 10,000, yet the amount laid in the plaint as the value of the suit for the purpose aforesaid, being only Rs. 3572, three times the amount of one year's jumma, or rent, the Petitioners were prevented by the rules of the Court from applying to that Court for such leave.

The misrepresentation, therefore, upon that petition is this. The plaint, according to the Regulation, estimates the value of the property at three years' jumma. Three years' jumma amounts to Rs. 3572, and, therefore, according to the Regulation, represented a value which would furnish no criterion of what the actual value was. In this state of things it appeared to their Lordships that the parties ought not to be concluded by such a statement: that there was nothing inconsistent with that statement: that the property might be of a greater value, and, therefore, their Lordships gave leave to appeal upon somewhat unusual terms, namely, referring it to the Court below to report what was the actual value of the property.

Ben. Reg. X. of 1829, cited before us, enacts, that in suits respecting revenue lands three years' amount of the jumma shall be taken to be the value of the property, and with respect to suits for houses, etc., and other things of value, the amount is to be computed according to the estimated selling price, and that every plaint shall specify the value of the thing claimed.

Now, it appears, that there were in this case two distinct modes of valuation, one of which affords no criterion whatever of the actual value, the other of which, if it were fairly stated, afforded a most certain [197] criterion, being the estimated selling price, not the price it sold for, but what the property would sell for at the time the plaint was filed.

Now, it appears that the Plaintiff had represented by his plaint that the property was estimated at Rs. 3572, which was three years' jumma. But this statement does not fall within the above Regulation. For the purposes of this suit it was necessary to state what the actual value was: what the real selling value was: what the value was according to the Regulation, and, upon the final supplemental plaint, it was stated that the property was valued for this purpose at Rs. 4300, and in the record of the proceedings which had been drawn up, stating the issues which the parties were going to try, it was stated that afterwards the Plaintiff had filed a supplemental plaint, in which it was alleged that the suit had been valued at Rs. 4300, the price or value of the land, and that as the stamp was Rs. 150, it was sufficient to cover a claim of Rs. 5000. Is it possible not to understand this as applying to Regulation X. of 1829, and as stating therein the value, the estimated selling price? and which is stated at Rs. 4300. Now, if that fact had been stated to their Lordships, it is hardly to be believed that the Order for leave to appeal granted by their Lordships would have been made.

If we were of opinion that this had been an intentional misrepresentation on the part of the then Petitioners, we should, without the least hesitation, not only have discharged the Order, but we should have made the party who applied for it pay all the costs, and have given no liberty whatever to make any further application.

Their Lordships are, however, inclined to take an indulgent view of the case. They are inclined to [198] think that there was not any intentional misrepresentation; and, therefore, though they discharge the Order for leave to appeal, they will not do it on the conditions I have mentioned. They would, indeed, under any circumstances, have thought it right, whether the mistake was intentional or unintentional, to have made the party applying for it pay all the costs, were it not for the delay on the other side. The Order for leave to appeal was made in February, 1860; it went out to India, and it appeared that at least in August, 1860, the Petitioners who now apply to discharge the Order were informed that they would have liberty to give evidence under it. We think they might have applied the moment they saw the petition and the Order which contained the directions I have mentioned: for then they must have been aware that a very important fact had been kept back from the Court, and they might then have applied to have discharged the Order. Still they might have thought, that on the construction of the Order they should be enabled to give evidence, and they might have thought that it would be less expensive to make the application to the Court below. But, in August, 1860, they were told of the construction which the Sudder Dewanny Court at Calcutta had put upon their Lordships' Order, that they would not be at liberty to give evidence upon that enquiry; and they were, therefore, then apprised of the manner in which the Order of their Lordships was to be carried out.

Under these circumstances, their Lordships are of opinion, that costs should not be awarded against the parties who obtained the Order giving leave to appeal, and they discharge such order without cost and without prejudice to any other application by the Appellants, upon giving notice to the Respondents.

[199] MAHARAJAH KOOWUR BABOO NITRASUR SINGH.—Appellant; BABOO NUND LOLL SINGH, and Others, Respondents * [June, 19, 20, 22, 1860].

Decrees were made in the year 1816, in suits respecting disputed boundaries of certain Mouzahs in two Zemindaries and the boundary line determined. In 1845, a suit was brought by the representatives of one of the parties in the above suits to recover land alleged to be part of one of these Mouzahs, which land it was admitted by the Plaintiff that the Defendants had been in the possession of since the year 1834. It was pleaded in defence, first, that the land claimed, was within the boundary declared by the decrees of 1816 to belong to the Defendants; and, secondly, that the Plaintiff, or those under whom he claimed, had been out of possession for upwards of twelve years, and that the cause of action was consequently barred by Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 16. In such circumstances it was held that the issue of possession was the first point to be considered, and that such issue was wholly independent of the question of boundary [8 Moo. Ind. App. 220, 221].

Held further, that as the Plaintiff sought to disturb the possession of the Defendants, admitted by him to have existed for eleven years, but which the Defendants alleged was a much longer period, the onus probandi was upon the Plaintiff to remove the bar to the action by Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 16, by satisfactory proof that the cause of action accrued to him on a dispossession, twelve years before the commencement of the suit, and that he, or some person through whom he claimed, was in possession during that period; and that no proof of anterior title in his favour, such as would be involved in the boundary question, could relieve him from this onus, or shift the onus on the Defendants, by compelling them to prove the time and manner of possession [8 Moo. Ind. App. 220, 221].

Although the evidence of witnesses for the Defendants as to possession is of no better character than those produced by the Plaintiff as to dispossession, yet it lies on the Plaintiff to make out his case, and as the probabilities of the case in this instance were against dispossession, it was held by the Judicial Committee, affirming the judgment of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, that the Plaintiff had failed to prove the dispossession of the Defendants, which was necessary to maintain the suit [8 Moo. Ind. App. 223.]

A preliminary objection was taken in the Sudder Court to a decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen, on the ground that the Sudder Ameen had omitted to draw up the issues in the suit as required by sec. 10 of Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1814. This objection was held fatal, and the Sudder Court remitted the suit to the Lower Court with directions to lay down the issues in a regular way, and to try and determine the suit de novo. The Principal Sudder Ameen accordingly prepared the proper issues, and ordered that the parties should be called upon for their proofs. The Plaintiff did not go into fresh evidence, but prayed for judgment on the evidence already given, and upon the former evidence taken the Principal Sudder Ameen made a decree against the Plaintiff.

Held upon appeal by the Judicial Committee:—

First, that if this mode of trial was irregular, the Plaintiff had no just ground of complaint, as the irregularity was committed at his instance, or with his consent [8 Moo. Ind. App. 220].

Second, that a suspicion, however probable in the mind of a Judge that a party who has failed to prove his case, might be more successful on a fuller investigation, does not constitute sufficient ground for directing a new trial [8 Moo. Ind. App. 220].

The Appellant, the Zemindar of Pergunnah Nursingpore Koorah, owned a village in his Zemindary, called Mouzah Gopaulpore, otherwise Gopaulpore Maholee.

The two Mouzahs adjoin each other, and disputes respecting the boundary line of the Mouzahs had arisen from a very early period between the ancestors of the Appellant and of the Respondents. The Appellant in the present appeal claimed 700 beegahs of land as being part of Gopaulpore; whilst the Respondents' case was, that the land in question was part of Rampore, and had been so declared by a decree of the [201] Court in the year 1816; and, further, that the land claimed had been in their possession and their ancestors' without any claim on the part of the Appellant, or under those through whom he claimed, since the year 1818.

The facts of the case, which were complicated, were, in substance, as follows:—

The village of Rampore, together with certain other villages called Rajpore, Cuddeah, Jypore, and Jypore Pukree, were formerly the property of one Mohun Singh, the ancestor of the Respondents. In the year 1791, he was dispossessed of those villages by one Deo Raj Singh and obliged to bring a suit for their recovery, and that suit having ended in Mohun Singh's favour in 1803, he was again put in possession.

During Deo Raj Singh's possession, a dispute arose between him and Madho Singh, the Appellant's ancestor, who was the proprietor not only of the village of Golaulpore, but of a village called Surseeah, in Pergunnah Nursingpore Koorah; touching the boundaries of Surseeah and of Jypore, the adjoining village, claimed by Deo Raj Singh, and that dispute was referred to an Ameen, named Khoda Yaar Khan, to ascertain the boundaries, who, on the 24th of August, 1792, made an award to the effect, that the lands in dispute belonged to Madho Singh, and in that report he laid down the boundaries of the two Pergunnahs of Naredegur (in which Mohun Singh's villages were situate), and of Nursingpore Koorah, which included Surseeah and Gopaulpore. These boundaries were laid down principally with reference to a point, the position of which was ascertained, called Baugh Jhujree, due south of Jypore, as appeared from a plan annexed to the award. [202] and the substantial result was, that Pergunnah Naredegur (Mohun Singh's and the Respondents' property) lay to the north and west of that point, and Nursingpore Koorah to the south and east.

Notwithstanding this award, however, Madho Singh took advantage of the unsettled state of the title as between Mohun Singh and Deo Raj Singh, to lay claim to parts of the lands which were in dispute between them, and in 1803 and the following year he claimed or got possession of 411 beegahs, part of the village of Jypore Puckree, and of 251 beegahs, parcel of Rampore, which Madho Singh alleged to be parcel of Gopaulpore Maholee.

In 1810, Mohun Singh, who, on the termination in his favour of the litigation with Deo Raj Singh, had obtained the right to the possession of his villages, instituted a suit against Chuttur Singh, the son of Madho Singh, he having died in the interim, to recover possession of both these parcels of land; but he was, on the 27th of January, 1814, nonsuited, not upon the merits, but upon the technical objection that he had included in one suit lands in two separate villages. He thereupon, on the 15th of November, 1814, instituted a fresh suit to recover the 251 beegahs, parcel of Rampore, and, on the 11th of May, 1816, obtained a decree in his favour, which was upheld on appeal by the Sudder Court, on the 8th of December, 1818.

In this suit Mohun Singh and Chuttur Singh filed plans. By these plans, it appeared that the 251 beegahs then in dispute lay to the west of Baugh Jhujree, and to the north of a point in a stream called Nudder Purwana.

Shortly after the institution of the above suit by Mohun Singh for the recovery of the 251 beegahs [203] Chuttur Singh, in January, 1815, brought a cross suit in the Zillah Court of Tirhoot against Mohun Singh to recover 400 beegahs of land, alleged by him to be parcel of Gopaulpore. The 400 beegahs were, however, held by that Court to belong to Rampore, and this decision was confirmed on appeal by the Patna Court of appeal, on the 8th of December, 1818.

On the 5th of January, 1818, Mohun Singh was put into possession of the disputed lands; and he shortly afterwards brought them into cultivation by his villagers from Rampore, and it appeared that he and his descendants since that time, and until the institution of the suit, out of which the present appeal arose, had, with one exception, in 1834, when another attempt was made to encroach upon Rampore, held undisputed possession.

The Mouzah Maholee appears to have become the property of the wives of one Tej Narain Singh; and, on their obtaining a decree in their favour as to that village, they laid an attachment upon 200 beegahs, part of Rampore. The then Zemindar, Chintamun Singh, the son of Mohun Singh, instituted proceedings in the Criminal Court of Zillah Tirhoot under Ben. Reg. XV. of 1824, to preserve his possession to those beegahs, decreed to him as being part of Rampore; and the Magistrate having examined the decree of 1816, and compared the boundaries, found that the 200 beegahs were part of those included in the suit brought by Mohun Singh for 251 beegahs, and by an order made on the 24th of May, 1834, maintained Chintamun Singh's possession.

On the 5th of August, 1845, Roodur Singh, the then proprietor of Nursingpore Koorah, instituted [204] the present suit in the Zillah Court of Bhagulpore against Chintamun Singh and the Respondents, for possession and mesne profits, claiming the lands which were the subject of the suit of 1814. He, however, denied their identity, and alleged by his plaint, that possession was forcibly acquired by Chintamun Singh after the proceedings in 1834. In order to account for the delay since that time, he set up certain conversations and admissions, which he alleged were made by the Respondents, that they agreed to restore the land to him; and, in order to destroy the identity of the lands, he misplaced the old bandh and the old tank of Gopaulpore (substituting Bodhee Singh's tank for it), and thus drew a boundary considerably to the north and west so as to exclude the lands from Rampore.

The Defendants in their answer denied these allegations, and insisted that the Plaintiff's claim was barred by the provisions of Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, secs. 12 and 16, as the Plaintiff sought to recover the possession of land pertaining to their Zemindary mentioned in both the decrees of the 11th of May, 1816, and the 8th of December, 1818, which decrees, as they admitted in their answer, had laid down the boundaries of Mouzah Rampore, and of Mouzah Gopaulpore, agreeably to the award of Khoda Yaar Khan.

A replication and rejoinder having been filed, an order was made on the 5th of May, 1847, that Sheeb Loll, the Record Keeper of the Court, should proceed to the spot and draw a plan; and he accordingly, on the 9th of June, 1847, made his report, filing with it a plan, which contained the assertions of both sides, as to the position of the different [205] points bearing or supposed to bear upon the point at issue. Besides this plan, plans of the villages of Rampore and Gopaulpore were also filed. The plaintiff also filed a plan, containing his allegations as to the boundary, and copies of the two plans filed in the suit of 1814, were also given in evidence. Witnesses were examined upon the question of possession by the Respondents. Their evidence was of a conflicting character, the effect of which is mentioned in their Lordships' judgment.

On the 28th of December, 1849, the Principal Sudder Ameen, without laying down issues, as required by sec. 10, of Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1814, gave judgment in the Plaintiff's favour.

The Defendants appealed from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Court at Calcutta. Upon the appeal coming on for hearing, a preliminary objection was raised on their behalf that the Court below had not, according to the Law of procedure, drawn up and recorded any issues. The Sudder Court held that this objection was fatal, and ordered that the decree appealed from should be set aside, and the case remanded to the Principal Sudder Ameen, with directions to lay down the issues and call upon the parties for proofs and refutations, and then to try the case de novo.

In accordance with the order of the Sudder Court, a proceeding took place before the Zillah Court, on the 4th of December, 1852, when the Principal Sudder Ameen recorded the issues as follows:—First, were the lands at issue within the boundaries of Mouzah Rampore, the property of the Defendants, as laid down by the decree of Court, dated 11th of May, [206] 1816, agreeably to the kyfrut of Khoda Yaar Khan, or apart from them? Secondly, was the Plaintiff's suit within the period limited for the cognizance of the Court, or not?

No evidence was gone into upon these issues, the Plaintiff having declined to do so, and asking for judgment on the evidence already filed, and, on the 13th of December, 1852, the Principal Sudder Ameen gave judgment to the same effect as the former one. The Defendants appealed from this judgment to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

The hearing of the appeal took place before Messrs. Sconce, Trevor, and Torrens, three of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. The Judges differed in opinion, Messrs. Sconce and Trevor agreeing to reverse the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen. The remaining Judge, Mr. Torrens, was opposed to that course, being of opinion that the Court should remand the case for re-trial by the Principal Sudder Ameen.

The judgment and decree pronounced by Messrs. Sconce and Trevor, forming the majority of the Judges, was as follows:—"We might take objection to the form in which the Principal Sudder Ameen's decree has been passed, for in his latest decision, he has confined himself to such points as the remand involved, and, upon the merits, has adopted in general terms, without repeating details, the decree of December, 1849. The last and final decree should have been complete in itself, and should not have been made to rest on a decision which has been set aside; but, as the grounds of the latest judgment taken in connection with the first have been sufficiently intelligible to the litigants, and are so to the majority of this Court, we think it inexpedient again, upon this point of form, to re-transfer the case to the Lower Court. For the better understanding of the issue submitted to us, we have fully heard the parties, both as regards the line of boundary, which, by the decree of 1816, should determine the extent of their villages, Gopaulpore and Rampore, and as regards the enjoyment by the Plaintiff of the disputed land within a period which renders this suit admissible. That the several parties have had every opportunity before the Lower Court to present their case complete, is not denied by them; nor before ourselves have they indicated, if it were optional to them to indicate, any other sources of available evidence than that already adduced. And thus we cannot hesitate to adjudicate upon the proceedings as they came before us. The Principal Sudder Ameen has remarked, shortly, that Plaintiff's witnesses prove that he was in possession of the disputed land before 1242, F.S.; and connecting the presumed dispossession of that year with the boundary laid down nineteen years before, he found Plaintiff's claim to be established. But, it appears to us, that the evidence of the Plaintiff is wholly inadequate to sustain the specific allegations, or to justify the large claim which he has preferred. Plaintiff's witnesses say, generally, that he was dispossessed in 1242, F.S., but we required more detailed information to prevent the act of forcible dispossession characterized by the circumstances with which it must have been attended. Seven hundred beegahs—nearly all, as is said by the Plaintiff's witnesses, under cultivation—could not have been transferred from his occupancy without the occurrence of some [208] event sufficiently conspicuous to be presented to us in evidence; nor is it to be presumed that his long asserted enjoyment of his Ryots' rents, previous to 1242, F.S., could become suddenly interrupted, without some attempt on his part to enforce, with the aid of summary laws, the payment of rent for 1242, F.S., which, up to 1241, F.S., he had collected. Nor, further, is it intelligible to us that Plaintiff (Respondent), without an application to the Magistrate, should have suffered the order passed by that Officer, under Reg. XV. of 1824, to have been executed to his prejudice, had he not been a party to the summary proceeding in which it was issued.

We think that, at all events, throughout some portion of the line, the Principal Sudder Ameen's endeavour to trace the boundary decreed in 1816 A.D. has not been unsuccessful; but in this suit we cannot per saltum pass from 1242 to 1223 (1816), as if to find in that year the link of Plaintiff's right, from which he subsequently became dissevered. What we have said of the evidence of dispossession in 1242, F.S. is equally applicable to the evidence for possession in 1241, Fuslee, or any previous year. We have, in fact, no specific evidence that the Plaintiff (Respondent) exercised the rights of proprietor between 1223, Fuslee (1816) and 1242: it is not, for example, shown what rents he realized from the 700 beegals, and yet the realization of rent is the strongest evidence of possession. If we were to grant that in the decree of 1816 A.D., to a greater or less extent, an inceptive right is traceable, we have no evidence of the effect given to the decree, and, as already intimated, none to establish the enjoyment of an appropriated right between 1816 (1223) and the asserted date of dispossession in 1835 (1242). [209] It is, therefore, ordered, that the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen be reversed, and the suit dismissed with costs: that the Appellant recover from the Plaintiff (Respondent), the costs of this Court, with interest, to the day of realization, agreeably to the account prepared by the Accountant of costs of this Court; and that, in order to realize the expenses of the Zillah Court, they present a petition in the Zillah whence a proper order will be passed, in accordance with the purport of the Circular Order, dated 4th March, 1836."

The third Judge, Mr. Torrens, recorded his opinion as follows:—"In a case circumstanced as the present, both as to the character of the claim, and the mode in which the proceedings of the Lower Court were conducted, I am unable to agree with my colleagues in the reversal of the decree passed, simply on the ground of the record, as now before us, not containing fuller proofs of the alleged act of dispossession. The latter part of the issue, which the pleaders of both parties, certainly with the permission of this Court, have agreed to, cannot, it appears to me, be satisfactorily tried without first considering whether the map prepared by the orders of the Lower Court shows, as stated in the decision, the true boundary between the two villages, as determined in the suit between the fathers of the litigant parties in 1816. If it be as the Lower Court has now decided, it was surely for the Appellants in some way to show how, in direct opposition to a former judgment, they had passed the line of boundary and acquired possession of land held on such strong title against them as a final decree of Court. The Principal Sudder Ameen's decision may in effect be wrong or not; but it has been based, I [210] consider, purely on comparison of the map, which he had prepared by his Amlah with the boundaries as laid down in the decree of 1816 A.D. He has taken two fixed points indicated in the map as those betwixt which a line running in a northern and southern direction was drawn under the decision of that year, which line fixed the boundary of the Plaintiff's, (Respondent's,) village of Gopaulpore, and the Appellants' village of Rampore. The Appellants assent to one of these points, the most southern, as the true point—contending that the map, as laid down, has shifted the northern point from its real position. To show this, they refer to copies of former maps filed or agreed to by the Respondent, and to the relative position as there given, and as now existing in the Mofussil, of certain known landmarks and village boundaries, bearing on the disputed sere of the northern point fixed in 1816 A.D. The investigations of the Principal Sudder Ameen have been mainly directed to these obligations; and having concluded that the map prepared by his Amlah set them aside, and that it had defined the true boundary as laid down in 1816 A.D., without ever holding any proceedings, as imperatively required by law, under sec. 10, Reg. XXVI., 1814, he first determines the case chiefly on this conclusion, but also on oral evidence of dispossession. On an appeal the Sudder Court, seeing the illegality of the decision without the proceedings referred to, remanded the case. On the 4th of December, 1852, the Principal Sudder Ameen went through what he considered the form of proceeding, and on the 13th, decided that the points then settled for adjudication had already been proved and disposed of by his first decision; and so; without indicating [211] the necessity of any further proof, and without the Defendants having preferred any further objection than that the deputation of an unsworn Amlah to make a map was opposed to rule, he decided the case merely by reference to his former judgment. This mode of proceeding entirely defeats the object of clauses 3 and 4, sec. 10, Reg. XXVI., 1844, and the Plaintiff (Respondent) has thus necessarily rested throughout on the Lower Court's view of the map and boundary, and has not been, as I think, ever in a position to bring forward more substantial proof on the point of dispossession. That which he had given on this point in the informal trial, the oral evidence of a few ignorant Ryots, is quite as good as any evidence given by the Defendants as to their ever having remained in undisturbed occupancy of the lands. Neither party, in fact, from having directed their chief attention to the principal Sudder Ameen's investigation and judgment on the boundaries, have adduced the best evidence which might be procured on the questions of possession and dispossession; and it is to be observed in this country, before the recent revenue survey, where disputes exist respecting tracts of land on the confines of two contiguous Zemindaries, which tracts, as in this instance, are not shown to be held by resident Ryots, the Ryots of one Zemindar cultivate one part of the disputed land one year, and those of the other Zemindar another part of the next year, so that there is no very defined possession until some act occurs on the part of either which drives the other into Court; and, I, therefore, think, in this case, without authentic collection papers produced, or without the evidence of more respectable witnesses, that even on the question of dispossession, the bound-[212]-dary line, if the Principal Sudder Ameen's decision on it be correct, is our most certain guide. Be that as it may, I conceive that his irregular proceedings, as before noticed, gave no opportunity for Plaintiff's bringing fuller proof as to the act of dispossession; and I certainly would say, with much deference to my colleagues, that without determining the correctness or otherwise of the map and boundary line as compared with the former decision, the Court is in no position to set aside the decree on the grounds assigned. The petition of plaint does not appear to me to imply simply one single act of dispossession; it states that the Defendants had first, on plea of a decision passed in their favour in a case under Reg. XV. of 1824, with other parties, contrived to obtain possession of 200 beegahs within the old boundary in 1242, F.S., and then, working on this, encroached on, or took possession of, the whole 700 beegahs now claimed. The Plaintiff, finding they had done so, sent for them, and called on them to retire from beyond the boundary; and on their persisting in not doing so, at length brought his present action, so as to be within the period of limitation. In the first decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen, he states that the map of his Anilah, on which he has adjudicated the case, is supported by the Revenue survey map, prepared whilst the case was pending; and, under all circumstances, instead of finally reversing the order passed, I would return the case to the Principal Sudder Ameen for re-trial, after having an intelligible map prepared, such as prescribed by the Circular Order of this Court, No. 173, of the 5th of May, 1852, A.D., which would show distinctly the relative positions and distances of the points by which the [213] boundary line of 1816 was laid down: and on the question of possession or dispossession, I would require that further and more substantial evidence should be taken, by enforcing the provision of Act, No. 19 of 1853. Such a course, I think, would be most equitable, and most likely to put an end to litigation, which, to judge from some of the statements made, would appear to have been going on respecting the same boundary, in greater or less degree, ever since 1199, B. S., notwithstanding numerous decisions passed."

The present appeal was brought from the decree of the majority of the Court.

The appeal was argued by Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant, and Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. Field, for the Respondents.

The material arguments are stated and referred to in their Lordships' judgment, which was delivered by

The Lord Justice Turner (July 30, 1860).—The parties to this cause are the proprietors of two contiguous Zemindaries in Zillah Bhagulpore. For many years the Zemindary called Pergunnah Nursingpore Zoorah, which includes the village called Mouzah Gopaulpore, has been held by the Appellant, or his ancestors; whilst the family of the Respondents has been in the possession of the Zemindary called Naredegur, which includes the village called Mouzah Rampore.

That litigation concerning the boundaries of the two estates has been frequent, if not incessant.

[214] In the year 1792, there was a suit to settle the disputed boundaries of Mon-

zah Surseeah, part of the Appellant's Zemindary, Nursingpore Koorah, and Mouzah Jyepore Puckree, part of the Zemindary of Naredegur. This was determined in accordance with the award of an Ameen, appointed with the consent of both parties, named Khado Yaar Khan, which fixed, or ought to have fixed, the boundaries between the two Mouzahs, and so far, those between the two Zemindaries. It may be proper to mention, though the circumstance is not now material, that this suit was between an ancestor of the Appellant and one Deo Raj Singh, who appears to have dispossessed at that time the Respondents' ancestor of Naredegur.

In 1816, two suits were pending between Mohun Singh, the grandfather of the Respondents, and Maharajah Chutter Singh, the grandfather of the Appellant. In one of them Mohun Singh, as Plaintiff, claimed as part of Mouzah Rampoor, two hundred and fifty-one beegahs of land, which the Maharajah, as Defendant, insisted formed part of Mouzah Gopaulpore. In the other, the Maharajah, as Plaintiff, claimed as part of Mouzah Gopaulpore, four hundred beegahs of land, lying to the north and west of the lands in question in the other suit, and Mohun Singh, as Defendant, insisted that they were comprised in Mouzah Rampoor. In the first suit the Zillah Judge, proceeding in part upon the old award of Khoda Yaar Khan, of which both parties admitted the accuracy, drew a boundary line between the two Mouzahs, and gave to the Plaintiff so much of the land claimed as fell within Mouzah Rampoor thus defined. The suit of Chutter Singh he simply dismissed, inasmuch as the whole of the four hundred beegahs [215] claimed by him were clearly within Mouzah Rampoor as defined by the other decree. Both decrees were, on the appeal of Maharajah Chuttur Singh, confirmed in 1818, by the then Court of appeal at Patana.

In 1834, there was a summary proceeding in the Criminal Court under Regulation XV. of 1824, touching the possession of two hundred beegahs of land which were claimed on the one side by the then proprietors of Naredegur as part of Mouzah Rampoor, and on the other by two widows who had acquired an interest in Mouzah Maholee, a village forming part of Nursingpore Poorah, and either identical with or contiguous to Mouzah Gopaulpore, which, in these proceedings, is sometimes called Gopaulpore Maholee. The decision of the Magistrate was to the effect, that the proprietors of Naredegur were in possession of the lands in question, and ought to be maintained in it. To this proceeding, which bears date the 24th of May, 1834, no person whom the Appellant represents was directly a party. He has, however, produced it for a particular purpose, and made it part of his case. It is unnecessary, at least for the present, to go more fully into those earlier proceedings, because, if material at all, they can only be material as evidence upon one or other of the issues raised in the present suit.

This suit was instituted in August, 1845, by the father of the present Appellant. It was for the recovery of seven hundred beegahs of land, alleged to have been part of Mouzah Gopaulpore, but admitted to have been in the possession of the Respondents, though by wrongful title, since May, 1834, or for a period commencing soon after that date. The case made by the Plaintiff on his pleadings was shortly this:— [216] That the seven hundred beegahs in question were within Mouzah Gopaulpore as defined by the decree of 1816; that the Defendants had taken possession of them, under colour of the award of the 24th of May, 1834, some time in the year 1835, and had ever since continued in possession; but that during these ten years, and in order to prevent the institution of a suit against them, they had repeatedly admitted the Plaintiff's title, and promised to restore the land.

The Defendants' case, on their pleadings, was to this effect:—That the seven hundred beegahs claimed were within the boundary of Mouzah Rampoor as defined by the decree of 1816; that they were, in fact, the aggregate of the two hundred and fifty-one beegahs and four hundred beegahs, which were the subject of the two suits finally determined by the confirmation of that decree in 1818; that the title to them was, therefore, res judicata; and further, that in any case, the Plaintiff and his father had been out of possession of them for upwards of twelve years next before the institution of the suit, which was, therefore, barred by the Regulation of Limitation.

On the statements, therefore, of the two parties, it appears that the substantial questions of fact in dispute between them were:—

First. What was the boundary-line laid down by the decree of 1816, to which both appealed?

Second. Was the Plaintiff, or his father, Chuttur Singh, in possession of the lands claimed at any time within the period of twelve years next before the institution of the suit?

The words of the decree of 1816 are: "It is, therefore, ordered, that from the edge of the old [217] bandh eastward, which is in the map of the Plaintiff, and from the old pokhur, which is in the map of the Defendant, and all along to Lullahee Ghaut southward, which is in the map of the Plaintiff, and which the Defendant states to be Ghaut Suspattee, the boundary is fixed of Mouzah Rampoor, the Milkem of the Plaintiff, from Mouzah Gopaulpore Maholee, the property of the Defendant."

The parties to the present suit were agreed as to the position of Ghaut Suspattee, or Lullahee, but differed materially as to the position of the two other points. It might well be supposed that this contention could be settled by the production of the two maps referred to in the decree. Unfortunately, the Appellant impugns the genuineness of the map which is put in by the Respondents, as that produced by Mohun Singh, the Plaintiff in 1816; and on the map put in by the Appellant as the map produced by Chuttur Singh, the Defendant in 1816, there appear to be several Pokhurs or tanks and an oval mark which, though it contains no description but the words "Peepul tree," the Appellant now contends, denoted the old Pokhur referred to in the decree. Hence the common appeal to the decree of 1816 does nothing more than settle one of the termini of the boundary line, and resolve the general issue of the boundary line into the two particular issues, where was the old bandh? and, where the old Pokhur?

The Principal Sudder Ameen, before whom this suit was pending, took the evidence which each side tendered, touching either the possession of the disputed land or the boundary question. He also, by a proceeding, dated the 5th of May, 1847, directed one [218] Lallah Sheeb Lall, the Record Keeper of his Court, to visit the spot and make a plan of the disputed land in the presence of both parties. To the character and mode of proceeding of the Lallah objection is no longer taken. He visited the spot and made a map or plan, and a report. Upon these materials and the evidence taken previously, the Principal Sudder Ameen made his first decree in favour of the Appellant. It is dated the 28th of December, 1848. From that decree the Respondents appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. In the appellate Court a preliminary objection was taken to the decree on the ground that the Principal Sudder Ameen had omitted to draw up the issues in the suit in conformity with cl. 3, sec. 10, of Regulation XXVI. of 1814; and the Court saw fit to remand the cause to the Judge below, with a direction to lay down the issues in the regular way, and "having called upon both parties for proofs and refutations of those issues, to try and determine the cause de novo." The cause went back; and the Judge laid down the issues, which were, substantially,—Whether the lands in question were within the boundaries of Mouzah Rampoor, as defined by the decree of 1816, and whether the Plaintiff's suit was within the period of limitation or not. By the same proceeding, which was dated the 4th of December, 1852, he ordered that the parties should be called upon for their proofs. The Appellant took no advantage of the opportunity thus afforded to him of giving fresh evidence; but, by petition, prayed for judgment on the evidence, oral and documentary, already given. The Respondents only filed certain judgments of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, given in other cases, for [219] the purpose of showing the invalidity of Lallah Sheeb Lall's investigation and report,—a point now given up. The Principal Sudder Ameen, therefore, made upon the old evidence a second decree in favour of the Plaintiff in the suit. Against it the present Respondents renewed their appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

The appellate Court was divided, not so much on the merits of this case as upon the proper method of determining them. Two of the Judges, without entering into the boundary question, or impugning the decision of the Court below on that point, were for reversing the decree, and dismissing the suit on the ground that the Plaintiff had failed to prove his possession of the disputed lands at any time between 1816 and the commencement of the suit, or his alleged dispossession of them at any time in or after May, 1834. The dissentient Judge did not go the length of saying that the decree below ought to be affirmed. He seems to have thought that the finding of the Court as to the boundary line might shift the burden of proof as to the time and manner of dispossession on the Defendants; that on both issues there had been a mis-trial, and that it was proper to remand the case for another trial after the preparation of a more intelligible map, and taking further and better evidence on the question of possession, particularly that of the parties under the provisions of Act, No. XIX. of 1853. The opinion of the majority of course prevailed, the decree of the Court below was reversed, and the Appellant's suit dismissed. Against that decree of the Sudder Court, the present appeal has been preferred.

The learned Counsel for the Appellant have not [220] strongly contended that the proper order to be made on this appeal, is one remitting the case for re-trial in the manner suggested by Mr. Torrens in the Sudder Court. They have rather insisted that on the materials now before their Lordships, he is entitled to have the decree made in his favour by the Principal Sudder Ameen, affirmed. Their Lordships, however, desire to observe that in their judgment the majority of the Sudder Court was right in treating the cause as ripe for final decision. The Appellant had had, at all events from the date of the settlement of the issues, clear notice of what he had to prove. He had been called upon to adduce further evidence on those issues if he had any to give. He advisedly declined to do so, and called for the judgment of the Court upon the evidence already given. If this manner of trial were irregular, it is not for him to complain of an irregularity committed at his instance, or with his consent. And the suspicion, however probable, of the Judge, that a party who has failed to prove his case, may be more successful on a second and fuller investigation, is no sufficient ground for directing a new trial.

Again, their Lordships concur with the majority of the Sudder Court in thinking that the issue of possession is the first to be considered in this case, and that it is wholly independent of the boundary question. The Appellant is seeking to disturb the possession, admitted to have existed for about eleven years, of Defendants, who insist on a possession of much longer duration as a statutory bar to the suit. It clearly lies on him to remove that bar by satisfactory proof that the cause of action accrued to him (for that is the way in which the Regulation puts it) [221] on a dis-possession within twelve years next before the commencement of the suit; and, therefore, that he, or some person through whom he claims, was in possession during that period. No proof of anterior title, such as would be involved in the decision of the boundary question in his favour, can relieve him from this burden, or shift it upon his adversaries by compelling them to prove the time and manner of dispossession. The lands in question may have been part of Mouzah Gopaulpore, and as such may have been enjoyed by his ancestor, and yet he may have lost, by lapse of time, his right to recover them. Their Lordships, therefore, propose to consider in the first place, what evidence there is that the Appellant, or any person through whom he claims, was in possession of the lands in question at any time within twelve years next before the commencement of the suit.

There are eight witnesses examined on the part of the Appellant. They all agree in stating that his grandfather, Chuttur Singh, was in possession of the lands in question until some time in the Fuslee year 1242 corresponding with 1835, A.D., and was dispossessed under colour of the Magistrate's order of May, 1834. All of them, with the exception of the second, Baboo Ram Mundur, speak of this dispossession as "forcible"; as effected with more or less of violence, and in the face of opposition on the part of the occupiers of the land. They do not agree as to the fact whether or no a Peon from the Magistrate's Court was present to give effect to the order of May, 1834. They are pretty well agreed that the disputed land was, before the alleged dispossession, for the most part under [222] cultivation; that the cultivated portion of it was rented at from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2. 6a. per beegah, and yielded from Rs. 1100, to 1300, per annum. Some of them give the names of the cultivators; some, but not all, speak as if the whole land had been farmed by one Tajaen, who, in such case, would have paid a gross rent to the Zemindar, and have made the collections from the Ryots on his own account. No such person was produced as a witness; nor is the oral testimony supported by the production of any paper purporting to be lease, Pottah, Kaboolyat, or receipt for rent,—the usual adminicula of proof in such cases. Again, most of the witnesses concur in saying that, before the alleged dispossession, there was but one hamlet on the disputed lands, the inhabitants of which deserted it upon the dispossession; and that the Defendants had, year by year, since 1835, established three or four new hamlets upon them.

The Appellant's witnesses are contradicted by some nine or ten on the part of the Respondents. The general scope of this latter testimony is to show that the disputed lands are within the boundary of Rampoor as defined by the decree of 1816, and have ever since that date been in the possession of the Respondents' family; that they are identical with the 400 and 251 beegahs which were the subjects of the two suits of 1816; that the 251 beegahs, or part of them, were also the subject of the dispute with the widows of Tej Narain Singh, which was settled by the order of May, 1834; and that there are three hamlets on the lands in question in the suit, of which the latest in date had, in 1847, been established for [223] upwards of twenty years. This testimony is also unsupported by documents: but the last of the witnesses seems to be somewhat more respectable in point of station than the Appellant's witnesses. Let it be granted, however, that the oral evidence on the part of the Respondents is no better than that on the part of the Appellant: it must still lie on the Appellant to make out his case; and their Lordships have next to consider whether he has done so, by the greater probability of the tale told by his witnesses.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that the balance of probabilities is decidedly against him. His witnesses agree that the land was for the most part under cultivation, and yielded a considerable revenue. They treat the dispossession as a single and forcible act. These admissions exclude the hypothesis, which was sometimes suggested in the course of the argument, that the Respondents' possession may have been gradually acquired by squatting on waste land. Again, the theory is, that possession was gained under colour of the order of May, 1834. The 200 beegahs which were the subject of that order, are either included in the 700 beegahs now in dispute, or are distinct from them. On the latter assumption it is not easy to see (and this difficulty is wholly unexplained) how an order maintaining one man in the possession of certain lands can be made an instrument for turning another man out of the possession of other lands. The former assumption implies that 700 beegahs were taken under an award for only 200 beegahs: that the proceeding before the Magistrate, who had only jurisdiction to determine the fact of possession, was had [224] between two parties, neither of whom was really in possession; and that he, in whose favour the order was made, successfully used it to eject the actual possessor of the lands, who being no party to the proceeding, was not bound by it. Such doings may not be without example in India; but those aggrieved by them do not ordinarily acquiesce in them. Lastly, in any view of the evidence there was a palpable, if not violent, invasion of Chuttur Singh's possession, known to him at the time. Is it conceivable that one so prone to litigation as he is shown to have been, would not immediately have sought redress, either by a summary proceeding under Reg. XV. of 1824, or by regular suit? To account for his unnatural acquiescence, the Appellant and his witnesses have recourse to a very common subterfuge of falsehood. They say that the Respondents admitted their adversary's title, and promised to restore the lands. The plaint alleges that there were repeated assurances of this kind. The witnesses only depose to one ante litem motam; but add that ten years afterwards, when the suit had been commenced by Chuttur Singh's son, the Respondents again offered to relinquish the lands on being released from the claim for mesne profits. Their Lordships consider this part of the Appellant's case simply incredible. And, on the whole evidence, they are of opinion, that he has failed to give that proof of the alleged possession of Chuttur Singh which is essential to the maintenance of this suit.

This being so, it is unnecessary to go into the boundary question. Upon that, although sensible of the force of Mr. Palmer's observation that questions of that kind are presumably best determined by [225] local Judges, their Lordships are by no means satisfied that the Principal Sudder Ameen has come to a correct conclusion, or that the lands in question are within the limits of Mouzah Gapaulpore as defined by the decree of 1816. But they do not decide this question. Their decision of the other question is of itself sufficient ground for the recommendation, which they propose to make to Her Majesty, that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

THE GOVERNMENT OF BENGAL. —Appellant; MUSSUMAT SHURRUFFUTOON-NISSA (after her death, SAYYUD SHAH ASSAD OOLAH, her son and heir), and SAYYUD SHAH ENAYET HOSSEIN.—Respondents * [June 25, 1860].

On petition from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, at Calcutta.

Under the provisions of the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV. c. 41, and the Order in Council of the 4th September, 1833, an appeal from the Sudder Court in India was brought to a hearing by the East India Company, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and, by an Order in Council made on the appeal in 1836, the costs incurred in prosecuting the appeal were directed to be paid to the East India Company by the respective parties to the appeal, or their representatives, as provided by the Order in Council of the 18th of November, 1833. On a suit brought by the Government in 1852, against the representatives of one of the parties to the appeal, to recover part of the costs incurred by the East India Company in bringing the appeal to a hearing. Held:—

First, that the recovery of the costs incurred by the East India Company, being in the character of agents to prosecute the dormant appeal, under the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, sec. 22, and Order in Council of the 4th September, 1833, did not constitute a “public right” within the provisions of cl. 2, sec. 2, of Ben. Reg. II., of 1805, which gives the Government a period of sixty years for bringing a suit; and,

Secondly, that the claim was barred by sec. 14 of Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, and the Court in India prohibited from entertaining the suit, as it had not been brought within twelve years, the time limited by that Regulation.

The Respondents appeared by Counsel at the hearing to argue the appeal, without having lodged a printed case. Their Lordships refused to hear the appeal, until a printed case was lodged [8 Moo. Ind. App. 230, 231].

This appeal arose under the following circumstances:—

Some time previously to the year 1833, an appeal was preferred to His late Majesty in Council, by Shah Assud Oolah, the father of Sayyud Shah Enayet [226] Hossein, one of the present Respondents, against Mussumat Emamun, as Respondent, from a decision of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in Bengal.

Under the provisions of Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, sec. 22, and the Order in Council of the 4th September, 1833, that appeal was brought to a hearing by the East India Company, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and on the 7th of December, 1836, the Judicial Committee reported to His late Majesty, that the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut should be affirmed; and their Lordships directed that there should be paid to the East India Company, or their agent, by the Appellant and Respondent respectively, or their respective representative or representatives, certain sums for costs of bringing the appeal to a hearing. This report of the Judicial Committee was confirmed by an Order in Council, dated the 22nd of December, 1836.

Previously to the decision upon the above appeal, Shah Assud Oollah died, leaving Sayyud Shah Enayet Hossein his only son and heir, who succeeded to his father's estate.

[227] Early in the year 1837, the Government of Bengal proceeded to adopt measures for the realization of the sum of Rs. 31,019 0a. 12p., the amount of the costs due to the East India Company under the Order in Council founded upon the decision of the Judicial Committee; and, upon the application of the Government, orders were issued by the Judge of Zillah Bhagulpoor for the sale of certain Mouzals and other property, real and personal, of Shah Assud Oollah, which had descended to Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein; but, previously to the execution of such order, Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa, the wife of Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein, and one of the present Respondents, presented a petition to the Zillah Judge, stating that a deed of gift of the real property advertised for sale had been executed by Shah Assud Oollah, in favour of Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein, in the year 1811, and had been assigned to her by her husband in lieu of dower by a deed of sale, and that she had obtained a decree from the Provincial Court of Moorshedabad, dated the 17th of May, 1830, for the property embraced in the deed of sale. Syed Willayat Hossein, and others, also presented a petition to the Zillah Judge, stating that they had a half share in the Mouzahs advertised for sale.

The objections raised by the petition of Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa were disallowed by the Zillah Judge; and the consideration of the other petition postponed. On the 29th of December, 1837, an order was passed for sale of half of the real property of Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein. Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa being dissatisfied with the order of the Zillah Judge, preferred a summary appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut; and, on the 31st of January, 1839, that Court reversed such order and [228] ordered all the property comprised in the decree of the Provincial Court of Moorshedabad to be released, upon the ground that, on the face of the documents filed by Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa, no summary order disturbing her possession could be passed.

Several efforts were afterwards made to recover from the surety of the original Appellant the money due to the East India Company; but it was found that his landed property had already been sold, partly for arrears of Government revenue, and partly in execution of decrees enforced by decree holders; and nothing could be obtained from him. The Government, then, at various dates, presented petitions to the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen, praying for the arrest of Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein, and for the sale of other property belonging to him. But upon certain objections being taken to the proposed sale, an order was made by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, on the 15th of May, 1849, prohibiting the sale. Afterwards, in conformity with the directions of the Sudder Court, contained in a letter from that Court, dated the 3rd of September, 1850, an order was made by the Zillah Court on the 6th of December in that year, whereby an apportionment was made of the sum of Rs. 31,019 0a. 12p. due for costs, as specified in the Order in Council; and it was declared that of that amount, the sum of Rs. 26,027 8a. was due from the original Appellant, Shah Assud Oollah, and the sum of Rs. 4,991 9a. 2p. was due from the original Respondent, Mussumat Enamun. The whole of the latter sum was subsequently realized by the Government.

[229] In the meantime, frequent attempts had been made to arrest Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein for the debt due from him, but without success.

The Government then petitioned the Zillah Court, praying for the attachment and sale of the property of Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein, but this petition was rejected by the Court.

Upon this, the Government filed a plaint on the 25th of June, 1852, in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Bhagulpoor, against Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa and Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein stating the facts above mentioned, and charging that the deed of gift to Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein and the assignment to the Defendant, Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa were fraudulent and collusive, and praying that the sum of Rs. 26,002 8a., the sum declared to be due from Sayyut Shah Enayet Hossein, under the apportionment made by the order of the Zillah Court, dated the 6th of December, 1850, after deducting the sum of Rs. 25, and also the sum of Rs. 19,750 1a. 9p., for interest thereon, might be awarded to them, and that an order of sale be issued of the landed property specified in a schedule annexed to the plaint, which was the same property as was claimed by the Respondent, Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa.

The Respondents put in separate answers to the plaint, and thereby pleaded, amongst other things not material to the question raised in the present appeal, that the Government's right of action was barred by the Regulation of Limitations, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14, more than twelve years having intervened between the date of the summary order of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, of the 31st of January, 1839, and the date of the institution of the suit.

Replications to the answers were filed by the [230] Government which, amongst other things, insisted that the rule of limitation pleaded by the Respondents was not applicable to the claim of the Government.

On the 19th of June, 1855, Mr. Colin Macdonald, the Principal Sudder Ameen, decided that the deeds on which the Respondent, Mussumat Shurruffutoonnissa, relied, were fraudulent and void; and that, in conformity with the provisions of clauses 1 and 2, sec. 2, Ben. Reg. II. of 1805, the claim of the Government, being for a public right, could be preferred within sixty years, and he accordingly made a decree in favour of the Government.

The Respondents appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and the appeal was heard before the full Court, consisting of Messrs. Trevor, Loch, and Bayley, and, on the 30th of April, 1858, Mr. Trevor and Mr. Loch, in opposition to the opinion of Mr. Bayley, made a decree reversing the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen, upon the ground that the claim of the Government was not for a public right, as provided by cl. 2, sec. 2, Reg. II. of 1805, and, therefore, that the suit was barred by sect. 14, Reg. III. of 1793, as the suit had not been brought within twelve years.

From this decree the present appeal was brought.

An appearance was entered for the Respondents, but no case was lodged by them. When the appeal came on for hearing (June 19, 1860) their Lordships * refused to hear the Respondents' Counsel unless a printed case was [231] lodged. Upon the Respondents undertaking to lodge a case, the hearing of the appeal was adjourned. A case having been lodged by the Respondents the appeal came on for hearing.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Government of Bengal, and, Mr. Leith, for the Respondents.

On the part of the Government, it was insisted, first, that their claim to be reimbursed the costs paid by the East India Company in the appeal prosecuted by them under the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, sec. 22, and Orders in Council of the 4th of September and 18th of November, 1833 (Knapp's P.C. Cases, Appx. pp. xxvii. and xxix.), was "a public right," within the meaning of cl. 2, sec. 2 of Ben. Reg. II. of 1805, and, therefore, could by cl. 2 of the section of that Regulation be preferred at any time within the period of sixty years from and after the origin of the cause of action. Secondly, that the payment of the costs had been demanded within twelve years and admitted, and that as the present claim of the Government was substantially a claim for the sale of land of which possession had been acquired by the Respondents by fraud, therefore, that the suit instituted by Government was not barred by sec. 14 of Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, and was within the exception contained in that section, there being "good and sufficient cause" shown why the Government had been precluded from obtaining redress. Upon these points they cited Troup and Dyce Sombre v. The East India Company (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 104), Prannath Roy Chowdry v. [232] Rookea Begum (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 332), Rup Chand Sahu v. Jivan Lal Ray (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 168), and it was further argued that by analogy to the Statute of Limitations, 21st Jac. I. c. 16, sec. 3, the suit was not barred, as the claim for costs was made under an Order in Council which made the Government a decree holder, Mildred v. Robinson (19 Ves., 585).

For the Respondents, it was submitted, first, that as the claim was for costs incurred by the East India Company, under the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV. c. 41, sec. 22, and the Orders in Council made thereon, and not by the Government of India, which was distinguished from the East India Company by Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV. c. 85: therefore, that the suit had been improperly brought in India in the name of the Government instead of the East India Company. Secondly, that the East India Company's claim for reimbursement of the costs incurred by them being in the character of agents appointed by the Crown, under the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, to prosecute the appeal (an agency which the Crown could, under that Statute, have delegated to any other person), did not, therefore, constitute a "public right" so as to bring the suit within the exception of sixty years provided by cl. 2 of sec. 2 of Ben. Reg. II. of 1805; and, thirdly, that as the period of twelve years from the time the cause of action accrued had elapsed before the suit was commenced, the Court in India was precluded, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, from hearing and trying the suit by sec. 14. The cases of Pudarat Dass v. Fattel Ali (7 Sud. Dew. Rep. N.W.P., 158), Sheroj Singh v. Mansookh Rao (7 Sud. Dew. Rep. N.W. P., 337), were referred to.

The Right Hon. Dr. Lushington.—It will be necessary in this case merely briefly to advert to some of the circumstances which have given rise to the questions discussed at the bar. It appears that there was a suit of very old standing; of such great antiquity that even the parties do not attempt to state at what period an appeal to His late Majesty in Council was lodged against a decision of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta. Some time prior, however, to the year 1833, an appeal had been preferred by Shah Assud Oollah, the father of one of the present Respondents, against Mussumat Emamun, as Respondent.

In virtue of the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV. c. 41, that had passed, giving authority to the Crown to appoint the East India Company to take charge of appeals and bring them to a hearing, the appeal was heard; the Appellant was condemned in costs; and the decree of the Court below affirmed. Previous to the hearing it seems that Shah Assud Oollah had died. It does not appear from any of the proceedings in this case that the present Respondent (his son) had anything to do with that appeal whatever individually; but his father having been condemned in the costs, proceedings were taken against the son, as possessing the property of his father, for the realization of the sum due for costs.

In the year 1837, the first proceedings in the present case were adopted, and the mode of proceeding was this:—The East India Company, in virtue of the rights they had acquired to recover the costs, proceeded against the son, and also against the wife. They proceeded for the purpose of rendering certain property, which was claimed by the wife as having [234] been conveyed to her by deed of gift of her husband, amenable to the payment of those costs. These proceedings went on, and by a decree of the Zillah Judge, which was made on the 29th of December, 1837, a sale of half the real property of Shah Enayet Hossein was directed to be made. But Mussumat Shurruffutoonnisna was dissatisfied with this order, and appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and on the 31st of January, 1839, that Court reversed the order of the Zillah Court, and ordered all the property comprised in the decree of the Court below to be released, upon the ground, that no summary order could, in the existing state of things, disturb her possession.

Now, it is important to see what was really the tenor of that order as set forth in the judgment of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, which states the facts more particularly. It appears that this property had been registered in the Collectorate in the name of the Respondent; that it had been alleged to have been given up by deed of sale in lieu of dower, and that she had rightly or wrongly obtained a decree on the 17th of May, 1830, in her favour. Now, the Sudder Adawlut in that case very clearly intimated what was the state of things, namely, that it was impossible that the Order of the Judge of the Court below could be affirmed, because the only mode of proceeding was that which they directed to be adopted, namely, to proceed regularly to bring the property to sale, and they held that no summary order disturbing her possession could be passed.

This took place, as has been stated, on the 31st of January, 1839, and no further proceedings were taken on the part of the Government to realize the payment of these costs by means of the sale of this particular property, until the year 1852, after a lapse [235] of thirteen years. When the case came to be prosecuted in 1852, the only objection we need notice was an objection made on behalf of the present Respondents, that the suit could not be heard on account of its being barred by the Regulations of Limitations.

We will address our attention, therefore, to that question at once.

Two Regulations of Limitations have been adverted to by the Counsel for the parties before us, namely, Regulation III. of 1793, and Regulation II. of 1805. Assuming that it was possible that this suit might be governed by Regulation III. of 1793, Mr. Forsyth raised a question that it was excepted, by virtue of certain words found in that Regulation, from the operation of that Regulation, without reference to Regulation II. of 1805; and he stated that, the money had been demanded by the Government for the matter in question, and that the Defendants admitted the correctness of the demand. Now, that the money was demanded may be perfectly true, and that the Defendants might have admitted that the demand was claimable from some quarter or other, may be perfectly true: but that, according to the intent and meaning of the words of the Regulation, they admitted that there was a claim as against the property in question, there certainly is not one atom of evidence before their Lordships.

Their Lordships think, therefore, that that clause in the first Regulation can have no operation upon this case.

Let us, then, consider the further question raised. There is indeed this exception in the Regulation of 1793, "when, either from minority or other good and sufficient cause, he had been precluded from obtaining redress." We will not say that "other good and [236] sufficient cause" are not words so comprehensive that they might by possibility extend to anything that may in the ordinary meaning of those words constitute "a good and sufficient cause" but is there any good and sufficient cause shown upon the present occasion? Here, in the month of January, 1839, there is an express warning given to the Government, who had then sought to make this property amenable for the costs, that the proper course was to commence a regular suit, and not to proceed in a summary mode. They had the proper course pointed out to them; they had pointed out to them the only course by which they could make this property amenable; and they neglected for the whole period of thirteen years to take any such measure. It is, therefore, quite clear, giving the most extensive meaning to the words, "other good and sufficient cause," that it is impossible to say that, "either from minority or other good and sufficient cause," they were precluded from obtaining redress.

We now come to what is certainly a very important point, namely, whether Regulation II. of 1805, extends to the present case, so as to enable the Government to sue, notwithstanding the lapse of time. Undoubtedly, the great object of the Regulation of 1805 was to prevent vexatious suits, in consequence of the litigiousness that generally prevails among the natives of India, and, in all probability, it was not intended at that time to embarrass the East India Company, or the Government of India. But, be that as it may, Regulation II. of 1805, sec. 2, cl. 2, expressly declares that this Regulation of Limitations should not be considered applicable to any suit for the recovery of "the public revenue," or for "any public right whatever" which might be instituted by or on behalf of Govern-[237]-ment, with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, or by direction of any public Officer or Officers who might be duly authorized to prosecute the same on the part of Government: or, secondly, to any claims on the part of Government, "whether for the assessment of land held exempt from the public revenues without legal and sufficient title to such exemption, or for the recovery of arrears of the public assessment, or for any other public right whatever."

Now, the question turns on the meaning that ought properly to be attached to these words, "any other public right whatever." Perhaps it would be too strict a construction to say that these words shall be construed precisely to be ejusdem generis with those matters which are mentioned before, namely, "the assessment of land held exempt from the public revenue without legal and sufficient title to such exemption, or for the recovery of arrears of the public assessment:" but, although they may not be construed with that degree of strictness, yet they must be taken to depend upon the same principles, otherwise the word "public" would have no meaning.

This brings us to the consideration of the question, whether the recovery of these costs does or does not constitute a public claim? The Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, has been read, and we need not go through it again. By virtue of that Statute, His Majesty in Council might give such directions as He thought fit to the East India Company, or other persons, for the prosecution of these suits, and also might make such orders for security and for the payment of costs as His Majesty in Council should think fit. Accordingly, it appears that an Order in Council was issued, with a view to carry into effect this Statute, and that Order in Council [238] directed the East India Company to appoint agents and Counsel for the different parties in the appeals then pending, to do all such matters and things as had been usually transacted and done by agents in the prosecution of appeals. Now, we are of opinion, that these were all private acts between individuals, and that they had not originally in their nature anything of a public character to be ascribed to them. It appears that His Majesty, by another Order in Council, directed that the East India Company should be "entitled to demand payment of their reasonable costs of bringing appeals to hearing by virtue of the said Act, to such amount and from such party and parties, and shall have a lien for the said costs on all monies, lands, goods, and property whatsoever which may be recovered in such appeals, and upon all deposits which may have been made, and all securities which may have been given in respect of such appeals." In other words, that Order in Council placed the East India Company in precisely the same place and position as the winning party would have been in if an appeal had come on in its ordinary course. It appears to their Lordships that the nature of this transaction was originally of a private character. It continued to be of a private character, and the only distinction that can be drawn is this, that the East India Company are the agents to assert the right of the originally successful party to the costs incurred in the appeal.

It has been observed in the course of this discussion that other persons might have been appointed, and nobody can for a moment say that, if it had pleased His Majesty in His wisdom to appoint anybody else to conduct these proceedings and to realize the costs, the parties so appointed would not have sued as [239] private individuals. It pleased His Majesty, however, to appoint the East India Company. Can the appointment of one particular agent change the whole character and nature of the transaction from beginning to end, and convert that which was originally a private transaction, and nothing but a private transaction, into a transaction of a public character so as to bring it within the terms of the Regulation on which we have commented? Their Lordships think that it did not.

Their Lordships are of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the Court below was right, and they will, therefore, humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm that decision, with costs.

RAM GOPAL MOOKERJEE,—Appellant: SAMUEL MASSEYK and THOMAS J. KENNY,—Respondents * [June 28 and 29, 1860].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Pending the execution of decrees in suits between A., lessee, and B., under-lessee, for the balance of rent, C. purchased B.'s interest in the under-lease. For the protection of the property suits were then brought by C. against A. An Ikrarnamah, or agreement, was afterwards entered into by A. and C., to put an end to the litigation. This agreement recited that C. was indebted to A. in a certain sum which C. agreed to pay, upon a remission by A. of part of his claim, by two instalments at specified dates; and the agreement then provided that, if default was made by C. in paying the instalments then that the remitted money was to be held due to A. by C., and secured upon certain property comprised in the underlease, as well as by making C. himself liable. No place was specified, nor was there any custom established by the evidence, where the money was to be paid. The instalments were paid, but not until some time after the day specified in the agreement. The money had been tendered to A's Mookhtar, but refused by him from the fact of A. being absent, and also on the ground that interest was not tendered. A. afterwards brought an action against B. and C. to recover the sum remitted by the Ikrarnamah, on the ground that by the conditions of that agreement, the instalments should have been punctually paid upon the specified days, which had not been done, nor had any legal tender been made. Held by the Judicial Committee (affirming the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut), (1) that although A. had agreed to remit part of his demand on condition of receiving payment on specified days, or in default that the remitted sum was to be paid, yet that there was nothing in the agreement which made the payment of the instalments on the days fixed the essence of the contract, and that the Judicial Committee would not apply the technicalities of the English law with respect to breach of contracts to such an agreement, (2) that the penalty could not be enforced, as there was a bona fide endeavour to pay the money on the specified days, and (3) that the agreement was substantially performed by the payments, and that a strict legal tender was not necessary.

In this case the Appellant brought a suit against the Respondents to recover the sum of Rs. 12,829. 2a. 7p. for principal and interest due to him under an Ikrarnamah (deed of agreement), dated the 23rd of [240] September, 1850, executed by the Respondent, Masseyk.

The Appellant had a lease of a share of the Pergunnah Mahmood Shahee, appertaining to the Zillah Jessore, in Bengal; and the Respondent, Kenny, who possessed indigo factories in the neighbourhood, held an underlease of some of the lands comprised in the Appellant's lease.

The Appellant instituted actions and obtained decrees in the Civil Court of Jessore, against the Respondent, Kenny, for balance of rent due on the underlease, took out execution, and procured the attachment of the indigo factories in his possession, together with their appurtenances; and also procured the attachment of certain decrees obtained by the Respondent, Kenny, against divers of the debtors of his indigo concern, and adopted measures for effecting a sale of the attached property, and sold three of the decrees against debtors and received the proceeds.

The Respondent, Masseyk, purchased the entire [241] right of the Respondent, Kenny, to the concern, taking over the debts and credits, and obtained from the Zillah Judge in the different suits, orders for the release of the attached factories, from which orders the Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in Calcutta, while, in three other cases, proceedings were still pending in the Zillah Court; and, on the other hand, four actions had been brought by the Respondent, Masseyk, against the Appellant, for matters connected with the above transactions.

In this state of affairs, and after the hearing of one of the appeals by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut had commenced, the Respondent, Masseyk, came to an amicable settlement with the Appellant; and, on the 25th of September, 1850, a deed of agreement, called an Ikrarnamah, was executed at Calcutta. This instrument, after reciting the facts above stated, proceeded in the following terms:—"Now, considering the sums in the said decrees obtained by you (the present Appellant) on account of the concern which I (the Respondent, Masseyk) have purchased, to be justly due to you, and being desirous to come to an amicable settlement for the money due to you, an account has been made of all the decrees that you have obtained against Mr. Kenny, up to the 30th June, 1850, and it has been proved that the sum of Rs. 33,589. 15a. 3p. is due to you, out of which, under an amicable settlement, I have agreed to pay you Rs. 25,000, and you have agreed to receive the said sum and make a remission. Out of the said sum of Rs. 25,000 you have received from the Court, Rs. 2281, by the sale made to you of three summary decrees obtained by the said Mr. Kenny against Kishen Chund Chuckerbutty. After [242] giving a deduction for this, the debt becomes Rs. 22,719, out of which this day Rs. 10,000 have been paid to you through your Mookhtar, Jaggut Chunder Mitter, and the Rs. 12,719, that remain due after the payment of the said sum (10,000) have been stipulated to be paid under these conditions:—That

Rs. 6000, out of the principal and interest on the said Rs. 12,719, whatever may become due from the 1st of Bhadoon last, will be paid on the 10th of Magh of the current year, by entering payment thereof on the back of this document; that the remaining Rs. 6719, I will pay on the 10th of Chayte, together with interest, enter payment thereof on the back of this Ikrar, and obtain the return of the said Ikrar and release; that whatever amount of money I may at any time pay, I will have payment thereof made on the back of this Ikrar: and no objection whatever in regard to payment is to be admitted, with the exception of payments recorded on the back of the Ikrar; and whatever sum of money I may at any time pay, you will first deduct the interest money out of that, and credit the balance for principal. As security for the payment of the said money, the whole of the indigo factories, with their appurtenances, etc., that you had cause to be taken in seizure, in execution of decrees, that is to say, the factory of Dhunnuggur, the factory of Lukhpoore, the factory of Cheechooa, the factory of Puddundee, and the factory of Shalghur Muddhoora, together with my person and heirs, are held bound. If I fail to pay the whole of the money due to you, together with interest, after deduction of the remitted money, agreeably to the condition written, then the remission of the money that you have now made under the amicable settlement is not to hold good; and the [243] said remitted money will be justly due by me, and you will realize it by the sale of the hypothecated factories, and from me, my heirs, representatives, and executors, and in the event of any other person purchasing the said factories, from the said purchasers; and you will file Dustburdaree (a petition for leave to withdraw a suit) in the cases in which you have had decrees enforced. You will also file Dustburdaree in the purchase made on your part in consequence of the sale ordered by the Judge, who had rejected the receipt filed regarding the payment of the amount of summary decree in No. 291, due by the judgment debtor, Hur Soondrea Debea, of Turruff Subonee. I give up my claims to the action instituted against you in the Dewanny Adawlut of Zillah Jessore, for excess of rent of Dehee Kuppoorhaut, and to the actions that I have instituted to set aside the three summary decrees against Kishen Chunder Chuckerbutty, which you have realized by causing sale to be made; and I will file Dustburdaree in the said suits, and whatever costs and expenses may be incurred in the said matter will be borne by me. Should Mr. Kenny hereafter prefer any claims against you in any other way, I will become answerable for the same, and they will have no connection with you, therefore I have executed this Ikrar."

The Ikrarnamah contained no stipulation as to the place where the instalments were to be paid, nor did it appear from the evidence that the Appellant intimated his wishes on the subject in writing.

Upon the day of the execution of this instrument, the Appellant and the Respondent, Masseyk, severally presented petitions for withdrawal of the suit to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, at Calcutta, stating the par-[244]-ticulars of the amicable settlement which they had made with each other, and praying that the Ikrarnamah, and petitions of Dustburdaree should be admitted, and the suit be struck off the list of pending cases, and that the Ikrarnamah, together with the Mookhternamah, or power of attorney, under which it was executed (both of which were filed with the petitions), should be delivered to the Appellant, all which was accordingly ordered by the Court.

The Appellant resided in the Zillah of Nuddea, at some distance from Jessore. The Mooktar, or agent of the Appellant, one Deb Coomar Rae, resided at Jessore, and held a general power to conduct on the part of the Appellant the cases relating to Ijarah Mehals, to which the Appellant was a party in the Civil Courts of Jessore, and to receive and to grant receipts in the Appellant's name, for any moneys due to the Appellant that were deposited, whether in the Civil Courts or in the office of the Collector. Accordingly, on the 10th Magh, 1257 (22nd of January, 1851), the day fixed by the Ikrarnamah, the Respondent, Masseyk, tendered to Deb Coomar Rae payment of Rs. 6000, the amount of the first instalment of the portion still unpaid of the sum of Rs. 25,000, which the Appellant had agreed to accept in satisfaction of the decrees which he had obtained against the Respondent, Kenny. Deb Coomar Rae refused to receive the Rs. 6000, alleging that the Ikrarnamah was not with him, but was in the house of the Appellant; but he promised at the same time, that he would send for the Ikrarnamah, and receive the money, and said that no interest should be charged after the day of tender.

Deb Coomar Rae not having performed this pro-[245]-mise, the Respondent, Masseyk, on the 8th of February, 1851, presented a petition to the Civil Court of Jessore, stating that he had been tendering payment since the 10th Magh to the Appellant's Mooktar, in the Zillah of Jessore, of the Rs. 6000, that were payable upon that date, but that the Mooktar had not taken the money, and that the object was not to take the money in accordance with the conditions of the deed, but thereafter to increase the interest.

As there was no suit pending before the Court concerning this matter, the Court refused to make any order upon the petition.

On the 12th of February in that year, the Appellant presented a counter petition, in which, without denying that payment of Rs. 6000, had been tendered to his Mooktar, alleged that if the Respondent, Masseyk, had intended to pay the money, there was nothing to have prevented his paying the money to the Appellant at Beernugger, and having the payment entered on the back of the deed; and he expressed his readiness to receive the money from the Respondent, Masseyk, in the presence of the Court, and to file a petition of relinquishment in the cases in which the Ikrarnamah bound him to do: but he did not offer to produce the Ikrarnamah, and enter the payment on the back of it, as required by the Ikrarnamah; and he intimated an intention to require payment of the remitted sum of Rs. 8589 15a. 3p., in consequence of the Rs. 6000 not having been paid to himself on the 10th Magh.

On the 19th of February, 1851, the Respondent, Masseyk, again petitioned the Court, insisting that the intended payment should be entered upon the back [246] of the deed, and praying that notice should be given to the Appellant to attend the Court, either in person or by Mooktar, or a Vakeel of the Court, to receive the Rs. 6000, and to permit the payment to be entered on the back of the deed. The Judge thereupon ordered that notice should be served, for the Appellant to receive the money from the Respondent, Masseyk.

The Appellant took no steps in the matter till after the 10th of Cheyete, when the second instalment became due. Then, on 12th Cheyete, 1257 (24th of March, 1851), he produced the deed to the Court, along with a petition, in which he expressed his willingness to receive the whole of the money of the instalments due 10th Magh and 10th Cheyete, with interest, and to allow them to be entered on the back of the deed; but he insisted that the money remitted by that instrument had become payable in full, and reserved his right to demand it. In this petition he asserted that at the time when the Ikrarnamah was executed, the Respondent, Masseyk, agreed that he would send the money to the house of the Malyamindar, or surety of the Appellant's lease, and have entry of payment made on the back of the deed.

On the 28th of March, the first instalment of Rs. 6000 was paid in Court to Deb Coomar Rae, the Mooktar of the Appellant, and the payment was entered on the back of the deed.

The second instalment, which had become due on the 10th Cheyete, before the Appellant thought fit to receive the first instalment, was paid under the following circumstances:—Upon the 14th Cheyete the day on which the first instalment had been received [247] by Deb Coomar Rae, the second instalment, consisting of Rs. 3245 in bank notes, and Rs. 4208. 11a. in cash, making in all Rs. 7453. 11a., was tendered on behalf of the Respondent, Masseyk, to Deb Coomar Rae, who said that his dwelling was in the midst of a jungle, that he had not people with him, and that he could not receive so large a sum in cash without sending to his employer at Beernugger, and obtaining thence Beerkundazes, or armed servants, to convey it, and requested that the money might be kept for four days, stating that the interest would cease from that day. Five days after this, and on the 2nd of April, 1851, he said that the Respondent might give him what money he wished to pay, and enter payment on the back of the Ikrarnamah; that he was willing to receive the money, but that he would not be able to return the deed, having been forbidden by his employer to do so.

The day after this communication, the Respondent, Masseyk, presented a petition to the Court, in which he complained of the refusal to take the money and return of the deed, and then tendered the money, praying that Deb Coomar Rae should be sent for, and return to him the Ikrar Kistbundee. On the next day the Appellant presented a petition to the Court, in which, without denying the statements of the Respondent, Masseyk, in his petition, he insisted that the whole of the remitted money had become due, with interest, through the default of the Respondent, Masseyk, and offered to return the deed on receiving payment of it in full; but expressed himself willing to allow him to pay whatever money he might consider to be due, and to enter the payment thereof on the back of the [248] deed, after which he would sue for the remitted money.

After some delay the Respondent, Masseyk, on the 5th July, presented another petition to the Court, and tendered Rs. 7540. 10a. Sp., with an account, showing that this sum constituted the whole principal payable by him, with interest up to the 14th Cheyte, the day on which the tender was made; and he prayed that the money should be received by the Court and paid to the Appellant, and payment entered on the back of the deed, and that the deed should be ordered to be returned to him. That sum was paid to the Mooktar of the Appellant, and payment endorsed upon the original deed, which, however, was not given up to the Respondent, Masseyk.

The Respondent, Kenny, afterwards purchased back the indigo concern from the Respondent, Masseyk, taking over the debts and credits.

On the 21st of December, 1853, the Appellant filed his plaint in the Civil Court of Zillah of Jessore, against both the Respondents, for the amount of the remitted money with interest. In the pleadings, he, for the first time, objected to the tender made to Deb Coomar Rae, on the ground that the latter was not authorized to receive any money, except that which was in deposit in the Civil Court.

The Respondent, Kenny, alone appeared to the suit, and, by his answer, admitted his possession of the factories, and also the execution of the Ikrarnamah of the 25th September, 1850, but contended and submitted that the real intent of the condition therein was not as contended for by the Appellant, and averred that the Appellant had not been put to, or [249] suffered any, trouble or loss in that behalf. He further alleged, that the Appellant had been guilty of fraud in not receiving the money, stating that the first instalment was Rs. 6000 only, and had been duly tendered to the Mooktar of the Appellant at Jessore; and the answer also averred that the second instalment due on the 22nd of March, 1851, had also been duly tendered to the same Mooktar by a tender made on the 26th of March, 1851, when the Mooktar stated that no interest would be charged from that date; and after stating the ultimate payment of the above two sums to the Appellant, he denied the Appellant's right to recover any further sum under the Ikrarnamah.

The Appellant by his replication denied that the Respondent, Kenny, had rightly interpreted the condition in the deed. He also denied that any tender had been made within the stipulated time, and contended that, even if made to the Appellant's Mooktar at Jessore, the same would not have been a sufficient tender, as it ought necessarily to have been made to the Appellant himself, and not to his Mooktar, who had no authority in that behalf from the Appellant. He also expressly denied that any tender had been made in respect of the second instalment, and contended that, if made as alleged, it would not have been a good tender, the money having previously become due on the 22nd of March, 1851.

No witnesses were examined by the Appellant. The Respondent produced as evidence on his part an attested copy of the Mookhtarnamah granted by this Appellant to Jeb Coomar Rae, his Mooktar at Jessore, and he also examined several witnesses. The evidence of these witnesses was to the effect, that the [250] money due for the two instalments was tendered on two occasions to the Appellant's Mooktar at Jessore, and that such money belonged to and was sent by the Respondent, Kenny, by whose agent the tenders were alleged to have been made; that the sum first tendered was Rs. 6000, only; that the tender of the second sum was on the 25th or 26th of March, the second instalment being fixed on by the Ikrarnamah as payable on the 22nd of March; that on both occasions the Appellant's Mooktar declined to receive the money, and stated that he had not the original Ikrarnamah, and that on the second occasion he stated that he had no means of securing the money, and could not receive it till he had procured people for that purpose from the Appellant, but that on both occasions the agent declared that the tenders should have the effect of preventing the interest continuing to run. The Appellant's Mooktar was summoned as a witness by the Respondent, but he did not appear.

The hearing of the suit took place on the 30th of June, 1855, when the Principal Sudder Ameen (Baboo Opendur Chunder Nayerutton) dismissed the suit. By this judgment the Principal Sudder Ameen found that the Respondent, Kenny, had proved the tender and payment of the instalments to the Mooktar. On the question as to the nature of the condition in the deed, the judgment of the Court was as follows:—"In the next place, even had there been any fault on the part of the Defendants in respect to this, yet the Plaintiff cannot obtain the said money, because had the Defendants failed to pay the instalment, the condition of the Ikrar would have been rendered null, and the Plaintiff would have become [251] entitled to the whole of the amount that had been due on the decrees. It was incumbent on him not to have taken the money that the Defendants had deposited, and to have resorted to such measures as were necessary for the realization of the entire sum of money. By his not having so done, and by his having taken the money deposited by the Defendants without his consent, it is to be considered that he himself had set aside the said condition, and realized the money; otherwise it was proper for him, at the time of taking the said money, to have made the Defendants admit their fault in not having paid the money (in accordance with the specified time), and then to have taken the said money. When the Plaintiff did not so act, but took the money according to his pleasure, it is to be concluded that he had taken the money, having himself relinquished the claim to receive the money that he had remitted. With regard to the sentence that he has written in his petition to the Judge with a view to his own benefit, that he will hereafter institute an action on a claim for this very money, that cannot remedy his defect; it is, therefore, ordered that the suit be dismissed, and that the Plaintiff pay the Defendants' costs with interest from this date to the date of realization."

The Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, submitting, as grounds of appeal, first, that the whole of the original debt was recoverable, the two several instalments not having been paid in conformity with the conditions in the Ikrarnamah, and within the stipulated time; secondly, that having expressly, by his petition filed in Court, reserved his rights, and received the two sums paid to him as aforesaid in part payment only, and without prejudice to his right to recover the whole original [252] debt, he could not be barred thereby from recovering the balance.

To these grounds the Respondent, Kenny, who alone appeared to the appeal, by his answer, contended, first, that the Appellant having fraudulently and purposely neglected to receive the money at the appointed times, the Respondents were never in default, and the whole original debt could not, therefore, be claimed; and, secondly, that Appellant's claim was barred by his having received the two instalments paid to him.

The hearing of the appeal took place on the 22nd of January, 1857, when the Judges of the Sudder Court, consisting of Messrs. Colvin, Sconce and Torrens, unanimously dismissed the appeal, with costs.

From this decree of affirmance, the present appeal was brought.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—No legal and sufficient tender of the first or second instalments has been proved to have been made to any one who had the authority and legal capacity to receive the same for the Appellant. Now, the Ikrarnamah expressly provides, that if default be made in paying the balance due with interest thereon, according to the particular conditions prescribed by that instrument, the sum of money which had been agreed to be deducted from the original debt should become, ipso facto, due and recoverable. Here the interest was not tendered. Then as default was established, and neither of the two instalments of the balance due having been paid at the date, or at any time in full according to the conditions, the Respondent was, upon the breach, entitled to the sum sued [253] for. In Davies v. Penton (6 Bar. and Cress. 216), it was held that as an agreement had not been complied with, a condition annexed, that in the event of non-compliance, the remission was not to be allowed was a penalty which could be recovered at law. Ford v. The Earl of Chesterfield (19 Beav. 428) is on all fours with the present case. There a mortgagee agreed to take a portion of his debt, in lieu of the whole, upon payment upon a given day, and that not being done, the Court of Chancery refused to give relief against the effect of its non-payment on that day. [Lord Kingsdown. — That case differs from the present. Here it was not a debt for which Masseyk was liable.] Time was the essence of the contract, and punctual payment the very consideration for the remission of part of the debt. Davis v. Thomas (1 Russ. and Myl. 506). It is an idle excuse to say that as there was no place mentioned in the Ikramamah where the money was to be paid, that he could not pay the Appellant himself. The answer to that argument is, that where there is no agreed place of payment, the residence of the creditor or his place of business was the proper place, which ought to have been found out by the debtor, and the principal and interest then due paid to him, which has not been acted upon here.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. W. Macpherson, for the Respondents. — The full amount secured by the Ikramamah, with interest, has been received by the Appellant. That instrument does not specify any place of payment, nor did the Appellant ever appoint a place either for payment or for the production of the deed, nor was [254] payment on the day an essential part of the contract. The facts differ from Ford v. The Earl of Chesterfield, which does not apply. The Respondent, Masseyk, was ready with the money, and used all reasonable means to compel the Appellant to receive the same at the time appointed. The sum of Rs. 33,589. 15a. 3p. mentioned in the Ikramamah was intended merely as a penalty to secure the payment of Rs. 25,000 with interest. There was a substantial effort to pay on the part of the Respondent, while the Appellant avoided the receipt of the money, for the purpose of founding his claim to the larger amount. If the conditions of the Ikramamah have not been literally performed, such non-performance was owing to the conduct of the Appellant himself. It was not necessary to tender a specific sum, Ashmole v. Wainwright (2 Q. Ben. Rep. 837).

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 18, 1860).—This is a suit brought by the Appellant to recover Rs. 12,829, alleged to be due to him from the Respondents under an Ikramamah, or agreement.

It appears that the Appellant was the lessee of certain lands in the Zillah of Jessore, and that the Respondent, Kenny, who was the proprietor of several indigo factories in that District, was under-lessee of a portion of the property.

The Appellant alleged that a large sum was due to him from Kenny for rent, and he brought several actions in the Zillah Court of Jessore to recover the amount, and issued attachments against Kenny's factories and other property.

[255] In 1850, while this litigation was pending, the other Respondent, Masseyk, intervened, and alleged that he had become the purchaser of the interest of Kenny, and he objected to any sale being made under the attachments.

He obtained an order to stay the sale under four of the attachments, from which order the present Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and that appeal was pending at the time when the engagement on which the question before us was raised, was entered into by Masseyk; besides which three other execution of decree cases were pending for trial in the Zillah, and other actions were brought by Masseyk against the Appellant.

In this state of things the instrument in question was executed by Masseyk, on the 25th of September, 1850.

It is in the Bengalee form and language, and is addressed by Masseyk to the Appellant. It recites the circumstances already stated, and that Masseyk was desirous of coming to an amicable settlement for the money due to the Appellant, that the amount due to the Appellant from Kenny had been proved to be Rs. 33,589 15a. 3p., and of which under an amicable settlement Masseyk had agreed to pay to the Appellant Rs. 25,000, and that the Appellant had agreed to receive that sum and make a remission.

The agreement then states that certain sums had already been received by the Appellant in part of the Rs. 25,000; that at the time of the execution of the instrument Rs. 10,000, more had been paid to the Appellant through his Mooktar, leaving Rs. 12,713; and that Masseyk agreed to pay this sum, with interest, from the 1st

Bladoon (16th August, 1850) by [256] two instalments, one of Rs. 6000, for principal, on the 10th Magh (22nd of January, 1851), and the other of Rs. 6719, for principal, on the 10th Cheyre (23rd of March, 1851). In what way the interest was to be paid we will consider presently. The payments were to be endorsed on the back of the Ikrar; then follow these words:—"And whatever sum of money I may at any time pay, you will first deduct the interest money out of that, and credit the balance for principal."

The factories are then pledged for the payment of this money, as well as the personal liability of Masseyk. Then follow these words:—"If I fail to pay the whole of the money due to you, together with interest, after deduction of the remitted money, agreeably to the condition written, then the remission of the money that you have now made under the amicable settlement is not to hold good, and the said remitted money will be justly due by me, and you will realize it by the sale of the hypothecated factories, and from me, my heirs, representatives, and executors, and in the event of any other person purchasing the said factories from the said purchaser." Provision is then made for putting an end to the several suits subsisting between the different parties.

It is to be observed that, although the debt from Kenny to the Appellant might be Rs. 33,589, 15a., 3p., it by no means followed that the property which Masseyk had purchased was liable to the payment of the whole of that sum: and, whatever might be the liability of the property, Masseyk was, previously to this agreement, under no personal liability. By the agreement he made himself personally liable to the extent of Rs. 25,000, for the debt of another; of [257] which sum nearly half was actually paid at the time; and these payments made, and to be made, were part of an arrangement for a general settlement of the various disputes then pending between the parties, and for the dismissal of the suits.

There is nothing in the agreement which makes the payment of the instalments on the days fixed on the essence of the contract, unless that stipulation is to be inferred from the words, "If I fail to pay agreeably to the condition written."

Instead of there being in any other part of the agreement anything to favour this construction, the nature of the engagements on each side, and the clause to which we have referred as to any payments on account being applied first to payment of interest, appear to us to furnish an implication to the contrary.

It being a part of the agreement that the suits in the Zillah Court and the Sudder Dewanny Court should be abandoned, the Vakeels of both parties, on the day of the date of the agreement, brought it under the notice of the Sudder Dewanny Court by petition. It was also, on the same day, brought to the notice of the Zillah Court.

The first instalment of Rs. 6000, became due on the 22nd of January, 1851: it was not actually paid till the 21st of March, 1851.

The second instalment became due on the 23rd of March, 1851, and was not received by the Appellant until the 5th of July, 1851. Under these circumstances the Appellant has brought his action against Masseyk and Kenny, insisting that the agreement has not been performed according to its tenor, and that he is, therefore, entitled to receive the [258] payment of the whole amount of 8,000 and odd rupees, which, he says, were only to be remitted on the condition of the less sums being paid punctually on the specific days mentioned in the agreement.

On the part of the Respondent it is contended, that payment on the day was no essential part of the contract; that this is not the case of a creditor engaging to remit to his debtor a portion of his demand in consideration of his making payment of smaller sums punctually at fixed periods, in which case the punctuality of payment is the only consideration which the creditor receives for his indulgence; that this case does not, therefore, fall within the principle of Ford v. The Earl of Chesterfield (19 Bear. 428), relied on by the Appellant, but is a case in which a third person, being under no liability, consents to incur that liability, and binds himself in a penalty for the due performance of his engagement.

The Judges of the Zillah Court, and all the Judges of the Sudder Court, have decided against the claim of the Plaintiff, the present Appellant; and their Lordships have to consider whether any sufficient reasons have been urged for disturbing those decisions.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that they ought not to apply to this case the nice technicalities of English law, that they must look at the agreement with a view to see what the real intention of the parties was, and must inquire whether it appears upon the evidence that there has been any failure by the Respondents in the substantial performance of the contract, and if there has been any default, to whom such default is attributable.

It appears to their Lordships to be sufficiently [259] proved, that on the 10th Magh, the Respondent, Masseyk, through his Mooktar, offered to pay to Deb Coomar Rae, the Mooktar of the Appellant, in the Zillah of Jessore, the sum of Rs. 6000, as the first instalment due under the agreement, and that Deb Coomar Rae declined to receive it, alleging that he had not in his possession the Ikrarnamah on which the receipt of the money was to be indorsed. This instrument is said to have been in the possession of the Appellant himself, who resided at some distance from Jessore.

It is objected, on the part of the Appellant, to this offer: First, that the offer did not include the interest which ought at that time to have been paid. Second, that Deb Coomar Rae had no authority to receive the money on behalf of the Appellant. Third, that the Respondent was bound to seek out the Appellant on the day of payment, and to tender to him the exact amount of principal and interest then due.

First. Their Lordships, on consideration, are of opinion (contrary to the impression which they at first entertained) that by the agreement the interest on the Rs. 12,719, up to the day of payment was to be paid at the same time with the Rs. 6000, and that, therefore, if it were necessary to prove a strict legal tender, such tender was not made; but they are satisfied that the omission to include the interest arose merely from a misapprehension of the ambiguous words of the agreement, and that such omission was not the reason why the money was refused, and they think that a strict legal tender was not necessary.

Second. They are by no means satisfied that Deb Coomar Rae had not authority to receive the money. He has not been examined by the Appellant, and he [260] was summoned as a witness by the Respondent and he failed to appear. He was the person through whom, if the attachments against the property had been prosecuted, the money would have been recovered, and to whom it would have been paid in the Zillah Court; and he was, therefore, the person to whom the Respondent might well imagine that the Ikrarnamah, on which the payment of the money was to be indorsed, would be transmitted by the Appellant. There seems no improbability in the statement of the Respondent's witnesses that Deb Coomar Rae said that he would send for the Ikrarnamah that the indorsement might be made upon it.

Third. There seems to have been uncertainty on both sides as to the place at which the Ikrarnamah was to be produced and the money was to be paid. The instrument was executed at Calcutta, where the Appellant had a Mooktar; it related to property at Jessore, where the Appellant had another Mooktar. The deed had been sent from Calcutta to be produced in the Zillah Court of Jessore. The Appellant resided at Beernugger, and had a place of business at Kishnugger. It is stated by the Respondent that it was verbally settled, after the execution of the Ikrar, that the money should be paid to the Appellant's Mooktar in the Zillah of Jessore, and that the Appellant would send the Ikrar to him. There is, however, no proof of this. On the other hand, the Appellant does not allege that there was any place fixed, either by agreement or by custom, or by rule of law, where the payment should be made. He suggested, indeed, at different times in the course of the proceedings, that the payment or tender might have been made to his Mooktar at Calcutta, or to himself [261] at his house at Beernugger, or at the house of the Malzamendar of the Ejarah. To these the place of business of the Appellant at Kishnugger was added in the discussion at our Bar as a proper place for making the tender.

Upon the whole their Lordships are satisfied that there was a bona fide endeavour on the part of the Respondent fairly to perform his engagement, and that there is much reason to believe, with some of the Judges in the Court below, that there was a desire on the part of the Appellant to throw obstacles in the way of the performance, in order to obtain payment of the penalty which he expected would be the consequence of non-performance.

The principle of these observations applies to the second instalment as well as the first, and their Lordships have arrived without hesitation at the conclusion that the main ground of the appeal entirely fails, and that if the Appellant has received the full amount of the principal sum of Rs. 12,719, with interest upon that sum till the time of payment, he has received everything which he can justly claim.

They are not, however, satisfied that he has received the full amount of interest which he might reasonably demand; because it appears that with respect to the last instalment there was an interval of several months, during which time no interest was calculated, the delay of payment during that period having arisen, as it is suggested, from the accidental absence of the European Judge from Jessore. It appears, however, that this point is not stated in the reasons of appeal laid before the Sudder Court, nor does it appear to have been suggested below. The sum would, probably, have been allowed if it had been [262] asked, and if it had been refused the amount would have been far below that for which an appeal to this country can be brought.

Under these circumstances, their Lordships think they would not be justified in modifying on this ground the order which they must humbly advise Her Majesty to make, namely, an order that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

DOORGA DOSS CHOWDRY,—Appellant: RAMANAUTH CHOWDRY, and Others,—Respondents * [Dec. 5, 1860].

Costs of suit cannot be added to the principal sum and interest, in calculating the appealable value of Rs. 10,000, the amount restricted by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838.

This was an application by Doorga Doss Chowdry for special leave to appeal from a decree of the Sudder Court reversing a previous decree of the Zillah Court of Rajshahyl, in a suit instituted in the year 1857, by the Petitioner against Ramanauth Chowdry, the executor of one Kallykanth Lahory, deceased, to recover the principal and interest due on a Bond conditioned for the payment of the sum of Rs. 8250, and interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, alleged to have been executed by the deceased in favour of the Petitioner.

[263] It appeared that the Petitioner's claim was laid in the plaint at Rs. 9274. 6a., including the interest due, in order to fix the value of the stamp, in accordance with Ben. Reg. IV. of 1793. The cause was heard on the 23rd of October, 1857, when the Principal Sudder Ameen decided in favour of the Petitioner, and decreed that the Petitioner receive the total of the amount of the claim, Rs. 9274. 6a., and the interest on the principal sum during the period the suit was pending trial, and costs, together with interest on the consolidated sum from that date up to the day of realization.

Ramanauth Chowdry, the Defendant, appealed to the Sudder Court at Calcutta, from this decree, and that Court, on the 29th of February, 1860, reversed the decree of the Zillah Court, and allowed the appeal, with costs.

The amount originally laid in the plaint being under Rs. 10,000, the appealable value fixed by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, no application was made by the Petitioner to the Sudder Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, but the present petition was presented for liberty to enter and prosecute such appeal.

Mr. Leith, for the Petitioner, submitted, that the original decree being for a sum of Rs. 9274. 6a., which with the additional interest accrued due and payable thereon since the date of the plaint, under the provisions of the Bond, and the decree of the Zillah Court, together with the costs of suit, would exceed Rs. 10,000, and that sum must be considered as the value of the matter in dispute, which would bring the case within the intent and meaning of [264] the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, and that the Petitioner was, therefore, entitled to appeal.

Mr. W. Field, for the Respondents, contra.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—The amount absolutely decreed by the Court is Rs. 9274. 6a., the interest added to that for the time specified, at 8 per cent., would, according to the Petitioner's calculation, raise the sum due to Rs. 9310, that is under the appealable sum. It has been determined a short time ago by their Lordships, in the case of Maharajah Sutterschunder Roy v. Gangeschunder (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 164-8; see also Gooroo persad Khound v. Juggutshunder, 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 166), that the Sudder Courts have no authority under the Order in Council of the 10th April, 1838, to add the interest accruing subsequent to the decree to the capital sum decreed for the purpose of reaching the appealable amount; here the interest, under any circumstances, would not be sufficient, for, to arrive at the necessary amount, you must add, as you seek to do, the costs. Now, the costs of a suit are no part of the subject matter in dispute, and cannot be used for the purpose you seek; if they were allowed to be added to the principal sum claimed, it would be in the power of every litigant, by swelling the costs, to bring any suit up to the appealable value. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion, that the sum in issue in this suit is not sufficient to bring the case within the Order in Council, and no merits are stated which entitle the Petitioner to the special favour he asks. They refuse the application, with costs.

[265] JOYKISSEN MOOKERJEE,—Appellant: THE COLLECTOR OF EAST BURDWAN and Others,—Respondents * [Dec. 5, 1860].

On petition from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Special leave to appeal given in a case involving a question of tenure service, called Chakeeran, although the subject matter in dispute was below the appealable value; there being many other suits depending on the decision of the case.

This was a petition for special leave to appeal in a case in which the sum in dispute was laid at Rs. 200 only, but which involved an important question of tenure of certain land, as well as of other lands sought to be resumed, respecting which no less than thirty suits were brought.

The object of the suit in question was to resume and recover possession of 19 Beegahs of land situate in the Mouzah of Gobinpore, of which the Petitioner was the Talookdar from one Ahmud Buksh, alleged to be held by him on a tenure called Chakeeran (lands held by servants in lieu of wages), and which had been originally assigned to him on the condition of his rendering and performing certain services and duties connected with the Petitioner's Talook, such duties being to guard the house of the Talookdar, the [266] Mal-cutcherry, and the village; and that as he had ceased to perform those duties, the Petitioner was entitled to resume the land; but, nevertheless, the Defendant retained possession of the land, insisting that the land which the Petitioner claimed was Malguzary, by reason of which, and other Government claims, the Petitioner was compelled to make the Collector of Burdwan, the Zillah in which the lands were situate, a co-defendant.

It appeared that this suit was only one out of thirty which had been commenced about the same time, and under similar circumstances, by other Talookdars, in respect to the Chakeeran lands, against other parties, for having been deprived of similar services by their tenants.

The Petitioner obtained decrees in his favour by the Principal Sudder Ameen in two of the suits, which declared that Petitioner had authority to resume the lands in question under sec. 14 Ben. Reg. VIII of 1793.

From these decrees the Government obtained special leave to appeal, and the suits were remanded for trial on certain issues then fixed, which the Petitioner alleged were not properly adhered to by the Judge of the Zillah Court, to whom the cause was referred: and who by his decree dismissed the Petitioner's suit. The Petitioner appealed from this decision to the Sudder Court, the Judges of which affirmed the decree of the Court below, stating their opinion, on the question of tenure, against the Petitioner's right to resume.

Under these circumstances, and the case being one involving a question of tenure on which many holdings depended, and in which there were other suits already pending, the Petitioner prayed for liberty to appeal.

[267] Mr. Leith, for the Petitioner, relied on the circumstances above stated, and the importance of the question at issue, and the number of suits involving the same right. Upon the question of value, Spooner v. Juddow (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 353; see also Sumbhoolall Girdhurlall v. The Collector of Surat, ante, p. 17) was cited; and the public importance of the nature of the tenure, Raja Lelanund Sing Bahadoor v. The Government of Bengal (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 101) referred to.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, on behalf of the Collector of East Burdwan and the Government, opposed the application, insisting, first, on the extreme smallness of the amount at issue as precluding an appeal; and, secondly, the want of sufficient evidence that the other suits involved the same question, or would be governed by any decision in this case. They contended that the Petitioner ought to have produced an affidavit of that fact.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—Their Lordships are of opinion that this is a fit case to advise the allowance of a special appeal. They reserve the question of costs; security to the amount of £300, must, however, be given by the Petitioner.

[268] GOURMONEY DEBIA.—Appellant: KHAJA ABDOL GUNNY,—Respondent * [Dec. 5, 1860].

Appeal admitted from the Sudder Court at Calcutta, in a case where the land sued for was laid in the plaint as under Rs. 10,000; upon evidence stating the value of the property much to exceed that sum.

This was an application for special leave to appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, of Calcutta, affirming a previous decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen in a suit instituted by an alleged mortgagee against the Petitioner, a purchaser for valuable consideration in possession of certain lands, the possession of which was sought to be obtained by the suit.

It appeared that the value of the property was laid by the Plaintiff at Rs. 7182 odd, three times the amount of the annual jumma of the land, in order to fix the amount of the stamp to be used on the plaint, although the purchase-money paid by the Petitioner amounted to Rs. 19,000.

The decrees in both Courts being against the Petitioner she presented a petition for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, praying, under the circumstances, for liberty to appeal from the decree of the Sudder Court.

The application was supported by depositions taken in India as to the value of the property in question, made by two native residents, who stated that the actual value of the property was of much larger amount than Rs. 10,000. The statements in the petition were verified by the affidavit of the Solicitor in the appeal, who deposed to their being taken from the record of the proceedings in the suit.

Mr. Leith, for the Petitioner.

Their Lordships allowed the appeal, on security being given by the Appellant to the amount of £300, subject, as the application was ex parte, to the Order admitting the appeal being dismissed, on application by the Respondent.

[270] SALIK RAM and HURARAM.—Plaintiffs: AZIM ALI BEG.—Defendant *
[March 24, 1862].

On petition from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner for the Province of Oude.

No provision by Statute, or Charter, being made for appeals to Her Majesty in Council from judgments of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oude, created on the annexation of that Kingdom in the year 1858, the Judicial Committee, to prevent the denial of justice, admitted an appeal, under Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41.

This was a special application for leave to appeal from a judgment of the Judicial Commissioner for the Province of Oude, pronounced in a suit in which the Petitioners were Plaintiffs, and Azim Ali Khan, Defendant.

The facts which gave rise to the application were these:—

In the month of February, 1856, the Kingdom of Oude was annexed to the territories of the East India Company, and became the Province of Oude, belonging to the Government of India.

By a despatch of the Governor-General in Council, dated the 4th of February, 1856 (Parl. Papers relating to Oude, 1866, p. 257), Courts of Justice were established in the Province of Oude, including, amongst others, the Courts of the Judicial Commissioner, and of the Deputy-Commissioner for that Province; and it was ordered that the Judicial Commissioner should be charged with the direction and control of the administration of civil and criminal justice, and that he should be the ultimate Judge in all cases of a judicial character and that the Deputy-Commissioner should try all original suits for property real or personal exceeding in value Rs. 1000, and that an appeal should lie from his decision in such cases to the Commissioner, whose order was ordinarily to be final.

On the 7th of August, 1860, the Petitioners instituted a suit in the Civil Court of Lucknow, in the Province of Oude, before the Deputy-Commissioner, to recover the sum of Rs. 18,630, for principal and interest upon a bond. The point turned upon a question of limitation of time in bringing the suit; and that Court upon that question decided against the Plaintiffs, who appealed therefrom to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner for that Province, who, by his judgment, affirmed the decision of the Deputy-Commissioner. The Petitioners were desirous of appealing from such judgment of affirmance to Her Majesty in Council as being erroneous in law, and took the necessary steps by presenting a petition of appeal, within the ordinary time limited for appealing from the Courts in India. After inquiries by the Judicial Commissioner to the Government officer Mr. Campbell, as to his power to allow such an appeal, and a reference upon that point to the Advocate-General (who in a letter, dated the 9th of January, 1862, referred to the opinion of the Advocate-General to the Under-Secretary to the Government of India), the Judicial Commis-[272]-sioner refused to allow an appeal to Her Majesty in Council from his judgment (a).

(a) The following was the opinion given by the Advocate-General (Mr. W. Ritchie), and acted upon by the Judicial Commissioner:—

1st. In my opinion it is not competent to the Judicial Commissioner of Oude to allow a petition of appeal to Her Majesty in Council from any decision passed by him in any case, civil or criminal, or to suspend execution pending, or to take security regarding any such appeal, unless an Order to that effect shall have been obtained from Her Majesty in Council. But that it is quite competent to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to entertain a petition from any person aggrieved by a judgment of the Judicial Commissioner in any civil case of whatever amount, praying for leave to appeal from such judgment, and if such leave be granted, to order the transmission to the Privy Council of transcripts of the proceedings, and to hear and finally dispose of the appeal as fully as in the case of ordinary appeals.

2nd. It is true, as stated by Mr. Campbell, that appeals from the Supreme Courts and Sudder Courts of India, are regulated by positive Statute, and that there is no Statute, or positive law applicable to appeals from the Judicial Commissioner's decision, which are, for all ordinary purposes and so far as the constitution of his Court by the Governor-General in Council could make them, final. But the Queen in Council possesses by virtue of the Royal Prerogative, a clear appellate jurisdiction over the judgment of all Courts of Justice established in any of the British dominions beyond the seas, and notwithstanding the express statutory rights of appeal from the decisions of the Supreme Courts and the Sudder Courts, it has been repeatedly held that, notwithstanding the Statutes which prescribe the time and mode of appealing and the limits in point of amount, the power of the Queen in Council to entertain petitions, for leave to appeal where the conditions imposed by the Statute have not been complied with, remains in full force. Thus it is quite discretionary with the Judicial Committee to admit an appeal from the Supreme or Sudder Courts, in cases far below the appealable amount mentioned in the Statutes, and long after the period prescribed by the Statute for filing a petition of appeal in India has expired, such petitions have frequently been admitted, and have led to a reversal of the judgment of the Courts below. But these Courts have no power to allow or entertain a petition for leave to appeal, or to stay execution, or to take security for the costs of an appeal, except strictly in accordance with the terms of the Statute, or with any Order the Privy Council may make in the particular case.

3rd. Thus the course of any person wishing to appeal from a judgment of the Judicial Committee, will be to send to his agents or legal advisers in England, a copy of the judgment, and of so much of the proceedings as may suffice to render his case intelligible, and to show what his grounds of appeal are, and to instruct such agents to apply, by petition, to the Judicial Committee for leave to appeal from the judgment complained of. If the Judicial Committee think fit to grant such leave, it will cause notice to be given to the Judicial Commissioner's Court and to the Respondents in the cause, and all proceedings in the cause must then be translated and transmitted by the Court to England, in the mode usual in ordinary appeals from the Sudder Court, unless the Privy Council make any special Order as to the mode of transmission, or the documents to be sent. Until an order is made by the Privy Council, the Judicial Commissioner will have no jurisdiction to interfere in any way with the appeal, either in transmitting the record, staying execution, or otherwise. There can, however, be no objection, I apprehend, in cases which appear to him of sufficient magnitude to warrant an appeal, to his authenticating the copies or translations of the proceedings about to be sent home by persons contemplating an appeal.

4th. The Privy Council, in determining whether to admit or reject an appeal, will not be restricted to the amount which, in the Supreme and Sudder Courts, is the ordinary appealable amount, viz., Rs. 10,000, or to any particular limits of time, but it probably will require a very special case to be made out prima facie to its satisfaction, in order to induce it to admit an appeal for a lower amount than Rs. 10,000, or after the expiration of the ordinary time allowed for appealing.

[273] In consequence of this refusal the Petitioners, the original Plaintiffs, presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council, which after setting forth the above facts, and that the matter in dispute exceeded the sum of Rs. 10,000, and that important questions of law were involved in the suit, prayed for special leave to appeal from the judgment of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, and that that Court might be ordered to [274] transmit forthwith the transcript of the proceedings and the evidence in the suit.

Notice of the application for leave to appeal was served on the Secretary of State in Council of India.

Mr. E. J. Lloyd, Q.C., and Mr. L. W. Cave, in support of the petition.

Leave to appeal was refused by the Judicial Commissioner upon the ground that no power has been conferred upon him to allow an appeal. Upon this point they referred to the Parl. papers relating to Province of Oude, 1856, p. 257, par. 3; p. 267, pars. 44, 45, 46, 49; p. 273, pars. 80, 81. There is no positive Statute Law, Regulation, or Order in Council applicable to the admission of appeals from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner to Her Majesty in Council, and our application is for the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown to admit an appeal to prevent a denial of justice. Such power is conferred by Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, sec. 4. There is no question as to the appealable value. By the 21st Geo. III., c. 70, sec. 21, the appealable value in civil suits was limited to £5000, but by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, the appealable value is reduced to Rs. 10,000. The question of law involved is with respect to the operation of the Limitation Act, No. 14, of 1859, to suits brought before the Judicial Commissioner upon bonds, and is most important.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Their Lordships think this a fit case for allowing an appeal to Her Majesty in Council. Security for £300 must be lodged for costs. A similar application was made on the 4th July, 1862, in the case of Yamab Tajdur Bohoo v. Mirza Jehan, and leave to appeal granted. [For subsequent proceedings see 10 Moo. Ind. App. 252].

[S.C. 14 Moo. P.C. 329. Appeals now lie to Judicial Committee from Court of Judicial Commissioner of Oudh on same terms as from Indian High Courts; see Act X. of 1897, s. 3 (24); and Act XIV. of 1882, s. 595. On appeal from the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

Specific performance decreed of an agreement in the English form, made between husband and wife (Armenian Christians), in the nature of a family compromise, respecting the wife's separate property.

In the answer of the wife it was alleged, that property purchased by the husband had been concealed by him from her when she executed the agreement; held, in the circumstances, that that fact if proved was not sufficient to entitle the wife to treat the agreement as a nullity.

Held further that if the property said to have been concealed by the husband had been purchased by him out of moneys belonging to the wife's separate estate, which was clothed with a trust for the children of the marriage, the wife's remedy was, to enforce her own and children's rights by Bill, to compel a settlement of any property improperly withheld by the husband at the date of the execution of the agreement.

This was a Bill filed in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, by the Respondent, Cochrane, the Official assignee of the estate and effects of one Arathoon Hyrapret Arathoon, an Insolvent, against Catherine Arathoon, his wife, since deceased, and Vertannes Ter Martyroze, her trustee, to compel specific performance of an agreement, in the nature of a family compromise, entered into by her with her husband; and also to set [276] aside an execution under a decree, taken out by her subsequent to such agreement, whereby a house and premises belonging to her husband, was seized; and further to restrain her from receiving any dividends in respect of a debt proved by her against his estate, as being in contravention of such agreement. The defence was, first, that the agreement was vitiated by fraudulent misrepresentations, concealment, and suppression of facts by her husband, and in particular that at the time of the execution of the deed he was possessed of the house and premises, which fact he had concealed from her; and, secondly, that the house and premises were fraudulently purchased by the husband, out of the wife's separate estate entrusted to him as her legal guardian, she being a minor at the time of her marriage.

The facts and circumstances of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, appeared for the Appellant; and Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Maude, for the Respondents.

The cases of Attwood v. Small (6 Cl. and Fin. 232); Dietrichsen v. Cabburn (2 Phill. 52), were referred to in the argument.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (Feb. 6, 1861).—In this case the original appeal was brought by Catherine Arathoon, since deceased, against a decree of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, on the Equity side, which in effect set aside an execution issued by the original Appellant, and directed a reconveyance of the property seized and sold under it. Mrs. Arathoon [277] having died, the suit has been revived by the present Appellant, who is her personal representative.

The Respondent, Cochrane, is the Official assignee under the Insolvent Act of Arathoon Hyrapret Arathoon, the husband of the late Appellant, against whose property the execution in question was issued.

The husband and wife were both Armenian Christians. The marriage took place in the year 1836, the lady at that time being little more than twelve years of age, entitle to a large property, both real and personal, and under the wardship and protection of the Provincial Court of Dacca, where she resided.

Previously to the marriage, the future husband, at the instance of an aunt of the wife, signed an Ikrarnamah, or agreement, by which provision was made for some settlement of the real and personal estate of the wife. The instrument itself was destroyed by Arathoon, after the marriage, in a fit of passion, as he alleges, and the contents of it do not distinctly appear.

Though the marriage took place without the sanction of the Court, the husband was put into possession of the real and personal property of the wife. It is suggested in the Appellant's case, that he was so put into possession as the tutor and guardian of his wife during her minority, and that this was done in conformity with the Armenian law, by which their rights were to be governed. It does not appear that on this occasion the Ikrarnamah was brought under the notice of the Court.

There were several children of the marriage, which proved a very unhappy one; there were continual quarrels between the husband and wife; and at last they separated in 1845.

[278] In June, 1845, Mrs. Arathoon brought a suit against her husband, in the Zillah Court of Buckergunge, in which she stated that she had attained her majority; charged him with ill-treatment and malversation of her property; and prayed that he might be decreed to account for the same, and that she might be put into possession of the whole of her real and personal estate, which had been, as she alleged, entrusted to him as her legal guardian.

The husband, by his answer, insisted that the rights of the parties were to be governed by English law, and that by such law the proprietary right to his wife's real and personal estate had vested in him, and that the instrument which he had executed was not binding upon him.

On the 22nd of September, 1845, the suit was heard before the Judge of the Zillah Court, who held that the Armenian law was to prevail; that the husband by his conduct had put an end to the state of tutelage in which the Plaintiff was placed, and that her right to the control of her own property, which he stated to be undoubted according to the law, could no longer be withheld. He then declared that the wife was entitled, both by law and by virtue of the agreement entered into before the marriage, to have delivered up to her the whole of her real and personal property, and also to have an account of the bygone rents and profits, subject to a deduction in respect of the sums which the Defendant could prove that he had expended in the maintenance of the family during the time that the wife resided with him. The decree then, as we understand it, though the matter is not very clear, charged the Defendant with the value of all the real and personal property of the wife which [279] he was shown to have possessed, amounting to Rs. 3,99,510, of which about Rs. 1,86,000 was the value of the real, and the remainder the value of the personal estate.

Against this decree there was an appeal to the Sudder Court at Calcutta, by which the judgment of the Court below was affirmed on the 17th of August, 1848.

It is obvious that this decree involved the consideration of several important questions; whether the Armenian or the English law was to regulate the rights of the parties; and if the Armenian, whether by that law the wife was entitled to the whole of her real and personal estate, as if she were a feme sole, exempt from all claims on the part either of her husband or children (a notion not entirely consistent with the fact that the husband had been required before the marriage to execute an agreement renouncing or limiting his right); and, if so, whether the agreement had contained a provision limiting the wife's powers, and securing the property after the death of the parents to the children. If, on the other hand, the rights of the parties were to be regulated by the English law, it would be difficult upon any principles to maintain the decree.

It is insisted by the Appellant that this decree not having been made the subject of appeal within six months to Her Majesty in Council had become final, before the compromise which is the subject of the proceedings now before their Lordships was made, but their Lordships think that what afterwards took place removes any bar which could have been caused by lapse of time.

The decree in question had been made in the [280] absence of the children, who were not parties to the suit. There were, at this time, four children, all, of course, by our law, infants. Three were residing with their father, and one, the youngest, with the mother.

On the 2nd of August, 1848, a few days after the affirmance of the decree, a bill was filed in the Supreme Court of Calcutta in the names of the infant children of Mr. and Mrs. Arathoon, by the brother of Arathoon, as their next friend, against the father and mother. This Bill stated that by the terms of the agreement, or Ikrarnamah, executed by the husband before the marriage, the children were entitled in reversion to the whole real and personal property of the wife; that such agreement had been destroyed by Arathoon; that he was totally unable to pay the large debt awarded against him in his wife's suit; that he would be thrown into prison, and the children, who were residing with him, would be left to starve. The Bill prayed that the contents of the agreement might be ascertained, and that the rights of the children might be secured, and that the wife might be restrained by injunction from executing the decree which she had obtained, and by which the whole property in which the children were interested would be swept away.

It is suggested by the Appellant that the object of the children's suit was to defeat, without any appeal, the execution of the decree obtained by the wife, and that the suit was instituted in collusion with the husband, which is very possible. But however this may be, on the institution of the second suit, further proceedings in both suits were stayed, negotiations for an amicable settlement of the disputes between [281] the husband and wife were entered into, the parties came together again, and cohabited till the 30th of April, 1849.

It is clear that the time which elapsed during this interval could have no effect in barring Arathoon's right of appeal against the decree of the 17th of August, 1848.

On the 30th of April, 1849, the parties again separated. Mrs. Arathoon thereupon sued out a writ of execution under the decree of the 17th of August, 1848, and was put into possession of her real estates, in the receipt of the rents and profits of which her husband had been up to this time.

On the 12th of May, 1850, Arathoon sued out of the Supreme Court a writ of habeas corpus against his wife to recover possession of her youngest child, then a little more than three years old, who was living with his mother, and an order was made by the Chief Justice for the delivery of such child to the father.

On the 15th of May, 1849, Mrs. Arathoon filed her separate answer in the suit of the children. She denied that the Ikrarnamah signed by the husband contained any provision for the children, or any restriction upon her rights, or that she was at all bound by it if it did. She stated that, under the decree of August, 1848, she had obtained possession of her real estate, but that all her personal estate, and the mesne profits of her real estate, still remained to be recovered from her husband.

To enforce these claims she issued two writs of execution out of the Zillah Court, by one of which, dated the 21st of May, 1849, the Zillah Judge directed the Nazir of the Court to apprehend [282] Arathoon, unless he paid the sum of Rs. 1,15,620. 8a. 10p.; and by the other, dated the 29th of the same month, the Judge directed the same officer to levy of the lands, goods, and chattels of her husband the sum of Rs. 1,16,236. 8a. 9p., besides costs of suit.

How these sums were made out does not very distinctly appear, nor do we understand upon what principle the two writs were issued, one against the person and the other against the property of the husband, for different amounts, nor whether they were for different portions of the same debt, or whether the one was included in the other.

For the purposes of the present appeal, however, these questions are not very material. It is clear that both these writs were founded on the decree of the 17th of August, 1848; that the real estate awarded by that decree had been delivered up; and that the sum found due for personal estate, and rents and profits of the real estate, alone remained to be accounted for, subject to an allowance in respect of sums expended in maintenance.

In this state of the litigation in this unfortunate family, negotiations were entered into for the settlement of all their disputes. Agents and friends were employed on both sides: and at length, after a long interval of discussion, the terms were agreed upon, and were embodied in a deed in the English form, dated the 17th of July, 1849, which was made between Mrs. Arathoon of the first part, her husband of the second part, the next friend of the infants in their suit of the third part, and a formal party of the fourth part.

This deed contained a very full recital of the [283] disputes subsisting between the parties, and a statement of the personal property of the wife disposed of by the husband, or remaining in his hands, by which it appeared that Rs. 70,000, had been laid out in the purchase of a real estate in the Old China Bazar at Calcutta in his own name, and that Government promissory notes to the amount of Rs. 21,000, were still in his hands: and it then provided that all the suits and litigation should be terminated upon the terms subsequently stated. These were, in effect, that upon the children's suit being compromised by order of the Court, Mrs. Arathoon would enter up satisfaction on the judgments which she had obtained against her husband, and in the mean time suspend their execution; that the promissory notes in the hands of the husband should be made over to her; that the property situate in Calcutta should be vested in trustees, to be approved of by the Master, upon trust to pay the rents to Arathoon, he maintaining three of the children, who were to remain with him, and after his death to pay the rents to the wife, if she survived, and after the death of the husband and wife, in trust for all the children, and the issue of such as should die. It was then provided that one of the children already born, and the child of which the wife was then pregnant, should reside with her, and that the husband and wife should, in future, live separate, and a deed of separation and mutual releases were to be executed. The next friend of the infants was to obtain a reference to the Master, to inquire whether it would be for their benefit that their suit should be compromised on these terms, and the wife was to pay her own costs, and also the costs of the infant Plaintiffs in their suit.

[284] An order was accordingly obtained in the infants' suit for a reference to the Master, as provided by the agreement. The Master seems to have doubted whether he could sanction on their behalf, the proposed compromise, and he required, before he did so, that Arathoon should put in his answer. By his answer Arathoon admitted that the Ikrarnamah was to the effect stated in the Bill, and that in a fit of passion he had destroyed it; he said that at the time of the marriage he was a person of independent, though small, property, and he admitted that he was wholly unable to pay the large amount for which execution had been issued against him, or adequately to maintain the children.

The Master ultimately approved the compromise. His report was confirmed by the Court, which, on the 18th of February, 1850, made an order directing the compromise, as regarded the children, to be carried into effect, and a proper deed to be executed for conveying the estate in the Old China Bazar to trustees, upon the trust proposed by the agreement.

A deed was accordingly prepared and executed, bearing date the 25th of December, 1850, by which this estate was conveyed to two gentlemen of the names of Bagram and Voss. The promissory notes of the Government described in the deed of compromise, were transferred to Mrs. Arathoon. She remained in possession of her real estate; she lived separate from her husband without any interference by him, and she had the custody of the child who was to be retained by her, and also of that which was born subsequently to the agreement, and the suit of the children was put an end to. In short, she received the full benefit of every stipulation contained [285] in her favour in the deed of compromise, which, as regarded her interests, was in substance fully and completely executed.

She did not enter up, and probably was not called upon to enter up, satisfaction on the judgment which she had obtained against her husband, and on which writs of execution had been issued; this was a mere formal act.

The amount of the Government promissory notes which had been handed over to her, and the value of the Old China Bazar estate, now settled on the children, were included in the sums for which the executions had been issued, and by the transfer and conveyance under the terms of the compromise, these judgments had been actually satisfied.

Availing herself, however, of the circumstance that satisfaction had not been entered up, Mrs. Arathoon, on the 21st of January, 1853, while she was enjoying the benefits secured to her by the compromise, adopted the extraordinary proceeding of putting in force one of the writs of execution which had been thus satisfied, and seizing under it a house in Free School Street, Calcutta, as property belonging to her husband, and liable to her execution. The husband's interest in this house was sold by the Sheriff, and the house was purchased by Mrs. Arathoon, and in May, 1854, was conveyed to a trustee for her.

Arathoon hereupon took the benefit of the Insolvent Act. The Respondent, Cochrane, was appointed assignee, and, in the month of September, 1855, he filed against the late Appellant and the trustee for her, to whom the house in Free School Street had been conveyed, the Bill out of which the present appeal arises. This Bill insisted on the terms of the compromise, and [286] prayed that it might be declared binding upon the Defendant, Mrs. Arathoon, and that she might be decreed to enter up satisfaction on the decree or judgment in her suit, and that the house in Free School Street might be conveyed to the Plaintiff, as assignee of Arathoon.

The Defendant, by her answer, admitted the agreement, but alleged that she had been induced to enter into it by the positive statement of her husband, that except the Old China Bazar estate, he was possessed of no property whatever; while, in fact, he was at that time possessed of the house in Free School Street, which had been conveyed at the same time with the Old China Bazar estate to the same trustees; that the fact of such right of her husband to this property had been fraudulently concealed from her at the time of the compromise; and she insisted that, under the circumstances, she was well justified in seizing the Free School Street house under her writ of execution, and in refusing to enter up satisfaction on her judgment. She appended to her answer the copy of a notice which she had received from the trustees under the deed of the 25th of December, 1850, already referred to, in which it was stated that, by a deed of the same date, the house in Free School Street had been conveyed to them by Arathoon upon certain trusts for the benefit of himself, his wife, and children, which do not appear to differ very materially from those to which the Old China Bazar estate was subject.

Evidence was gone into, and at the hearing the Court was of opinion, that the defence was not made out in point of fact, and that if it had been it could not have been sustained in point of law.

[287] The decree ordered satisfaction to be entered on the judgment, and the estate in question to be conveyed to the Plaintiff, subject to any claims which might be established against it by the Trustees under the conveyance in trust, alleged to have been executed by Arathoon.

Their Lordships agree with the Court below in their opinions on all the points which they had to consider.

There is no evidence that Mrs. Arathoon in entering into the agreement of compromise acted under the belief that her husband was possessed of no real estate beyond that in the Old China Bazar. If she really was acting upon that assumption it was necessary, in order to make the fact of any importance, that it should have been communicated to her husband; for otherwise there could be nothing to require him to make any discovery of his property, or to subject him to any imputation of bad faith for omitting to do so. But no such communication appears ever to have been made, and there is no sufficient proof that Arathoon ever made, or was ever called upon to make, any disclosure as to the amount or particulars of his property, except as to purchases made with the money of his wife. There was no statement in his answer in the suit of the children that he had no real property except the Old China Bazar estate; and he had, and his wife could not be ignorant that he had, a share in a house in Calcutta which had belonged to his mother.

The grounds of the compromise are fully stated in the recitals of the deed. It is not pretended that such recitals are inaccurate, and from the beginning to the end there is no trace of the alleged statement [288] of the husband, nor of the pretence now set up that his state of destitution was any consideration for the wife entering into the compromise. He had, indeed, stated, what was equally true, whether the Free School Street house belonged to him or not, that he was unable to satisfy the judgment obtained by his wife. This lady received ample consideration for abandoning her writs of execution. She secured a separation from her husband. She got rid of any claim by him and by her children to any part of her real or personal estate, except the property in the Old China Bazar. She prevented any appeal against the decree which had been pronounced in her favour in the Sudder Court, and she secured the custody of two of her children.

That the inquiry as to Arathoon's property was confined to purchases made with the money of his wife, is clear from what took place in the month of March, 1850.

At that time Mr. Templeton, the solicitor of Mrs. Arathoon, supposed that Arathoon was the owner of the house in Free School Street; and he insisted that this house had been purchased with Mrs. Arathoon's money, and ought to be included in the settlement on the children. He wrote to this effect to Mr. Denman, the solicitor acting for the infants; and it is clear from the evidence, that both Mr. Denman and Mr. Templeton considered that the principle of the arrangement for the compromise was that all real estate which had been purchased with Mrs. Arathoon's money should be the subject of the settlement. This is perfectly consistent with the recital in the deed, and with the commission of a fraud by Arathoon in misrepresenting or concealing the fact that such pur-[289]-chase had been so made. But there is no trace of any claim being made on behalf of Mrs. Arathoon on the property at this time, supposing it to be the independent property of the husband, not purchased with her money, nor is there any complaint of misrepresentation or concealment by him, if that was the case. There was full opportunity of inquiring into the circumstances between the month of March, when the claim in question was brought forward, and the subsequent month of December, when the compromise was carried into effect; and the lady at that time acquiesced in the arrangement previously made, and accepted the benefits thereby given to her in satisfaction of her claims under the judgment.

On the whole, their Lordships are satisfied that no such fraud as is the foundation of the defence in this case has been established against her husband. If it had been it could not have been used as a defence in this suit, which is not one for the specific performance of an agreement remaining in fieri, and in which a Court of Equity has a discretionary power to grant or to refuse relief beyond the law. It is a Bill to set aside an act done in plain violation of an agreement which, in all its material parts, had been executed, and all the benefits of which the party violating it retained on her part, while as against the other party she treated it as a nullity.

There may be reason to suspect from the evidence that the house in Free School Street was purchased with the wife's money, and that if so purchased it ought to have been included in the settlement, and that it was kept out of the settlement by the fraudulent misrepresentations or concealment of the hus-[290]band. But on that hypothesis the proceedings of the wife are equally irregular. If the house was bound by a trust for the children it could not be subject to a writ of execution for her private debts. Her proper course would have been not to treat the agreement as a nullity, but to act upon it, and enforce it by a Bill to compel a settlement of the property which had been improperly withheld.

In truth, however, it appears that a settlement had been made of the house on trusts pretty much the same with those applicable to the property in the Old China Bazar.

On the whole, their Lordships agree both with the decision in the Court below, and with the reasons assigned for it in the extremely able judgment of the Chief Justice, and they must advise Her Majesty to affirm the decree complained of, with costs.

[291] LUCKMEE CHUND, and Others,—Appellants: ZORAWUR MULL, and Others,—Respondents* [Dec. 3, 1860].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Agra in the North-Western Provinces.

A contract was entered into at Rutlam, in the independent State of Malwa, between the firm of L., who resided and carried on business at Muttra, within the jurisdiction of the Zillah Court at Agra, and the firm of Z., carrying on business at Rutlam, and elsewhere; for the establishment of a co-partnership for the purchase and sale of opium. The co-partnership business was carried on principally at Muttra, and the business was conducted there by means of the capital advanced in the concern, by the firm of L., in which place the partnership books were kept. At the close of the partnership, which was attended with loss, a balance was struck at Muttra, which showed a debt due by the firm of Z. to the firm of L. In an action brought by the firm of L. against the firm of Z. in the Zillah Court of Agra, for recovery of the amount of this balance, it was pleaded by Z. that as the contract was made at Rutlam, where the firm resided, the Zillah Court at Agra had, by Ben. Reg. II., of 1803, no jurisdiction to entertain the action, which objection the Zillah Court allowed, and afterwards the Sudder Court at Agra, on appeal, sustained.

Upon appeal such decision was reversed by the Judicial Committee on the ground, that the cause of action arose in Muttra, and was, by Ben. Reg. II., of 1803, within the jurisdiction of the Zillah Court of Agra.

First, because Muttra was the established place of business of the co-partnership, where the books were kept for the purpose of the partners ascertaining the state of the transactions between them, and

Secondly, as it was there that the balance was struck, and payment of the balance due.

The sole question in this appeal was, whether the Zillah Court at Agra had jurisdiction under the provisions of Ben. Reg. II. of 1803 to entertain the suit.

[292] The case was not heard upon its merits, but on a preliminary point, whether the Zillah Court at Agra had jurisdiction to hear and determine the suit under the provisions of Ben. Reg. II. 1803, sees. 3, 4, 5 (a). The Appellants were non-suited by the Zillah Court, on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and that Court's decree was affirmed on appeal by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

The facts of the case were these:—

The Appellants resided at Muttra, within the ambit of the Zillah Court of Agra's jurisdiction, carrying on a banking and mercantile business by themselves [293] and by Gomastahs, or agents, in houses of business established in the principal cities throughout India. One of these houses established at Muttra, was carried on by the Appellants. Another was established at Rutlam, in the independent State of Malwa, and the business carried on by agents only. The respondents were also Bankers and merchants, carrying on business at Rutlam.

The dealings between the parties to this appeal began in the month of March, 1846, when one Salig Ram went to Muttra, and had an interview with the Appellants, at their house of business there, to whom he was previously known, at one time as the partner, and at another as the Gomastah of the Respondents. At this interview, Salig Ram stated that he had been commissioned by the Respondents to effect a partnership between them and the Appellants in the purchase and sale of opium.

The terms and conditions of the partnership were, after some delay, finally agreed to at Muttra by the Appellants on the one part, and by Salig Ram, acting on behalf of the Respondents on the other part. The authority of Salig Ram, as agent, was afterwards confirmed by the Respondents, both verbally and by a letter sent by them to the Appellants. That letter was as follows:—

“Dear brethren, brother Radhakishen, and brother Rughonath Doss, accept the salutations of the Rutlam Walas and Dan Mull, and Indur Mull, and know that the Rutlam Walas assigned over the opium business to brother Salig Ram. The transactions conducted by Salig Ram, wherein he made purchases at Muphul, Bathama, Buja, [294] Rutlam, Burnugar, and Mundisore, you will be pleased to close. In future your and our joint transactions you will be pleased to enter into with the consent of both parties, opening a separate set of books. The profit or loss shown by these will consist of 21 shares, that is to say, one share shall belong to God, $12\frac{1}{2}$ shares shall belong to yourselves, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ shares shall be our property. It is agreed that this shall be the distribution of the 21 shares. The former loss of three and a quarter lacs of rupees brother Salig Ram has taken upon himself, and until your loss is reimbursed the share shall continue as above stated. When your loss shall have been recovered, then the shares shall be divided half and half alike. In these transactions your capital at Muttra shall be embarked, and interest at the rate

(a) These sections enact as follows:—

“3. The jurisdiction of the Zillah Courts shall extend to all civil suits arising within the Districts and places which are, or shall be, included in the Zillahs in which they are respectively established.

“4. All natives, and other persons not British subjects, are hereby declared to be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Zillah and City Courts.

“5. The Zillah Courts are empowered to take cognizance of all suits and complaints respecting the succession or right to real or personal property, land rents, revenues, debts, accounts, contracts, partnerships, marriage, caste, claims to damages for injuries, and generally, of all suits and complaints of a civil nature, in which the Defendant may come within any of the descriptions of persons mentioned in section 4: provided that the landed or other real property, to which the suit or complaint may relate, shall be situated, or in all other cases the cause of action shall have arisen, or the Defendant at the time when the suit may be commenced shall reside, as a fixed inhabitant, within the limits of the Zillah over which their jurisdiction may extend.”

of 6 annas per cent. per mensem will be allowed. Salig Ram will conduct the business, and he will act with the consent of both parties. Salig Ram will discharge his duties towards both parties conscientiously."

It appeared that separate sets of books were opened, and kept at Muttra, where the co-partnership business was carried on at the house of business there of the Appellants. The moneys used as the capital in the co-partnership dealings were, also, supplied by the Appellants at Muttra, and debited in the books kept there, to the amount of Rs. 57,31,865. Salig Ram alone expending and employing the same in the purchase of opium for the co-partnership. The opium was sold at Bombay and in China, and the account sale and proceeds were all remitted to the Appellants' house at Muttra, where the business and accounts [295] of the co-partnership were kept by the Appellants, and where the books containing those accounts were retained.

It further appeared that losses were sustained in the business, and when the co-partnership dealings and accounts were closed, a balance was struck at Muttra, against the co-partnership, amounting to Rs. 22,67,962.

The Appellants informed the Respondents of the state of the co-partnership accounts, and the balance at debit, and requested them to come to a settlement and pay their share of the balance.

The Respondents having neglected to pay the same, an action was brought by the Appellants in the Zillah Court of Agra, against them to recover their share of the balance, amounting to the sum of Rs. 10,75,156. 1a., including interest as well as the principal. Amongst other things set forth in the plaint, the terms and conditions of the co-partnership verbally agreed to at Muttra, by the Respondents through Salig Ram, were stated, and a letter received by the Appellants from the Respondents was set out, which was in these terms:—"The Defendants (the Respondents), according to mercantile custom, addressed a letter to the house at Rutlam, under date the 2nd Katik Soodee Sumbut, 1903, containing all the conditions in respect to the partnership which Salig Ram had previously proposed and settled with the Plaintiffs (the Appellants), which letter, along with other letters of the Defendants, the Plaintiffs now hold."

The answer of the Respondents, among other things, stated that they were residents of Oodeypore [296] Kotah Jehsumore and of Rutlam, places situated in a Foreign territory, and they raised two objections to the action: first, that the action was not entitled to be heard in the Company's Courts, and especially in the Agra Court; and, secondly, as to the incorrectness of the claim itself. As to the first objection, it was alleged, that Salig Ram was neither the agent nor partner of the Respondents, nor did they depute him, but that he was the agent and confidant of the Appellants; and secondly, that the Respondents were not residents in the British territory, nor did the transactions and accounts declared to have taken place by the Appellants occur in a British territory. That, according to Reg. II. 1803, there were two points which defined the District in which a suit could be instituted. One of them was to the effect, that it should be instituted in the place where the transactions occurred with Defendants; and the other, that it should be presented in the District of which, at the time of presenting the complaint, the Defendants were permanent residents; and they insisted that the institution of the suit in the Company's Court was a violation of the Treaties existing between the British Government and Native States, an account of which was given in the letter addressed by the agent to the Judge of the Zillah, dated the 4th May, 1850, and which was filed with the misl; and the Appellants relied upon the letter, dated 2nd Katik Soodee Sumbut, 1903, received from the house of Rutlam, situate in a Native State, in connection with the partnership, the cause of action in the present suit—when, according to the Appellants' own showing, that letter related to Rutlam, and could not, [297] therefore, be inquired into by the Zillah Court at Agra.

By the replication it was insisted that the Respondents were residents and had property, both moveable and immoveable, within the territories of the East India Company; but that being mercantile men they occasionally travelled to other places; and it was further insisted that suits might be heard against those who were residents in a Foreign territory, under the rule laid down in section 36 of the Despatch of the Honourable Court of Directors, dated 27th of May, 1835; and, that the Treaties alluded to in the answer were not applicable to this case. The replication also stated that the letter alluded to in the answer, was not the ground of action, but only a verification of the conditions of the co-partnership which had been concluded previously at Muttra, through Salig Ram, the authorized agent of the Respondents; and that he had been for a long time a partner, and subsequently the Gomastah of the Respondents.

The Zillah Court of Agra, directed, among others, the following issues to be tried. First, whether the Court was legally competent to hear the suit; and secondly, whether any defect existed in the claim which rendered the Plaintiffs liable to be non-suited. The issues of facts arising from the pleadings were stated to be,—First, whether the partnership contract in the opium speculation was actually entered into as stated by the Plaintiffs; secondly, if the contract was proved, whether the amount claimed was due; and thirdly, whether Salig Ram was the accredited agent and partner of the Defendants, and entered into the terms of the contract on their behalf.

[298] Witnesses were examined on the part of the Appellants. It was proved that the alleged co-partnership was effected through Salig Ram at Muttra, as the agent of the Respondents; and the subsequent verbal confirmation of his acts by one of the Respondents, Bhuboottee Sing. The letter written by him in the name of his firm to the Appellants' firm was also proved, and that the accounts were kept, and payments made, and the proceeds of the opium received at Muttra on account of the co-partnership. No witnesses were examined by the Respondents.

On the 24th of July, 1851, judgment was pronounced by Mr. Henry Byng Harington, the Officiating Judge of the Zillah Court of Agra. By that judgment the Appellants were non-suited, on the ground that they had failed to establish that the Respondents were subject to the jurisdiction of the Court in respect to the claim, either on the ground of the cause of action having arisen, or on the Respondents being constructively or otherwise residents, at the date of the institution of the suit, within the limits of the Court's jurisdiction.

The appeal was heard before Messrs. Begbie, Browne, and Harington, the Judges of that Court, and a decree was pronounced on the 7th of June, 1852. The material parts of this decree were as follows:—"Apart from the facts involved in it, the question of jurisdiction itself lies within a narrow compass. It is not denied that a party entering into a partnership engagement with a firm in the British territory, [299] and carrying on transactions elsewhere with the funds advanced by it, is liable to the jurisdiction of the tribunal of the locality where the cause of action, or in other words the partnership contract arose; nor, on the other hand, is it contended that a party, resident in the British territory, who embarks his capital in trading speculations with residents of a Foreign territory, on a contract entered into and to be executed within that territory, has any power by law to summon the other contracting party before his own Courts. The Appellants, in fact, throw the grounds of their suit on the contract which Salig Ram is said to have concluded with them on the part of the Respondents within the Agra jurisdiction; and although the cause of action has not been set forth in the plaint with the distinctness required by law, it may be gathered from the pleadings at large with sufficient clearness to constitute the determination of this fact; the test of the jurisdiction. On the pleadings, the proof of Salig Ram having been the accredited agent of Respondents, and of the contract alleged, must be first considered, and as these must be drawn from the oral and documentary evidence, and from general probabilities, the Court consider the first objection raised by the Appellants in their reasons to be of no weight, no more of the facts of the case having been entered into by the Court below than were necessary to enable it to arrive at some certain conclusion on the preliminary issue. The Court first note the ambiguous character in which Salig Ram is said to have appeared at Muttra, and the want of any satisfactory proof of the real position held by him in relation to the Defendants in their general business. [300] In the pleadings he is stated to have been both partner and agent. In the oral evidence the witnesses adduced by the Appellants depose on their knowledge, derived from common and credible rumour, that he was the confidential friend and agent of the Defendants' house of business, that he had also a share of his own in several houses of business in Malwa, and that the Defendants, on being questioned, had themselves stated that he was one of them. But in the petition presented by Salig

Ram himself to the Resident of Indore, he represents that his partnership with Defendant had been dissolved some time before, and that a 'Farigh-kuttee,' or deed of release, had been exchanged, whereby it was agreed that a yearly allowance of Rs. 6000. should be paid to him in satisfaction of all claims. The petition was presented for the purpose of obtaining the aid of the Residency authorities in the payment of the allowance; and although the presenter of it had an obvious motive in exaggerating his services, no mention is made in it of any direct and continued connection with Defendants, in the way of situation of service, subsequently to the dissolution, or of any power having been committed to him, either as an agent or friend, to open the negotiation referred to therein. This evidence is, in the opinion of the Court, wholly insufficient to prove that Salig Ram had established himself as an accredited agent in the general business of Defendants' firm so as to dispense with the formality of credentials, and the Appellants do not affirm that any special letter of introduction was brought by him authorizing his proposals. It is, on the contrary, abundantly clear [301] from the circumstances, no less than from the ambiguities and contradictions above noticed, that the Appellants were quite at a loss in what manner they were to receive the communications of Salig Ram; and that after deputing a confidential servant for the purpose of observing his proceedings, and instructing their correspondents at the branch firm at Rutlam to make full inquiries on the subject, they took no further steps in the matter until the receipt of the letter which had been transmitted to them by the Rutlam house. The correctness or otherwise of the inference drawn by the Judge from the question proposed to the witness, Puna Lal, appears to the Court to be of no material consequence either way. The facts still remain, that Salig Ram, after his lengthened stay at Muttra, did not repair, on his return, to his alleged principals; that nearly six months, according to the Appellants' own showing, elapsed between the arrival of Salig Ram at Muttra and the date of the letter, which period had been spent in inquiries, and that the books were not opened in the interim. The circumstances are strongly opposed to the statements put forth by the Appellants, and afford no indications of the tender and acceptance of formal proposals regarding the partnership, and of the postponement of the opening of the books until the terms of the contract had been ratified by the principals of the Defendants' firm, as asserted by them. There is, it is true, some oral evidence to the particulars of the negotiation between Salig Ram and the Appellants at Muttra, but no value can be allowed it when weighed against the opposite presumptions, and the Court view it on other grounds with much distrust. Negotiations of so delicate and [302] important a character between large and opulent firms are not usually conducted in the presence of witnesses, and proof of such transactions is not sought for by the Courts, or by the commercial usages recognized by the Courts in oral testimony. It is at the same time remarkable, considering the advantages in point of jurisdiction which the completion of the contract at Muttra would have conferred, that the Appellants, who are thoroughly versed in the practice of our Courts, should have neglected to guard their own interests, by securing some unquestionable documentary proof of the fact, in aid of their present allegations. The letter remains to be considered, a translation of which is to be found in the decision appealed from. Each party placing a different construction on this document, the Appellants urging that its terms convey a ratification of the previously-completed contract of which it was merely the evidence, whilst, according to the statements of the Defendants, and under the view of its purport taken by the Judge, it formed the original and basis of the partnership agreement, and constituted the real cause of action. The letter in question refers to some past opium transactions between the parties, which had been conducted by Salig Ram, and under the distribution of the shares in the new venture the writers agree that Salig Ram should work off the loss of three and a quarter lacs incurred by the Rutlam house in the former transactions from the five shares in excess, which are assigned to the house for that purpose, the business being conducted by Salig Ram as before. There is also a mention of the capital of the Muttra house being embarked in the speculation, [303] but beyond this there is nothing in the letter to indicate a foregone contract in the matter with the head firm at Muttra, or to warrant any presumption of the transfer of the locality of the agreement from Rutlam. It is addressed by the Defendants' house at Rutlam to the Appellants' house at the same place, and the plain terms of the document, in the opinion of the Court, afford no grounds for an inference that the contracting parties were other than the two houses there. It would, in fact, appear from its tenor as if the Defendants had endeavoured to guard against any other possible interpretation of their meaning at the time of writing. The Court, therefore, consider that the purport of the document assists the conclusions from the other evidence; and, as there is no evidence that the Defendants acknowledged afterwards, by act or letter, the existence of any partnership transactions with the Muttra house direct during the three years of their alleged continuance, they hold that the Agra Court has no jurisdiction in adjudicating between the parties, and dismiss the appeal."

As the Respondents did not put in an appearance the appeal was set down for hearing ex-parte.

Mr. Leith, for the Appellants.—This decree cannot be maintained. It is founded upon an entire misconception of the effect of the co-partnership agreement. The only question that the Court below had to consider was, whether the contract between the parties, of the cause of action arising out of the contract, occurred within the juris-[304]-diction of the Zillah Court of Agra. First. By the terms and conditions of the contract between the parties the carrying on of the co-partnership business was to take place, and, as a fact, did take place at Muttra; the locus contractus, was, therefore, at Muttra. There the partnership accounts were kept, in respect of which the liability of the Respondents arose; moreover, the balance was there ascertained and taken, and it was for the recovery of the balance so struck there that the present action was brought, the breach being for non-payment there. Now, the Respondents were either actually or constructively subject to the jurisdiction of the Zillah Court at Agra, for first, the action arose within the jurisdiction of that Court within the meaning of sec. 3 of Ben. Reg. II. of 1803; and, secondly, the cause of action arose within that jurisdiction by sec. 5 of that Regulation. It has been so decided by the Courts in India, Wilayat Ulee Khan v. Mirza Ubdoolah Shah (11 Sud. Dew. Rep. N.W.P. 646), Chowdhree Juggernath v. Bunseedhar (8 Sud. Dew. Rep. N.W.P. 159), In re Sunken Mahter (10 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 280). The general rule upon this point is conclusively laid down by Story. "Conflict of Laws." (Edit. 1841.) In sec. 282, when treating of the conflict of jurisdiction, he says, that "if no place of performance is stated, or the contract may be indifferently performed anywhere, it ought to be referred to the lex loci contractus." So Burge, "Commis. on For. and Col. Law," vol. iii. p. 752, observes, that "when the parties do not reside in the place where the contract is made, and it is effected by agents or letters, the place in [305] which the final assent is given by the party to whom the proposition was made, is that in which the contract is considered to have been made." The authorities fully sustain this proposition. Albion Fire and Life Assurance Co. v. Mills (3 Will. and Shaw, Sc. Reps. 233; S.C. on appeal, 1 Dow and Cl. 342), Whiston v. Stodden (8 Martin's Amer. Reps. 95), Cox v. The United States (6 Peters' Amer. Reps. 172), Robinson v. Bland (2 Burr. 1079).

Secondly. It is a principle well recognized that if a contract is made by an agent without orders, and the correspondent ratifies it, such contract is binding on the principal, Boyle v. Zacharie (6 Peters' Amer. Reps. 644). Here Salig Ram had authority previously to bind the Respondents by the co-partnership agreement entered into by him at Muttra on their behalf; but, even if he had not that authority, then the subsequent adoption and ratification of his acts by the letter of one of the Respondents gave the same effect to the agreement as if he had previously obtained such authority from them.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—The proceedings of the Plaintiffs in this cause have not been particularly expeditious, as we are now dealing with a decree of the Sudder Court made in the month of June, 1852, affirming a decree of the Zillah Court, by which the Plaintiffs' suit was dismissed on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

The only question which their Lordships have to determine is, whether the contract which was entered into between the parties, or the cause of action arising [306] out of that contract, occurred within the Jurisdiction of the Zillah Court of Agra.

If this question had depended upon the authority of Salig Ram to enter into any contract by which he could bind the Respondents, probably their Lordships would have determined that there was no evidence whatever to show that he possessed any such authority, because in the petition which he had presented to the Resident of Indore, and which was put in by the Appellants themselves and made part of their evidence, Salig Ram distinctly states that no partnership existed between him and the Respondents; and if he were merely the Gomastah of the Respondents, he could have no power in that character alone, to bind them to any such partnership as it is alleged he entered into. But whether this is so, or not, it is quite clear that the letter which was put in evidence by the Appellants, and which was written by one of the Respondents, amounts either to a contract of partnership or to a ratification of what had been previously done by Salig Ram. Now, although that contract was entered into at Rutlam, yet it was for the establishment of a partnership which was to be carried on principally at Muttra, where all the transactions were to be conducted by means of the capital embarked in the concern at that place.

The partnership having been thus established, advances were made from time to time, according to the terms of that partnership. Money was transmitted to Indore and other places. So far as those advances were from time to time made, though they did not constitute any debt upon which there would [307] be any cause of action arising to the Appellants, yet they were made in pursuance of the partnership contract, and if the speculation had been a successful one, the profits would, of course, have gone to countervail the advances. But it turns out that the undertaking was unprofitable, and that losses were incurred, and the claim which is now made being the cause of action alleged by the Appellants, is for a balance of ten lacs of rupees arising out of these partnership transactions.

Now, where can it be said that the cause of action, supposing it exists for that balance, properly arose? Muttra was, undoubtedly, the central place of business: at Muttra the partnership books were kept; at Muttra the partners would have recourse to those books for the purpose of ascertaining the state of the transactions between them; and if, in the result a balance was due to the Appellants, Muttra would be the place where the payment of that balance would have to be made. It, therefore, appears clear to their Lordships that if there is a cause of action arising out of the balance resulting from these partnership transactions, that cause of action arose at Muttra.

Under these circumstances, it is quite unnecessary for their Lordships to make any further observations upon the case; indeed, they are anxious not to touch, in the slightest degree, upon the merits of the question between these parties. They must assume, of course, but merely for the purpose of the determination of this question, that there is a balance due to the Appellants arising out of the partnership that was established.

[308] Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that both these decrees must be set aside, but, as there are two decrees in favour of the Respondents, their Lordships are of opinion that this should be without costs.

A suit was instituted in 1827, by A. against B., to recover a moiety of real estate in the possession of B. In the year 1829 the suit was compromised and a partition agreed upon. The Razenamah, or deed of compromise, provided that, in the event of either of the parties not agreeing to act, according to the terms of the compromise, the Court was to enforce the same. B. refused to carry out the agreement, and A. applied to the Court to enforce the compromise; the Sudder Court in 1832 confirmed the agreement, and ordered possession to be given to A., directing the suit to be struck off the file. No directions were given by the order of the Court respecting the mesne profits. In the same year A. presented a petition to the Sudder Court, founded on the order for possession, for Wasilat or mesne profits of his share of the real estate. This petition came before a single Judge of the Sudder Court, who made an order awarding Wasilat from the date of the decision of the Court to the date of possession. This order was appealed from, and in the year 1853, the Sudder Court held that the order of a single Judge decreeing Wasilat was ultra vires. In consequence of this decision, A. brought a regular suit against B. for Wasilat. In defence it was pleaded that the Plaintiff's claim was barred by Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14, as the mesne profits claimed accrued beyond twelve years from the date of the institution of the suit. The Sudder Court decided, that, in the circumstances, the Regulation did not apply. Such decree affirmed, on appeal, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by reason—

First, that the cause of action did not arise upon the suit instituted in 1827, or upon the agreement to compromise, and

Secondly, that the conduct and acts of A., from the date of the order striking the cause off the file of the Sudder Court, in endeavouring to recover the Wasilat showed an intention to carry out the compromise, and the proceedings before the Court to recover the same took the case out of the operation of Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14.

A single Judge of the Sudder Court is not competent to make a supplemental order for Wasilat, upon a decretal order of the Court merely decreeing possession.

This suit was brought for the recovery of Wasilat, or mesne profits of real estate, and the sole question [309] raised by the appeal was, whether the Respondent was entitled to Wasilat from the period of twelve years next before the institution of the suit, according to sec. 14 of Ben. Reg. III., of 1793, or, whether he was entitled to go back to the year 1829, the date at which by certain deeds of Razenamah and Safeenamah, and an order of Court made thereon, his title to the moiety of the property became perfected.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

The appeal was argued by Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., Mr. Leith, and Maude, for the Appellant, and Mr. W. Field, for the Respondent.

The authorities cited upon the question of the limitations of the suit, under Ben. Reg. III., of 1793, sec. 14, and Ben. II., of 1805, secs. 1 and 3, cl. 3, to the Wasilat, were Group and Dyce Sombre v. The East India Company (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 101), Rajah Enayet Hossein v. Sayud Ahmed Reza (Ib. 238), Pran-nath Roy Chowdry v. Rookda [310] Begum (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 323), Sheoraj Singh v. Munsookh Rai (7 Sud. Dew. Rep. N.W.P. 337), Pudirrut Dap v. Futteh Ali (7 Sud. Dew. Rep. N.W.P. 158).

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (Dec. 20, 1860).—A suit was instituted by the present Respondent in 1853, and the only question in the case is, whether the Respondent is barred from the prosecution of his claims in this suit by the Indian law of limitation.

It is necessary to the correct understanding of this case to state some of the circumstances under which the suit was commenced and the decree pronounced.

It appears that both the Appellant and Respondent are brothers; their uncle died without issue in 1810; their father died in 1821, having succeeded to the property of their uncle, and he left the Appellant and Respondent, his two sons, joint heirs-at-law. The property which so devolved upon them was very considerable, and much litigation ensued as to the division and possession of that property, which was situated in various Districts; to recover each portion of the property lying in various Districts, it would be necessary to institute proceedings in the various Courts having local jurisdiction.

On the 29th of January, 1827, the present Appellant instituted a suit against the Respondent, in the Provincial Court of Calcutta, to recover a certain share in Zillah Jessore, which was, in fact, a very [311] small part of the estates in question. Whilst this suit was pending, the parties to it came to an agreement to compromise their claims, and on the 4th of April, 1829, deeds of compromise were executed and filed in the Zillah Court—they agreed to divide the estate in certain proportions; and it was further stipulated that, in the event of either of the parties not agreeing to act according to the terms of the compromise, they had no objection to the Court's insisting upon and enforcing the observance of the said compromise.

The Respondent applied to the Collector for an Ameen to make a partition in terms of the above deeds.

On the 24th of April, 1829, the Appellant, who was the Plaintiff in that suit, presented a petition to the Provincial Court, praying that the suit might be struck off the file of the Court, on the ground of the compromise being effected. The Respondent, on the 25th of April, 1829, objected to this petition, and alleged that the compromise was not binding, undue influence having been exercised by the Collector to bring about the same.

The Provincial Court of Calcutta, however, on the 2nd of September, 1829, made the following order: that the case be struck off the file and that the parties conform to their respective engagements; in the event of their not conforming to the same this Court shall insist on and cause them to conform to the conditions of the compromise. The suit was removed from the file on the 2nd of September, 1829, and the value of the stamp returned to the present Appellant.

The present Respondent appealed to the Sudder Adawlut. On the 21st of June, 1832, Mr. Walpole [312] decreed that the appeal should be dismissed, and that the decree of September the 2nd should be confirmed. He further stated, that the parties were entitled to take possession according to their respective rights under the compromise. On the 5th of July, 1832, Mr. Ross, another Judge of the same Court, declared his concurrence with Mr. Walpole.

Now, as these decrees were never appealed from, they are, to all intents and purposes, binding decrees. But, before proceeding further, it may be expedient briefly to consider the effect of the proceedings just recited. It is quite clear that the suit commenced on January 29th, 1827, was entirely at an end; and having been struck off the file, and the value of the stamp returned, no further proceedings could be had in that suit. But the Provincial Court were of opinion that, by the consent of both parties, they were entitled to take cognizance of the deed of compromise executed on the 4th of April, 1829, and to enforce the observance of the same, notwithstanding that the deed of compromise embraced property out of the Zillah Jessore, and in the Zillah Twenty-four Pergunnahs, and other places, which properties were not sued for in the original suit. Whether this proceeding was strictly regular or not cannot now be made a question. Of that opinion are all the Judges of the Sudder Adawlut which had cognizance of the present suit, including Mr. Raikes, who thought that there was an error in the first instance in the Court so taking cognizance.

We will now return to the consideration of what was done by the present Respondent upon the decrees of the Sudder Adawlut of June the 21st, 1832, and July the 5th of the same year. He lost no time in [313] resorting to the Court for the purpose of recovering the mesne profits: for in September of the same year (1832), he presented a petition, in what is called the Miscellaneous Department of the Sudder Adawlut, praying for mesne profits, agreeably to the Circular Order of September the 11th, 1829, which is in the following terms:—"The Court are of opinion that in all cases where money liable to bear interest is payable under the decree of a Court, a clause should be inserted in the decree providing for the allowance of interest until the decree is carried into final execution, and that in the event of such provision being omitted in a decree, the Court, by which the same may have been passed, is competent to order at any future period the payment of the interest on the amount decreed which may have accumulated subsequently to the date of the decree without referring the party to a new suit for the recovery of such interest; and that the same principle is applicable to profits in cases of decrees for landed property."

The Sheristadar of the Court reported on the back of the petition that no Wasilat had been decreed to the Respondent by the said decree of the Sudder Adawlut, notwithstanding that it had been applied for. In consequence of the objection so raised by the Sheristadar on the 10th of September, 1832, the matter was again brought by petition before Mr. Ross, one of the Judges of the Sudder Adawlut, and Mr. Ross, then sitting alone, made an order that the Respondent was entitled to mesne profits, from the 5th of July, 1832, to the date of his obtaining possession; and on September 18, 1832, Mr. Ross made another order, again sitting alone, whereby he ordered that a copy of the Appellant's [314] petition, with the decision of this Court, be sent to the Judges of the Court of Appeal at Calcutta, with an order that if the Appellant should not have already obtained possession of his proper share under the deed of compromise, possession should then be awarded to him in execution of the decision of this Court; and, further, that after awarding Wasilat to the Respondent from the date of the decision of this Court to the date of the recovery of possession, a report that this order has been carried out, accompanied with the decision forwarded herewith, should be transmitted to this Court.

We do not find that the Judges of the Court of appeal at Calcutta took any further notice of these proceedings, and we might, perhaps, be at some loss to discover why, if there was any error in them, some observation respecting that error, some suggestion as to setting it right, should not have been made: however, nothing of this sort was done; various proceedings were had for the purpose of recovering this wasilat before several Judges in the Zillah Court of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, and these proceedings were in the Miscellaneous Department.

This Court is not very accurately informed what is included under the term "Miscellaneous Department," but for the purposes of the present appeal the Department may be taken to include the carrying into effect decisions made by the Court of Sudder Adawlut, as contra-distinguished from the commencement of an original suit. In one of these proceedings, an order made by one of the Judges was carried up to the Sudder Adawlut, when that Court, on the 21st of July, 1853, decreed that the [315] order by Mr. Ross passed on the 10th of September, 1832, in favour of Tarapersaud, for wasilat, was, without the concurrence of Mr. Walpole, incomplete and not binding by law, and its execution not obligatory on the Court.

Now, this decree not having been appealed from, must be considered as containing a correct statement of the law, but we may observe that the Court did not pronounce the decree of Mr. Ross to be null and void, and that the defect, such as it was, was never discovered during the whole of the preceding litigation for one-and-twenty years; though, of course, if this had been a palpable defect, there were very numerous opportunities for its discovery. The consequence of this decree of the Sudder Adawlut of the 21st of July, 1853, was that the present Respondent was thrown back upon the decrees of June 21st and July 5th, 1832, which decrees had ordered him to be put in possession of his proper share of the property, but had not decreed wasilat.

It might, perhaps, have been a question, whether, under those decrees of June 21st and July 5th, coupled with the Circular Order of September 11th, 1829, the Respondent had not obtained a decree giving him a right to wasilat accruing. But, however that might be, in the same year, 1853, the Respondent instituted the present suit, praying that his demand for wasilat should be admitted. One of the defences to that suit was, that his claim was barred by the law of limitation for all wasilat accruing at a period beyond twelve years from the institution of that suit. The Principal Sudder Ameen, amongst other matters which were decided by his decree, pro-[316]-nounced that the law of limitation did apply. The other matters were decided in favour of the present Respondent. Both parties appealed from this decree to the Sudder Adawlut, and on the 17th of June, 1857, that Court pronounced its decree, whereby it decided, by a majority of two out of the three Judges, that the law of limitation did not apply, and remanded the case to the Zillah Court for further consideration.

The question now for their Lordships to advise Her Majesty is, whether the majority of the Sudder Adawlut were right in their view of this case, and it may be first expedient to state, so far as is necessary, the Indian law of limitation. It is to the following effect:—"The Zillah and City Courts are prohibited hearing, trying, or determining the merits of any suit whatever, against any person or persons, if the cause of action shall have arisen previous to the 12th of August 1765, or any suit whatever against any person or persons, if the cause of action shall have arisen twelve years before any suit shall have been commenced on account of it, unless the complainant can show, by clear and positive proof, that he had demanded the money or matter in question, and that the Defendant had admitted the truth of the demand, or promised to pay the money, or that he directly preferred his claim, within that period, for the matters in dispute to a Court of competent jurisdiction to try the demand, and shall assign satisfactory reasons to the Court why he did not proceed in the suit, or shall prove that, either from minority or other good and sufficient cause, he had been precluded from obtaining redress." (Regulation III. of 1793, sec. 14.)

Now, it appears to their Lordships to be clear, that [317] this cause of action cannot be said to arise upon the suit which was struck off the file in 1832, neither do we think that it can be properly said that the cause of action arose upon the agreement of compromise alone; for it is obvious that all the proceedings have been founded upon the decrees of the 21st of June, and the 5th of July, 1832, decreeing possession to the Respondent. In fact, all the subsequent proceedings are subsidiary proceedings in the same suit, and all for the purpose of carrying into full effect those decrees which, though they did not in terms do more than decree possession, yet, taking into consideration the order of September, 1829, and the justice of the claim, gave the Respondent a right to wasilat up to the time when the Appellant did justice, and obeyed those decrees by allowing the Respondent to have possession of the property justly belonging to him. All these proceedings are connected together from the time that the rights of the parties were finally settled by the decree of July 5th. The Respondent was never remiss in the prosecution of his claims; he resorted to the proper tribunals for that purpose, and, year after year, legal investigations were going on for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to which he was justly entitled. None of the many Judges engaged in these investigations detected any error or irregularity in these proceedings till 1853, when the Court of Sudder Adawlut for the first time discovered that the order made by Mr. Ross was ineffectual by reason of its not being confirmed by a second Judge.

Admitting that such order was ineffectual, and that proceedings to enforce it could not avail, we think that such erroneous proceedings did not operate as a [318] total abandonment of the rights under the decrees of June and July, 1832. We think that it may be fairly said that the Respondent was continually endeavouring, by resort to competent Courts, to recover his rights, and that he is not ousted from availing himself of the exception in the laws of limitation by reason that part of the proceedings was erroneous.

We concur with the majority of the Court, and deem it most expedient to found our concurrence upon the reasons we have stated, and do not take into consideration other matters which might admit of more doubt.

We shall humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decree of the 17th of June, 1857, with costs, feeling assured that it is consistent with a just construction of the law of limitation and with the justice and equity of the case.

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

A bond executed by a Hindoo widow and guardian of an adopted son, during his minority, the object of which was, first, to pay off a debt due by her deceased husband, charged upon the Zemindary, and next to discharge certain debts contracted by her in the management of the Zemindary, the validity of which was recognized by the adopted son after he became of age, upheld: without determining the question raised of the power of a Hindoo widow, as guardian of a minor, to create a charge on the Zemindary during the minority of her adopted son.

The object of this suit, which was brought by the Respondent against the Appellant, the Zemindar of Terriore, and his adoptive mother, Dhurmavurdany Unmal, was to recover the sum of Rs. 32,000, for principal and balance of interest due on a bond executed by Dhurmavurdany Unmal during the minority of the Appellant.

The facts of the case material to the issue are so fully detailed in their Lordships' judgment, that it is not requisite to repeat them here.

[320] The principal question raised at the hearing of the appeal was as to the power of a Hindoo widow in possession of a Zemindary, as guardian during the minority of an adopted son, to execute the Bond in suit, and charge the Zemindary for the payment of debts alleged to have been incurred in respect of the Zemindary, so as to bind the Appellant, after he had attained his majority. Upon this point, Hunoomapersaud Panday v. Mussumat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (5 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 271), Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 18 (2nd edit.); and as to the debts of the deceased Zemindar forming an equitable charge upon the Zemindary, Douglas v. The Collector of Benares (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 393), Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 166 (2nd edit.), were relied on.

The appeal was argued by Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Speed, for the Appellant; and Mr. Giffard, Q.C., and Mr. Pontifex, for the Respondent.

Judgment was pronounced as follows, by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (March 13, 1861).—In this case an action was brought by the Respondent against the Appellant, upon a bond for Rs. 17,000, dated the 27th of August, 1841.

The Respondent obtained judgment for the amount of the Bond, with interest, in the Civil Court of Trichinopoly, on the 10th of March, 1857.

This judgment was affirmed on appeal by the Sudder Adawlut, on the 5th of May, 1858, the Judges being unanimous.

From this decree the present appeal is brought.

[321] The Appellant is the adopted son of the late Zemindar of Terriore. He was adopted by the widow of the Zemindar after his death; and he is in possession of the Zemindary.

It appears that the widow, after the adoption of the Appellant, and during his minority, remained in possession of the Zemindary.

The death of the Zemindar took place in 1835. The lady seems, some years after the adoption, to have repented of what she had done, to have endeavoured to repudiate the act, and to have insisted on retaining the possession of the estate against the adopted son after he came of age. In fact, she continued in possession till July, 1851.

While she was so in possession, and on the 27th of August, 1841, she executed the Bond in question for Rs. 17,000, to Rungasawmy Jyengar, the natural father of the Respondent.

That this sum was advanced by Rungasawmy Jyengar is not disputed, but it is said that it was advanced on the personal security of the widow: that the bond did not purport to bind the Zemindary, and that the widow had no power to bind it; that the Appellant at that time had attained his majority, and that the widow was holding possession adversely to him, and could not, therefore, as guardian or manager of the estate, charge it with any debt which she might contract.

On the other hand, it is said that the amount of the Bond consisted in part of the balance due on a bond executed to the same creditor by the late Zemindar himself, the husband of the obligor, in his lifetime, and that as to the remainder, the money was raised to pay other debts of the Zemindary, binding the Zemindar: that the bond, therefore, constituted [322] a charge on the Zemindary, which the Appellant, as the owner, was liable to pay, and that he had, in fact, acknowledged his liability to do so after he came of age, both verbally and by a letter written in the year 1845, long after he had obtained his majority.

The Bond purports to be made on the settlement of an account between the widow and Jyengar, and to be given for moneys partly due from the late Zemindar, and partly advanced to the widow herself.

The consideration for it is stated to be—

1. A balance due on a Bond from the late Zemindar, dated in July, 1832-33	Rs. 8700
2. A balance due on a Bond executed by the widow herself on the 27th May, 1840	3445
3. Cash received by the widow, through Pillay, her agent, on the 19th August, 1841	3031½
4. Cash received on the execution of the bond	2000
Total	Rs. 17,176½

from which the sum of Rs. 176½ being relinquished by the obligee, there remain Rs. 17,000.

The Bond proceeds:—"This being the amount of debts incurred by my husband and myself, I shall pay the same, with interest at 1 per cent, per mensem, by yearly instalment of Rs. 2000, payable in cash, from this year, and enter such payment at the foot of the Bond."

The Bond itself purports to bind nobody but the [323] widow, and the statement of the account could not of course bind the Appellant, who was no party to the instrument. On the other hand, it is plain that, from the contents of the Bond itself, the Appellant, if he saw it, would know for what causes it purported to have been given. But it consisted partly of moneys alleged to be due from his father, and partly of moneys admitted to have been advanced to the widow personally.

Unless those moneys so advanced to the widow personally were advanced to pay subsisting charges on the estate or otherwise, for its advantage, they of course could constitute no charge on the Zemindary.

There is produced in evidence, and proved, a Bond from the late Zemindar, dated in 1832, for Rs. 5000, bearing interest at 12 per cent., on which, after deducting the sums appearing by the Bond to have been paid, there would remain due for principal and interest, a sum exceeding Rs. 8700, stated in the Bond for Rs. 17,000.

This Bond of 1832 is proved to have been produced at the time when the Bond in dispute was executed, and the amount settled of the sum due to Jyengar.

With respect to the sums advanced to the widow, their payment is regularly proved, and, indeed, that the transaction as between the lender of the money and the widow was a fair one is not in dispute.

As to the purpose for which these advances were made, it is sworn that the widow told the lender that she wanted money to discharge debts contracted by her husband with two persons named, and to pay [324] maintenance to the widow of her husband's elder brother.

The fact that the money was required, and was advanced for these purposes, is stated by another witness who had been in the service of the late Zemindar and also of the widow, and who had been acquainted with the circumstances as they occurred.

The same fact is sworn to by other witnesses.

With respect to the evidence generally, it appears to their Lordships to be less open to suspicion than usually happens in appeals from India.

At the time when the debts were contracted for which the Bond for Rs. 17,000 was executed, and at the time of the execution of the Bond, the widow was in possession of the Zemindary, and the Appellant was living there under her protection.

It is said that the Appellant had before this time attained the age of sixteen years; his legal majority; and that he was entitled to the estate and was wrongfully kept out of it by the widow.

It is not very distinctly proved at what time the Appellant attained his majority. That disputes did take place between the widow and the Appellant with respect to the right of possession of the Zemindary sufficiently appears, but the period at which they commenced is not in evidence. The important matter is free from doubt, that during the period of these transactions and subsequently, and up to the time when the letter of the Appellant, to be presently referred to, was written, the Appellant was living on the Zemindary, and had, therefore, probably full means of ascertaining the real truth of the case with respect to these advances.

[325] In this state of circumstances what took place is quite natural. The Appellant was the adopted son of the late Zemindar, entitled, as it seems, to the Zemindary; he was living there, and had attained his majority, and might reasonably be supposed to be in the enjoyment of the revenues.

Accordingly the Plaintiff, who considered that the money due to him was a charge upon the estate, applied to the Appellant for payment of the amount due on the bond.

It is stated by one of the witnesses "that the Plaintiff sent him to the Defendant to demand of him the said sum, and when he went to Torriore, and asked the Defendant, he said, 'I and my mother are at variance, and I can pay the debt only after we come to some settlement.'" The witness then says that he went to the widow and asked her, and she sent by her servant, Jamboovien, Rs. 1000.

There is nothing improbable in his account. The witness says it happened about fourteen years ago. He was examined in August, 1856, and on referring to the bond it appears that Rs. 1000 were paid in May, 1842.

This statement is confirmed by another witness, and other applications to the Appellant, and similar answers by him, are sworn to by other witnesses.

Nothing is more likely, therefore, than the account which is given in the evidence that, in 1845, Rs. 1000 only having been paid in respect of the bond, a written demand of payment should be made on the Appellant, and that he should make in writing an answer to the same effect with that which he had given verbally on several previous occasions. A letter is accordingly produced and proved, dated [236] the 11th of March, 1845, with the signature of the Appellant, which contains a distinct recognition of the Plaintiff's demand, and the same excuse for non-payment which he had previously offered, viz. that his mother was still in possession of the Zemindary, that the dispute between them was not settled, and that he had, therefore, no power to discharge the debt. He then distinctly states that on inquiry he finds that the Bond which the Plaintiff holds is genuine.

Now, it is said that this letter is a forgery, but there does not appear to their Lordships to be any evidence whatever to support the charge, nor any the least improbability in such a letter, under the circumstances, having been written.

The inference drawn from the evidence in both the Zillah Court and the Sudder Adawlut has been that this Bond was given for debts which the Defendant, as owner of the Zemindary, might be liable to pay, and that by his own acts he has admitted that he actually was liable to the payment, and their Lordships entertain no doubt that this is the right conclusion.

It is necessary, under these circumstances, to allude to the law upon these subjects as laid down by this Board on the case of Hunoomanpersaud Pandey v. Mussumat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 393), with respect to the power of the manager of an estate on the part of an infant to charge it, for no question of law arises in this case when the facts are understood.

Their Lordships will have no hesitation in advising Her Majesty to affirm the decree complained of, with costs.

[327] An objection was taken as to the Plaintiff's right to sue on the Bond, but that objection was sufficiently answered by the Respondent's Counsel at the hearing.

VENCATASWARA YETTLAPAH NAICKER, Appellant; ALAGOO MOOTTOO SERVAGAREN,—Respondent * [Feb. 14, 15, 1861.]

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

A Cuttoogootaga tenure (perpetual lease at a low fixed rent payable to the Zemindar, granted in consideration of military services performed by the ancestors of the grantee) of a distance part of a Zemindary in Madras, upheld.

A perpetual lease of a distinct portion of a Zemindary is not within the provisions of section 8 of Mad. Reg. XXV. of 1802, and does not require registration, as it is not a "sale, gift, or transfer" of the whole or any portion of the Zemindary.

Semble: that section applies only to questions between the Zemindar and the Government with a view to prevent a severance of the Zemindary without public notice to the Government.

The question in this appeal related to a claim by the Respondent to hold under a Cuttoogootaga tenure (perpetual lease at a low fixed rent payable to the Zemindar, granted in consideration of military services performed by the ancestors of the grantee) fifteen villages, forming part of the Zemindary of Yettiappooram, in Madras. The Appellant was Zemindar, and had dispossessed the Respondent of [328] the villages. The case set up by the Appellant in defence to the action brought by the Respondent to recover possession of the villages was, first, that the Respondent and his ancestors never had any right to the villages other than as lessees for a term, under temporary leases, and that Zemindars had no power to grant lands included in their Sunnuds on a permanent lease; and, secondly, that the permanent lease set up by the Respondent in support of his claim was a forgery, but even if a genuine lease, still, it could not, by sec. 8 of Mad. Reg. XXV. of 1802 (a), operate so as to deprive the Appellant of the proprietary right in any portion of his Zemindary, as it was not registered in the Collector's office. The Respondent relied upon the genuineness of the lease, and in answer to the second branch of the defence, respecting registration, contended that sec. 8 of Mad.

(a) This section enacts that "Proprietors of land shall be at free liberty to transfer, without the previous consent of Government, or of any other authority, to whomever they may think proper, by sale, gift, or otherwise, their proprietary right in the whole, or any part of their Zemindaries; such transfers of land shall be valid, and shall be respected by the Courts of Judicature, and by the officers of Government; provided that they shall not be repugnant to the Mahomedan or Hindoo laws or to the Regulations of the British Government. But unless such sale, gift, or transfer, shall have been regularly registered at the office of the Collector; and unless the public assessments shall have been previously determined and fixed on such separated portions of land, by the Collector: such sale, gift, or transfer, shall be of no legal force or effect: nor shall such transaction except a Zemindar from the payment of any part of the public land-tax assessed on the entire Zemindary previously to such transfer, but the whole Zemindary shall continue to be answerable for the total land-tax, in the same manner as if no such transaction had occurred."

Reg. XXV. of 1802, did not apply, as the permanent lease of a distinct portion of the Zemindary [329] was not included in the words "sale, gift, or transfer," and he further insisted that, as the Cuttoogootaga tenure of the Respondent's ancestors existed before the Istimzar sunnud, the title under which the Appellant claimed the Zemindary, the objection that the Zemindar had no power to grant a permanent lease of part of the Zemindary could not be supported, as Mad. Reg. IV. of 1822, provided that the Permanent Settlement of 1802, and the granting of the Sunnuds "were not intended to define, limit, infringe, or destroy, the actual rights of any description of landholders or tenants." Evidence was entered into by both parties in the Courts in India; both of which Courts established the Respondent's title, and made a decree in his favour, with mesne profits.

The circumstances of the case, and the material documents relied on, are sufficiently referred to in their Lordships' judgment.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Mr. J. B. Norton, and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellant, and Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Respondent.

Upon the question of the genuineness of the lease, the Respondent relied upon the concurrent judgments of the Courts of India in his favour, citing Cheyt Ram v. Chowdree Nowbut Ram (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 207), and it was submitted, that if any doubt existed the Court had power to order the original lease to be transmitted to England for inspection. McCarthy v. Judah (12 Moore's P.C. Cases, 47), Mussumat Khoob Koonwur v. Modnarain Sing (6th Feb., 1861).

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (March 13, 1861).—This appeal arises in a suit brought by the Respondent to establish a claim to hold in perpetuity, at a fixed rent, certain villages forming part of the Zemindary of Yettiapooram, which belongs to the Appellant.

The Civil Court of Tinnevely, in which the suit commenced, decreed in favour of the Plaintiff's title, and that judgment has been confirmed by the unanimous opinion of the Judges of the Sudder Adawlut of Madras.

The Zemindary in question is of great extent, comprising above one hundred villages; the claim of the Respondent extends to fifteen of them.

The case of the Respondent is, that he and his ancestors have had some right or interest in those villages, or the District in which the villages now exist, for a very long period, long antecedent to the establishment of the English authority in the country, and that when the English authority was established in 1803, a grant of the whole Zemindary, without noticing the rights of the Respondent's family, was made at a fixed jumma to the Appellant's ancestor.

That in order to secure such rights, without disturbing the grant of the Zemindary, an agreement was made in the year 1805, between his ancestor and the then Zemindar, by which it was settled that the Respondent's ancestor and his descendants should hold the fifteen villages in question on a Cuttoogootaga lease, or, in other words, should hold them in perpetuity at a low fixed rent payable to the Zemindar, [331] and that such rent was fixed at 1940 pons, being in fact the proportion of jumma which was assessed upon them by the Government.

The Respondent alleges that he and his ancestors remained in possession of these villages under this agreement for many years till he was turned out of possession by the Appellant in the year 1848.

The case of the Appellant is an extremely simple one. He alleges that the case set up by the Respondent is a pure fiction; that the documents which he produces in support of it are mere forgeries; that the Plaintiff's possession began in the year 1814, under an Ijarah lease, or in other words an ordinary tenant lease at a rent agreed upon; that such lease was from time to time renewed for different periods, the last of such leases being made on the 29th of July, 1836, for twelve years, on the expiration of which the Plaintiff, having no longer any right to the property, was turned out of possession.

In support of this case, certain instruments purporting to be counterparts of these leases are produced, and it is admitted that if they are genuine they are quite inconsistent with the right alleged by the Respondent.

There is clearly forgery either on one side or the other; and both of the Courts below, who had the documents before them, have concurred in attributing the forgery to the leases produced by the Appellant.

It would be a strong measure for their Lordships upon a question of fact to reverse a decision founded, at least in part, upon an examination of the documents themselves, in which all the Judges below [332] came to the same conclusion. At the same time, cases may exist warranting such a course, and one was mentioned at the Bar in which this Board did actually adopt it (see McCarthy v. Judah, 12 Moore's P. C. Cases, 47). The question is, whether such a case has been made out by the Appellant.

No doubt the onus was on the Respondent, who was the Plaintiff, to prove his case.

Let us see, then, what the evidence on each side was.

The first instrument produced was a deed on copper, dated in 1557, and purporting to contain a grant of the District in question to an ancestor of the Respondent. It was produced by the Respondent, who was the proper person to have it in his custody, and some objections alleged to exist upon the face of it, as if it had borne to be executed by a person not then enjoying the sovereignty of the country, seem to have been removed by the diligence and exact investigation of Mr. Mackeson.

Many other documents were produced, beginning in the year 1712, and bearing different dates in 1747, 1749, 1777, 1779, and 1789, all showing dealings with the property by ancestors of the Respondent.

It is said that there is no proof of these papers; they are all of a date which excludes the possibility of direct proof; but they are proved by the production itself to come from the possession of the Plaintiff, and the want of formal proof that they were found in his muniment-room cannot be regarded as of any importance in a suit of this description.

It is contended, however, that they are, if genuine, inconsistent with the case now made by the Respon-[333]-dent, because the original grant appearing to be rent free, it is improbable that the Respondent's ancestor could ever have accepted a lease charging him with a rent, and yet such is the nature of the lease now set up as the foundation of the Respondent's title.

But the documents produced show, that whatever might be the case originally, there was, in 1712, a certain tribute payable by the whole Zemindary of which one-sixteenth part was appportioned to the Respondent's district.

The Judges below placed no reliance on these documents, not, so far as appears, because they disbelieved their genuineness, which their Lordships see no reason to doubt, but because they held them to be immaterial to the Plaintiff's case. They are, however, of some value as a matter of inducement, showing the probabilities of the statements made by the opposite party.

The next document which the Plaintiff puts in evidence is the instrument on which he rests his claim. It is a paper writing, alleged to be signed on the 5th of August, 1804, by the then Zemindar of Yettiapooram, and addressed to the ancestor of the Respondent in these terms:—"As I have leased out to you fifteen Cuttoogootaga villages," it then enumerates them "attached to Cuttalangoolam division, under a deed for the fixed rent of 1940 pons, you should, without delay, continue to pay, every year, the said amount into the treasury of the Yettiapooram Cutcherry, and yourself, your son, and grandson, can enjoy the said fifteen villages for ever, paying the kist amount thereof."

Supposing this document to be genuine, of course [334] there is an end of the case. It is, however, alleged by the Appellant to be a forgery.

The direct evidence in support of it is not very satisfactory; it is spoken to by several witnesses who profess to have seen it, and to remember its execution nearly fifty years before, on whose testimony, however, no great reliance can be placed; but if the dealing with and possession of the estate has been consistent with the instrument, its date sufficiently accounts for the absence of better direct testimony.

The next document, in point of date, is a mortgage, dated in 1811-12, made by the grandfather of the Respondent, to a person named Pillay, of a portion of this property for a term of ten years.

The mortgage is sworn by two witnesses to have been in possession under this instrument, and, when the debt was satisfied, to have returned the deed to the mortgagor.

Now, the date of this instrument is more than two years before, as the Appellant alleges, the Respondent's family had anything to do with the property.

In addition to this, there is the testimony of many old witnesses that the ancestors of the Respondent had been in possession of this property for very many years, and long before the period assigned by the Appellant for the commencement of such possession. The office of Servagar appears to be one of authority, implying the command of one hundred men, and it is shown to have been held in this Zemindary for a very long series of years by the family of the Respondent, and it is further shown that the grant of lands in Cuttoogootaga or Java-tha, is a usual mode of remunerating such services.

[335] The case, therefore, of the Respondent is probable and consistent.

But the evidence goes a great deal further, and shows very clearly, in the opinion of their Lordships, that the title of Respondent has been repeatedly admitted by the ancestors of the Appellant.

The lessee seems not to have been very punctual in the payment of his rent, and, in the year 1822, the Zemindar found it necessary to apply to the Collector at Tinnevely to enforce payment, and he presented an arzee on the 27th of November, 1822, to Mr. Huddleston, the then Collector.

The arzee in question comes from the Collector's office; it is open to no suspicion, and it is of itself sufficient to disprove the Appellant's case, and to afford a strong confirmation of the statements of the Respondent. It is to this effect:—"Fourteen villages in Cuttalangoolam division, attached to the Zemindary which was obtained by my late father from the Honourable Company, were given to Alagoo Moottoo Servagaren, son of Alagoo Moottoo Servagaren, of the said Cuttalangoolam, for his maintenance at jumma of pons 1959 a-year which was paid by him, and, after him, by his son, Alagoo Moottoo Servagaren, in fact, up to the 992 Aundoo (this date corresponds with the year 1816); but he had entirely discontinued the payment of the same for the Aundoo 993 and 994, though he was holding out mere promises whenever demands were made for it; the balance due by him from the Aundoo 994 to 997, amounts to about pons 1541, and fanams 53.

This is a statement, therefore, that the villages had been granted to the ancestor of the Respondent for his [336] maintenance at a fixed jumma, and that up to the year 1816 the rent had been regularly paid by the grantee, and by his son, and yet it is now pretended by the Appellant that the Respondent's ancestor first came into possession of the property in 1814, and then under an Ijarah lease. It is clear that this statement refers to the payment of rent for a considerable period, and could not mean a payment for two years. There is evidence, indeed, that the person to whom this grant is said to have been made, and who is represented to have paid rent under it, died in 1808.

The Zemindar then prays that the property of Alagoo Moottoo may be attached to pay this demand.

There is another document less strong, but, as far as it goes, confirmatory of the Plaintiff's case.

It is found in an order of Mr. Bird, the Collector, made in the year 1845, at which time disputes had arisen with respect to the boundaries of some of the villages in the Zemindary, and, amongst others, of villages in the District of Cuttalangoolam, the District claimed by the Respondent.

This order mentioned that the Zemindar had submitted an arzee, stating that he had nothing to do with certain lands therein mentioned, "which are in the enjoyment of the Merassidars of Cuttalangoolam, to whom he had leased it out under Cuttoogootaga tenure."

There is abundant other testimony in support of the Respondent's case, and in direct contradiction of the Appellant's, but it is useless to pursue it further. Their Lordships have not the slightest doubt that the Court below could have arrived at no other conclusion than that the case set up by the Appellant [337] was based in fraud and perjury, and that as far as the facts are concerned the Plaintiff had completely established his claim.

It is hardly worth while to notice the objections taken to the Plaintiff's documents.

First, it was said that the sum mentioned in the paper of 1805 (1904 pons, as printed in the Records) differed from the actual rent of 1959 pons and some fanams actually paid.

It appeared, however, very clearly, that the 1904 pons was a misprint for 1940, and that the difference between 1940 and 1959 odd was accounted for by the addition of shroffage.

The representation of the Appellant that the division of the Zemindary claimed by the Respondent contained only thirteen villages at the period when his title commenced, and that two of them were added afterwards, is clearly disproved by the public accounts for the year 1802, showing that at that time Cuttalangoolam was a known District held on Cuttoogootaga, containing the fifteen villages of which it now consists, and was subject to an assessment of 1000 pagodas.

It is said, however, that whatever may be the Respondent's right in point of fact, he is precluded from recovering by an objection of law, viz. that the Plaintiff's title is not registered according to the Madras Regulation XXV. of 1802, sec. 8; and it is said to have been settled in India that although an instrument not registered may be good against the Zemindar who executed it, the successor is not bound by it.

The language of the Regulation would seem to apply to questions between the Zemindar and the [338] Government, and to have been framed with a view of preventing a severance of the Zemindary without public notice to the Government. It is not very obvious upon what principle it can be held that an instrument good against the party making it is bad against an heir, if the ancestor had an absolute power of alienation. If the successor is, as we should term it, a remainder man, or claiming by a title which the ancestor could not defeat, the case, of course, is different.

But their Lordships are of opinion that there is in this case no ground for the objection. This is not an alienation of the Zemindary, or any part of it. It is a perpetual lease of a distinct portion of the Zemindary, which constituted a distinct portion before the Appellant's title to the Zemindary accrued, and such an estate could not, without great violence to the language, be considered as a transfer within the words of the Regulation. The title of the Respondent has been recognized not only by the Zemindar who created it, but by subsequent Zemindars, and there has been a possession under it of above fifty years.

Their Lordships will advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment complained of, with costs.

Under the Imperial Statute, 11th and 12th Vict. c. 21, relating to Insolvent debtors in India, the Assignees have a right to subsequently acquired property of an Insolvent, unless the Insolvent has obtained a certificate and discharge, but this title of the Assignees is subject to two qualifications—first, when the Insolvent has acquired property subject to liens and obligations; in such a case the property taken is subject to the equities and charges which effect it in the hands of the Insolvent; and, secondly, when the Insolvent carries on trade at a subsequent period, with the assent of the Assignees, the property which is acquired in the subsequent trade, will be subject in equity to the charge of creditors in that trade, in priority to the claim of the Assignees.

to carry on a business, and in order to secure the advances made, gave a bond, and agreed in writing, to execute a mortgage of the goods so purchased to the lender to secure repayment. He afterwards executed an assignment of the goods for that purpose. The business was carried on with the knowledge of, and without any objection by, the Official Assignee. The lender never had possession of the goods assigned to him by the Insolvent, and the same remained in possession of the Insolvent until his death. Held (reversing the decree of the Supreme Court at Madras) that the Insolvent's after-acquired property was subject to the lien of the lender, and that such lien was paramount to any claim of the Official Assignee under the insolvency.

The sum involved was under the prescribed amount limited by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838. Upon a special application the fact appearing that the question involved the construction of an Act of Parliament respecting the operation of the law of Insolvent debtors in India, leave to appeal was granted [8 Moo. Ind. App. 351, 352].

In the Supreme Court of Madras the following special case was stated:—

A. Cundasawmy Moodelly was on the 23rd of April, 1858, by the Court for the relief of Insolvent [340] Debtors at Madras, adjudged to have committed an act of Insolvency under the 18th Vict., c. 21, sec. 9, and on the same day the usual vesting order was made under the 11th section.

Such adjudication of Insolvency was not questioned by the Insolvent, who afterwards filed his schedule in the matter, and on the 18th of September obtained his personal discharge under section 47.

The insolvent did not file any petition under the 60th section, nor did he obtain his discharge in the nature of a certificate.

The Insolvent previous and up to his Insolvency was the proprietor of an hotel which was known as the "Imperial Hotel," and after his discharge this hotel was kept by T. Soondarum Moodelly and P. Appavoo Moodelly who engaged the Insolvent, on a salary of Rs. 40 a month, to manage as their servant the hotel known as the "Imperial Hotel;" and he did so manage the same down to the 7th of February, 1859.

On the 7th of February, 1859, the Insolvent borrowed from the Defendant, Moses Kerakoose, who was aware of such insolvency, Rs. 10,000, and on the same day he executed his Bond to Moses Kerakoose in the penal sum of Rs. 20,000, conditioned for payment of Rs. 10,000, and interest at 12 per cent per annum, three months after date.

On the same 7th of February, 1859, the Insolvent [341] from and out of the sum of Rs. 10,000, so borrowed and received by him from the Defendant, paid to the said T. Soondarum Moodelly and P. Appavoo Moodelly the sum of Rs. 6500, for the purchase of the furniture, stock-in-trade, and goodwill of the hotel, and expended the remaining sum of Rs. 3500, in the purchase of certain carriages, horses, and harness, to be let for hire.

On the same day the Insolvent, in further performance of his agreement with the Defendant executed to Moses Kerakoose an instrument under seal, in these words:—

"Know all men by these presents that I, Agappah Cundasawmy Moodelly, for the better securing the repayment of the within sum of Rs. 10,000 so borrowed and received by me at the time within mentioned, have granted, bargained, sold, assigned, and set over unto Moses Kerakoose, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns (Here the items of property, goods, and chattels were inserted, and the instrument then proceeded) and all my interest due and to grow due thereon, and all my right, title, interest, claim or demand whatsoever of, in, or to the same, and should default be hereafter made in payment of the within sum of Rs. 10,000, so borrowed and received by me as aforesaid, when the same shall become due, then I do hereby for myself, and my heirs, executors, and administrators, authorize and empower the said Moses Kerakoose, by giving me three days' notice, to sell and dispose of the said (Here the items of property were inserted over again, and the instrument then concludes in these words) hereby assigned and set over, or intended to be, and to pay and apply the proceeds of such sale in discharge of the principal and interest [342] due on the within bond. Agappah Cundasawmy Moodelly. Signed, sealed, and delivered, where no stamp paper is to be had, in the presence of Satour Lazar, C. Therooven-gadow Moodelly."

The whole of the goods and chattels mentioned in the instrument were purchased by the Insolvent, by and with the sum of Rs. 10,000, so as aforesaid lent and advanced by the Defendant to the Insolvent, and the sum was lent and advanced by the Defendant to the Insolvent, on the express understanding and agreement, that the same was to be laid out by him in the purchase of the goods and chattels, and that the same, when so purchased, were to be mortgaged by the instrument, above set out by the Insolvent to the Defendant to secure to him the repayment of the the sum of Rs. 10,000 and interest.

The whole of the goods and chattels mentioned in the above instrument were contained in, and kept upon, the premises, called the "Imperial Hotel," situate on the road leading to St. Thomas Mount, in which the Insolvent from and after the 7th of February, 1859, with the Plaintiff's knowledge carried on business, as an hotel-keeper, on his own account.

Moses Kerakoose had no possession of such goods and chattels, or of any part thereof; but the same remained in the Insolvent's possession, down to the date of his death.

The Official Assignee had no knowledge of the Insolvent's transactions aforesaid with Moses Kerakoose, or of the purchase of property in the hotel, from T. Soondarum Moodelly and P. Appavoo Moodelly.

The Insolvent departed this life, on the 7th of April, 1859, intestate, leaving a widow surviving him, [343] who declined to administer to his estate, and other debts besides that to the Defendant contracted subsequent to his insolvency.

Moses Kerakoose, immediately after the death of the Insolvent, and on the 7th of April, 1859, instructed Messrs. Ashton, Richardson, and Co. to take possession of all the goods and chattels mentioned and set out in the instrument of the 7th of February, 1859, and they accordingly placed their Peons in charge of the Hotel and of the goods and chattels mentioned in the instrument of the 7th of February, 1859.

The Official Assignee, on the 8th of April, 1859, instructed Messrs. Ashton, Richardson and Co. to take possession of all the goods and chattels contained in or standing on the premises which were reputed to belong to the Insolvent, and thereupon a dispute arose between the Defendant and the Plaintiff as to the right of the Defendant to the property mortgaged by the Insolvent, above set out, and it was ultimately agreed that the property so taken possession of by Messrs. Ashton, Richardson and Co., under the orders of the Defendant, together with all the other property in the hotel, should be sold by them at a public auction.

The nett proceeds of the sale of the property mentioned and set out in the instrument of the 7th of February, 1859, amounted to Rs. 8234. 7a. 9p.

It was agreed that such nett proceeds should represent the goods and chattels, and that no action for damages should be brought by either party against the other, in respect thereof, and that both parties should submit themselves to the judgment of the Supreme Court in this matter.

The question for determination of the Court was, [344] whether such nett proceeds formed part of the estate of the Insolvent, to be distributed amongst the creditors under the insolvency, and if so, then that the same might be declared and decreed accordingly.

The special case was argued before the Supreme Court on the 2nd of September, 1859, and stood over for judgment until the 12th of September, 1859, when the Court decreed that the nett proceeds formed part of the estate of the Insolvent, and passed to the Plaintiff as his Assignee. After stating the above facts, the learned Judge, Sir Adam Bittleston, proceeded as follows:—"The Defendant never had possession of the goods assigned to him by the instrument of assignment of the 7th of February, 1859, but they remained in the possession of the Insolvent, who, from and after that day to the day of his death, the 7th of April in the same year, carried on business as an hotelkeeper on his own account. The case finds that the Insolvent so carried on business with the knowledge of the Official Assignee, but that the Official Assignee had no knowledge of the Insolvent's transaction with the Defendant, nor of the purchase of the property in the whole from Soondrum Moodelly and Appavoo Moodelly. Upon the death of Cundasawmy, the goods in question were claimed by the Defendant under his mortgage, and, his title being disputed by the Official Assignee, the property has been sold; and the question submitted by agreement to this Court is, whether the nett proceeds of such sale form part of the estate of the said Insolvent to be distributed amongst the creditors under the said insolvency. Now, the language of the Insolvent Act is perfectly clear. It leaves no room to doubt that the effect of the vesting order is to vest in the Official Assignee all the future estate, title, and [345] interest of the Insolvent in any effects which he may purchase after his insolvency, as well as in any property to which he may have been previously entitled. The situation of an Insolvent who has not obtained his discharge in the nature of a certificate under the Statute, 11th and 12th Viet., c. 21, is not materially different from that of an uncertificated Bankrupt under the English Bankrupt Laws; and, as a general rule, it was not disputed at the Bar that an uncertificated Bankrupt has no power of acquiring property for himself, but whatever he acquires passes to his Assignees. In Everett v. Barkhouse (10 Ves. 99), the Master of the Rolls, Sir William Grant, says, 'It is clear, being an uncertificated Bankrupt, he could acquire property only for the benefit of his creditors under those commissions, unless, indeed, under very particular circumstances: where the Assignees may by their conduct have precluded themselves from claiming the property, which they have permitted the Bankrupt to acquire in the trade in which he was afterwards engaged, as in Troughton v. Gitley (Ambler, 630); but in other cases, without those particular circumstances, it is perfectly clear the Bankrupt, either by himself or a partner, acquires property not for himself or his new creditors, but for the Assignees under the existing commissions.' Accordingly, it was argued, on behalf of the Defendant, that this case fell within the principle of the decision in Troughton v. Gitley, and the comparatively recent case of Tucker v. Hernaman (1 Sm. and Giff. 394, S.C. 4 De G. Mac. and Gor. 395) founded upon it. But it seems to me that the present case cannot be governed by those decisions. In Troughton v. Gitley, the Assignees were parties to the original arrangement, by which the Bankrupt was put into possession of property for the [346] purpose of enabling him to carry on his trade: he was afterwards suffered to trade for four years without interruption or claim, and, upon his death, after he had made profits in his trade, the question arose between the two sets of creditors in an administration suit, and the Court held that the creditors under the commission had, by their conduct, lost their priority. In Tucker v. Hernaman (1 Sm. and Giff. 399), V. C. Stuart says, it was decided by Troughton v. Gitley that the Assignee of a Bankrupt who has neglected his duty in suffering the Bankrupt to contract debts and amass property, is to be postponed to subsequent creditors. And in the same case upon appeal, 4 De G. Mac. and Gor. 399, L. J. Turner said, 'The case of Troughton v. Gitley, is a clear authority for this, that, if creditors under a commission in bankruptcy permit the Bankrupt to carry on his trade subsequently to the issuing of that commission, those prior creditors, as in the case of a prior mortgage standing by and suffering a subsequent mortgage to be made, without giving notice of his security, lose their priority in respect to the debts which were due to them: and that in the administration of the estate of a Bankrupt so circumstanced, the debts of creditors incurred subsequently to the commission must be paid in priority, upon the authority of Troughton v. Gitley, thus understood, Tucker v. Hernaman was decided. But is this the case of a man having a lien standing by and letting another make a new security? On the 7th February, what had the Official Assignee or the creditors done to preclude them from claiming any property which the Insolvent might acquire by purchase? where is the conduct amounting to a declaration to all mankind [347] that he had sufficient capacity? The case states that he did on that day purchase the goods in question, and the Defendant claims under an assignment from him: neither the Official Assignee nor the creditors under the insolvency had any knowledge of that transaction, and it is difficult to understand how they can be prejudiced on the ground that they permitted that to take place which they had no means of preventing. In the fact that the Insolvent afterwards for two months carried on trade on his own account, with the knowledge of the Official Assignee, I can discover no ground for depriving the creditors under the commission of their priority over the Defendant: and the fact that other debts, besides that of the Defendant, were contracted subsequent to this insolvency, does not seem to me materially to affect the question as between the Defendant and the creditors under the insolvency. It was not discussed at the bar, whether the creditors whose debts were contracted during the two months when the Insolvent was carrying on trade on his own account with the knowledge of the Official Assignee, would be entitled to priority. Indeed, those creditors are not parties to this case: their interests have not been represented here, and they would not be bound by this decision. But I have given some consideration to that question: and though their case comes much nearer to the case of Troughton v. Gitley than the case of the Defendant (so that if the Insolvent had made profits by his trade, even in the short period of two months, I should have been strongly inclined to think that they would have had a prior claim upon the profits acquired in that trade), yet, inasmuch as the property in question was not acquired in the trade, but before [348] the trade was commenced, nor with the concurrence of the Official Assignee or creditors, but without their knowledge, it seems to me that the equity established in Troughton v. Gitley does not apply in this case, even in favour of those creditors whose debts were contracted during the trading. It is observable that in Tucker v. Hernaman, the fund upon which the subsequent creditors were held to have a prior claim appears to have consisted wholly of the profits realized in the business carried on after the bankruptcy; and though, in Troughton v. Gitley, the priority given to the subsequent creditors extended to the original fund with which the Bankrupt commenced trading after his bankruptcy, as well as to the profits realized by him afterwards in that trade, yet there the original fund and the subsequent profits were equally acquired with the knowledge and assent of the assignees under the commission. It might be argued, on behalf of this class of creditors, that though the Official Assignee knew nothing of the transaction with the Defendant, or of the purchase of the goods by the Insolvent, yet, as he knew that possession of them had been delivered to the Insolvent, and permitted him with those goods to trade on his own account, he held out the Insolvent as a trader who might be trusted, and by so doing he has precluded himself from asserting the prior right of the creditors under the insolvency to any part of the property employed in that trade. But the possession which the Insolvent had was not inconsistent with the supposition that the property remained vested in others; and, indeed, the claim of the Official Assignee seems, at first, to have been made upon such supposition, for he directs Messrs. Ashton and Richardson [349] to seize such goods as were reputed to belong to the Insolvent: and I am not aware that it is any part of the duty of an assignee to interpose for the purpose of preventing an Insolvent from carrying on his trade, if any friend of the Insolvent is willing to trust him with the possession of goods for that purpose. I do not see how he could effectually prevent such an arrangement, and the interests of the creditors under the insolvency might often suffer if he did; for, if the trade is subsequently carried on with profit, the fund realized is liable to their debts, after those of the subsequent creditors have been discharged. Therefore, upon the whole, under the very peculiar circumstances of this case, I think that even the creditors whose debts were contracted during the two months, from the 7th of February to the 7th of April, could not, as regards payment out of this fund, claim priority on the creditors under the insolvency. There is one other point of view in which I have considered this case. Lord St. Leonard's in re Atkinson's Trust (2 De G. Mac. and Gor. 143), says, 'It may be considered as decided that the Assignee in insolvency represents the Insolvent; he stands in his place, and takes only such interest as he can give, and subject to all equities to which the Insolvent himself is bound; and, under the influence of feeling that the case was one of some hardship upon the Defendant, I have given some consideration to the question whether any equity in the Defendant's favour, binding on the Assignee, could arise out of the agreement between the Defendant and the Insolvent; that the money lent by the one should be applied by the other in the purchase of the specific goods in question; and that they should be immediately mortgaged to the [350] Defendant; but it is clear that the intention was that the property in the goods should vest in the Insolvent: and the Defendant knew that he was dealing with an insolvent, and that circumstance seems to me fatal to any claim for equitable relief on his part. He must be taken to have consented to advance the money upon such security as the Insolvent was legally competent to give, and, if he took a security which was worthless, he took it with full knowledge of the circumstance which rendered it so; and ignorance of the law is not to be presumed; and if presumed, would not afford a title to relief. In the case of Meur v. Smith (1 Mount. D. and De G. 396), which I mentioned on the argument, it appears that the Plaintiffs, who, upon deposit of a lease, advanced £1000 to an uncertificated bankrupt upon the transfer to him of the lease of a public house, were ignorant of his bankruptcy at the time, and that the very same act which gave existence to the lease, viz. the delivery, was the act which constituted the deposit and the lien. I have come to the conclusion that, in this case, the property in these goods acquired by the Insolvent by purchase, passed to the Official Assignee by the operation of the vesting order, and that the proceeds of the sale form part of the Insolvent's estate, to be distributed under the insolvency. In this result there may, at first sight, appear to be some hardship upon the Defendant; but it may reasonably be supposed, that he speculated upon the probability of the Insolvent being able to carry on a profitable trade, and of succeeding in realizing a fund sufficient to pay him as well as his other creditors; at all events, he might, if he had so chosen, have purchased the goods himself, in which [351] case some notice, at least, would have been given that the property in the Insolvent's possession was not his own. And, as was said by Bayley, J., in Nias v. Adamson (3 Bar. and Ald., 231), 'there is no hardship in this, for it is clear, that the goods cannot be purchased with money belonging to the Bankrupt himself; and, if purchased by money belonging to a friend, it is as easy for the friend to buy it and to have the legal property transferred to him.'

The Defendant filed in the Supreme Court a petition for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against the judgment of the Court, but as the subject matter was under Rs. 10,000, the Court refused to allow the appeal.

The Defendant then presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council, praying for leave to appeal from the decree of the Supreme Court. The grounds for the application, as stated in the petition, were, that the application for leave to appeal was refused by the Supreme Court solely in consequence of the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, the amount of the nett proceeds being under the appealable value of Rs. 10,000, therein prescribed; that the question at issue was one of general interest in the insolvency beyond the mere amount of the nett proceeds, inasmuch as the other creditors of the Insolvent, subsequent to the Insolvency, were interested in, and the other property acquired by the Insolvent since his insolvency was affected by, the decision, and that the question was also of general importance in India, as involving the construction and working of the Insolvent Act, 11th and 12th Vict. c. 21.

[352] Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., in support of the petition.

Their Lordships * (Feb. 1, 1860) granted the application, upon the sum of £300 being deposited for costs.

The appeal now came on for hearing.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Appellant.—It is submitted, first, that the loan, bond, and mortgage formed one contemporaneous transaction. The mortgage was endorsed on the bond, and it was the intention of the parties, previous to the purchase and loan, that the lien or charge of the Appellant upon the property should precede any interest of the Insolvent. Such is clearly the substantial effect of the acts and dealings of the parties, and unless this view be taken, the assignment was without meaning, as the debts of the Insolvent exceeded the value of the goods and chattels intended to be mortgaged. But, secondly, even if the goods had not vested in the Appellant, as we insist they did, the fact of the Insolvent having been allowed by the Official Assignee to carry on the business of the Hotel on his own account, and deal with the goods and chattels as his own property, is conclusive against any claim by him on behalf of the creditors, and estops him from disputing the assignment to the Appellant. As the Official Assignee did not, under the 86th section of the Statute 11th and 12th Vict. c. 21, enter up judgment against the Insolvent, he cannot claim any property acquired by the [353] Insolvent subsequent to his insolvency. If the Official Assignee could take the property it would be subject to the same equities which subsisted between the Insolvent and the Respondent.

Upon the question whether the proceeds of after-acquired goods belonged to the Assignees of an uncertificated Insolvent or to the mortgagee, the following cases were relied on:—Platel v. Bevil (2 Exch. Rep. 519), Jackson v. Burnham (5 Exch. Rep. 173), Ashley v. Kell (Stra. 1207), Halsgrave v. Hodges (3 Drew. 74), Hosker v. Hallowell (2 Sm. and Giff. 498), Badley v. Culverwell (8 Barn. and Cr. 448), Foote v. Groves (1 Ves. Jun. 280), Row v. Dawson (1 Ves. 331), Langton v. Horton (1 Haro. 549), Curtis v. Auber (1 Jac. and Wal. 526), Tapprell v. Hildrean (6 Man. and Gr. 245), Carvalho v. Burn (4 Barn. and Ad. 382; S.C. 1 Ad. and El. 883; 7 S.C. 1099), Lempriere v. Pasley (2 Term. Rep. 486), Everett v. Buckhouse (10 Ves. 94), Becher v. Oldfield (6 Bingham. N.C. 102), In re Atkinson's Trusts (2 De G. Mac. and Gor. 140), In re Barr's Trusts (4 Kay and John. 219), Winch v. Kerley (1 Term. Rep. 649), Twiss v. White (3 Bingham. 486), Woodland v. Fidler (3 Per. and D. 570), Fraughton v. Gitley (Amb. 630), Tucker v. Hernaman (1 Sm. and Giff. 394; S.C. on appeal, 1 De G. Mac. and Gor. 399).

Mr. Lewis, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Respondent.—The principle which concedes to the creditors of an Insolvent, debts contracted in public trade subsequent to his insolvency, a priority of payment out of the profits of such trade, has no application to a debt [354] contracted in the manner stated in this case. Immediately upon the purchase of the effects in question by the Insolvent, on the 7th of February, 1859, the same were vested in the Official Assignee. The subsequent assignment of such effects by the Insolvent to the Appellant could not prejudice or affect the title of the Assignee, as the statutory title of Assignees under insolvency is not subject to any equity arising from dealings of the Insolvent subsequent to the insolvency, except in certain cases in which the fact of the person asserting the equity is shown to have been ignorant of the insolvency. That is the distinguishing ingredient in cases of this kind which is lost sight of by the Appellant. Exp. Boulton (1 De G. and Jo. 163) is a strong case in our favour. There a holder of shares in a Railway Company was one of the secretaries of the Company and a Solicitor. He borrowed money of a client on a deposit of a certificate of the shares, but no further notice of the deposit was given to the Company. The Solicitor became Bankrupt; and it was held by the Lords Justices that the shares were in his order and disposition with the consent of the client. In the present case it cannot be denied that the Appellant was aware of the insolvency at the time of the transaction in question. Such knowledge is fatal to his claim to have a prior lien. Neither can it be urged that there has been any act or default on the part of the Assignee whereby he can be deemed to have waived or lost his right to such effects in priority to the claim of the Appellant.

Next, we submit, that the loan, bond, and mortgage did not form one transaction, or that the parol agreement for a lien at the time of the advance of the [355] money constituted an equitable lien. The authorities upon this point are conclusive. In Exp. Coombe (4 Madd. 251), Sir John Leech says, "A good equitable mortgage was made by the deposit of the original lease, but the parol agreement to deposit the further lease can give no title." Although it was held by Lord St. Leonard's, in re Atkinson's Trusts (2 De G. Mac. and Gor. 140), that the title of an equitable assignee for value of an equitable interest is not affected by the previous insolvency of the assignor; yet that case is distinguishable from the present. There the Assignee had no notice of the insolvency. Exp. Hooper (19 Ves. 477) is an authority, that where there was a mortgage to secure a sum of money, and the mortgagor afterwards entered into a parol engagement that further sums advanced subsequently to the mortgage should be tacked to the original mortgage, and the mortgagor afterwards became a Bankrupt, that a further mortgage was not created on the strength of the parol engagement. [Lord Chelmsford: It is impossible that you can split up the transaction or contend that the Assignee is not subject to the same equities as the Insolvent himself.] There may be an equity between the Insolvent and the Appellant, but not necessarily so as against the Assignee. It is necessary to establish that the party dealing with the Insolvent should not have had notice. [Lord Kingsdown: If that be so, as you broadly lay down, an Insolvent could deal with nobody.] You must look to the conduct of the party contracting with the Insolvent. If he, knowing the insolvency, supplies him with goods, he gives him a false ground for future credit. But, admitting that the loan, bond, [356] and mortgage must be looked at as forming one transaction; yet in every case where property passes through the Insolvent and is dealt with as his, the statutory title of the Assignee at that moment attaches. There are only two classes of cases in which the statutory title of the Assignee is displaced: first, where the Insolvent is allowed by the Assignee to continue trading, then we admit that subsequent creditors have a preference on subsequently-acquired property. This is allowed on the ground of public policy and the conduct of the Assignee in leading the public to give the Insolvent credit. Here there was no public trading. It was a mere secret and private dealing. The second class is in choses in action. That rests on the peculiar nature of the property; but even there, want of notice of the fact of insolvency forms an essential ingredient.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—The case rests upon a narrow point. Under the Statute, 11th and 12th Viet. c. 21, the Assignee has a right to the subsequently-acquired property of an Insolvent, unless the Insolvent has obtained a certificate and discharge; but the Assignee's right to the subsequently-acquired property is subject to two qualifications. In the first place, if the Insolvent has acquired property subject to liens and obligations, then any property taken by the Assignee under that state of things is taken subject to those charges and equities which affect the property in the hands of the Insolvent. The second qualification is this, that if the Insolvent carries on trade at a subsequent period, with the assent of the Assignee of the estate under the Insolvent Act, in the first instance the property which is acquired in the [357] subsequent trade will be subject in equity to the charge of the creditors in that trade, in priority to the claim of the Assignee under the first insolvency.

Now, in this case, when the facts are understood, their Lordships cannot entertain the slightest doubt. It is admitted that what has been done might have been done in such a way as to exempt the property from the claim of the Assignees. Then what is the transaction which takes place? The Insolvent carries on for a certain time the business of a Hotel, as agent or manager for other persons. On the 7th of February, 1859, he makes an arrangement with the Appellant, by which he becomes the purchaser of the property now in dispute, and carries on the trade subsequently on his own account, with the knowledge of the Assignee under the insolvency. Under what circumstances, then, does he acquire the property by which the subsequent trade is carried on? Does he acquire an absolute right to it, discharged from any lien, or does he acquire a right to it subject to a legal or equitable title on the part of other persons?

Now, it appears that a sum of money was advanced by the Appellant for the purpose of being laid out in the purchase of the property; and at the time it is advanced, it is advanced subject to an agreement, that it is to be laid out in that particular manner, and that the property is to be assigned to the person who advances the money in order to secure the repayment. A mortgage is executed accordingly. It is one transaction by which the Insolvent never acquired anything except subject to the lien of the creditor, and the Assignee can stand in no better situation.

Their Lordships, therefore, must advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed, and with costs.

[358] ANUNDMOHUN PAL CHOWDHOORY, and Others,—Appellants; KISHEN CHUNDER BANNERJEA CHOWDHOORY, and Others,—Respondents :
[Dec. 4, 1860].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Heard ex-parte.

Money was advanced by A. to B. and others. The repayment, by instalments extending over a period of eleven years, of the principal and interest at 12 per cent., per annum, calculated up to a certain date, was secured by three instruments, consisting of a Dye Shooder Ijarah (usufructuary lease), a Dur Ijarah Kurbooleat (underlease agreement), and a security bond. A balance being found due on the expiration of the stipulated time for payment, the securities were put in suit, when it was pleaded in defence that the lease and underlease were a fraudulent contrivance to cover illegal interest, and, therefore, void by secs. 8 and 9 of Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793. Held in the circumstances, and from the accounts, that the transaction was not a device, or evasion of the law of usury, within that Regulation.

This suit was instituted in the Civil Court of Zillah Backergunge, to recover money due to the Appellants on a loan transaction secured by mortgage. The principal questions raised were, first, whether the Respondents had, as they alleged, paid off the loan, and secondly, whether the Respondents had proved that the loan, and the deeds by which its repayment with interest was secured, together constituted a de-[359]-vice, within the meaning of Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793 (a), to elude the rules regarding interest, prescribed by that Regulation.

(a) The following are the sections of Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793, bearing upon this point, and referred to on the hearing of the appeal:—

Sect. II.—First: If the cause of action shall have arisen before the 28th day of March, 1780, the Courts of Civil Judicature are not to decree higher or lower rates of interest than the following:—

Second: On sums not exceeding one hundred sicca rupees, three rupees and two annas per cent. per mensem, or thirty-seven rupees and eight annas per cent. per annum.

Third: On sums exceeding one hundred sicca rupees two per cent. per mensem, or twenty-four per cent. per annum.

"Sect. IV.—If the cause of action shall have arisen on or after the 1st day of January, 1793, the Courts are not to decree any interest on any sum whatever, above the rate of 12 per cent. per annum.

"Sect. VII.—The Courts are not to decree any compound interest arising from intermediate adjustments of accounts. This rule, however, is not to extend to cases in which accounts between the parties shall have been adjusted, and the former bonds or agreements cancelled, and new bonds or agreements taken for the aggregate amount of the principal and the legal interest remaining due upon the adjustment consolidated into principal.

"Sect. VIII.—The Courts are not to decree any interest whatever, in any case, where the bond or instrument given for the security and evidence of the debt shall have been granted on or subsequent to the 28th day of March, 1780, and shall specify a higher rate of interest than is authorized by this Regulation to have been given and received subsequent to that date.

"Sect. IX.—Nor to decree any interest whatsoever in favour of the Plaintiff, in any case where the cause of action shall have arisen on or subsequent to the 28th day of March, 1780, where a greater interest than is authorized by this Regulation [360] The Civil Court of the Zillah Backergunge decided on both questions in favour of the Appellants; declaring, as to the first, that the written receipts put in evidence by the Respondents to prove the payments were fabricated; and, as to the second, that the Respondents had failed to prove that the case was brought within 8th and 9th sections of that Regulation. The Sudder Dewanny Court upon appeal reversed the decree of that Court on the second question only, declaring that the case was shown to be within sec. 9 of that Regulation, and dismissed the suit with costs, thereby, in effect, decreeing an entire forfeiture of both the principal and interest due to the Appellants from the Respondents.

The circumstances out of which the suit arose were these:—

On the 15th of October, 1844, Woomakunt Bannerjea, since deceased, the father of the second and fourth Respondents, obtained a loan of Rs. 15,000, from the Chy-tunno Kishen Pal Chowdhoory, Banker, also since deceased, and the father of one of the Appellants, named Ram Kishen Pal Chowdhoory and Kally Kishen Pal Chowdhoory, and uncle of the other Appellants Anundmohun Pal Chowdhoory, Gobind Chunder Pal Chowdhoory, Mohesh Chunder Pal Chowdhoory, and who, together with his sons and nephews, constituted an undivided Hindoo family.

At the time when the money was agreed to be lent it was also agreed, between the borrower and lender, that three several instruments should be executed by Woomakunt Bannerjea, in order to secure the repayment, by instalments, extending over a period of eleven years and ten months, of Rs. 15,000, [361] together with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum.

These instruments were dated 1 Kartick 1251 (the 15th of October, 1844), and registered in the District.

The first of these instruments, executed by Woomakunt Bannerjea called an Ijarah Pottah (instrument of lease), and sometimes a Dye Shoodde Ijarah (usufructuary lease), was as follows:—

“To Chy-tunno Kishen Pal, son of Kishen Mungul Pal, deceased, inhabitant of Lohojung, Thannah Rajabaree, Zillah Dacca. This Ijarah Pottah is executed by Woomakunt Bannerjea Chowdhoory, inhabitant of Kaleepara, Thannah Sreenaggur, in the above District:—My ancestral Zemindary, Talook, and Howalas, comprise a one-third of the whole 12-anna share of Pergunnah Ramnuggur, bearing a proportionate Sudder jumma of Rs. 1,220 5a. 3p., out of the whole Rs. 3,660 15a. 9p.; a 4-anna share of the entire 16 annas of Tuppah Kaderabad, the proportionate Sudder jumma of which is Rs. 240 11a. 3p., out of the whole Rs. 962 13a., subordinate to the Collectorate of Zillah Backergunge, and in my Nij (own) name; Talook Abdool Momeen, the collections of which are included in Zillah Hyderabad, bearing a Sudder jumma of Rs. 3 4a., and 3p.; Kharija Chuckla Noorpoor, the collections of which are realized along with Zillah Rajnuggur, and which is named Howala Atush Khan, bearing a Sudder jumma of Rs. 21 5a. 4p.; Howala Anwar Khan, the jumma of which is Rs. 21 5a. 4p.; and Howala Sultan Mahomed, bearing a Sudder jumma of Rs. 1 1a. 1p., subordinate to the Collectorate of Zillah Dacca [362] Gelalpoore; so that in the above two districts my rights bear a total Sudder jumma of Company's Rs. 1,508 6p. The whole of this, I, of my own consent and free will, do farm out to you for a term of 11 years and 10 months from the month of Kartick, 1251, to the month of Sawun, 1263. The Mofussil proceeds of the whole, according to the fixed annual collections, are these:—in Pergunnah Ramnagore, Mouzah Balia, Mouzah Barjalia, and Jowar Shajeera, yield Rs. 3,391 10a. 3p.; Tuppah Kaderabad, Rs. 831 10a.; and Talook, Abdool Momeen, Howalas Atush Khan, Anwar Khan, and Sultan Mahomed, appertaining to Kismut Muchooa, Rs. 107 12a.; in all, Rs. 4,331 3p. Deducting from this sum the expense of collections to be incurred by you as heretofore, and the Chuckran allowances in money and lands (that is on account of Pergunnah Ramnuggur), Rs. 344 7a. 6p.; Tuppah Kaderabad, Rs. 133 10a. and Kismut Muchooa, Rs. 8, amounting in all to Rs. 486 1a. 6p., there remains Rs. 3844 14a. 9p.). At this calculation, the Mofussil proceeds during the above term, will amount to

shall have been received, or stipulated to be received, if it be proved that any attempt has been made to elude the rules prescribed in it, by any deduction from the loan, or by any device or means whatever: nor to give any other judgment but for the dismissal of the suit, with costs to be paid by the Plaintiffs.”

Rs. 45,498 4a. 1p.; out of this sum you will make over to me annually the Government revenue for the above term, which, at the above rate (that is, Rs. 1508 6p. per annum), amounts to Co.'s Rs. 17,845 7p. I will pay this sum into the above collectorates. As for the remainder, Co.'s Rs. 27,653 3a. 6p. which, for the above term, will be due to me from you, I have received from you in cash, from hand to hand, on this day, at Lahojung, an advance of Co.'s Rs. 15,000. Instead of repaying this sum, Rs. 15,000, at once, it will be paid by instalments, noted below, within the [363] above term of the Ijarah, 11 years and 10 months; hence, interest on that sum, as per schedule, at the rate of 1 rupee per cent., will, for the above term, amount to Rs. 12,653 3a. 6p. in all, principal and interest, amounting to Rs. 27,653. 3a. 6p., which will be due to you. You will, therefore, retain the aforesaid Zemindary, Talook and Howalas in your own possession and control for the above term of the Ijarah, 11 years and 10 months, collect rents in the Mofussil, according to the gross assets, and, after deducting the expenses of collection and the Government revenue, you will take, in liquidation of the above principal and interest, the whole of the above sum of Rs. 27,653. 3a. 6p., which is due to me. I will not, during the term of the Ijarah, alienate the property mentioned in this Pottah, either by sale or gift. Should the aforesaid Mehals be sold for arrears of Government revenue, then, out of the above amount, whatever will remain due to you at that period, after deducting the sums repaid, will be paid, without any objection, by myself and my heirs. In failure of payment, the same will be realized from my other real and personal properties, and no objection, either on my part or on the part of my heirs, will be admitted. The Sudder and Mofussil expenses and losses, on account of suits relative to the aforesaid Mehals, which are now pending, or which will be instituted in future, in the Civil or Criminal Courts, the Collectorate, etc., will be payable by myself, and you have nothing to do with them. Under these terms, and on receipt of Rs. 15,000, do I execute this Dye Shooddee (usufructuary) Ijarah lease, and take a Kurbooleat. A schedule showing the instalments payable was annexed.

[364] The second instrument was executed by the Respondents, Krishto Chunder Bannerjea Chowdhoo, on behalf of Woomakunt Bannerjea, whose Gomastah he was, called a Dur Ijarah Kurbooleat (an under-lease agreement), and which became necessary as it had been agreed between the principal parties, as is usual, that the mortgagee, Chytunno Kishen Pal Chowdhoo should not enter into actual possession of the property, or into receipt of the rents, under the Ijarah Pottah, but that as lessor under it he would grant (which he did) an underlease to the Respondent, Kishen Chunder Bannerjea, as the appointee of Woomakunt Bannerjea.

To Chytunno Kishen Pal. You have taken an Ijarah lease of the ancestral Zemindaries, Talooks, and Howalas of Woomakunt Bannerjea Chowdhoo. Therefore, Bannerjea Chowdhoo being security, I do, hereby, of my own accord, take a Dur Ijarah from you of the above-mentioned Mehals for the said term of 11 years and 10 months, the annual Mofussil proceeds of which are, as stated in the Ijarah lease, Rs. 3391. 10a. 3p. in Mouzah Balia and Mouzah Burjalia, and Jowar Shajural, appertaining to Pergunnah Ramnuggur; Rs. 831. 10a. in Tuppa Kaderabad, and Rs. 107. 12a. in Talook Abdool Momeen; Howala Atush Khan, Anwar Khan, and Sultan Mahomed, appertaining to Kismut Muchooa, making a total of Rs. 4331 0a. 3p., from which is to be deducted Rs. 486. 1a. 6p., being the collection charges, etc., due to me, as stated in the Ijarah Pottah, as well as the Chuckran allowances in money and lands, viz., Rs. 344. 7a. 6p. for Pergunnah Ramnuggur, Rs. 133. 10a. for Tuppah Kaderabad, and Rs. 8 for [365] Kismut Muchooa, making a total of Rs. 486. 1a. 6p. That, from the remainder of Rs. 3844. 14a. 9p. per annum, or from the total sum of Rs. 45,498. 4a. 1p., accruing during the said term, I will pay to Bannerjea Chowdhoo, the proprietors, according to the terms of the Pottah, the sum of Rs. 17,845. 0a. 7p., being the total amount of Sudder jumma for the term at the rate of Rs. 1508. 0a. 6p. per annum, as stated above, by whom the same shall be paid into the Collectorates. The remainder, Rs. 27,653. 3a. 6p., which would be due to you for the period, shall be paid to you by me without any objection, according to the undermentioned instalments, and on the following months of each year. Failing to pay any instalment, I will pay interest at one rupee per cent. per month. All profits arising from increase, and losses incurred on account of decrease in the fixed collections of the Mehals, caused by inundation, drought, damage, etc., as also all costs of suits pending, or that will hereafter be instituted in the Criminal and Collector's Courts, etc., will go to my account, and you have no concern with them. In case the rents be not paid according to the stated instalments, you will realize them in conformity with the Regulations that are now or will hereafter be in force as regards the collection of rents. I or my heirs are not at liberty to relinquish this Dur Ijarah within the aforesaid period." A schedule showing the instalments payable here followed.

The third and last instrument, called a security bond, was executed by Woomakunt Bannerjea in order to guarantee the due performance of the conditions contained in the above Kurbooleat.

[366] After the execution of these instruments Woomakunt Bannerjea, and the Respondent Kishen Chunder Bannerjea, as such under lessee, were jointly in possession of the land and premises mentioned in the securities.

Woomakunt Bannerjea died in 1845, leaving three sons, the Respondents, Brojo Chunder Bannerjea, Chunder Kunt Bannerjea, and Soorjoo Kunt Bannerjea, his joint heirs him surviving, who accordingly entered into and have since remained in joint possession of the land and premises with the other Respondent, Kishen Chunder Bannerjea.

It appeared that between the 16th Poos B.E. 1251 (corresponding with the 30th of December, 1844), and the 23rd Maugh B.E. 1256 (corresponding with the 4th of February, 1849), the aggregate sum of Company's Rs. 7398. 12a. was paid in divers amounts to account of instalments under the securities, partly by the late Woomakunt Bannerjea, during his life, and partly by the Respondents since his death, but no further payments were received in respect of the loan.

In consequence thereof, the Appellants, together with one Mussumaut Shukee Monee Chowdhoorane, since deceased, who had survived Chytunno Kishen Pal Chowdhoory, put the securities in suit, and, on the 28th of February, 1853, they filed a plaint in the Zillah Court of Backergunge, which, after setting forth that the loan of Rs. 15,000, and also the other principal facts before mentioned, sought to recover a balance, after crediting the amount so received as aforesaid, of Rs. 18,381. 10a., due from the Defendants at the date of plaint, under the three several instruments, [367] which were therein relied on, as having been duly executed, to secure the repayment of loan of Rs. 15,000, and interest at 12 per cent. per annum, and in such instalments as aforesaid; and the plaint prayed that the sum of Rs. 18,381 10a., the balance claimed to be due, might be awarded and decreed to be paid from the properties left by Woomakunt Bannerjea, in the deeds mentioned in the instruments, and also from the other real and personal properties of the Defendants.

The joint answer of the Respondents, Brojo Chunder Bannerjea and Chunder Kunt Bannerjea stated, that the loan of Rs. 15,000, was not paid down in cash on the 1st Kartick 1251, but was made up as alleged of a sum of Rs. 11,300, the balance of principal and interest, part of which they submitted was illegal, due from their father, Woomakunt Bannerjea, on five several bonds, and of the sum of Rs. 3700, paid him in cash on the last-mentioned date; that the execution of the lease and sublease was a mere fraudulent contrivance to cover the receipt of illegal interest, the addition of the sum of Rs. 12,653. 3a. 6p. being an illegal anticipation of interest, and the provision as to interest on instalments when over due, being a device to receive compound interest, and that, therefore, the suit ought to be dismissed, even as regarded the small portion of the principal due, with reference to sections 8 and 9 of Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793; that the Defendants had repaid, in respect of the loan, the sum of Rs. 17,972 8a. 8p. for which they held receipts, and a further sum of Rs. 700, for which, as they admitted, they had no written acknowledgment; that the right and interest in the lands mentioned in the instruments [368] of mortgage securities were not liable to be sold by auction, or the amount due to be recovered from the same, as the Mehals had been alienated.

The replication denied the statements in the answer, and in particular the payments therein alleged were denied. The replication explained that the sum of Rs. 12,653. 3a. 6p., stated to be the total amount of interest, was not interest on the whole principal sum of Rs. 15,000, for the whole term of 11 years and 10 months, but only on the balance from time to time to remain outstanding, supposing each instalment was paid at due date, and that, therefore, if the instalments were not duly paid, the provision in the mortgage securities for the payment of interest thereon was just and legal, and it was denied that any excess of legal interest or compound interest had been received.

The answer of the other Respondent, Kissen Chunder Bannerjea, stated that the amount of the liability of Woomakunt Bannerjea, together with illegal interest thereon, was determined at Rs. 15,000, and the securities were given to cover that sum with interest; that as he was then Gomastah of Woomakunt Bannerjea, he signed his name to the sublease as requested by him, but that, with this exception, he had no connection with the debt, or with those instruments, and was not in possession of the property.

An account was filed which showed that the balance of Rs. 18,381. 10a., principal money and interest sought to be recovered by the plaintiff, was owing. This account so given in evidence was calculated on this principle. The principal money, beginning with full amount of the original loan, viz. Rs. 15,000, was entered in that account in one column, and simple [369] interest thereon, accruing, under the agreement, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, was separately entered in another column; and the account showed that the sums actually paid from time to time were, as received, applied first to the discharge of the interest accrued due, and, when the amount of any payment was large enough to admit of it, which was only on two occasions, viz. the 15th Poos, 1251, and 18th Poos, 1252, the surplus was applied in reduction of the principal. The Defendants filed statements of account with the object of making it appear that illegal interest had been charged by the Plaintiffs.

The Plaintiffs filed, as their evidence, the three several instruments forming the mortgage securities hereinbefore mentioned. Ten witnesses also were examined by them to prove the loan and actual payments by Kishen Pal Chowdhoozy of the full sum of Rs. 15,000, at the time of the execution of the instruments as well as the due execution of the latter by Woomakunt Bannerjea and Kishen Chunder Bannerjea respectively, and also that promises of payment of the balance claimed by the Appellants to be due had been made by the Respondents since Woomakunt Bannerjea's death. The Defendants filed five documents purporting to be Bengalee Bonds, and alleged to have been executed by Woomakunt Bannerjea, at different dates between the 7th of February, 1837, corresponding with the 26th Maugh, 1243, B.E. and 24th of September, 1844, corresponding with the 9th Assin, 1251, B.E., in favour of Kishen Pal Chowdhoozy, as the lender of the moneys therein respectively mentioned, and which these alleged Bonds purported to cover, in the whole [370] the aggregate sum of Rs. 9700 for principal moneys admitted to have been lent, exclusive of interest, which was conditioned to be paid, on the principal moneys aforesaid, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. None of these Bonds had been registered. They also filed certain other documents, five of which purported to be the suleanas (yearly receipts), having different dates between 17th of March, 1845, corresponding with 5th Cheyt, 1851, B.E., and 19th of March, 1852, corresponding with the 7th Cheyt, 1258, B.E.; and the remaining fifteen documents, purporting to be the dakhillas (receipts) bearing different dates between the 31st of December, 1844, corresponding with the 17th Poos, 1251, B.E., and the 2nd of January, 1852, corresponding with the 19th Poos, 1258, B.E. The aggregate amount alleged to be covered by those fifteen documents was Rs. 17,972. 8a. 8p.

None of these alleged suleanas and dakhillas, it appeared, were written on stamped paper, but they had each been stamped two months subsequent to the date on which the plaint was filed.

Ten witnesses were examined on behalf of the Defendants to establish the suleanas and dakhillas filed, and these witnesses were also examined to prove that the sum of Rs. 15,000, was not paid in full, but that some part of it was made up of illegal interest charged under a verbal agreement made at the time of the alleged execution of the five several last-mentioned Bonds, and, as it appeared, directly at variance with the condition on the face of them, which provided for the payment of interest at 12 per cent. per annum only.

[371] The hearing of the suit took place before Mr. Kemp, the Acting Judge of the Zillah Court of Backergunge, into which Court the suit had been transferred from the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen.

The judgment and decree of the Court was pronounced on the 5th of April, 1855: the decree after holding that the sulemanas and dakhillas were fabricated, proceeded in those terms:—"The whole drift of the defence is to bring the transaction under the provisions of sec. 9, Reg. XV. of 1793. These provisions are very stringent, and, in my opinion, can only be enforced where the contract is so covert as to be manifestly a device implying trickery. A contract will not be bad under either sec. 8 or 9 of the Usury Regulation, unless there has been a clear attempt to obtain on the whole more than the principal, with legal interest. In the present case there has been no such attempt. The principal in this suit, or Co.'s Rs. 15,000, is stated by the Defendants to be made up of the aggregate of sums due to Plaintiffs on five bonds, interest thereon, and a cash payment. This is denied by the Plaintiffs: but, admitting the statement of the Defendants to be correct, there is nothing illegal in the transaction. To secure the liquidation of the above sum, a Dye Soodee Ijarah of certain Mehals was granted to Chytunno Kishen Pal by the father of the Defendants, Nos. 2 and 3, and the mehals were again sublet to Omakunt Bannerjea, the father of the Defendants, Nos. 2 and 3, in the name of the Defendant No. 1. The whole of these transactions have been formally registered, and are above suspicion. Moreover, they have been acted upon by the Defendants, who admit that [372] they have paid rent, according to the terms of the sub-lease, from 1251 B.S. to 1259 B.S., amounting to no less than Rs. 17,972. 8a. 8p., as per receipts, and Rs. 700 without a receipt. The argument of the Pleader for the Defendants, that anticipation interest has been added to the principal, and that upon the aggregate interest on the lapsed instalments has been charged, will not, if proved, bring the transaction under the operation of section 9: for, as already observed, the Plaintiffs have not attempted to obtain on the whole more than the principal, with legal interest. Let us test this:—the principal is admitted to be Co.'s Rs. 15,000, which was borrowed on the 1st Kartick 1251, payable by Srabun, 1263, B.S.; simple interest on the above sum for a period of 11 years and 10 months would be Rs. 21,300, add this to the principal, and the result is Co.'s Rs. 36,300. Now, the Kistbundy signed by the sub-lessee, Defendant, No. 1, and the security bond signed by Omakunt Bannerjea, father of the Defendants, provides for the payment within the term of lease, or from Kartick, 1251, and Srabun, 1263, B.S., of the sum of Rs. 27,653. 3a. 6p." The judgment then proceeded:—"I now come to the point whether the Plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount of their claim from the property pledged by Omakunt Bannerjea, the father of the Defendants, 2 and 3, and from any other property, real or personal, possessed by the Defendants. I am of opinion that they are entitled to recover. In the security bond it is stipulated that, until the claim of the Plaintiffs be fully satisfied, the property pledged shall not be either sold or alienated. A further stipulation is made that if this property be not sufficient, all other property, [373] real or personal, belonging to the security and his heirs, shall be liable. There now remains to be determined to what extent Defendant, No. 1 is liable. This party admits that he took a sub-lease from the Plaintiffs on the security of Omakunt Bannerjea, the father of the other Defendants. This party may or may not be Benamee for Omakunt Bannerjea: he admits taking the lease, and he must be held to be liable. Holding, therefore, that the Plaintiffs' claim does not come under the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of Reg. XV. of 1793; that the Defendants have totally failed to prove that they have paid the sums alleged by them; and that both the property pledged and any or all other property possessed by any or all of the Defendants, is liable to the recovery of the Plaintiffs' claim, it is ordered that the entire claim of Plaintiffs, with interest from date of suit to date of final recovery, and all costs with interest from this date to date of recovery, be decreed against all the Defendants. Let the amount of this decree be recovered from the property pledged and from any other property of the Defendants."

The Defendants appeal from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

The appeal was heard before Messrs. Raikes, Patton, and Sconce, Judges of that Court, and by a decree of the Court, they declared as follows:—"The first issue which we have to hear and decide is, that the transaction founded upon, is an attempt to elude the rule laid down in Reg. XV. of 1793, whereby greater interest than 12 per cent. per annum is prohibited, and that, under section 9 of that law, the suit should be dismissed. Baboo [374] Ramapershad Roy, (the Pleader for Respondents), said, that in this case there was no device to take excessive and illegal interest, that is a mere matter of calculation. The Judge, whose decision is now before us, says also that there has been no attempt to obtain, on the whole, more than the principal due, with legal interest. To test this, he assumes that simple interest for 11 years and 10 months on Rs. 15,000, would be Rs. 21,300; and he contrasts with that Plaintiffs' claim for interest, Rs. 12,653. 3a. 6p. But the Plaintiffs demand much more than that. They demand not merely the simple interest of Rs. 12,653. 3a. 6p., but, consolidating this with the principal and making one item of Rs. 27,653. 3a. 6p., they claim interest on that from the date of each instalment to the date of liquidation. To show the extent of the Plaintiffs' claim, an account has been taken in this Court. Plaintiffs, in this suit, do not bring their claim for arrears later than the year 1259, in which the suit was instituted; but, for the sake of completeness, we have had an account taken to the final date of liquidation provided in the lease—viz. Sawan, 1263; and from this we find that, while simple interest on Rs. 15,000, from Kartick, 1251, to Sawan, 1263, amounts to Rs. 21,150, the compound interest which the Plaintiffs have stipulated should be paid to them amounts to Rs. 32,432—that is, first, we have the item of Rs. 12,653. 3a. 6p., and, next, the item of Rs. 19,778. 12a. 6p., which, upon all the instalments of Rs. 27,653. 3a. 6p., being unpaid, it is provided should be paid till liquidated. This is exactly the suit which the Plaintiffs now seek to give [375] effect to. Plaintiffs stop at Phagoon, 1259; but, if instead of that date, they had sued at the close of Sawan, 1263, upon a principal debt of Rs. 15,000, they would have claimed on their deed, interest amounting to Rs. 32,432. In the suit before us, Plaintiffs represent the principal debt due to the 13th Pous, 1259, to be Rs. 19,722, and upon that they claim also interest to the same date, amounting to Rs. 6057. 12a. 7p. Now this last item is calculated at 12 per cent., and the first item, called principal, comprises only a portion of the original debt for Rs. 15,000; while all the balance of that sum of Rs. 19,722 is also interest. Not only so, the Plaintiffs admit the receipt of Rs. 7358. 12a. 6p., of which they apportion Rs. 5376 2a. 3p. to principal (meaning thereby both the original debt of Rs. 15,000 and the interest of Rs. 12,653. 3a. 6p. consolidated therewith), and Rs. 2022. 9a. 9p. to subsequent interest. That this is the exact character of the suit, is no matter of opinion—it is a matter of fact and figures: the transaction which Plaintiffs entered into was clearly a transaction intended to evade the law, and we have no alternative under the law but to dismiss the suit. The Pleader, Baboo Ramapershad Roy, has desired to bring the case within the provisions of sec 7, Reg. XV. of 1793, as if it were a case of adjusted accounts, in which a new engagement had been taken for the aggregate amount of the principal and legal interest remaining due at the date of the adjustment. The present case is of a totally different character—that is, the whole interest set forth was prospective interest, and the engagement was, that it should be levied by a double cal-[376]-culation, which we find to largely exceed in amount the rate allowed by law. We reverse the judgment of the Lower Court, and dismiss the suit with costs. Let the Appellants, agreeably to the account prepared by the Khurchanuvees, receive from the Plaintiffs (Respondents) costs of this Court, together with interest from this date up to the date of realization; and, for the costs of the Zillah Court, let them present a petition there, when the necessary order will be passed in regard to the same, in accordance with the orders contained in the Circular Order, dated the 4th of March, 1836.

The appeal was from this decree. No appearances having been put in for the Respondents the appeal was heard ex-parte.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellants.—This is a security in the ordinary form in Bengal. There was no stipulation for usurious interest in the contract, or any condition that the borrower should pay compound interest on the loan. [Lord Kingsdown: It is like the purchase of an annuity payable by instalments.] The suit ought not to have been dismissed under the eighth and ninth sections of Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793, as the particulars of the transaction of loan were fully, openly, and truthfully set forth on the face of the three registered instruments securing the repayment of the loan. It is clear that the execution of these instruments ought not to have been considered and treated as a device within the meaning of the 9th section to elude the rules as to interest prescribed by that Regulation. Khedoo Lal [377] Khatri v. Rattan Khatri (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Adaw. Reps. 10), Bahoo Shamsuddeen Lal v. Bahau Ubbelakh (11 Ben. Sud. Dew. Adaw. Reps. 872), Sheikh Uchur Ali v. Patuk Sher Lal (10 Ben. Sud. Dew. Adaw. Reps. 459). The case of Wise v. Kishankumar Bous (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 201), is distinguishable. That was a shift for usury. The documents were intended to cover a usurious contract. If it was a penalty to pay interest on the non-payment of the instalments the penalty was either good or bad in law; if the former, no question could arise, on the other hand, such penalty, if bad, was distinct from the contract, as shown by these instruments. [Lord Chelmsford: If the Respondents had appeared then the whole question of the alleged receipts could have been gone into.] But the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut only finds that compound interest was stipulated for by the parties; and, admitting for the sake of argument only, that such was necessarily the construction to be put upon these instruments, yet, we contend, that the Court ought merely to have disallowed by their decree such compound interest, as is especially provided for by sec. 7 of the Regulation in question. Lastly, we submit, that sections 4, 7, 8, and 9 of Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793, ought to be read and considered together; and we contend that there is nothing contained in these sections, or in any other part of that Regulation, to deprive the Appellants of their remedy, and, as the Zillah Court held, that they are entitled to a decree for payment to them of the sum sought in the plaint to be recovered, which sum was shown to be less than the amount of principal money then due in respect of [378] the original loan, together with simple legal interest thereon.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—Their Lordships are of opinion, that the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Court ought to be reversed, and the decree of the Zillah Court affirmed, with costs of the Courts below and of the appeal.

[379] MOONSHÉE BUZUL-UL-RAHEEM.—Appellant: LUTEEFUT-OON-NISSA,—*Respondent [June 17, 18, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Provision is made by the Mahomedan law for divorce in either of the two forms.

First, Talâk, and secondly, Khoola.

A divorce by Talâk is the mere arbitrary act of the husband, who may repudiate his wife with, or without cause, but in a divorce of that kind the husband is liable to repay dyn-mohr, or the wife's dower, and Semble, also to give up her jewels and paraphernalia [8 Moo. Ind. App. 395].

A Khoola divorce is with the consent and at the instance of the wife, for which she gives a consideration to her husband for release of the marriage tie [8 Moo. Ind. App. 395].

Non-payment of the consideration-money by the wife does not invalidate such a divorce.

Divorce by Talâk is not complete and irrevocable by the single declaration of the husband, but a Khoola divorce is at once complete and irrevocable from the moment the husband repudiates the wife and a separation takes place [8 Moo. Ind. App. 395].

Suit by divorced wife against her husband to recover her dyn-mohr on the allegation that her husband had dissolved the marriage "by divorcing her," and had obtained from her by force and duress two instruments, first, an

Ibranamah, or release of her dyn-mohr, and secondly, a Khoolanamah, or deed securing her husband the stipulated consideration to be paid by a wife in a case of Khoola divorce. In his answer, the husband denied that a Talâk divorce had taken place, and in order to bar her claim to dower upon that form of divorce set up the Ibranamah and Khoolanamah. Held,

First, that as it appeared from the evidence that the deeds were obtained by force and duress, they could not be supported; and [8 Moo. Ind. App. 398, 399],

Secondly, that upon the admission in the answer of a divorce it must be presumed as a fact, that a divorce of some kind had taken place, and that in the circumstances it was a Talâk and not a Khoola divorce, according to which the divorced wife was entitled to recover her dyn-mohr.

This suit was brought by the Respondent against the Appellant to recover dyn-mohr (marriage gift), [380] secured by Kabeenamah (deed of marriage settlement), by reason of the divorce of the Respondent from the Appellant.

It appeared from the evidence, in the year 1842, the Appellant, a Mahomedan, married the Respondent. On that occasion a marriage settlement was executed, by which the Appellant settled on the Respondent, by way of dower (mohr), Rs. 10,000 and 1000 gold mohurs. That in the early part of the year 1847, the Appellant also married one Shumsoonissa, a rich widow. From that time the Appellant did everything he could to get rid of the Respondent; treating her with great harshness, refusing to permit her to see her mother, denying her food and clothing adequate to her station, in the hope of inducing her to ask for a divorce, by which she would forfeit her right in respect of her dower, and to force her to return the marriage settlement, which was at this time deposited with her mother for safe custody. The Respondent complained to her mother of the treatment she met with from her husband, and begged her to return the marriage settlement to him. In consequence of these complaints her mother, in the years 1848, 1849, and 1850 filed petitions in the Foujdary Court, complaining of the treatment to [381] which her daughter was subjected at the hands of the Appellant, and praying the interference of the Court. Under one of these petitions, she obtained an order on the Appellant to allow her to see her daughter. At the interview which ensued, the Appellant, who was present, said to the mother, "I have divorced her (the Respondent); you give up the paper and take away your daughter." The mother refused at this time to give up the marriage settlement; but subsequently, no redress having been obtained by the petitions, on the 24th of August, 1850, hearing from her daughter that her condition was becoming more miserable, she sent that document to the Appellant. Having obtained the deed, the Appellant compelled the Respondent to execute an Ibranamah and a deed of divorce, after which he turned her out of his house at midnight in a state of insensibility.

In consequence of this treatment the Respondent, on the 7th of September, 1850, filed a petition in the Foujdary Court, for the production of the deed of divorce and other documents. This petition was dismissed, on the ground that the Foujdary Court had no power to make an Order as to their genuineness.

Whereupon the Respondent filed a plaint in formâ pauperis, in the Zillah Court of Twenty-four Pergunnahs, against the Appellant, in which she alleged that the Appellant had dissolved the marriage by divorcing her, and she further stated that two instruments by which she was alleged to have given up her dyn-mohr were obtained from her by fraud and duress, and by the plaint sought to recover her dower of Rs. 10,000, and 1000 gold mohurs, valued at Rs. 16,000, making in the aggregate Rs. 26,000.

[382] The Appellant by his answer, denied that he had divorced the Respondent by Talâk, that she left his house, having substance money of her iddit; and alleged that she had executed an Ibranamah, and had thereby released him from all claims in respect of her dower; and that, on the 24th of August, 1850, she had given him a Khoola and executed a Khoolanamah, by which the claim sought to be enforced by the plaint was barred.

The Respondent, in her replication asserted that the Ibranamah set up by the answer was a fabrication, and that the execution of the Khoolanamah had been obtained by duress, and she contended, that the Appellant by pleading a Khoola divorce had admitted the existence of a divorce, which was Talāk.

By a proceeding of the Court, under sec. 10, Ben. Reg. xxvi. of 1814, the following issues were fixed:—On the perusal of the pleadings the chief points in dispute are these: First, had the Defendant divorced the female Plaintiff or not? Second, had the female Plaintiff, relinquishing her claim to the Kabeen, executed or not the Ibranamah of the 4th of Bysack, 1251, and the Khoolanamah of the 9th Bhadro, 1257? On the perusal of the replication, and the issues on the merits, the issues on law are these:—Although the divorce of the Defendant, and the execution of the Khoolanamah by the female Plaintiff be not proved, still the Defendant states that he obtained the Khoolanamah. Now, according to Mahomedan law, is it tenable or not as claimed by the female Plaintiff?

Evidence was entered into by both parties, and in support of the plea of the alleged Ibranamah, an instrument was put in by the Defendant, purporting to have been executed by the Plaintiff. This instrument, after [383] reciting that the Plaintiff had for a long time been passing her days in the greatest happiness and pleasure as a wife, and that her husband had in every way shown his love and affection towards her, went on to exonerate him from all liability in respect of her marriage portion, whatever the amount might be. It purported to be witnessed by nine persons, of whom only one, Ahmed Hosein, was called as a witness, and he admitted that he himself did not see the document signed by the Plaintiff, but stated that he recognized her by her voice from behind a purdah (screen). In support of the Khoolanamah, six witnesses were examined by the Defendant, of whom two only, Syud Mahommud and Syud Allee (Ameen of the Defendant's Mudrissa), deposed to having seen the Plaintiff execute it. Syud Mahommud, however, admitted that he did not know whether the Plaintiff signed it voluntarily or not, and both witnesses were contradicted as to the circumstances of the execution by the statement contained in the Khoolanamah.

The Court directed a Futwa by the Mahomedan Law Officer attached to the Court.

The case submitted to the Moulvie and his Futwa thereon, was as follows:—“Luteefut-oon-nissa Beebee claims her dyn-mohr money, stating that Moonshee Buzul-ul-Raheem married her on a dyn-mohr of the sum of Rs. 10,000, and 1000 gold mohurs, and consummated the marriage, and they lived as husband and wife. Afterwards he, without fault, and without her pleasure, divorced her from himself. Therefore, she prefers the claim to the dyn-mohr. Moonshee Buzul-ul-Raheem states that he did not divorce her, and did not declare that he had divorced her; but that she had given him a Khoola, and executed a Khoolanamah accordingly. The wife says that the allegation of the Moonshee aforesaid, to the effect that he got a Khoola, is, conformably to Mahomedan law, a proof of the divorce. Under these circumstances, if the Talāk and Khoolanamah aforesaid are not established, still is the Moonshee liable by Mahomedan law for the dyn-mohr on his own allegation that he had received a Khoolanamah?”—“Answer.—The husband's statement of the Khoola taking place, and of the wife's denial of it, are of two kinds; First, the man claims Khoola in this manner, viz. ‘I have entered into a Khoola with my wife in lieu of so much property, and she has voluntarily agreed to it; I am, therefore, entitled to that much of the property.’ The wife denies the Khoola, and the man is unable to adduce proof of his claim. Under these circumstances, there shall be a divorce inferred in consequence of the husband's admission, but the claim to the property, that is to say, in lieu of the Khoola, shall remain as it was, that is to say, it shall not be proved without the wife's admission, or testimony of witnesses; because the claim is based on two things; one, Talāk, which is to be proved by the admission of the husband, since he is competent to make the divorce, and it does not depend on the acknowledgment of the wife; and the other is the wife's liability to payment of the property in lieu of Khoola, which cannot be proved unless the wife has agreed to it. The wife's agreement, however, is proved either by her own admission, or by evidence of witnesses. The second kind is this: the wife claims from the beginning, saying, ‘My husband has divorced me after consummation of the marriage; I am, therefore, fully entitled to the whole mohr and iddit allowance.’ The husband in answer, in order to repel the [385] claim to mohr and iddit allowance, alleges execution of the Khoola, stating that 'The wife has given me a Khoola : my liability to her claim of the mohr and iddit allowance is extinct.' This second kind conforms to the question. The divorce on which the wife claims her dyn-mohr is irreversible divorce, and carries with it no property. This divorce, however, if proved, obliges the husband to pay the entire mohr and iddit allowance. The divorce which is dependent on the Khoola, which the man alleges is quite a different one, and this divorce, if proved, extinguishes the mohr, as also the stipulation for the iddit allowance. Under these circumstances the allegation of Khoola which the man makes can never be admission of or submission to the divorce alleged by the wife. So, if the wife's allegation be proved, the husband shall be fully liable for payment of the mohr and iddit allowance; and if the husband's allegation be proved, in that case the entire mohr and nufka (maintenance) to which he was liable will become extinct. If the allegation of neither be proved, then the mohr shall remain in force as it was, that is to say, it will not be extinguished. The difference between the two kinds is, that in the first kind the husband claims the Khoola; and the object of his alleging the Khoola is to claim the property in lieu of which divorce is made, and the wife denies this. Since the Khoola is the same as that of an irreversible divorce, and, as the husband is competent to give a divorce, therefore, divorce, according to his admission, is established; but as the wife's liability to give property cannot be proved without her consent and acknowledgment, therefore, proof of the wife's liability depends entirely upon her own admission or evidence of witnesses. And, in the second kind, the [386] wife claims mohr and iddit allowance against her husband on the ground of divorce being effected without property, and the husband denies the claim, and in order to render void the wife's claim, alleges that she, of her own accord, has relinquished the marriage and extinguished it, and mentioned this relinquishment as being the Khoola. Under the circumstance, although the husband apparently claims the Khoola, yet she is the Defendant, and denies it, for the object of the Khoola is merely to rebut the claim of the mohr, and not to prove any property due by the wife, nor to prove the divorce which is included in the Khoola. The allegation of this Khoola can never prove the wife's claim, which rests on the Talâk without property, if the wife's claim, founded on divorce without property, is not proved, and if the husband's allegations of Khoola effected in lieu of property be not also proved. In that case, the wife's claim of dyn-mohr shall continue in force as before, and the husband's allegation of Khoola shall be extinct. As proof of divorce depends on Khoola being made, and as it is unnecessary for the husband to prove the divorce, and as he is not also required to prove the Khoola, his object being to rebut the claim to the mohr, therefore, when Khoola, which is the chief thing, is not proved, then Talâk, which is a branch of it, and is not the object sought for, shall not be established, because neither the husband nor wife claims this divorce. When divorce is not proved, in that case the liability of payment of the whole mohr and also the iddit allowance on the divorce, shall also not be established."

The cause was heard by the Principal Sudder Ameen (Baboo Lokenath Bose), who by his judgment found that [387] the Respondent had failed to prove a simple divorce (Talâk). With regard to the Khoolanamah and Ibranamah, that Judge observed that "after a consideration of all the facts of the case, the Court is convinced that the Defendant having received intelligence that Shumsoonissa aforesaid was desirous of entering into nika, and having observed the prospects of her wealth, made known his proposals, when Shumsoonissa pleaded that he had a wife, that Defendant having obtained her consent by promising to forsake his wife, afterwards entered upon some oath in her presence regarding a divorce, and was yet under fear lest he should be bound to pay the marriage portion. On this account, having prepared an Ibranamah at the time he became at ease and married; that being unable to treat the female Plaintiff as his wife, he consented to give her a divorce, but subsequently a discrepancy of names was known to exist in the Ibranamah; that the sight of the rival wife being painful, Shumsoonissa aforesaid urged the Defendant to turn her out, but the Defendant had purposed to do so without risk, that is to say, he desired to get back the Kabeenamah, and have a Khoolanamah written out; that as there were no means of doing so easily he began to torment her gradually, and make her pine under anxiety; that having obliged her mother to return the Kabeenamah, he got up a fictitious assembly and invited all great men, and having acted apparently in conformity with Mahomedan law, induced the female Plaintiff to sign, and turned her out of the house at twelve o'clock at night." The Court further decided, that the Khoolanamah and Ibranamah had not been established; and, with regard to the issue in law, the Court held, that the Appellant having pleaded a [388] Khoola, the Respondent was exonerated from proving a Talak, and ordered the Appellant to pay the amount of the Respondent's claim, with interest from the date of the decree up to that of its liquidation.

From this decision the Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

In his reasons of appeal, the Appellant insisted that the finding of the Court against the Khoolanamah was erroneous, and urged that the Principal Sudder Ameen had illegally rejected the Futwa of the Moulvie, although the opinion agree with the Hedaya and other authorities in Mahomedan law. The Appellant also urged, that inasmuch as the Talak divorce by the Appellant, which was relied on by the Respondent, was not proved by the evidence, and as to the Khoola and Khoolanamah set up by him was also at the same time declared not to have been proved, the Court could not legally decree to the Respondent for the amount of the mohr, which was only recoverable on an actual dissolution of the marriage according to Mahomedan law being proved, or on proof of the death of either of the parties.

The Sudder Dewanny Adawlut ordered that a Futwa should be given by the Mahomedan Law Officer of that Court, on the following case submitted to him:—"The wife sues her husband on allegation of divorce for her dyn-mohr (the marriage portion due), and the husband denying the divorce, in order to bar the marriage portion, pleads a Khoola from his wife. By the Mahomedan law, an irreversible divorce is not established, nor is the Khoola of the wife. Under these circumstances, is the mere allegation of Khoola pleaded by the husband a real divorce sustainable or not; and is the wife entitled to claim the whole of the [389] marriage portion, the same as would have been the case on proof of the divorce given on the part of the husband?" The Futwa given was as follows:—"If the case be such as stated, then, by the mere allegation of Khoola on the part of the husband, which is tantamount to a relinquishment of property, the divorce of his wife will be fully established, and the wife will be entitled to demand the whole of the dyn-mohr as in the case of a divorce by the husband being proved." The following authorities were referred to by the Moulvie in support of the Futwa:—The Fosool Emandee, pp. 279, 481 (Calcutta Edit.); The Doorool mokhtar and Tahtanee, pp. 190-1 (Egypt Edit.).

The hearing of the appeal by the Sudder Court took place before Abercrombie Dick, Esq., Henry T. Raikes, Esq., and James Hardwicke Patton, Esq., the Judges of that Court.

The question as to the effect of pleading Khoola by the Appellant was first argued and disposed of by the Court. The material part of the judgment upon that point was in these terms:—"The question before the Court is, whether the mere pleading of a Khoola in defence, and inability to prove it, entitles the Plaintiff to claim immediate payment of dower, notwithstanding she has failed to prove such a divorce by her husband as would have entitled her. We are of opinion, that as Defendant has rested his defence on the Ibranamah and Khoolanamah it has that effect. The plea to exempt from payment of dower in virtue of a Khoolanamah is an admission of such a divorce (that is, an irreversible divorce) as entitles a wife to claim immediate payment of dower; and the release from such liability is dependent on proof of the truth of the Khoolanamah and the Ibranamah, the burden of which [390] lies on the Defendant, for it is a special plea. The Appellant's pleader will, therefore, proceed to show that both those deeds have been duly proved."

The evidence in support of the two instruments, the Ibranamah and Khoolanamah was then investigated, when the Court finally decreed as follows:—"We are of opinion, after a careful consideration of the evidence adduced, and the circumstantial facts on record in the case, that the evidence for the genuineness of the Ibranamah is utterly defective. Only one witness out of seven or eight has been produced to testify to it. It purports to have been executed by Plaintiff under the name of Wozerut-oon-nissa, a name she declares she never bore, and there is no proof that she, Plaintiff, was so called. It sets forth that it was given out of love and affection for her husband, yet it bears the same date as his marriage with another lady, who had declared she would not enter his house until Plaintiff was turned out of doors. In short, the terms of the deed, with the reasons for giving it, are altogether irreconcilable with the notorious conduct of the husband to the donor, and the known facts opposed to it. The recital of it in the Khoolanamah by no means proves its due execution. The Khoolanamah is certainly proved to have been witnessed according to forms prevalent among Mahomedans of rank; but there is a remarkable want of care evident on the part of the respectable witnesses who have testified to it, to ascertain that the act of the lady was free and unrestrained. Finally, the recorded fact that no fewer than six complaints of ill treatment by her husband had been presented to the Magistrate by the Plaintiff, from the date of the alleged Ibranamah and the marriage with the second wife to the date of Plaintiff giving up her Ka-[391]-beenamah and executing the Khoolanamah, is sufficient, together with the other circumstances above alluded to, to satisfy the Court that the execution of the Khoolanamah was not a voluntary unrestrained act. It is, therefore, a nullity." The Sudder Court by their decree dismissed the appeal with costs.

The present appeal was from this decree.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant. —First. By the Mahomedan law a divorce may be obtained in two ways; in the first instance, by a form called Talak, and secondly, by what is called Khoola. Hedaya, Bk. IV. ch. ii. p. 213; ib. ch. viii. pp. 314-15. These forms are well known in India. The first is an absolute divorce, at the instance of the husband, without any misbehaviour on the part of the wife, or without assigning any cause. A Talak divorce entitles the divorced wife to have returned her marriage portion. Macnaghten "On Moohummadan Law," ch. vii. pl. 24, p. 58. It is not so in the second form, which is a conditional divorce. By the Khoola form the wife is at liberty, with her husband's consent, to purchase from him her freedom from the bonds of marriage. Macnaghten "On Moohummadan Law," ch. vii. pl. 28, p. 60. Maulvi Abdul Wahab v. Mussumat Hingu (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 200). The Koran, ch. ii. p. 28 (Edit. 1858), lays it down in express terms that "the wife shall redeem herself," and by releasing parts with her dower. Now, we contend, that as the suit was brought by the Respondent to recover her marriage portion secured by deed, the onus of proving the validity of the alleged Talak divorce was clearly upon the Respondent. The decrees of the Courts in India have rightly held that she had failed to prove a [392] Talak divorce on the part of the husband, which was relied upon in her pleadings, as entitling her to sue for her marriage portion provided by the Mahomedan law, and yet, in effect, the Court decree her dyn-mohr as if she had proved her alleged Talak divorce.

Secondly. We submit that the Khoolanamah is sufficiently proved. Khoola is only an offer of divorce on certain terms. The Khoolanamah is the written contract between the parties for a conditional divorce, desired and to be purchased upon certain conditions by the wife. The inconsistency of the decree appealed from is this, that the Courts have found that this deed, although pleaded by the Appellant, but not proved, yet is to be taken as evidence of a Talak or absolute and unconditional divorce. Now, if the Khoolanamah is not proved, there is but one alternative, which is, that there was no divorce at all. In the pleadings the Respondent pleads that her husband divorced her; in the answer that is denied by the Appellant, who pleads that she gave him Khoola, which averment of a fact is reasonable, the second marriage being the inducement for the divorce by Khoola. There is no authority to be found in the Mahomedan law to show that a Khoolanamah, per se, is a divorce. Man and wife living separately does not without evidence of a divorce constitute a divorce. Noorunnissa Begum v. Nawaub Syed Mohsin Allee Khan Bahadoor (7 Ben. Sud. Dew. Adaw. Reps. 40). The Futwa of the Law Officer of the Zillah Court was right (ante [8 Moo. Ind. App.], 386), and the decrees of the Courts below ought to have been conformable to it.

Lastly. By the admission of the Respondent and the evidence, the execution by her of the Ibranamah and Khoolanamah were proved. She entirely failed to prove her plea of duress, or that she had been coerced by the Appellant to execute those deeds.

[393] At the conclusion of the Appellant's argument,

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown observed, that their Lordships were agreed that the deeds relied upon by the Appellant could not be supported, and directed the Respondent's Counsel to confine themselves to the question, whether there was anything in the pleadings, or otherwise, not of the Khoolanamah, from which the Court could find that a divorce had taken place.

Mr. Lloyd, Q.C., and Mr. L. W. Cave, for the Respondent.—A Khoola divorce is irrevocable, according to the opinion of the Moulvie of the Court below, and not conditional, as contended by the Appellant's Counsel. The Hedaya, Bk. IV. ch. viii. p. 316. In this case the circumstances show that the divorce was Talak at the instance of the husband, and not of the wife. With respect to the pleadings we contend that all that the Respondent pleaded in her plaint was that her husband had divorced her. The general averment of such a fact is compatible with a Talak divorce. The Hedaya, Bk. IV. ch. ii. p. 213. The Appellant having by his answer pleaded a special divorce, or Khoola, at the request of his wife, he must be deemed to admit the fact and condition of a divorce, which relieves the Respondent from the necessity of proving a simple divorce; the consequence, therefore, is, that the Appellant having failed to prove the Khoola divorce, is liable to the demand for dower as upon a Talak divorce, for it cannot be denied that a divorce has taken place. The fatwa (see ante [8 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 389) of the Moulvie of the Sudder Courts supports this construction.

[394] Judgment was postponed and now delivered by

The Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 12, 1861).—This suit was instituted in the Civil Court of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs by the Respondent, Luteefut-oon-Nissa, suing as a pauper against the Appellant, Moonshee Buzul-ul-Raheem, to whom she had been married, to recover her dyn-mohr, consisting of the sum of Rs. 10,000 and of 1000, gold mohurs valued at Rs. 16,000, amounting together to Rs. 26,000.

This sum was payable by the Appellant to the Respondent in the event of the dissolution of the marriage, and she alleged in her plaint that the Appellant had dissolved the marriage by divorcing her. She further stated, that two instruments by which she was alleged to have given up her dyn-mohr had been obtained from her by the force or fraud of the Appellant, and were of no avail to bar her rights.

The Appellant, in his answer, denied the divorce as stated by the Respondent, but alleged that two instruments, one a Khoolanamah, had been executed by her, by which she released her dyn-mohr, and which deeds he insisted were binding upon her.

The Zillah Judge was of opinion, that no divorce except by Khoola had been proved by the Respondent, but he held that the plea of the Appellant admitted a divorce by Khoola, and that the instruments set up by him as containing a release of the dyn-mohr were fraudulent and void, and that, therefore, the marriage being dissolved, the Respondent was entitled to recover her claim, and he decreed accordingly.

This decision by the Zillah Court was confirmed [395] by the Sudder, and from the order of the Sudder the present appeal is brought.

Upon the facts, we think, that there is little doubt. The question is mainly one of Mahomedan law, and we should not lightly in such a case disturb the concurrent decision of two Courts. But we are quite satisfied that the decision is conformable both to law and to justice.

It appears that by the Mahomedan law divorce may be made in either of two forms; Talak or Khoola.

A divorce by Talak is the mere arbitrary act of the husband, who may repudiate his wife at his own pleasure, with or without cause. But if he adopts that course he is liable to repay her dowry, or dyn-mohr, and, as it seems, to give up any jewels or paraphernalia belonging to her.

A divorce by Khoola is a divorce with the consent, and at the instance of the wife, in which she gives or agrees to give a consideration to the husband for her release from the marriage tie. In such a case the terms of the bargain are matter of arrangement between the husband and wife, and the wife may, as the consideration, release her dyn-mohr and other rights, or make any other agreement for the benefit of the husband.

It seems, that according to existing usage, a divorce by Talak is not complete and irrevocable by a single declaration of the husband: but a divorce by Khoola is at once complete and irrevocable from the moment when the husband repudiates the wife and the separation takes place. In these particulars the two modes of divorce differ.

But there is one condition which attends every [396] divorce, in whichever way it takes place, namely, that the wife is to remain in seclusion for a period of some months after the divorce, in order that it may be seen whether she is pregnant by her husband, and she is entitled to a sum of money from her husband, called her iddit, for her maintenance during this period.

At the hearing of this case, two points were made by the Appellant's Counsel. They insisted, first, that the instruments releasing the Respondent's claim under her settlement were valid; and, secondly, that if the Khoolanamah executed by the wife were laid out of the case, there was no evidence at all of divorce, and then the marriage was not shown to be dissolved; that the Respondent could not approbate and reprobate the same deed—insist that it was good for the purpose of establishing a divorce, and, bad for the purpose of securing to the husband the price which he was to receive for consenting to it.

This objection, however plausible, is founded on a misconception of the real nature of the divorce. The divorce is the sole act of the husband, though granted at the instance of the wife, and purchased by her. The Khoolanamah is a deed securing to the husband the stipulated consideration, but it does not constitute the divorce. It assumes it, and is founded upon it. The divorce is created by the husband's repudiation of the wife, and the consequent separation. The law might have provided that non-payment of the consideration should invalidate the divorce, but it is clear, as well from the opinion of the Law Officers of the Indian Courts, as from the authorities cited at our Bar, that the law is otherwise.

The non-payment by the wife of the consideration [397] for the divorce no more invalidates the divorce than in England the non-payment of the wife's marriage portion invalidates the marriage.

In this case the husband, while denying a divorce by Talak, not only did not deny but set up a divorce by Khoola. He alleged distinctly, in his answer, that the Respondent took from him a Furuckuttee (which is a deed of divorcement), that she took from him also the subsistence money of her iddit, and gave him a receipt for it, and that she then quitted his house with the assent and under the care of her mother.

That a divorce, therefore, had taken place, was the common case of both parties, and the only question was, whether the husband could insist on receiving the consideration for which he says that he had stipulated.

This must depend on the validity of the deeds which he sets up in bar of the Respondent's demand. The dissolution of the marriage being admitted, it is for the Appellant to make out that the Respondent has given up the rights which prima facie result from the dissolution, and upon this part of the case their Lordships have never felt the least doubt.

Two instruments are relied on by the Appellant: one an Ibranamah, or instrument by which the wife is made, out of regard and affection for her husband, voluntarily to release to him all claim to her dyn-mohr. This instrument purports to have been made on the 16th of April, 1847. It states that the settlement by which the dyn-mohr is secured is in the possession, not of the wife, but of her mother; that the wife, therefore, cannot give up the in-[398]-strument, and is not aware of what the dyn-mohr consists.

There is nothing like satisfactory proof that the Respondent ever gave her assent to this deed with a knowledge of its contents, and the admitted facts of the case make it in the highest degree improbable, almost impossible, that she should have done so.

At the time at which this instrument purports to have been made, the husband had married, or was on the point of marrying, a second wife, as by law he was entitled to do. The evidence of one of the witnesses states, that the marriage took place either in April, 1847, or in the following October; and from the time of the marriage, and indeed from the time when it was decided upon, their Lordships are quite satisfied from the evidence that the Appellant and the Respondent were equally desirous of a divorce. Indeed, it appears that the second wife stipulated as a condition of her consent to the marriage, that her husband should divorce his first wife. He had the power to do so by Talak, but this would not answer his purpose; he desired to get rid of his wife, but to retain her dowry, and he prepared this deed in order that, having procured a release of the dowry, he might exercise his power of divorce. The mother of the wife, however, had possession of the settlement, and refused to give it up, and it seems to have been thought by the husband that it would be impossible for him to establish the Ibranamah unless he could procure a confirmation of it, and a surrender of the settlement by the mother, and a divorce by Khoola. For this purpose he had recourse to measures of great cruelty: he refused to permit the mother to [399] see her daughter, and, by a long series of ill-usage, unless there be much exaggeration in the evidence, injured the health and even endangered the life of the Respondent. The mother, after repeated applications to the Foujdary Court for the protection of her daughter, at last yielded, and gave up the settlement; under such circumstances the Khoolanamah was obtained, which professed to confirm the Ibranamah.

The Courts below have most properly held that instruments so obtained can have no legal effect. They can be of no more avail, when used as a defence against the claims of the wife, than they would have had if the husband were suing upon them as Plaintiff to enforce rights secured to him.

Their Lordships are quite satisfied that the judgment complained of is correct, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm it, with costs.

[400] MYNA BOYEE, and Others.—Appellants; OOTARAM, MYARAM, and TAUKOORAM,—Respondents * [June 19, 20, 1861].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

H., an Englishman, had five children by two native Hindoo women, one of whom was of the Brahmin caste, a married woman, though living apart from her husband. The five children were brought up as Hindoos, and lived together as a joint family. H. by his Will devised an estate to the five illegitimate children in equal shares: Held,

First, that the illegitimate children were to be considered as Hindoos, and their rights governed by that law [8 Moo. Ind. App. 420];

Second, that being children of a Christian father by different Hindoo mothers, although constituting themselves co-parceners in the enjoyment of the property after the manner of a joint Hindoo family, yet that the partnership so constituted differed from the co-partnership of a joint Hindoo family as defined by the Hindoo law; and that, at the death of each son, his lineal heirs representing their parent would be entitled to enter into that partnership [8 Moo. Ind. App. 420].

Quære. Whether such right of inheritance enures to collaterals?

A suit was instituted by one of the illegitimate children against his brothers for partition of the estate left them by H. A deed of Rahzeenama was afterwards entered into by the parties, by which the shares and the amounts to be paid to each were ascertained, and provision made against alienation by sale, mortgage, lease or security of any separate share. Held, that this deed did not affect the right which each co-sharer had to alienate by Will.

Where a reference is made by the Court to the Native Law Officers for an opinion upon a question which arises in a suit before the Court, the answer to which may bind a right, the question submitted should embrace all the important facts proved or admitted in the suit, which may affect the conclusion; and it is the duty of the Court itself so to frame the question, that the Court may elicit an opinion upon the very facts upon which the legal title depends. If the facts be not ascertained, but stated and disputed, then the question should embrace either view of the facts.

When the opinion given is apparently irreconcilable with the opinions of approved text writers on the Hindoo Law, those who give the opinion should be asked to explain that which appears, prima facie, irreconcilable; so that they may show on what ground an apparent exception from the general law is inferred; whether on general custom, modifying texts, on local usage, family customs, or other exceptional matter [8 Moo. Ind. App. 422].

If both parties are dissatisfied with a decree of the Court below, a cross appeal is necessary.

An Appeal was brought from part of a decree. At the hearing, held, that although the whole decree was not open to the Respondents, who had not appealed, yet, in the circumstances, leave to present a cross appeal ought to be permitted.

The Appellants having waived the formality of lodging a cross appeal, the appeal was heard from the whole decree [8 Moo. Ind. App. 412, 413].

In this appeal the question in issue related to the right of one Ramaprasad, the husband of the Appel-[401]-lant, Myna Boyee, an illegitimate son of George Arthur Hughes, an Englishman, by a native woman, of the Brahmin caste, a married woman, living apart from her husband, to one-fifth part of the rents and profits of an estate called Kadalkoody, to which Ramaprasad claimed to be entitled as heir of Taukooram, another illegitimate son of the same person.

The facts of the case were these:—

Some time before the year 1841, Hughes died, having made a Will, whereby he devised estate of Kadalkoody in equal shares to five persons, namely, the above Taukooram, and Ramaprasad, and also to Myaram, Chundoolaul, and Oottaram, who were three other illegitimate sons of Hughes by another native woman.

After the death of Hughes, the estate of Kadalkoody was held and enjoyed in common by his five children until some time in the year 1841, when Ramaprasad brought a suit in the Auxiliary Court of Tinnevely, claiming a separation or partition of the one-fifth share of the estate to which he was entitled as a devisee under the Will, and a decree was passed accordingly.

[402] About this time Oottaram, one of the five devisees, died, and after his death his daughters and co-heiresses contracted for the sale of his one-fifth share of the estate to Chundoolaul.

In the year 1843, Taukooram, Myaram, and Chundoolaul appealed to the Civil Court of Tinnevely against the decree of the Auxiliary Court, but before the appeal came to a hearing, a Razeenamah, or deed of compromise, in the form of a petition to the Court, was entered into between the parties.

This instrument was in these terms: “Razeenamah presented by both parties (seven in number) in appeal suit No. 92, of 1843, before the said Court, viz.:—Appellants (1) Taukooram, (2) Myaram, and (3) Chundoolaul. Respondent (4) Ramaprasad, and supplemental Defendants (5) Ganda Boyee alias Toolaja Boyee, (6) Ganga Boyee, daughters of Rama Boyee, widow of Oottaram, and Second Defendant in original suit, No. 39, of 1841, on the file of the late Auxiliary Court, and (7) Tarachund, guardian to Ganga Boyee. In the original suit, wherein the Plaintiff sought to recover from the Defendants as his share one-fifth of the Paliaput of Kadalkoody referred to in the plaint, a decree was passed as sued for. Dissatisfied with this decision, the Appellants preferred the Appeal above referred to, and, after Answer was filed in the said Appeal, the parties entered into a compromise.” The first portion of the compromise had relation solely to the purchase-money of Oottaram’s one-fifth share. The Razeenamah then proceeded as follows:—“Of the said Kadalkoody Paliaput, the share assigned to the third Appellant by Mr. Hughes’s Will is one-fifth, and this added to the one-fifth share purchased [403] by him as stated above, makes his total share two-fifths of the whole estate. The share assigned to the second Appellant, Myaram, under the said Will, is one-fifth, and that left to the first Appellant, Taukooram, and the Respondent Ramaprasad, by the said instrument, is one-fifth each. Thus, it having been settled that we four should enjoy the said Zemindary in five shares, we have entered into the following agreement, viz. That from Fusly 1254, the management of the entire Zemindary shall for life be entrusted to one of us four, viz. Taukooram, the other three abiding by this arrangement. That the Paischush, amounting to Rs. 4469. 8a. 0p. per annum, shall be punctually paid by Taukooram, from and out of the income of the Paliaput, for each Fusly; the Irsal or remittance being made in the names of us all four. That all the repairs necessary to the Paliaput shall be executed by him every year at an annual outlay of Rs. 500, he taking care that the money is properly spent. That of the surplus left of each year's income, after defraying the Paischush, charges of repairs and costs of establishment of that year, Taukooram shall pay to Myaram and Chundoolaul, whatever may fall due to them for their said three shares, as per accounts. That on account of the one-fifth share of Ramaprasad, Taukooram shall, for his life, pay into the treasury of the Court the fixed sum of Rs. 1300 a-year, a moiety thereof being payable on the 11th April, and the other moiety on the 11th July, of each Fusly. That Ramaprasad or the heirs appointed by him shall receive the said sum from the Court. That should the income of Ramaprasad's said one-fifth share for any year exceed the fixed amount above referred to, such excess shall be appropriated by Taukooram. That [404] should the income of the said share fall short in any year of the fixed sum above referred to, Taukooram himself shall make good such deficit. That Taukooram shall be entrusted with the title-deeds of the said Paliaput, and any sharer shall be at liberty to refer to them whenever he wishes. That should the accounts furnished by the Ameen deputed to attach the Paliaput exhibit any old balance outstanding for Fuslies, 1251 to 1253, during which period the Paliaput remained under attachment, Taukooram shall recover the same, and pay to Ramaprasad his one-fifth share thereof, taking a receipt from him. That the other shares also shall receive their shares of the said balance in the same manner. That after Taukooram's death, Ramaprasad, or the heirs appointed by him, shall have the management only of his one-fifth share, subject to profits or loss. That the management of the other four shares shall be entrusted to Myaram or Chundoolaul, or their heirs or representatives appointed by them. That the Ryots, Kurnums, servants, etc., of the Paliaput, shall pay to the other sharers, when they go to visit the estate, the very same respect that they would show to Taukooram or persons entrusted with the management after his lifetime. That the Paliaput shall never be divided, but only the income thereof, of which each sharer shall receive and enjoy his share with reference to accounts of income and expenditure. That neither the sharers, nor their heirs nor representatives appointed by them, shall alienate their respective shares by sale, mortgage, lease or security; all such transactions, if effected, being null and void."

This instrument was filed in the Civil Court, and the estate of Kadalkoody remained under the manage-[405]-ment of Taukooram, in accordance with its provisions, until his death, which occurred on the 21st of January, 1852.

During the lifetime of Taukooram, he and Chundoolaul, and Myaram also, until his death, lived together, as undivided brothers. Ramaprasad, on the contrary, was a divided brother, and between him and Taukooram it appeared great enmity existed.

Upon the death of Taukooram, the management and the absolute beneficial interest in a one-fifth share of the Kadalkoody estate, to which alone Ramaprasad was entitled under the Razeenamali, passed to him, and Chundoolaul entered upon the management of the other four-fifths of such estate in accordance with that, and also assumed possession of the property of Taukooram, to which, together with any disposable interest of Taukooram in the estate, he claimed to be entitled under a Will executed by Taukooram on the 16th of January, 1852.

In February, 1852, Ramaprasad made an application under Act, No. 19, of 1841, to the Civil Court of Tinnevely, alleging that he was entitled to succeed, as sole heir of Taukooram, to all his property, including his one-fifth share of the Kadalkoody estate, and that Chundoolaul had assumed wrongful possession of the property, and praying to be put into possession under a summary order of the Court. This application was rejected by the Civil Judge, and Ramaprasad was left to the institution of a regular suit to establish his alleged title.

Under these circumstances Ramaprasad, in September, 1852, instituted a suit against Chundoolaul in the Zillah Court of Tinnevely, alleging in his plaint that the suit was brought for the recovery of real and per [406] sonal property of the value of Rs. 14,568. 4a. 0p. belonging to his deceased brother, Taukooram, and that Taukooram died leaving no other heirs but Plaintiff, and that the Defendant in order to get possession of the property had forged a Will, and Mookternamah purporting to be executed by Taukooram in the Defendant's favour, and praying that the Court would be pleased to pass a decree adjudging to the Plaintiff, amongst other property valued at Rs. 8000, Taukooram's right and title to one-fifth of the income of the Kadalkoody Estate.

The Defendant by his answer stated, that the Razeenamah provided that after Taukooram's death the Plaintiff should be entitled to his own one-fifth share of the Kadalkoody estate separately and absolutely, and nothing more, and that the Plaintiff and Taukooram were enemies, while the Defendant and Taukooram were friends; and that on the 23rd of March, 1850, Taukooram executed a Mookternamah, vesting all his right and interest in the Kadalkoody estate after his death in the Defendant, and that on the 16th of January, 1852, he executed a Will confirming the Mookternamah, and devising and bequeathing other property to the Defendant, whom he appointed sole executor of his Will.

The Court stated that it was desirable, with reference to the terms of the Razeenamah, that the heirs of Myaram deceased should be made parties to the suit. Accordingly a supplemental plaint was filed, making Laudebhoy Ammaul, the widow and alleged sole heiress of Myaram, a Defendant.

The pleadings being completed, the Court proceeded to ascertain the issues of law and fact raised therein, and found that there were seven issues, of which the [407] second, third and fourth issues of fact, were alone material in this appeal. These issues were:—Second, whether the Plaintiff was, as the survivor of two illegitimate sons of a Hindoo woman, heir-at-law to his deceased brother. Third, whether Taukooram executed a Will in Defendant's favour under date the 16th of January, 1852. Fourth, whether under the Razeenamah in appeal suit, No. 92, of 1843, Myaram and Chundoolaul and their heirs take upon the death of Taukooram his one-fifth share of the Kadalkoody Zemindary to their own use, or in trust for Taukooram's heirs. Upon the above issues, the Court recorded the following points to be established by the parties respectively. Under the third issue, the Defendant was to prove—first point for the Defendant, that the deceased Taukooram left a Will on the 16th of January, 1852, constituting the Defendant his heir. “First point for the Plaintiff—Under the fourth issue the Plaintiff was to put in a copy of the Razeenamah in appeal suit No. 92, of 1843.”

Before any evidence was adduced, the Defendant Chundoolaul died, and on the motion of the Plaintiff the suit was revived, and Oottaram, Myaram, and Taukooram, the minor sons of Chundoolaul, by their guardian, Bhavany Prasad, were made Defendants thereto.

The following question was then submitted by the Zillah Court to the Pundit of the Sudder Dewanny Court for his opinion: “You are requested to state whether, upon the death of one of two illegitimate sons of a Hindoo woman, the estate of the deceased by law devolves upon the surviving brother,” to which the Pundit returned the following answer. “If the illegitimate sons referred [408] to in the question were undivided, the estate of one of them would, after his death, devolve upon the surviving brother. If divided, it would go to him only on failure of the deceased's widow, daughter, or her son, or of the deceased's mother.”

The Will alleged to have been executed by Taukooram in 1852, and the Mookternamah executed by Taukooram in 1850, the identity of these documents, and the execution thereof, were deposed to by three of the four attesting witnesses to the Will, and by four of the five attesting witnesses to the Mookternamah.

The Judge, Mr. Woodgate, pronounced the Zillah Court's decree, by which it decided that, in accordance with the opinion of the Pundit, the Plaintiff was the heir of his divided brother, Taukooram; that the Mookternamah and Will were forgeries, and that the Razeenamah did not debar the Plaintiff from succeeding to the share of the Kadalkoody estate as next heir to his deceased brother, as that document passed only a right of management, and not a beneficial right or interest in the one-fifth share of Taukooram.

Against this decree an appeal was preferred by the guardian of the infant Defendants to the Sudder Adawlut at Madras.

On the 27th of November, 1856, the Sudder Court, consisting of Messrs. Anderson and Harris, pronounced the following judgment:—The Court observes that the Mookternamah was not registered in the Zillah Court, nor was the stamp paper on which it is engrossed purchased by one of the parties to the same, nor did the Defendant act upon that document previous to the death of Taukooram as he ought to have done, had it been genuine. [409] Both it and the Will have been discredited by the Lower Court, and nothing has been advanced in the appeal to lead this Court to consider that the evidence has not been correctly appreciated. As the property was not hereditary, but devised to Taukooram by his father, Hughes, the former had an undoubted right to devise it by Will; but the Court sees no reason to disturb the judgment of the Lower Court, which has declared the Will and Mookternamah not to be genuine documents. The judgment then proceeded, “As regards the right of the Plaintiff to inherit the property of his uterine brother Taukooram, the Court is decidedly of opinion that these persons must be looked on as Hindoos, and subject to Hindoo law. The question as to the Hindoo law of the case has been fairly put to the Pundits of the Court, and the Court is of opinion that the Plaintiff has a right to inherit the property of Taukooram. The Court, however, find it necessary to modify the award of the Civil Judge as regards the one-fifth share of the Paliapur of Kadalkoody, regarding which a Razeenamah was executed by the parties in settlement of appeal suit, No. 92 of 1843. In that suit, the present Plaintiff sued for a one-fifth share of the above Zemindary, and obtained a decree in his favour; this was appealed against, and the above Razeenamah was filed in the appeal suit. It must be borne in mind that as the present Plaintiff was Plaintiff also in that suit, it was his rights which were then specially to be settled. Now, in the Razeenamah, it is distinctly stated that the above Zemindary was never to be divided, nor were the sharers to convey or burden their shares;—a provision was made, not only for the disposal of the property during the life of Taukooram, [410] but also a distinct arrangement made for its disposal after his death:—the very contingency so provided for has led to the present suit. The provision made for this contingency was, that the Plaintiff, or heirs appointed by him, should be invested with the management of his (Plaintiff's) one-fifth share alone, and that the management of the other four shares should vest in Myaram and Chundoolaul or their heirs. It is subsequently provided that without ever dividing the Paliapur, the profits accruing therefrom for the share of each shall alone be divided and enjoyed according to the amount of profits. During the lifetime of Taukooram, the latter was to manage the whole Zemindary, and pay annually into Court the sum of Rs. 1300, as the value of the produce of Plaintiff's one-fifth share: after the death of Taukooram, the Plaintiff was himself to manage this one-fifth share, but it was clearly the intent of the Razeenamah that the right of the Plaintiff should be confined to the enjoyment of his one-fifth share with the management thereof. The right and title to the management and enjoyment of the profits of the other four shares was clearly vested in the other shareholders. The Court is, therefore, of opinion that the Plaintiff is not entitled to recover the one-fifth share of the Zemindary which belonged to Taukooram, and they resolve to reverse that part of the decree of the lower Court, which awards that share to the Plaintiff. In other respects the decree of the lower Court is confirmed.”

The Plaintiff applied for review of judgment, which the Sudder Court admitted. Ramaprasad, the Plaintiff, died, and the suit was revived by the Appellant, Myna Boyee, his widow and [411] heiress; and Era Saul, the executor and devisee, and Hary Ram, claiming to be the other devisee of the deceased Plaintiff.

The application for a review of judgment came on again before the Sudder Court, and an Order was made by the Court, on the 12th of November, 1857, to the effect that no grounds whatever had been established which would justify the Court in interfering with the judgment already passed in the case. That the Court considered that the arguments used were such as could only be dealt with on a regular appeal from the judgment in question. The Court did not think that they could legally review, or be justified in reviewing, a judgment, because the decision was not that which, perhaps, the present Court would give; and the Court found that the matter in issue had been fully discussed, due consideration given, and that no grounds existed for considering that the merits of the case had not been fully understood, and rejected the application for review, with costs.

The Appellants applied to the Sudder Court, for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council from so much of the decree of the 27th of November, 1856, as declared, that Ramaprasad was not entitled to recover the one-fifth of the Zemindary which belonged to Taukooram, and which reversed that part of the decree of the Zillah Court, which awarded the one-fifth share to Ramaprasad, and also from the Order passed on the 12th of November, 1857. The Court admitted the appeal.

The appeal was argued by Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Ayrton, for the Appellants, and [412] Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Respondents.

A preliminary objection was taken by the Respondents, who submitted that the Sudder Court were wrong in admitting the appeal, the value of the matter in dispute being under the sum of Rs. 10,000, and that no special certificate was made on admitting the appeal in accordance with Rule II. of the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, so as to preclude the Respondents taking objection as to the value of the matter in dispute in the appeal and the admissibility thereof; and they further submitted that if the appeal was to be considered as properly admitted, then the whole matter originally in dispute including the question of heirship ought to be open to adjudication at the hearing of the appeal, although no cross appeal had been lodged by the Respondents from that part of the decree.

The Lord Justice Turner.—As leave has been granted by the Court below, the objection to value of the subject-matter in dispute cannot be sustained, but their Lordships are of opinion, that the question of heirship is not open to the Respondents upon this appeal from the decree of the 27th of November, 1856, which decree amounts to a declaration of the Court that the Plaintiff was entitled to inherit the property of Taukooram as heir. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case the Respondents ought not to be deprived of the opportunity of bringing that question before the Court: and they think, therefore, that as to this particular portion of the decree leave ought to be given to the Respondents to bring that [413] point distinctly before the Court by petition for leave to appeal, if the Appellants require a petition of appeal to be lodged. If the Appellants be content to waive the question of form and have a decision of the question upon the merits, in that case their Lordships will consider and dispose of the case as it now stands; but if on the other hand the Appellants adhere to the objection that the question is not open to them before this Court, then the Order will be to give the Respondents liberty to present a petition of appeal confined to this particular point, their Lordships, under the circumstances, thinking it not right now to give the Respondents leave to open the whole of the decree (see as to the allowance of a cross appeal, though not applied for in the Court below, Nana Naram Rao v. Hurree Punt Bhao, 6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 464).

The Appellants' Counsel stated that they were willing to have the case argued without the necessity of lodging a petition for leave to appeal by the Respondents.

The appeal was then heard upon the whole decree of the Sudder Dewanny Court.

It was contended, that the Will and the Mookternamah, alleged to have been executed by Taukooram, were forgeries.

Upon the question, whether the Razeenamah operated as a partition, it was insisted, that Ramaprasad was precluded from claiming, upon the death of Taukooram, an interest in any portion of the Kadalkoody estate beyond his own one-fifth share. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 201 (2nd Edit.), was referred to.

As to the inheritance of illegitimate children, W. H. Macnaghten's "Principles of Hindu Law," Vol. II., note, [414] p. 15, was cited; and, as to the right of a uterine brother to succeed to his deceased brother's estate, W. H. Macnaghten's "Principles of Hindu Law," Vol. II., pp. 66-7.

And, as to the power of a Hindoo, to make a Will, Nagalutchmee Ummal v. Gossao Naderaja Chetty (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 309), and the authorities there cited, were relied upon.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (Aug. 2, 1861).—The facts of this case, so far as they are material to the questions we have to consider, lie in a narrow compass. Mr. George Arthur Hughes, an Englishman, living in India, had two illegitimate children, named Ramaprasad and Taukooram, by a native woman, a Hindoo, who appears to have been a married woman, to have deserted her husband, and to have lived in adultery with Mr. Hughes. This woman appears to have been originally of one of the privileged classes, and not of the Soodra class. Mr. Hughes had also three other illegitimate children, Myaram, Chundoolaul, and Ootaram, by another native woman. By his Will he devised the estate of Kadalkoody to his five illegitimate children in equal shares; to each a fifth share. The children appear to have been brought up as Hindoos and to have lived at first as an united family, but some time after Hughes's death Ramaprasad, the original Plaintiff in the suit from which this appeal arises, instituted a suit for partition and obtained a decree accordingly. There was an appeal from this decree, and pending this appeal the parties compromised, and a Razeenamah, or deed of compromise, was entered into between them. This deed, to which four of the chil-[415]-dren, one of whom, Chundoolaul, had purchased the share of Ootaram, the fifth of the children, who had died, after reciting the Will of Mr. Hughes and the above-mentioned purchase, proceeded, as follows: [His Lordships here read the deed of Razeenamah, ante [8 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 402.]

In pursuance of the arrangement made by this deed Taukooram had the management of the estate during his life, and paid to Ramaprasad the annual sum stipulated for by the deed. On the 21st of January, 1852, Taukooram died intestate and without having had issue, and on his death Chundoolaul took possession of all his real and personal estate, including his one-fifth part of the Kadalkoody estate. The plaint in the suit which has given rise to the appeal before us, was filed on the 18th of September, 1852, by Ramaprasad claiming as the heir of Taukooram against Chundoolaul for the recovery of the real and personal estate of Taukooram. The Defendant, Chundoolaul, by his answer in the suit, amongst other grounds of defence which are not material to be mentioned, stated, that in the partition suit the Plaintiff had declared that he was not related to Taukooram; that if they were co-parceners they were so through their father and not through their mother; and that the Hindoo law was not applicable to them. That each of them having received a certain amount of property under Mr. Hughes's Will, their interest were distinct, and one of them had nothing to do with another's portion; that was the status in which Ramaprasad had, in the partition suit, prayed the Court to place him; and that the decree in that cause was that the parties were not amenable to the Hindoo law, and he insisted that in the teeth of these proceedings in the former suit it was not open to the [416] Plaintiff to claim Taukooram's share of the estate of Ramaprasad; he relied also upon the Razeenamah, insisting that Taukooram's intention that his share of the Kadalkoody estate should on his death pass to him, the Defendant, was evident from the fact of that instrument containing a detailed provision that Taukooram's share, and the management of the other four shares of the estate, should be held in succession by the Defendant and his heirs, or other persons appointed by him; he also set up a Mookternamah and a will alleged to have been made by Taukooram in his favour.

The Plaintiff, by his replication, explained the allegations made by him in the partition suit, and denied that they bore any such meaning as was imputed to them by the answer. The rejoinder was a mere recapitulation of the answer.

The only material evidence in the cause was, on the part of the Plaintiff, the Razeenamah, and on the part of the Defendant, the Mookternamah, and the Will, with the depositions of some witnesses in support of those instruments. There was no evidence as to the Plaintiff's title as heir; but upon this point the following question appears to have been submitted to the Pundit of the Court of Sudder Adawlut:—"You are requested to state whether, upon the death of one of two illegitimate sons of a Hindoo woman, the estate of the deceased by law devolves upon the surviving brother?" And to this question the following answer appears to have been returned:—"If the illegitimate sons referred to in the question were undivided, the estate of one of them would, after his death, devolve upon his surviving brother. If divided, it would go to him only on failure of the deceased's widow, daughter, or her son, or of the deceased's mother."

[417] Upon the hearing of the cause in the Zillah Court, the Judge was of opinion that the Mookternamah and the Will were forgeries, and that the provisions of the Razeenamah had reference to the management of the estate, and did not affect the right to it; and resting upon the opinion of the Law Officers, he treated the allegations in the partition suit as irrelevant, and considered the Plaintiff's title as heir to be established. The decree of the Zillah Court, therefore, was wholly in favour of the Plaintiff.

From this decree the heirs of Chundoolaul, who had died in the meantime, appealed to the Sudder Adawlut; but the Judges of that Court were also of opinion that the Mookternamah and the Will were not genuine documents; and as regards the right of the Plaintiff to inherit the property of his uterine brother Taukooram, they were of opinion that those persons must be looked upon as Hindoos, and subject to Hindoo law; and the question as to the Hindoo law of the case having, as they thought, been fairly put to the Pundits of the Court, they considered that the Plaintiff had a right to inherit the property of Taukooram. They accordingly, by a decree dated the 7th of November, 1856, affirmed the decree so far as respects the estate of Taukooram not included in the Razeenamah; but as to the one-fifth part of the Kadalkoody estate, which was included in the Razeenamah, they were of opinion that the intent of that instrument was, that the right of the Plaintiff should be confined to the enjoyment of his own one-fifth share, and the management thereof, and that the right and title to the management and enjoyment of the profits of the other four shares was vested in the [418] other shareholders, and they accordingly held that the Plaintiff was not entitled to recover the one-fifth share of the Kadalkoody estate, which belonged to Taukooram, and reversed that part of the decree which awarded that share to the Plaintiff.

The Plaintiff, however, afterwards obtained, as it would appear ex parte, an Order for the case to be reheard, but he died soon after the making of this Order, without having had issue.

By his Will, which appears on these proceedings to have been disputed, he devised the Kadalkoody estate to the now Appellants, and appointed two of them to be his executors. They accordingly revived the suit, and the Sudder Court having subsequently, by an Order dated the 12th of November, 1857, discharged the Order for re-hearing, upon the ground that the case was more proper to be the subject of appeal, they obtained leave to bring, and have accordingly brought, this appeal, which is from so much of the decree of the 7th of November, 1856, as reversed the decree of the lower Court, so far as it awarded to the Plaintiff Taukooram's share of the Kadalkoody estate, and also against the Order of the 12th of November, 1857.

With respect to the objection raised by the answer that the Plaintiff was precluded, by reason of the allegations made by him in the partition suit, their Lordships are of opinion that no weight is due to that objection. The allegations referred to could, at the highest, operate only, under the circumstances of this case, as an admission against title, on a particular view of the legal status of the party, in point of law, which, if it were erroneous, ought not to [419] have bound the party in another suit for a different object, the Court having before it all the facts relating to the true status.

The immediate question raised by this appeal, therefore, is, whether the Sudder Court was right in the construction which it put upon the Razeenamah. Their Lordships find themselves unable to agree with the Sudder Court upon the construction of this deed. The deed had its original in the partition suit. The result of that suit and of the decree which had been made in it, if carried out, would have been to sever, at all events, one-fifth of the estate, and to destroy, to that extent at least, not only all unity of interest but all power of joint management.

The deed appears to have been framed for the purpose of avoiding these results. It provides that there shall be no sale, mortgage, lease, or security of any separate share: that, during the life of Taukooram, he shall have the management of the whole estate, Ramaprasad receiving a fixed income; and that after his death, Ramaprasad shall have the management of his fifth, and the management of the other four-fifths shall be entrusted to Myaram or Chundoolaul; but these provisions point to management, and to management only. They effect the mode of enjoyment, not the right of property. That right does not appear to be affected by the deed otherwise than by the particular provisions against alienation—provisions which, it is to be observed, are carefully limited by the deed, and do not extend to prevent alienation by devise, for it is plain that the deed contemplates that each co-sharer might devise. It is scarcely possible to suppose that it could be intended that the right to devise should be preserved, but that the right of inheritance [420] should be taken away. Failing this argument upon the construction of the Razeenamah, the Respondents contended that the title of the Plaintiff was nevertheless defeated by that instrument. They argued that all the illegitimate sons were to be considered, as they were considered, and, as it appears to their Lordships, rightly considered, in the Courts in India, to be Hindoos; and that the sons, except Ramaprasad, having continued in common, Ramaprasad could not, by the Hindoo law, be entitled to any portion of the Taukooram's share.

This argument renders it necessary to consider what sort of a partnership was constituted by the actual agreed union of the other sons. They were not an united Hindoo family in the ordinary sense in which that term is used in the text-writers on the Hindoo law: a family of which the father was, in his life-time, the head, and the sons in a sense parceners in birth, by an inchoate though alterable title: but they were sons of a Christian father by different Hindoo mothers, constituting themselves parceners in the enjoyment of their property after the manner of a Hindoo joint family. On the death of each, his lineal heirs, representing their parent, would, by the effect of the agreement, enter into that partnership; collaterals, however, could not so enter by succession, unless the Hindoo law gave, in the case under consideration, a right of inheritance also to collaterals. The parties could not by their agreement give new rights of succession to themselves or their heirs unknown to the law. The law of survivorship, which is the consequence of such a partnership amongst Hindoos, would come in only on failure of the heirs.

A further suggestion was made on this part of the [421] case, that from the peculiar status of the parties it was to be presumed that the intention of the instrument was to bar the State by the arrangement between the parties, inter se, as to the enjoyment of the property, but no such intention is to be collected from the instrument, or is disclosed by the evidence; and it may be added that the arrangement for the parties continuing in common would, as already observed, include survivorship, and that it could, therefore, only be on failure of heirs of the last survivor that the claim of the State could arise. The instrument too, in its dealings with the management, contemplates the existence of haeredes facti, and the parties, therefore, cannot but have been aware that they had in their power the means of protection against any claim of the State. So far, therefore, as the immediate question raised by this appeal is concerned, their Lordships are of opinion that the decree complained of cannot be maintained.

A further question was also raised on the part of the Respondents, whether the appeal, although from part of the decree only did not, open to them, the Respondents, the whole decree. Their Lordships were of opinion that it did not, but they thought that under the circumstances of this case leave should be given to present a cross appeal, and the Appellants not having insisted that the mere form of presenting such an appeal should be gone through, it was agreed that the whole decree should be considered as open.

The whole case as to the Mookternamah and the Will, and as to the Plaintiff's title as heir to Taukooram, was thus open to the Respondents. Nothing was said by them as to the Mookternamah or the Will, and it is unnecessary, therefore, to refer further to [422] those documents, which no doubt were forged. The contention was as to Ramaprasad's title as heir. This title appears to have been affirmed by both the Courts in India upon the faith of the opinion given by the Law Officers. It does not appear to have been further investigated or inquired into.

The correctness of this opinion was questioned by the Respondents, who objected to the mode in which the question was submitted to them, but the Court declined to take another opinion, and adopted the opinion of these Officers, apparently without noticing its inconsistency with the ordinary text expositions of the Hindoo law. The question submitted to the Law Officers does not include some important facts which existed in this case. Every such reference to a suit, where it may bind a right, should embrace all important facts proved or admitted in the cause, which may affect the conclusion; and it is the duty of the Court itself so to frame the questions that they may elicit an opinion upon the very facts on which the legal title depends. If the facts be not ascertained but stated, and disputed, then the questions should embrace either view of the facts. When the opinion given is apparently irreconcilable with the opinions of proved text-writers, those who give the opinion should be asked further to explain that which appears prima facie, thus irreconcilable, so that they may show on what they ground an apparent exception from the general law, whether on general custom modifying texts, on local usage, family customs, or other exceptional matter.

In this case it was very important to point out to the notice of the Law Officers that the mother of the Plaintiff and of his uterine brother was a wife living [423] in adultery; originally, as above mentioned, one of the privileged classes; that her sons were adulterous issue; that the property had never been the mother's, but had been bequeathed by the father, an Englishman, to his sons, as his sons, and was meant by him to be a parental provision for his children. It was not referred to the Law Officers to consider whether the inability of the sons to succeed to the father affected their heritable capacity as collaterals inter se.

On the terms of the answer, the Law Officers may have considered the case merely as one of succession amongst Soodras proper, and may have acted simply on a wider view of the law of succession amongst Soodras than the written text authorities afford. They may have viewed it as enlarged by some general custom there prevalent extending the law, according to the principles of the Hindoo law which would support such custom, if in fact such custom has obtained.

It is, however, impossible to treat these sons as the sons of a Soodra father; if the Plaintiff and Taukooram be viewed as the sons of a Soodra mother, still the property never was hers, and their heritable capacity even to property of hers has not been established. If any general usage in this part of India has ripened into a custom having the force of law, that the illegitimate children of a woman pursuing an unchaste course of life, whether married or unmarried, inherit her property, this custom is not a proof.

If amongst Soodras proper a course of decisions, or other evidence of the prevalence of a general custom, support a heritable capacity of illegitimate Hindoos beyond that which the writers' text-books establish, these decisions have not been made known, nor has that custom been established. But a title such as the [424] present, so wholly irreconcilable with the expositions of any text-writer, and, unsupported by any authority, cannot be established upon the evidence which this case affords. To assume without evidence, on assertion simply, a capacity in the Appellant and his uterine brother to inherit to their mother, and assuming that capacity of lineal inheritance to their mother, thence to derive collateral heirship, inter se, to property which never was their mother's, would be at variance with legal principles.

Their Lordships have accordingly felt some difficulty in dealing with this part of the case. On the one hand, they are not prepared to act upon the opinion of the Law Officers given upon an imperfect statement of facts, unsupported by authority, and apparently not easily to be reconciled with the opinions of the text-writers on the Hindoo Law. On the other hand, they do not feel satisfied that the opinion of the Law Officers may not be well founded, more especially with reference to some local custom or usage. They have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the only safe course which can be taken is to remit this question to India for further investigation and consideration.

In the course of the argument on the part of the Respondents, an objection was taken on their behalf to the title of the Appellants as the heirs of Ramaprasad, but this objection does not appear to have been entertained or considered by the Sudder Court, and their Lordships very much doubt whether it is competent to the Respondents to raise it upon this appeal, having regard to what must have been done in the cause.

Their Lordships, therefore, delivered the foregoing [425] judgment at the close of the sittings after Trinity Term, but they ordered their report to stand over until after the Long vacation, in order that the minutes might be fully considered by their Lordships and by Counsel; and the matter having been again brought before their Lordships on the 26th of November, 1861, the following minute was finally settled by their Lordships, with the assent of Counsel on both sides, on the 30th of November, 1861:

"The Appellants, having by their Counsel consented that the rights of the parties should be considered and dealt with in the same manner as if the Respondents had presented a cross appeal confined to the subject-matter of this appeal, viz., the share of Taukooram in the Kadalkoody estate, their Lordships humbly recommend to her Majesty that the decree of the Sudder Court of the 27th of November, 1856, be reversed, in so far as the same is complained of by the appeal, and that the appeal be dismissed in so far as it complains of the Order of the 12th of November, 1857, and that it be declared that the Razeenamah in the pleadings mentioned does not prejudice or affect the Appellants' claim to Taukooram's share of the Kadalkoody estate, and that the Mookternamah and the Will in the pleadings also mentioned were not genuine instruments; and that it be also declared that the aforesaid reversal of the said decree of the Sudder Court shall not in any way prejudice or affect the right of the Respondents to contest the title of Ramaprasad as the heir of Taukooram to his (Taukooram's) share of the Kadalkoody estate upon any other grounds than those above mentioned, nor prejudice any objection which may be now open to the Respondents, and which they may be advised to take, to the title of the [426] Appellants as the heirs of Ramaprasad to the said share of Taukooram in the said Kadalkoody estate, and to any application they may be advised to make to the Sudder Court respecting the same; and that it be ordered that the Sudder Court do make all such further inquiry as may be proper and necessary as to the title of Ramaprasad as the heir of Taukooram to his (Taukooram's) share of the Kadalkoody estate, and do proceed in the cause as respects that property according to the result of such inquiry; and that it be further ordered that, if it shall appear that Ramaprasad was entitled, as the heir of Taukooram, to the said share of the Kadalkoody estate, and that the Appellants are entitled thereto in right of Ramaprasad, the costs of this appeal be paid by the Respondents, and the whole costs in the Sudder Court be also borne by them, except the costs of the application for review, as to which, in that event, there should be no costs; but that, if it shall appear that Ramaprasad was not entitled as the heir of Taukooram, or that the Appellants are not entitled, in right of Ramaprasad, to the said share of the Kadalkoody estate, the whole costs of the case in the Sudder Court be dealt with as the said Court may direct, and that in that event there be no costs of this appeal."

[427] GEORGE LAMB and JOSIAH PATRICK WISE.—Appellants: BEJOY KISHEN DASS, DILLAWUR ALLEE GHOLAM ENSUFF and Others.
Respondents * [June 22, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Heard ex parte.

A suit was brought in 1852, to set aside an execution sale made in 1841, on the ground of irregularity in not complying with the provisions of Ben. Reg. XLV., sec. 12, of 1793, for the due publication of the sale. A summary suit, under Ben. Reg. VII., of 1825, sec. 5, had been brought shortly after the date of the sale by the judgment debtor, to set it aside on the ground of inadequacy of the purchase-money, which suit was dismissed. There was no allegation in that suit of any irregularity in the publication of sale. It appeared from the evidence in the suit of 1852, that the notice of sale was affixed at the dwelling-house of the judgment debtor, the place where his rents were paid, but which was not part of the estate sold. It was not pleaded in the suit of 1852, that there was a town or village where the notification could be fixed as required by sec. 12, Ben. Reg. XLV. of 1793. The Sudder Dewanny Court held, that there had been an irregularity in the publication of the notice of sale, as it was not made within the ambit of the estate sold, and set the sale aside on that ground. Upon appeal, held by the Judicial Committee, reversing such decree,

First, that, as it did not appear that there was any town or village within the Pergunnah at which the notification required by the provisions of Ben. Reg. XLV., sec. 12, of 1793, could be affixed, there had been no irregularity in posting the notice at the house of the judgment debtor, so as to vitiate the sale, and,

Secondly, that, even if there had been an informality in that respect, it ought to have been objected to in the summary suit brought in 1841, and could not be opened eleven years afterwards.

This was a suit, in the nature of an action of ejectment, brought in the Zillah Court of Dacca by the Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, to oust the Appellants [428] from the possession of certain landed property, and with that object, to set aside a sale made by public auction to the Appellants, and for mesne profits.

The principal question raised in the suit below and by the appeal was, whether the sale by the Government Collector under an Order of a Civil Judge, in execution of his decree, ought to be set aside eleven years afterwards to the prejudice of the Appellants, the auction purchasers, for an alleged irregularity on the part of that Officer in the mode of publishing the notice of the intended sale, with respect to which alleged irregularity no material deviation from the mode prescribed by Ben. Reg. LXV. of 1793, sec. 12, was established by the Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, nor was any pecuniary injury to himself shown to have resulted from the sale; and more particularly as the judgment debtor, who had availed himself of the remedy by summary suit given by Ben. Reg. VII. of 1825, sec. 5, cl. 2, shortly after the sale, to set aside the sale on the ground of irregularity, did not in that suit complain of the alleged irregularity as to the posting of the notice of sale, the objection urged in the present suit.

The principal facts of the case were as follows:—

The Respondent, Dillawar Allee Gholam Ensuff, and others, obtained a decree in the Zillah Court of Dacca against the principal Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, [429] and others, and, after having made the usual application for execution of the decree, the Court issued an Order, directing the Government Collector of that Zillah to sell a certain share, namely, a 3 annas 18 gundas 3 c. 1 krant, out of a 10 annas 13 gundas 1 c. 1 krant share of Pergunnah, Ootur Shahpore, situate in the Zillah, belonging to the Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, and two of the other Respondents, named Doyamoyee and Moheshurry, also judgment debtors and co-sharers with him, but excepting the rights of one, Ram Dass Dutt, who had previously purchased the interest of Doyamoyee in such share.

The Collector accordingly attached the share, lotted it for sale, and published the usual notice or notification of the intended sale, as required by Ben. Reg. XLV. of 1793. This notice, it appeared, was not affixed within the Mehal in which the property was situate, but at a place called Arrylazara, where the house in which the rents of the judgment debtor, Bejoy Kishen Dass, were collected, which house was within the estate sold, and, after some postponements, on the 30th of January, 1841, the share was put up to public auction in the Cutcherry of the Collector. Appellants purchased the same for the sum of Rs. 2105. The sale was afterwards confirmed by the Commissioners of Revenue.

In the month of April, 1841, Bejoy Kishen Dass commenced summary proceedings under Ben. Reg. VII. of 1825, sec. 5, cl. 2, to set aside the sale, by filing a petition in the Zillah Court of Dacca before the Principal Sudder Ameen, in which he stated, amongst other things, the postponement of the sale from the 23rd to the 30th of January, and the sale to the Appellants on the last-mentioned date, and alleged, that the price fetched at the sale was under the true value of the [430] share, with reference to the sums previously bid for it, and further alleged, that if the share had been sold on the 23rd of January, a larger sum would have been obtained for it; and prayed on that ground that the sale might be reversed and the share re-sold.

The Principal Sudder Ameen, before whom the summary suit was heard, on the 17th of April, 1841, ordered, that the sale should be set aside and annulled, and that a re-sale should take place, on the ground of irregularity, as the sale was not made on the day first appointed, and also as the share was, in his opinion, sold for an inadequate price.

The Appellants appealed from this Order to the Civil Court of the Zillah of Dacca, and the Judge of that Court, Mr. J. F. G. Cooke, by a proceeding of that Court, dated the 19th of May, 1841, reversed that Order, recording his reasons for so doing, as follows:—"Although the Principal Sudder Ameen, on the grounds stated by him, has reversed the sale, it does not appear to me that the sale was made in contravention of the law or established rules: for this reason, that though the sale was made several days subsequent to the date fixed, yet the kyfeut that has been recorded on the sale advertisement is not at variance with the established rules, nor are the biddings, made ab initio, and the sale which was concluded, incorrect according to the provisions of cl. 2, sec. 8, and cl. 2, sec. 14, Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822. It was not proper for the Collector to demand from Chunder Madhub the amount which he had bid at the first; for although the above Regulation has reference to arrears of revenue, there is nothing in addition thereto stated in Regulation XLV. of 1793. Under these circumstances, the Order of the Principal Sudder Ameen, [431] setting aside the sale at which the Appellants purchased the property, is not proper: for this reason, the Order of the Principal Sudder Ameen being reversed, it is ordered that a copy of this proceeding be forwarded to the principal Sudder Ameen, who is to consider the auction purchase of the Appellants as confirmed, and given intimation thereof to the Collector."

Bejoy Kishen Dass appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, against this Order, and upon the hearing Sudder Court held, that nothing irregular had taken place in respect to the sale, and confirmed the Order appealed from.

The Appellants were put into possession of the share so purchased by them, on the confirmation of the sale by the Commissioners of Revenue, and continued in uninterrupted possession for about eleven years, until the 23rd of March, 1852, when the Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, alone of the several co-sharers, commenced the suit in forma pauperis, out of which this appeal arose, by filing a plaint in the Zillah Court of Dacca against the Appellants, as auction purchasers, and the decree-holders and also against his own co-sharers, as Defendants, to set aside the sale to the Appellants, and to obtain possession of his own proportion of the share sold; with mesne profits. The plaint stated, that the sale was illegal, having been made in contravention of the existing laws and practice; and then set forth, in particular, two several alleged irregularities in the conduct of the sale, having reference to the notification and publication thereof:—First, that the notice of the sale was not published at the locality of the property sold, as prescribed by sec. 12, Ben. Reg. XIV. of 1793. Secondly, that the name of one Shah Newaz Khan, as a decree-holder, [432] was irregularly inserted in the sale notification, instead of the names of the decree-holders; and also that it was published in Kismut Arryhazara, which place was included in another Talook, Mahadeb Roy, instead of at the estate sold; and that for those causes the sale ought to be reversed, agreeably to the provisions of cl. i, sec. 5, Ben. Reg. VII. of 1825. The plaint also stated, that the Appellants had been in possession of the estate, and in enjoyment of the profits thereof, since the Order of the Judge of the Zillah Court in the summary proceedings, and that the Plaintiff's co-sharers had colluded with him, and, as they had not sued for the reversal of their respective proportions of the share, he had no other alternative but to institute the suit against the auction-purchasers, and the decree-holders.

The Appellants, the principal Defendants, by their answer, set forth the summary proceedings and the decrees of the Zillah Court and Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, insisting that by the latter decree it had been judicially decreed that there had been no irregularity in the conduct of the sale, according to the rules and practice of those Courts, and it was by the answer pleaded, with reference to the two grounds of irregularity set forth in the plaint, that they were of no avail, because the names of Dillawur Allee Gholam Ensuff and others, were written in the place of the decree-holders in the notification, which was duly published at the Plaintiff's house at Arryhazara, in which was the principal collection Cutcherry (office) of the estate sold, and which being the fact, the sale could not on that account be considered to have been illegally held, especially as the Plaintiff urged no objection as regarded the publication of the notification in the summary petition which he [433] presented for the reversal of the sale. The answer also asserted the regularity of the Collector's proceedings in postponing and adjourning the sale from day to day, and referred to a Circular Order of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of the 17th of July, 1846, to show that the Collector's proceedings were in accordance with what is stated in that Circular Order as the established practice; the answer moreover stated, that on the day of sale the property was publicly bid for and sold at the Cutcherry, in the presence of many people, and the Appellants purchased it in consequence of no other person having bid higher; and they submitted that, in such a case, the allegation that the property was sold at an inadequate price could not be a ground for the reversal of the sale.

The Plaintiff filed documentary proofs. Amongst these was a copy of the report of the Nazir of the Collectorate, dated the 15th of January, 1841, which stated that he had published two notifications of the sale through the Peon at Kismut Arryhazara, where the above property was situate, and that he had submitted to the Collector, the Peon's return and sooruthals (certificates) of certain persons resident in the neighbourhood of the publication of the notification. The return of the Peon who served these notifications was also put in evidence and which was as follows:—“Two notifications were delivered to me. No person on the part of the decree-holder having pointed out the locality of Talooka Kashee Ram Rae, but having pointed out Kismut Arryhazara as the locality of the aforesaid Talook and Zemindary, the notification was published in the house of debtors (Bejoy Kishen and others, judgment debtors aforesaid, having been previously mentioned in this return), in the presence of [434] Kawul Kishen Shaha, Kishen Chowkeedar, and others, inhabitants of Arryhazara, and I have brought up a sooruthal of the said persons.” The Appellants' witnesses proved that the principal Cutcherry for the collection of the rents of the share of the Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, was in his own dwelling-house, at the time when the sale notification of the share was there published by the Peon of the Collectorate. No evidence was offered by the Respondent to contradict the facts proved by the Appellants, that the notification of the then intended sale was in due time published at his own dwelling-house, being the office also for the collection of the rents of his share, or to show that he had not notice of such intended sale; or that he had ever at any time objected to such publication, or had done otherwise in respect thereof than acquiesce in the property of the publication up to the time of filing his plaint, eleven years after the sale.

The hearing of the suit took place before the Principal Sudder Ameen of the Zillah of Dacca, and on the 6th of February, 1854, he pronounced his decree, in which after disposing of the two first issues, by declaring that they do not operate as a bar to the suit, he decreed against the claim of the Respondent, as follows:— "In the trial of the third issue it is held, that although it has appeared that the Plaintiff has stated several objections as regards the incorrectness of the sale, yet not one is worthy of credence; because the first objection is, that in contravention of section 12, Regulation XLV. of 1793, the sale notification was not published at the estate to be sold. Now, it is no secret, that the object of publishing the notification at the property to be sold is, [435] that the proprietors of and persons connected with the property put up for sale may come to the knowledge of the sale; and this object is attained by the publication of the notification at a place where many persons of that locality collect, such, for instance, as the principal village Cutcherry, Bazar, etc. In section 8, Act IV. of 1846 (which has been enacted in elucidation of the aforesaid section 12), it is enacted, that the sale notification is to be published at a conspicuous place on the property, attached or contiguous to it; therefore, without doubt, by the term, 'principal village,' as stated in section 12 aforesaid, is meant such a locality of the land to be sold where many people reside; and from copy of the report of Bungo Chunder Bose, Nazir of the Collectorate, dated the 15th of January, 1841, it is clear, that the sale notification was published at the house of the Plaintiff, the proprietor of the property to be sold, and hung up at the Thannah of Roopgunge; and from the evidence of six of the witnesses of the Defendants, it is established, that the Plaintiff's house was close to the collection Cutcherry of the estate to be sold; therefore, in my judgment, according to the intent of that section, the publication of the notification at the collection Cutcherry of the Plaintiff's dwelling-house was sufficient. This view is supported by the Sudder Dewanny report, dated the 7th of July, 1853, in the case of Eknatoes Panioty v. Shepherd, in which it was held, that the publication of the notification at the debtor's house is to be considered sufficient. The other objection is, that in place of the names of the decree-holders, the name of Shah Newaz Khan was inserted in the sale notification; but looking at the copy of the notification, the name of Shah Newaz [436] Khan does not appear; rather it is evident from the report and proceeding of the Collector, dated the 30th of January, 1841, that the names of the decree-holders were written in the original notification, and that the sale in the case of the execution of the decree of the decree-holders was conducted with great regularity; therefore, this decree must be adjudged to be entirely false. The third objection is, that the Collector not having made the sale on the 23rd of January, 1841, the date fixed, sold the property on the 30th of January, or seven days afterwards, in contravention of law. Now, on looking at the copies of the notification and the proceeding of the Collector, it appears, that for want of time the sale was not made by him on the 23rd of January, but that he recorded a kyfeut of the cause of each day's postponement on the back of the sale notification, as prescribed by the sale laws, and held the sale on the 30th of January: therefore, this objection is considered groundless, as the Plaintiff has not submitted any reason to prove the illegality of the sale. The fourth objection is, that in contravention of section 13, Regulation XLV. of 1793, the estate was resold, without the publication of a fresh notification, on the 30th of January. On looking at the section aforesaid, it appears, that in the event of the auction purchaser not depositing the earnest-money, the sale is to be made ab initio; but the Plaintiff has submitted no precedent to prove that the words ab initio, as stated in the aforesaid section, means the publication of a fresh notification. It is ordained in section 5, Act IV. of 1846, which explains the aforesaid section 13, that in the event of the earnest-money not being paid, the property is to be forthwith resold: therefore, the words, ab initio, used [437] in sec. 13, and in lieu of which the word 'forthwith' is inserted in section 5 aforesaid, means that the first sale is to be held as never having taken place, and having had no existence; and a second sale is to be held according to the injunction in the said first notification, in the same way as if the property were sold for the first time; and, in the said second sale, all the compliances of a first sale are to be carried into effect. Besides, the orders for attachment and publication of the sale notification are passed prior to the sale, and not subsequent to it. Objections fifth, sixth, and seventh, relating to the property having been sold at an adequate price, and to the Collector having rejected the petition or the decree-holders to stop the sale, are considered worthless, as they do not in any way show cause for the sale being invalid, because by no law can inadequacy of price be considered a cause for rendering a sale incorrect; and without an Order from the Civil Court the Collector had no power to stop the sale, so that his rejection of the decree-holders' petition could afford no ground for holding the sale irregular. In short, there do not appear to be any grounds for saying that there was any irregularity in the sale; and this action seems to be improper, and instituted for the purpose of giving trouble, because, from the commencement, ie. from the attachment and sale, the Plaintiff has instituted several summary suits, and afterwards instituted an action on a kubala through Radha Kishore, claiming on it the several of the sale, and which he maintained up to the Sudder Dewanny; and after that this worthless plaint is brought in forma pauperis, for the purpose of ruining the decree-holders, and harassing the auction-purchasers." And it was accordingly ordered, that the suit be dismissed.

The Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Das, appealed to [438] the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta from this decree.

The appeal was heard before Messrs. Raikes, Colvin, and Sconce. The Judges differed in opinion. Messrs. Raikes and Colvin were of opinion, that the decree of the Court below ought to be reversed and the sale annulled. Their recorded judgment was as follows:—"It is admitted by both parties that the sale notice was published by affixing it to the Plaintiff's house at Arryhazara: the points for determination are, whether Arryhazara, the village where Plaintiff has his dwelling-house, is within the property advertized for sale, and if not, whether the publication of the notice at that place fulfils the requirements of the law, as held to be the case by the Lower Court. We observe that it was clearly and distinctly averred by the Plaintiff, in his plaint, that the notice was not published on the spot, as required by section 12, Ben. Reg. XLV. of 1793, but at the village of Arryhazara, in Talook, Mahadeb Roy: it is also shown by the return of the Peon who affixed the notice of sale at the residence of the Plaintiff, that the notice was served in that manner, while the Defendants have not in their answer alleged, that Arryhazara is within the precincts of the Mehal, but have contended for the legality of the publication, as having been made at the dwelling-house of the Plaintiff, where the collecting Cutcherry was also situated. It has, however, been urged in this Court that the Mehal sold consisted of a fractional portion of Pergunnah Oottur Shahpore, within which Pergunnah, Arryhazara is situated, and that it is consequently a village of the Mehal sold, and service of notice at that place was, therefore, a sufficient service to protect the sale. It has been, however, explained, and the explanation [439] stands uncontradicted, that the Mehal advertized for sale is called Duftera Lukheenarian and Kishenram Roy, consisting of 10 annas 13 goondas 1 couree and 1 krant of Pergunnah, Oottur Shahpore, and that the remaining portion of the Pergunnah constitutes a distinct and separate Mehal under the name of Talook, Mahadeb Roy, within which, and not within Duftera Lakheenarian and Kishenram Roy, the village of Arryhazara lies. The return of the Peon who served the notice distinctly states that, as no one on the part of the decree-holder pointed out to him the locality of Talook, Kishenram Roy, he affixed it at the residence of the debtors in Arryhazara, Talook Mahadeb Roy. Now, it is clearly incumbent on the Defendants to deny or to controvert this part of the case, whereas they have not attempted to meet Plaintiff's averments, further than by tendering evidence to show that the collecting Cutcherry of the Plaintiff was held at the place where he resided, and by pleading that the publication of the notice at that place met all the requirements of the law. We must, therefore, hold the finding of the Lower Court to be that the notice was published at the dwelling-house of the Plaintiff, and that as the Cutcherry of the Plaintiff was at or contiguous to their house, the publicity thereby given to the sale advertisement was equally as effective as if the notice had been published on some spot within the Mehal, and the requirement of the law, therefore, fully accomplished. The law, however, see sec. 12, Reg. XLV. of 1793, under which process of sale was held, in this instance admits of no such lax interpretation. It provides, that publication of the notice shall be made at 'the principal town or village in the lands to be sold,' and although we are of opinion, [440] that the length of time which has elapsed since the sale was made would fairly entitle the Defendants to be relieved from the burthen of proving that the place selected for publishing the notice was 'the principal town or village in the lands sold,' we do not think we can pass over the fact made evident in this case that the place of publication was not in the lands at all, or judicially determine that some other kind of notice was substituted for that specified and directed by the law. We must, therefore, in conformity with former precedents (see the case of Ranee Moosidun v. Mussumat Roop Kowur, 3rd October, 1844, Vol. VII., p. 184, Select Reports, and case of Brijlul Oopaydhya, Petitioner, 1st August, 1850, Summary Reports, and without reference to the lapse of time, Plaintiff being within the period allowed by law, hold that the informal publication of the notice vitiates the sale and renders it necessary that we should reverse the judgment of the Lower Court, and cancel the sale. It is, therefore, ordered, that the judgment of the Principal Sudder Ameen be reversed, and the sale annulled. Let possession be decreed to the Appellant on depositing the amount of purchase-money, without interest, within the period of one year from this date; but in consideration of the time, nearly twelve years, which elapsed before bringing the suit, the purchasers will not be called upon to account for (see case of Musst Ram Mulla and others, Appellants, v. Mohummud Idrak and others, Respondents, decided 4th September, 1850) wasilat during his possession previous to date of suit. Let the Appellant receive from the Defendants, who are the Respondents, the costs of this Court, according to the account prepared by the khurchanuvees, together with interest [441] thereon from this date to the date of realization; and for the costs incurred in the Zillah, and let a petition be preferred to the Zillah Court, from whence an Order will be passed for payment agreeably to the purport of the Circular Order, dated the 4th March, 1836."

The dissentient Judge, Mr. A. Sconce, stated the grounds of his difference of opinion with the majority of the Court, and of his reasons that the decree of the Zillah Court ought to have been affirmed, in these terms:—"It is with very great difficulty that I form a definite opinion upon the point now before us. We are required by the Plaintiff, whose suit was instituted in March, 1852, to set aside an execution sale made on the 30th of January, 1841, and the first ground set forth by the Plaintiff for quashing the sale is, that the publication of the intended sale had not been made, as provided by sec. 12, Reg. XLV. of 1793, in the principal town or village in the lands to be sold. So far as we can judge of the facts from the evidence submitted to us, it appears that notification of the sale was published in Mouzah, Arrybazara; that this village did not form part of the estate sold, but that as the residence of the judgment debtor and the Cutcherry at which, by his tenantry, his rents were paid to him, were situated within this village, the requisitions of the law were presumed to be complied with by notifying the intended sale there. Reg. XLV. of 1793, declares what forms should be followed previous to sale, but it does not contain any provision for setting aside sales on the ground of informality. The only assistance furnished in our law for the determination of such questions when they should arise is cl. i., sec. 5, Reg. VII. of 1825. A doubt had arisen, whether illegal sales [442] could be summarily annulled by the Civil Courts without a regular suit, and accordingly by this Regulation it was provided, that if within one month after the sale any material deviation from the mode of sale prescribed by the Regulation was brought before the Court ordering the sale, it was competent to that authority to declare the sale to be null and void. Here then the rule for the Courts to follow in discussing alleged irregularities in the sale proceedings, is to determine whether or not the deviation alleged to have occurred be a material deviation from the mode of sale laid down in the law. It is not only a deviation, but a material deviation, that by Regulation VII. of 1825 our Courts are required to look to, and I apprehend that the fair construction of these words is, that the irregularity in each case complained of should be shown to have materially, or, as I would understand, prejudicially affected the completed sale. It may be said, that such a construction of the law is too indeterminate, and furnishes no definite rule of action for the disposal of such cases as the present; but it seems to be the manifest purpose of the law not to declare absolutely that the omission of any one form constituted an illegal sale, but to leave it for the Courts to consider in each case whether or not the non-compliance with any specific form was a material evasion of the law. In this case, as I have said, the suit was instituted more than eleven years after the sale objected to occurred. So far the Plaintiff may not unjustly be held not to have considered the asserted flaw to have been material to his interests, or he would have asserted it sooner. Besides, though the Plaintiff did by summary petition in the Zillah and in the Sudder Court contest the [443] validity of the sale immediately on its completion, he took no objection to the Mofussil notification. Here, again, I conclude, is evidence that the Plaintiff was not conscious that any material defect in the sale had arisen from an inexact service of the notification at his place of business. And, further, though I am far from arguing that it is competent to Officers effecting sales to substitute forms for those laid down in the law, we have in this case evidence that there was no intention to evade the law, as, both at the Plaintiff's residence and at the police Thannah, notifications of the intended sale were published. I observe, that on the 26th of May, 1853, on the appeal of Hurrooondree and others, a case was decided in this Court in which the non-compliance with the forms laid down in sec. 12, Reg. XLV. of 1793, was also pleaded. By this law, notification of the sales was required to be taken in the office of the Secretary of the Board of Revenue, and in that case the plea was taken that no such notification had been made. It was held, however, that as the Commissioners of Revenue, appointed under Reg. I. of 1829, had succeeded to the powers of the Board of Revenue (with certain restrictions), it was not to be presumed, with reference to the peculiar constitution of the Commissioner's Office, that notifications necessary to be made in the Board's Office should, instead thereof, be made in the Commissioners'. The appeal decided in 1853 differs from the present; but so much is inferable from that decision, that the Courts are competent to determine that the omission to comply with the whole forms prescribed by sec. 12, Reg. XLV. of 1793, does not necessarily import such an illegality as compels them to set aside sales, in concluding which the [444] omission may have occurred. Upon the whole, then, I am not satisfied that the Appellant has shown that he is entitled to the relief claimed upon the informality referred to."

By the final decree of the majority of the Court it was ordered, that the judgment of the Principal Sudder Ameen be reversed, and possession decreed, without mesne profits, to the Respondent, Bejoy Kishen Dass, on depositing the amount of purchase-money, without interest, and that the Appellants should pay the costs, with interest from the date of their decree.

The present appeal was from this decree.

As the Respondent did not appear the appeal was heard ex-parte.

Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., (with whom was Mr. Leith) for the Appellants.—It is submitted that this decree cannot be upheld. First, the publication of the notification of the intended sale substantially complied with the requirements of Ben. Reg. XLV. of 1793, sec. 12. The rents were collected and paid into the judgment debtors' Cutcherry at Arrybazara, the village at which the notice was affixed. No town or village was proved in the evidence to be on the land sold. Now, the Act, No. IV. of 1846, sec. 8, supplies the defect in Ben. Reg. LXV. sec. 12, upon this point, by inserting the words, "town or village," which is "nearest the land to be sold." The cases relied upon by the Sudder Court of Ranee Moradun v. Mussamat Roop Kowur (7 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 184), and Mussamat Ram Mulla v. Mohammad Idrak (13 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 462), do not, there-[445]-fore, apply. There is no provision in the Regulations declaring a sale by public auction in execution of a decree, null and void, or liable to be set aside, in consequence of any irregularity on the part of the Government Collector or his subordinate Officer in the publication of the notification of the intended sale. Secondly, the Respondent elected to take his remedy under the summary suit given by Ben. Reg. VII. of 1825, sec. 5, cl. 1., to set aside such sale, and it ought to have been satisfactorily established by the Respondent, that the irregularity complained of in the present suit, involved a "material deviation" in the mode prescribed by the Regulations for publishing an intended sale, which was not done. There is no allegation in the plaint that there was any other town or place where the notification ought to have been made. The Plaintiff failed altogether to establish that fact; but the circumstances detailed, and the conduct of the Respondent with respect to his former summary suit, and his other proceedings before the Collector, has the effect of waiving or curing the irregularity, if any existed, in the publication of the notice of the intended sale now complained of. Another objection is, that his conduct showed that he acquiesced in the mode of publishing the notice, adopted, under the circumstances, by the subordinate Officers of the Collector, as shown by their reports and returns made and filed at the time in the Collectorate. Lastly, the Appellants, bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration, at the sale by the Collector, have been in possession for eleven years under that sale; and even if the Respondent had proved any injury or damage to him, by reason of the alleged irregularity on the part [446] of that Officer, which, however, he did not attempt to do, his remedy in law would have been against that person, and not against the Appellants.

Their Lordships, without calling upon Mr. Leith, pronounced judgment, as follows, by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—We consider the decree of the Court below erroneous.

It has not been made out to our satisfaction that there was any town or village within the Pergunnah at which notice could have been given. The notification posted at the principal Respondent's house does not, in our opinion, constitute a material irregularity with the provisions of the Regulation cited before us; at all events, if there was an irregularity, it ought to have been brought before the Court below at the time of the summary suit and taken advantage of then. The judgment appealed from must be reversed.

[447] GOLAUB KOONWURREE BEBEE,—Appellant: ESHAN CHUNDER CHOWDHOOREE, and Others,—Respondents * [June 22, 1861].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Heard Ex parte.

A Hindoo Testator, by his Will empowered his Executor and guardian of his infant children, who was also manager of his Zemindary, to charge the same for payment of debts and advances during his children's minority, and directed that when the children came of age they should repay the amount raised. The Executor borrowed of a Banking firm money for payment of Government revenue, and gave Bonds charging the Zemindary with the sums so borrowed. On the children coming of age they executed a Kistbundy for repayment by instalments, of the amount then due. This instrument they afterwards repudiated, and on a suit being brought against them by the lender upon the Kistbundy, in defence they not only denied the existence of the Bond, but charged the lender with fraudulently colluding with the Executor in obtaining the loan, and granting a lease to a nominee of the lender at an inadequate rent. Held,—

First, that the Executor had power under the Will to charge the Zemindary with advances made for the purposes of the Zemindary.

Secondly, that, as a question of fact, the Kistbundy was established.

Thirdly, that the remedy of the Defendants was to have instituted a suit against their guardian for an account, charging collusion between him and the lender, so as to investigate the transactions which had taken place and ascertain what was the amount due.

The Appellant in this case brought an action to recover the sum of

Rs. 25,119. 5a. 3p., the amount of principal and interest due on a Kistbundy, or instalment bond.

The late Anund Chunder Chowdhoree, a Hindoo inhabitant of Futtehpore, in the Province of Bengal, Zemindar of a 3-annas share of Chuckla Futtehpore, in Zillah, Rungpore, left six sons, minors, of whom the Respondents were the survivors (the others having died minors and unmarried), having first made a Will, whereby he appointed Hurrokant Bhuttacharjee, his spiritual guide, since deceased, the sole Executor and trustee, as well as appointing him manager of his Zemindary, until the Testator's sons should attain majority, when he directed all his real and personal estate to be equally divided among them. The Will also contained the following direction:—"If, in the event of a deficiency of money on any account, and incurring of loan, according to occasions be necessary, you will, according to custom, borrow from creditors, which will be repaid from the profits of the Zemindary. If this be not done, and the minors become of age, then those sons of mine shall repay the debts of the creditors; and on their failure to do so the same shall be realized from the said estates."

Hurrokant Bhuttacharjee accordingly took upon himself the execution of the trusts of the Will, as Executor, and entered upon and took the sole management of the Testator's Zemindary, and, in March, 1848, finding the collections of rent insufficient to supply the whole amount then payable to Government for revenue on account of the Zemindary, borrowed the sum of Rs. 2937 from a Kotee or banking-house carried on for the benefit of the Appellant, which sum he applied in payment of the Government revenue. He afterwards borrowed from the Appellant three other sums of money, under similar circumstances, and for [449] the same object, amounting in the whole to the sum of Rs. 16,444. 8a. For these respective sums eight Tumsooks (bonds) were severally duly executed by the Executor to secure the repayment of these principal moneys and interest.

The Respondents attained their majority in 1851, when they entered into possession of the Zemindary, when the Appellant demanded payment of the amount due; and, in the month of July, 1861, an adjustment of accounts took place, when the sum of Rs. 22,294. 10a. 11p. was found to be due from them to the Appellant for principal and interest for the moneys so advanced.

The Respondents being unable to pay the whole amount at once, it was agreed, that they should pay down Rs. 294. 10a. 11p., and grant the Appellant a Kistbundy (instalment bond) to secure the balance, with interest. Accordingly, on the last-mentioned date, a bond was executed by the Respondents respectively, in favour of the Appellant. This instrument recited the facts above mentioned, including the borrowing of the several sums, and the execution of the bonds, and the amount of the balance of principal and interest found due on the adjustment of the accounts as aforesaid. The Kistbundy then provided for the payment of the same by the Respondents, together with interest at 12 per cent per annum, by instalments, in various fixed amounts, and at various fixed dates in each year between the year 1258 B.E. (1851-1852 A.D.), and the year 1272 B.E. (1866-1867), both inclusive; and the Kistbundy then declared, that if four successive instalments should be in arrear, the Appellant was empowered to realize at once the whole sum then remaining due, [450] with interest. The Kistbundy concluded with a clause hypothecating the Zemindary and other immovable property of the Respondents, to secure the repayment of the moneys, with interest.

This instrument was registered in the public register office for deeds in the Zillah, Rungpore, by Juggurnath Sircar, the Mookter, under a Mookternamah, or power of attorney, signed by the Respondents, for that purpose. The Mookternamah recited the execution by them of the Kistbundy, to secure the amount due under the documents granted by the Executor on account of payments made in respect of the Government revenue payable on the Zemindary.

The Respondents paid to the Appellant, on account of principal and interest under the Kistbundy, in various amounts and at various dates, in conformity with the requirements of the deed in that behalf, the sum of Rs. 800, on account of principal, and Rs. 600, on account of interest. The Respondents, however, having made default, and more than four of the instalments of the Kistbundy having fallen into arrear, the Appellant brought an action against the Respondents in the Civil Court of Zillah, Rungpore. The plaint, after stating in detail the facts above mentioned, stated and charged that, after crediting and deducting the part payments aforesaid, the Respondents were indebted, on the day previously to the date of the plaint, the sum of Rs. 21,200, on account of the whole balance of the principal, and Rs. 3915. 5a. and 3p. on account of interest, making together the aggregate sum of Rs. 25,119. 5a. 3p., the amount she sought to recover by her suit.

The answer of the two first of the Respondents stated, that the third Respondent, Hurro Chunder Chowdhoree, had gone on a pilgrimage before the [451] commencement of the suit, and had not then returned. The answer then charged, that the claim of the Appellant, as well as the grounds and statements thereof, were all invalid, for that neither was any money due by them, nor had they ever executed any Kistbundy for the same; and that the Appellant had fabricated that deed. The answer admitted the registration of the Kistbundy, but endeavoured to throw suspicion upon it by alleging, that the Mookter who presented it for registration was a stranger to the Respondents. The answer then stated, that the Executor had held the collection office for the rents of the Zemindary in the Appellant's Kotee, or banking house at Rungpore, from the year 1255 B.E. (1848-9 A.D.), when the Respondents reached their majority; that the Appellant's cash-keeper, Hurree Pershad Tewarree, made collections, and performed other affairs of their Zemindary, receiving a salary of Rs. 10 monthly in the name of his son; and that after the payment of the Government revenue and other expenses, the amount of profit used to be kept in deposit in this Appellant's Kotee; that no loans were contracted on account of the Government revenue, the Zemindary, as they alleged, having returned a large profit, and there being, therefore, no necessity to borrow money either before or after their father's death; and that either the Executor was acting in collusion with the Appellant, or the Appellant without his knowledge appropriated the surplus profit, and prepared the false Tumsooks or bonds, and the Kistbundy, and had, four months after the death of the Executor, brought the present action. The answer further stated, that the Appellant had, in collusion with the Executor, obtained a farming lease [452] of the Zemindary, in the name of the cash-keeper, Hurree Pershad Tewarree, at a very low rent, from the year 1258 to 1266 B.E.

The replication charged, that by large outgoings, some of which were especially referred to, the Executor and trustee was under the necessity of borrowing the moneys in question from the Appellant's Kotee, for the payment of the Government revenue; and submitted, that under the Will the Executor and trustee was empowered to borrow the moneys, and that the Respondents, after attaining majority, were bound to pay the same; and that, on their failing to do so, the same was to be realized from the Zemindary, on which the moneys borrowed were a charge; and it was averred, that the statement as to the lease of the Zemindary was false, and that the Appellant never took the Zemindary under lease, nor advised any other person to do so.

A great many witnesses were examined, the nature and effect of whose evidence is stated in the judgment of the Sudder Ameen.

The hearing of the suit took place before the Principal Sudder Ameen (Sreejoot Nuzeerooddeen Mahomed), who pronounced a decree in favour of the claim of the Appellant, as follows:—First: From the depositions of Juggunnath Sircar and the Defendants' relation, Hurro Gobind Sen, whom the Defendants have admitted in their answer to be another Mookter of theirs, as well from the depositions of the witnesses to the Kistbundy in question, viz. Bahadoor Singh, Boid Nath Tewarree, Ram Nath Doss, and Lalla Hurruck Chand, tenants of the Defendants, and also from the evidence of the other witnesses, Lokenath Sircar, Dwarka Nath Dass, and [453] others, it has been satisfactorily proved, that the Defendants executed the Kistbundy aforesaid under their respective signatures, in consideration of the aforesaid sum borrowed by their Executor, as well as the amount which the Plaintiff paid on account of Defendants' debts, and also the amount which they had borrowed themselves, together with interest thereon, after deduction of the amount repaid, and gave a special Mookternamah in the names of their Mookters, Juggunnath Sircar, Roy Gobind Dutt, and Hurro Gobind Sen, in order to get the Kistbundy registered; that they got the Mookternamah attested through another Mookter of theirs, Kandoora, and by the evidence of the witnesses thereof, viz. Hurruck Chundro and Russool Mahomed, who are their tenants and dependants, that they got the Kistbundy registered through their tenant and Mookter, Juggunnath Sircar, one of the Mookters mentioned in the Mookternamah. The writer of the Kistbundy, Deb Nath Banerjea, who is a servant of the Defendants, has declared that it was he who wrote the Kistbundy. From the copy which the Plaintiff has produced of the Mookternamah, dated the 16th Bysack, 1259 Bengalee year, bearing the signatures of the Defendants, filed in the settlement case brought in the Collectorate, it appears that Juggunnath Sircar, who got the Kistbundy registered, was the Defendant's Mookter, in conjunction with the individual whom the Defendants have admitted in their answer to be their Mookter, and also in conjunction with their maternal uncle, Roy Gobind Dutt, and others. From copy of the Mookternamah, dated 10th Bliadon, 1258 Bengalee year, bearing the Defendant's signature, it appears that Kandoora, who had produced the Mook [454]-ternamah to get the Kistbundy registered, was the Defendant's appointed Mookter in conjunction with their beforementioned other Mookter. From the copy of the Mookternamah dated the 23rd Maugh, 1257 Bengalee year, bearing the Defendants' signatures, it appears that Lalla Hurruck Chund Doss was a witness of the Mookternamah, regarding the registration of the Defendants' names, and had given his evidence. Hence the Defendant's plea that the said individuals, though composed of their tenants, old servants, and relations, are strangers, appears to be false and untrue. That the sum of Rs. 16,444. 8a. mentioned in the eight bonds, bearing the signature of the Defendant's Executor, filed by the Plaintiff, was paid on account of the Government revenue of the Defendants' Zemindary from the year 1251 up to 1257 Bengalee year, is satisfactorily proved from the Collector's attested copies, filed by the Plaintiff, of the twenty-two chellans, etc., bearing the signature of their (Defendants') Executor, in which chellans that sum is stated to have been borrowed from and paid into the Collectorate through the Plaintiff's Kotee. That the Plaintiff's Mookter paid Rs. 2950, on account of the Government revenue of the Defendants' Zemindary for the Bengalee year 1257 is satisfactorily proved from the dakhilla bearing the seal and signature of the Collector, given in the name of the Plaintiff's servant, with a mention of payment being made through the Plaintiff's Kotee, and also from the copy of the Petition which the Mookter, Roy Gobind Dutt, had filed in the name of the Executor by his own pen, admitting that the sum (Rs. 2950) was paid by the Plaintiff's servant, and these facts have been corroborated by the Plaintiff's khattah [455] which have been produced and duly proved, and wherein it is mentioned that the aforesaid sums are due by the Defendants, but nothing is due to them. The Defendants cannot bring any objection to this. That the Defendants borrowed Rs. 350, by giving rookha (note), as mentioned in the Kistbundy, has not been proved like the above. From the copy which the Plaintiff has filed of the Wuseutnamah, which the Defendant's father executed in the name of their Executor, Hurrokant Bhuttacharjee, it appears that the Executor was authorized to contract loans, and that the liability of the loans contracted by him would attach to the Defendants as well as to their Zemindary. Such being the case, the Defendants' plea that the Executor was not authorized to contract loans appears to be utterly false. When the Kistbundy and its registration have been proved by the Defendants' relations, servants, and others, as well as by other witnesses, and when it has been proved that the amounts mentioned in the Kistbundy have been paid on account of the Government revenue of the Defendants' Zemindary, and that they (the Defendants) are liable to pay the debts contracted by their Executor, then there is no doubt that the Defendants are liable to pay the disputed money. The Defendants' servant, Deb Nath Bondopadhya, the writer of the Kistbundy, states, that he went to some other place after he had written the Kistbundy, and did not see the Defendants put their signatures on the same. The witness, Emamdee, states, that the Kistbundy was executed, but he did not see the Defendants put their signatures on the same. The Defendants' tenant, Narain Duftery, who is one of the subscribing witnesses to the Kistbundy, states that he did not witness [456] the Kistbundy. These statements appear to have been made by the influence of the Defendants. When it is considered how the Defendants have stated themselves to be unaware of the terms of the Wuseutnamah, and unacquainted with their own servants and others so well known to them, then I cannot convince myself that any one of their statements is true. The Defendants' plea that the witnesses of the Kistbundy are low people and the Plaintiff's servants, can be of no consequence, when it has been satisfactorily proved, as stated above by the evidence of their (the Defendants') relations, etc., that the amount of the Kistbundy was paid into the Collectorate on account of the Government revenue due by the Defendants, and that the Defendants made over (to the Plaintiff) the Kistbundy, after getting it registered by the Register of Deeds through their Mookters, servants, tenants, and others. Secondly, The Defendants plead, that their Executor had held the collection-office of their Zemindary in Plaintiff's Kotee; that the amount of collections of their Zemindary used to be deposited at first in the Plaintiff's Kotee, and then out of the same the Government revenue of it used to be paid; that their Executor and the Plaintiff, being in collusion with each other, appropriated to their own use the profits of the Zemindary, and gave rise to these frauds; and that if an account be made up and a balance-sheet drawn up with reference to real khattas of the Plaintiff's Kotee, it will appear that nothing is due by them. They have also filed 146 chellans, signed by the Putwarrees of their Zemindary, and given evidence of the six witnesses, who are their Tehsildars, and others in support of their pleas. These proofs cannot vitiate this claim, brought [457] on the registered Kistbundy, which is based on the dakhillas, etc., of the Collectorate, and the bonds executed by the Executor, the validity of which has been proved, as stated in the first branch of this decision. The Defendants' witnesses state, that the Executor had appointed one Hurree Pershad Tewarree, a servant of the Plaintiff's Kotee, in the office of superintendent, and, therefore, the amounts of the collections of rents used to be sent to him agreeably to the direction of the Executor. This circumstance cannot prove that the Plaintiff made the collections of rents agreeably to her own request. If the Defendants' Executor have practised any fraud, still no investigation with regard to the same can take place in this suit, which is brought on a Kistbundy given in consideration of former debts, bonds, etc., nor can any adjustment of accounts of the collections of rents made at the Plaintiff's Kotee be made in this suit. If it be taken for granted that there was no need for the Executor to contract loans by giving bonds, owing to the amounts of the collections of rents of the Defendants' Zemindary having remained deposited, and that the Executor has practised frauds, yet another suit is necessary to investigate the loss incurred by the Defendants by their Executor's fraud. When there is no doubt that the aforesaid amount of loan was paid on account of the Government revenue due by the Defendants, and when it has been satisfactorily proved that the Defendants executed to the Plaintiff the Kistbundy in consideration of the same, then, agreeably to the decision of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, dated 3rd of February, 1853, in the case of Mohataboo, Appellant, as well as that dated 26th July of that year, in the case of [458] Prosunno Singh, it is not necessary to hold an investigation with regard to the former accounts. Lastly, there is no proof relative to the Rs. 350, but I am of opinion, that no more proof than the above is necessary in order to prove that sum, when it has been proved as required by law that the Defendants executed the Kistbundy, admitting the same to be their debt. The four instalments of the Kistbundy having fallen due, the Plaintiff is competent to sue for all the instalments agreeably to its terms, as is apparent. Out of the witnesses mentioned in the second isemnovesee filed by the Defendants, two were cited by both parties, and their depositions taken down. The Defendants prayed for the issue of a subpoena for the attendance of the remaining witnesses. It appears that the Defendants have made this prayer with no other view than to waste time uselessly. The Defendants have already given the evidence of many witnesses, which, however, has proved of no advantage to them with regard to the point respecting which they wish to give the evidence of the remaining witnesses. The copy filed by the Plaintiff of the Wusseutnamah executed by the Defendants' father appears to have been obtained on a stamp-paper worth eight annas. This is not a principal document in the case, but merely one in support of it. Therefore, it is not illegal to have taken it on a stamp-paper worth eight annas. It is, therefore, ordered, that this case be decreed, that the Plaintiff's principal amount, as well as interest thereon, agreeably to law, and all costs of Court, together with interest on the aggregate amount of the money from this day till the day of realization, be awarded to the Plaintiff against the mortgaged property."

The appeal was heard before Messrs. Colvin, Sconce, and Dick, when the two first-mentioned Judges, being the majority of the Court, by their judgment, decreed that the decree of the Lower Court should be reversed, with costs both of the Zillah and Sudder Court.

The judgment of Messrs. Colvin and Sconce was as follows:—"We are of opinion, that in a case of this kind, where a deed is said to have been formally executed in adjustment of previous accounts, some evidence should have been afforded of the fact of their settlement, and that a deed professing to be recognition of their settlement should be duly attested. But it does not appear from the evidence that such settlement took place when the Kistbundy was said to have been prepared, and the attestation of the deed by witnesses, two only of whom out of seven signed for themselves, is far from satisfactory proof of its execution. The writer of the deed also says that he wrote it by desire of the late guardian of the Appellants, without their sanction, and that he did not see them sign. Moreover, the execution of the power of attorney by the Appellants, to register the Kistbundy, is very insufficiently established. The chief witness, Juggunnath Sircar, says it was brought to him as coming from them, and he acted upon it, and only afterwards was informed by them that they agreed to it; and it was more necessary to have the power duly proved, as the Mookternamah for registry was not executed till two months, viz., on the 18th Bhadoon, 1258, after the date of Kistbundy, viz. 17th Assar preceding. The argument of the Respondent as to the existence of the old Bonds executed by the [460] guardian, and the payment of revenue through her, prove nothing in support of the Kistbundy, upon execution of which by Appellants, and not upon the acts of the guardian, the suit is founded."

The dissentient Judge, Mr. Dick, recorded his judgment in these terms:—"The Plaintiff in this case sues the Defendants on an instalment-bond for recovery of money lent on seven or eight bonds, and to an Executor of their father's Will, during their minority, for the purpose of paying up the revenue of their estates, and a small sum borrowed by themselves on note of hand after becoming of age. In proof of the claim they produce the subscribing and other witnesses to testify to the due execution of the instalment-bond, and file the deed; they file also the seven or eight bonds with the signature of the Executor and the note of hand of the Defendants, and documents from the Collectorate, showing the sums to have been paid up through the Plaintiff's banking concern for revenue of Defendants' estates. The Defendants deny the claim altogether, and rest their defence mainly on the improbability of their giving such a deed so soon after coming of age, when, too, they were disputing with a servant of the Plaintiff's banking concern about a farming lease purporting to have been given by the Executor for nine years, a short time before the expiration of their minority; on no accounts having been produced at the time the deed was executed; and on the want of respectability of the subscribing witnesses to it. The Plaintiff has by three witnesses at least proved the due execution of the instalment-bond and the signatures on it of Defendants. The Mookter who got the deed registered has distinctly testified that the Defendants [461] themselves told him to get it registered, and there is proof that he was in their employ as a Mookter. On the deed are indorsed three separate payments; one by an uncle of Defendants, who was summoned by Plaintiff, but would not appear, and the other two payments by principal servants of the Defendants. As corroborative evidence, the seven or eight bonds on which the money was borrowed have been filed, bearing the signature of the Executor, and documents from the Collectorate, which are not and cannot be impugned, showing that the money borrowed was expended in paying up revenue due on Defendants' estates. It is true that the subscribing witnesses to the instalment-deed are not of high respectability in point of station, but their testimony has been verified by persons of higher position, who were present at the execution of the deed. On the other hand, the signatures on the deed of each of the three Defendants have not been challenged, nor the signature of the Executor on the bonds. The Mookter who got the deed registered, and the subscribing witnesses to it, have several of them been proved to be in the Defendants' employ, and to reside on their estate, though declared by the Defendants to be utter strangers. The Plaintiff has denied that there were any accounts to be produced, except the banking-books, which they have produced, and which have not been impugned, and Defendants have not filed any accounts of the Executor to gainsay what appears in those books and is substantiated by the Collectorate documents. The Defendants' uncle, summoned by the Plaintiff to testify to one of the indorsements, would not appear, and the Defendants would not summon their two servants to testify against the other two indorsements. [462] Here was an admirable opportunity, not accepted, for falsifying the deed. The payments indorsed seem to have been made in the lifetime of the Executor; and had the deed been forged, the names of three persons so much in the interest of the Defendants would not have appeared as the payers, nor would the names of the subscribing witnesses have been all, save one, written by one person, and the writer of the deed a servant of the Defendants. The instalment-deed was written while the dispute about the farm was pending in the Magistrate's Court, and the registry made after the Razeenamah, or deed of relinquishment, was filed by the farmer. So far, therefore, as that affair is connected with the execution of the deed, if the farmer were a servant of Plaintiff, probability in favour of the deed is more apparent than improbability, the registry being kept back till the Razeenamah was filed. Lastly, nothing to impugn the integrity of the Executor, or of the Plaintiff, on the fairness of their dealings with each other, has been adduced. I think, therefore, sufficient proof has been produced to establish the due execution and registry of the instalment-bond, and nothing of weight to throw doubt on that proof. On being asked by me in Court how the bonds of the Executor remained with the Plaintiff after execution of the instalment-deed, it was answered, that money-lenders in such cases retained the bonds as collateral proof, and, in lieu of giving them up, inserted their dates in the instalment-deed. I would uphold the decision of the Lower Court, and dismiss the appeal."

The present appeal was from the decree of the majority of the Sudder Court.

[463] Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith for the Appellant.—There was sufficient evidence of the loans, which formed the consideration of the Kistbundy, having been contracted by the Executor and trustee under the Will, and that those loans were applied for the benefit of the Zemindary, therefore, the Respondents were liable to the Appellant as the lender, under the express terms of the Will of their father, and bound to pay the same on their coming of age, as the payment of the loans by the Will created a charge upon the estate, Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussamat Babooe Munraj Koonwuree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 393). As to the Kistbundy, that instrument was also proved; indeed, the Mookternamah for the registration fully recites that document, and the fact of its execution by the Respondents. The charge in the pleadings of the Respondents of fraud and collusion between the Executor and the Appellant was unfounded and not established; but such a charge could not avail the Respondents as a defence in the present suit, which is solely confined to the validity of the Kistbundy.

At the conclusion of the argument, their Lordships intimated their opinion that as at present advised they thought the decree appealed from could not be sustained.

The appeal stood over for consideration.

Judgment was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 12, 1861).—We have looked carefully through the papers in this case, and remain of the opinion, which we inti-[464]-mated at the hearing, that the decree cannot be supported. Considering the large amount of the sum at stake, and the position in life of the Respondents, it is difficult to account for their omitting to appear at our Bar to maintain the decree which they have obtained. But as far as we can discover, the proceedings of the Appellant to have been regular, and she is entitled therefore, to call upon us to dispose of the appeal ex-parte.

The Appellant carries on business as a Banker; in that character she alleges that she made very large payments for the Respondents, during the time that they, or some of them, were minors, in respect of jumma or revenue due to the Government from a Zemindary belonging to them. These advances are alleged to have been made at the instance of a person who was the guardian of the infants, and Executor and trustee under the Will of their father. For these sums the Respondents on taking possession of their Zemindary had given a Kistbundy, or engagement, to pay the amount by instalments, and for one of the instalments so secured the action in this case was brought.

There appears to be great reason to suspect fraud on the part of the guardian, and some reason to believe that the agents of the Appellant were privy to it. There can be little doubt that the lease of the Respondents' Zemindary, which was made by the guardian to a servant of the Appellant, and which was disputed by the Respondents and surrendered by the lessee, was really made to the servant as the nominee and for the benefit of the Appellant. It is very possible that if the Respondents had instituted a suit to take the accounts of this guardian, and, [465] charging collusion between him and the Appellant, had investigated the transactions which had taken place, it might have appeared that there was no such sum as was claimed by the Appellant justly due to her.

The Judges of the Sudder Court, who have pronounced a decree in favour of the Respondents, seem to have been influenced by reasons of this nature, and to have rested their judgment on the ground, that no adjustment of accounts had taken place to ascertain the balance really due to the Appellant before the Kistbundy was granted.

But we think this objection, under the circumstances, cannot be allowed to prevail; for the question, whether it would be fit to insist on this adjustment was distinctly brought under the notice of the Respondents before the Kistbundy was executed, and decided by them in the negative. It is proved by Hurro Gobind Sen that when a claim was made upon the Respondents in respect of the Bonds given by the Executor and guardian, they were desirous of avoiding the payment, and consulted him as to the mode of doing so; that they were advised by him that they could only do so by instituting a suit to which the Executor must be a party, and in which a settlement of his accounts would be required. Now, the Executor was their spiritual guide, and had been the spiritual guide of their father, and it was not considered proper to institute a suit against him. Under these circumstances it was thought better to come to terms with the Appellant, to obtain time for payment of the debt by instalments. The Kistbundy was accordingly executed, and the witness says that he considered the arrangement beneficial to the Respondents.

[466] There seems no reason whatever to doubt this statement. Hurro Gobind Sen, who makes it, was in the employment of the Respondents, was connected with them by marriage, and was referred to in their answer as one of their agents who ought to have been employed in any business of this description.

It appears impossible to permit the Respondents, after the death of the guardian, now to dispute their liability for payment of the debt which they had thus deliberately undertaken to pay.

The Kistbundy itself and its registration appear to be regularly proved, payments have been made of some of the instalments, and such payments are indorsed upon the instrument. The account books of the Appellant were produced at the hearing, and the fact of the payments made by her as the consideration for the bonds given by the Executor seems to have been thereby established.

Whatever suspicion may attach to the dealings between the Appellant and the Executor it cannot affect the decision of the present suit. We think that the decree of the Zillah Court must be restored, and the decree of the Sudder Court reversed, and that the Appellant must have the costs of the proceedings in the Sudder Court, but we are not inclined to give any costs of this appeal.

We will make a report to Her Majesty in conformity with the opinion which we have expressed.

[467] MUSSUMAT KRIPOMOYE DEBIA,—Appellant: GERISCHUNDER LAHORE, and Others,—Respondents * [July 2, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Suit to set aside a sale of Putnee Talooks, for arrears of rent, on the ground of an irregularity in the Proclamation of sale, as the lease was alleged to be held by the lessee in Benamee, and that the proper party's name did not appear, dismissed, the Ikrarnamah creating the alleged trust being declared a forgery.

The Appellant in this suit sought to recover possession of the Putnee Talooks, Dehee Chateaugour and Luckeebatta, situate in the Zillah, Rajshahye, of which Rajah Kisha Chunder Bahadoor was Zemindar, with wasilat, or mesne profits. In order to obtain such possession the Appellant sought by the suit to set aside, on the ground of irregularity, a sale by the lessor, made in the year 1836, under Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1819, for arrears of rent.

The facts of the case and the evidence sufficiently appear from their Lordships' judgment.

The appeal was argued by Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Leith for the Appellant; and Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. Field for the Respondents.

[468] As to the lease being a Benamee transaction, and the effect of such a trust by the Hindoo law, the case of Goopeekrist Gosain v. Gungapersaud Gosain (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 53) was referred to.

Their Lordships' judgment was reserved, and now delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir John Romilly (Aug. 2, 1861).—The question in this appeal is, whether the purchase of a Putnee Talook made by Juggurnath Roy, on the 6th of September, 1835, was a Benamee transaction—that is, whether it was bought with the money of and in trust for Hurro Kanth Roy, who is now deceased, but whose widow is the Appellant. Substantially, the question depends upon, whether an Ikrar Puttro, or declaration of trust, purporting to bear date the 29th Kartick, in the year, 1242, which corresponds to the 14th of November, 1835, and which also purports to have been executed by Juggurnath Roy, is a real or a supposititious document.

We entertain no doubt, if on the evidence it should appear that no reliance is to be placed on this document, that there is no other evidence before us sufficient to establish that the transaction in question was a Benamee transaction.

In consequence of the non-payment of the rent, the amount of which was disputed, the Putnee Talook was, after various proceedings to which it is unnecessary to advert, sold by the revenue authorities, on the 21st of May, 1836, by public auction, to Kalee Kanth Lahoree, who was the highest bidder; who has since died, but whose heir is the first Respondent on the record.

[469] The suit to recover the Putnee Talook was first instituted by Hurro Kanth Roy, on the 1st of March, 1845; that suit failed in April, 1850, by reason of misdating the Ikrar in the plaint, which error the Court refused to allow to be corrected.

On the 18th of July, 1850, the Appellant filed her plaint in this suit.

On the 26th of December, 1854, the Principal Sudder Ameen dismissed the Appellant's suit with costs.

This decision was appealed from to the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, and on the 28th of December, 1857, the decree of the Court below was affirmed with costs, which is the decree appealed from to us.

The original Kubalah granting the Putnee Talook was made on the 22nd of Bhedoon, 1242, which corresponds to the 6th of September, 1835; it was attested by fourteen witnesses, and at the same time a Kubooleut, or counterpart, was executed by Juggurnath Roy, containing the usual condition that, if the rents were not paid, the Zemindar should be at liberty to sell the Talook, under the provisions of Regulation VIII. of 1819. This counterpart was executed by nine witnesses, of whom the first and last were also attesting witnesses to the Kubalah, but the remaining seven witnesses were distinct and different persons.

That the same witnesses, fourteen in number, who attested the Kubalah should be obtained to attest the Ikrar, two months later, is a circumstance which, in our mind, gives rise to very grave suspicions. No valid reason is given for this peculiarity; the collection of exactly the same fourteen persons who had attested an instrument two months before, for the [470] purpose of attesting another instrument, must have occasioned both difficulty and delay, and it is not pretended that the circumstance of the witnesses who attested both instruments being the same could confer additional validity on the Ikrar. So little did this seem to be a matter of importance to the parties engaged in the transaction on the 6th of September, 1835, that of the two instruments then simultaneously executed, only two witnesses attested both. The suspicion created by this circumstance is augmented by the consideration that in the original plaint, which was filed on the 1st of March, 1845, the Ikrar is alleged to bear the same date as that of the Kubalah. If, in truth, the Ikrar had been executed at the same time with the Kubalah, it might well be that the same witnesses who attested the lease would also attest the declaration of trust; and, indeed, such a supposition would be natural and probable. Upon the assumption that the original Plaintiff had intended to set up a fictitious Ikrar, with the view of establishing the transaction to be one of a Benamsee character, it would be natural to set up an Ikrar of even date with the original Kubalah, in which case it would be naturally attested by the same witnesses, and accordingly such was the Plaintiff's allegation contained in the original plaint; and we cannot but consider it a matter also open to suspicion that, in so important a matter as the statement in the plaint of the Ikrar, on which the whole of the Plaintiff's case depended, an erroneous date should have been assigned to that instrument. It is to be observed, also, that the Ikrar itself, on the face of it, seems to have been framed as if it had been intended to be contemporaneous with the Kubalah, for it speaks of the delivering up of the Umulnamah, or letter of [471] authority, of to-day—that is, of the day of the date of the Ikrar; but the only Umulnamah of the existence of which any evidence is given is the Umulnamah of the date of the original Kubalah.

On the assumption that it was intended to set up a fictitious deed, various circumstances might, after the institution of the original suit, render it impossible to act on that intention, and to establish by proof an Ikrar of even date with the original Kubalah.

The following are instances:—The witnesses speak of Hurro Kanth Roy as having been present at the time when the Ikrar was executed, and even of the conversation which passed between him and Juggurnath Roy on that occasion. Hurro Kanth Roy was, at the date of the execution of the Kubalah, distant four or five days' journey off, at Calcutta. This fact might possibly have been established by evidence brought on the part of the Defendants. There were present, at the time when the Kubalah was executed, in September, 1835, the witnesses to the Kubooleut, and these witnesses, or some of them, might have been called, and not only disproved the presence of Hurro Kanth Roy, but might also have disproved the execution of any Ikrar at all at that time, and might have given evidence which would have been irreconcilable with the evidence on the part of the Plaintiff.

Assuming, therefore, that a fictitious deed was intended to be set up, this circumstance might explain how it was originally intended to set up an Ikrar of even date with the original Kubalah, and how that intention was afterwards abandoned as far as regarded the date of the instrument.

Another circumstance which creates grave suspicion [472] in our minds is the age of Hurro Kanth Roy at the time of the transaction. This we consider to be proved by the deposition of Hurro Kanth Roy himself, made in a distinct matter on the 12th of May, 1843. By this deposition it appears that he was then at the Government School at Rampoor, and that he stated his age to be at that time seventeen or eighteen. This was eight years and nine months after the date of the Ikrar. This would reduce his age at the time of the transaction to nine or ten years old. The explanation attempted to be given, that he understated his age for the purpose of entering the school, by the regulations of which no pupil could be admitted who had passed a given age—even if admitted, could only extend to a year or two; but no latitude which could be given to this suggestion would induce us to believe that a man of twenty-six or twenty-seven, could pass off for a youth of seventeen or eighteen; but we have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement of his age contained in the deposition which was made by himself in a matter in which his age was not a matter of importance, and by which it appears that he was then under the master of the school, and in which he speaks of the other lads of the school.

We are, therefore, of opinion that, on the evidence before us, the age of Hurro Kanth Roy in November 1835, must be considered as not exceeding ten or eleven years. In what way a boy of ten or eleven years of age could be possessed of money sufficient for the purchase of the Putnee Talook, the evidence fails to explain.

But this is not the only difficulty presented in the way of the Appellant by the youth of her husband [473] at the time of this transaction. The evidence given by the witnesses of the conduct of Hurro Kanth Roy on this occasion is irreconcilable with the supposition that he was not more than eleven years old, even allowing much to the precocity ascribed to Indian youths.

Ram Nedhee Deb says that this boy of ten or eleven years old gave directions for obtaining some of the Rajah's Mehal, if any were to be let out in Putnee. The witnesses all speak of his understanding the transaction, and taking a part in it.

Gooroo Dyal Roy says that Hurro Kanth Roy sent the money for the Kubalah, Rs. 4700 in specie, from Calcutta, by him and three other persons, accompanied by five or six others, by a boat; a very improbable mode of transmitting money in a country where Government notes were in circulation.

Kalee Pershad Dass says that Juggurnath Roy and Hurro Kanth Roy corresponded on this subject, and that Hurro Kanth Roy wrote letters to Juggurnath Roy on the subject, and they all state that he went from Calcutta to Sydabad, for the purpose of completing the transaction.

A careful examination of the witnesses also discloses various inconsistencies in their testimony. Two of them, namely, Haroo Dass and Gour Mohun Dass, in their depositions made in the first suit, speak of the Ikrar as originating from Juggurnath Roy; but the two witnesses examined in the suit, Ram Nedhee Deb and Sheetal Ram Raha, say that the Ikrar was made at the instance of Hurro Kanth Roy.

This latter observation would not have much weight were it standing alone, but combined as it is with the other circumstances enumerated above, it adds to the [474] suspicion necessarily created by the other facts in the case. It is not to be overlooked, also, that the Ikrar was not registered; to this omission, however, little weight would have to be attached, if the whole of the rest of the case were free from suspicion, by reason of the desire to keep the matter secret, which, on the assumption that it was a Benamee transaction, and intended to be concealed from Rajah Gobind Chunder was intelligible enough.

The circumstances above enumerated, if they stood alone, would bring our minds to the conviction that no reliance could be placed on this Ikrar in a Court of Justice as an authentic document.

But there is some evidence, on the other hand, in favour of the transaction having been originally a Benamee transaction. The strongest portion of this is to be found in a letter which, singularly enough, has been produced on behalf of the Defendant, Kalekanth Lahore; it is, therefore, free from all suspicion when used on behalf of the Plaintiff: this is a letter written in October, 1835, between the date of the Kubalah and the Ikrar, addressed to Juggurnath Roy, apparently by the Maharanee Kishenmonee Takooranee, who was the aunt of Hurro Kanth Roy. It seems to have been written in answer to a letter from Juggurnath Roy, requesting from her directions respecting this Putnee; and in it she directs that a Mookter-namali should be made out in the name of Nub Kanth Roy, and coupled with that of Oomapersaud Lahore, to whom the documents relating to the Putnee and the Kubalah were to be forwarded. This direction, to some extent, at least, seems to have been acted upon by Juggurnath Roy, and it is certainly very difficult to reconcile the writing by Juggurnath Roy of the [475] letter to which this was an answer, with the supposition that he was the beneficial owner and purchaser of the Putnee Talook. This observation, however, although in favour of holding that the transaction was originally one of a Benam character, does not establish the case of Hurro Kanth Roy, or make out any title in him to the Putnee Talook. It may be that the Maharanee was the purchaser of the Putnee Talook, but that is not the case of the Plaintiff, or what we have to consider in this appeal. This document has however, although indirectly, a bearing on the part of this case, which is that which is indeed the principal foundation of the Plaintiff's case, namely, the presence of all the deeds and papers relating to this Putnee Talook, and the Wasilat papers during the time which elapsed after the Kubalah, and before the sale in May, 1836, which are all now in the hands of the Plaintiff. This letter of the Maharanee authorizes the delivery of all papers relating to the Kubalah to Nub Kanth Roy. Hurro Kanth Roy is stated in the judgment of the Court to have resided with Nub Kanth Roy, who predeceased him, and it is suggested that by this means the original documents may have come into the possession of Hurro Kanth Roy. Whether this be so or not, it will not, in our opinion, affect the ultimate decision of the case.

The mode by which the Plaintiff alleges that she acquired possession of these documents is not established to our satisfaction, and this being so, we cannot allow the simple possession of them to outweigh the other circumstances of the case, which, in our opinion, strongly preponderate in favour of the Respondent.

One circumstance, however, and that a very material one, remains to be noticed, and which makes [476] strongly against the claim of the Appellant; and this circumstance is, that the sale having taken place in May, 1836, no suit is instituted until March, 1845, a period of nine years. This circumstance is the more noticeable because it appears that the Rajah Gobind Chunder, on whose account alone the matter is alleged to have been kept secret, had died in November, 1836, thereby releasing Hurro Kanth Roy from the fear of his making any claim to the Putnee Talook, the apprehension of which is alleged to have been the cause of the Benam.

Another circumstance connected with this lapse of time is also most important, for the suit was not instituted until after the deaths of both Juggurnath Roy and of Nub Kanth Roy had taken place, and they were the persons who could have spoken positively to the truth of this case, and whose evidence was of the greatest value in the determination of it.

Taking all these matters into consideration, and also bearing in mind that this is an appeal from the unanimous decision of the Court below on a question of fact, in which they had the opportunity of seeing and testing the mode of giving evidence of such witnesses as appeared before them, we are of opinion, that the decision of the Court below ought to be affirmed; and their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

[477] CHUNDERMONEE DEBIA CHOWDHOORAYN.—Appellant: MUNMOHEE-NEE DEBIA,—Respondent * [July 3, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

It is the practice of the Judicial Committee, in a case of disputed fact when the Courts in India appear to have diligently investigated the evidence, and no palpable mistake is apparent in the appreciation by the Court below of such evidence, to affirm the decree appealed from with costs.

An adoption said to have been made by a Hindoo widow in compliance with a power given her by an Unoomuttee Puttro, alleged to have been executed by her deceased husband, which adoption did not take place until seventeen years after his death, decreed by the Courts in India as unfounded in fact and the deed a forgery. Such finding sustained on appeal by the Privy Council.

This suit was brought by the Appellant on behalf of Sookda Gobind Chowdhooree, a minor, as the adopted son of Doorga Gobind Chowdhooree, deceased, claiming by his adopted mother and guardian. The principal objects of the suit were, first, to establish the minor's rights, as such adopted son, to the estate of his adoptive father; secondly, to set aside and cancel a clause in a Solehnamah (deed of compromise), alleged by the Appellant to have been fraudulently introduced by Burda Gobind Chowdhooree, the late husband of the Respondent, in which deed the Appellant admitted, that no permission or authority had been given her to adopt a son to her husband, and that, therefore, upon her death, the estate of her late husband devolved upon Burda Gobind Chowdhooree, his uterine brother; and, thirdly, to set aside, as fraudulent and void, two other Bengalee instruments, called respectively a Hibbanamah (deed of gift) and an Ikrarnamah (deed of agreement), purporting respectively to bear the seal of the Appellant, made in favour of Burda Gobind Chowdhooree by the Appellant; on the ground, that the same were prepared, and the seal of the Appellant surreptitiously and fraudulently impressed by Burda Gobind Chowdhooree himself.

The Appellant was the widow of Doorga Gobind Chowdhooree. Doorga Gobind Chowdhooree had two brothers: the elder, Gooroo Gobind Chowdhooree, a half brother, and the younger, Burda Gobind Chowdhooree, whose widow, Munmohenee, was the Respondent. The three brothers lived as a joint undivided family, and held possession jointly of their ancestral and acquired property. Doorga died in 1830. After his death litigation arose in the family, and the property was, by a compromise (the terms of which were embodied in a Solehnamah, dated the 19th of January, 1838), divided in the proportion of half to the eldest brother, Gooroo, and half to the younger brother, Burda; and the Appellant, Chundermonee, who was by the death of her minor son entitled, as his heiress and representative in estate, to the share which had belonged to her husband. Gooroo gave up so much of the property in his possession as made up the share of Burda and Chundermonee to half; and Burda gave up, on the part of Chundermonee and himself, so much of the property in his own possession as made up the share of Gooroo to half. This deed in form addressed to Gooroo by Burda and Chundermonee, contained [479] the following clause:—"Further, I, Chundermonee Dibbea, have no male or female issue, nor have I any permission to adopt a son. After my death, my share will revert to Burda Gobind Chowdhooree and his heirs, and your heirs have no concern in the matter. At no period will yourself or your heirs put forward any claims to the above share; such claims, if ever made, will be inadmissible."

Not long after the compromise, Chundermonee, in consideration of Burda having given up his own rights, and of his being entitled to the property in reversion, executed a Hibbanamah, or deed of gift, dated 1st Bhadoon, 1246 (August, 1840) by which she gave him certain estates. This gift was qualified by a later deed, called an Ikrarnamah, dated 19th Thalgoon, 1246 (March, 1841), by which, after stating that the rents arising from the estates which she had not given him were insufficient for her expenditure, she gave him power to manage her remaining estates, but directed that the profits of all the property comprised in both deeds should be applied for her own purposes. In both the last-mentioned instruments, the statement that Chundermonee had no authority to adopt, and consequently that the property would devolve upon Burda after her death, were repeated.

In 1849, the Appellant filed a plaint in the Civil Court of Zillah Rajshahye against the Respondent, Munmohenee Debia, the widow of Burda; and Bejcy Gobind, the eldest son of Gooroo; Sheebsoondree, the mother of Gobind; and one of the widows of Gooroo; and Hursondree, another of the widows of Gooroo.

In this plaint the Appellant sought to set aside the above particular portion of the Solehnamah, made between her and Burda Gobind Chowdhooree on the one [480] hand, and Gooroo on the other hand, on a settlement of some family disputes and litigation in that year, and about ten years after the death of her husband. The particular passage in this deed which the Appellant objected to, was the one which alleged that she had not any permission from her husband to adopt a son. The substance of the plaint was, that the Appellant had had one son by her husband Doorga, named Sarodha Gobind Chowdhooree, who had survived her husband, and had died before reaching his majority, in 1835; that that son being in bad health and misfortunes having been predicted to him by his horoscope, her husband having before his death given to her, in May, 1830, a deed of permission to adopt three sons consecutively in case of Sarodha's death; that after her husband and son's death she had lived jointly in mess with Burda, and, from the time of his coming of age, had entrusted him with the entire management of her affairs, and had placed her seal in his possession; that litigation having arisen between Gooroo on the one hand, and herself and Burda on the other, with reference to an ancestral Zemindary called Sonabajoo, this litigation had been compromised in the year 1838, by the deed of compromise, which deed had, as she alleged, been fraudulently filed in Court by Burda without her consent; that after Burda's death, in 1844, his widow (the Respondent), Munmoheenee, had forwarded to her (the Plaintiff) her seal, which had been left by her for a long time in the custody of Burda; that in August, 1845, she had proceeded to adopt a son (Sookda Gobind Chowdhooree) under the alleged deed of permission given by her husband, and that she had then discovered that Burda had unnecessarily and fraudulently caused to be inserted in the Solehnamah [481] a statement that she had no permission from her husband to adopt, and that after her death her share would revert to Burda and his heirs; that afterwards Burda had caused to be prepared a Hibbanamah and an Ikrarnamah relating to the same property as the Solehnamah without her knowledge, and she prayed that the rights of her adopted son might be established, by annulling the particular statement in the Solehnamah which she objected to, and by cancelling the deeds of Hibbanamah and Ikrarnamah.

The Respondent, Munmoheenee, by her answer, denied the allegation of the Plaintiff that, on the death of her husband, she had entrusted Burda with the management of her affairs; and alleged that it was untrue and incredible that the Solehnamah complained of should have been filed by Burda without the knowledge of the Plaintiff, since she had been fully informed of the nature of the compromise with Gooroo, in which the Solehnamah had been drawn up, the drafts of the deeds having been sent to her at Tantee Bund for her information, and the deeds themselves having been filed in the Court of Mr. Barlow, the then Judge of the Zillah Court, after distinct inquiry as to her consent to their contents; and the answer further alleged that the Judge had taken the precaution of sending back to the Plaintiff the Solehnamah, for the purpose of enabling her to affix her seal to it, and had caused it to be filed in Court, after taking the depositions of several respectable witnesses to the Plaintiff's execution, and making on the deed itself a memorandum on this point. It also alleged, that the Judge had ultimately decided the suit in which the Solehnamah was filed under its [482] provisions. The answer then averred, that it was necessary and material to mention in the Solehnamah that the Plaintiff had no permission to adopt, since the compromise had been made on the footing of Burda having a reversionary right to the property of the Plaintiff's deceased husband, and that Burda had, upon this understanding, given up his own property referred to in the compromise, in order to obtain for himself and Chundermonee certain other property which had been subsequently, and was then still enjoyed by the Plaintiff, and others, under the terms of the compromise; it also averred that, by numerous earlier petitions and proceedings in the Courts, the Plaintiff had herself disproved the allegations made in her plaint as to Burda having had possession of her seal, and had distinctly admitted her execution of the Ikrarnamah complained of. The answer also denied that Sarodha had been sickly before the death of his father Doorga, or that Doorga had given to the Plaintiff any permission to adopt; and it pointed out that it was very improbable that he should have done so, since he was, at the time when he was alleged to have made this deed, a young man, having one son, with the probability of having others, and that he had lived six months after the date of the supposed deed; and although he was the owner of considerable property, he had not, in that interval, caused the deed to be registered; nor had the Plaintiff, after her husband's death, in any way alluded to the deed in the declarations made by her before the public authorities, and in the petitions she had filed, after Sarodha's death, in which she had represented herself as the heir of Sarodha. The answer further [483] alleged, that it was very improbable that the Plaintiff would, if she had really obtained from her husband a right to adopt, have entrusted Burda with the management of the estate, since he was a co-sharer in the property with her, having on her death a heritable right to her husband's estate; and it stated that, in fact, Burda had not been so entrusted, but that the Plaintiff had herself managed her estate for seven years, between the death of her husband and son, and the majority of Burda, during the whole of which period she had never mentioned to any of the authorities that she was in possession of a deed of permission to adopt. The answer then pointed out that nearly twelve years had elapsed between the death of Sarodha and the exercise by the Plaintiff of the alleged right of adoption; and that about seventeen years had elapsed from the date of the alleged deed of adoption, before the Plaintiff had brought it forward.

The Defendant, Bejoy Gobind Chowdhooree, by his answer, alleged that the Plaintiff had had full knowledge of the contents of the deed, a portion of which she was seeking to set aside, and that all the terms embodied in it had been inserted therein with her full consent; that not only had the signature and assent of the Plaintiff been distinctly proved under the precautions taken by Mr. Barlow for that purpose, but that she had, in January, 1838, sealed a Mookternamah properly attested, in order to give effect to the compromise; that although the Solehnamah had been so long filed in Court, and the Plaintiff had, after her husband's death, managed her own property and instituted various suits, she had not for a very long [484] period raised any objection to the Solehnamah, and had indeed, within two and a half years of the commencement of the suit, taken a copy of the Solehnamah and inspected it, without making any objection to its purport. He also denied that the Plaintiff's husband had given her any authority to adopt, pointing out in detail the great improbability of her statement in that respect.

The Plaintiff's witnesses were called principally with the object of establishing the deed of permission to adopt set up by the Plaintiff, and to show that Burda had in his lifetime possession of the seal of the Plaintiff, and had affixed it to the Solehnamah without her consent or knowledge, and that the other documents relating to and consequent on the compromise had been drawn up and sealed by Burda without her consent. The statement of the witnesses called to prove the deed of permission to adopt, as to the time during which Doorga had been ill before his death, did not agree with the recital in the deed itself in this respect, and several of the witnesses who denied their attestations to the documents, disputed by the Plaintiff, had, soon after the making of these documents, given opposite evidence before Mr. Barlow, the former Judge. The witnesses, on behalf of Munmoheenee and the other Defendants, substantially proved the allegations contained in the above-mentioned answers of the Defendants; the making of the compromise of January, 1838, and the Plaintiff's full knowledge of the terms of the Solehnamah; that the document was drawn up in the presence of numerous respectable witnesses, after a discussion as to the rights of the parties about to enter into the compro-[485]-mise, and a distinct mention in the Plaintiff's presence of her being a widow without any son, and after that portion of the Solehnamah which referred to the fact, and to her having no authority to adopt, had been distinctly read out in her presence. They also proved the precaution taken by Mr. Barlow, in sending back the Solehnamah for the purpose of having the seal of Chundermonee affixed, and the subsequent affixing of the seal by Chundermonee. They also deposed to facts which established clearly that Chundermonee had had all along the possession of her seal, and had not entrusted it to Burda, and that the alleged adoption by Chundermonee had been illegal in substance, as she had paid money for the purchase of the child which she pretended to adopt. Owing to the death of the witnesses who had attested the fixing by Chundermonee of her seal to the Solehnamah, the Defendants were unable to call them before the Court, but it appeared by the earlier judicial proceedings, that four of these witnesses had, within a short time of the execution of this deed, appeared before the then Judge, Mr. Barlow, and deposed to its execution by Chundermonee. Evidence was also given showing that at the time when, as Chundermonee subsequently alleged, her seal had been left in the custody of Burda, she had herself stated the contrary in legal proceedings, and had affixed her seal to legal documents; that in other instances in the earlier litigation, Chundermonee had admitted the Solehnamah.

and shown that she was well aware of its contents, and that she had dealt with the family property on the footing of the arrangement contained in the compromise, and had been a [486] party to proceedings taken before the Courts to enforce the carrying out of it; and that she had on many occasions described herself and sued as the heir of her deceased son, Sarodha, and had not mentioned the deed of permission to adopt, which she subsequently, and after the lapse of many years, had set up.

On the 26th of July, 1852, the Principal Sudder Ameen (Abdool All) gave judgment, dismissing the suit, with costs.

On the 22nd November, 1852, the appeal came on for hearing before a full bench of the Sudder Dewanny Court (consisting of Sir Robert Barlow, Mr. H. T. Rakes, and Mr. J. H. Patton); when the Court, after referring to the evidence and issues, gave judgment in the following terms:— "There can be no doubt that the Plaintiff's object in bringing this suit has been to procure the recognition of her right to adopt a son, by putting to proof the validity of the Unoomuttee Puttro, and suing to get rid of certain admissions in existing documents which are opposed to the exercise of her alleged rights under the deed of adoption, on the averment that those admissions were introduced into the deeds in question with a fraudulent intent by her late husband's brother, without her knowledge or consent. The chief deed (to which it is only necessary to refer) is a Solehnamah filed in the suit before the Judge of Rajshahye, and, among other conditions relevant to the property then in litigation, it recites, that the ancestral property of Plaintiff's husband will be inherited after her death by her husband's brother, as she has received no power to adopt a son. This deed was filed in Court in the month of January, 1838, her husband having died in 1830, and the only son surviving him having died, before reaching his majority, in 1835. From the time of her husband's death till her assumption of the right to adopt in 1847, there is no proof whatever that she in any way intimated the possession of such a power, although there are admitted public acts on her part independent of the Solehnamah which might have naturally called forth some mention of her having been invested by her late husband with such a trust. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to withstand the strong and overpowering presumption against the Plaintiff arising from her own adverse admission in the Solehnamah, if it be established that that deed was filed in all its integrity with her knowledge and acquiescence. Of this we can entertain no doubt. The Solehnamah was filed in open Court with the greatest publicity by some of the parties themselves, and the agents of those not personally attending, on the 15th of the month of January, 1838, and on the deed itself is a memorandum written by the Judge of Rajshahye to the effect that as the deed exhibited no seal of the Plaintiff, Chundermonee, it should be forwarded to her residence on that day through parties named, that Plaintiff might affix her seal to the document in the presence of the parties so named by the Judge. There is another memorandum, written by the Judge on the 19th of the same month, certifying that his orders had been carried out, and that the parties indicated had authenticated the Solehnamah as the act of the Plaintiff, and to which she had affixed her seal in their presence. The decree of the Court then issued in the terms of the Solehnamah. Thus it is proved, and has now been admitted, that more than usual precaution was taken by the Judge of Rajshahye to ascertain and record that the Plaintiff herself duly certified by her own act her full acquiescence in the contents of the Solehnamah. She was a Purdah woman it is true, but parties apparently possessing her confidence, and in no other respect interested in the suit then pending, were specially deputed to witness her consent, and prevent the possibility of fraud being practised against her. It seems to us impossible, under these circumstances, to presume that she acted without a competent knowledge of the admissions contained in the deed, or at least to believe that she could have been long in ignorance of them when incorporated in the decision passed on that occasion. We coincide, therefore, in opinion with the lower Court, that the only reasonable conclusion is that she must have known the contents, and did of her own accord intimate thereby that she had received no power to adopt from her husband. Her assumption of that right now is under a deed which has never been certified by registration, or otherwise publicly recognised by her husband during his life, and is supported by no preponderating proof of its previous existence, cannot be recognised by the Court, and the claim of the Plaintiff, founded thereon, has, in our opinion, been most properly dismissed." And it was ordered, that the decision of the lower Court be confirmed, with costs, against the Appellant.

[489] The present appeal was from this decree of affirmance. The case was argued by the Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith for the Appellant, and Mr. W. Macpherson and Mr. Maude for the Respondent.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—The question in this case is a mere dispute as to facts; and, in a case of disputed facts, when they appear to have been proved and diligently investigated in the Courts below, and their Lordships can find no palpable mistake in the appreciation by the Court below of the evidence, they never advise Her Majesty to reverse a decree which is brought before them under such circumstances.

Now, this case appears to their Lordships to have been fully and fairly investigated.

The object of the suit was to establish an adoption, under a deed, dated the 19th of May, 1830, called an Unoomuttee Puttro, giving authority to adopt. The husband died within six months after that date, and the adoption which is now represented to have been made is not completed until January, 1847, seventeen years after the death of the husband.

Now, the only excuse for the delay is, that there was a son then in existence, and that so long as that son lived there was no necessity for the adoption of another son; but that son died in 1835, and from that year to 1847, there is not any proof whatever, or even an allegation, of any such power as is represented in this case having existed.

The first objection to this Unoomuttee Puttro is, [490] that the instrument itself ought to have been, and in ordinary circumstances (considering the nature of the instrument, the importance to the family, and the amount of the property to which it relates) would have been registered, and would have been communicated to the different parties, the persons whose rights were likely to be affected by such an adoption. Nothing of the sort took place, although the party executing the instrument lived six months after the date of it.

It can hardly be pretended that, if no notice was given of this instrument until the year 1846, it would be possible to maintain such a deed; but it is said that in 1835, immediately after, or at least very soon after the death of the son, the deed was actually mentioned and set up by the present Appellant in a petition to the Zillah Court.

Now, upon referring to that petition their Lordships are satisfied, that the Court could come to no other conclusion than that which they arrived at. What is the proof? There is no proof whatever. A document is produced which purports to be a copy of an original existing on the file of the Court. The files of the Court contain no such original. It professes to have been compared by a person named Mohamed Assim, who swears that that which professes to be his original signature is a forgery. It also purports to have been written by one Surroop Chunder Baugeheo, who also states that he never heard of it.

It appears to their Lordships, therefore, that in the Court below, independent of the Solehnamah, which is conclusive, the evidence against the Unoomuttee Puttro is strongly prepondering of those witnesses [491] who swear to it. There are four witnesses produced, who, in terms, substantially and almost identically the same, state that the instrument was executed, and all fall into the same mistake as to the period at which the party executed it. On the other hand, the Solehnamah, which is a distinct recognition that there was no such instrument as this, appears to be free from all objection whatever.

On the death of that son, the Zemindary was claimed by his uncle, the eldest brother of the father, and he instituted a suit against the younger brother and the Appellant, claiming the Zemindary. In that suit the parties came to a compromise, and executed a deed of Solehnamah, and it was essential to that compromise, as it seems to us, that the fact of there not being anybody in existence who could dispute the validity of that agreement should be stated. The deed accordingly, very naturally and very truly, states that the son who had been in existence was dead, and there could be no other son, because there was no power of adoption from the father.

Now, the deed not only has the seal of this lady attached to it, but is produced in Court. Sir Robert Barlow, the Judge before whom it is produced, seeing its importance, desired to have it fully ascertained, whether this deed was actually executed with the knowledge of this lady; he actually sends parties in whom confidence is placed, to have that verification of the instrument; they return an answer, that the deed was verified, and, she being a party to the suit, the Vakeel of the lady filed it in Court, and from that time to this it remains unimpeached.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that there was not the slightest pretence for this appeal, as the case had [492] been very fully and ably investigated by the Courts below; both Courts agreeing in holding that the one instrument is valid, the other a forgery. In those judgments their Lordships concur, and they will, therefore, advise Her Majesty to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

MOHUN LALL SOOKUL and Others,—Appellants; BEBEE DOSS and Others,—Respondents * [Nov. 26, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

The provisions of Ben. Reg. X. of 1829, imposing a stamp duty upon plaints in respect of the value of the subject-matter sued for, should be strictly attended to by the Courts in India.

Upon evidence taken in India showing the value of the property in dispute, an Order in Council, which rescinded a previous Order allowing special leave to appeal, on the allegation of the suppression of material facts as to the value, discharged, and the appeal restored.

The present application was to discharge an Order in Council, made upon a petition (see ante [8 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 193), which rescinded a previous Order in Council, granting special leave to appeal (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 428), on the ground, that there were omissions in the petition for leave to appeal of proceedings in the Court below, which would have shown the true value of the subject-matter in dispute, and for leave to restore the appeal.

[493] The present petition, after setting forth the facts reported on the previous petitions, stated, that the Court in India, having transmitted the depositions of witnesses examined by the Registrar of the Sudder Court, in compliance with the Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, which required evidence to be supplied by the Appellants, that the real or market value of the lands in dispute exceeded the sum of Rs. 10,000, had returned an answer that the value of the estate was not less than Rs. 950, which, calculated at twelve times the profits according to the mode of estimating the value in India, would exceed the prescribed sum of Rs. 10,000. The Petitioners also alleged that, there had been no intentional misrepresentation as to the value, or in keeping back the fact of the supplemental petition; and it was submitted, that the requirements of the Order of the 22nd February, 1860, were fully satisfied by the evidence establishing that the value of the estate was above Rs. 10,000, and the Petitioner prayed that, under the circumstances, the Order of the 26th of June, 1861, should be discharged, with costs.

Mr. Leith, in support of the petition, contended, first, that there had been no fraud in respect to the amount of the stamp impressed on the plaint with respect to the value of the subject-matter in dispute; and that, if any error occurred, it arose from a misapprehension of the effect of Ben. Reg. X. of 1829; and, secondly, he submitted that the evidence taken before the Registrar of the Sudder Court established the fact, that the real, or market, value was above Rs. 10,000, which brought the case within the limit prescribed by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838.

[494] Mr. W. Field, for the Respondents, opposed the application. He insisted, in the first place, that as the plaint untruly stated the value of the property sued for, it was a fraud upon the revenue law of India, citing Ben. Reg. X. of 1829, and, therefore, that the Petitioners were not now entitled to any indulgence: and he further insisted, that if the Court entertained the application at all, it ought to be upon terms of allowing the Respondents to give evidence in India before the Registrar of the Sudder Court that the lands were not of the value stated.

The Right Hon. Lord Justice Turner (Nov. 27, 1861). In this case leave to appeal was granted by an Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, but it was provided by the Order that the leave to appeal should be null and of no effect, unless satisfactory evidence should be supplied by the Appellants to the Registrar of the Sudder Court, that the real or market value of the land in dispute exceeded the sum of Rs. 10,000. By an Order of the 26th of June, 1861, the Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, was discharged. The application now before us is to restore the appeal, and to discharge the Order of the 26th of June, 1861, with costs.

The petition on which the Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, was made, alleged that the real or market value of the land in dispute exceeded the sum of Rs. 10,000, the prescribed limit under which the Sudder Court has no power to grant leave to appeal: but that the amount laid in the plaint as the [495] value of the suit for the fiscal purposes being only Rs. 3572, 10a. 9p., three times the amount of the Sudder jumma, or rent, the Petitioners were prevented by the rules of practice of the Sudder Court from obtaining leave to appeal therein.

The petition on which the Order of the 26th of June, 1861, was made, alleged that the Respondent, Bebee Doss, in her answer, insisted that the suit ought to have been valued according to Regulation X. of 1829, that is, at the real or market value of the land, and that the Appellants after this answer filed a supplemental plaint, stating that the suit had been by mistake valued at three times the Sudder jumma, and that it should have been valued at Rs. 4300, the real or market value of the land, but that the stamp being sufficient to cover a claim of Rs. 5000, no objection could exist on that head; and this petition further stated that the petition on which the Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, was made, had omitted to state the Respondent's answer, and the supplementary plaint, and it also stated, that the real or market value of the lands did not exceed the sum of Rs. 10,000.

In this state of circumstances, it was of course to discharge the Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, that Order having been obtained ex parte, and appearing to have been obtained upon an inaccurate statement of the facts, and the Order was discharged accordingly; but it being considered that there had been no intentional misrepresentation on the part of the Appellants, the Order of the 26th of June, 1861, by which it was discharged, was made without prejudice to any further application by the Appellants on notice to the Respondents.

[496] The case, therefore, now comes before us unprejudiced by what passed on the previous applications, and, it now appears, that the supplementary plaint did not allege the Rs. 4300, to be the real or market value of the land, but stated it to be the auction price of the land, referring, of course, not to any then present auction, for there was none, but to some past auction at which the property had been bought, and meaning, no doubt, to refer to the auction mentioned in the plaint; and, it further appears, that the Appellants have laid before the Registrar of the Sudder Court satisfactory evidence that the real or market value of the land exceeds Rs. 10,000.

As the case now stands, therefore, there was no fraud practised upon this Court in obtaining the Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, and the condition on which that Order was granted has been fulfilled. There would seem, therefore, prima facie, to be no ground for now refusing to restore the appeal.

But it was said for the Respondents that the value of the land in dispute was untruly stated in the plaint, in fraud of the revenue laws of India, and that leave to appeal ought not, therefore, to be granted. Their Lordships are far from saying that, if they were satisfied that any such fraud was intended they would be disposed to grant the least indulgence to any party in any way participating in it, but in this case they are satisfied that, whatever misapprehension there may have been, there was no such fraud intended. It was a mistake on the part of the Court, no less than of the Appellants, to allow the cause to proceed upon such a representation of the value as was contained in the supplementary plaint, and their Lordships take this opportunity of suggesting that the terms of the [497] Regulation upon the subject of value should be carefully attended to. They think that, as this case now stands, the Order applied for cannot be refused upon the ground suggested.

It was asked by the Respondents that they might be at liberty to go into evidence on the question of value, but their Lordships are not disposed to deviate in this respect from their original Order, which was carefully and designedly confined to evidence to be adduced by the Appellants, with a view to prevent the introduction, for the purpose of a merely fiscal Regulation, of a contested issue on the question of value, a result which, in their Lordships' Judgment, ought in all cases, as far as justice will permit, to be avoided.

The petition before us asks that the Order of the 26th of June, 1861, may be discharged with costs, but their Lordships think that there should be no costs on either side.

The Order, therefore, which their Lordships will humbly recommend to Her Majesty to be made on this application, will be simply to discharge the Order of the 26th of June, 1861, and to restore the appeal.

[498] OMANATH CHOWDRY and Others,—Appellants: SHEIKH NUJEEB CHOWDRY and Others,—Respondents * [Nov. 26, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

A cross appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Court in India, although not interposed within the proper time, admitted, upon conditions, (1), of the principal appeal being prosecuted; and (2), that the principal and cross appeals be consolidated and heard on one printed case.

This was a petition by the Respondents for leave to prosecute a cross appeal from part of the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Court at Calcutta, dated the 31st of December, 1860, which affected their interests.

It appeared from the petition that Omanath Chowdry and the other Appellants being dissatisfied with the above decree, in due course appealed to the Queen in Council, and it was alleged that the effect of that decree was to deprive the Petitioners of a portion of the land sued for by them, which consisted of 2339 Beegahs. That Omanath Chowdry and others, having by their petition appealed against the whole decree, the Petitioners, acting upon the practice of the Courts in India, regulated by the Act, No. XV. of 1853, thought [499] that it would be open at the hearing of the appeal in England to offer objections to that portion which deprived the Petitioners of part of the land without incurring the expense of a cross appeal in respect thereof. That the Petitioners were afterwards advised that it was necessary to institute a cross appeal for that object, and that as the time for applying to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for leave to appeal had expired, under the circumstances, it was submitted, that a cross appeal ought to be allowed, and the Petitioners prayed for special leave to lodge a cross appeal, and that the same should be consolidated with the original, or principal appeal of Omanath Chowdry and others, and that the same should come on for hearing upon one printed case, provided that if such original or principal appeal should be dismissed for non-prosecution, then that the Petitioners should be at liberty to prosecute their cross appeal as a separate appeal.

Mr. Leith, for the Petitioners, applied ex-parte for leave to prosecute a cross appeal.—Their Lordships granted the application upon the terms embodied in the following Order in Council, made thereon:—"It is hereby ordered, that the Petitioners be, and the same are hereby allowed to enter and prosecute their cross appeal from so much of the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta of the 31st of December, 1860, as deprives the Petitioners of a portion of the 2339 Beegahs of land sued for by their plaint, provided the principal appeal be prosecuted by the original Defendants to the suit, and in [500] case the appeal and cross appeal are prosecuted, the same are to be consolidated and to be heard on one printed case on each side" (a).

THE COLLECTOR OF MASULIPATAM,—Appellant: CAVALY VENCATA NAR-RAINAPAH,—*Respondent [June 15, 18, 19, 1860].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

The estate of a Hindoo of the Brahmin caste, dying without heirs, escheats to the Crown, as the Sovereign power in British India.

An estate taken by escheat is subject to the trusts and charges, if any, previously affecting the estate.

Exposition of the law of escheat laid down in the Mitaschara, ch. ii., sec. vii., art. 5, and the passages there cited, where it is said "Never shall a King take the wealth of a priest; for the text of Menu (ix. 189) forbids it. The property of a Brahmana, shall never be taken by the King; this is fixed law." And also referring to Narada, where it is declared that "If there be no heir of a Brahmana's wealth, on his demise it must be given to a Brahmana, otherwise the King is tainted with sin." Held by the Judicial Committee, reversing the decision of the Sudder Court at Madras, that the title of the Crown by escheat to property of a Brahmin dying without heirs, subject to the duty, or trust impressed, prevailed against any claimant who could not show a paramount title.

Semble. There is no distinction in this respect between Sacerdotal Brahmins and the ordinary members of that caste.

In this case, the question raised was the right of the Government to seize as an escheat a Zemindary, in the Collectorate of Musulipatam, the property of a [501] Hindoo of the Brahmin caste, who died without heirs, and without an adopted son.

The estate in question, called the Zemindary of Vissulnapettah, was held by a Hindoo of the Brahmin caste, named Varegonda Ramanapah, under a permanent Cowl, or grant, subject to the payment of the revenue to Government. On his decease in the year 1810, without issue, and without any adopted son, his widow, Lutchmedavamah, entered into possession, and continued so until her decease, which happened on the 1st of September, 1849.

It appeared that as early as the year 1795, the Respondent's family had been in the habit of advancing money to the owners of this estate, to enable them to pay the Government revenue, and other liabilities incurred on its account. The Respondent's father, Cavalv Vencata Lutchmia, continued to make advances to the widow Lutchmedavamah until the year 1838, when a balance of Rs. 48,614. 13. 6p. was found to be due to Cavalv Vencata Lutchmia from her; and on the 20th of April, 1838, she executed a bond in his favour, by which she mortgaged to him the Zemindary, with the exception of two villages, as security for the payment of that sum, by instalments, and the permanent Cowl of the Zemindary was at the same time delivered up by her to Cavalv Vencata Lutchmia.

Default having been made in payment of the first instalment, Cavalv Vencata Lutchmia instituted a suit in the Provincial Court of Masulipatam against Lutchmedavamah to recover the amount of the Bond, which became due on the first default, by a sale of the mortgaged estate. That Court on the 10th of March, 1839, decreed that the amount [502] due to Cavalv Vencata Lutchmia, with interest and costs, then amounting to Rs. 65,613. 2a. 4p., should be paid to him by the sale, in the first instance, of the property mortgaged by the Bond, and in the event of the proceeds of the sale not proving sufficient for the purpose, that the deficiency should be recovered from any other property belonging to the Defendant Lutchmedavamah.

Cavalv Vencata Lutchmia died shortly afterwards, leaving three sons, one of whom, the Respondent, on behalf of himself and his brothers, in the year 1840, presented a petition to the Provincial Court, praying for execution of the decree against Lutchmedavamah. On the 14th of January, 1841, the Provincial Court ordered that a precept be issued to the Assistant Judge at Masulipatam, directing him to enforce the decree by collecting the amount thereof from Lutchmedavamah, and from the mortgaged property, and to pay the same to the Respondent.

The Assistant Judge transmitted a precept, with a copy of the proceedings, to Mr. P. Grant, the then Collector of the District, upon which the Collector sent a letter to Lutchmedavamah, advising her to make arrangement with the judgment creditor for the satisfaction of his claim; and he added, that, if she did not enter into a compromise with the creditor, and report the arrangement to the Court within five days, she might be sure that the Zemindary would be attached, and the precept of the Court carried out.

In compliance with this requisition, Lutchmedavamah entered into a settlement with the Respondent, and on the 5th of April, 1841, following, executed a Razeenamah, which set forth that, the Collector had taken measures to affect a sale of [503] the property, and that she had, for the purpose of preventing such sale for the present, entered into a compromise with the Respondent, whereby she had undertaken to pay him Rs. 67,444 12a. by eight annual instalments and that twelve of the fourteen villages of the Zemindary, and the hamlets attached thereto, and that the permanent Cowl granted by the Government to her late husband should remain under mortgage, according to the terms of the Bond sued on, till the principal and interest were discharged, the remaining two villages being reserved for her maintenance. This compromise was recorded, and the execution of the decree suspended. This arrangement was reported by Lutchmedavamah to the Collector on the 26th of April, 1846.

In consequence of litigation between Lutchmedavamah and other parties respecting the Zemindary, the Sudder Court, on the 5th of December, 1841, suspended the execution of the compromise; but on the termination of those disputes, the Respondent again moved the Sudder Court to execute the decree of 1839, when that Court made the following order: "The delay to give effect to the Razeenamah in question particularized by the Petitioner (the Respondent), having in effect occurred, and he having thereby been subjected to loss of produce, from the estate transferable to him under the Razeenamah having been thus kept from him, the Court is of opinion, that it is just and equitable that Petitioner should be indemnified for the losses. The Court, therefore, direct the Civil Judge to adjust the Petitioner's claim, in regard to its amount, from the 15th November, 1841, on which date, according to the terms of the Razeenamah, the Zemindary should have been made over to the Petitioner, and to realize the same from the estate of Lutchmedavamah for the period terminating with her death, up to which the estate was in her hand, and for the remaining period from the party or parties who then held possession."

Upon the death of Lutchmedavamah, in 1848, the Zemindary was attached by the Magistrate of Masulipatam; and possession taken by the Collector, under Act. No. XIX. of 1841. On the 16th of July, 1850, the Governor in Council of Madras declared the estate to have escheated to the Government on failure of heirs, and directed the same to be assumed and incorporated with the Circar lands.

The Respondent presented two petitions to the Civil Judge of Masulipatam, praying to be put in possession of the Zemindary, in accordance with the stipulations of the Razeenamah. These petitions were rejected by an order of the Civil Judge, dated the 24th of June, 1853; but such order was reversed, on appeal, by the Sudder Adawlut, on the 13th of February, 1854, and that Court ordered the Civil Judge to execute the decree in suit of 1839, by making over the Zemindary to the holder of the decree, pursuant to the terms of the Razeenamah. An application was made on behalf of the Collector of Masulipatam to the Sudder Adawlut, for a view of the order of the 13th of February, 1854, on the ground that the Zemindary had escheated to Government on failure of heirs; but the Court decline to depart from such order, and confirmed the same on the 21st of October, 1854.

From these decisions there was no appeal, and the Respondent was put in possession of the Zemindary. Under these circumstances, the Appellant, as the [505] Collector of Masulipatam, on the 25th of September, 1855, instituted a suit against the Respondent to recover the Zemindary, alleging, amongst other things, that the title of Government to the estate was paramount to that of the Respondent, if, in fact, he had any valid title at all, and that Lutchmedavamah had no power or authority under the Hindoo law to alienate the estate, or any part thereof, in perpetuity, or to pledge the same, if at all, for any period beyond that of her own life, as against those entitled to the estate as next in succession to herself. That upon her death the estate passed by way of escheat to the Government, and vested therein, and that no act of Lutchmedavamah, could in any way defeat, postpone, or curtail the vested right of the Government, who upon her death became entitled by the Hindoo law to enter upon and enjoy the estate fully discharged from any incumbrances or liabilities created by her during her incumbency and possession thereof.

The Respondent by his answer denied that the title of Government to the Zemindary was paramount to that of the Respondent, which he insisted was absolute and established by law, and also denied that Lutchmedavamah was without power or authority under the Hindoo law, to alienate the Zemindary, or any part of it in perpetuity, or to pledge the same for any period beyond that of her own life, as against those entitled to the Zemindary as next in succession to herself; and the Respondent contended that, the Zemindary was an ancient Zemindary held under a permanent Cowl, guaranteed by a Sunnud Istemrar Milkeut, or deed of permanent property, with full power to dispose of or alienate [506] it, and that no such Zemindary could escheat to Government after it had once been legally disposed of under a decree of a competent Court and the Razeenamah, and that such Zemindary could in no way be seized or attached by Government except for nonpayment of the annual settlement, or kist, which had not happened in this case; and the answer insisted, that Lutchmedavamah succeeded by the Hindoo law with full power of alienation, and that by that law a widow in possession as heir had full right to sell, mortgage, or alienate in perpetuity the property, or any portion of it, which she had inherited, for certain necessary purposes, such as the payment of debts contracted by herself or the former proprietors; for lawful purposes, such as, in this case, the payment of Government Peishcush, or the discharge of liabilities, and also for her maintenance, binding the estate, and on such, as a matter of law, the Respondent craved the judgment of the Court; and the answer further insisted, that on the death of Lutchmedavamah there was no part of the Zemindary, being her estate, remaining to lapse to Government, or to be claimed as an escheat, for that the whole of the estate had been already vested in the Respondent years before, by a decree of a competent Court, and by the Razeenamah, having the force of a decree; that the delay in executing the decree and Razeenamah, which was not occasioned by the Respondent or his acts, could in no way alter his vested interest, or cut down his absolute right to possession and enjoyment of the lands and profits; and that of all this the Government, through their agent, the Collector, were fully cognizant, having had due notice thereof before and at the time of the execution of the Razeenamah, and through [507] their agent, the Collector, having been consenting parties thereto; and on those points, as matters of law, the Respondent craved the Judgment of the Court.

After the reply and rejoinder had been filed, the Court recorded the following points to be established by the Appellant and Respondent respectively:—The Appellant's points were; first, to prove the title of Government to escheats, of the nature alluded to in the plaint. Second, that the widow, Lutchemdavamah, had no authority by Hindoo law to transfer her ancestral property to the Respondent; and that she was only a life tenant, and had only a life interest in the same; and third, that the property was seized by Government as an escheat, and to show authority for such act.

The Respondent's points were—first, to prove the present Respondent's title to the property. Second, that in the decree of 1839 he had authority under Hindoo law to alienate all property, personal and real, by demise or otherwise to any one. Third, that the Collector, or agent of the Government, was made acquainted with the stipulations of the Razeenamah, now disputed, and that he acceded to them. Fourth, that execution was never sued out for the decree of 1839, and what occurred officially thereupon. Fifth, that the property was not seized as an escheat, but zifted (sequestered), pending the decision of judicial authorities as to the respective rights thereto of different claimants. Sixth, that the property in question could, under no circumstances, escheat to Government; and to show the order of succession to such property as laid down in Hindoo law.

Evidence was adduced on behalf of the Appellant [508] and of the Respondent, to establish the facts above stated. It appeared from the Appellant's evidence that the Collector of Masulipatam, in the year 1830, had refused to register a transfer of the estate in question from the widow Lutchemdavamah to one of her relations, on the ground that it would prejudice the next heirs of her deceased husband.

At this stage of the proceedings, the Court of Masulipatam, at the instance of the Respondent, propounded the following questions to the Hindoo law officers of the Sudder Court:—"Whether a Hindoo widow (Brahmin) has authority to transfer by mortgage, or conditional bill of sale, all right and title to her real property (landed estate) on account of debts incurred by her for the payment of the Government Peishcush, her own personal expenses, as well as those of the establishment?—If such deed of transfer is valid and binding on her, her executors and assigns, having no direct heir at law?—Whether the estate of such party thus transferred during her lifetime can be escheated at her death, as Bewariss, or without heirs?"

To these questions the Pundits of the Sudder Court returned the following answers:—"The Hindoo law declares, that a widow inheriting the estate of her husband is bound to perform his exequial rights, maintain his relatives, and make daily religious gifts, in proportion to the extent of the estate. She cannot, likewise, fail in her punctuality of payment of the Circar Peishcush. These charges are so important, that the law holds the widow possessed of only real estate competent, when she has no other alternative, to alienate her right and title thereto by mortgage, or conditional bill of sale, in the [509] event of the estate not yielding, under any circumstances whatever, produce sufficient to meet the above charges, as well as her own personal expenses; and in the event of her having no cousins, or of her cousins having neglected to afford her the necessary pecuniary assistance. Under these circumstances, the Brahmin widow referred to in the question has, under the Hindoo law, authority to transfer by mortgage, or conditional sale, the real estate mentioned in the question, on account of the debt incurred, for the purposes therein stated. Such deed of transfer, emanating as it does from an authorized person, as stated above, is valid, and is, therefore, binding upon her and her relations. The only estate which would escheat to Government as Bewariss, or without heirs, is that of persons other than Brahmins, which might have been left undisposed of by the proprietors thereof; but the Circar cannot take as heirless property that which had been legally transferred by the proprietor thereof during his lifetime, and which has, in consequence, become the property of the transferee. In the present instance, therefore, the estate transferred, as stated above, cannot be escheated as Bewariss."

The Civil Court of Musalipatam, on the 8th of May, 1857, pronounced its decree in the cause, by which it decided, that the object of the agreement of compromise was to make that permanent and absolute which the mortgage bond had made simply conditional or dependent on the amount that should be realized by the enforcement of the terms, namely, by the sale of the property alluded to; and although such deed might have been executed by the free will of the parties in question, the Civil

Judge was of opinion, [510] that such transfer, without good and sufficient cause shown, was illegal, and contrary to the provisions of Hindoo law. That from a full consideration of the whole of the circumstances of the case, the Court was of opinion, that the Kararnamah, or postponed petition alluded to, must be quashed, and that the provisions of the decree in the original suit of 1838, should be enforced in its integrity by the sale of the property therein alluded to, or so much thereof as might be sufficient to meet the balance of the award then made, and to no later period, the whole to be exposed at an upset price equal to that demand; and on failure to realize the sum decreed, the property itself should be made over to the Defendant. That, on the other hand, should the value of the property be more than sufficient to satisfy the award to the Defendant in the former decree, in consequence of there being no direct heirs to the deceased widow, Lutchemdavamah, the title of the Government to claim such property as an escheat was confirmed on payment of the lien thereon, namely, the balance due to the Defendant.

The appeal was heard before Messrs. Hooper, Strange, and Baynes, the Sudder Court Judges, and on the 8th of May, 1858, the Court delivered judgment as follows:—“The Defendant objects that the estate in question, as belonging to a Brahmin, can never escheat to the Government; and to this point, as being one of a conclusive nature, the hearing of the appeal has been confined. On the trial of the suit before the Civil Judge, a question, among others, was put by him to the Pundits of the Sudder Adawlut, in such a form as to elicit from them an answer to the effect [511] that the estates of Brahmins could not escheat to the Government; but the point appears to have escaped the Civil Judge's attention, as it is not noticed by him in his decree. The objection is met on the part of the Plaintiff by the plea, that the law which would ultimately assign the estate of an heirless Brahmin to other Brahmins, and these virtuous ones, is of too vague and uncertain a nature to be dispensed: that this law must be considered obsolete, as are other parts of the Institutes of Menu, from which it is derived; and that, if it be put in force, it can have respect to none but sacerdotal Brahmins. The Judges have considered these various pleas, and do not find them sustainable. It is true that, there may be difficulty in dealing with the ultimate provisions of the law of succession to Brahminical estates devoid of natural heirs, but there can be none in upholding the primary declaration that ‘the property of a Brahmin shall never be taken by the King,’ which, it is added emphatically, is a ‘fixed law’ (Menu, ch. IX. art. 189); and it is with this primary declaration that the Court have now to deal. That this law is an obsolete one, there is nothing to show. It is re-enforced in the current law-books, and prominently in the Mitaschara, (ch. II. sec. vii. art. 5), which is the authoritative and prevailing declaration of law in this part of India; and it is obvious that, while Brahmins exist in the integrity of their caste, a law regulating inheritance among them, and unchanged, must in like manner be in continued existence. The plea that the law now in question relates merely to sacerdotal Brahmins is founded in misapprehension. Whatever the occupation of a Brahmin, he is as much a Brahmin as one who devotes himself to the office of the priesthood; and the law is general as to all Brahmins, without any [512] such limitation as is contended for. The term ‘Priest,’ it has to be observed, as the text may show, has been used in the translation of the fifth clause of the section of the Mitaschara, above referred to, as convertible with the Brahmin, the words used in the original being ‘Brahmana Dravyam,’ or ‘the wealth of a Brahmin.’ The Court finding thus a positive prohibition in the Hindoo law to the assumption in escheat by the ruling power, of the estate of a Brahmin, and it being allowed that the property now in question is a Brahminical estate, the Court resolve to set aside the decree of the Civil Judge, and dismiss the suit, with costs.”

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill for the Appellant.—Although there is no averment in the pleadings that Veragonda Ramanapha, the last Zemindar seized, was a Brahmin, or that on account of his caste the Zemindary could not escheat to the Government; points which by Mad. Reg. XV. of 1816, sec. 10, ought to have been recorded for proof in the suit, Srimut Moottoo Vijaya Raghanaidha Goveery Vallabha Perria Woodia Taver v. Rany Anya Moottoo Natchiar (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 278), Namboory Setapaty v. Kanoo-Cholannu Pulla (ib. 359), yet, for the purpose of the argument, we will admit that he was a Brahmin, although there is no proof of that fact.

We insist, however, that the judgment cannot be sustained upon these grounds, first, that the Government was constructively in possession of the Zemindary, and had a good possessory title as against the [513] Respondent: secondly, that the Respondent had no title, inasmuch as the widow had no power by the Hindoo Law to alienate any part of the Zemindary: and thirdly, that the Government is in possession by escheat.

First, The Government were put in possession by the Court under the provisions of the Act, No. XIX. of 1841, and we insist that that is a valid title, as against the Respondent, whose only right was as a mortgagee, and under the Razeenamah. Now, as the widow had no power to alienate the estate, the whole transaction, as affects the Government right, must fall to the ground. The Collector had no authority from the Government to recommend the widow to agree to the Razeenamah to save the estate from sale, and as such act was beyond the functions which devolved upon him as an executive Officer, the Government are not bound by this act, which was ultra vires.

Secondly: the important question really involved is, whether a childless Hindoo widow has power by the Hindoo law prevailing in Madras to alienate her deceased husband's estate. Our contention is, that she has no such power. According to the Books of authority and text-writers received in India, they all, without exception, negative such a power: no passage can be found in the Books which authorizes a widow to alienate her husband's estate, even if the husband had died without heirs. It must be borne in mind that there are two schools of law in India. The Mitashara prevails throughout the peninsula of India. The Dāya-Bhāga is confined to Bengal, and is, therefore, the exceptional law. Now, the Dāya-Bhāga, though it is not the law which governs the rights of Hindoos in Madras, gives larger powers to widows than the Mitashara, which latter authority, we sub-[514]-mit, governs this case upon this point. It makes no difference that she was the widow of a Brahmin. The general Hindoo law on this subject is thus stated by Sir Thomas Strange, "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 246 (2nd edit.): "With respect not only to what she may have inherited from her husband, but to its accumulated savings also, her duty is to regard herself as little more than tenant for life, and trustee for the next heirs, of property so possessed; being (as already intimated) restricted from alienating it, by her sole independent act, unless for necessary subsistence, or purposes beneficial to the deceased." This interpretation of the law is confirmed by the Pundits, in the case of Ramasamy v. Mandavilly Pariah, referred to in Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 408. So, in the Dāya-Bhāga of Jimūta Vāhana, ch. XI. sec. i. art. 56, it is laid down that "the wife must only enjoy her husband's estate after his demise. She is not entitled to make a gift, mortgage, or sale of it. Thus, Catyayana says, "Let the childless widow, preserving unsullied the bed of her lord, and abiding with her venerable protector, enjoy with moderation the property until her death. After her let the heirs take it." And in the Mitashara, ch. II. sec. i. art. 35, which is an authority more favourable to the widow's rights than the law received in other parts of India, it is said, that if the husband dies without male issue, his brothers take, and the widow has only an allowance for maintenance for life, as "the wife takes as much as is adequate for her subsistence, and the brethren take the rest." In Morley's Dig. tit. "Inheritance" 4. "of widows," Vol. I. p. 311, it is broadly laid down that "a widow succeeding to the landed estate of her husband, takes only a life interest," and he quotes numerous authorities in sup-[515]-port of that proposition. The restriction upon the widow's power of alienation of the real estate of her husband arises from the fact that she has only a life estate. Sir F. W. Macnaghten, "Hindu Law," p. 9, says "widows who take an estate shall take it for life only." And so it has been determined by the Supreme Court at Calcutta, Gopeymohun Thakoor v. Seban Cover (Sir E. H. East, notes of decided case, 2 Morley's Dig. p. 110), Doe dem. Ramanund Mookopadhin v. Ramkishen Dutt (ib. 219), Doe dem. Sibnauth Roy v. Bunsook Buzzary (ib. 131); by the Sudder Court there, Mohun Lal Khan v. Ranees Siroomunee (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 32), Nundkomar Rai v. Rajindurnaraen (1 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 262), Pokhnarain v. Mussumaut Seesphool (3 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 116): and by this Tribunal, in the case of Keerut Sing v. Koolahul Sing (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 331).

Thirdly: the estates of a Hindoo, whether of the Brahmin or any other caste, dying without heirs, devolve on the Sovereign power, by the law, as now administered in India. [The Lord Justice Knight Bruce:—It would avoid further litigation if some arrangement could be made for the surrender of the Zemindary to Government upon payment of what is due to the Respondent.] The Indian Government, as the Sovereign power, took the Zemindary, in the absence of heirs of the late Zemindar, by escheat. Nothing can be more positive than the right of the State to take either as ultimus haeres, or for forfeiture, as in the case of felony (a) or treason, the estate of a Hindoo. Mad. Reg. VII. of [516] 1817, sec. 6, expressly provides for the general superintendence of all escheats, which that section directs to be vested in the Board of Revenue. That regulation was founded upon the Ben. Reg. XIX. of 1810, sec. 7, which is almost identical with the former Regulation, and also provides for the superintendence of escheats. Joanna Fernandez v. Domingo de Silva (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. pp. 227, 230), was a case of a British subject dying in India without heirs, and the Sudder Court held that the Government was entitled to take the lands under the provisions of the latter Regulation. If there can be any exemption in such law from the general law of escheat in favour of any class, it must be confined to the estates of Brahmins who are devoted to priestly offices, and does not apply to the Zemindary in question. It is true that it is laid down in the Institutes of Menu, ch. IX. sec. 189, that "The property of a Brahmin shall never be taken as an escheat by the King; this is fixed law: but the wealth of the other classes, on failure of all heirs, the King may take." And that principle is adopted in the Mitaschara, ch. II. sec. vii. art. 5. But it is impossible to receive this as an exposition of Hindoo law now received or acted upon in India. It must be treated as obsolete. Sir Thomas Strange says in his preface to his treatise on "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. xiii., that the Institutes of Menu, though the undoubted foundation of all Hindoo law, are looked upon by Jurists "as a work to be respected, rather than, in modern times, to be implicitly followed." So W. H. Macnaghten "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pref. p. viii., treats of ancient Hindoo laws as obsolete at the time he wrote. But, if the question is to be tried solely by the ancient Hindoo law, if not affected by Mad. Reg. VII. of 1817, which we contend overrides it, then we [517] submit, that the exemption in such law from the Government's right to take by escheat, in favour of any class, is confined to the estates of sacerdotal Brahmins, a distinction well known and defined by the Hindoo law. W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. ch. V. pp. 248-263; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. pp. 220, 247, where the point was distinctly raised and decided. Mill's British India, Vol. I. p. 185 (4 edit. by Wilson), gives a valuable summary of the law relating to Brahmins, showing the utter impossibility of the application of the doctrine laid down by Menu to the present state of society. Wilson says, in a note, Vol. I. p. 192, that the Brahmins, collectively, have lost all claim to the character of a priesthood, and that they form a nation following all kinds of secular avocations. How is a Brahmin property to be generally exempt from escheat! Take this test. Suppose a Brahmin committed felony, or treason, if the passage in Menu is to be adopted, the Crown would have no power of declaring his estate forfeited to the State. Such an anomaly could not be permitted upon the authority of a single passage in that work. If the Crown cannot take as ultimus haeres, who then is the heir of a Brahmin? Menu does not say any one Brahmin in particular, but "Brahmins who read the three Vedas," ch. IX. sec. 188. Such succession is utterly impracticable. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. pp. 149, 310 [2nd edit.]. In any circumstances the ruling power must take, even if it be held to be subject to a trust for a Brahmin; though such a trust would be void by English law for uncertainty.

Lastly, we are not concluded by the orders or the decrees of the Sudder Court and the Civil Court of Masulipatam, in 1854, and we submit that, although the former order was not appealed from, yet that the whole [518] subject at issue can be taken into consideration by the Court upon a final decree, Sumbloodall Girdhurlall v. The Collector of Surat (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 1). No appeal lies from an Interlocutory order (1 Summary Cases, 113).

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Mr. Ayrton, and Mr. Norton for the Respondent. First: Our answer to the Appellant's argument is, that there is no possessory title by the Government: on the contrary, that the Collector in advising the compromise admitted the Respondent's possessory title, and that the Government are bound by the Collector's acts. Indeed the Respondent's title is unquestionable. He was put into possession, and holds the Zemindary under a judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction, made in a regular suit in which the Collector, as representing the Government, was a party, and such judgment is still in force, unimpeached and not the subject of the present appeal. Mad. Reg. VIII. of 1818, sec. 3, requires, that if the party is dissatisfied, an appeal should be interposed within six months, otherwise the decree stands. No appeal having been brought it is too late now to question the decree. The proceedings of the 13th of February, 1854, therefore, operate as an estoppel, and are a bar to the present suit. What was done under Mad. Reg. VII. of 1817, sec. 6, was merely an administrative act on the part of the Government as between itself and one of the Government Board of revenue. It does not in the slightest degree alter the rights of any of the parties in respect of this property. The Appellant's contention, that the Government were in possession by escheat, and that the possession decreed to the Respondent by the decree [519] of the Court was ultra vires, cannot prevail. For if the Government taking by escheat is the next heir, then from the acts of the Collector we must assume that we have had their full assent to the alienation by the widow.

Secondly. It is contended by the Appellant, that a childless widow is by the Hindoo law tenant for life only, and has no power of alienating immoveable estate. We submit, that such a proposition is untenable and cannot be maintained. The principle of the Hindoo Law is, that a childless widow has the whole inheritance of the estate vested in her. It is true that her rights over that inheritance are so far restricted and qualified that she cannot dispose of real estate without the consent not only of the lineal heirs of her deceased husband, but also of the collateral relations, or for a sufficient cause, such as necessary subsistence, or for purposes beneficial to her late husband, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 246, which operates as an alienation for the benefit of the next heir. Such alienation must, however, be with the consent of the members of the family, who are entitled to maintenance, but if there be no heirs, then the limitation, ex necessitate, ceases to exist. No doubt can be raised that in this case upon the death of the Zemindar last seized, the Zemindary devolved upon his widow. There is nothing known in Hindoo law analogous to the English law with respect to dower, or that by which a claimant would be simply tenant for life. The inheritance is in the widow as perfectly as what in England would be called the fee. The authorities fully support this. In the case of Cossinaut Bysack v. Hurroosondry Dossee (2 Morley's Dig. 215) Sir Edward Hyde East says, the [520] widow has "the entire right of property vested in her, both in the moveable and immoveable state; for there is no distinction between them taken in the Books in respect of the husband's estate devolving upon her as heir." So in the Dāya-Bhāga, ch. XI. sec. i. art. 43, it is laid down, that "on failure of heirs down to the son's grandson, the wife, being inferior in pretensions to sons and the rest, because she performs acts spiritually beneficial to her husband from the date of her widowhood (and not like them from the moment of their birth), succeeds to the estate on their default." This exposition of the widow's right of inheritance is recognized in the case of Pokhnarain v. Mussimaut Soosphool (3 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 114), Sihoo Singh v. Pirthee Singh (10 S. D. R. N. W. P. 415).

Thirdly, we insist that the estate in question was, at the death of the widow, Lutchemdavamah, charged with the debt due to the Respondent, being mortgaged to him to secure repayment thereof, and that the right or interest of the Respondent in the Zemindary did not escheat to Government on the widow's decease. The question of escheat involves two considerations:—first, that although we admit that the ruling power may generally take by escheat on failure of heirs, yet an exception exists in the case of a Brahmin, and that in this case, as the Zemindar last seized was a Brahmin, the Government could not take, as upon his death his real and personal property must be given to a Brahmin. That is the opinion of the Sudder Court, founded upon the great authority of Menu, and unless you repudiate that authority, the law as expounded by the Pundits and adopted by the Court must prevail. Menu, ch. IX. art. 189, says, "The property of a Brahmin shall never be taken as an escheat by the [521] King; this is fixed law: but the wealth of the other classes, on failure of all heirs, the King may take." And this doctrine is fully recognized in the Mitaschara, in ch. II. sec. vii., "on the succession of strangers upon failure of the kindred." In art. 3 it is laid down that a learned priest is heir; according to Gautama, 28, 29; and art. 4 of that section states, generally, any Brahmin, who has read the three Vedas, as Menu has declared; and so in art. 5, where it is unequivocally declared that "Never shall a King take the wealth of a priest; for the text of Menu forbids it: The property of a Brahmin shall never be taken by a King: this is fixed law. It is also declared by Nareda, If there be no heir to a Brahmin's wealth, on his demise, it must be given to a Brahmin, otherwise the King is tainted with sin;" and so it is laid down by Strange, "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 149. Secondly, if the Government took by escheat as the ultimus haeres, then the act of the Government officer is binding, as it shows the full consent of the Government to the alienation by the widow. Nothing is to be found in the pleadings to show that the Government impeached it on that ground, which they were bound to have done if they depend upon their right by escheat.

But, lastly, the Government in no circumstances can have a right to the estate sought to be recovered until the Respondent's claims have been discharged. It is a simple case of a mortgagee endeavouring to recover back money, which it is admitted he had advanced for the benefit of the Zemindary.

Judgment was reserved, and now delivered by

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (July 30, 1860).—Of the various questions that have arisen in this case, the only one which appears to have been argued [522] in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, and certainly the only one decided by that Court is, whether, on the death of a Brahmin without heirs, the Sovereign power in British India is entitled to take his estate by escheat. The decision of the Sudder Court upon this question strikes at the root of the Appellant's title; and its correctness is, therefore, the first thing to be now considered.

The learned Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut have treated the question as one to be determined merely by Hindoo law; and recognizing the general right of the Crown or other ruling power by escheat when there is a failure of heirs, have adopted and enforced an exception as to the property of Brahmins, which is supposed to result from certain texts in Menu and other ancient authorities. The arguments addressed to us have also assumed the applicability of the Hindoo law; and their Lordships, therefore, propose to deal primarily with the question, whether that law, as it now obtains in British India, has, if applicable to the case, been properly held to be fatal to the Appellant's title.

For the exposition of the Hindoo law on the point, it is unnecessary to go back further than the Mitaschara. That treatise, the highest authority on the law of inheritance in the part of India where the Zemindary, the subject of this suit, is situate, comprises, amongst other authorities, the passage of Menu which is principally relied upon. It is, however, from the consideration of the whole chapter of the work, and of the different authorities which are there collected, taken together, that we are most likely to arrive at a right conception of the law.

The important passages are in articles 3, 4, and 5, of chapter II., section vii.

[523] From these it would appear that the beneficial enjoyment of a Brahmin's property ought not on his death without heirs to pass to the King; that it ought, in some way or another, to pass to other Brahmins. But the texts also shew that it is not to pass to Brahmins generally, or even to any definite or well-ascertained class of them. The persons to take the beneficial interest are to be Brahmins having certain spiritual qualifications; they are to be pure in body and mind, and are to have read the three Vedas. If this be the law, it seems to imply a power of selection; and a right of possession, at least intermediate, of the property in somebody. It cannot be supposed that the first Brahmin who could lay hands upon the property of a member of his caste dying without heirs was to hold it, subject, perhaps, to the condition of showing that he possessed the personal qualifications which the law requires.

It appears to their Lordships, that the passage quoted by the Mitaschara from Nareda, in the very section which cites the prohibition of Menu, shows what the law in its utmost strictness was. That passage is—"If there be no heir of a Brahmana's wealth, on his demise it must be given to a Brahmana. Otherwise the King is tainted with sin." In other words, the King is to take the property, but to take it subject to the duty, which he cannot neglect without sin, of disposing of it at his discretion amongst Brahmins of the kind contemplated by the preceding texts.

If this be so, it appears to their Lordships that, according to Hindoo law, the title of the King by escheat to the property of a Brahmin dying without heirs ought, as in any other case, to prevail against [524] any claimant who cannot show a better title; and that the only question that arises upon the authorities is, whether Brahminical property so taken is, in the hands of the King, subject to a trust in favour of Brahmins. In this suit, where the issue is between the Government claiming the property (whether subject to a trust or not), by escheat, and a party claiming by an adverse title, it is unnecessary to decide whether the duty imposed upon the King is one of imperfect obligation, or a positive trust affecting the property in his hands, or whether, if a trust, it is or is not one incapable of enforcement by reason of the uncertainty of its objects. It is also unnecessary to decide on the arguments addressed to us concerning a distinction, or supposed distinction, between the Brahmins who have been called "Sacerdotal Brahmins" and the ordinary members of the caste. For, assuming that the Appellant's title is to be governed by Hindoo law, and assuming that there is no valid distinction in this matter between sacerdotal and other Brahmins, their Lordships, for the reasons above stated, would be unable to concur in the judgment under review.

Their Lordships, however, are not satisfied that the Sudder Court was not in error when it treated the Appellant's claim as wholly and merely determinable by Hindoo law. They conceive that the title which he sets up may rest on grounds of general or universal law.

The last owner of the property in question in this suit derived her title under an express grant from the Government to her husband, a Brahmin, whom she succeeded as heiress-at-law. If, upon her death, there had been any heirs of her husband, those heirs [525] must have been ascertained by the principles of the Hindoo law; but by reason of the prevalence of a state of law in the Mofussil which renders the ascertainment of the heirs to take on the death of an owner of property, a question substantially dependent on the status of that owner. Thus the property being originally, and remaining, alienable, might have passed by acts inter vivos in succession to British subject, to foreign European owner, to Armenian, to Jew, to Hindoo, to Mahometan, to Parsee, or to any other person, whatever his race, religion, or country. According to the law administered by the Provincial Courts of British India, on the death of any owner, being absolute owner, any question touching the inheritance from him of his property is determinable in a manner personal to the last owner. This system is made the rule for Hindoos and Mahomedans by positive regulation; in other cases it rests upon the course of judicial decisions. But when it is made out clearly that by the law applicable to the last owner, there is a total failure of heirs, then the claim to the land ceases (we apprehend) to be subject to any such personal law; and as all property not dedicated to certain religious trusts must have some legal owner, and there can be, legally speaking, no unowned property, the law of escheat intervenes and prevails, and is adopted generally in all the Courts of the country alike. Private ownership not existing, the State must be owner as ultimate Lord. Consequently, the claim of the Government, in the present instance, might have been considered with reference to this principle.

In the case of The East India Company v. The Mayor of Lyons (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 175), the [526] question arose whether an alien could hold lands in British India. Some of those lands were without the bounds of a Presidency town. It was decided, on appeal here, that that part of the law of England which disabled an alien from holding land against the claim of the Crown had not been introduced into India; but the reasons and principles of the decision do not appear to their Lordships to be inconsistent with the view that they take of the present controversy.

In the present case, if the Hindoo law had expressly provided that, upon the death of a Brahmin without heirs, ordinarily so-called, his property should pass to some definite person or class of persons; if, for instance, it admitted, in the case of a Brahminical succession, collaterals more remote than it would admit in the case of succession to a Soodra, there would be ground for excluding the title of the Crown, because there would, by Hindoo law, be some person in the nature of an heir capable of succeeding; but here the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut rests its decision on what it terms "the primary declaration of Menu that the property of a Brahmin shall never be taken by the King." That declaration is contained in an article (see Menu, ch. IX, art. 189) which, assuming a complete failure of heirs, negatives the King's right to Brahminical property, whilst it affirms his title to the wealth of all other classes in such circumstances. In so dealing with the question, the Sudder Court was, we think, applying the actual or supposed Hindoo law, in derogation of the general rights of the British Sovereignty.

Their Lordships' opinion is in favour of the general right of the Crown to take by escheat the land of a [527] Hindoo subject, though a Brahmin, dying without heirs; and they think that the claim of the Appellant to the Zemindary in question (subject, or not subject, to a trust) ought to prevail, unless it has been absolutely, or to the extent of a valid and subsisting charge, defeated by the acts of the widow, Lutchmedavamah, in her lifetime. In the latter case, the Government will, of course, be entitled to the property subject to the charge.

It follows that the decree of the Sudder Adawlut cannot stand. The manner in which it ought to be varied depends upon the decision of the questions which have been raised on this appeal touching the effect of the acts of Lutchmedavamah in her lifetime. On none of these has the Sudder Adawlut adjudicated. On some of them, as, for instance, the effect of the Collector's acts in 1841, it is particularly desirable to have the judgment of that Court. Again, it appears to their Lordships very doubtful whether the present record affords the materials requisite for the satisfactory decision of some of those questions. There is little, if any, legal evidence of the nature of the advances made to the widow, or of the necessity for them. It may be also material to know what was the nature and what the effect of the proceedings by which the execution of the Razeenamah was suspended. In these circumstances, their Lordships, though they would have been glad to determine, if they could, this long litigation by a final decree, do not feel that they can safely do more than remit the case to the Sudder Adawlut for further hearing, with a declaration that the general right of the Government by escheat (subject, or not subject, to a trust) has been established. It is right, however, to state further their [528] Lordships' opinion, that the proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, under the dates of the 27th of October, 1853, and the 21st of October, 1854, do not constitute any bar to the title of the Appellant in this suit; but that they do amount to an award of possession, with which, in the present state of the cause, and until its final adjudication, their Lordships will not interfere.

Their Lordships desire again to suggest, for the consideration of the parties, that some arrangement for the surrender of the Zemindary to Government, upon payment of what is due to the Respondent for the advances actually made, would probably meet the real justice of the case, and save both parties from protracted litigation.

There will be no costs of this appeal. The costs in India will be dealt with by the Court to whom the cause is remitted.

It is remitted with the declaration as to the right of the Crown to escheat, without touching the question of trust, or no trust (see the further report of this case, next page).

[529] THE COLLECTOR OF MASULIPATAM. Appellant: CAVALY VENCATA NARRAINAPAH. Respondent * [Nov. 29, 30, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Adawlut at Madras

By the Hindoo Law of inheritance, a childless widow takes as heir, but it is only a special and qualified estate.

If there be collateral heirs of the husband, the widow cannot alien the property except for special purposes, such as for religious or charitable objects, or those acts which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, in which circumstances she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the latter purpose, she must show actual necessity.

The restrictions imposed by the Hindoo Law on a widow's power of alienation of her husband's estate are inseparable from her estate, and do not depend on the existence of heirs capable of taking on her death.

When the Crown takes by escheat for want of heirs, it has the same right to impeach an unauthorized alienation by the widow, which the heirs of the husband (had there been any) would have had.

The acts of a Government Officer bind the Government only when he is acting in the discharge of a certain duty within the limits of his authority, or if he exceed that authority, when the Government in fact, or in law, directly, or by implication, ratifies the excess.

Circumstances in which it was held that, a Government Officer had no authority to waive the rights to which the Government might be entitled by escheat, and that a decree founded thereon by a Court in India did not operate as an estoppel against the Crown.

The rule laid down in the case of Myna Boyer v. Ootoram (ante, p. 400), that an opinion of the Pundits, apparently discordant from works of current and established authority upon Hindoo Law, given in the absence of authorities, or of local usage, is not to be received as conclusive upon the question at issue without further investigation, approved of.

In the first appeal in this case, the question then raised, the right of the Appellant to seize an estate [530] in his collectorate as an escheat to the Government for want of an heir to the person last possessed, their Lordships decided in favour of the general right of the Crown to take by escheat the estate in question, subject, or not subject, to a trust, and remitted the case to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for further hearing, with the expression of their opinion, that there was not sufficient evidence in the case to admit of a satisfactory decision on the subject of the trust and the claims under it.

The suit accordingly was again brought before the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut on the 20th of October, 1860, and, on the 22nd of the same month, that Court delivered judgment, whereby, after stating that the Court had ascertained from the parties that they were not in a position to come to an arrangement in accordance with their Lordships' suggestions, but wished the suit to proceed, and that the Court "had not found it necessary towards their pronouncing upon the merits of the suit to call for the additional evidence which their Lordships had indicated as apparently requisite," the judgment of the Court proceeded in these terms: "The arguments brought before the Court have led them to consider, primarily, what may be the rights of the Crown by the law of escheat, especially as connected with the powers of a female, under Hindoo law, to alienate property. In view of the circumstances under which the right of the Crown to an escheat, in reference to the particular estate in litigation, has been declared by their Lordships of the Privy Council, any clause of the Hindoo law, 'actual or supposed,' notwithstanding, the Court have felt it incumbent on them to judge of the law of escheat in the most general aspect: and, towards forming an [531] opinion on the subject, they have admitted the arguments of Counsel, based upon the bearings of the law as recognized in the Courts in England, besides taking into consideration the state of the law as existing in this part of India, which it is their more peculiar province to deal with. It has been pressed upon the Court, that by English law, title by escheat does not confer the powers belonging to title by heirship. The Lord paramount, it is declared, always takes to his own disadvantage, Burgess v. Wheate (1 Sir W. Black, 123). There a trustee held property, and those for whose benefit it had been intrusted to him had lapsed, the Crown was declared not entitled to deprive the trustee of the possession as having escheated to it, 2 Spence, 'Equi. Juris.' p. 266; Taylor v. Haygarth (14 Sim. 16-7). It has been also ruled, in the case of property held under mortgage, the heirs of the mortgagor being extinct, that the Crown cannot exercise the equity of redemption, Burgess v. Wheate; Jeremy, 'Equi. Juris.' p. 182; 2 Spence, 'Equi. Juris.' 237; Taylor v. Haygarth; Prescott v. Tyler (1 Jurist, 470). Also, that the Crown cannot enforce forfeiture upon breach of condition, Burgess v. Wheate. The Hindoo law is here analogous. Had the last undisputed owner of the Zemindary in issue been a male, without male progeny, he could have alienated the estate at any moment before his death, whether with or without consideration, and no collateral could have questioned the act. By consequence, the Crown could not do so. The last owner having been a female, the power to alienate in her was placed by the law under certain special restrictions—that is, though destitute of direct lineage, she could not alienate to the prejudice of her remotest heirs, [532] save under their consent, or under strict necessity. In the present suit, the Crown claim to possess the restrictive power belonging to an heir of the female, and have laid this suit to defeat her act. The Court have consulted their Pundits on the occasion, and their declaration is to the effect that the limitations under which a female is placed are exclusively for protection of the interests of her heirs—meaning thereby her kindred—or those of her husband; that failing all such heirs, the provision does not extend to the protection of the interests of the ruling power as coming in by escheat; and that in regard to the ruling power, the female is absolutely free, being at liberty to alienate without seeking its consent, and irrespective of its ulterior rights. Among the authorities quoted by the Pundits in support of their view of the law, they have referred to Mitaschara, ch. I., sec. i. art. 2, where the following definition appears:—‘The term heritage (Daya) signifies that wealth, which becomes the property of another, solely by reason of relation to the owner.’ This being the treatise under which rights in property are governed among Hindoos in this part of India, the dictum must be received as of high authority; and it obviously governs all those parts of the treatise which relate to the limitation under which females are placed in respect of those who are to take the ‘heritage’ after them—that is, ‘the heirs,’ or, as the original is, the ‘Dayadies.’ The limitations are thus for protection of those to whom the property is to come in right of kindred; and here the Crown, as the ultimate possible successor, is not in question. Accordingly, it is the consent of the ‘Dayadies’ that must be secured by the female before she can alienate, save under strict [533] necessity, and the consent of the Crown is unessential. Community of right in property among the Hindoos is ever dependent upon community in blood, and the possible ultimate appropriation by the Crown rests upon quite another basis. It is where there is no ‘heir’ only, that the Crown comes in, and obviously as universal landlord, where no individual rights exist, and for the avoidance of the disputations and disturbance which would arise were unclaimed property left, without provision of law, to be seized upon by the strongest or the most active. This the Court consider to be the principle of the law of escheat. Under it, the Crown could probably defeat the possession of any heirless property obtained by fraud upon the previous owner, and certainly any that had been secured by mere seizure without pretence of right; but where there is an assignment by the former owner, the Crown cannot take the place of an heir to challenge the power of the individual to effect the assignment, and undo the act. It is upon the presumption that the Crown has thus the power to challenge and defeat the act of the last incumbent that this suit has been brought, and on the ground that the Crown, by the law of escheat, has no such power, the suit should be dismissed. Another bar to the suit, it appears to the Court, is created by the Collector's act in 1841, to which their Lordships of the Privy Council advert. The Defendant was in process of putting in execution the decree held by him, and was about to have his claim satisfied by sale of the Zemindary, as provided for in the decree. The execution was intrusted by the Court to the Collector to enforce, when he gave that counsel to the debtor, Lutchmedavamah, which [534] led to the execution of the Razeenamah on which the Defendant founds his title. The terms of the Razeenamah were immediately communicated to the Collector, and the execution dropped. The Collector held office in more capacities than one. As respected the enforcement of the decree, he was acting as the Nazir, or executive officer, of the Court; otherwise, in his ordinary position, he was the agent or representative of the Government in his District. It appears clear to the Court that, in advising Lutchmedavamah to come to some terms settling upon any conditions with the creditor, so as to save the estate from sale, the Collector was dealing with the matter in a manner beyond the functions devolving on him as executive officer of the Court, and was acting in the capacity proper to him as agent of the Government. It is the policy of the Government to save from peremptory sale the possessions of landlords, and especially those important estates known as Zemindaries; and there can be little doubt that it was owing to the interest thus felt in Lutchmedavamah as a Zemindar that the advice in any way to save her property from being brought to auction was given, together with the respite necessary for the purpose. The terms into which Lutchmedavamah entered with her creditor, in pursuance of the above advice, were such as to allow of the estate eventually vesting in him. The Collector, after being made aware of these terms, offered no objection thereto. On the contrary, he gave effect to the arrangement, and so indorsed it, by dropping the execution. It would be altogether inadmissible that the Collector, individually, after the condition of lapse to the creditor had become effectual, should appear and protest against the arrangement, and seek to de [535] feat it on the plea that it was made without his consent and against his interests; and it is equally inadmissible that his principal, the Government, should do so. The Court are of opinion, therefore, that, supposing the consent of the ruling power to the alienation by Lutchmedavamah were necessary, the suit should be dismissed on the ground that such consent was in effect obtained. But even if it might be admitted that the Government could now challenge the alienation in question, it appears to the Court that the plaint takes up no ground on which the act can be called in question. The Defendant held a decree, in which it was found, upon evidence taken, that the debt was one actually incurred by Lutchmedavamah, and of a nature to be fairly and legally chargeable upon the estate. To defeat that decree the Plaintiff had to subvert the facts found, by showing that the judgment was one obtained fraudulently and collusively; that the debt was not a bona fide one, or that the obligation was of a character such as to render it not chargeable on the estate. In the plaint no such grounds are taken. The plaint, in fact, is founded upon a wrong view of the law, being to this purport:—‘Let the obligation be of what character it will, it is not chargeable upon the estate, as a female can, under no circumstances, alienate her property in which she holds but a life interest.’ Now, it is well known, and certainly not disputed at the hearing of this appeal, that a female may alienate her property absolutely, if for relief of necessities. There can be no more admissible necessity than the obligation to meet the Peishcush or Government demand, failing discharge of which the estate would be peremptorily sold, and lost both to the occupant and her heirs. [536] Advances for Peishcush are represented to have formed an essential part of the debt incurred by Lutchmedavamah. The fact was so found in the decree held by the Defendant, and the plaint discloses that the Plaintiff was aware, as in truth he was bound to be, that such was the alleged character of the debt. Yet there is no denial that the debt was thus incurred. On the contrary, the Civil Judge who had the conduct of the actual examination of the case, states, in his judgment, that ‘the justice or otherwise of the claim in original suit, No. 18 of 1838, is in no way called in question in the present case.’ True it is, the Civil Judge adds, that ‘the suit is alluded to as having been a collusive one,’ but where he has met with such collusion the Court fails to discover. The claim itself being taken as a just one, how the suit can have been a collusive one is not apparent. Possibly the fact of the suit having been undefended is all that is pointed to. From all these grounds, the Court come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has alleged nothing in consideration of which the assignment by Lutchmedavamah to the Defendant can be called in question. It has been maintained, on the part of the Plaintiff, at the hearing of this appeal, that the burden of sustaining the legality of the assignment rested upon the Defendant. The Court think otherwise. First, as before observed, he held a decree sustaining the basis of the assignment, and it was for the objector to show something by which that decree could be overthrown. Nothing of the sort having been shown, the Defendant may rest upon his decree. Secondly, even supposing there had been no decree, or that the decree obtained cannot be pleaded, the obligation in question was not incurred [537] with the Defendant, but with his father. It sprang from transactions originating, as the decree held by him shows, in 1813, and continued to 1838, and remaining unchallenged, so far as this Plaintiff is concerned, until the filing of this suit in 1855, even if this suit can be said to have called them in question. The father, in 1831, obtained assurance for the debt by the bond in favour of which the said decree was given, and the Defendant, in 1841, entered upon the fresh transaction, on the basis of the previous obligation, which it is the design of this suit to set aside. The Defendant would be placed at a great disadvantage, were the maintenance of his position to be dependent upon his producing antiquated testimony of transactions long ago concluded, and not personally so by himself—evidence which may by this time have been extinguished, or otherwise placed beyond his reach. The Court think, therefore, that where such a transaction as that now in question is challenged, the burden of showing causes against it rests with the challenger. In this opinion, the Court find themselves supported by a judgment of the Privy Council. In deciding upon a case, where the heir sought to free his estate of liability for a charge incurred by the previous incumbent as his guardian, their Lordships observed,—‘It is obvious, however, that it might be unreasonable to require such proof from one not an original party (i.e. the creditor) after a lapse of time, and enjoyment and apparent acquiescence; consequently, if, as is the case here as to part of the charge, it be created by substitution of a new security for an older one, where the consideration for the older one was an old precedent debt of an ancestor not previously ques-[358]-tioned, a presumption of the kind contended for by the Appellant (the creditor, namely, that the obligation formed a valid charge) would be reasonable.’ Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussumat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (6 Moore’s Ind. App. Cases, 420). The burden of proving, therefore, whatever might be necessary to free the estate in issue of its liability to the Defendant, has rested upon the plaintiff. It is apparent that no sort of proof of the nature in question has been adduced by him. He has contented himself with filing four exhibits, which are irrelevant to the transaction in issue, and produced no witnesses. The judgment of the Privy Council, above referred to, enables the Court to meet another plea that has been taken in behalf of the Plaintiff; namely, that admitting the obligation incurred by Lutchmedavamah to have been of a character whereby the estate could be charged, the resources of the estate were so ample that it could only have been by dissipating them that she could have fallen under any necessity to incur debt, and that, consequently, the estate cannot be charged with such debt. The Court have already observed that the liability for Peishush, to meet which the obligation in question was in part, and presumed in chief part, incurred, was one of a nature so urgent, that when it arose, had it not been met, the estate would have been sold and lost to all interested in it. To pronounce the estate when thus redeemed from risk not liable for the money advanced for its redemption would, under any circumstances, in the opinion of the Court, be unjust, and the prevalence of such a principle would, it may be remarked, jeopardize every estate incurring similar risk; but, in the judgment of the Privy Council adverted to, it is laid down that a [539] creditor is ordinarily not to be prejudiced by the previous waste, which may have led to the necessity which he relieves—‘Where,’ their Lordships observe, ‘the charge is one that a prudent owner would make, in order to benefit the estate, the bona fide lender is not affected by the precedent mismanagement of the estate. The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded.’ Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussumat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (6 Moore’s Ind. App. Cases, 423). Upon every ground above taken, the Court resolve, in reversal of the decree below, to dismiss the suit with costs:—first, because the law of escheat does not give the Plaintiff the power to question the assignment objected to; secondly, because the Plaintiff acquiesced in this assignment when made; thirdly, because the burden of showing cause against the assignment rested upon the Plaintiff, had he been in a position to challenge the same, and no such cause has been shown by him, or even alleged.

From this judgment the Collector of Masulipatam again appealed.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill for the Appellant.—By the former judgment of this Tribunal the right of the Government to the Zemindary in question to take by escheat was established, unless it had been absolutely, or to the extent of a valid and subsisting charge, been defeated by the acts of the widow, Lutchemdavamah, in her lifetime. No such valid acts have been established in evidence. The case must be considered under two heads. First, the power of the [540] widow by the Hindoo law, to alienate as she has done, and, secondly, whether the acts of the Collector affect the rights of the Government.

Upon the first point we insist, that she had no power to dispose of or mortgage the Zemindary, or do any act charging the Zemindary, except to raise money for certain necessary purposes as defined by the Hindoo law. A widow has not an absolute proprietary right in her husband's property, nor can she in strictness even be called tenant for life. W. H. Macnaghten, "Hindu Law," Vol. I. pp. 19, 20. No such purposes as allow her to charge the Zemindary were proved to exist in the present case. It has not been established that the advances were to pay the husband's debts or the Government revenue. The Respondent has been challenged to sustain such a case, but he failed to do so. The restrictions upon her alienation are defined in the Mitashara, ch. i. sec. i. art. 20. Colebrooke's Dig., Vol. III. pp. 457-8, 467. [Sir Lawrence Peel referred to the case of Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussamat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 393).] That was the case of a manager acting for an infant heir. The authorities are collected in Morley's Dig. Vol. I. tit. "Inheritance," p. 311; ib. Vol. II. pp. 110, 111, 131. Steele's "Law and Custom of Hindoo Castes," pp. 42, 69. Strange's "Manual of Hindu Law," pp. 29, 30 [edit. 1856]. Madras Appeal Suits, p. 453. Bengal Decisions of 1859, p. 567, Keerut Sing v. Koolahul Sing (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 334).

Secondly. It was established that the Government, through the then Collector, and through the Board of Revenue, expressly refused to allow Lutchemdavamah to dispose of the Zemindary, and such refusal [541] was never actually or constructively withdrawn. Even admitting that there was a valid charge on the estate, as the Government never consented to the creation of the charge, they are not bound by the act of the Collector. His advice to her related to her life interest. How can the Respondent's interest be damaged, as her life interest only could have been sold under the decree? But as the Government were not parties to the suit in 1838, the acts of the then Collector, in 1841, as respects the enforcement of the decree made in such suit, were not such as to affect or waive the rights of the Government. [Sir Lawrence Peel: It does not appear that the Collector knew that there was a failure of heirs.] There has been a miscarriage. The Sudder Court ought, in conformity with the direction of this Court when the first appeal was before them, to have called for evidence to show the nature of the advances alleged to have been made to the widow, and the necessity for the same.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Mr. Ayrton, and Mr. Norton for the Respondent.—It must be taken as a fact that in the years 1830 and 1831 the Government were aware of their rights as escheators, and the Government should then have repudiated the proposed compromise by the widow and her creditor; but, on the contrary, Government by the Collector proposed and acquiesced in the Razeenamah, and they are, therefore, bound by his acts, Sumbhoolall Girdhurlall v. The Collector of Surat (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 1). In such circumstances the rights of the Respondent, under the decree of 1838, and the sub-[542]-sequent Razeenamah and Order made in that suit, could not be questioned by the Government claiming title by escheat. Again, the suit now under appeal was not instituted, nor was any evidence adduced by the Appellant, to impeach the bona fides of the decree of 1838, and the Razeenamah. Assuming, therefore, that the consent of Government to the alienation by the widow, in the absence of heir, was necessary, that consent has in point of fact been given in a form which cannot afterwards be retracted, and that is one of the grounds which the Court has decided in the Respondent's favour.

The question whether the widow could by her own absolute authority alienate without the consent of the Crown, taking by escheat, was left open by the judgment of your Lordships. Now, the first principle of Hindoo law is, that the property is supposed to belong to the family and held by one of the family for the benefit of the other members of that family, and that law, as to descent of immoveable property, is, that it descends from father to son. The widow takes no estate if there is a son. There is nothing like a life estate known by that law, and, therefore, it is reasoning by false analogy to compare an estate for life by the English law with a Hindoo widow's rights, which error arose from the earlier English Judges using that phrase with respect to the widow's estate. The system of restriction of alienation does not apply to widows only, it applies to all holders of property. If a father has no son, he can alienate by deed; but if he has male heirs, he cannot without their consent. Neither can he, if he has daughters, deprive them of their right to maintenance, which, like the widow, is chargeable [543] on the property. By the Hindoo law the whole estate descends upon the widow as heir, in the absence of sons, although her power of alienation is restricted where there are heirs. If there are no heirs she can absolutely dispose of the estate. The Mitaschara, ch. ii. sec. i. art. 39. In Sibhoo Singh v. Pirthee Singh (10 S.D.R., N.W.P. 420), the validity of such an alienation was upheld. All that the authorities cited by the Appellant, upon this branch of the case, affirm, is this, that where there are heirs, alienation by the widow cannot be made without their consent. In the present case there are no heirs, and she has, therefore, an absolute power of alienation.

Lastly, we insist that there is sufficient proof of the advances made to the widow mentioned in the Razeenamah, and it would operate inequitably if the Respondent is after this distance of time to prove the advances made for the purposes of the Zemindary. It cannot be questioned after the decision of this Tribunal that a manager has power to charge this Zemindary, to preserve the estate, Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussumate Bahooee Munraj Koonweree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 293), and so by a widow, Chetty Culum Comara Vencatachella Reddyer v. Rajah Rungasawmy Jyengar Bahadoor (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 319). If the Crown is heir, it could not be as a member of the family; and the title accrued when the husband died, not the widow; and, as the Collector advised the widow to execute the Razeenamah, it cannot now avoid the transaction. In Burgess v. Wheale (1 Sir W. Black. 123), it was held that the Crown coming in by escheat cannot avoid a transaction which the heir claiming by right of inheritance has done.

[544] Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., replied.

Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Lord Justice Turner (Dec. 21, 1861).—This cause has come before their Lordships on appeal for the second time. They regret to find that they are still without the means of satisfactorily determining the long litigation between the parties.

The Zemindary which is the subject of the suit was claimed by the Appellant on behalf of the Government of Madras, as an escheat to which the Crown became entitled on the death of the widow of the last male Zemindar, of whom there were no heirs in remainder to the widow; and he claimed to have it free and discharged from all incumbrances with which it had been charged by the widow during her enjoyment of it.

The Respondent disputed the right of the Crown to take the particular property by escheat in any circumstances; and insisted that, even if that right existed, he had a title to the Zemindary, paramount to that of the Crown by virtue of a Razeenamah executed in his favour by the widow in her lifetime. His case as to this was, that his father had made advances to the widow for some of the purposes which, under the Hindoo law, justify the alienation by a widow of immoveable property inherited from her husband, and had obtained a decree for the amount of the debt; that after his father's death he had taken out execution on that decree, and that to stay his execution the Razeenamah had been executed. He further contended that this had been done with the sanction and under the advice of the then Collector of the District, and that the Government was [545] estopped from disputing the transaction, if it could otherwise have done so, by the conduct of its officer.

The Razeenamah was in the nature of an agreement for the payment of the judgment debt by instalments, with stipulations that if default were made in the payment of any instalment, the whole sum should become due, and that the judgment creditor should be put into possession of twelve out of the fourteen villages comprising the Zemindary (which were to be implegged to him), and should, on her death, take possession of the two other villages, and hold the whole Zemindary as his absolute estate. No instalment was paid by the widow, nor yet was possession taken under the Razeenamah in her lifetime. The Respondent, however, alleged that it was by reason of an order of the Sudder Court, suspending the execution of the Razeenamah, in consequence of proceedings in another suit, that he failed to get possession.

It follows from this statement that the questions to be determined in the cause were, whether the Crown had any title by escheat to the lands; and if so, whether that title had been defeated, either absolutely or to the extent of any subsisting charge, by the acts of the widow in her lifetime. The latter question involved the consideration of the powers of a Hindoo female taking her husband's estate by inheritance, and whether the transaction relied upon by the Respondent was an act done bona fide in the exercise of her powers, or a mere colourable contrivance for transferring the property to the Respondent in spite of her disabilities.

In the judgment of the Sudder Adawlut, which was the subject of the first appeal, the Court had [546] dealt with the first of these questions only. It held that the property having belonged to a Brahminical family the Crown had no right to take it by escheat, though on the clearest failure of heirs; and therefore dismissed the suit on that ground, without adjudicating upon the other questions raised in it.

Upon the appeal, however, the whole case was more or less fully argued. Their Lordships came to the conclusion that the judgment of the Sudder Adawlut, was erroneous; that the Crown was entitled to take the property of a Brahmin, as of any other Hindoo subject dying without heirs; and that the question whether such property would be subject, in the hands of the Crown, to any trust in favour of Brahmins, that would be capable of enforcement, was one which could not be determined in that suit. After stating their reasons for this conclusion, their Lordships' judgment proceeded thus:—"Their Lordships' opinion is in favour of the general right of the Crown to take by escheat the land of a Hindoo subject, though a Brahmin, dying without heirs; and they think that the claim of the Appellant to the Zemindary in question (subject or not subject to a trust) ought to prevail, unless it has been absolutely, or to the extent of a valid and subsisting charge, defeated by the acts of the widow in her lifetime. In the latter case the Government will, of course, be entitled to the property subject to the charge. It follows that the decree of the Sudder Adawlut cannot stand. The manner in which it ought to be varied depends upon the decision of the questions which have been raised touching the acts of Lutchmedavamah in her lifetime. On none of these has the Sudder Adawlut adjudicated. On some of them, as, for instance, the [547] effect of the Collector's act in 1841, it is peculiarly desirable to have the judgment of that Court. Again, it appears to their Lordships very doubtful whether the present record affords the materials requisite for the satisfactory decision of some of those questions. There is little if any, legal evidence of the nature of the advances made to the widow, or of the necessity for them. It may also be material to know what was the nature, and what the effect of the proceedings by which the execution of the Razeenamah was suspended. In these circumstances, their Lordships do not feel that they can safely do more than remit the appeal to the Sudder Adawlut for further hearing, with a declaration that the general right of the Government by escheat (subject or not subject to a trust) has been established."

Their Lordships also suggested to the parties the expediency of compromising the suit upon some such terms as the surrender of the Zemindary to Government upon payment of what might be due to the Respondent for the advances really made.

Upon the recommendation of their Lordships an Order was made by Her Majesty in Council, in July, 1860, pursuant to their judgment, and remitting the cause to the Sudder Adawlut.

The case went back to Madras, and was re-heard by the Sudder Adawlut there. In the judgment pronounced on the 22nd of October, 1860, the Judges stated that they had ascertained that both parties having failed to come to an agreement, wished the suit to proceed. They further stated that they had not found it necessary towards their pronouncing upon the merits of the suit, to call for the additional evidence which their Lordships had indicated as appa-[548]-rently requisite. They accordingly proceeded to deal with the merits of the suit in the following way:—Admitting the right of the Crown to take by escheat property of which the last owner died without heirs, they held that where there had been an assignment by that owner, though a female, the Crown could not take the place of an heir to challenge her power to make that assignment. They, therefore, decided that the suit, having been brought upon the erroneous assumption that the Crown had the power to challenge and defeat the act of the last incumbent, should be dismissed.

They next decided that, even if the Crown had the right contended for, it was estopped from asserting it by the acts of the Collector, and the sanction given by him to the Razeenamah of 1841.

They, lastly, decided that, even if the Crown could not challenge the alienation in question, the plaint had not been properly framed for that purpose.

It is with the appeal against this judgment that their Lordships have now to deal.

It has been argued for the Appellant that in ruling the first and third of the points the Court below has exceeded its powers, inasmuch as it has come to conclusions inconsistent with those expressed in or implied by Her Majesty's Order of July, 1860. In their Lordships' opinion, this objection is well founded. The Order of 1860, which, after argument here, recommended, if it did not enjoin, the Court below to take additional evidence on the question whether the acts of the widow in her lifetime were valid against the Crown, must be taken to assume that the question was one fairly open to the parties upon the pleadings.

[549] Again, the declaration that the general right of the Crown to take the property by escheat ought to prevail, unless it had been defeated by the acts of the widow in her lifetime, when followed by the direction to adjudicate upon those acts, seems to imply a decision that the Crown had established its right to maintain a suit of this nature.

The first conclusion of the Sudder Adawlut, however, involves a question of substance—an important question of law; and if their Lordships were satisfied that it was well founded, they would be disposed to prevent its being met by the objection, in some degree formal, of its inconsistency with the Order of Her Majesty, by taking measures to procure the variation of that Order. They, therefore, proceed to consider first whether the conclusion is, in fact, correct.

The principal argument in support of it, which has been very ably put by the learned Counsel for the Respondent, is that on the death of a Hindoo owner of an undivided estate without preferable heirs, the whole inheritance descends to and vests in his widow; and that, although it be true that her power of disposition over it is qualified, and only valid against the heirs next in succession when exercised for certain purposes, or with their consent, yet if there be no such heirs it becomes absolute; or, at all events, its exercise at her free will can be questioned by nobody. Her power of disposition was likened to that of the male owner of an undivided estate in that part of India in which the general Hindoo law obtains without qualification: he can dispose of that as he will if he has no adult sons, but if there be such sons their consent is necessary to render his disposition valid. The only difference between the two [550] cases was said to be that in the one the right of objection was confined to sons or other direct descendants; in the other it was possessed by all collaterals capable of inheriting to the deceased husband of the widow.

It was justly observed in the course of the argument, with reference to those authorities which speak of the widow's interest as a life estate, that great confusion arises from applying analogies derived from the English law of real property to the Hindoo law of inheritance; and that when so applied the terms by which we describe estates in land under the English law are more likely to mislead than to direct the judgment aright. It may, however, be doubted whether the argument on behalf of the Respondent does not really require some such process of reasoning to support it. The Hindoo widow, it was urged has an estate of inheritance, not a life estate; the original estate it is said, devolves on her in a course of succession derived from the husband, who had in him an estate of inheritance which she takes as heir. Yet what is this, in effect, but to apply the English law regulating the descent of lands in fee simple from ancestor to heir?

It is clear that under the Hindoo law the widow, though she takes as heir, takes a special and qualified estate. Compared with any estate that passes under the English law by inheritance, it is an anomalous estate. It is a qualified proprietorship, and it is only by the principles of the Hindoo law that the extent and nature of the qualification can be determined.

It is admitted, on all hands, that if there be collateral heirs of the husband, the widow cannot by her [551] own will alien the property except for special purposes. For religious or charitable purposes, or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last she must show necessity. On the other hand, it may be taken as established that an alienation by her which would not otherwise be legitimate, may become so if made with the consent of her husband's kindred. But it surely is not the necessary or logical consequence of this latter proposition that in the absence of collateral heirs to the husband, or on their failure, the fetter on the widow's power of alienation altogether drops. The exception in favour of alienation with consent may be due to a presumption of law that where that consent is given the purpose for which the alienation is made must be proper.

Nor does it appear to their Lordships that the construction of Hindoo law which is now contended for, can be put upon the principle of "cessante ratione cessat et ipsa lex." It is not merely for the protection of the material interests of her husband's relations that the fetter on the widow's power is imposed. Numberless authorities, from Menu downwards, may be cited to show that, according to the principles of Hindoo law, the proper state of every woman is one of tutelage; that they always require protection and are never fit for independence. Sir Thomas Strange (See Strange on "Hindoo Law," Vol. I. p. 242) cites the authority of Menu for the proposition that, if a woman have no other controller or protector, the King should control or protect her. Again, all the authorities concur in showing that, according to the [552] principles of Hindoo law, the life of a widow is to be one of ascetic privation (2 Colebrooke's Dig., 459). Hence, probably, it gave her a power of disposition for religious, which it denied to her for other, purposes. These principles do not seem to be consistent with the doctrine that, on the failure of heirs, a widow becomes completely emancipated; perfectly uncontrolled in the disposal of her property; and free to squander her inherited wealth for the purposes of selfish enjoyment.

Their Lordships cannot but think that, if the consequences of the failure of heirs of the husband were such as they are now argued to be, there would be some decisions on a case so likely to have happened before; or, at all events, that there would be some trace of so startling an exception to the general rule of Hindoo Law touching females, taking by succession the property of males, in the ancient text-writers and commentators. The proposition, however, rests upon the argument founded on the nature of the Hindoo female's estate, as an estate of inheritance; upon a passage from a modern treatise by Strange, for which no authority is cited; and upon the opinion of the Pundits. The first, for the reasons already given, their Lordships consider unsatisfactory. The second cannot be treated as more than an opinion, though an opinion deserving of respect and attention. Upon the last, their Lordships can but repeat an observation made by them in the late case, Myna Boyce v. Oottaram, ante, p. 422, to the following effect:—Where an opinion apparently discordant from works of current and established authority is delivered by Pundits, it must not be taken on their authority to be a correct exposition of law. They should be questioned further [553] as to authorities, usage, and generally-received opinions. Such an inquiry might produce a conviction that the Pundits on a new case delivered rather their own notions of expedient law, as law, than delivered it on the force of the opinions of any writers or authoritative expounders of the Hindoo Law.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the restrictions on a Hindoo Widow's power of alienation are inseparable from her estate, and that their existence does not depend on that of heirs capable of taking on her death. It follows that if, for want of heirs, the right to the property, so far as it has not been lawfully disposed of by her, passes to the Crown, the Crown must have the same power which an heir would have of protecting its interests by impeaching any unauthorized alienation by the widow.

Their Lordships, therefore, dissent from the first ground on which, by the judgment under appeal, the Sudder Adawlut has dismissed the Appellant's suit.

The next consideration is, whether the Sudder Adawlut was right in holding that the Crown is estopped by the act of the former Collector, Mr. Grant, from disputing the title asserted by the Respondent under the Razeenamah. In their Lordships' opinion the principles of estoppel do not support this contention. On every reasonable presumption the facts relating to the creation of the original debt were known to the Respondent, or to the original Plaintiff in the suit whose judgment he was enforcing. The Collector would have no necessary knowledge on the subject; nor is he proved to have had actual knowledge. His advice to the widow, to the effect that unless she made an arrangement with the creditor, [554] the estate (which, the sale being an execution sale, must be taken to mean her right, title, and interest in the estate) would be sold, is not a statement at variance with the true state of things. The Razeenamah into which she entered, might, for aught that appeared, be satisfied by payment of the instalments in her lifetime. Again, the acts of a Government officer bind the Government only when he is acting in the discharge of a certain duty within the limits of his authority, or, if he exceed that authority, when the Government in fact, or in law, directly, or by implication, ratified the excess. The Collector in this case had certainly no authority to waive the rights to which Government might become entitled by the escheat; nor were his acts, when fairly viewed, calculated to give rise to the supposition that he had such an authority.

Their Lordships have already indicated their opinion that it is too late to assert, if it could ever have been successfully asserted, that it is not open to the Appellant on these pleadings to question the validity of the widow's alienation against the Crown. The reasoning of the Sudder Adawlut on this point seems to their Lordships to involve some misconception of the effect of the decree under which the Respondent claims. As regards the Appellant that decree is res inter alios acta. He is, therefore, in a very different position from one who, coming into Court to get rid of a decree binding upon him, has to allege and prove that it was fraudulently or collusively obtained, or is open to some other definite objection.

Again, though particular circumstances may shift the burthen of proof, the general rule certainly is, that it lies upon those who claim under an alienation [555] from a Hindoo female to show that the transaction was within her limited powers.

Their Lordships continue to think, that the evidence before them is not such as to admit of a satisfactory decision of the question whether the Razeenamah does to any and what extent constitute a charge on the Zemindary as against the Crown, and that there ought to be a further trial of that issue. Under the former Order of Her Majesty, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut should have given to each party, if so disposed, an opportunity of adducing further evidence. It does not appear to have done this, but to have acted on its own impression that no further evidence was necessary. Such at least is their Lordships' understanding of the preliminary statements in the judgment under appeal.

In these circumstances their Lordships propose humbly to recommend to Her Majesty that the present appeal be allowed; that it be declared that the Crown, taking by escheat, has the same right to impeach the alienation by the widow which the next heirs of the husband (if such there had been) would have had, and is not estopped from asserting that right by the acts of the Collector in 1841; that the Crown is not bound by the decree; and that the widow was not entitled to alienate without the consent of the Crown, except in so far as she could have alienated without the consent of the next heirs of the husband, if such there had been, but that the Respondent is, at all events, entitled to a charge upon the estate, and to be paid and satisfied thereout, the full amount of all such of the advances, if any, made by the Respondent's father to the widow as were made for purposes for which, according to the Hindoo [556] law, she would have been entitled to alienate the estate, as against the next heirs of her husband, if such there had been, in so far as she had not other estate of her husband to answer such purposes, and that the cause be remitted to the Sudder Adawlut to inquire whether, having regard to the declarations aforesaid, the right of the Crown was absolutely defeated by the Razeeannah, and if not to inquire what advances, if any, were made by the Respondent's father to the widow, and whether all or any, and which, of such advances, and to what amount, were made for purposes for which, according to the Hindoo law, the widow would have been entitled to alienate the estate as against the next heirs of her husband, if such there had been, and whether the widow had, when such advances were respectively made, other estates of her husband sufficient to answer such purposes; and the parties respectively are to be at liberty to adduce further evidence touching the matters aforesaid, or any of them, as they may be advised, and the Sudder Court is to proceed in the cause according to the result of the said inquiries.

REPORTS OF CASES heard and determined by the Judicial Committee and the Lords of the Privy Council, on Appeal from the Supreme and Sudder Dewanny Courts in the East Indies, 1861-64. By EDMUND F.
MOORE, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. IX.

MUSSAMUT KHOOB CONWUR, guardian of BABOO BIJNATH PERSAUD, the minor son of Baboo Deanut Roy, deceased, BABOO JOYKURRAN LAUL, MUSSAMUT CHEYT CONWUR, and TEK CONWUR,—Appellants; BABOO MOODNARAIN SINGH, and, after his death, MUSSUMAT ISMEDIA CONWUR and SUNDEEP CONWUR, the widows of Baboo Moodnarain Singh,—Respondents * [Nov. 27 and 28, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Suit in the nature of ejectment to recover possession of certain mouzahs and to set aside a sunnud, or deed, under which they were held, on the allegation that the deed, had been altered after execution, and its purport entirely changed by the insertion of words of limitation, creating hereditary rights. The decrees of the Courts in India respecting the alleged alterations being conflicting the Judicial Committee, upon motion to that effect, ordered the original deed to be transmitted for inspection at the hearing of the appeal [9 Moo. Ind. App. 17, 18].

Though the onus of proof of the genuineness of an instrument in its altered state lies upon the party producing and claiming under it, yet the altered and suspicious appearance of the instrument may be explained by proof of its original state when executed, and its existing state sufficiently accounted for, to rebut the presumption of the deed having been falsified and tampered with after execution by the party claiming under it.

The Judicial Committee upon appeal reversed the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and upheld the deed, as originally containing the words of limitation, being satisfied that the deed had been tampered with while in the custody of the Record-keeper of the Sudder Ameen's Court.

This suit, brought by Baboo Moodnarain Singh against Mussamut Man Conwur and others, as of the nature of an action of ejectment to obtain [2] possession of certain mouzahs, or villages; and also to set aside and cancel so much of a sunnud, or deed, in the Persian language, as purported to be a grant and conveyance of the villages in question, which was alleged by the Plaintiff to be a forged and fabricated document, so far as regarded certain defacements that appeared on the face of the deed. The fact of the execution of the original document by the late Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh, the father of the Plaintiff, was admitted in the suit.

The principal question raised in the Court below and upon appeal had reference to the impeachment by the Plaintiff of this instrument. The contention of the Plaintiff was, that the original deed was a lease only for the life of the grantee, and had been fraudulently altered by the Defendants, or those under whom they claimed, by inserting words of limitation giving hereditary rights. The Defendants' case was, that the deed had been defaced by, or through the means of the Plaintiff while in the custody of the Record keeper of the Sudder Ameen Court, pending a suit there in the year 1812, and that it was originally a grant in fee.

The material evidence and the facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of their Lordships.

[3] The deed in question was under the seal of the late Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh in favour of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, one of the sons of Roy Prithce Singh, the Dewan of the Maharajah, and since deceased, reserving a rent of S. Rs. 1880, payable yearly into the Treasury of the Maharajah.

This instrument, translated, as it appeared when filed in this suit, was as follows:—"Mocurrery sunnud, dated 8th Shaban, 1209 (1st of March, 1795) Hijree. Pootah Koul Kurar (by way of agreement)." "This Mocurrery Istemrari, in the name of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, 'O mai broderan Hukekee, nuslun bad nuslun O butnun bad butnun' (and together with uterine brothers from generation to generation), of mouzahs, Irkee, with the chunks appertaining thereto, and Chelowree, in Purgunnah, Sunwot; and Junooawan, appertaining to Purgunnah, Bhilawur; and Muniaraburdhia, Sukhea, and Sarsara, appertaining to Purgunnah, Nurhut, Puttie (division) Katowa, as per the following schedule, is, without objection, given at an absolute and fixed jumma of Rs. 1880 (a moiety of which is S. Rs. 940), of the current coin, and of the full weight and value, from the Fuslee year 1202, with the exception of one thousand two hundred beegahs of land for Khyrat, Bishenpret, Sayer Rahdaree, Chaharuntar, and embankments. The persons alluded to should confidently believe themselves to be the actual Mocurreyders of the aforesaid mouzahs, keep in good faith the tenants satisfied and pleased, till and cultivate the mouzahs with care and attention, and pay the rent thereof, according to the Kaul Kurar (terms) of the Pootah Mocurrerys Istemrari, Lal ba Lal (year by year) into my treasury, without any objection on the [4] score of drought and inundation, which they must consider as appertaining to their Mocurrery tenure. Whatever profits they may derive from the attention and care to be bestowed by them on the mouzahs in question, will, of right, belong to the Mocurreyders. The tenants and cultivators of these mouzahs will consider the person alluded to as 'Mocurreydar nuslun bad nuslun,' and exert themselves to their full in cultivating the lands. They should consider all praises and defamation of the Mocurreydar as affecting themselves. Save and except the fixed rent, not a single pice will be demanded from the aforesaid Mocurreydar. Consequently, these few words are written as a Mocurrery and Istemrari sunnud, that it may be a document hereafter." The deed was registered.

This deed, when produced at the hearing, bore marks of erasures, alterations and defacements, particularly in the expressions which created the limitation of hereditary rights.

On the 2nd of June, 1851, the suit out of which the present appeal arose was commenced, after a possession of fifty-six years from the date of the execution of the deed, and after a possession of thirty-two years by the successive heirs, who inherited the mouzahs since the death of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, the original grantee, and more than twelve years after the title of Moodnarain Singh accrued. The plaint was filed by Moodnarain Singh against Mussamut Man Conwur, since deceased, Mussamut Tek Conwur, Mussamut Neem Conwur, since deceased, Lalla Deenan Roy, Joykurran Lul, Inderjeet Singh, Totnam Sheo Suhac Singh, and Mullick Dawar Hossein, and sought to recover the possession of the mouzahs, by cancella-[5]-tion of the deed, which was charged by the plaint to be a spurious Mocurrery Pottah, and for the recovery of Rs. 46,800, on account of mesne profits, appropriated from 1249 to 1257 Fuslee era, corresponding with 1841-2, and 1849-50 A.D. The plaint alleged, that the Mocurrery sunnud, admitted to have been executed by Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh, was only an Istamrarry Pottah, and contained originally a grant of the mouzahs for the term of the life only of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, the grantee; and that from Roy Prithree Singh his father having been then, and his grandson, Lalla Nujee Laul, having been afterwards, Dewan to the Maharajah, everything was in their management, and that he, the Plaintiff, was kept in ignorance of the true nature and condition of the Mocurrery sunnud; and the plaint charged that the sunnud was forged; that the Defendants having erased therefrom the word "Istemrar," and substituted the words, "Mai broderan Huckeekee, O nusun bad nusun O butnun bad butnun," ("with brothers uterine, and seed after seed, and womb after womb"), it ought to be cancelled; and that, according to the Hindoo law, and also according to the Regulations of Government, Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh had no power to make such a Mocurrery Istamrarry settlement of any of the villages in his ancestral Zemindary, as the Defendants relied upon.

The answer of the Defendants alleged, that the sunnud was tampered with and defaced while deposited in Court, pending another suit, by the Plaintiff and his servants, in collusion with the Record-keeper. The answer also stated, that when Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, the grantee, died in the year 1818-19, his heirs and those of his brothers remained in possession of the land [6] for a longer period than twelve years previous to the bringing of the present suit, and relied on the provisions of the Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14, as a bar to the suit.

The hearing of the suit took place on the 5th of August, 1854, when the Principal Sudder Ameen (Syed Mahomed Rafiq Khan Bahadoor) of the Civil Court of Behar made a decree, supporting the deed, on the ground that the Court did not find that the deed had been tampered with or erased by the Defendants. The Sudder Ameen in his judgment expressed his opinion that, "On inspection of the Mocurrery document, it appeared clear that the words, 'mai brotheran, Huckeekee, nusun bad nusun,' in the first line, and 'butnun bad butnun,' in the second line, and again, 'nusun bad nusun,' in the twelfth line, which have been tampered with and defaced with a pen, originally existed in the deed, but had, while in the office of the Sudder Ameen, been so tampered with and defaced by corrupt and unprincipled men. Besides, it appeared from copy of the same document, given under the seal of the Cazi, and filed by the Defendants, that it was not written solely in the name of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, as the Plaintiff contended it was, but was written exactly as the Defendants stated it was; because it abounds with plural terms, such as, 'persons alluded to,' 'Khorda' (themselves), 'Kunnud' (ditto), 'Ahenasund' (recognized), which stand in their original features, and have not been at all tampered with or defaced. Had the document been originally written in the name of one individual, what was the reason of using the above plural terms?"

The Plaintiff appealed from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, and on the [7] 31st of December, 1856, that Court, consisting of Messrs. Colvin, Sconce, and Torrens, pronounced a decree reversing the decree of the Civil Court, and adjudging possession to the Plaintiff. The judgment was as follows:— "As both parties admit that an effacement of the document has occurred, we have no inquiry to make on the bare fact. It is shown to have remained in the custody of the Respondents up to the date of its delivery to the Sudder Ameen's Court on the 9th of February, 1842; and if alteration, not mere effacement, as pleaded by Respondents, has taken place, it is clearly, as argued by Mr. Allan on the part of Appellant, for Respondents to show that such alteration was not effected at their instance. Having very fully considered the proceedings held by the Sudder Ameen in 1842, we find nothing therein whatever to show or lead even to the remotest conclusion either that the tampering extended merely to an effacement, so as to be consistent with the allegations against Appellants on this point, or that there was anything but a downright and positive alteration of the terms of the document, extending to a change of the title in the tenure, so as to render it beneficial to the claim of the Respondents. It is to be recollected that Respondents impute to Appellant only that the true and existing Persian characters in the document, where it refers to hereditary rights, had been blemished at the instance of the Appellant or the officers, by collusion with the Sudder Ameen's Amlah, so as to make it appear that the words and characters had been altered, when, in fact, they stood as originally inserted. Now, we have intrinsic evidence, in the words and context of the documents, that this representation of the Respondents cannot be correct. [8] In the first place, we observe at the commencement of the Pottah, where it is usual to specify the name, residence, and birth of the recipients of a tenure of the kind, that, after the name 'Hoonooman Dutt,' there occurs a very palpable erasure and interpolation, not a mere defacement of characters before existing; and the Pottah is made to run that it was given to the above, and, according to the words occurring after his name, to his brothers and heirs. 'O mai broderan Huckeekee, nuslun bad nuslun, O butnun bad butnun.' The copulative conjunction here used would, to make the passage at all idiomatic, have been altogether unnecessary, except that the difficult and somewhat ingenuous erasures and interpolations made required its introduction; and the insertion of the condition of the tenure in this part of the Pottah is as altogether singular as the omission of the residence of the Mocurreydar. The insertions of the recipient's own brothers in general is, likewise, quite unusual; and the words used, as well as the evident erasure of the Persian characters, most fully denote a positive alteration. Next, it is to be observed that Respondents do not contend that any defacing took place except at this part of the document and lower down, where the words 'nuslun bad nuslun' afterwards occur; but, looking very carefully over the document opposed to the view of the Principal Sudder Ameen, we find that the verbs and pronouns have been most palpably altered from the singular to the plural, so as to make the sequel of the deed correspond with the insertion of the words 'mai broderan Huckeekee'—that is, it was granted in favour of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, along with his own brothers, instead of, as the Appellant contends, to Lalla [9] Hoonooman Dutt only for life. Thus, where the pronoun 'khoodra,' alluding to the conditions which the single Mocurreydar was himself to perform, occurs throughout the document, the word has been altered to the plural 'khoodhra;' so, likewise, in the words specifying what the Mocurreydar was to consider himself liable for, what to perform, and how to treat the estates and Ryots, the verb is throughout most palpably altered from the singular to the plural. The above description of the document shows at once, without any doubt whatever in our minds, that the terms were actually altered, and that there had not been merely defacements perpetrated by Appellant; and as such alterations are altogether fatal to the Respondents, it is ordered that the decision of the lower Court be reversed, and that a decree for possession, with wassilat from date of suit, and costs, be passed in favour of Appellant."

The Appellants filed a petition in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for a review of judgment, and they offered to produce fresh evidence, and, amongst other documentary proofs, the Registrar's book, containing the copy of the original sunnud, as it had been discovered after the decree of the Sudder Court had been made; that the old books were not really missing, as had been reported by the Registrar of deeds, but that they were found extant in the office of the Judge. The Appellants produced, with their petition, a copy from the Judge's office and from the Registrar's books, of their original sunnud, from which, as it was stated in the petition, the fraud of the Plaintiff would be apparent and proved. The Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, by a [10] proceeding of the 30th of May, 1857, rejected the application for the review of judgment.

The Appellants appealed to England from the decree of the 31st of December, 1856. After the transcript had been transmitted to England,

Mr. Leith (Feb. 6, 1861 *) moved for an order on the Court of India to transmit the original Persian deed to England for inspection of the defacement at the hearing, as was done in the cases of McCarthy v. Judah (12 Moore's P.C. Cases, 47), and Mason v. The Attorney-General of Jamaica (4 Moore's P.C. Cases, 228).

Lord Kingsdown.—We think, in the circumstances, that the application is reasonable, and will make an order, directing the transmission of the deed.

The deed was sent to England and inspected by their Lordships, and a Persian translator examined the same at the hearing of the appeal.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellants, in support of the appeal, insisted, first, that independently of the sunnud, it was sufficiently established from the admissions of the Plaintiff, that the mouzahs in question were granted by the late Maharajah in perpetuity, and under an hereditary tenure; and the finding of the Zillah Court of Behar, that the Plaintiff, or the Record-keeper, had sur-[11]-reptitiously caused the alterations and defacement of the sunnud, was supported by the evidence in the cause. Second, that as the suit was in the nature of ejectment, the Plaintiff could not recover, the Appellants having had from the death of the grantee a good possessory title for thirty-two years against the Plaintiff, and that the suit was, therefore, barred by effluxion of time, citing Ben. Reg. III. sec. 14, of 1793. They also referred to Ben. Regs. V. of 1812, sec. 2, and VIII. of 1819, sec. 2, as to the power of the Maharajah to alienate a part of the Zemindary.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. W. Field, for the Respondents, contended, first, that the instrument in question was a lease, and was granted only for the life of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, and that the words of inheritance therein contained, as it appeared from the instrument itself, had been fraudulently interpolated by the Appellants, or those under whom they claimed; that the limitation was expressed by the Persian words "Mocurrery Istenrariy," which by themselves did not convey hereditary rights, and had been so registered, without any mention of any hereditary rights being transferred; and they further insisted, that the deed must be strictly proved to render it admissible in evidence. Bunwaree Lall v. Maharajah Hetnarain Singh (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 148). And, secondly, that the Maharajah, being in possession of the Zemindary, which was ancestral property, had no power while a legitimate son was living to alienate the mouzahs in perpetuity, which would be the case if the deed could be supported with the words of inheritance which it purported to contain.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (Dec. 21, 1861).—The facts upon which this appeal arises may be thus stated. In the year 1795, Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh Bahadoor, who appears to have been a person of considerable position in the Province of Behar, granted a Mocurrery Istenrariy lease of the property which is the subject of this suit. That the grant was by a sunnud in the Persian language; and that the instrument produced in the cause is that sunnud, and bears the genuine seal of Rajah Mitterjeet Singh, are undisputed facts. It is also admitted, that the only grantee described by name was Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, the eldest son of Roy Prithee Singh, who, at the date of the grant, and for many years afterwards, up to the time of his death, was the Dewan of the grantor. But the substantial question in the cause is, whether the grant was expressed to be to Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, solely and simply, or to him "together with his uterine brothers from generation to generation;" in other words, whether the Persian words which now appear on the face of the sunnud, and import the addition in question, have, as the Respondents contend, been fraudulently substituted for other words, or, as the Appellants insist, have always formed part of the document.

On the former hypothesis the tenure would, as the law has been settled by a course of decisions, commencing at latest in the year 1817, have determined with the life of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt. The addition of words importing "from generation to generation," would make the grant one of a perpetual lease to Lalla Hoonooman Dutt and his heirs. The [13] further addition of the other words in question would, of course, make it one to him and his brothers jointly, and to their respective heirs. Lalla Hoonooman Dutt had two brothers, Gumess Dutt and Mahadeo Dutt; and some time in 1806 or 1807 a partition of the property comprised in the sunnud was made between the three, by or with the sanction of their father, Roy Prithee Singh. He died in 1839. His son, Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, certainly predeceased him, and though the precise date of his death is not clearly proved, there seems no reason to doubt that it took place, as stated by the Appellants, in or about the year 1819. In 1839, Rajah Mitterjeet Singh granted to his son, Moodnarain Singh, a Teeka lease of his interest in certain mouzahs, including those in question in this suit; and the latter were then treated as being still the subject of a subsisting Mocurrery tenure. In 1840 the Rajah died, leaving two sons, Hetnarain Singh and Moodnarain Singh. They made a partition of his estate, and the property in question fell to the share of Moodnarain Singh. On that occasion it was again treated as held by a subsisting Mocurrery tenure, a circumstance which must have been considered in estimating the share to be allotted to each brother.

In 1841, Moodnarain Singh instituted three separate suits, conformably to the devolution of the property under the Appellants' version of the original lease, for the recovery of arrears of Mocurrery rent alleged to be due in respect of certain mouzahs, parts of the property comprised in the sunnud, and claiming to have the Mocurrery tenure in those mouzahs respectively cancelled, on the ground of the arrears. These proceedings, therefore, [14] assumed the existence of the Mocurrery tenure in the lands in question in 1841; and also that they were thus held in severalty by the descendants of Roy Prithee Singh, recognizing to that extent the partition of 1807. In one of these suits, and on the 9th of February, 1841, the original sunnud was produced by the representatives of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt. On the following morning, if not on that night, it was inclosed in an envelope sealed with the seal of the Court. It was certainly from the time of its production up to the 22nd of March in the custody of the Court. On the last-named day the envelope was opened in Court in the presence of the Vakeels of both parties. The appearances which cast suspicion on the sunnud were then for the first time discovered. On the 30th of March, 1842, the Sudder Ameen, before whom the case was pending, passed a decree in favour of the Plaintiff for a small sum of arrears, but dismissed his suit so far as it sought for the cancellation of the tenure. On the same day he proceeded to hold an inquiry into the supposed tampering with the sunnud whilst in the custody of the Court. His proceeding resulted in the dismissal of the Record-keeper.

There were various other proceedings in these suits, of 1841 by way of appeal to the Sudder Adawlut, and of remand to the Court below, and in the course of the litigation Moodnarain Singh appears to have raised, by petition of amendment, some new issues founded on the appearance of the sunnud. The three suits, however, seem to have been finally disposed of by the decree of the Sudder Ameen, dated the 17th of June, 1846. The effect of the decision was that the Plaintiff was entitled to some arrears of Mocur-[15]-rery rent, though to considerably less than the amount claimed by him, and that he had shown no ground in those suits for the cancellation of the tenure.

From 1846 to 1851, Moodnarain Singh took no step; in June of the latter year he commenced the present suit, which embraces the representatives of all the three sons of Roy Prithee Singh, and is for the recovery of the whole property comprised in the sunnud, with mesne profits since 1842, and for the cancellation of the sunnud, as spurious.

His case, so far as it is necessary to state it, is that the sunnud as granted by his father was a grant of a Mocurrery Istemrary lease to Lalla Hoonooman Dutt alone, and, therefore, that the tenure legally determined on Lalla Hoonooman Dutt's death; that the document has been fraudulently altered by those who claim under it, the Persian words importing a grant in favour of his brothers jointly with Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, and of the heirs of all in perpetuity, having been written in substitution of words descriptive of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, or of other words erased, and words in the singular number having throughout been converted into words plural, wherever the alteration was necessary to make the instrument consistent. He tries to explain the continued enjoyment of the lands, as under a Mocurrery tenure, after Lalla Hoonooman Dutt's death; and other circumstances which are apparently inconsistent with his theory of the original grant by the alleged influence of Roy Prithee Singh over the Maharajah; and malversations in office by him and his grandson and successor in the Dewanship.

The case of the Defendants is also that the sunnud, as it now exists, has been tampered with, but they [16] contend that this tampering took place whilst the document was in the custody of the Sudder Ameen's Court in 1842, and was the act of the Plaintiff's agents in collusion with the Record-keeper: that it consisted only in disfiguring certain material passages of the instrument without altering its tenor, in order to cast suspicion upon it, and to give colour to the case now made against it. They also insisted that the present suit was barred by lapse of time under the Regulations of limitation.

It does not very clearly appear whether there has been any adjudication on this last plea. The Sudder Adawlut treated it as decided by the Sudder Ameen against the Defendants, who had not appealed against his decision. But in the proceedings before this Committee there is no trace of any other of the Sudder Ameen on this plea against which the Defendants could have appealed. His final decree of the 5th of August, 1854, is in their favour.

Proceeding much upon the finding of his predecessor on the inquiry of the 30th of March, 1842, into the conduct of the Record-keeper, he adopts the Defendants' theory of the tampering, and thereupon dismisses the Plaintiff's suit, declining to consider any of the other issues in the cause. He relied also on a copy of the lease bearing the Cazi's seal, which was given in evidence by the Appellants and is consistent with their case.

On appeal this decision was reversed by the Sudder Adawlut, which held that there had been a fraudulent alteration of the terms of the sunnud, and decreed in favour of the Plaintiff. On the second hearing of the case upon a petition for review of judgment, the Court adhered to its former decision, and rejected [17] some fresh evidence that was tendered on the part of the Appellants. The propriety of that rejection is not now questioned, but against the substance of the decree of the Sudder Adawlut, the present appeal is preferred.

The decision of the Sudder Court rests entirely on the evidence which, in the opinion of the Judges, the inspection of the document and the consideration of its contents afforded of the falsity of the explanation of its suspicious appearance given by the Appellants. Their judgment affords no ground for concluding that the corroborative proofs in support of the Appellant's case had been duly presented to the Court, and overruled by them. Their Lordships, however, think this case cannot be properly decided without weighing the whole evidence on either side, and applying the presumptions from conduct thence fairly arising, to the consideration of the opposite statements or theories with respect to the alteration of the instrument, that have been put forth by the respective litigants. It may be conceded that, in an ordinary case the party who presents an instrument, which is an essential part of his case, in an apparently altered and suspicious state, must fail, from the mere infirmity or doubtful complexion of his proof, unless he can satisfactorily explain the existing state of the document.

But this wholesome rule admits of exceptions, if there be, independently of the instrument, corroborative proof strong enough to rebut the presumption which arises against an apparent and presumable falsifier of evidence. And, such corroborative proof will be greatly strengthened, if there be reason to suppose that the opposite party has withheld evidence which would [18] prove the original condition and import of the suspected document. Moreover, the peculiarity of the present case is, that one of the issues to be determined is, what was the condition of the document when it was first produced by those who claim under it. The Appellants may fairly contend, that the rule above stated is not applicable to them, until this question has been decided against them.

In dealing with the whole evidence, their Lordships will first consider that derived from the actual inspection of the document.

After close and careful examination, they are unable to concur in the conclusion of the Judges of the Sudder Adawlut that such inspection alone affords decisive proof of positive alteration by erasure. It would, in the opinion of their Lordships, be a most difficult, if not impracticable, task, to efface by erasure, on paper such as that on which the sunnud is written, words covering the space which a full line would occupy, without plainer signs of that mode of tampering, than any which this document presents. Their Lordships would expect to find on paper of this quality so dealt with, more breaking of the surface, more running of ink into blots, and a more decided attenuation of the substance of the paper, discernible from a view of its reverse side when held to the light. They are also struck by the apparently insurmountable difficulty of so completely erasing so many words, that no trace of original words or letters should be discernible with the aid of a strongly magnifying glass. The nature of the particular paper and ink seems to render so perfect an erasure so improbable, that success in the attempt is not readily to be conjectured. Yet [19] the fact of alteration by erasure is essential to the Respondent's case.

Again, the addition of a plural termination to the pronoun "khud," an addition totally unnecessary on either theory of the original import of the instrument, is capable of being attributed to either side. If a falsifier of this instrument had grammatical skill enough to see the propriety of converting the singular nouns and verbs into the plural, it is reasonable to suppose that he would know, as their Lordships believe to be the case, that the pronoun " khud " was applicable to either number. To add a plural inflection to it would be to impose upon himself in that place an additional difficulty. The existence of a single noun in the singular when the strict sense required it to be in the plural would, in a case unattended with suspicion, naturally be ascribed to oversight or ignorance, or to the use of a singular noun in a collective sense. The word " Mocurredar " remains in this instrument in the singular where the plural termination " an " should have been added. This, it was contended, proved that the document, as it originally existed, had contained only the name of a single person as " Mocurredar." That argument assumes that the falsifiers had overlooked in a short instrument an important word, and whilst altering the other words, had by oversight neglected to convert that word into the plural. Such an oversight certainly may have occurred; but it is at least as probable a conjecture that the word stood originally in the singular, and was either advisedly used in a collective sense, or was inserted by misadventure in the singular instead of the plural number. The words in the singular, though ungrammatical, would not [20] have been inconsistent with the operation of the instrument for which the Appellants contend: their existence now in the plural cannot be relied on as in itself alone decisive evidence to turn the scale in a doubtful case against the Appellants, the Respondent's theory of erasure presenting, on the inspection, difficulties no less grave. The case on the argument founded on mere inspection cannot be viewed as other than a doubtful one.

The Appellants meet the arguments against them, with those which the appearance of the letters as blurred over and painted, the improbability of so great an erasure leaving so faint a trace, and the presence of the trace of the letter " mim " above the line, afford in confirmation of their theory of the tampering. The appearance of the paper in that part is certainly favourable to the supposition that that letter there existed, and its existence there is not reconcilable with the theory that words of mere description occupied originally the place where the disputed words are now found. On the whole, then, the inspection appears to their Lordships to furnish no certain or satisfactory grounds for deciding the case.

The next material inquiry is, what evidence is there as to the state of the instrument when first produced? This, so far as it goes, is in favour of the Appellants. If the document was fraudulently altered by them, it must presumably have been so altered before it was produced in Court in the year 1842. It is not conceivable that they would produce an instrument destructive of their own title, which in the ordinary course would be examined on its first production, on the chance of being able fraudulently [21] to alter its tenor whilst it was in the custody of the Court. Again, if the alteration was made before its production in 1842, the document must then have presented appearances even more suspicious than those which it now presents: since the lapse of eighteen years, and frequent manipulations in Court, must have tended to soften rather than to aggravate the marks of tampering. Those appearances could hardly have escaped the attention of one conversant with the Persian language who then examined the instrument. The Sudder Ameen, however (a Mussulman by his name, and, therefore, presumably the more conversant with Persian), has in a solemn proceeding declared, that he did carefully peruse the paper when it was produced, that it did not present the appearances which it afterwards presented, and that, if these had then existed, he must have observed and would have recorded their existence. He added that his attention to this part of his duty was well-known. The Solicitor-General sought to avoid the effect of this statement by suggesting that the Sudder Ameen, conscious of having neglected his duty, sought to avoid responsibility by stoutly asserting its performance, and throwing blame upon an innocent subordinate, his Record keeper. It is to be remarked, however, that his argument assumes the point in dispute, and it is further to be observed, that the Judge followed up his declaration by an important act, the dismissal of the Officer: and that there is no trace of any appeal from that act to any superior authority. The argument then assumes a violation of duty, of which there is no proof: and their Lordships cannot treat [22] the declaration of this native Judge, so solemnly and publicly made, as undeserving of credit.

It is next to be considered whether the Respondents have satisfactorily accounted for the non-production of evidence which would naturally be in their power, and would conclusively show what were the terms of the original grant. The evidence for the Respondents shows that there was, as in the ordinary course of business there would be, a Kuboolyet, or counterpart of the Mocurrery lease executed by the grantee to the grantor. His witnesses state that in 1839, when Baboo Moodnarin Singh took the Teeka lease from his father, inquiry was made about this Kuboolyet; and that Nujeeblal, the grandson of Roy Prithee Singh, who then acted as Dewan, stated that it was lost. The imputation on Nujeeblal seems to be that he or his grandfather abstracted this and other papers. The explanation, however, cannot be accepted as satisfactory. It is said that at the time it did not satisfy either the Maharajah or his son; and it is not easy to see why the latter, who seems even then to have been sufficiently alive to his own interests, did not take other steps either to enforce the production of the paper, or to ascertain by other means what was the purport of the original grant. The statement of Nujeeblal was calculated to excite rather than to allay suspicion.

It is, moreover, difficult to conceive that, independently of the Kuboolyet, and of the copy in the missing register-book, there has not been in the family of Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh's clear knowledge of the terms of the original and admitted grant of the tenure in question, at least during a considerable part [23] of the long period of enjoyment under it. It is no doubt suggested that the Maharajah was, in the latter part of his life at least, incapable of attention to business, and much under the influence of his Dewan. But there is no proof, and hardly a suggestion, of such incapacity in 1795, or for many years afterwards.

It is consistent with the habits of men of his rank to attend to and have a knowledge of their affairs, and to hold a sort of domestic forum for the transaction of business in their Cutcheries. The grant of a Mocurrery Istenrary lease to the son, or sons of the Dewan, and probably in recognition of his services, was an act likely to take place with some pomp and publicity. The terms of the grant would be notorious to many; they are not likely to have been slipped from the memory either of the Maharajah or of those of his dependants to whom they were known. Yet when we come to test the truth of the conflicting statements as to those terms by the presumptions arising from the conduct and acts of both families, what do we find? Their Lordships would not lay much stress on the mere fact that some of the family of Roy Prithee Singh continued in the enjoyment of the tenure after the death of Hoonooman Dutt. This, though prima facie inconsistent with the Respondents' case, might be referred to the favour shown by the Maharajah to the family of the Dewan. But in 1807, when the grant was still comparatively recent, we have the partition between the sons of Roy Prithee Singh. That was a transaction perfectly consistent with the sunnud as it now stands, but utterly inconsistent with the hypothesis that the grant was to Lalla Hoonooman Dutt alone, and for life only. It [24] was a transaction which can hardly have escaped the knowledge of the Maharajah, or of those who would soon have made it known to him. If it were known to him, he could not have treated it as other than an impudent usurpation, and an alteration of the terms of his grant to his prejudice effected by his Dewan, unless he was conscious that it was in fact consistent with the true import of the grant, and authorized by it.

Again, this partition was clearly known to Baboo Moodnarin Singh when he commenced the suits of 1831, if not when he took the Teeka lease in 1839. The very form of his proceedings recognized this partition, and admitted the subsisting rights of Mocurredars, though long after the death of Lalla Hoonooman Dutt, and this at a time when he was hostile to them. This act of his is conceivable if the terms of the grant were known to be what the Appellants say they were; inconceivable, if they were known to be what the Respondent says they were; and highly improbable if they were then doubtful.

It is also obvious that, when the partition took place between Baboo Moodnarin Singh and his brother, the traditions and belief of the late Maharajah's family must have been in favour of the existence of a valid Mocurrery tenure in these lands; and the fact that they were held in severalty by the divided branches of Roy Prithee Singh's family must have been notorious.

Here again is a solemn act of the grantor's family which is consistent with the Appellants' case, and inconsistent with that of the Respondents. The evidence of the Respondents' witnesses as to the Kaboolyet is also inconsistent with a statement in his pleadings concerning them, which was remarked upon by Mr. Forsyth in his reply.

[25] Their Lordships think that by the presumptions thus arising from the acts and conduct of the parties during a long series of years, this case must be decided. They do not say that it is free from difficulty, or that either side has succeeded in explaining satisfactorily the state of the Persian sunnud. But against whatever inference to the prejudice of the Appellants may be drawn from that circumstance (and it is at least doubtful whether any such can fairly be drawn), may be set the presumption arising from the non production of the Kaboolyet by the opposite party. The actors in the original transaction are all long since dead, and the Respondent is seeking to recover the property from those who have been for many years in the enjoyment of it. In any view of the case, he has been guilty of great laches in the assertion of his alleged rights. The difficulties (if any) which arise from the loss of evidence, and the other consequences of lapse of time, ought, in justice, to fall on him.

It is essential to his case to establish that the original grant was to Lalla Hoonoo-man Dutt alone, and for life only. The weight of the evidence, independently of the disputed sunnud, seems to their Lordships to be against this allegation, and in favour of the title insisted upon by the Appellants; that preponderance of proof is also necessarily in favour of the Appellants' theory of the alteration of the document.

The copy of the lease, verified by the Cazi's seal, cannot be treated as any corroboration of the Appellant's case, as there is a total absence of evidence concerning the time, mode, and cause of its execution and presentation to the Cazi.

This being their Lordships' view, it is unnecessary [26] to consider whether the plea that the suit was barred by lapse of time and the Regulations of limitation is still open to the Appellants, or could have been successfully maintained by them.

Upon the merits of the case, their Lordships propose humbly to recommend to Her Majesty that the appeal be allowed, that the decision of the Sudder Adawlut be reversed, and that of the Zillah Court affirmed; and that the Respondents do pay the costs of the appeal to the Sudder Adawlut and of this appeal.

ANUNDMOYEE DOSSEE and Others, Appellants; POORNOO CHUNDER ROY and Others,—Respondents * [Nov. 20, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Decanney Adawlut at Calcutta.

Act, No. XVI. of 1845, amending Act No. XXIX. of 1841, enacts, that it is competent to the Sudder Court in the case of the dismissal of an appeal for want of prosecution; upon the application of the Appellant within three months after the appeal has been dismissed, to readmit the appeal, if the Appellant satisfies the Court, that the dismissal was "occasioned by the default of his Vakeel, or by unavoidable accident."

An appeal was made to the Sudder Court at Calcutta, but in consequence of the absence from illness of the Appellant's Mookhtar, the written reasons of appeal were not lodged within six weeks, the time prescribed by Act, No. XV. of 1853, sec. 6, and the appeal was dismissed. Upon application for re-admission of the appeal, the evidence showed, that there had been no wilful delay, and that the Appellant was in ignorance of the fact of the reasons of appeal not having been filed. Held, reversing the decree of the Sudder Court, that such circumstances constituted a case of "unavoidable accident," within the meaning of the Act, No. XVI. of 1845, and the appeal ordered to be re-admitted on the file of pending causes.

In reversing the decree of the Sudder Court, the order of that Court that the costs of the application to re-admit the appeal should be paid by the Appellants, was confirmed; but as the Appellants were successful in obtaining a reversal of the decree of the Court below, the costs of the appeal in England against such decree were ordered to be paid by the Respondents.

This appeal was brought from an order made by a single Judge of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, dated the 19th of September, 1859. By a [27] previous order of that Court, dated the 21st of June, 1859, an appeal by the Appellants then pending in that Court, against a decree of the Zillah Court of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, was ordered to be struck off the list of pending causes, under the provisions of Act, No. XXIX. of 1841, on the ground, that the Appellants' written reasons in support of their appeal had not been filed within the period of six weeks, the time prescribed by Act, No. XV. of 1853, sec. 6, and the same Judge, by the order, dated the 19th of September, 1859, refused to re-admit the appeal, on an application for that purpose made by the Appellants, supported by affidavits explaining the cause of the delay in filing the reasons of appeal (a).

The facts of the case, so far as they are necessary to the question of practice raised in the appeal, were as follows:—

The Appellants were Defendants in a suit brought [28] against them by the Respondents in the Court of the Sudder Ameen of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, and appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut from the decree of the Sudder Ameen, made on the 23rd of September, 1858. The petition of appeal was lodged on the 2nd of October, 1858.

On the 2nd of April, 1859, the Deputy-Registrar of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut passed an order in that appeal, calling upon the Appellants, pursuant to the provisions of 6th section of Act, No. XV. of 1853, to prefer their grounds of appeal from the decision of the Lower Court within six weeks. The Appellants failed to do so within that time, and on the 3rd of June, 1859, the Deputy-Registrar made an order as follows:—"Although six weeks had expired from the 18th of April, the day on which the notice (pursuant to the above order of the 2nd of the same month) was affixed, yet the Appellants have not filed their grounds of objection and reasons of appeal. Wherefore, the Appellants having neglected to proceed with the case within six weeks, and it being considered liable to be struck off the file according to the provisions contained in Act, No. XXIX. of 1841, it is ordered, that the case be referred to the Judge now sitting in the miscellaneous department, for his orders to strike it off the file of the Court."

Accordingly, on the 21st of June, 1859, the matter came before Mr. Samuells, a Judge of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, who ordered the case to be struck off the list of pending causes.

It appeared, that the Appellants were kept in ignorance by their Mookhtar of these proceedings; but as soon as they were made aware of them, they applied in the usual manner to have the appeal re-admitted, [29] and filed two petitions for that purpose, dated respectively the 7th of July, 1859, and the 20th of the same month. These petitions stated, that the Appellants had not been guilty of any negligence, that they had retained Vakeels, previous to the notice being affixed; and that the default was occasioned by the severe illness and absence of their Mookhtar, to whom was confided the conduct of the appeal; that the Appellants were altogether ignorant of such illness and absence, and of the non-filing of the reasons of appeal within the prescribed period, and they prayed that the Court would overlook the default on lapse of time, agreeably to the provisions of Act, VIII. of 1859, sec. 347, and re-admit the appeal case to the file. The Appellants filed an affidavit in support of this application, in which, after stating the information which they had then recently received of the illness and absence from Calcutta of their Mookhtar, and that they were wholly ignorant and unacquainted with what had transpired concerning the appeals, until the 25th of June, 1859, when they received a letter from a third party informing them that he had heard their appeal had been struck off, deposed that they had caused inquiry to be made as to the truth of the statement of the Mookhtar, concerning his departure from Calcutta and alleged illness at Hooghly, and believed both the circumstances to be true; but that, even if true, it was the bounden duty of the Mookhtar to have given them information when he left Calcutta for Hooghly, so that they might themselves have taken steps for filing their grounds of appeal in due time; which notice, however, he wholly omitted to give; that whilst believing the probability and truth of the statements of the Mookhtar, they also laboured under the apprehension that the Mookhtar might have been tampered with by the Mookhtar or agents of the Respondents; but whether that was so or not, the result was, that their interests had, through the conduct of the Mookhtar, amounting either to unavoidable absence from illness, or from wilful neglect of duty, been sacrificed, and they had been debarred, without any negligence on their part, from prosecuting the appeals before the Sudder Court, in cases relating to disputed property of the value exceeding a lac of rupees.

(a) Act, No. XVI. of 1845, declares, that the provisions of Act, XXIX. of 1841, are inconveniently severe as regards appeals, and that it was expedient to mitigate the strictness thereof: and by sec. 1, it is enacted, that it shall be competent to the Court which shall have dismissed such appeal to re-admit the same, if the Appellant shall make application for that purpose, on the stamp prescribed for miscellaneous petitions, within three months after the appeal shall have been dismissed, and shall satisfy the Court that the dismissal was occasioned by the default of his Vakeel, or by unavoidable accident.

On the 1st of July, 1859, and pending these proceedings, Act, No. VIII. of 1859, the new Code of Civil Procedure came into operation, which by section 347, provides, that "if an appeal be dismissed for default of prosecution, the Appellant may, within thirty days from the date of the dismissal, apply to the appellate Court for the re-admission of the appeal; and if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the Appellant was prevented, by any sufficient cause, from appearing when the appeal was called on for hearing, the Court may re-admit the appeal."

On the 30th July, 1859, by a proceeding held by the same Judge, it was ordered that the Mookhtar should file an affidavit in the matter.

An affidavit of the Mookhtar was filed, which stated, that he acted as Mookhtar for the Appellants, that within ten days after the date of the decree of the Sudder Ameen, under the instructions of the Appellants, he caused to be lodged a memorandum of appeal in the Zillah Court against the decision, on their part; that after the appeals had been lodged in the Zillah Court, he only waited for the usual Ishtihar to be issued from the Sudder Court to sign the Vakeelutnamahs, and had retained pleaders; that up to [31] the 16th April, he was in daily attendance at the Sudder Court for the purpose of ascertaining if such Ishtihar had been issued, but that none having been up to that date issued, and having received intelligence of the dangerous illness of his son, he abruptly left Calcutta for his family house at Buripore, in the District of Hooghly, where he arrived on the 17th of April, and then found that his son was under medical treatment and seriously ill, so much so that his personal care and attendance became absolutely necessary, and that he accordingly attended on him up to his death, which took place on the 30th of April; after that date he himself fell dangerously ill, and continued in such state, quite incapable of attending to any business, until the 17th of June, when he returned to Calcutta, and there, for the first time, learnt that the Ishtihar, calling on the Appellants, his employers, to file their grounds of appeal, had been issued on the 18th of April, and that the six weeks usually allowed for filing the reasons of appeal from the date of the Ishtihar, had run out, and that, for such default of prosecution on the part of the representatives of Muttyloll Seal, deceased, and also of Sreemutty Dossee, the two appeals had been referred to the Judges of the Sudder Court for the purpose of being struck off. That, on obtaining such information, he filed a Vakeelutnamah in the case on the 20th of June, 1859, and that the two appeals were struck off the file on the following day, the 21st of June, 1859. That when he left Calcutta, on the 16th of April, he gave no information of his departure to the Appellants, as he fully expected to return to Calcutta in a few days; but that, owing to the severe and fatal illness of his son in the first instance, and his own [32] personal illness in the second, he was detained at Hooghly until the 17th of June, as before stated, and whilst so absent, he failed to communicate to the Appellants, either the fact of his departure or his illness, of neither of which circumstances they had any information or knowledge, until after the appeals had been struck off the file for want of prosecution. And he admitted that it had been entirely owing to his culpable but unintentional neglect that the necessary steps were not taken for prosecution of the appeals, the duty connected with which solely and exclusively devolved on him as Mookhtar, and that the Appellants were wholly ignorant that the appeals had been struck off, until they learnt the intelligence from other sources, which led to the discovery of his neglect and inattention to their interests, which caused his dismissal from being any longer their Mookhtar.

On the 19th of September, the hearing of this application took place before the same Judge in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, when that Judge made an order rejecting the application for the re-admission of the appeal, stating his reasons as follows:—"At the first hearing of the petition, it was contended for the Petitioners, that the application might be re-admitted, under the provisions of sec. 347 of the New Code of Procedure, on the Petitioners showing sufficient cause," to the satisfaction of the Court, for their default. But the Court were of opinion, that as the default had occurred prior to the enactment of the New Code, and was a totally different description of default from that treated of in sec. 347 of the Code, the petition must be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the old law. The Petitioner's [33] pleaders were accordingly called upon to satisfy the Court that the dismissal of their appeal had been occasioned either 'by the default of the petitioners' Vakeel, or by unavoidable accident;' the only conditions on which, under the stringent terms of Act, No. XXIX. of 1841, and Act, No. XVI. of 1845, the Court were empowered to re-admit a case which had been dismissed for default. It was argued for the Petitioners, that the affidavits in the case were uncontradicted, and disclosed a clear case of accidental default, for which his client was in no way to blame. The sudden departure of the Mookhtar, without notice, his unexpected detention, and his unlooked-for illness, were all, it was said, facts which would come under the category of 'unavoidable accident;' and, on this point, the case of Gooroo Pershad Dutt, decided on the 7th of March, 1849, by Mr. Sconce, was quoted. On the other hand it was contended that, even if the Court did not look upon the case as one of unavoidable accident, it was, on the face of it, a default of the legal agent of the Petitioners—the person who was employed in the conduct of the suit, and who was standing at the time in the place of the Vakeel. A liberal construction of the law, such as, it was urged, the Court should put upon the Act, would, therefore, it was said, allow the same effect to the default of the Mookhtar in this case as to the default of a Vakeel; and the case of Gudadhur Parshad Tewarree v. Moosumat Soonderkoomaree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 201) was quoted, to show that in the case of a rule regarding default, equally stringent with Act, No. XXIX. of 1841, the Privy Council refused to construe the rule harshly to the injury of the Appellants. The [34] Courts, the learned Judge observed, are always disposed to deal with cases, in which the default does not appear to be wilful, as leniently as the law will permit them; but, at the same time, they are bound to take care that any idea they may form of the hardship of a case shall not induce them to strain the law in favour of one party to the detriment of the other. To entitle him to claim re-admission for his appeal, a Petitioner must show that his case comes fairly within one of the two classes to which the law extends its indulgence, viz. defaults occasioned by the conduct of his Vakeel, or by unavoidable accident; and, in all cases, he must satisfy the Court that he himself was not to blame. Now, after a full consideration of all that has been urged for the Petitioners in this case, I do not see how they can successfully contend that the default was attributable to any other cause than their own gross negligence and lax habits of business. Here were men who had cases in Court, involving large sums of money, who reside in the immediate neighbourhood of the Court, and are aware, or ought to be aware, of the very stringent law which enacts that any suit not prosecuted for six weeks shall be dismissed, and yet they leave everything in the hands of a single Mookhtar, do not send for him for months, or make a single inquiry how the case was going on. Had they placed their case when they appealed, in the hands of the respectable Vakeels whom they employed, with instructions to file the grounds of appeal at the proper time, and to conduct their case through all its stages, they would have been perfectly safe; but, like many of the suitors in this Court, they preferred, for reasons best known to themselves, to defer filing the [35] Vakeelnamah till the latest moment, and in the meantime entrusted the management of their case to a Mookhtar, over whom they appear to have exercised neither check nor control. This, it appears to me, is the very conduct against which the stringent provisions of Act, No. XXIX. of 1844 are levelled—the failure of suitors either to use diligence themselves in the prosecution of their suits, or to employ Vakeels of Court who may take the necessary steps for them. Act, No. XVI. of 1845, allows the suitor to plead the default of his Vakeel, but of no other person. The Mookhtar is not a legal agent, recognized by the law, and cannot claim, under any circumstances, to stand in the shoes of the Vakeel. He is merely the private servant of the suitor; and the default of the Mookhtar is, in the eye of the law, the default of the suitor himself. The only plea which the law allows a party to a suit to put forward in exculpation of his own default, is that of unavoidable accident; but, as I have already intimated, I can see nothing of the kind here. It was not accident which caused the Petitioners to leave their Mookhtar to deal with the case as he thought proper, without taking the most ordinary precautions in the matter themselves; and it was not accident which led to the Mookhtar's absenting himself without notice, or to his masters permitting his absence to pass unobserved. It was nothing, on the part of both masters and servant, but extreme negligence and unbusiness-like habits. The cases which have been quoted in support of the Petitioners' application are quite irrelevant. In that of Goorooopershad Dutt, where the Appellant, residing in the Mofussil, despatched a servant with a Mookhtarnamah, and the papers of the case to Calcutta, [36] that he might appoint a Vakeel, and the Mookhtar fell ill on the road, the Court after taking evidence, held it to be a case of unavoidable accident, for which the Appellant was not to blame, and replaced his suit on the file. The case was precisely as if the Appellant himself, journeying to Calcutta to appeal, had been struck down by sudden illness. It is scarcely necessary to point out how very widely that case differs from the present, where there is apparent, a long course of negligence, and where the Petitioners, had they used ordinary vigilance, would have ascertained the absence of their Mookhtar in time to take the necessary steps for prosecuting the appeal themselves. The case of Gudadhar Purshad Tewarree v. Moosamat Saander-koomaree, and the case of Seto Lutcheechund v. Seto Zoramur Mull (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 204), rather make against the Petitioners than otherwise, as they show that the Privy Council would not have relaxed the rule referred to in these decisions, except under the very special circumstances which the cases disclose. The dismissal of the Petitioners' appeal, then, being neither occasioned by the default of their Vakeel, nor by unavoidable accident, but purely by their own inexcusable negligence, the application is necessarily rejected, with costs."

The present appeal was from this order.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellants.—As the affidavit of the Mookhtar sufficiently explained the cause of the delay in filing the reasons of appeal within the period of six weeks, the limit prescribed by the Act, No. XV. of 1853, sec. 6, the refusal of [37] the Judge to re-admit the appeal to the list of pending causes upon a mere question of procedure, on the ground that the default must be occasioned by the "Vakeel," or by "unavoidable accident," was erroneous and cannot be upheld. The alleged default of the Appellants, on account of which their appeal was dismissed, was caused by "unavoidable accident" within the meaning of the Act, No. XVI. of 1845. According to the equitable construction of that Act, a party who suffers from the default of his Mookhtar, under such circumstances as existed in this case, is entitled to the same indulgence as if the negligence had been occasioned through the "default of his Vakeel," and we submit, that the ruling of the Sudder Judge was wrong in holding that the Act did not apply to the default of a Mookhtar. Again, the Judge was wrong in his judgment, in holding that the provisions of sec. 347, of the Act, No. VIII. of 1859, which contains the new procedure of the Court and came into operation on the 1st of July, 1859, were not applicable to the present case.

Mr. Andrew, for the Respondents.—The decision of the Sudder Judge upon the question now raised, is in accordance with the law as it stood at the time of the Appellants' default. They failed to file their grounds of appeal within the prescribed time, and that default was solely attributable to their own gross negligence. It cannot be successfully urged, that the evidence adduced by the Court below, with a view of inducing that Court to re-admit the appeal, disclosed sufficient grounds to entitle them to the indulgence they asked. The Act, No. XIV. of [38] 1845, enumerates two instances only where relief can be given; first, default of the Vakeel, and, secondly, unavoidable accident, neither of which instances can be construed to apply to the present case.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The evidence shows that this is a case of "unavoidable accident" and is within the provisions of the 1st sec. of the Act, No. XVI. of 1845. The decree of the Court below, therefore, cannot stand; and we shall humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse it. As to the costs of the application in the Court below, their Lordships are of opinion, that the Court below was right in ordering them to be paid by the Appellants, but the costs of the appeal must be paid by the Respondents (in the case of Sreemutty Dossee Poornoo v. Chunder Roy and others, the circumstances of which were exactly similar with the above case, and which was heard by the Judicial Committee on the same day, a similar order was made, re-admitting the appeal).

[39] RANEE COWULBAS KOONWUR.—Appellant; BABOO LOLL BAHADOOR SINGH and Others,—Respondents * [Dec. 4, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Heard ex-parte.

Construction of an Ikrarnamah, or deed of agreement and partition, of an ancestral estate, among several brothers: Held that the terms of the deed were not restrictive upon the power of each brother, to alienate his separate share.

A., one of the brothers, had his share registered on the Collector's Books as owner, and by deed of sale conveyed such share to his daughter, who was also his heir. The Collector, upon the objection of one of A.'s brothers (who denied A.'s right to alienate, on the ground that it was ancestral property), refused to register the daughter's name as proprietor. Held, that the Collector was bound by Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1800, sec. 21, to register her name as purchaser, but that such mutation of name was to be without prejudice to the question of the right of succession.

It is beyond the power of the Court to make a declaration in a decree, upon a point not recorded in the issues, as required by Ben. Reg. XXVI. sec. 10, of 1814.

This was a suit brought by the Appellant against the Respondent, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, and Baboo Bhowanee Partaub Singh, for himself, as guardian of Baboo Jobraj Singh, his minor son. The chief object of the suit was to obtain a declaration of the Court on the construction and effect to be [40] given to an Ikrarnamah, or instrument of agreement and partition, executed by four brothers named Loll Bahadoor Singh, Bhowanee Partaub Singh, Run Bahadoor Singh, and Odey Partaub Singh: and raised the question of the power of Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh to alienate his share of the ancestral property which was formerly jointly held by himself and brothers. The suit was instituted at the instance of the Government Commissioner of Revenue, who refused, without a decision of the Civil Court, as to the construction to be put on the Ikrarnamah, to affirm an Order of the Collector, which directed that the name of the Appellant as purchaser should be substituted in the Collector's books for that of Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, the vendor of the mouzahs, or villages, the subject of the suit.

The facts were these:—

The above-named four brothers were Hindoos, and in joint possession as co-sharers of certain landed property, consisting of numerous mouzahs in Zillah Behar and Shahabad, and being desirous of effecting a partition and division of the same among themselves, executed, on the 22nd of October, 1845, an Ikrarnamah, which was duly registered.

This Ikrarnamah was in these terms:—"Whereas, it is mutually necessary for us to divide by lot, villages, properties and revenues and malikana of the minabee villages, of Pergunnah Ceris and Kotumba, in Zillah Behar, and of the settled villages and malikana of the minabee villages of Pergunnah Havellee Ruhtans of Zillah Shahabad, and of the Moeurrery villages in Pergunnah Pullamon, and of the lands Gurbagh in Moorarpoor, in Pergunnah Gyah, and of the debts of [41] Mahajuns and the zurpeshgee of Tikadars, etc.; for this purpose a Punchayet has been appointed, viz. Sreemunth Ram Chunder Bhartee, Baboo Tejnarayn Singh, Baboo Bishen Nath Singh, and Baboo Daad Bahadoor Singh, and we have filed an Ikrarnamah punchayuttee (arbitration bond) before the Punchayet, under our signature, but on account of the non-fulfilment of the conditions of said Ikrarnamah, the said members of the Punchayat have declined to act. Now, with our voluntary and free will, in the presence of Lala Dabee Purshaud, our Mookhtar, we have submitted a hyut-bundee (specification) of the villages and of the malguzary, after giving a deduction of mouzahs Tehrah and Bhorosah and Sandusee, uslee and rujokee and mulhdowah, uslee with dakhillee of Pergunnah Kotumba in Zillah Behar, and of Mouzahs Sunlona and Korenaha, Pergunnah Havellee Ruhtans in Zillah Shahabad, all of which belong rightfully to Baboo Run Bahadoor Singh, that is to say, in right of primogeniture, and the debts of Mahajuns, zurpeshgee, of Tikadars, etc., and each sharer has obtained the hyut-bundee, and is in possession of the share accordingly. Under these circumstances, there is no dispute or contention existing with reference to the partitioned villages, and the debts of Mahajuns, etc. The malguzary of Mouzah Duldhar and mouzah Daoodpoor, appertaining to Havellee Ruhtans, according to the ticea writing of the Tikadars down to the Fuslee year 1255, is collected, and each sharer is to take an equal share of it. From 1256, we shall continue to make collections of the malguzary of the villages, as mentioned in the hyut-bundee. We, therefore, declare and give in writing, that in case of necessity, we four brothers [42] are competent, in order to liquidate expenses, debts of malguzary, debts of Mahajuns, etc., in case of our having no means at hand, to make alienations in the best way we think proper of shares of our villages, by deed of irreversible kabala, bybil-wuffa, mortgage, ijarah and zurpeshgee, bhurna, etc. We shall continue to pay debts of Mahajuns, zurpeshgee, of Tikadars, etc., in proportion assigned in the hyut-bundee to each sharer, and whatever besides becomes payable during the period of coparcenary. We, nor our heirs, shall make any objection in respect of the deed of bhurna, burnahurree, tomusooks, bybil-wuffa, ijarah, tunkhahee chittees, and receipts, bearing date previous to this Ikrarnamah. Cases which are pending or will be brought in the Civil Courts, Foujdary Courts, Collectorate, and other lower Courts of the Zillah, and in the Sudder, during the period of coparcenary, the expenses of the prosecution and defence thereof are chargeable to all four brothers; should any of us, declarants, or our heirs, swerve from these conditions, in that case, the said objection will become void."

After the execution of the Ikrarnamah the brothers individually exercised acts of ownership over their several separated shares, some of them selling the mouzahs assigned to them.

On the 16th of September, 1848, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, having no male issue, sold the mouzahs in question in this suit, constituting his share of the joint estate, for the sum of Rs. 75,501, to his daughter, the Appellant, and at the same time executed a deed of sale, which was registered in the office of the Register of Deeds of Zillah Behar.

The ordinary petition was presented to the Collector by the Appellant and the vendor, stating the [43] purchase and deed aforesaid, the payment of the purchase-money, and the possession of the Appellant, and praying that her name might be recorded in the Collectorate in place of that of the vendor on his assent at the time given. Bhowanee Purtaub Singh, one of the vendor's brothers, thereupon filed a petition of objections, on behalf of himself and his minor son, alleging that Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh had no power to alienate by sale ancestral property in favour of the Appellant during the lives of the Petitioner and his son, and praying that the name of the vendee might not be recorded. Afterwards a second petition was filed by the same party, referring to the terms of the Ikrarnamah, and contending that only conditional sales—namely, for the liquidation of debts and Government revenue, were permitted under that instrument, and that, therefore, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh was not competent to make any alienation. The vendor filed a petition by way of answer, in which he stated, that he and his brothers were separate, and that their property had been divided among them, and that sales had been made by them severally of mouzabs out of their respective shares, and that the names of the purchasers had been duly recorded in the Collectorate.

The hearing of the petition took place before the Assistant Collector, when that Officer ordered as follows:—"Whereas it appears from a copy of the Ikrarnamah filed by the Mookhtar of the objector that it has reference only to the fact that a sale is allowable for liquidation of debt under decrees, etc., and in the bill of sale adduced by the Petitioner there is no mention of 'necessity' for making the sale. Under these circumstances, the vendor is not competent to [44] make any alienation. Ordered, therefore, that this case be struck off the file."

The Appellant appealed from this decision to the Collector, and on the 23rd of December, 1850, the hearing of the appeal took place, when the Collector referring to the terms of the Ikrarnamah, declared the competency of the vendor to alienate the mouzabs sold, reversed the decision of the Assistant Collector, and ordered, to the effect, that the name of the vendor should be struck out from the Government records, and the name of this Appellant as the purchaser should be substituted. The objector being dissatisfied with the order, filed a petition of appeal in the Court of the Commissioner against this decision. The hearing of the appeal took place before the Commissioner on the 3rd of June, 1851, when by a proceeding of that date he declared, that the mutation of names was not valid; and that, although the Collector in his proceeding had declared the competency of the vendor to alienate the share sold under the Ikrarnamah, and ordered that the name of the female purchaser might be registered, and that of the vendor struck off, yet that a decision on the terms of the Ikrarnamah rested with the Civil Courts. Hence, in the opinion of that Court, the Collector's order could not be admitted or confirmed, and it was ordered by the Commissioner that the Collector's order, dated the 23rd of December, 1850, be reversed.

In consequence of this decision of the Commissioner, the Appellant brought the suit from which the present appeal arose against Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh and Bhowanee Purtaub Singh, and his minor son, Jobraj Singh. In the plaint the Appellant stated, [45] that the mouzabs were held by the Defendant, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh as his own absolute property under the partition and division aforesaid, and the Ikrarnamah above mentioned; that he sold the same under the registered deed of sale, and for the consideration aforesaid, to the Appellant, who was put into possession, and then still continued in possession thereof. The plaint further stated the proceedings before the Assistant Collector, the Collector, and Commissioner, submitting that the order of the Commissioner was opposed to the provisions of sec. 21, of Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1800, and precedent, No. 4, cited in the Circular Order of the Sudder Board of Revenue, dated 25th of March, 1851; and prayed that orders might be passed by the Court to have the Appellant's name recorded in the Collectorate in place of that of the vendor, in respect of the mouzabs.

The answer of the Defendant, Bhowanee Purtaub Singh, after objecting that certain mouzabs of Zillah Shahabad were left out of the plaint, and the omission of mention of the price of each mouzah insisted that the record of name was intended for the person in possession, but that the present Appellant was never in possession of the mouzabs, and had never paid the consideration money. The answer also stated, that the mouzabs were acquired by the common ancestor of the four brothers; and it submitted, whether by law an ancestor had the power directly or indirectly to make alienations in the face of the real successor, and to his deprivation. It then stated, that of the brothers only one, viz. the Defendant, had male issue, and insisted that the Ikrarnamah only permitted a sale to pay revenue or other debt of the sharer.

[46] The answer of the Defendant, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, supported generally the statements in the plaint, and expressed assent to the mutation of name prayed for therein, praying that he might be dismissed the suit, with costs, having been made unnecessarily a party.

The replication stated, in respect to the Ikrarnamah referred to in Bhownsee Purtaub Singh's answer, that it nowhere contained a condition that a brother was not competent to alienate property mentioned in that instrument or otherwise, when he had brothers or nephews alive, but that rather the whole tenor of the deed was, that such sharer was competent to make alienation of his share.

The pleadings having been closed, the usual proceeding by the Principal Sudder Ameen, under sec. 10, Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1814, took place, when the issues to be tried in the suit were recorded as follows:—Pleas in bar in admission of suit.—First, is this suit admissible or not, according to Circular Orders of the 11th of January, 1839, and the 30th of September, 1847, as certain mouzahs of Zillah Shahabad have been left out from the plaint; and also whether omission of the mention of the price of each mouzah is or is not in contravention of sec. 3, Reg. IV. of 1793, and reports of regular cases decided on the 12th of March, 1850, and 13th and 18th April of that year? Second, is the suit of Plaintiff, claiming the record of her name, although out of possession of the purchased property, without first suing for possession, admissible or not? Facts arising which require to be determined in accordance with clause 2, sec. 10, Reg. XXVI. of 1814. The first point relative to fact to be determined, which Plaintiff may adduce and the Defendant [47] deny. First, It is to be seen first whether the bill of sale dated 1st of Assin of the Fuslee year 1256, is correct or not in conformity to Regulation, and whether the Plaintiff is in possession of the purchased property or not; and what is the condition of the Ikrarnamah; and is the vendor competent to sell or not; and is the Plaintiff rightfully entitled to get her name recorded in the Collectorate or not, in reversal of the roobakaree of the Commissioner? Is the intent of the Circular Order of the Sudder Board, dated 25th of March, 1851, in bar of the mutation or not? The second point relative to fact to be determined, which Defendant may adduce and the Plaintiff deny. "It is to be seen first what the form of sale and purchase is, and what are the terms of the Ikrarnamah, and is Plaintiff in possession of the same or not, and whether the vendor is competent to make alienation of the property in dispute or not, and whether Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, one of the Defendants, ought to be exonerated from this claim."

Evidence was adduced by both parties under these issues, and witnesses were examined on behalf of the Appellant, who proved the sale and purchase, and her actual possession thereunder. There were also witnesses examined on behalf of the Defendant, Bhownsee Purtaub Singh, in contradiction to the witnesses of the Appellant, to prove that she was not in possession. It was further proved in the course of the examination of the Defendant's witnesses, that the four brothers separated, and that a division was made among them, and that the mouzahs in question fell to the lot of Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh.

[48] The hearing of the suit took place before the Principal Sudder Ameen (Moulvee Sayyad Mahamed Rafeeq Khan Bahadoor), in the Court of the Zillah of Behar, on the 20th of August, 1853, when he made a decree in favour of the Appellant, in the following terms:—"In this case, the claim of the Plaintiff is as stated above, and that the answer of Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, vendor, is in support of the plaint of the Plaintiff, and prays his own exoneration from the claim; and that the answer of Bhownsee Purtaub Singh is to the effect that the plaint is irregular, by reason of omitting the mouzahs in Zillah Shahabad, mentioned in the bill of sale; that the Plaintiff is not in possession; that no mention is made of price; that the vendor is not competent to make alienation of the property claimed under the deed of partition, and that the vendor has no male issue, but nephews, as stated expressly, in the answer. But no irregularity is found in the plaint, as the defect is cured by supply of supplementary stamps. This action is merely to get her name recorded in the Collectorate. It became necessary, therefore, to try this point only, viz. whether or no the vendor has the right to sell the property in dispute, and is, or is not, Plaintiff rightfully entitled to get her name recorded in the Collectorate, and to ascertain who is the person in possession of the property in dispute. The decision thereupon is this:—This case was instituted to effect the record of names in place of others to be expunged. The vendor admits the sale, and the opposing Defendant also does not deny the fact of the right of the vendor, but he declares that the vendor is in possession, [49] which is not established, because, by the testimony of witnesses on the part of the female Plaintiff, her possession is proved. From copies of bills of sale, and roobakaree of mutations, and documents filed by the Plaintiff, it is evident that Baboo Run Bahadoor Singh, and Baboo Odey Purtaub Singh, and the opposing Defendant, have sold their mouzahs, mentioned in the deed of partition, in proportion of shares mentioned in the papers aforesaid, and the mutation of names has been effected, and not one of them has protested against it. Under these circumstances, there appears no ground why a sale of the property in dispute should not be effected. The passage, that in case of necessity, for expenses and payment of revenue, and debt of Malajuns, etc., and by reason of their having no cash with themselves, the four brothers are competent, in the best way they are able, to raise money by sale absolutely, and by bybil-wuffa, and mortgage, and by leasing out and by usufructuary peshgee, etc., of the villages of their own shares, is mentioned in the deed of partition, dated the 6th of Kartick, 1252, Fuslee; and is, in my opinion, no bar to the sale made, but, on the contrary, the clause fortifies the sale. If such were not the case, then how did these people sell as well as the opposing Defendant? If this sentence, namely, ‘If sale is made without necessity, it is void, and in case of necessity, it should be incumbent to prove the validity of the same,’ were in the deed of partition: in that case there may have been something. Such, however, is not the case, nor is the word ‘necessity’ used in the sale of those vendors. The bare allegation of the witnesses of the Defendant, in respect of possession of the vendor, is not sufficient in [50] this case. His Thicadars have also deposed to the possession of the vendee. Under these circumstances it is ordered, that this case be decreed the Plaintiff.”

The hearing of the appeal took place before the Judges of that Court, consisting of Messrs. Trevor, Samuells, and Money, on the 18th of April, 1857, when the Court decreed as follows:—“On the merits it was argued by the Appellant, that the clause of the deed of partition was restrictive, and that the Plaintiff’s father was only empowered to sell under circumstances of urgent necessity, which he was bound to prove. The sale, moreover, it was contended, was manifestly fictitious, no proof of the payment of the consideration-money, which the deed alleged, having been given, and the whole circumstances of the case showing the transfer of the property to have been merely nominal. For the Respondent, it was contended, that these were not pleas which the Appellant, who had no immediate interest in the property, was competent to raise; that the Plaintiff’s suit was merely for registration, to which she was entitled, on the acknowledgment of the transfer by the vendor, and proof of possession of the estate, which, it was maintained, she had given; that she had not sued to establish her title, and that under the provisions of the registration law, Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1800, it was unnecessary for her to do so. We entertain no doubt of the Defendant’s competence to raise the question of the bona fides of the sale in this action. His rights as the nearest, or one of the nearest heirs who can [51] take absolutely after the death of Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, are clearly attacked by the sale, and the recognition of her title as purchaser and absolute proprietor under the purchase, which the Plaintiff seeks to obtain, would altogether destroy the reversionary interest which, in the absence of a sale, the Defendant possesses in the property. We are not of opinion, that the terms of the deed of partition are not restrictive to the extent of compelling the shareholder, who may part with his share, to prove the necessity under which he acted. On the contrary, while recognizing the abstract impropriety of parting with ancestral property, except under the pressure of necessity, the deed clearly constitutes each shareholder the judge of that necessity in his own particular case; and the particular clause quoted has, we think, been inserted to obviate any objection which might otherwise have arisen under the Mithila law, to sales effected by any one of the shareholders without the consent of his brethren. But, we see no evidence in the case before us, that any bona fide sale has taken place; nor do we consider that the Plaintiff has established the material averments on this head, which her plaint contains. Her averments are, that her father, being in want of money, sold to her the whole of his landed property for the sum of Rs. 75,501, and put the Plaintiff in possession on receiving the full amount of the consideration money. Now, no evidence as to the payment of this large sum is tendered. Only one witness to the deed of sale is examined, and he expressly says, that no consideration passed in his presence when the deed was executed. It is not even suggested from what source the daughter of the vendor, who is represented as being himself in want [52] of money, could have obtained the necessary funds, nor is any proof furnished that the vendor was in want. The evidence as to the Plaintiff's possession of the property goes merely to show that notice of the transfer was given to the tenants, and that they paid their rents in to her account; but this is quite consistent with the supposition of the transfer being a benamsee one, and it is not shown that the money thus received was applied separately for the daughter's benefit, or indeed that she had any establishment distinct from that of her father. Under these circumstances, we cannot but regard the sale to the Plaintiff, and her possession under that sale, as alike fictitious, and we accordingly reverse the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen, and decree the appeal with costs."

The present appeal was from this decree.

As the Respondents did not appear, the case was heard ex parte.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant. At the time of the alienation, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh was separate from his brothers, having, under the deed of partition of the family property, held the mouzabs afterwards sold by him to the Appellant, his daughter, as his own separate and divided share; and, therefore, he was competent by Hindoo law, to make sale or gift of the mouzabs, as his own absolute and exclusive property; and the Appellant's name, as proprietor, ought to have been registered by the Collector, pursuant to Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1800, sec. 21, as the rights of succession are not changed by mutation of names on the registry. With respect to the title to [53] the mouzabs, on the death of the Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, intestate and without male issue, the Appellant, as his daughter, and not his nephews, would have succeeded to the mouzabs as his heir-at-law according to Hindoo law, supposing that the sale of them had not been made. Even if Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh and his brothers and nephews had remained members of a joint and undivided Hindoo family, which was not the case, and that no partition of their family property had taken place, he, having no male issue, would have been competent, according to Hindoo law and custom, to alienate his own undivided share. It cannot be maintained, therefore, that the provisions of the Ikrarnamah executed by the brothers, limited or restricted the power of Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh, as a divided member of a Hindoo family, to alienate any portion of the separate share vested in him under the partition and division of the family property effected by himself and brothers. Lastly, we submit that the ground on which the suit was decided against the Appellant in the Sudder Court was not open between the parties, having regard to the issues recorded by the Zillah Judge under cl. 3, sec. 10, Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1814.

The Lord Justice Turner.—Their Lordships have fully considered this case. They do not think it would be right for them to order this deed to be put upon the register in any mode that would give a colour of the opinion of their Lordships as to the validity of the deed, considered without reference to the clauses contained in the partition deed; but, with reference to the clauses in the partition deed, their Lordships agree with [54] the Zillah and the Sudder Courts in the opinion, that those clauses did not prevent Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh from alienating the property in any mode he might think fit.

Their Lordships cannot agree with the decision of the Zillah Court, which puts the case upon the footing of a purchase, and registration as a purchase, nor can they agree with the conclusion of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, which Court seems to have entered into a matter not very distinctly in issue in the suit, and as to which there had been no points recorded.

It appears, therefore, to their Lordships, that the proper course to take in this case is, to reverse the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and also the decree of the Zillah Court, and to declare, that by the clauses contained in the deed of partition, Baboo Loll Bahadoor Singh was entitled to alienate the property in question, and that the Appellant is entitled to have her name put upon the register, but to provide that the order is to be without prejudice to any other question of title or right that may be raised against the Appellant, or her representatives, in any other suit, or proceeding.

Their Lordships do not think this a case to give any costs.

[55] RAJAH NURSING DEB,—Appellant; ROY KOYLASNATH and Others.—Respondents * [June 25, 1862].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat at Calcutta.

The Zemindar in possession by a sunnud conveyed to A., as the head of a branch of the grantor's family, an estate, part of the Zemindary, in lieu of maintenance to which A. was entitled out of the Zemindary; "to hold and enjoy possession, from generation to generation," subject to an allowance for maintenance to a certain class of the family described as "Lowahokans and Motalokans" (dependants and relations). A.'s heir afterwards alienated a part of the estate for a valuable consideration. Held, first, in the absence of evidence of any class of persons answering the description of "Lowahokans and Motalokans" (which might have created a trust), that A. took an absolute estate in the lands assigned to him; and Secondly, that the limitation in the sunnud "from generation to generation" did not create such an estate as to operate as a bar to alienation by sale.

The question is this appeal turned upon the construction of a sunnud, in the nature of a deed of a maintenance, dated the 8th of August, 1799, by which certain villages and lands were granted by Chytun Singh, the Rajah in possession, to Joy Singh Deb, to hold "possession, of the villages, and lands, etc., and support his Lowahokans and Motalokans (dependants and relations) from generation to generation," and the point raised was, whether Joy Singh Deb had any power under this deed to alienate the property beyond the term of his own life; or whether, notwithstanding his alienation, the villages and lands did not vest in his descendants "from generation to generation," they maintaining such [56] dependants and relations out of profits of the estate so conveyed to the grantee.

The circumstances under which the deed was executed were as follow:—

The villages and lands were formerly part of the Raj of Bissenpore, of which the grantor, Chytun Singh, and his cousin, Radha Damoodhur Singh (descendants of a common ancestor named Gopaul Singh, the former Zemindar), were in the year 1771 jointly possessed.

Some time after Gopaul Singh's death, Chytun Singh instituted a suit against Radha Damoodhur Singh, for the purpose of having it declared that, in accordance with a custom which prevailed in the family, Chytun Singh, as nearest heir, was alone entitled to the Zemindary. This claim was recognized by the Governor-General and the Council (who at that time had jurisdiction on appeal), and who, by their order dated the 14th of April, 1780, so decreed; but they also, by a subsequent order dated the 21st of September, 1781, assigned one-half share of what is called Butter-jant land to Radha Damoodhur Singh for his maintenance.

Radha Damoodhur Singh died, leaving his son, Bahadoor Singh, his heir, who instituted a suit claiming a share in the Zemindary, which, on the 22nd of January, 1795, resulted in a decision of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, confirming the order of the Governor-General, dated the 14th of April, 1780, the Court declaring that Bahadoor Singh and his connections were entitled to maintenance at Chytun Singh's hands, for which, if kept back, it was competent for him to maintain a suit to recover. Bahadoor Singh subsequently died, leaving his son and heir, Joy Singh Deb, and also leaving a half-brother of Joy Singh, named Rughoonath Singh; and the provision for [57] maintenance of Joy Singh and his branch of the family not being regarded by Chytun Singh, a suit was instituted, and Joy Singh Deb obtained a decree against Chytun Singh, which decree fixed the yearly maintenance to be paid by him to Joy Singh Deb, and the other heirs and descendants of Radha Damoodhur Singh, at Rs. 4200.

Instead, however, of allowing this sum to remain as a permanent charge, Chytun Singh determined to appropriate specific villages and lands; and he assigned Rs. 1500, as the provision for the maintenance of Rughoonath Singh and the branch of the family of which he was the head; and, to secure it, Chytun Singh, by a sunnud, assigned to Rughoonath Singh certain lands in lieu of the Rs. 1500. In like manner, in order to provide permanently for the maintenance of Joy Singh Deb, and the branch of the family of which he was the head, and who were entitled to maintenance under the decree, Chytun Singh, on the 13th of Sraban, 1206 B. S. (1799), assigned to Joy Singh Deb the villages and lands which were the subject of the present suit, and the annual income from which was about Rs. 2000.

The sunnud by which these villages were assigned was in the following terms:—
 "To the seat of all happiness, my grandson, Sree Sree Rajah Joy Singh Deb, I do hereby execute a 'sunnud Khooro Poos' (deed of maintenance), to the following effect:—The Zemindary of Pergunnah Bistopore, etc., were jointly of the late Rajah Radha Damoodhur Singh, your grandfather, and of me. Afterwards, disputes having arisen with the late Rajah Radha Damoodhur Singh, your grandfather, and the late Rajah Bahadoor Singh Deb, your father, regarding the Zemindary, the Zemindary of the whole Pergunnah [58] aforesaid has been decreed to me; but, in the said decree, it is ordered that I shall have to grant maintenance out of the Zemindary to the 'Lowahokans,'—i.e. members of the family of Rajah Damoodhur Singh, and to the 'Motalokans'—i.e., the dependants of Rajah Bahadoor Singh. For this, according to the order of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, it being necessary to allow maintenance to those 'Lowahokans' and 'Motalokans' from the Zemindary of the Pergunnah aforesaid, the sum of Rs. 3500 is fixed. Out of this, to Sree Sree Rughoonath Singh and others, agreeably to separate Ismuveesee (list), a separate sunnud of this kind has been granted for 1500 beegahs of land, in lieu of Rs. 1500. Deducting that in lieu of Rs. 2000 for your maintenance, I do give unto you the entire mouzahs and lands, as per schedule of allotment at foot. Holding and possessing the mouzahs and lands, etc., and giving maintenance to the 'Lowahokans' and 'Motalokans' on your side, continue to hold and enjoy possession at ease, uninterruptedly, from generation to generation. Besides this, whoever has got a decree for the Dewutter shall hold and keep in possession separately of it."

Joy Singh Deb obtained possession of the lands mentioned in the sunnud, and continued in possession of them, and out of the income derived therefrom maintained his family down to the year 1832, when, in payment of certain debts and a judgment, he executed a deed of conveyance, by way of absolute sale of the lands to one of the Respondents, named Gunga Narain Roy, who was thereupon put in possession.

Joy Singh Deb died in the year 1846, leaving the Appellant's father, Cheyt Singh, his heir and legal representative; Cheyt Singh claimed the villages and lands, on the ground that they were not alienable; and [59] ultimately, on the 8th of October, 1852, he filed a plaint in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of the Zillah Court of West Burdwan, against Gunga Narain and Koylashnath Roy, then in possession, praying to be put in possession of the lands, alleging that the lands assigned by Chytun Singh agreeably to the order of the Court for the maintenance of the relations and dependants, were inalienable, and could not be transferred by sale or gift.

Gunga Narain Roy and Koylashnath Roy by their joint answer set up the sale by Joy Singh Deb to Gunga Narain Roy as an absolute and valid sale, and also pleaded the Ben. Reg. of limitations, sec. 14, and III. of 1793, on the ground that there had been more than twenty years' possession of the land in question under Gunga Narain Roy before the institution of the suit.

The cause came on for hearing before the Principal Sudder Ameen (Sree Gobind Chunder Bidyarutho), upon the 24th of November, 1856, who decreed in favour of the Appellant (who had in the meantime succeeded his father), holding that Joy Singh Deb could not alienate any part of the lands to the injury of the next heirs in reversion, or charge, except so far as his own life interest extended; and, further, holding that the law of limitation did not affect the Appellant's claim, inasmuch as he had brought his suit within six years from the date of the death of Joy Singh Deb, on which date he considered his right of action first accrued.

The Respondents appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, at Calcutta; and the hearing of the appeal took place before Messrs. Raikes, Patton, and Torrens, three of the Judges of that Court. These Judges pro-[60]-nounced their decree on the 29th of April, 1858, reversing the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen, and dismissing the suit of the Appellant. The decree was as follows: "In order to determine the point of limitation raised in this case, it is necessary first to ascertain and decide whether the Lower Court has rightly maintained the inalienable nature of the grant, as pleaded by the Plaintiff; as, if the contrary be established, we consider both the evidence on record and the judgment of the Lower Court on the long possession of Gunga Narain Roy under the registered Kubala of 1239, fully entitle the Defendants to demand the dismissal of this claim as barred by lapse of time, without the Court expressing any further opinion as to the technical informality of the deed under which that possession was originally required. We are told that the Zemindary of Bissenpore was held jointly at one time by Chytun Singh and his younger brother, but that, disputes occurring, Chytun Singh sued to hold the estate singly, in accordance with family custom, and his claim was conceded, with the proviso that he should provide for the maintenance of his younger brother. An action was then commenced by Bahadoor Singh for their maintenance, and the Court decreed that it should be fixed at Rs. 4200, yearly. When this decree was passed it would appear that the recipients were Joy Singh Deb and Rughoonath Singh, the sons of Bahadoor Singh; and on the 13th Sawun, 1106 B. S., Chytun Singh executed a sunnud, assigning to Joy Singh Deb certain lands and villages in lieu of the maintenance allowance fixed by the decree. This sunnud recites that a separate assignment had been made to Rughoonath Singh, and others, in discharge of the same decree, at the computed [61] value of Rs. 4500, yearly income, and that the grant to Joy Singh Deb was for the yearly value of Rs. 2000. Thus we see that in lieu of the yearly allowance, fixed by the Court at Rs. 4200, for the maintenance of Bahadoor Singh's relations and dependants, lands and villages were assigned by Chytun Singh, and the computed value of the allowance reduced by the recipients to Rs. 3500 per annum. This further purport of the deed has been held by the Lower Court to have conveyed to Joy Singh Deb the lands mentioned therein as a maintenance for himself and family, to be enjoyed by them generation after generation, and to be inalienable by any member of the family. The question which has been raised and argued before us is whether the grant purports to be a grant to the family generally, or to Joy Singh Deb individually leaving him to provide for their maintenance from the proceeds of the property, and releasing Chytun Singh from all responsibility on that account. We have no hesitation in holding that this last is the proper interpretation to put upon the deed. The deed was without doubt a compromise under the decree, and, in full discharge of it, Joy Singh Deb, as head and representative of his branch of the family, was the recipient of the allowance settled upon them by the decree, and in the assignment made in full discharge of that award his name alone is mentioned; and while there is no doubt the grant was intended to do for the family all that the decree provided for, there is none also that the grantor must have taken upon himself all responsibility on that score. The wording of the deed will, it is admitted, bear this interpretation, though it is also argued that it may be construed as meaning that Joy Singh Deb's relations and dependants will derive their mainte-[62]-nance generation after generation from the lands and mouzahs of the grant. There is, however, no specific proviso against alienation, and the most reasonable inference to be drawn from the whole transaction, and one consistent with the general terms of the deed is, that Joy Singh Deb intended it as in full discharge of the decree, and took upon himself the responsibility of providing for his own dependants. That such a responsibility should fall on the head of the family is natural, and that the party undertaking it should consider the acquisition of landed property the best mode of ensuring to himself the means of so providing for his relations, accounts in an intelligible way for the grant being created for his benefit. After the lapse of so many years, and after ascertaining from the record before us that Joy Singh Deb did not hesitate to meet this assignment as conveying to him absolute right over the property, it would require very cogent evidence to induce the Court to supersede his acts, on the understanding that he had wilfully or inadvertently misconstrued the terms on which the assignment had been made in his favour. No sort of evidence has, however, been submitted to us in proof of a restrictive power having been vested in Joy Singh Deb, or that other members of his family had ever opposed him in dealing with the property. Believing this sunnud to have conveyed to him the power of sale, etc., we see no reason to doubt either the fact of the particular sale pleaded by the Appellant, or the possession under it by Gunga Narain Roy and the Appellant for more than twelve years before institution of this suit. The present claim, then, cannot be one which only arose after the demise of Joy Singh Deb. It brings in question a registered deed which has never been disputed since its execution to the present time, and under which possession had continued for upwards of twelve years. The suit is manifestly barred by the law of limitation, and reversing the judgment of the Lower Court we decree the costs of the suit to the Appellant."

The appeal was from this decree.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. W. Field, for the Appellant; and Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Respondents.

On the part of the Appellant it was contended, that the only question involved was, whether by the terms of the sunnud of 1795, Joy Singh Deb had power to alienate the mouzals as against his rights. W. H. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 9, and whose right of possession, it was insisted, with reference to the Law of limitation of suits, only accrued on Joy Singh Deb's death.

The Respondents' case was, first, that the sunnud conveyed an absolute estate of inheritance to Joy Singh Deb, without any restriction upon the general power of alienation given by the law of Bengal to a Hindoo father in possession of an estate of inheritance: that even if there had been such limitation, it would have been inoperative, as being contrary to the spirit and policy of the Hindoo Law as administered in Bengal: that the six mouzals being a portion only of the lands granted by the sunnud, were sold and conveyed to Gunga Narain Roy absolutely by Joy Singh Deb for a valuable consideration. Secondly, that it did not appear that there were at the time when the suit was brought any [64] persons in existence who could properly come within the designation or description of "Lowahokans," or "Motalokans," on the side of the late Rajah Joy Singh Deb in the sunnud mentioned, or if there were, that their claim was against the heirs of Joy Singh Deb, or the estate left by him, and not against the Respondents in respect of the mouzals purchased by Gunga Narain Roy.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Their Lordships, in this case, agree with the Counsel for the Appellant, that the question of the construction of the instrument of 1795 was, if not the only question, at least, that alone which it is necessary for their Lordships to decide.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that the reference to maintenance was merely for the purpose of showing what we should call the consideration for the instrument, or the transaction.

The question is not, whether the maintenance of the two classes of persons here described was, or was not, the condition of the grant so as to render it void, or voidable, in the event of the maintenance not being afforded—a point upon which their Lordships give no opinion—nor is it a question before us whether it is what English lawyers would call a trust, or a charge, affecting the lands in favour of the class be maintained. Upon that point also, we think it unnecessary to give an opinion. The question is, whether land dedicated permanently to maintenance of a particular class, is to remain inalienable in the hands of the person to whom the grant was made, and his descendants, as long as there should be descendants of his, for ever, so as to prevent a sale and to render it perpetually inalienable. Whether that be the law [65] which governs landed property of this description, their Lordships also do not mean to intimate any opinion, but assuming for the sake of the argument, that it can be, it does not appear to their Lordships that this is a case of that description. They do not collect from the instrument an intention that from son to son, it should remain in the family: with the head of the family for the time being, in order to enable him to afford the maintenance.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that giving the land to a member of the family to whom it was given, had the same effect, and was an act of the same character as giving a sum of money to him absolutely, in lieu of any claim for maintenance burdened with the duty upon his part of maintaining those who ought to be maintained. If that had been done, their Lordships are of opinion, that the money would have been absolutely the property of the person to whom it was given, and that would have well discharged the duty incumbent upon the person who should have paid the same.

We think, that the words at the end of the instrument, rightly construed, render this construction sufficiently certain: for the words are "continue to hold and enjoy possession to us uninterruptedly from generation to generation." Every part of that portion of the deed appears to their Lordships to refer to the enjoyment of the land, and not the identity, or the persons, or the continuance of the persons of those who were to be maintained.

Their Lordships are of opinion, therefore, that the judgment immediately under appeal is right; that the Sudder Dewanny Court rightly differed from the Zillah Court, and that the appeal must be accordingly dismissed with costs.

[66] NARAGUNTY LUTCHMEEDAVAMAH.—Appellant; VENGAMA NAIDOO.—Respondent * [Dec. 3 and 4, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

The nature of the Polliam tenure in Madras investigated.

A Polliam is ancestral estate of the nature of a Raj; and although it may belong to an undivided family, yet it is not subject to partition. It can be held by only one member of the family, who is styled the Polligar. The other members of the family are entitled to maintenance out of the Polliam [9 Moo. Ind. App. 86]

The succession to the Naragunty Polliam, being ancestral estate, held to vest in the nearest undivided male cousin of the Polligar last seized, who died without issue male, in preference to his widow.

The presumption is, that a Hindoo-family remains undivided: the onus is upon a party claiming, as upon a partition, to prove division of the joint estate.

In 1847, A. presented a petition to the Civil Court of Chittoor for liberty to sue in forma pauperis for recovery of a Polliam. The Court was of opinion that, under Mad. Reg. IV. of 1831, A. could not be permitted to sue without obtaining the authority of the Government. In May, 1848, A. obtained the sanction of the Government, and in October of that year he presented a petition for leave to sue in forma pauperis, and, at the same time, lodged his plaint. On the 13th of November, 1848, the plaint and petition were ordered by the Court to be filed. The order for service of the petition and plaint requiring the Defendant to show cause why A. should not be allowed to sue in forma pauperis was not served until August, 1849. No cause was shown, and the proceedings stood in that position on the 16th of September, 1849, when twelve years (the time limited by Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. 18 cl. 4), from the 16th of September, 1837, when the cause of action accrued, had expired. The plaint was by a subsequent order of the Court filed on the 1st of March, 1850. Held:

First, that the proceedings of the Civil Court of Chittoor, on the 13th of November, 1848, were by Mad. Reg. VII. of 1818, sec. 5, irregular, as the course there directed was to serve the petition and plaint on the party proceeded against, to show cause within a certain time why the Plaintiff should not be allowed to sue in forma pauperis [9 Moo. Ind. App. 95].

Secondly, that the suit was not barred by Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. 18, cl. 4, as A. had preferred his claim within the prescribed period to a Court of competent jurisdiction, and had been prevented from commencing his suit in proper time by the irregular proceedings of the Court [9 Moo. Ind. App. 95].

The native Courts in India, in receiving evidence, do not proceed according to the strict technical rules adopted in England. According to the practice there, a copy of a public document, authenticated by the signature of the proper Officer, is received as prima facie evidence, subject to further inquiry, if it is disputed [9 Moo. Ind. App. 90].

It is not the practice of the Judicial Committee to advise the reversal of a decision of the Court below, merely on the effect of the evidence or the credit due to witnesses, as the Judges in India have better means of determining questions of fact than the appellate Court [9 Moo. Ind. App. 87].

In this case, the suit was brought in the Zillah Court of Chittoor against the Appellant by Kooppy [67] Naidoo, the father of the present Respondent, to recover from the Appellant the Polliam of Naraguntty, with mesne profits.

The principal question involved in the suit was with respect to the right of succession to the Naraguntty Polliam: whether in an undivided family, the Polliigar last seized dying without issue male, the widow, or the nearest male cousin of the deceased Polliigar, was entitled to succeed to the Polliam.

The facts were these:—

The Naraguntty Polliam was an ancestral estate, of which Anantappa Naidoo was the original Polliigar. He was succeeded by his elder son, Vengama Naidoo, the second Polliigar, whose son, Venkatachellapathy died before him, leaving two sons, Venkatappa Naidoo and Anantappa Naidoo, both infants, the estate remaining undivided. It appeared, that the next Polliigar was Krishnappah, or Krishnama Naidoo, younger brother of Vengama Naidoo, the paternal grand-[68]-father of the first Plaintiff; and that he was succeeded by his son, the first Plaintiff's father, Vengama Naidoo, and that the Polliam remained undivided. On his death, as the Plaintiff and his brothers were very young, and as Venkatappa Naidoo and Anantappa Naidoo were men of influence, and as the two branches of the family lived in harmony, Venkatappa Naidoo became Polliigar of the estate, which continued undivided. Venkatappa Naidoo having no son, adopted his nephew, Vengama Naidoo, son of his brother, Anantappa Naidoo, and died shortly after, but Vengama being too young at the time, his natural father, Anantappa Naidoo succeeded to the Polliam. Vengama Naidoo, on his father's death, succeeded him as Polliigar, and having no sons, he adopted his sister's son, Venkatappa Naidoo. In the year 1820, the Polliam was taken under management of the Government, pending the liquidation of the Polliigar's debts, but in the year 1825, the Polliam was discharged from the attachment, and restored to Vengama Naidoo. Whilst the Polliam was under attachment, allowances were made by the Government to the Polliigar, Vengama Naidoo, who thereout allowed Kooppy Naidoo, the Respondent's father, as a member of the undivided family, a portion for his expenses. On the 8th of December, 1828, Vengama Naidoo died, whereupon two claimants asserted their right to the Polliam, Venkatappa Naidoo, as the adopted son of Vengama Naidoo, and Kooppy Naidoo, the Respondent's father, under a Kararnamah, dated the 8th September, 1825, by which he alleged he was appointed his successor, and as next heir of an undivided family.

Koopy Naidoo had two elder brothers, Kristnappa Naidoo and Moodoo [69] Kristnana Naidoo; but they, by two Kararnamahs, or transfer deeds, dated respectively the 19th of January, and 1st of July, 1831, assigned all their rights in the Polliam to their brother, Kcoopy Naidoo.

On the 6th of December, 1831, Koopy Naidoo, commenced a suit in the then Central Provincial Court against Venkatappa Naidoo and others, to obtain possession of the Polliam, claiming as the next heir of the undivided family on the death of Vengama Naidoo without male issue, and disputing the validity of the adoption by the latter of Venkatappa Naidoo. By a decree of the Central Provincial Court, dated the 31st of December, 1836, that Court after admitting evidence of the relationship and the common descent of Vengama Naidoo and the Plaintiff from Anantappa Naidoo, the root of the family, and that the Plaintiff's grandfather and father had been in possession of the Naragunty Polliam held, that Vengama Naidoo had legally adopted Venkatappa Naidoo the late Polligar, as his son, and pronounced him to be the heir to the Polliam of Naragunty. In consequence of this decision, Venkatappa Naidoo remained in possession as Polligar until the 16th of September, 1837, when he died without male issue, leaving the Appellant, his widow, him surviving, who took possession of the Polliam, claiming it as his heir. The possession of Venkattappa Naidoo was not acquiesced in by Koopy Naidoo; but the latter omitted to prosecute his appeal from the decree of the 31st of December, 1836, for want, as it was alleged, of means. On the 3rd of September, 1838, Koopy Naidoo made an application to the Sudder Adawlut for the admission of an appeal in forma pauperis from the decree of the Central Provincial Court [70] of 1836, stating the death of the Appellant's husband without male issue subsequent to the decree. On the 22nd of October, 1838, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut passed an order, refusing the admission of such appeal, the period for appealing having long expired, and stating that any new ground of action by the Petitioner for the recovery of the estate could only be asserted by a new suit. Accordingly, Koopy Naidoo, in the year 1847, presented a petition to the Civil Court of Chittoor, praying for leave to institute a suit in the Court for the recovery of the Polliam; but the Court, in December of that year, held, that no such order could be given unless he produced the authority of the Government to that Court, directing it to entertain the suit. In the meanwhile the first Plaintiff's elder brothers, Krishnappa Naidoo, and Moodoo Kristnama Naidoo having died, Koopy Naidoo, the Respondent's father, became the nearest heir of Vengama Naidoo, and on the 13th of May, 1848, he presented a petition to the Governor of Madras for an order permitting him to establish his right to the Polliam, by means of a regular suit, under the provisions of Mad. Reg. IV. of 1831; and on the 30th of May, 1848, an order was made by the Government permitting him to prosecute such claim in the Courts.

Accordingly, on the 5th of October, 1848, a petition was filed in the Civil Court of Chittoor by Koopy Naidoo and the Respondent, his son, for leave to file a plaint, in forma pauperis, against the Appellant, which leave was granted on the 13th of November, 1848, though the order for service of the petition and plaint on the Appellant was not made by the Court until the 31st of July, 1849. The plaint [71] was by an order of the Court filed on the 1st of March, 1850, and set forth the above genealogy of the Plaintiffs, alleging that the Plaintiffs and the Defendant's husband were members of an undivided Hindoo family, tracing their descent from the original Polligar, Anantappa Naidoo, it also stated that the Polligars were taken sometimes from the elder branch and sometimes from the younger branch of the family, and that from the latter branch the Plaintiffs were descended. That the Polligars whilst in possession, made allowances to the members of the other branch: and, particularly, that the Polligar, Vengama Naidoo, had made allowance to the first Plaintiff, and by a deed had named him his successor. That on the death of Vengama Naidoo, the Defendant's husband, Venkatappa Naidoo, claimed to be Polligar, as his adopted son: and after stating the proceedings in the original suit of 1831, the appeal therein, and the permission from the Government to sue, it alleged that the Defendant's husband having died without male issue, she had no legitimate title to the Polliam, which had been his undivided estate. That the first Plaintiff was entitled to the Polliam, as next heir and successor of the undivided family, and after stating the annual net profit at Rs. 10,000, or thereabouts, the Plaintiffs claimed mesne profits from the 22nd of October, 1838, to the date of the plaint, at the above rate, amounting to Rs. 92,920; and prayed that the above sum, and the Polliam of Naraguntty, might be awarded to them, as against the Defendant.

The Defendant by her answer alleged, that her husband and his ancestors were Polligars of Naraguntty, but not the first Plaintiff's father or grandfather, who she insisted had no manner of title thereto. That her [72] husband having died without male issue, she, under the Hindoo law as his chief heiress, was entitled to succeed to the Polliam, which the Government had continued to her. That the suit of 1831, before the Central Provincial Court, having been decided against the Plaintiff, the present suit was barred by sections 9 and 10, of Mad. Reg. II., of 1802. That the suit was further barred by clause 4, section 18, of the same Regulation. That it was unknown whether any relationship existed between the ancestors of the Plaintiffs and those of the Defendant's husband; and even if any had existed, that it might have become extinct in course of time, and she finally insisted that the Plaintiffs and her late husband, were not members of an undivided family.

Both parties entered into evidence. On the part of the Plaintiffs, among other documents, a copy of a genealogical table of the Naraguntty family, dated Fusly 1211 (A.D. 1802) sent by Anantappa Naidoo to the East India Company, procured from the records of the Collector of Chittoor, was filed. This document was as follows: "Anantappa Naidoo, Polligar of Naraguntty, had two sons, viz. Vengama Naidoo and Krishnappa Naidoo, both of whom held the Polliam. The former had a son named Vencatachellapaty Naidoo, who had two sons, Venkatappa Naidoo and Anantappa Naidoo. Vencatachellapaty Naidoo died without ever holding the Polliam, and his son, Venkatappa Naidoo, succeeded to it, but having had no issue adopted his brother's son, Vengama Naidoo. I, Anantappa Naidoo, now hold the Polliam. The said Krishnappa Naidoo's son, Vengama Naidoo, was Polligar, and his sons are Krishnappa Naidoo, Mooddoo Krishnappa Naidoo, and Kooppy Naidoo." The Record Keeper of the Collector's cutcherry, was [73] called by the Court to prove the record and copy of this genealogical tree, which it appeared was filed with similar lists of families of other Polligars in the Collector's office. Other documents, consisting of a copy of an arzee from Vengama Naidoo, the Polligar of Naraguntty, to the Principal Collector of North Arcot, dated the 17th of November, 1823, stating that he had no concern with Defendant's husband, who had left his protection. A Mahzarnamah executed by the Polligars in the Chittoor Talook to the East India Company, dated the 1st of April, 1828, giving therein the names of the possessors of the Naraguntty Polliam for the last century and a half, and showing both branches of the family to be entitled; a Mahzarnamah executed by the Enamdars, Kurnums and public officers attached to Naraguntty Polliam to the same effect; a Kararnamah executed to Kooppy Naidoo, the Respondent's father, by his elder brother, Kristnappa Naidoo, on the 1st of July, 1831, in which the latter resigned to the former his claim on Naraguntty Polliam; a Kararnamah executed by his other brother, Mooddoo Kristnamah Naidoo, on the 19th of January, 1831, to the same effect. They also examined witnesses to prove the relationship of the families; that the family was undivided, and the value of the annual profits. Witnesses were also examined by the Defendant, some to prove their ignorance of the relationship; and others, to prove the value of the annual profits.

The following question was propounded by the Court to the Pundits of the Sudder Adawlut:—"This Polliam, the ancestral property of a family said to be undivided, has descended to an adopted son K, and, on his death without male issue, is taken possession of [74] by his Widow L. The Polliam is now claimed by H and J, the cousins of I, the adoptive father of K, as their inheritance. Is such claim valid? or is L, the widow of the adopted son K, who died without male issue, entitled to succeed to the Polliam?"

The Pundits answered as follows:—"The Hindoo law books, 'Vijnyaneswara,' etc., declare, that all the members of an undivided family have a joint right in their ancestral property, although only one of them, being capable, continues in possession thereof. I, who had no issue, was not justified in adopting K, a stranger, as son, to the exclusion of his undivided cousins H and J; but, as he adopted him, he (K) became a member of the said undivided family, and the said H and J, being his undivided cousins, still retain their joint right in the ancestral property of the family. It is only when a family is divided that a widow succeeds to the estate of her husband, who died leaving no son; but when the family is undivided, the right of succession rests, not in the widow, but in the undivided cousins. This being the rule of the Hindoo law, H and J, the undivided cousins of I and K, are alone entitled to inherit the ancestral Polliam referred to in the question. L, the widow of K, has no right to succeed to it."

On the 4th of March, 1856, the Judge of the Civil Court of Chittoor, Mr. A. S. Mathison, passed a decree in favour of Respondent's father. This decree was, in substance, as follows:—First, that the decree of the Central Provincial Court in 1831 was no bar, as it appeared by that decree that the first plaintiff then claimed the Polliam, not from the Defendant, but from her husband, on the ground that the adoption of the latter was illegal. But the adoption being con-[75]-firmed, and the first Plaintiff's suit of 1831, dismissed on that ground, the Plaintiff could not be prevented from bringing the present action on the different ground of his claim to succeed to the estate being preferable to that of the widow of the former Defendant, the last Polliar. Second, that the Plaintiffs had proved their descent from the younger son of the founder of the Naragunty family, and that the first Plaintiff was the eldest surviving male member of the younger branch, his elder brothers being dead. Third, that the Plaintiffs were members of the undivided family, with the Polliar, Vengama Naidoo, and his lineal ancestors, the Polliars of Naragunty. Fourth, that the evidence, both oral and documentary, fully proved that the first Plaintiff was the undivided cousin of Vengama Naidoo, a similar conclusion having been come to by the Central Provincial Court, as shown in their decree in the former suit. Fifth, that the first Plaintiff was entitled to succeed on the demise of the Defendant's husband, who died without male issue, in preference to the widow; the answer of the Pundits of the Sudder Court being considered decisive on that point. Sixth, that as to the extent of the income from the Polliam during the past years claimed by Plaintiffs, it was unnecessary to decide, as under the Mad. Reg. IV. of 1831, a suit could only be entertained in the Court under the authority of the Government, dated the 30th of May 1848, allowing the first Plaintiff to prosecute his claim in the established Courts; and as the Defendants had been up, to that time, in possession given to her by Government, she could not be called upon to refund any past profits; and lastly, the Court admitted the right of the first Plaintiff to the ancestral estate, and adjudged [76] the Defendant to deliver the Polliam over to him, but disallowed the claim for past profits, and decreed the Defendant to pay a proportion of the costs of the suit.

An appeal from this decree was interposed to the Sudder Adawlut. In the petition of appeal the Appellant took four specific grounds of objection to the decree appealed from; first, that the plaintiffs had no new ground of action in the present suit; secondly, that they were barred by the regulation of Limitations, Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, secs. 9 and 10, and also by cl. 4, sec. 18 of that Regulation; thirdly, that the first Plaintiff failed to prove his claim as an undivided cousin of the late Vengama Naidoo; and lastly, that he was not entitled by the Hindoo law to succeed to the Polliam in preference to the Appellant. The petition also entered into a minute objection to the nature of the evidence of the first Plaintiff being the undivided cousin of the late Vengama Naidoo, and of his relationship; and also to the reception of evidence by the Court below, particularly with respect to the genealogical table; submitting that the original document was not produced, as it ought to have been, but a copy without signature, and evidently not the original document had been improperly admitted, and urged that as the Record keeper deposed that the original was in the Record office, the original ought to have been produced.

On the 5th of March, 1857, the Sudder Adawlut, consisting of Messrs. Anderson and Goodwin, pronounced a decree, affirming the judgment of the Civil Court, and observing on the Appellant's four objections to it in order, as follows:—First objection.—Whether the Plaintiff's suit was not barred by sections 9 and 10, Regulation II. of 1802. That the causes of action in the suit, No. 24, of 1831, [77] and the present suit were entirely different; that the original suit, No. 24, of 1831, was dismissed as the adoption of Defendant's husband was established, while in the present suit the first Plaintiff's cause of action was, that he being nearest male heir in an undivided family, had a preferable claim to that of the Defendant, the sonless widow of the party whose adoption had been so upheld. Second objection. That the first Plaintiff's claim was barred by cl. 4, section 18, Regulation II. of 1802. It was not denied that the Defendant's husband died on the 16th September, 1837, consequently the twelve years had not expired in 1848, the year when the present suit was commenced by the presentation of the pauper plaint, etc. Third objection.—That the first Plaintiff had failed to prove his claim as an undivided cousin of the late Vengama Naidoo; that the decree of 1831, to which both parties referred, showed that the Defendant's husband then tacitly admitted that the first Plaintiff was an undivided collateral cousin, though maintaining that a collateral cousin's claim was inferior to his own, as an adopted son. That the acting Civil Judge of Chittoor was right in stating that the Central Provincial Court came to the conclusion, that the first Plaintiff was the undivided cousin of Vengama Naidoo; that in the present suit the Defendant's denial of the Plaintiff's relationship to the Naraguntty Polligar was by no means so clear and decided as might have been expected if he was not an undivided collateral heir. That a strong prima facie presumption was, therefore, raised in favour of the truth of the Plaintiff's claim, and the Court agreed with the Civil Judge respecting the relationship existing in the Naraguntty family. And, on the fourth and last objection, the Sudder Court decided, that [78] the first Plaintiff was not entitled by the Hindoo law to succeed in preference to the Defendant. That there appeared to be no reason why the Polliam in question should not be considered as an ancestral estate, the succession to which was regulated by Hindoo law. That if, as alleged by the Appellant, "succession in each individual instance is dependent on the will of Government, and as such the widow of the late incumbent is the legal heir to the estate in preference to any distant male relation," the Government would have disposed of the first Plaintiff's claim, and not have referred him for redress to the Civil Court: and lastly they declared that the answer of the Pundits that the right of succession rests, not in the widow, but in the undivided cousin, was in strict accordance with Hindoo law. The appeal was, therefore, rejected by the Court, with costs.

This appeal was from such decree.

The Respondent's father having died since the decree in his favour, his rights descended to the present Respondent, his son and heir, by whom the appeal was revived.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Badeley, for the Appellant.—First.—We submit that the Polliam in dispute is not an ancestral estate, nor were the parties in the suit members of an undivided Hindoo family. The reasons given by the Court below for holding the contrary opinion are insufficient. Much of the Plaintiff's evidence in the Civil Court of Chittoor was inadmissible, particularly the genealogical table, purporting to show the relationship, which is not entitled to any weight, and ought not to have formed the basis of the judgment of that Court, or the Sudder Adawlut on appeal. The latter [79] judgment is most unsatisfactory; it contains not the slightest examination either of the oral or of the documentary evidence adduced in the Court below; and although the objections to the Plaintiff's evidence had been carefully brought before the Sudder Adawlut in the petition of appeal, and much of it was shown to be inadmissible and untrustworthy, there was not the slightest attempt to sift or to deal with it, and the adoption of it in a lump, when parts of which were clearly bad, is sufficient to invalidate the judgment. Again, the view of the Hindoo law which the Sudder Adawlut took in the conclusion of its judgment is wholly at variance with the law as declared by the Pundits and admitted in the original suit of 1831, and even, if taken to be correct, is inapplicable to a state of things like the present suit.

Then, upon the question of limitation of suit, the judgment is clearly erroneous. In the first place, it proceeds upon the mistaken notion that the cause of action in the present suit, was not the same as the one which had been decided in the Central Provincial Court in the year 1836, and consequently, that it was not barred by sects. 9 and 10 of Mad. Reg. II. of 1802: whereas it is clear from the judgment in that suit, that the cause of action there, was substantially the same as here, both suits being to recover the same estate, and brought by the same Plaintiff upon the same alleged title; the only difference being, that the Defendant in the second suit was the widow of the Defendant in the first. But still, as his widow and representative, she only claimed through him. In such a case, it is obvious, that the mere change of parties could make no difference in the merits of the action; and that between the parties then contesting the estate, the judgment in the previous suit of 1831, [80] operated as a direct estoppel; and, as in every action of ejectment the Plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title alone, and not upon the weakness of the Defendant's, the first Plaintiff, in either suit, was bound to establish his title generally, and must be considered to have failed to do so, in the opinion of the Central Provincial Court. The Plaintiff's claim, therefore, could not lawfully be revived in the Civil Court of Chittoor after such an adjudication. As, therefore, the then Plaintiff allowed the whole period for appealing against that adjudication to pass without any attempt to reverse it, he surely must be deemed to have admitted its validity and the insufficiency of his own title. Secondly, it is submitted, that the Sudder Adawlut was wrong in holding that the Plaintiff's claim was not barred by the Regulation of Limitations, cl. 4, sec. 18, Reg. II. of 1802, for his cause of action, if any, commenced when his alleged title accrued; and this, according to his own showing, was upon the death of Vengama Naidoo, in the year 1827 or 1828, more than twenty years before the commencement of the present suit, and, therefore, much longer than the period of twelve years, fixed by that Regulation. Even, therefore, if the suit was commenced within twelve years, as reckoned either from the date of the judgment of the Central Provincial Court in 1836, or from the death of the Appellant's husband, which event seems somewhat uncertain, he could not, when the original suit of 1831 had not been kept up, give a fresh title, or a new cause of action, by merely instituting another suit against a Defendant, whose right to the possession of the estate had been already ascertained by the previous decision. In the third place, it must be observed, that the manner in which the Sudder Court [81] professes to deal with the Plaintiff's proof of his title in the Civil Court of Chittoor is most unsatisfactory, and such as cannot be admitted in any real adjudication upon the merits of that part of the case. The judgment, moreover, is in fact inconsistent with itself, as well as wholly unfair, for it rests upon the decree in the original suit of 1831, and the supposed admission of the Appellant's husband in that suit as destroying the Appellant's case, although it just before declared that the causes of action in that suit, and in the suit then before them were entirely different and that the decree in the suit of 1831, did not bind or affect the Plaintiff in the existing suit, or entitle the Appellant to make use of it against him. But if the cause of action was entirely different, and the Defendant in the second suit was a stranger to the first, it is difficult to see upon what grounds, either of law or equity, the Court could adopt such a principle of decision. If the decree of 1831 and the proceedings in that suit were good against the Appellant, they surely were equally good for her, and if so, she was entitled therewith to estop the Plaintiff. The judgment appealed from upon that ground, stultifies itself.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Respondent.—First.—As to the nature of the Polliam of Naragunty. This peculiar tenure is described in the 5th Report on the affairs of the East India Company, in 1812, pp. 117, 150, 730-1. It is a species of tenure which in olden times was held by petty chieftains, for services rendered to the State and although the Polligars acknowledged the State as paramount, yet [82] they were, in fact, almost independent. Such tenure is recognized by Mad. Reg. IV. of 1831, and a Ghatwal tenure, of a similar nature was upheld by this Court, Raja Lelanund Sing Bahadoor v. The Bengal Government (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 101). It is ancestral and indivisible as in the case of a Raj, and descends to a single heir. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 198, 208, 236; Strange's "Manual of Hindu Law," p. 47; the other members of the family are not co-parceners, but constitute an undivided family, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 199, and are only entitled to maintenance, without partition, Colebrooke's Dig. Vol. II., pp. 532-3, citing Narada. Our case is, that the late Polligar, Venkatappa Naidoo, being a member of an undivided family, the Respondent, as his next undivided cousin, was entitled to succeed to the Polliam, in preference to the Appellant, the widow of the late Polligar. Where, by family custom, a Zemindary has always been held by a chief male heir, the brother takes in preference to the childless widow. The widows of Raja Zorawur Sing v. Koonwur Pertee Sing (4 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 57), Koonwur Bodh Singh v. Seonath Singh (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 97). No doubt can be entertained as to the relationship, or that the Respondent's father was the next heir. His elder brothers, Krishnappa Naidoo and Mooddoo Krishnama Naidoo, had released to him their rights to the Polliam, and moreover they being dead when the present suit was brought, the Respondent's father was, undoubtedly, the next heir. The relationship was but faintly denied by the Appellant in her pleadings. The Respondent's witnesses speak positively from their own knowledge; whereas the Appellant's witnesses [83] merely express their ignorance of any relationship. The genealogical table produced from the Collector's records is decisive upon this question. It purports to have been sent by the then Polligar to the East India Company in the year 1802. The Polliams of Chittoor had been acquired by the East India Company, by treaty, in the year 1801; and the genealogies of the Polligars in that District were presented at the same time with the jumlabundy account, to enable the Government to fix the permanent settlement. The Mahzarnamals, which are documents signed by other Polligars of the District, and by the Enamdars, Kurnims, and other public officers of the Polliam itself, are equally clear in support of the relationship. This kind of evidence is frequently resorted to in order to arrive at facts, which are matters of public notoriety in particular Districts.

Secondly, as to the family constituting an undivided family. Naragunty is an ancestral estate of considerable standing, and the onus of proving division falls on the Appellant. The presumption is in favour of union, as the Hindoo law presumes joint tenancy as the primary state of every Hindoo family, Dhurm Das Pandey v. Mussumat Shama Soondri Dibiah (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 229) Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I, p. 225, Strange's "Manual of Hindu Law," p. 49, but the Appellant has given no evidence of division of the ancestral estate. The genealogical table, and the Mahazanamals prove that the family was undivided. It was distinctly in evidence that the Polligars came from the elder and younger branches, as most capable persons presented themselves, and that the rest of the family lived and messed together, or received allowance from the head [84] of the family. With respect to the right of succession in undivided families, the law, as expounded by the Pundits, in this case is undisputed, namely, that if a member of an undivided family dies without male issue, his undivided cousin is preferred to his widow.

Thirdly, the decree in the original suit in 1831, was no bar to the present suit under Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, secs. 9 and 10. That suit was brought to try the validity of the adoption of the late Polligar. The present suit is entirely different, and brought to try a new question, which only arose at his death, namely, the disputed succession between the widow and the undivided cousin. The issues in the two suits were, therefore, entirely different.

Lastly, the suit is not barred by the Regulation of Limitations. Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. 18, cl. 4, prescribes twelve years as the limit. Here the right accrued on the death of the late Polligar, on the 16th of September, 1837; and the present suit was commenced, at all events, on the 13th of November, 1848. In calculating the period of limitation, the circumstance of the application to sue in forma pauperis must not be lost sight of. Ram Khan v. Bikram Samce (7 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 96), Mahatab Chand v. Mirdad Ali (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 268), Futteh Jan Bebee v. Noorunnissa v. Chowdraine (14 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 175). Macpherson, on Civil Procedure, p. 65, citing Sel. Rep. 20th January, 1838, vol. 7, p. 8; 14th June, 1842, vol. 7, p. 96, lays it down that no effect can be given to a plaint to sue in forma pauperis till authority is given to sue, and that the period of limitation ends on the day on which the plaint is lodged. No irregularity of the Court in the proceedings that took place in respect to filing the plaint, can prejudice the Respondent. If there was any laches, it was the act of [85] the Court, and that fact took the case out of the operation of the Regulation of limitations, as it came within the words of the Regulation, as an exception "for good and sufficient cause, whereby he was precluded from obtaining redress," and has so been decided in respect to the Ben. Regulation of Limitations II. of 1803, sec. 18, cl. 3. Troup and Dyce Sombre v. The East India Company (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 104), Rajah Enayet Hossein v. Sayud Ahmud Reza (ib. 238).

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

Lord Kingsdown (Dec. 5, 1861).—Two questions were argued before us in this case:

First, whether the Plaintiff in the suit had established his claim.

Second, whether his suit was commenced within such a period after the accrual of his title, that the Court was warranted in entertaining his demand.

The subject of dispute is a Polliam called Naragunty, in the District of Chittoor, in the Presidency of Madras.

In order to make the facts of the case and the bearing of the evidence more clear, it may be convenient to state what is the nature of a Polliam.

A Polliam is explained in Wilson's Glossary to be "a tract of country subject to a petty Chieftain." In speaking of Polligars, he describes them as having been originally petty Chieftains occupying usually tracts of hill or forest, subject to pay tribute and service to the paramount State, but seldom paying either, and more or less independent; but as having, at present, since the subjugation of the country by the East India Company, subsided into peaceable landholders. This corresponds with the account read [86] at the Bar from the Report of the Select Committee on the affairs of India, in 1812. A Polliam is in the nature of a Raj, it may belong to an undivided family, but it is not the subject of partition; it can be held by only one member of the family at a time, who is styled the Polligar, the other members of the family being entitled to a maintenance or allowance out of the estate.

The Polliam in dispute, at the time when the East India Company acquired the sovereignty of the District in 1802, was held by a family of the name of Naidoo. Possession of this and of several other Polliams in the same neighbourhood was assumed by the Company, and held by them for several years. They ultimately, however, restored the Polliam, Naragunty, to the Naidoo family, different members of which were at different times Polligars, and in 1837, Venkatappa Naidoo died in possession of the property.

He died without male issue, and the present Appellant, who was his widow, entered into possession, asserting title as heir of her late husband.

The present suit was instituted by the Respondent and by his father, Kooppy Naidoo, who is since dead, for the purpose of recovering possession of the Polliam from the widow.

The case which they made, was that the Polliam was ancestral property, that it belonged to the family of Naidoo; that the family was undivided, and that on the death of the last possessor the right to it vested in the next male heir of the family in preference to the widow, and that they (the Respondent's father and the Respondent) were such male heirs, Kooppy Naidoo being next male heir.

The Pundits consulted by the Court as to the rule of Hindoo Law on the assumption that the Plaintiffs [87] had established their allegations by evidence, were of opinion that they were entitled to succeed. This view was adopted by the Court below, and no objection to the decision upon this point has been urged at our Bar.

Both parties went into evidence as to the facts; and the Zillah Court first, and the Sudder Court afterwards upon appeal, were of opinion, that the Plaintiffs had sufficiently proved their case, and no difference of opinion existed amongst the Judges below.

It is not the habit of their Lordships, unless in very extraordinary cases, to advise the reversal of a decision of the Courts of India merely on the effect of evidence or the credit due to witnesses. The Judges there have usually better means of determining questions of this description than we can have, and when they have all concurred in opinion it must be shown very clearly that they were in error in order to induce us to alter their judgment; but in this case we think that the Courts could have come properly to no other conclusion than that at which they arrived.

The points to be established by the Plaintiffs were that the Polliam of Naragunty was an ancestral property; that it belonged to a family of which they (the Plaintiffs) were members, of which the Respondent's father was the next male heir; and that the family was undivided.

The Appellant by her answer had stated, "that it was unknown whether any relationship existed between the ancestors of the Plaintiff and those of the Respondent's husband, and even if it did exist it might have become extinct in course of time; but that one thing was certain, that the Plaintiff and the Defendant's late husband were not members of an undivided family."

[88] The Plaintiffs, amongst other evidence, produced a document which, if it be genuine and correct, establishes beyond doubt that the Plaintiffs and the Appellant's husband were members of the same family; that the property was ancestral, that it had been enjoyed at different times by members of the elder branch to which the Appellant's husband belonged, and by members of the younger branch to which the Plaintiffs belonged, and that the family at the date of this document was an undivided family; we allude, of course, to the document, professing to be a copy of a paper in the custody of the Collector of Chittoor, sent to his office in Fusly 1211, corresponding with 1802 of our era.

It cannot be doubted, and was indeed hardly disputed by the able Counsel for the Appellant, that if the statement contained in this paper is to be taken as true, it goes very far towards establishing the case of the Respondent; but it was said, that it was a mere loose paper, the possession of which by the Collector was not satisfactorily accounted for; that the original had not been produced; that it did not appear to have any signature attached to it, and that it ought not to have been treated as of any authority.

But on inquiry it turns out that the circumstances under which the paper was lodged in the Collector's office are such as to give it the very highest authority.

When the East India Company took possession of these Polliams, as we have mentioned, in the year 1802, they made allowances out of the proceeds to the families of the Polligars, and contemplated the restoration at a future time, when order should have been established in the country, of the property so seized, to its owners.

[89] They thought it advisable, in order to give effect to these views, to procure and forward a statement of the particulars of the property so seized, and of the name and families of the existing Polligars.

They required, therefore, returns to be made by the Polligars of these particulars. The paper in question purports to be a copy of the return made on this occasion by Anantappa Naidoo, who then held the Polliam. The Appellant, in her petition of appeal to the Sudder Court, admits that such a genealogical table may have been given, but denies that there is any evidence that such table was the same as to its contents with the one filed by the Plaintiffs.

But the accuracy of the copy so produced, and the genuineness of the document, are made out beyond all controversy. It was not brought forward by surprise, nor received by the Court without full investigation.

On the 5th of January, 1855, the Plaintiffs made a motion to the Court in the following terms:—

"No. 121.

"To the Civil Court of Chittoor.

"Motion presented by Vencatacharry, Vakeel, on behalf of the Plaintiffs, in original suit, No. 24, of 1850.

"The Plaintiffs being the legal heirs to the Polliam, have brought this suit for the recovery thereof, with mesne produce. The Defendant utterly denies in her answer that they are in any way connected with the family. Soon after the country was brought under the British rule, there was a Circular Order issued, requiring all Zemindars to present genealogical tables, showing which of their ancestors held their Zemindaries. In compliance with this requisition, the Plaintiffs' ancestor also sent to the Collector of Chittoor, in Fusly 1210 or 1211, a statement of the above description; and this document is now on the records of the Collector, and it is material to the Plaintiff's case. In the same office there is also a statement, showing the average income of the Polliam for ten years, prepared when the Peishcush thereof was fixed by Government. The Plaintiffs pray that the Court will be pleased to grant a certificate requiring the production of those documents, in order that they may submit them, with their application, to the Collector, for copies thereof."

Having produced a copy of this document, authenticated by the signature of the Collector of Chittoor, they submitted it to the Court on the 30th of January, 1855.

The native Courts of India, in receiving evidence, do not proceed according to the technical rules adopted in England, and they would, by their usual practice, admit a copy of a public document, authenticated by the signature of the proper officer, as prima facie evidence, subject to further inquiry, if it were disputed.

The accuracy of this copy was disputed by the Appellant, and on the 13th of March, 1855, she made a motion in the following terms:—

“To the Civil Court of Chittoor.

“Motion presented by Varathachary, Vakeel, on behalf of the Defendant, in original suit, No. 24, of 1850.

“1. The Plaintiffs, with their motion, No. 58, presented a copy of an alleged genealogical table in which the name of the first Plaintiff is inserted [91] as a member of the family. This is a document concocted by the Plaintiffs themselves, and introduced into the Collector's record. For if this were a genuine voucher, the Defendant's father-in-law would not have declared in an arzee addressed by him to the Collector, when he adopted the Defendant's husband, that he had neither uncles nor uncles' sons. Moreover, the said genealogical table neither bears the signature of the party who addressed, nor is attested by the then Collector. The Defendant prays that the Court will, on a consideration of these objections, reject the above document, and pass a just decree.”

Hereupon the Court directed a letter to be sent to the Collector on the 31st of March, 1850, “requesting him to send up to this Court his Record Keeper, with the original record with which the genealogical table of which the Plaintiffs produced a copy may be connected, or the book out of which the said copy might have been furnished.”

On the 7th of April, the Collector sent an answer by the Record Keeper, intimating “that, with reference to the letter received from this Court on the 31st ultimo, the Record Keeper was ordered to appear with the papers required;” and on the same day the Record Keeper attended accordingly. He was examined and cross-examined, and fully established the authenticity of the document, and the accuracy of the copy furnished. He must have had the original in Court, though it does not appear to have been called for. Moreover, there is documentary evidence in confirmation of the accuracy of several of the statements contained in this paper.

Their Lordships, therefore, have not the least doubt that this paper is what it purports to be, and [92] that it established the case of the Plaintiffs, unless it can be made out that the family, undivided at that time, became afterwards divided.

Now, the parol evidence of the Plaintiffs, if it is believed, clearly shows that there never was any division. The presumption is that a family remains undivided, and the onus is in the Appellant to prove division. Her evidence is rather directed to show that the Respondent's father was a member of a different family. At all events, it is quite insufficient to establish a division, when opposed to the evidence produced on the other side.

It is unnecessary to advert to the proceedings in the suit to set aside the adoption further than to say, that in that suit, which was instituted as early as 1831, Kooppy Naidoo insisted on the same facts and the same title which, in concurrence with his son, he asserted in the present suit. The Court was of opinion, that the adoption was good, and would prevail against the Plaintiff's title, assuming it to be made out in point of fact, and, therefore, no decision was pronounced upon that point.

On the whole we may state that, if the question on the effect of the evidence in this case had come before us now for the first time, and not by appeal, we should have arrived at the same conclusion with the Courts below, though in that case it would have been necessary to go more in detail into the particulars of the evidence on both sides, than it is requisite or proper to do, when we have merely to state our concurrence in the judgment already pronounced.

There remains the question whether the Plaintiff's suit is barred by the Regulation for the limitation of actions.

[93] That Regulation (Regulation II. of 1802, section 18, paragraph 4) provides that a suit shall not be entertained which is commenced more than twelve years after the right accrued; but this is subject to exceptions, one of which is, if the Complainant can show by clear and positive proof, that he directly preferred his claim within that period for the matter in dispute to a Court of competent jurisdiction, or person having authority, whether local or otherwise for the time being, to hear such complaint, and to try the demand, and, "shall assign satisfactory reasons to the Court why he did not proceed in the suit, or shall prove that, either from minority, or other good and sufficient cause, he was precluded from obtaining redress."

Here the Sudder Court (for the objection does not seem to have been taken in the Zillah Court) has held that the suit was actually commenced in 1848, and, if so, the Plaintiff's title not having accrued till September, 1837, the time could not expire till the 16th of September, 1849, and, of course, the suit would have commenced in sufficient time not to fall within that Regulation.

With respect to this the facts stand thus:—

In 1817, the Respondent's father presented his petition to the Civil Court of Chittoor, for liberty to sue in formâ pauperis for the recovery of this estate. The Court was of opinion that, under Regulation IV. of 1831, he could not be permitted to sue without first obtaining the authority of Government.

In May, 1848, he obtained the requisite authority, and on the 5th October, 1848, he and his son, the present Respondent, presented a petition for leave to sue in formâ pauperis, and at the same time presented their plaint in this suit.

[94] The rules of the Court require that for the purpose of obtaining such order the Plaintiff must make an affidavit of his circumstances, and a list of all his property, and produce a certificate of a Vakeel that he has a good cause of suit.

All the necessary documents accompanied the petition, and on the 13th of November, 1848, the following order was made by the Court:—"1848, 13th November. On a perusal of the pauper plaint and its accompaniments put in by Kooppy Naidoo and another, Petitioners in miscellaneous petition 631, and on taking from them the prescribed affidavit, the said bill of plaint, etc., were ordered to be filed."

At this time, therefore, an order was made that the plaint to which an answer has since been put in, and upon which all the proceedings subsequently have taken place, should be received by the Court and put upon record. There seems strong ground for contending that this was the commencement of the suit; and the Court below, which must be the best judge of its own forms and practice, has held that it was so.

The practice is stated by Mr. Macpherson, at p. 85 of his valuable treatise, in these terms:—"The period of limitation ends on the day when the plaint is duly lodged by the complainant in a Court of competent jurisdiction, not on the day when the suit is placed by the Sudder Court upon the file of the Court which they deem most proper to try it, nor upon the day when the plaint is numbered and sent for decision; for if there be any delay in that process, it is the delay of the Court, and not of the Plaintiff."

But, if the preferring of the plaint with the order of the Court of the 13th of November, 1848, be not the commencement of the suit, these facts clearly [95] bring the case within the exceptions found in the Regulation.

There seems reason to suppose that the proceedings adopted by the Court on the 13th of November, 1848, were irregular, and that on that day it ought, according to the Regulation VII. of 1818, to have ordered immediate service of the petition and of the plaint on the Appellant, and to have fixed a day for her to show cause, if she could, why the Plaintiffs should not be allowed to sue in formâ pauperis.

If this course had been adopted on the 13th of November, 1848, the order, which was actually made on the 1st of March, 1850, which the Appellant contends must be treated as the commencement of the suit, might, and probably would, have been and long within the prescribed period.

The order for service of the petition and plaint on the Appellant, and requiring her to show cause, if she could, why the Plaintiffs should not be allowed to sue in forma pauperis, was not actually made till July, 1849. Service was made in August, and no cause was shown. The case, therefore, stood in this position on the 16th of September, 1849, when the twelve years expired: the Plaintiffs had preferred their claim within the prescribed period to a Court of competent jurisdiction, and had been prevented from commencing their suit in proper time (if, in point of fact, it was not commenced in proper time) by no neglect on their part, but by the irregular proceedings of the Court to which their claim was preferred.

It would be contrary to all reason and justice to hold that, under such circumstances, the Plaintiff's suit could be barred by the Regulation.

We must humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm, with costs, the decrees complained of.

[96] NANA NURAIN RAO, —Appellant; HUREE PUNTH BHAO, SREE NEWAS RAO and BULWUNT RAO, —Respondents * [June 25, 26, 27, and 28, 1862].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, North-West Provinces, Agra.

By the Hindoo law as administered in the North-West Provinces, a Hindoo has power to make a testamentary disposition in the nature of a Will.

A disputed Will, made by a Hindoo, disposing of self-acquired estate among his family, established.

Charges of fraud, forgery and perjury having been made by the Respondents against the Appellant, the party who propounded the Will, costs of the Court in India, and upon appeal to England, were upon reversal of the decree of the Sudder Court, ordered to be paid by the Respondents.

This was an appeal and cross-appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Court at Agra. By that decree the Court reversed so much of the decree of the Zillah Court at Cawnpore, as sustained the Will, dated the 24th of January, 1852, of Ram Chunder Punth, Soobadar, formerly Resident of the military cantonments of the late Peishwa, Sree Muhunt Bajee Rao, at Bhitoor in the District of Cawnpore, the father of the parties to this appeal, but dismissed so much of the Respondents' claim as related to two villages, [97] named Lalpoor and Bulwapoor, in Pergunnath Bithoor, which they insisted were part of the estate of the Testator, but which the Sudder Dewanny Court held were the private estate of the Appellant, having been acquired by him by purchase out of his own moneys and formed no part of the Testator, Ram Chunder Punth's estate. A cross-appeal was by special leave (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 461) brought against this latter part of the Sudder Dewanny Court's decree, and also against so much of the same decree as related to the valuation of the personal and immoveable property left by the deceased in case of his intestacy arrived at by the Sudder Court.

The Appellant was the eldest son of the deceased, and the Respondents his younger brothers.

The substantial questions raised and at issue in the appeal were, first, as to the power of a Hindoo to make a testamentary disposition in the nature of a Will, devising and bequeathing self-acquired property; and, secondly, the question of fact, upon the assumption of the existence of such power, whether the Will in question was sufficiently proved by the evidence in the suit, and was the free and voluntary act of the deceased. No objection was raised to Ram Chunder Punth's testamentary capacity.

In the view which their Lordships took of the evidence in respect to the validity of the Will, any further statement of the facts of the case are unnecessary; the evidence upon that point being fully stated and considered in the judgment of their Lordships.

Mr. A. Stephens, Q.C., and Mr. Edmund F. Moore, for the Appellant, insisted, first, that by the Hindoo law, the Testator [98] Ram Chunder Punth, had power to make a Will devising and bequeathing real and personal self-acquired estate, citing Sir F. Macnaghten's "Cons. on the Hindoo Law," pp. 316, 318, 331, (a); and, secondly, that it was established by the evidence, which they fully investigated and commented upon, that the Ram Chunder Punth executed the Will in question.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, for the Respondents, submitted that the onus probandi was upon the Appellant, and that he failed to prove by evidence that the Will was executed by the deceased, and further, that if the factum of the Will had been proved, the Will was invalid by the Hindoo law as laid down in the Mitacshara, which they insisted governed the case.

Mr. A. Stephens, Q.C., in reply.

The consideration of their Lordships' judgment was reserved, and was now delivered, as follows, by Lord Kingsdown (July 16, 1862).—The question in the original appeal in this case is [99] as to the genuineness of an instrument alleged by the Appellant to be the Will of Ram Chunder Punth, deceased, the father of the Appellant and Respondents; the Appellant being the eldest, and the Respondents the two younger sons of the alleged Testator. The Zillah Court of Cawnpore decided in favour of the Will. The Sudder Adawlut of the North-Western Provinces reversed that decision, but held that certain property which the Respondents alleged to be a part of their father's estate belonged to the Appellant.

Against the decision on this point, and against a determination of the Court with respect to the amount of the alleged Testator's property, with which the Appellant is to be charged, there is a cross-appeal by the Respondents.

Ram Chunder Punth in his lifetime was Soobadar, an officer of rank and distinction in the service of the Maharajah, the ex-Peshwa. He had accumulated a large property, and had invested some part of it, not very considerable in proportion to the whole, in the purchase of land.

He had two wives and three sons, and at least one daughter. He had a residence at Bithoor, where he seems to have kept a large establishment of servants, and he had a smaller house—a Bungalow, as it was termed by one of the Respondents' Counsel, at Cawnpore—at the distance of about ten miles from Bithoor.

He appears to have lived on terms of great intimacy with many Europeans resident in his neighbourhood, and especially with Mr. Morland, an English gentleman who held some official situation at Cawnpore. It is in evidence in the case, that the [100] eldest son, the Appellant, had the general management of his father's affairs, and that differences had prevailed in the family between the sons, the eldest as it is said, acting with harshness towards his younger brothers.

The Soobadar died on the 22nd of July, 1853, and on the 10th of August, 1853, the Appellant presented a petition to the Judge of the Zillah of Cawnpore, in which he described himself as eldest son, heir, and executor of Ram Chunder Punth, Soobadar. The petition stated the death of the Soobadar, and that when in his perfect senses he constituted the Petitioner his executor and proprietor of his effects, under a Will signed and sealed by the deceased, and bearing date the 24th of January, 1852; that during the lifetime, and to the day of the death of the deceased, the Petitioner held possession of all the real and personal estate and effects, in subordination to the deceased, and regulated and managed all his affairs, as people generally were well aware of, and of which the Court was equally well informed. He then stated that he found that he could not realize the assets of the Testator without obtaining a certificate of administration under Act, No. 20 of 1841, and he prayed a certificate accordingly.

He appended to his petition the alleged Will, with translations in English and Persian, and added the names of the four attesting witnesses and two persons by whom the translations were alleged to have been made under the Testator's directions, one an European, named Pownes, and the other a Hindoo, named Moleecooddeen.

On the 12th of August the Respondents presented their petition, alleging that the Will was a fabrication of the Appellant, and that they were joint heirs with him.

[101] Witnesses were examined for and against the Will, though it is said that the Judge improperly declined to examine some persons who were tendered by the Respondents for examination; and on the 8th of September, 1853, he ordered certificate of administration to be granted to the Appellant.

On the following day, the 9th of September, the Respondents filed their plaint in the Zillah Court of Cawnpore against the present Appellant, claiming two-thirds of the property, real and personal, of their deceased father, from the Appellant.

Evidence was gone into on both sides, and of course it was for the Appellant to establish the Will. It purported to bear date the 24th of January, 1852. The effect of it, according to the English translation, as made in the Zillah Court, was to declare, that the Testator was seventy-five years of age; that his eldest son had two sons and one daughter; that his younger sons were childless. It then proceeded to express his hopes that his wives and his sons would all live amicably together, and that all would look upon and consider his eldest son as the head of his family after his death. He then bequeathed the whole of his property, real and personal, to his eldest son, directing him to provide for both his wives, and to pay them proper respect, and to provide also for his younger brothers, and for the Testator's dependants; and he declared that he had made these provisions with a view to prevent dissensions in the family, and to enable them to live in peace and harmony after his decease. If, however, the younger sons should not feel disposed to abide by these directions, and should insist on a separation from the family, then the eldest son was to receive the rents [102] of two villages, mentioned in the Will, and pay over the proceeds to his younger brothers, as such proceeds were, from time to time, received; and he was further to pay to each the sum of Rs. 25,000. The Testator then gave Rs. 13,000, for the benefit of his granddaughter, the daughter of the Appellant, on her marriage and allotted Rs. 40,000, for what he calls the customary outlay in the first year after his death, including religious pilgrimages.

In the event of a pension which he enjoyed from the British Government being continued to his family there is some question as to the effect of the bequest, the first English translation provides, that in whatever proportions the British Government might allot it, the sons should enjoy it.

The Testator's property has been estimated by the Sudder Court as of the value, in the whole, of 5 lacs of rupees, or in English money of £50,000. The value of the two villages given to the younger sons is estimated at £5000; the two legacies of Rs. 25,000, would amount to as much more. They would take, therefore, £10,000; the granddaughter £1300; the funeral and other expenses, £4000; and there would remain a sum of £35,000, for the eldest son, charged with the maintenance of the wives and dependents of the Testator.

There seems nothing in this Will which to English notions would appear unreasonable. The eldest son was to maintain the rank and position of the family; he had issue which the younger sons (who had arrived at the age of manhood and appear by the Will to have wives) had not, and the provision seems to be such as a prudent Testator might be supposed very likely to make who was inclined to found a family.

[103] The evidence in support of the Will is singularly strong.

We have first the evidence of Apa Lagoo, who wrote the Will in the Mahrattée character. He says, "it is all in my handwriting down to the words indicating the Arabic month, at the end, which were inserted by the Soobadar himself. The date is 2nd Rubee-ool-Akhir, and underneath it is written, Magh Soodee Teej, in my hand writing. Under that again is the Soobadar's signature. This Will was written under the Soobadar's orders. It was planned two days before, and it was reduced to writing on the 21th of the month." He then proceeds to depose to the signature of the Will, and its sealing by the Testator, and signature by the four attesting witnesses. He says that a draft of the Will had been previously made by him, the witness, and the draft, as well as the Will, was handed over by the Testator to the Appellant. He says that the two translations were made four days afterwards.

It was remarked upon as singular, that Apa Lagoo was not an attesting witness to the Will; but we agree with the observation of the Counsel for the Appellant in his reply, that, if the Will was not genuine, the person who had written it would most probably have been made a witness in order to make it more difficult for him to betray his employer.

This witness was in the service of the Soobadar, sixteen or seventeen years; employed in writing letters for him. He seems to give his testimony very fairly. He says that the Will was made in favour of the Appellant only because he was the eldest son, for the Soobadar was not displeased with the younger [104] sons. He does not know whether the younger sons were informed of the Will or not; but they were not informed of it in his presence.

Three of the attesting witnesses to the Will, Byjaba, Sookharam, and Dinkur Punth, all give the same account of the transaction, not as we too often find in these cases, all in the same words, not, indeed, concurring in all the minute particulars of what passed, but with that agreement in substance and that variation in unimportant details which are usually found in witnesses intending to speak the truth, and not tutored to tell a particular story.

Now, who are the witnesses, and are they of a character to attach credit or discredit to their testimony.

The first witness is Byjaba. He says he was a companion of the Maharajah in his lifetime; that he had been in his service from the age of ten years; that he was in the habit of receiving presents of 500, 400, or 1000 rupees from the Maharajah, and as a permanency the Maharajah allowed him 2 rupees a-day. He says there was an intimate bond of brotherhood between the Soobadar and himself, and that the Soobadar sent a messenger in a carriage to Bithoor to fetch him to Cawnpore, in order that he might witness his Will.

This witness, therefore, appears to be a person in a very respectable position in life: a person likely to be called upon by the Soobadar to take the part which he did in the completion of this instrument. The only objection suggested to him is, that he appears to be indebted to the Appellant in a bond for Rs. 500, payable by instalments, a circumstance which cannot weigh much, if anything, against his evidence.

[105] The next witness is Sookharam, who was in the service of the Soobadar, and received what we imagine is rather a considerable salary, Rs. 300 a-year, and held a confidential situation as keeper of the jewels. No objection was made to him except that he was now in the service of the Appellant.

The next witness is Dinkur Punth, who also appears to be in a respectable position. He was a Resaldar in the Maharajah's employ, and received a salary of Rs. 300 per annum. After the Maharajah's death this salary was reduced by the Soobadar to Rs. 200, which he continues to receive from the Appellant.

The remaining attesting witness, Kesho Rao, had given evidence, like the others, in support of the Will on the application for the certificate of administration, and he was produced on the present occasion, by the Appellant, and came from Bithoor to give evidence, riding, as he says, a horse supplied by the Nana Sahib. Instead, however, of confirming his former testimony, he says, that the whole of it was false: that the Will was written by the Appellant himself, and that he, the witness, signed it fifteen days after the death of the Soobadar, and that when he gave his former evidence, he was brought into Court in a state of intoxication, having been drugged. This latter statement is manifestly false. He was examined and cross-examined on the former occasion in the presence of the Judge, and there are no signs at all of confusion in his testimony.

The reason of this man's thus contradicting his former evidence may be conjectured with great probability. He is a Brahmin, and it appears to be contrary to the tenets of the Brahmins that a person [106] in the situation of the Soobadar, having several sons, should dispose of his property by a testamentary instrument in favour of one: they hold it to be contrary to the Shasters, as appears by the evidence given in this case by the Respondents. The witness says, " Since the month of Katik last (he was examined on the 28th of March, 1854), all the Brahmins of my brotherhood combined and put me out of caste for giving such false evidence." He is asked by the Court, " How did the Brahmins learn that you had given false evidence?" He answers, " All the Brahmins are well aware that the Will is a fabrication; nor, indeed, is it the custom or usage of the country that three sons should be masters of the property and a Will be made in favour of only one son only without giving notice to the others."

All the circumstances lead to the conclusion that this witness is not coming forward to correct false evidence previously given, but that he has been tampered with, and, under the pressure of his brotherhood, is attempting to destroy an instrument which he knows and had originally declared to be genuine.

The Zillah Judge who saw the witness, and observed his demeanour during his examination, remarks, " I am bound to record the very unfavourable impression given by the manner and appearance of this witness, which was, it seemed to me, shared by all present." After referring to a description of the symptoms of a false witness contained in the Mitaeshara, he says, " All these features of uneasiness were very visible, and it seemed to me that he was in fear of some persons in the body of the room who had been sent to watch his evil-[107]-dence;" and he intimates " a strong suspicion that the venal perjury of this witness was mainly relied on to support the present suit."

There remain of the witnesses who have been previously examined, the two translators, as they are called, though that expression does not quite accurately express what they did, Nuzur Moheewooddeen and Pownes.

The former is examined, and confirms in every particular his previous evidence. He says that two days before the end of January, what he calls the translation was made. The translation was made in this manner. The Soobadar held the Mahrattee Will in his hands, and dictated the terms of it in the Oordoo language, which the witness wrote down after him in the Persian character, and when this was done, the Soobadar signed it; that " the Soobadar's object in making this Will was solely to perpetuate his name and dignity and rank, and that the Nana might be enabled to protect and support other persons, for the Soobadar always spoke to that effect."

Mr. Pownes is not examined again, but his former deposition is put in, and what took place with respect to him is so extraordinary, with reference to the proceedings of both the Zillah and the Sudder Courts, that their Lordships think it necessary to call it to the attention of the Judges there.

The witness had been examined and cross-examined in the former proceedings, and had given a similar account of the transaction to that given by Moheewooddeen, viz., that the Mahrattee Will was held by the Testator, who read it and went on rendering it in Oordoo, while the witness wrote it out in English; that the witness did not take the original Will into [108] his hands to inspect it, but it was on the table, and he should recognize it if he saw it. He does recognize it, and he says he first made a draft, which he afterwards fair copied, and the Soobadar wrote something at the bottom of it which must have been his signature, but the witness is not acquainted with that character.

On the 28th of October, 1853, the Appellant presented a petition to the Court containing the following statement: that Mr. Pownes, a clerk of the Judge's Office, and employed as English translator, had previously deposed on oath to the Will; that on the 22nd of the present month, six days ago, he had called at the Petitioner's house and proposed terms to the Petitioner connected with a pecuniary reward, which Petitioner declined; that two days afterwards he sent word to the Petitioner by a trustworthy man to say, that he would now give evidence of a different purport, and thus throw obstacles in the suit, if the Petitioner did not consent to his proposal. That on receiving this message the Petitioner was astounded, but that he had done his duty by reporting the circumstance to the Court.

When a charge of this most grave character was brought against an officer of the Court placed in a situation of great importance to the due administration of justice, which, if the charge were true, he ought not to have been permitted for a single hour longer to retain, it would naturally be expected that a most strict inquiry would be immediately made by the Court into the truth or falsehood of this charge. Yet as far as we can discover, not the slightest notice appears to have been taken of it.

On the 17th of November, 1853, the petition containing this charge was ordered to be filed, and on the 27th January, 1854, on the petition of the Appellant the deposition of Pownes to which we have already referred was ordered to be filed.

How it happened that if the Court did not think it necessary to investigate such a charge against one of its officers; that that officer himself did not immediately insist on having his character cleared, it is difficult to understand; something may have been done, and some explanation may have been given of which no trace is to be found on the record, but if this were so it is to be regretted that nothing of the sort appears.

The Zillah Judge does not seem to have adverted at all to the deposition of Pownes. The Sudder Court do observe upon it, but in terms not very accurate, according to the record as it appears before us; and they object to it only on a ground which is quite unenforceable, namely that the witness did not appear to have been sworn before he was examined, though the contrary appears upon the jurat signed by the Judge himself. They complain that he was not examined in the suit, but they do not take any steps for the purpose of remedying the defect, nor allude to any proceeding as having been taken or as being fit to be taken for the purpose of investigating a matter of so great importance to the due administration of justice as the charge of gross corruption brought against one of the officers of the Court of Cawnpore.

In addition to the witnesses to whom we have referred, speaking to the factum of the Will, there is other very important testimony in support of it. There is one person, Baboo Porarkur, whose evidence [110] on this subject is of the greatest weight. If he is to be believed, he proves the whole case; he says that he was not present when the Will was made; that he was detained at Bithoor by the death of his mother; that the Soobadar informed him of the Will soon after it was made on the 6th or 7th of February; that the Will was shown by the Soobadar to his younger sons, the Respondents, who took it up and read it and then laid it down near the Soobadar, who handed it to the Appellant. He says that those who live in the Bara (which we understand to be the mansion of the Soobadar) must all have been aware of the Will; that he has heard from Nurain Rao Apa, a grandson of the Testator, that Dr. Cheek and Mr. Vincent were aware of it; and he states as of his own knowledge, that Mr. Kirk of the Bank of Cawnpore, was also informed of it; and he refers to a letter, of which we shall have something to say presently. He says that he was always with the Soobadar, and acted in some respects as his deputy.

Now, not only is there no impeachment at all of this witness, but there is strong testimony in his favour. Mr. Morland, on whose evidence against the Will the greatest reliance is placed by the Respondents, refers to this person as the confidential agent and constant attendant of the Soobadar, and as one who would have been asked to attest the Will, if any Will had really been made by the Soobadar.

A sufficient reason why he was not asked to attest it, appears incidentally, on his examination, viz., that he was detained at Bithoor by the death of his mother.

[111] This witness Baboo Porarkur, refers to Mr. Vincent, Dr. Cheek, and Mr. Kirk, as Europeans acquainted with the Will.

Now, with respect to Mr. Vincent, a letter of that gentleman, written to the Appellant at Cawnpore during the examination of the witnesses in the case, is found on the record. In the petition tendering the letter the Appellant says that Mr. Vincent, who is now in Cawnpore, is ready to attest the contents of it. It amounts, however, to very little, even if the contents were regularly proved, which they were not.

Dr. Cheek, a physician says, that in February, 1852, when he attended the Soobadar professionally, he had the following conversation with him:—"One day he was very ill, and I said to him, 'The state of your health is such that you should arrange your affairs, though I hope you will recover from your present illness.' To this he replied, 'I have arranged my affairs,' or words to that effect. He never made use of the term 'I have made my Will,' though I was led to suppose he meant this from the above expression he made use of."

This was very soon after the date of the alleged Will, and appears to their Lordships important confirmation of the truth of the Appellant's case.

The third European referred to by Baboo Porarkur is Mr. Kirk of the Bank of Cawnpore. The communication to him is alleged to have been made by a letter signed by the Testator, which if it be genuine is admitted to be conclusive of the case.

This letter purports to have been written on the 9th of January, 1853, to Mr. John Kirk, at that time superintendent of the Cawnpore Bank.

[112] It appears that the Soobadar had at some antecedent period taken ten shares in the Cawnpore Bank, and had had those shares entered in the name of his youngest son, the Respondent, Hurree Punth Bhao. The Bank, in 1852, was winding up its affairs, and was about to return by instalments their capital, or a dividend upon such capital, to the shareholders. The Appellant had applied, as the manager of his father's affairs, to the Bank for payment of Rs. 250, the dividend then payable. Mr. Kirk, the Superintendent, refused to act upon his statement without the authority of the Soobadar, and thereupon the following letter is alleged to have been signed by the Soobadar, and sent to Mr. Kirk:—

"Dear Sir,—You have made an objection that the shares was held in the Cawnpore Bank by the name of my youngest son, Hurree Punth Bhao. Consequently you cannot pay the sum of Company's rupees (250), two hundred and fifty, to my eldest son, Nurain Rao Nana, being the amount of refund capital at the rate of 25 rupees per share on the ten shares in the Cawnpore Bank, which it is now going to discharge. In reply, I beg to inform you that in those days when the shares was taken, my elder son, Nurain Rao Nana, was in preparation to proceed to England for some business on the part of the Maharajah ex-Peishwa Bajee Rao. Consequently for namesake the shares in question was taken by the name of my youngest son, Hurree Punth Bhao, otherwise the shares were taken by the name of my elder son. Nurain Rao Nana has full authority over all my property at present and also in future. Moreover, I have already written down my last Will and bequeathed to him. There-[113]fore, I solicit your favour to remit the said amount to my elder son, Nurain Rao Nana, and also in future, whatever more shares will be liquidated on account of the said shares, kindly remit to my elder son, Nurain Rao Nana, and oblige.—Yours sincerely,

"RAM CHUNDER PUNTH, SOOBADAR.

"Cawnpore, the 9th January, 1853."

On the 19th of January, 1853, Mr. Stacy, who was then a clerk in the Bank, informed the Appellant, that Mr. Kirk had recognized his title, and had sent him a hoondie for Rs. 250.

Mr. Stacy's letter is produced and is proved by himself, and is in these words:—

"My dear Sir,—I am sorry Mr. Kirk will not agree to pay cash. He showed me your father's note, and he says he has now no further objection to recognize you as fully empowered to negotiate this business; but a hoondie is all he can give, and this for 250 rupees. I have accordingly the pleasure to inclose the same.—Yours truly,

"W. STACY."

Now, Mr. Stacy is examined, and his evidence is very important. He says that the Soobadar called upon him in company with the Appellant; and after giving a history of the shares, told him that though the shares were in the name of his youngest son, yet his eldest son was proprietor and manager of all his affairs, and the proper person to receive the money (dividends), and he requested the witness to call on [114] Mr. Kirk and get the money paid to the Appellant. He says that he had an interview with Kirk accordingly, who told him that he had received a letter from the Soobadar, and had no longer any objection to pay the dividends as requested, but could not pay cash; all he could do was to give a "hoondie" for the amount. Mr. Kirk read to him the Soobadar's letter, and he saw it too, but did not know the Soobadar's signature. He then verifies the letter which he had written, and looking at the other English letter addressed to the Bank, witness stated, that the contents of this letter were identical with those of the letter shown to him by Mr. Kirk.

It is clear, therefore, beyond all question, that some letter to the general effect of that stated by the Appellant was written by the Testator: that such letter had been sufficient to remove the difficulties felt by Mr. Kirk: and Mr. Stacy, on seeing the letter produced to him, declares the contents to be identical with that shown to him by Mr. Kirk.

It is said, however, that there is a passage in this letter which it is so improbable that the Soobadar should have written that it is in itself evidence of forgery. The passage is this:—"Nurain Rao Nana has full authority over all my property at present, and also in future. Moreover, I have already written down my last Will and bequeathed to him."

But on full consideration of all the circumstances their Lordships are not able to agree in that view. As to the first sentence it amounts to little, if at all, more than what Mr. Stacy says that the Soobadar stated to him, and when it is recollected that the Soobadar's object was to settle the matter then in dispute, not only with respect to the dividends then [115] payable, but as to future payments: that he was then seventy-six years old, and could not expect to continue much longer in life: and that he could only perpetuate the authority of his son by making a Will, and, according to the hypothesis, had done so, there does not seem any great improbability in his stating this fact. It was not one which he was desirous of keeping secret from indifferent persons, and there was a motive on this occasion for communicating it. The letter was written in January, 1853, and Mr. Stacy speaks to its contents in March, 1854.

It is said, however, that the circumstances under which it is brought forward throw great suspicion upon it. To their Lordships, on the contrary, it appears that those circumstances almost exclude the possibility of forgery.

The account of the Appellant is this:—He had originally found a copy of this letter in his father's letter-book, and he took the book containing it to Mr. Morland in October, 1853. Morland says, he remembers forwarding a letter to the "Secretary of the Bank regarding payment of instalments which were due in the name of the Soobadar." Again, he says, "When I came to Cawnpore, in October, 1853, the Defendant brought me a book, containing a copy of a certain letter which Defendant told me had been addressed to Mr. Kirk, regarding refund of the instalments."

It may safely be assumed that the letter, a copy of which he thus showed, or offered to show, to Mr. Morland, was to the same effect with that now produced. It was said that the letter-book was not produced by the Appellant, but he had in his pleadings tendered the production of it, and the Respondents might, if they had desired it, have called for its production. The original letter itself was referred to in the hands of Major Riddell.

Mr. Kirk was dead: his widow seems to have set up some business for herself, in which she employed a person named Read as a clerk. Major Riddell, a Magistrate at Cawnpore, had undertaken to wind up the affairs of the Bank, and, of course, would have the papers of the Bank in his possession. The Appellant alleges, that he applied to Major Riddell for the original of this letter: that Major Riddell searched for, but could not find it, and suggested that it might be amongst the private papers of Mr. Kirk in the hands of his widow, and promised to write to her on the subject. It appears that he must have done so, for on the 17th November, Mrs. Kirk, having found the letter, sent it to Major Riddell by the hands of her clerk, Read, and Major Riddell indorsed on it, "Received from Mr. Read, this 17th November, 1853." The Appellant put in his answer on the 19th of November, 1853, in ignorance, as far as appears, of the fact of this letter having been found: and on the 14th of December, he wrote to Mrs. Kirk, to inquire about this letter. On the 15th she sent him this answer:—

"Cawnpore, December 15, 1853.

"Sir,—In reply to your letter of yesterday's date, I beg to inform you that the letter I found from your father to my late husband has been duly forwarded by me to Captain Riddell, some time back, in order that the same might be made over to you."

The Appellant hereupon procured from Major Riddell a copy of this letter under his official seal, [117] and on the 26th of December, 1853, he put in his rejoinder to the Respondent's replication, in which he referred to this letter as then in the possession of Major Riddell, and to the letters of Mr. Stacy and Mrs. Kirk, as establishing its genuineness.

The persons here referred to, Major Riddell and Mrs. Kirk, were both resident in Cawnpore. Mr. Morland, who was a strong friend of the Respondent's, was probably also there; every opportunity was afforded to them of inquiring into the truth of the facts alleged, and of disputing the genuineness of the document, if any reasonable grounds existed for doing so.

On the 27th of January, 1854, the Appellant, by his petition, tendered in evidence a copy of the letter of 9th of January, 1853, referring to the original as in the hands of Major Riddell, and the two original letters of Mr. Stacy and Mrs. Kirk.

These documents were accordingly filed.

On the 29th March, Baboo Porarkur was examined, and stated the circumstances relating to these Cawnpore Bank shares, and the effect of the letter written by the Soobadar on the occasion, which he says was, that the real proprietor of these shares was Nurain Rao, and that he, the Soobadar, had made a Will in his favour; he says that the letter was written by one William, who was occasionally employed as clerk in the house at Cawnpore, in English, at the Soobadar's dictation in his, Porarkur's, presence.

The Respondents, as it appears from the judgment of the Sudder Court, called for the production of the original letter in the hands of Major Riddell, and it was produced accordingly. An order for the pro-[118]duction was made on the 29th of March, and though there is some confusion in the documents printed for the purpose of transmission to this country, and some orders are referred to in the index which are not printed, we think that it is sufficiently clear, independently of the statement by the Judges of the Sudder Court, that the original letter was produced in consequence of the order of the Court, and shown to Mr. Stacy, and on a subsequent occasion to Mr. Morland. No evidence whatever was given by the Respondents to impeach this document, nor were any questions put to any of the witnesses with a view to show any improper dealing with it by the Appellant.

If the statement thus given be true, and no attempt has been made to impeach it by any evidence, it is difficult to see how any opportunity of forgery was afforded to the Appellant. The objections made by the Sudder Judges to it are of no weight; one is that the Appellant, in setting out the copy of the letter, had not stated the indorsement made by Major Riddell of the day on which he had received it; the other, that Read the messenger who carried the letter to Major Riddell, had, fifteen years before, been convicted of fraud, and sentenced to imprisonment.

In addition to all this evidence, there was proof by a grandson of the Soobadar that the Will was known in the family, and had been the subject of conversation in the Soobadar's house in his lifetime, and this was confirmed by the testimony of several other witnesses.

Against this mass of evidence there was really no testimony entitled to any weight. The strongest [119] evidence against the Will is that of Mr. Morland, a gentleman of position and respectability; he says that he often suggested to the Soobadar the propriety of making a Will, observing that his late master, the ex-Peishwa had made one; but the Soobadar always (as he terms it) scouted the idea, saying, "Why should I make a Will?—there are my sons to inherit my property." This witness says, that he was on terms of such close intimacy and confidence with the Soobadar, that he is firmly persuaded that if the Soobadar had made a Will he would not only have consulted him about it, but asked him to be a witness.

But there appears upon this gentleman's own depositions quite sufficient reason why the Soobadar, whatever might be his general confidence in him, should neither consult him about his Will, nor ask him to be witness to it, nor inform him that he had made it. Mr. Morland, it is clear, in the differences which prevailed in this family, supported the cause of the younger brothers, and was anxious to protect their interests against the elder, towards whom, whether with or without reason, he entertained feelings of dislike. He not only says, that he advised the Soobadar to make a Will, because he thought the Appellant was likely to claim much more than his share of his father's property after his death, and would do much to the prejudice of his younger brothers, but he admits that he had, on one occasion, at the instance of the second son, represented to the Soobadar the alleged tyrannical conduct of the Appellant. The Soobadar, on that occasion, said he had an equal regard for all his sons, but did not admit the tyranny imputed to the eldest.

Now, if the Testator was determined to leave to [120] his eldest son the bulk of his estate, it was very likely that he would not communicate to Mr. Morland a determination so little in accordance with his advice or his wishes or ask him to authenticate the instrument.

The other evidence is hardly deserving of notice: it is disbelieved by the Zillah Judge, and is not adverted to by the Sudder Court. It consists of that sort of testimony with which, in these Indian cases, we are unfortunately too familiar—of witnesses who swear positively to matters of which they can have no knowledge: of witnesses who swear that they have heard the alleged Testator, after the date of his Will, declare that he had never made one: that they had heard the persons who had been parties to the instrument gratuitously declare to them that it was a forgery: of witnesses who declare that they had been solicited by the party in the cause, or his agents, to attest instruments, which they were told at the same time were fabricated. Witnesses of this description may be had, unhappily for India, in any number in that country.

The two wives of the Soobadar are examined as witnesses against the Will, but they really say nothing, nor, indeed, are asked anything that is important: each says in general terms, that the Soobadar never wrote anything in favour of any of his sons, and made no one proprietor: and that he regarded all his sons as equal, and each says the whole property of the Soobadar belongs to her. They are examined as to the property, with respect to which they may be able to speak. Other witnesses give their opinion as to the handwriting of the Testator, a species of evidence seldom of much value in contradiction to [121] positive testimony, and in this case rendered of still less value, as to some of the witnesses, by the circumstance that they deny the handwriting of the Testator to documents admitted to be genuine. The rest of the evidence consists of the testimony of Pundits, who say that the Soobadar was always obedient to the Shasters, and that the Shasters forbid a father who has several sons to appropriate by Will to one the property which by law ought to be equally divided amongst all. It is clear that in this District a strong feeling prevails amongst the Brahmins upon the subject of testamentary disposition, which, though at length established by law as to self-acquired property, is opposed to the ancient usages and feelings of the country.

On the whole it appears to their Lordships that the Appellant has sufficiently established his case. A course was taken in the Sudder Court, which is certainly unusual. The Judges ordered a translation to be made into English of the Oordoo Will, and they found that such translation did not, in form or in the order of the sentences, correspond in all respects with the translation made by Pownes, and from this, if we understand the meaning of the Judge who adverts to the fact, they drew an inference unfavourable to the Will. It may be observed that Mr. Morland, on being shown the English translation alleged to have been made by Pownes, says he has no doubt it is Pownes's writing. If any inference against the validity of the Will were to be drawn from the discrepancy between the two English translations, that discrepancy should have been called to the attention of the Appellant, and Pownes should have been further examined on the matter. The circumstance would have deserved [122] attention if Pownes's translation had been made from a written copy of the Oordoo Will, but it was not. It was translated, as we have already said, into English, from sentences read in Oordoo by the Testator from the Mahrattee Will, and the discrepancies, such as they are, appear to us to be fully accounted for by this circumstance.

We think the circumstances of the case are strongly in favour of the Will. It contains such a disposition of his property as it was extremely probable that the Testator should make, and extremely unlikely that the Appellant should introduce into a forged instrument. The Testator was of great age. He had placed his eldest son in his place with respect to the management of all his affairs in his lifetime. He might, very naturally, desire to keep together in his family the wealth which he had acquired by his own exertions, and to prevent its dispersion by division amongst his sons. His eldest son had issue, his other sons had none; and he had the example of his master, the Peishwa, to follow, who had adopted a son and made a Will in his favour. The witnesses in favour of the Will are in general less open to exception than is usual in Indian cases, and some of them entirely unexceptionable. The Zillah Judge who has seen them has come to an opinion in favour of the Will, and appears to doubt whether the opposition to it is really the spontaneous act of the Respondents.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that the reasons assigned by the Sudder Court for its judgment are quite unsatisfactory. The view which they take of the original appeal makes any consideration of the cross-appeal unnecessary. It must of course be dismissed. They must humbly advise Her Majesty to [123] reverse the decree of the Sudder Court on the original appeal, and to restore that of the Zillah Court; and considering that the Respondents' case is founded on an allegation of fraud, perjury, and forgery, which, in their Lordships' opinion, fails, they think they cannot do justice without advising, that the Respondents should be ordered to pay all the costs of the suit in both Courts below, and of both the appeals to Her Majesty.

SREEMUTTY SOORJEE MONEY DOSSEY,—Appellant: DENOBUDDO MULLICK and Others,—Respondents * [Feb. 10, 1862].

On appeal from the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

There is nothing in the General principles of Hindoo law, or public convenience, to prevent a Hindoo testator devising self-acquired property by way of remainder, or executory devise, upon an event which is to happen on the close of a life in being [9 Moo. Ind. App. 135].

The Will of a Hindoo Testator, after devising all his real and personal estate among his five sons (a joint undivided family) contained this clause: "Should any among my said five sons die, not leaving any son from his loins, nor any son's son, in that event neither his widow, nor his daughter, nor his daughter's son, nor any of them, will get any share out of the share that he has obtained of the immoveables and moveables of my said estate. In that event of the said property, such of my sons and my son's son as shall then be alive, they will receive that wealth according to their respective shares. If any one acts repugnant to this, it is inadmissible. However, if my sonless son shall leave a widow, in that event she will only receive Co.'s Rs. 10,000, for her food and raiment." The family remained joint. S., one of the sons, died after the Testator's death, without issue male, but leaving a widow, his heiress-at-law. Held, that by the words "not leaving any sons from his loins, nor any son's son," the Testator meant, not an indefinite failure of male issue, but a failure of male issue of any one of his sons at the time of the death of that son.

Held further (1), that upon the death of S., without male issue, his interest in the capital of the estate determined, and that his widow became entitled to hold and enjoy as a Hindoo widow, a fifth part of the accumulations from the Testator's estate, from the time of his death to the death of his son, S.; and (2), that she was also entitled absolutely in her own right, to the interest and accumulations which since S.'s death arisen from such fifth part of the accumulations.

By the decree, S.'s widow was declared entitled to the Rs. 10,000, given by the Will, with the benefit of a residence in the family dwelling-house, and participation in the means of worship. The question of the amount of her maintenance as a Hindoo widow was left open by the Judicial Committee, as that point could be raised on further directions after taking the accounts [9 Moore Ind. App. 139].

This was a suit brought by the Appellant against the Respondents, claiming as the sonless widow, heiress, and personal representative of Surroopchunder [124] Mullick, deceased. The Appellant, by the bill, sought to recover her deceased husband's one-fifth share of and in the surplus income of the joint family estate, with the accumulations: which estate was held by his surviving brothers, or their descendants, as members with Surroopchunder Mullick, of a joint undivided Hindoo family, subject to the trusts, conditions, and limitations contained in the Will of the late Bustomdoss Mullick, the father of Surroopchunder: the Appellant also claimed to be entitled to a legacy of Rs. 10,000 under the Will, bequeathed to such of the widows of the Testator's sons as should have no sons, for food and raiment.

The principal questions raised in the suit had reference to the construction and effect to be given to the above Will, and to the rights of the sons and their sonless widows, and especially as to the Appellant's claim as heiress of her husband Surroopchunder Mullick to one-fifth part or share of the accumulations of the proceeds and profits of the estate and property, during [125] the lifetime of her husband, which had been treated as an increment to the original corpus of the share, and as passing with it to the surviving brothers of the Surroopchunder Mullick, under the Will. These questions were argued on the hearing of a previous appeal to set aside two orders of the Supreme Court allowing two demurrers for want of equity to the Appellant's bill, and it was then held by their Lordships that, under the limitations in the Will, Surroopchunder Mullick's one fifth share in the family property went over, on his death, to his surviving brothers, but that the Appellant, as his widow and heiress-at-law, was entitled to the accumulations of income which had arisen from her husband's share of the Testator's estate during his lifetime. The facts and circumstances respecting the Will are fully stated in the report of the case in 6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 526, upon the hearing of the Appeal from the demurrers, and require now only a brief outline of what occurred subsequently in India.

The Testator, Bustomdoss Mullick, by the first clause of his Will devised his self acquired real and personal estate among his five sons. Clause II, upon the construction of which the questions in this appeal rose, was as follows:—"The Issore avert, but should peradventure any among my said five sons die, not leaving any son from his loins, nor any son's son, in that event neither his widow, nor his daughter, nor his daughter's son, nor any of them will get any share out of the share that he has obtained of the immoveables and moveables of my said estate. In that event of the said property, such of my sons and my sons' son as shall then be alive they will receive that wealth according to their respective [126] shares. If any one acts repugnant to this it is inadmissible. However, if my sonless son shall leave a widow, in that event she will only receive Company's rupees (10,000) ten thousand, for her food and raiment."

By an order of Her Majesty in Council, the order of the Supreme Court made upon the demurrers filed in the suit were reversed, and the demurrers overruled.

On the receipt of this order in India, the Respondents filed their answer in the suit so instituted, whereby they admitted the principal allegations in the bill as to the Will of Bustomdoss Mullick, and that the family lived after his death as a joint undivided Hindoo family, and also as to there being a large surplus of income over expenditure.

On the application of the Plaintiff, as a Hindoo lady of rank, a commission to examine her as a witness on her own behalf was issued, and her evidence was taken thereunder, by which she deposed that she was excluded against her will from the family house in which she and her husband had lived. The Defendants examined two witnesses: one, the Respondent, Brijobundo Mullick, who deposed to the mode in which the family accounts were kept, showing that all items of expenditure were borne by the joint family, even for individual members: and another witness, named Rajender Dutt, who, as member of a joint Hindoo family, was called to prove what the custom of joint Hindoo families were, but he was unable to prove any fixed and established custom as to joint families not having separate expenditure for individuals.

The suit came on in the Supreme Court, and was [127] heard before the Chief Justice, Sir Barnes Peacock, Sir Charles M. R. Jackson, and Sir Mordaunt L. Wells, Puisne Judges. At the hearing it was submitted on behalf of the Appellant that her husband, notwithstanding the Will of Bustondoss Mullick, was entitled absolutely to one-fifth of the corpus as well as of the accumulations; while, on the part of the Defendants, it was contended, not only that by the Will, Surroopchunder Mullick having died without male issue, his widow was excluded from all share in the corpus; but that by the Hindoo law governing families living jointly, as theirs did, the increment followed, and was blended with and became distributable in the same manner as the corpus; and that Surroopchunder Mullick, while so living in joint estate, must be considered as waiving his right to enjoyment in severalty of that portion of the estate which, under his father's Will, he would, if a partition had taken place, have been entitled to, and as having elected to take, in place therefore, the advantages which, in case he or his male issue had survived any of his brothers who should have died without male issue, might and would have accrued to him, Surroopchunder Mullick, or his male issue, by reason of the share of the brother or brothers so dying, of the accumulations becoming distributable in the same manner as the corpus, under the terms of their father's will; and the Respondent, therefore, submitted, that the Appellant was bound by the acts and conduct of Surroopchunder Mullick, and was not entitled to set aside an understanding and arrangement founded, as they alleged, on good consideration, and in accordance with Hindoo law and the custom of Hindoo families, and so long and uniformly acted on by Surroopchunder [128] Mullick, together with his brothers, in his lifetime, as to render impossible the proper taking of the account which the Appellant sought to reopen; and that she was not entitled to any portion of the relief which she prayed, except the payment of the legacy.

 "In this case, the first question that arises is, whether the plaintiff is entitled under the Will to her husband's share in the corpus of the joint estate. Only one of the three learned Counsel for the Plaintiff has argued that she is so entitled. Assuming that the judgment of the Privy Council is not conclusive on the question, let us see what was the intention of the Testator. The first clause of the Will gives all the property, moveable and immoveable, to the five sons, but the gift is defeated by the eleventh clause.—[The learned Judge read the clause, ante, 125, and proceeded.] Only one learned Counsel for the Plaintiff argued in support of the position that the Plaintiff took her husband's share of the corpus. He contended that, according to English law, the gift over would create an estate tail in real property and an absolute interest in personalty. That might have been so as to real estate under the law as it stood before the Wills Act, but not so as regards personal estate; and, according to Hindoo law, there is no distinction between real and personal estate. There was an absolute gift to the four sons under the first clause of the Will. The words of the eleventh clause, 'Should any of my sons die not leaving any son, etc.,' would not, even according to the old law, have imported an indefinite failure of issue in the case of personalty, but at most merely a [129] failure of issue at the time of the death of the son. The limitation over was, therefore, valid as an executory bequest, and there was no necessity for any implication. Furthermore, there is no such estate known in the Hindoo law as an estate tail. The next question is, does the husband's share of the accumulation pass to his widow? It is admitted that the brothers continued joint, that all expenses were charged to the joint estate, and that the annual income and profits exceeded the disbursements. The Privy Council have held that the accumulations do not pass with the corpus under the executory bequest; but it has been contended, on the parts of the Defendants, that they should go with the corpus, under a contract to be inferred from the act of the parties in having carried the accumulations to the credit of the estate. It must, however, be first shown that, in having carried the accumulations to the credit of the estate, the parties intended an alteration of their rights; this has not been shown, and is not to be inferred from the evidence. It has also been said that the parties believed that the accumulations followed the corpus; if they believed this, why should they have contracted to treat the accumulations as forming part of the corpus, which we are asked to infer that they did. The Plaintiff is not entitled to any share of the corpus, but she is entitled to a share of the accumulations, together with a share of the profits (if any) made thereon."

The following decree was made in the cause. — "Declare that the Plaintiff, as the widow and immediate heiress and representative of Surroopchunder Mullick, deceased, is entitled, for and during the term of her natural life, to one equal fifth part or share of [130] and in the accumulations which accrued during the lifetime of Surroopchunder Mullick, from or in respect of the joint estate which was of Bustondoss Mullick, deceased, the Testator in the pleadings named, and to one equal fifth part or share of the interest and other profits, if any, which have been made or received since the death of Surroopchunder Mullick, from the accumulations which, as aforesaid, accrued during his lifetime from or in respect of the joint estate, to be held, possessed, and enjoyed by her as a Hindoo widow, in the manner prescribed by Hindoo law. And this Court doth further declare, that under the last Will and testament of Bustondoss Mullick, the Plaintiff, as the widow of Surroopchunder Mullick, is entitled to receive, out of the joint estate, the legacy of Co.'s Rs. 10,000; and Counsel for the Defendants not objecting, this Court doth order that the Accountant-General and sub-treasurer for the time being of the Government of India, with the privity of the Accountant-General of this Court, do pay, indorse, and deliver over, for the Plaintiff, in full of the legacy of Co.'s Rs. 10,000, the Government securities and cash balance paid into Court to the credit of this cause, under an order bearing date the 28th day of July, 1856, together with all accumulations of interest accrued due thereon. And this Court doth further order, that it be, and it is hereby, referred to the Master of this Court, to take an account of the joint estate, moveable and immoveable, as the same stood at the time of the death of the Bustondoss Mullick, and also an account of the joint estate as the same, with accumulations thereof, stood at the date of the death of Surroopchunder Mullick, and also an account of the joint estate as the same, [131] with the subsequent accumulations thereof, stands at the present time; and the Master, in taking the account, is to make to all parties all just allowances, and, for the better taking of the same, all parties are to produce before the Master, on oath (if required), all books, accounts, papers, and writings, in their or any or either of their hands, custody, power, or control, or in the hands, custody, power, or control of their or any or either of their servants or agents, relating to or in any way touching or concerning the matters hereby referred to the Master; and the Master is to be at liberty to examine upon oath, or interrogatories, or ex parte, the parties, Plaintiff and Defendants, and to examine upon oath such witnesses as shall for that purpose be produced before him by any or either of the parties to the suit; and, Counsel for the Defendants not objecting, this Court doth order that the Plaintiff be at liberty during her life to reside in the family dwelling-house of the Testator, and occupy the rooms which were occupied by her and her late husband in his lifetime, and be also at liberty to attend the performance of the worship of the family idol. And this Court doth further order, that the Defendants, Denobundoo Mullick, Brijobundo Mullick, Toolseedoss Mullick, and Soobuldoss Mullick, do pay to the Solicitors of the Plaintiff her costs of and incidental to this suit, up to and including this decree, when such costs shall have been taxed by the taxing officer of this Court, to whom it is hereby referred to tax the same. And this Court doth reserve the consideration of all further directions, and of the subsequent costs of this suit, until after the Master shall have made his report; and, in the meantime, all parties are to be at liberty to apply to this Court, [132] from time to time, as they may be advised, and this decree is to be binding on the infant Defendant, Koonjoobeharry Mullick, unless he, being served with a subpoena to show cause against the same, shall, within six months after he shall attain his full age, show unto this Court good cause to the contrary."

The present appeal was from this decree.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), Mr. Rolt, Q.C.; and Mr. W. Pearson, for the Appellant. The point determined upon the previous appeal (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 526) on overruling the demurrers had reference to the Appellant's right of accumulations of the income which had arisen from her husband's share of the Testator's estate during his lifetime. The question, whether she was also entitled to the corpus of that share, was not then determined, and is now open upon this bill, notwithstanding the decision of this Court on the demurrers. By the Hindoo law as received in Bengal, only such an alienation as might be made inter vivos by gift, would be good by a Will of a Hindoo, as he cannot alter the character of the estate, W. H. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 4; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. pp. 130, 265-6-7; ib. Vol. II. pp. 419, 428, 435. Although it is true by latter authorities it has been held, that a Will may be made by a Hindoo, yet it is admitted that the extent of the power of disposition by a Hindoo Testator is regulated by the Hindoo law, and must be in accordance with the rights of his family under that law, Vegetutchnee Unmul v. Gopee Nadaraja Chetty (ib. pp. 309, 345), Sonatum Bysack v. Sreemutty Juggutsoondree Dossee (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 66). The first clause [133] of the Will, if it be rightly interpreted as a bequest of the property, and not as a recognition of the rights which the Testator's sons, as his heirs, had, according to Hindoo law, is an absolute gift by the Testator of the whole of his estate, both real and personal, to his five sons, in equal shares. The eleventh clause is not sufficiently clear and unambiguous, to limit such absolute estate to an estate for life, on the contingency of a son dying without a son, or a son's son. Our contention is, that on the death of the Testator the Appellant's husband was entitled absolutely to one-fifth part of the estate, and not merely to a life interest therein, and that the Appellant, as his widow and legal personal representative, is entitled to that share, together with the additions and accumulations thereof made between the death of the Testator, and the death of her husband, to be held by her for life, as a Hindoo widow, who has by the Hindoo law a mere usufructuary inheritance in her husband's estate; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 251; W. H. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 33. At all events, we submit that the decree of the Court below is wrong, as the Appellant ought to have been declared entitled absolutely, and not merely during her life, to all the income which since the death of her husband has arisen, or may hereafter arise during the Appellant's life, as well from the accumulations, as from the capital of the share to which she is entitled; but if it should be determined that her husband took only a life interest in the one-fifth part of the corpus of the estate, then the decree ought to have declared that the Appellant as Surroopchunder Mullick's widow, was entitled to a proper sum by way of maintenance, consistent with her position in life, and the wealth whereof [134] her husband was possessed, out of the joint estate, to enable her to perform the religious acts required by the Hindoo law, in addition to, and independently of the legacy of Rs. 10,000, bequeathed her by the Will for her food and raiment; W. H. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Hindu Law," Vol. II. pp. 117-9, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 63.

At the conclusion of the Appellant's argument

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce, on the part of their Lordships observed, that upon one point, probably the principal point in the case, their Lordships did not consider it necessary to hear the Counsel for the Respondents. His Lordship then proceeded as follows:—The chief question is, as to the meaning and effect of a certain provision contained in the Will of the Testator, Bustondoss Mullick, first, what was the sense, and next, is the Will (duly construed) at variance with Hindoo law? By the first clause of the Will the Testator, mentioning his five sons, one of whom has since died, and whose share of the property is now in dispute, gives them, in effect, all his property, in such a way as, if there were no more in the Will, would make them absolute owners of it. But in a subsequent clause (the eleventh) the Testator says—[His Lordship read the clause, ante p. 125, and proceeded]—A controversy has been raised whether, according to the true meaning of this eleventh clause, the Testator points to an indefinite failure of male issue of any one of his sons whose male issue should fail, or failure of male issue at the time of his death. Their Lordships, taking the Will to have been translated accurately, as it seems admitted on all hands to be, consider it to be perfectly plain that that to which the Testator [135] here points is not an indefinite failure of male issue, but a failure of male issue of any of his sons at the time of the death of that son. This happened in the case of the son, Suroopchunder Mullick, who died without leaving male issue living at that time. Accordingly, an event has happened that the Testator pointed out. The question then is, whether the Hindoo law prohibits such a provision.

Whatever may have formerly been considered the state of that law as to the testamentary power of Hindoos over their property, that power has now long been recognized, and must be considered as completely established. This being so, we are to say, whether there is anything against public convenience, anything generally mischievous, or anything against the general principles of Hindoo law in allowing a Testator to give property, whether by way of remainder, or by way of executory bequest (to borrow terms from the law of England), upon an event which is to happen, if at all, immediately on the close of a life in being. Their Lordships think that there is not; that there would be great general inconvenience and public mischief in denying such a power, and that it is their duty to advise Her Majesty that such a power does exist. Such powers have been long recognised in practice. The law of India, at least the law of Bengal, has long been administered upon that basis, and the very mode in which this suit has been framed, and the manner in which it was conducted in India, are evidence, if evidence were wanting, that such is the general opinion entertained in Bengal. Their Lordships, therefore, being of opinion, as has already been stated, that according to the true meaning of this Will the property was given over upon an event [136] which was to take place, if at all, immediately on the close of a life in being at the time when the Will was made, and seeing that that event has happened, consider that the Testator, in making this provision, did not infringe or exceed the powers given him by the Hindoo law, and that the clause effectually gives the corpus of the property to the surviving sons immediately on the death of that son who died without leaving male issue. To that question, therefore, the Respondents' Counsel need not address themselves. The question or questions as to the accumulations, interest, and maintenance, they will be so good as to address themselves to.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., for the Respondents.—My Lords, I might, perhaps, respectfully beg to be informed, whether by the word “accumulations” your Lordships referred to the same question as “maintenance.”

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Accumulations, interest, and maintenance; every question, in short, except as to the title to the mere corpus.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Respondents, were heard upon this point.

A Hindoo widow can only claim maintenance out of the estate left by her husband when it devolves on preferential heirs, but, in this case, the decree appealed from, declares the Appellant to be the immediate heiress of her deceased husband, and as such entitled to the whole of the property left by him, and in one of the averments in the bill, she estimates the accumulations at Rs. 3,50,000, to be enjoyed by [137] her as a Hindoo widow. Maintenance is a claim on the estate which has been given over by the Will, which fixes her maintenance at a sum of Rs. 10,000, and she claims that legacy, and we submit, by accepting that sum under the Will, bequeathed expressly for food and raiment, she is estopped from claiming any other sum out of the Testator's estate, even if she was otherwise entitled. The fact of the Appellant's succeeding to property as widow and heiress of her deceased husband prevents any claim attaching on the estate of the Testator, even if she had not been expressly excluded from the same by the terms of the Will. Indeed, no claim for maintenance, beyond the claim for the legacy, was mooted in the Court below. If necessary, she may raise the point of maintenance when the cause comes before the Court below on further directions when the account is taken.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—Their Lordships are of opinion, that the declaration in the decree may be with propriety varied in the manner to be now read: as to which, however (though it is probably more a matter of form than of substance), their Lordships will readily listen to any observations that Counsel may wish to make. Their Lordships propose to report to Her Majesty, that the declaration in the decree of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, of the 25th of August, 1859, in the words following, namely:—This Court doth “declare that the Plaintiff, as the widow and immediate heiress and representative of Surroopchunder Mullick, deceased, is entitled, for and during the term of her natural life, to one equal fifth part or share of and in the accumulations which accrued during the lifetime of [138] Surroopchunder Mullick, from or in respect of the joint estate which was of Bustomdoss Mullick, deceased, the Testator in the pleadings named, and to one equal fifth part or share of the interest and other profits, if any, which have been made or received since the death of Surroopchunder Mullick, from the accumulations which, as aforesaid, accrued during his lifetime from or in respect of the joint estate, to be held, possessed, and enjoyed by her as a Hindoo widow, in the manner prescribed by Hindoo law," be omitted, and that it ought instead to be declared, that according to the true construction of the Will of Bustomdoss Mullick, Surroopchunder Mullick became and was entitled to one equal fifth part of the estate, moveable and immovable, of Bustomdoss Mullick, but that such title was defeasible, nevertheless, upon the event of his death without leaving any son, or son's son, then living:—And that it ought further to be declared, that Surroopchunder Mullick having died without leaving any son, or son's son, his interest in the capital of the estate determined upon his death. But that it ought to be also declared, that Surroopchunder Mullick was at the time of his death entitled, and that the Appellant, as his widow, heiress, and representative, is now entitled to one equal fifth part of all accumulations which arose from the estate of Bustomdoss Mullick from the time of his death to the time of the death of Surroopchunder Mullick, the part to which the Appellant is so entitled to be held, possessed, and enjoyed by her as a Hindoo widow in the manner prescribed by Hindoo law. And that it ought to be declared, that the Appellant is entitled absolutely in her own right to all such interest and accumulations as, since the death of Surroopchunder Mullick, has or have arisen [139] from the one-fifth part of the accumulations to which she is before declared to have been entitled.

There remains the question of maintenance. It may be that the decree in its present shape, varied only in the manner which has been mentioned, decides and settles that question, whether on the ground of the Appellant having received the Rs. 10,000, given by the Will, and taken the benefit of a residence and participation in the means of worship which the decree mentions, or otherwise. If that is the effect of the decree, their Lordships are not disposed to interfere with it. They see no ground on which the Appellant can claim that interference; and, on the other hand, if the decree leaves the point open, leaves room for an application which, upon the state of the accounts as they shall ultimately appear, or otherwise, it may be reasonable to make consistently with the decree, their Lordships do not desire to interfere with that. They leave the matter as it is.

Then with regard to the costs. It is true that the decree will be to some extent altered; but, as to the main point of the contention, the appeal fails. It can hardly be said to succeed on any point, notwithstanding the slight alteration in language. And they see no reason why, in addition to the heavy costs which this lady heretofore has—their Lordships do not say improperly—occasioned to the estate, the costs of this appeal should also be thrown upon it. Their Lordships are of opinion that the costs of this appeal must be borne by the Appellant.

Does any observation occur to the Counsel upon the proposed alteration?

The Solicitor-General.—None occur to me, my Lord.

[140] Mr. Leith.—None, my Lord, to me.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The Counsel, of course, will understand that we leave the declaration as to the right of the Appellant to receive the legacy of Rs. 10,000, to have such effect as it may. There is no doubt, we suppose, that the accounts directed by the decree which we leave untouched, will bring out the whole condition of the estate, and enable the declarations to be carried into effect.

Mr. Leith.—I believe so. I believe that we take every account necessary to raise the question of maintenance.

GOBIND CHUNDER SEIN.—Appellant: VALENTINE RYAN, and on his decease, the Administrator-General of Bengal. — Respondent * [Dec. 4, 5, 1861]

On appeal from the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

The Factors Act, 5th and 6th Vict. c. 39, is extended to India, by the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XX, of 1844.

A Banian, or agent, was entrusted by his principals with a bill of lading for a particular purpose, and he pledged the same, malâ fide, without the consent of his principals to a native Banker, for advances made to himself.

Held, that in order to invalidate a pledge so made, under the third section of the Act, 5th and 6th Vict., c. 39, it is necessary that the Court, or jury, should find that the lender had notice of the agent's malâ fides, or want of authority to pledge the goods [9 Moo. Ind. App. 165].

To establish such notice, it is sufficient to show that the circumstances attending the transaction were such as that a reasonable man of business applying his understanding to them, would certainly know that the agent had not authority to make the pledge, even if the agent was not also acting malâ fide towards his principals [9 Moo. Ind. App. 170].

An appeal abated by the death of the Respondent. Administration with the Will annexed was granted to the Administrator-General of Bengal. On the application of the Appellant the appeal was revived against the Administrator-General, as the personal representative of the Respondent [9 Moo. Ind. App. 157].

Trover by the Appellant against one Ryan to recover the value of seventy-five bales of twist.

The case turned entirely upon the question, whether [141] a pledge made by one Denonauth Sein, as Banian, or agent, of the firm of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., with the Appellant was protected by the operation of the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XX, of 1844, which extended the Factors Act, 5th and 6th Vict. c. 39, to India.

Ryan, in the month of August, 1857, was the master of the ship Aurora. The firm of Gouger and Co., of London, in that month shipped seventy-five bales of twist on board that ship, then bound from London to Calcutta, under a bill of lading, making the twist deliverable to Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., merchants and agents of Calcutta, or their assigns, as consignees for sale. The twist was shipped on account of Messrs. A. Gouger and Co. and Mr. Stewart; and Messrs. A. Gouger and Co. forwarded the bill of lading and invoice to Messrs. A. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., to be dealt with by them as agents for sale in the ordinary way on account of Gouger and Co. and Stewart, the owners of the goods. The Aurora arrived at Calcutta with the twist on board. The partners in the firm of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. were then absent from Calcutta, and the business of the firm was transacted by their manager, Mr. Cockshott. Denonauth Sein had for some time previously been, and then was, acting as [142] Banian for the firm of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., and so continued to act until the month of February, 1858, when he absconded.

On the 18th of February, 1858, while so acting as Banian of that firm, Mr. Cockshott handed to Denonauth Sein the bill of lading of the twist, for the purpose of enabling him to get from the ship's agents the usual delivery order to get signed, and delivery of the twist made to Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. On the following day Denonauth Sein informed Cockshott that he had sold the twist to one Doorgapersaud, the price to be paid in cash on delivery of the goods from the godowns or warehouses of Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., and the same to be cleared away and settled for within forty-one days, and Cockshott accordingly entered the sale in the contract-book of the firm. On the 23rd of the same month the ship's agents signed the delivery order. It appeared that on the 24th of that month, Denonauth

Sein, borrowed from the Appellant, who was a money lender at Calcutta, the sum of Rs. 20,000, on a pledge of the bill of lading, without the knowledge of Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., who had never authorised him to pledge or deal with the same. Denonauth Sein was at this time largely indebted to Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., and had frequently been pressed by Cockshott to reduce the amount of his debt; and it appeared that he had taken the first part of the bill of lading to the Appellant, and informed him of the sale to Doorgapersaud, and of the entry thereof in the book of the firm, and that the price had not been paid by Doorgapersaud, and that the latter had forty-one days to clear the twist from the godowns of Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. The Appellant retained the first part of the bill of lading, [143] and advanced to Denonauth Sein, who was in want of money, the sum of Rs. 20,000, less Rs. 400, which he deducted and retained for interest, and he then received from Denonauth Sein his note of hand, and also a memorandum of deposit of the bill of lading in consideration of the advance so made. Before making the advance the Appellant enquired of Cockshott as to his authority to hand the bill of lading to Denonauth Sein, but the Appellant did not enquire of Cockshott whether Denonauth Sein had the authority of his principals, Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., to pledge the bill of lading. Of the money so received, Denonauth Sein paid the sum of Rs. 10,000, into the Oriental Bank to his principals' account. On the 2nd of March, 1858, the Appellant applied to Ryan, by letter, for delivery of the twist, but the same having been claimed by Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., who denied the Appellant's right to it, they desired Ryan not to give it up to him, to which he assented, on being indemnified by Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., against the Appellant's claim. An action of trover was in consequence brought by the Appellant against Ryan in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, for the recovery of the value of the twist. The Defendant pleaded two pleas, first not guilty, and second not possessed. The Plaintiff joined issue on those pleas.

The action was tried before the Chief Justice, Sir James Colville and Sir Charles M. R. Jackson. Among other witnesses examined on behalf of the Plaintiff was the Plaintiff himself, Denonauth Sein, and Cockshott. The facts above set forth were proved at the trial, and evidence was given of the nature of the duties of a Banian. The Supreme Court found a verdict for the Plaintiff on the plea [144] of not guilty, and a verdict for the Defendant on the plea of not possessed, upon which judgment was entered up for the Defendant.

The Plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground, first, that the verdict was against the evidence; and secondly, that there had been a misdirection.

After the argument upon the rule, Sir James W. Colville, on the 4th of March, 1859, delivered the judgment of the Court, as follows:—"The only pleas are not guilty, and not possessed. If the second issue is established, there can be no doubt about the conversation. Therefore, the only substantial question at the trial was, whether the Plaintiff had made out that right to the possession of the goods which entitled him to maintain the action. The goods were consigned by the ship Aurora to Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., as factors, for sale, on the joint account of Messrs. Gouger and Stewart, the former only of whom is a partner in Gouger, Jenkins, and Company. The Aurora arrived in February, 1858, about the 18th of that month. Cockshott, who then managed the business of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., as the constituted attorney of the two partners, both of whom were absent and in Europe, delivered to Denonauth Sein, the Banian of the firm, the bill of lading for the goods blank indorsed, but for the special purpose only of getting from the agents of the ship the usual delivery order, under which, in the ordinary course of business, the goods would have been landed and brought to the godowns of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. Some delay took place in getting the delivery order, which was not written across the face of the bill of lading until the 22nd of February. The form of it, notwithstanding the blank indorse-[145]-ment, is, 'Deliver to Gouger, Jenkins, and Co.' And there was evidence that it is according to the usual course of business here, though neither the necessity nor the prudence of the custom is apparent, to send bills of lading, when delivery orders are required, with the blank indorsement of the holders. In the meantime, and on the 19th of February, Denonauth Sein represented to Cockshott that he had found purchasers for the seventy-five bales of twist: and thereupon the usual contract of sale with Doorgapersaud and others, was entered in the sale-book of Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., but by accident or design (a circumstance which seems to have occurred on other occasions) was not signed by Doorgapersaud, the declared purchaser. It however bears the initials of Cockshott in token of his approval of it. On that contract, Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., appear to be the vendors of the goods, and the price is made payable on delivery from their godowns to the purchaser, who undertakes to clear away and settle for the goods within forty-one days after the date of the contract. It will now be convenient to state what, in our judgment, has been proved in the action touching the functions and powers of the Banian in relation to the firm of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., particularly with reference to this transaction. It is necessary to consider the evidence in this particular case, because, as we have had occasion to remark in other cases, although there may be a general similarity, there is by no means that uniformity in the relations of Banians with their employers in this city, which would justify us in assuming any of the points in question as known usages of trade. In the present instance there seems to have been [146] no written agreement of Banianship; but upon the parol evidence, the Court at the trial, inclining where they differed, rather to Messrs. Jenkins and Cockshott than to Denonauth Sein, who was a witness open to great suspicion, came to a very clear conclusion that the relations of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., and Denonauth Sein, might fairly be described as follows:—It was the duty of Denonauth Sein, as Banian, to find purchasers for goods imported by the house; when found they were brought by him to the partners, or other European manager, like Cockshott, of the house, and if the bargain was approved of, a formal and written contract, like that which has been put in evidence, was entered in the sale-book; Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., invariably appearing on the face of it as the sellers. This contract, in the proper and ordinary course of business, would be signed by the purchaser, though that ceremony seems, in this and in other instances, from carelessness or other cause, occasionally to have been omitted. The approval of the contract was intimated by affixing the initials of the partner or manager, in the present instance of Cockshott. The delivery would generally be from the godowns of Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., though, for the convenience of both, or either party, it might sometimes be made from the ship's side; and after the execution of the contract and its approval by his employers, the Banian would have an implied authority, without further reference to them, to make delivery, pursuant to the terms of the contract, but not otherwise, to the purchaser. The Banian, however, was not merely an agent or servant with these duties and powers. [147] Upon all sales he received a dustoorie, or commission, payable by the purchaser; and for this, as for a del credere commission, he guaranteed the acceptance of the goods and the payment of the price by the purchaser. By reason of this guarantee he became liable, when the time fixed by the contract for taking delivery had expired, or at the end of the month within which that time fell, to be charged in account with the price of the goods sold; and if he were so charged, any rights which the vendors had against the defaulting purchaser would, if exercised at all, be exercised for his benefit. He had also a general authority to receive payment according to the terms of the contract; and if he received payment before he was so chargeable in account, it would seem that he got what benefit might arise from the intermediate use of the money. Hence arose a running account between him and the house, in which he was debited with all the proceeds of goods sold with which he had become chargeable as above-mentioned, and was credited with the value of goods purchased on this credit for the house in the bazaar, and with his other disbursements, if any, on account of the house. It is proved that, at the date of the transaction in question, Denonauth Sein was largely indebted on the balance of this account. It is not proved that he was ever in advance to the house. Inasmuch, however, as some of the arguments which have been most strongly urged against the verdict are founded on this course of dealing, it is necessary to state positively, as one of our conclusions of fact, that the house never looked or intended to look exclusively to the liability and credit of the Banian, or [148] to abandon, so far as they might be necessary for its own protection, any remedies which it might have under the contract against the purchasers, or any security which the law might give them by way of lien upon the goods. We come to this conclusion, not merely because we think that the positive testimony of Messrs. Jenkins and Cockshott is more worthy of credit than the loose evidence of Denonauth Sein and the Plaintiff on this point, but also because the former seems to us to be consistent with and confirmed by the written contracts in the sale-book, and the whole course of dealing evidenced by them. If, then, our view of the evidence is correct, it follows that the powers and duties of Denonauth Sein, between him and his employers, with reference to these goods, after he received the Bill of lading, were, before the contract with Doorgapersaud, to get the goods landed and brought to the godown of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., and after the approval of that contract, to deliver the goods on payment of the price, pursuant to the contract, but until such delivery to keep them in the godowns of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., or otherwise in the actual or constructive possession. The pledge under which the Plaintiff claims title took place after the approval of the contract, and, therefore, whilst Denonauth's authority was of the latter description. He seems, some short time before, to have confided to the Plaintiff that he was in want of money, and to have come to some general understanding with him concerning advances upon the pledge of goods; but it does not, I think, very clearly appear that more than a transaction of this kind actually took place between them. The Plaintiff [149] and Denonauth Sein do not altogether agree in their evidence as to the preparation of the instrument of pledge, or the minor details of the negotiations which led to it. But it is clear that, on the 24th of February, Denonauth Sein handed the bill of lading to the Plaintiff, signed the instrument of pledge, and received, by cheque on the Bank of Bengal, Rs. 19,600, being the sum for which he pledged the goods, less Rs. 400 retained by way of discount. The letter of pledge is altogether silent about Doorgapersaud and the previous sale to him. It is, on the face of it, a pledge by the Banian, for his own purposes, of goods imported by his principals; but it is abundantly clear, on the evidence of the Plaintiff himself, that before he advanced his money he had been informed that Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. had sold these goods to Doorgapersaud, who had not paid the price of them, and was not entitled to the delivery of any for which he had not paid. The assent of Doorgapersaud to the transaction has been urged as an argument in the Plaintiff's favour; but it is obvious that the transaction has none of the essential elements of a subcontract by Doorgapersaud, in order to raise and pay the price of the goods. The advance is less than the whole price; the deposit is of the whole parcel of goods; the loan is to Denonauth Sein; he incurs a personal liability on his note of hand for it; the charges and risk of landing and the cost of storing the goods are to fall on him. The pledge imports no liability on the part of Doorgapersaud. He has nothing to do with it, except that he retains the right of clearing the goods as he can pay for them, and of converting the Plaintiff's lien on the goods into one on their [150] proceeds. Upon this state of facts, the Plaintiff at the trial rested his title (nor do we see how he could do otherwise) upon the last Factors Act, the 5th and 6th Viet. c. 39, extended to this country by Act. No. XX. of 1844. The evidence, however, involved a question which, if decided in favour of the Defendant, would, it was urged, deprive the Plaintiff of the protection of the Factors Act, even though he were otherwise entitled to it. It was insisted that there was evidence from which the Court might conclude that the alleged contract with Doorgapersaud was a mere fraudulent contrivance of the Banian, in order to gain dominion over the goods; and, therefore, that upon the authority of Kingsford v. Merry (26 L. J. Exch. 83), and Higsons v. Burton, (26 L. J. Exch. 342), the pledge of Denonauth Sein could not give a title even to a bona fide pledgee. This question we decided at the trial in favour of the Plaintiff, not because we had or have a very confident opinion that the sale to Doorgapersaud was a real bona fide transaction, but because we thought that it lay upon the Defendant to impeach it by calling Doorgapersaud, of whom both sides seemed to be afraid, and that we could not, in the absence of direct evidence, and on mere suspicion, presume that the alleged contract, which Cockshott and the Plaintiff had both at one time treated as valid, was a mere fraudulent pretence. The other questions considered at the trial were, first, whether Denonauth Sein was an agent, entrusted with the possession of the goods, or the document of title to them (the bill of lading), within the meaning of the Act; secondly, whether it did not sufficiently appear on the whole evidence, that the particular transaction was, by force of the [151] third section, excluded from the protection of the Act. On the first of these issues the burthen of proof lay on the Plaintiff; on the second, it lay on the Defendant. Upon the first of these questions, it appeared to us that Denonauth Sein was something more than a mere servant, or one of that class of agents which, in Wood v. Rowcliffe (6 Hare, 191), was held not to be within the scope of the last Factors Act : that he was a mercantile agent, though with powers far short of those of a general agent or factor for sale. We thought further, being such an agent, and entrusted, though for a special purpose, with the bill of lading, blank indorsed, he might, in certain circumstances, have made a pledge of the goods, which would have been protected by the Act : although it appeared, on the face of the document and other wise, that he held it only as agent for Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. ; whether we went too far in this it is unnecessary on this rule to inquire. But upon the other question we thought that the evidence brought the case within the proviso of the third section. We thought that the sale to Doorgapersaud (treating it as a real contract), and the communication of that sale to the Plaintiff before he advanced his money, put the Plaintiff into an entirely different position from that in which he might have stood had there been no such sale, or had he been ignorant of it. In the first place, it entirely negated the existence of that state of things which generally calls for the application of the Act, namely, a general agency involving a power to sell, and, therefore, under the provisions of the Act, a power to pledge, unless the non-existence of the latter power was made known to the party taking the goods. For the Plaintiff knew that if Denonauth Sein ever had a power to sell these [152] goods, that power had been expended by the sale ; and he knew more, he knew that the sale had been made, not by Denonauth Sein, but by and in the name of his principals, and that Denonauth Sein never had had the unqualified power of a factor for sale. He must be taken on his own evidence to have known further, that the goods had not been paid for ; that Doorgapersaud was not entitled to delivery or possession of them, except upon payment ; and that the agency of Denonauth Sein was limited to the retention of the goods on behalf of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., until payment pursuant to the contract, whatever it might be, and to delivery upon such payment being made to him as agent of the seller. Yet, with the knowledge that the interest of Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. in the goods, was simply that of unpaid vendors, and that the possession of Denonauth Sein, actual or constructive, was attributed to that interest, and could not extend beyond it : he takes from Denonauth Sein a pledge which might, as in fact it did, injuriously affect the position and interest of his principals, and, in the event of his insolvency, which happened, deprive them of the price of their goods, contrary to the known course of dealing between Merchants and their Banians. The case might be stronger if the Plaintiff were fixed with knowledge of the terms of the written contract, and, in an ordinary case, we should have held that, by what he knew, he was so put upon an inquiry into those terms as to be fixed with constructive notice of them. But, inasmuch as the Factors Act proceeds very much upon the principle of 'no questions asked' (a principle which may have been wisely introduced so far into commercial transactions, but which is certainly not found to be conducive to [153] honesty and fair dealing in the general concerns of mankind), we will not push the knowledge of the Plaintiff, actual or constructive, to this extent. It seems to us, however, that upon his own admissions of what he knew, the Court at the trial, rightly came to the conclusion that the circumstances were such as that a reasonable man, and a man of business, applying his understanding to them, would certainly know that Denonauth Sein had not authority to make the pledge, if not also that he was acting mala fide in respect thereof, against his principals. Some exception was taken, on the argument of the rule to this application of Lord Tenterden's ruling, in Evans v. Trueman (1 Mood. and Rob. 10), which, it was said, was a case that arose under the earlier Statute, the 6th Geo. IV. c. 94. But it is to be observed that the ruling, modified as we have modified it, is adopted by Lord St. Leonards in his celebrated judgment in Navulshaw v. Brownrigg (2 De G. Mac. and Gor. 452), as a proper mode of leaving to the jury the question of notice, under the 5th and 6th Vict. c. 39. It remains to consider a few of the objections, which on the rule have been urged to the finding of the Court, and have not already been incidentally noticed. It has been urged strongly that, inasmuch as Rs. 19,600, were actually advanced and paid, there would not be mala fides. But an actual advance cannot be conclusive of the question of bona fides ; since, if so, there would be no necessity expressly to require bona fides on the part of the pledge, by the third section of an Act which professes only to protect transactions in which money has been actually advanced. Again, bona fides in the pledgee is not alone sufficient. It is necessary that there should also be (see Narulshaw [154] v. Brownrigg, p. 450) "no notice that the agent is making the contract, either mala fide or beyond his authority." Again, it is said, there was no evidence of a lien on the goods. If this is meant of the existence of the vendor's lien under the contract, it is contradicted by the contract itself. But it is argued that the lien was waived by allowing Denonauth Sein to deliver without further consent from his principals. His authority, however, was only to deliver upon payment of the price. The lien would not the less subsist, even if he had been entrusted with the possession of the goods, since he can only have been entrusted with them in order to work out that lien for his principals, to whom it belonged. Had the goods been brought into their godowns, as in the ordinary course of business they ought to have been, he would not have had the possession of them; he would have had merely the power of taking them out of those godowns, and delivering them as paid for. Then, it is said, the Plaintiff had no notice of any such lien. But surely this is a fallacy. He knew that Denonauth Sein held the goods only as agent for Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., and that they had been sold to Doorgapersaud, who was not entitled to receive them until he had paid for them. This pledge, if a pledge of anything, was of the vendor's interest in the goods, that is, of the lien, until payment and delivery to Doorgapersaud, and of the proceeds afterwards. Again, it is argued that the lien was waived either by reason of the course of dealing between the house and the Banian, or by reason of the admission of Cockshott, touching the application of Rs. 10,000, part of the sum advanced by the Plaintiff. Now, one does not see how the lien could be waived except in [155] favour of the purchaser, and it is clear that, at the time of the pledge, Doorgapersaud neither was, nor represented himself to be, entitled to the possession of the goods. If it be meant that the lien was transferred to Denonauth Sein, the answer is that it was transferred to him only as agent, and for the benefit of his employers. The right to charge the Banian in account, under his guarantee, does not seem to us to affect this question, for that right could not accrue until the expiration of the forty days fixed for taking delivery, at which time either the contract must have been performed by delivery on the one hand and payment through the Banian and agent on the other, or the purchaser must have failed in the performance of the contract. And, in the particular case, the right was never exercised. Again, nothing in our judgment turn upon the expression of Cockshott, of which much more has been made on the rule than was made at the trial, in his examination de bene esse, to the effect that when the account put in was acknowledged, he knew that Rs. 10,000 of the money had been applied in purchase of the Bills of the Oriental Bank. The time when the account was acknowledged is not stated, but it was obviously later than that at which the account was made out; still later than that at which the bill became due. The case as to the Rs. 10,000, is simply this:—Denonauth Sein, when bound to lay out that sum for his principals out of other moneys due from him, obtains that and more by means of an unauthorized and fraudulent pledge of these goods. The result to his principals is the same. If the pledge avails against them, they, to the extent of it, have been defrauded of the price of their goods, whether any part of the [156] money went to reduce the balance due from the Banian on other transactions, or not. Lastly, on this question of lien, the Plaintiff's Counsel invoked the doctrine of Beardman v. Sill (1 Camp. 410 n.), and argued that the Defendant, not having set up a claim of lien originally, but having contended that the sale was a fiction, could not afterwards insist upon it. But there is no room here for the application of that doctrine. The Defendant does not now rest the defence as upon a subsisting lien. The lien was a circumstance which, if the contract was real, existed at the time of the pledge. When Doorgapersaud repudiated, or failed to complete his contract, the Defendant's property in the goods reverted. He is precluded from resisting the Plaintiff's title under the Factors Act, by insisting on any circumstance found by the Court to have existed at the time of the pledge. We have already incidentally dealt with the argument which treats the transaction as a pledge by or with the concurrence of the purchaser in order to raise the price of the goods. Upon the whole, then, no ground has been laid before us which induces us to disturb the verdict for the Defendant; and I need not say that it is a great satisfaction to Mr. Justice

Jackson and myself, who alone tried the cause at Nisi Prius, that the rule has been argued before a full Court, and that we are supported in our view of the case by Mr. Justice Wells, whose only doubt is, whether upon the evidence, Denonauth Sein was an agent entrusted with the bill of lading within the meaning of the Act. That question, however, we have treated as not open on this rule."

The appeal was from this judgment.

After the admittance of the appeal, Ryan died, [157] whereby the appeal became abated. Letters of administration with the Will annexed of Ryan were granted by the Ecclesiastical side of the Supreme Court at Calcutta to the Respondent, the Administrator-General of Bengal.

(June 14, 1861 *) The Appellant now moved to revive the appeal against the Administrator-General, as the legal personal representative of Ryan.

Mr. W. Field, appeared in support of the application. By an Order in Council it was directed that the appeal be revived against the Administrator-General of Bengal for the time being, and that the appeal be put in the same plight and condition as it was before the death of Ryan.

The appeal, being thus revived, came on for hearing.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., and Mr. W. Field, for the Appellant.—Our contention is, that Denonauth Sein had authority from Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. to pledge the bill of lading and goods. He was the Banian, or agent of the firm, exercising powers similar to a factor in this country, and entrusted by his firm with the bill of lading in blank, and his act comes within the meaning of the first section of the Factors Act, 5th and 6th Viet. c. 39, which Statute was extended to India by the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XX. of 1844, [158] and the pledge was valid within that section, and did not fall within the third section of the Statute. The evidence does not establish mala fides on the part of Denonauth Sein, the transfer of the bill of lading is not disputed, neither is any objection taken that full value was not given, nor that the Appellant had notice of any want of authority, or mala fides on his part which is necessary to bring the case within the third section. How, then, can it be treated as a fraud? The true rule is to be found in Evans v. Trueman (1 Mood. and Rob., 10). That case arose under the Statute, 4th Geo. IV. c. 83, and Lord Tenterden, referring to the Statute 6th Geo. IV. c. 94 says, "The expression in the Statute is, that a party is to be entitled to its protection if he shall not have notice by the documents, or otherwise, that the pledger was not the actual and bona fide owner of the goods pledged: a person may have knowledge of a fact either by direct communication, or by being aware of circumstances which must lead a reasonable man, applying his mind to them, and judging from them, to the conclusion that the fact is so; knowledge acquired in either of these ways is enough, I think, to exclude a party from the benefit of the provisions of this Statute; slight suspicion, I think, will not." These principles are recognized by Lord St. Leonards in Navulshaw v. Brownrigg (2 De G. Mac. and Gor., 452), which case turned upon the Statute, 5th and 6th Viet. c. 39, the Statute in question: there his Lordship, referring to Evans v. Trueman, observes, "It is necessary, therefore, even according to this case, to fix a man with knowledge of the want of authority, in order to take from him the benefit of the Statute." The same rule prevails with respect to [159] Bills of Exchange, Backhouse v. Harrison (5 Barn. and Adol., 1098), Goodman v. Harvey (4 Adol. and Ell. 870). The Bank of Bengal v. Radakisser Mitter (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 19), Wilkins v. Jadis (2 Barn. and Adol. 188). Gross negligence may, it is true, be evidence of mala fides. Raphael v. The Bank of England (17 C. Ben. Rep. 161).—[The Lord Justice Knight Bruce: Is there here anything but a question of fact? You accept the case of Navulshaw v. Brownrigg as law, and that case the Judges in the Court below relied upon in their judgment against you.] Denonauth Sein was a Banian and acted for other persons, as well as the firm of Gouger and Co., and was subject to a monthly account with his principals, therefore, independently of the Act, he had power to pledge the bill of lading, as it was within the general scope of his authority, Prescott v. Flinn (9 Bingh., 19), Story on Agency, sec. 26. It may be urged that the evidence of usage as respects this last position is not strong, but one or two instances of usage is enough, Holt's Nisi Prius Rep., p. 270. Moreover, it must be taken that the pledge of the bill of lading by Denonauth Sein with the Appellant was ratified by Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. That firm accepted the Rs. 10,000, part of the Rs. 19,600 received by Denonauth Sein with knowledge of the manner in which the money was procured.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), Mr. Leith, and Mr. Honyman, for the Respondent.—The Court below upon the evidence rightly held that the case came within the third section of the Factors Act for India, No. XX. of 1844, which prevents the [160] Appellant acquiring any title to the goods sued for. Denonauth Sein was not an agent entrusted with the bill of lading within the true meaning of that Act. The evidence establishes the fact, that he never was authorized by Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co. to pledge the bill of lading in question. The whole question depends upon evidence which has been sifted and rightly applied by the Court below. It cannot be urged with any success, that because Denonauth Sein was indebted to his principals and paid in the sum of Rs. 10,000, to their account, that it amounted to a ratification of his act of pledging, which we submit was mala fides.

Their Lordships' judgment was reserved, and now pronounced by

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (Dec. 21, 1861).—This was an action of trover, brought in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, to recover the value of certain bales of twist. The pleas were, not guilty and not possessed. The original Defendant was one Ryan, Master of the ship Aurora—he is now deceased—and represented by the nominal Defendant; but as the action was defended on the indemnity by Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co., Merchants at Calcutta, it will be convenient to treat them as the Respondents. The case was tried before the then Chief Justice Sir James W. Colville, and Sir Charles M. Jackson; they found a verdict for the Defendants, and subsequently discharged a rule for a new trial which had been applied for on the grounds of misdirection, and of the verdict being against the evidence. Judgment was entered up, and against this verdict and judgment the present appeal has been brought.

[161] The undisputed facts of the case are substantially as follows:—The goods in question were shipped in London by Alfred Gouger on behalf of himself and a Mr. Stewart, and consigned to Messrs. Gouger, Jenkins, and Co.; the bill of lading was forwarded to them. At the time of the arrival neither Gouger nor Jenkins was at Calcutta, and the business of their firm was being carried on by James Tobin Cockshott, under a power of attorney. The firm had been in the habit of employing a Banian of the name of Denonauth Sein; to this man Cockshott gave the bill of lading indorsed in blank, for the purpose of procuring a delivery order, and the delivery of the goods to the firm; but it was also part of the ordinary employment of Denonauth Sein, which applied to the present transaction, to procure a purchaser, and when he had so done, he was to report the name of the buyer and the terms to his principals for their assent to the contract. If they agreed, their initials were written upon it, which being done the Banian had authority to deliver the goods to the purchaser and receive the price. Between the Banian and his principals there was an account current, which was balanced at the end of the month; he was then debited for the contract price of the goods sold, and credited for the sums which he paid to the house; he received his "dustoree," or commission, from the purchaser.

In the present case he contracted for the sale of the goods to one Doorgapersaud, and by the terms of the contract the goods were to be cleared away and settled for within forty-one days after landing days, from the date of the contract, the 19th of February, 1848. To this contract Cockshott assented, and affixed his initials, and thenceforward Denonauth [162] Sein became entrusted, as between himself and his employers, with the bill of lading for the purpose of delivering the goods on the terms of the contract; they were by these terms made deliverable on payment in cash.

In this state of things, Denonauth Sein and Doorgapersaud went to the Appellant, a Banker and money-lender. According to the evidence, they represented to him that the latter had made a contract for the twist, and Denonauth Sein produced the bill of lading; it was stated that Doorgapersaud could not pay the whole amount, between

Rs. 23,000 and Rs. 24,000, in one sum, and that they (the two) wanted an advance. It was finally arranged that the Appellant should advance to Denonauth Sein, Rs. 20,000, less Rs. 400, deducted for discount. Denonauth Sein gave him his own promissory note for the amount, and signed a letter prepared by him, which stated the fact of the delivery to him of the bill of lading, and gave him authority to sell for his own benefit the goods in case of non-payment within one month and a half, refunding any excess that might remain after deducting the principal and interest, and other charges and making Denonauth Sein liable to him for any deficiency on the sale. Upon the authority of this instrument the delivery of the goods was demanded by the Appellant, and refused upon the indemnity of the Respondents; and the present action brought.

It is stated that Rs. 23,600 were paid to Denonauth Sein, and of these he paid Rs. 10,000 to the Oriental Bank on account of the Respondents, in obedience to a previous order, and had credit from them for the amount in the account current between them, in [163] which he was at the time, and still remains, largely indebted to them in respect of previous sales and other transactions on their behalf.

Upon the trial some evidence was given as to the nature of Denonauth Sein's employment, and the character and extent of his agency. The Court found that he received the bill of lading for the especial purpose of getting delivery of the goods, and that before the delivery order given, but after the receipt of the bill of lading, he informed his employers of the sale, and that they approved of the purchaser; that he was not strictly a Factor, but more than a mere servant—an agent to find purchasers, and, under some circumstances, to guarantee the payment; that the bill of lading was allowed by Cockshott to remain in his hands to obtain delivery of the goods, and that he had full authority to give delivery to purchasers on payment of the price; that he was, in the transaction in question, an agent within the meaning of the last Factors Act; that it must be taken on the evidence that the contract of sale with Doorgapersaud was not fraudulent; and that the only question remaining was, whether the pledge to the Appellant was protected by that Act—as to which the Court thought that the facts raised the inference that there was mala fides on the part of Denonauth Sein in dealing as he had done with the goods, and that the Appellant had notice that the pledge was without authority from the Respondents, and not bona fide. They therefore, held that the transaction did not come within the protection of the Factors Act, and that the verdict must be for the Respondents.

On this finding the rule was obtained which we have stated above, and, after argument, discharged, [164] upon the grounds stated in a very able and learned judgment delivered by Sir James W. Colvile, the correctness of which their Lordships are now to consider. In doing so it may be convenient, in the first place, to dispose of the question of a misdirection; and this they will do very shortly; for it seems to them that there is not the slightest ground for this part of the rule.

The question which the learned Judges made the cardinal one in the case, was, whether the circumstances were such as that a reasonable man, and a man of business, applying his understanding to them, would certainly know that Denonauth Sein had not authority to make the pledge, if not, also, that he was acting mala fide in respect thereof against his principals.

This is precisely the way in which the question was put to the jury in a case under the first Factors Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 94, Evans v. Trueman (1 Moo. and R. 10); and this was unquestioned at the time, though the case came before the Court on other point; this mode of leaving to the jury the question of notice was approved of by Lord St. Leonards, in Navulshaw v. Brownrigg (2 De G. Mac. and Gor., 452), as a proper mode under the last Factors Act, 5th and 6th Vict., c. 39; on which, in substance, the present case depends. And their Lordships entirely concur in the principle established by these authorities. The question so put gives full effect, on the one hand, to the large words of the first section of the Act, and effectuates the object of protecting pledges and exchanges of securities made bona fide by agents entrusted with them, in consideration of advances made in respect thereof; and [165] on the other hand, it gives proper, and no more than proper, effect to the third section, which limits such protection to loans, advances, and exchanges made bona fide, and without notice, either that the agent making them has not authority to make the same, or is acting mala fide in respect thereof against the owners of the goods represented by the document pledged. It makes the decision dependent not at all on mere suspicion, on the want of inquiry or of reasonable caution in the party advancing on the pledge, nor yet on the mere want of good faith in the agent, of which the party advancing is ignorant: all these, and such matters as these, which are in themselves inconclusive, and tend to embarrass the dealing with negotiable instruments, may be evidence; but the Tribunal deciding the issue, whether the jury, or, as there, the Judges acting as a jury, must, in order to bring the case within the third, and take it out of the first section, categorically find the facts of want of good faith, and of notice to the lender of want of authority in the agent, or that he is acting mala fide in the transaction against his principal. The Statute is silent as to the grounds on which the conclusion is to be arrived at; that is left to the ordinary principles of evidence. But, where the fact is so found, it would be as much against mere honesty as against the interests of commerce, properly considered, to afford any protection to the transaction. This objection, therefore, to the judgment entirely fails.

It remains to consider whether the verdict was against the evidence, and in doing so it will be necessary to introduce some additional facts, which did not find their place in the previous summary.

[166] Upon a careful consideration of all the circumstances, and after attention given to the arguments of the Appellant's Counsel, their Lordships are of opinion, that the Judges below have drawn the only right conclusion, that to which their Lordships would have been themselves led, and that the Court has shown great caution in not pressing its inferences as far, perhaps, against the Appellant as in strict justice might have been warranted.

The Judges say, that where there was a conflict of testimony between the Appellant and Denonauth Sein on the one hand, and Jenkins and Cockshott on the other, they had been disposed to credit the latter rather than the former. Now, it being assumed that Denonauth Sein was an agent entrusted with the document of title to the goods, so as to bring the case within the first section of the Statute, the advance which the Appellant made will still not be protected unless made bona fide, and without notice that the agent making the contract had not authority to make the same, or was acting mala fide against the owner. The Appellant must in the first place have acted bona fide in making the advance; and, secondly, he must have been without notice of want of authority in the agent; or, thirdly, of the mala fides in him against the owner. It appears to their Lordships that the evidence establishes all these three propositions.

As to the first, they assume that the Appellant really advanced the large sum of Rs. 19,600, but this alone will not establish his bona fides: he did so on advantageous terms to himself (whose business it was to lend money), in respect of the rate of discount and interest, and of perfect security, if the transaction should remain unimpeached. But beyond [167] this it was essential to his bona fides that he should believe the representations of Denonauth Sein and Doorgapersaud; and if he believed these, he must have believed also that the goods were actually sold to the latter, and were to be cleared and settled for in forty-one days: yet the terms of his advance were that he might, when he pleased, remove the goods at the cost of Denonauth Sein to his own godowns, and at the end of a month and fifteen days sell them, if the advance were not then repaid with all charges. Now, he says, he did not come to this agreement without cautiously inquiring as to the power under which Cockshott, the apparent principal for the time being of Denonauth Sein, was said to be acting, and that he went to Cockshott for the purpose of seeing it, and did so. If he had been acting bona fide, towards Cockshott, it seems to us that, exercising this somewhat superabundant caution as to the power, it is incredible that when in Cockshott's presence he should have made no inquiry or communication respecting this particular transaction; yet their Lordships think it perfectly clear upon the evidence that he did not. When it is considered how conclusive that communication, one way or the other, would have been, they cannot doubt that it would have been made by any one about to enter into such a transaction bona fide, nor that it would have been stated, if it had been made; but neither does the Appellant affirm it in his evidence nor was Cockshott cross-examined to it; and he, having been examined on interrogatories before the trial, and not being at the trial, his silence on the subject is entirely consistent with the same conclusion. If the transaction had been bona fide on the part of the Appellant, the communication, as we have said, [168] would naturally have been made, but if it were mala fide, it certainly would not; because it must have been known that it would put an end to the transaction at once, and that Denonauth Sein would not have been allowed to pledge goods which were already under contract of sale. This circumstance, however, strong as it is, does not stand alone. Denonauth Sein comes to the Appellant, not armed with all the documents which are stated to be usually in the hands of an agent authorised to pledge, and without excuse for their absence; and he comes, too, as an agent who has already confessedly exhausted his authority in respect of the goods, by the contract which he has made for the sale of them, and who seeks to pledge them on terms inconsistent with the terms of that contract. The presence and implied assent of the purchaser, so far from lessening these difficulties, was of a nature only to increase the suspicions attaching to the transaction.

The evidence enables their Lordships to deal with the two remaining questions at the same time. Had the Appellant notice that Denonauth Sein was without authority to make the contract of pledge, or that he was acting mala fide against his principals? They think that the evidence warrants an answer in the affirmative as to both. First, it is clear that in fact he had no authority express as to this transaction, or to be implied from any previous course of dealing; and if in truth he had been allowed to pledge more frequently, or with greater similarity of circumstances to those of the transaction in question than the evidence here discloses, there is nothing to show that the Appellant was aware of this, or acted on the credit of it. Secondly, it is clear that in fact [169] Denonauth Sein was acting mala fide towards his principals; the account current shows that he was largely indebted to them on the balance of prior transactions: he was bound, in order to maintain his post and credit with them, to make a payment for them at that time, and he sought to do this fraudulently by raising money on their own goods, which he would have to account for at a later period, and so forestalling the proceeds of them.

But of course these facts, though necessary as a basis, are not in themselves sufficient, without notice of them to the Appellant. Whether he had such notice must be judged as any other question of fact. To adopt the question on which the Judges made their decision turn, were the circumstances such as that a reasonable man, and a man of business, applying his understanding to them, would certainly know that Denonauth Sein had not authority to make the pledge, or that he was acting mala fide in respect thereof against his principals? In answering this it must be remembered again that the Statute, though it insists on a conclusion, prescribes nothing as to the nature of the evidence on which it is to be founded, or the manner in which the inquiry is to be conducted. The question must be dealt with as any other question of fact, by a due consideration of all the circumstances. Then it may be taken here as if Denonauth Sein had said, "I am the Banian of the Respondents; I hold in my hand the bill of lading of goods consigned to them, but not delivered. I have contracted to sell them to Doorgapersaud, who stands now beside me. My principals have sanctioned the sale, and he is to pay for them and clear them away in forty-one days. Now, I desire you to [170] advance me money on these goods; I will give you my own promissory note for the amount, and I will deposit the bill of lading indorsed with you; you may take the goods at my expense at once to your own godowns, and if I do not repay you at a period exceeding the date at which he is to clear and pay for them, you may sell them and pay yourself with interest, and all charges; and meantime you may deduct a large discount from the sum advanced"; and this offer is accepted, after a visit to Cockshott to see his power of attorney, and not a word said upon it to him at the interview.

The Appellant was a man of business; he had been himself a Banian: he either knew much of Denonauth Sein and his dealings, or little—if much, it is clear upon the evidence, and very material, that he had never known him, as agent of the Respondents, deal with their goods in a similar way under similar circumstances—if little, the more caution was necessary. He did apply his mind to the matter, for he required personal satisfaction as to Cockshott's power. What then must reasonable men, in turn applying their minds to these same circumstances, believe to have been the clear conviction in the Appellant's mind as to Denonauth Sein's authority or honesty? Their Lordships think that there is but one answer to this, that he must have felt perfectly certain that Denonauth Sein was acting without authority; if so, it is unnecessary to say whether with mala fides, though upon this they do not themselves entertain any doubt.

It remains only to notice a circumstance not very strongly relied on by the Appellant's Counsel, nor, perhaps, strictly relevant to the issues in the cause, [171] but yet which it will be better to dispose of. It appears that in the account current between the Respondents and Denonauth Sein for February, the month in which this transaction took place, the latter is credited with the sum of Rs. 10,000, paid to the Oriental Bank for the former. These Rs. 10,000 have been taken, in the argument, and are so now, to have been a portion of the Rs. 19,600, advanced by the Appellant. It was urged that the accepting the Rs. 10,000, with a knowledge how they were procured (a fact which stands not quite clear upon the evidence), was a ratification of the dealing between the Appellant and Denonauth Sein. Their Lordships do not assent to this argument. The sale of the goods to Doorgapersaud not being to be completed until the month of March, would not come into the account between the Respondents and Denonauth Sein until the end of that month; and in the account then to be made up if it had been regularly completed, he would have been debited with the price for which they had been sold and credited with the payment of that price to them. Meantime he being largely in their debt, and having been ordered to make a payment for them in respect of some prior dealings for them, had raised the money by this fraudulent pledge of their goods. Though he had so done, yet he was the principal debtor for this money to the Appellant on his own promissory note, and if everything had gone to its regular end, the Respondents would have received nothing more from him than they were entitled to. They have now received much less. As the payment was actually made to the Oriental Bank before it appeared in the account, and in pursuance of a previous order, the Respondents could neither refuse to give Denonauth [172] Sein credit for it, nor could they be called on to repay the money to the Appellant; any more than if, without the Collateral security of the pledge, it had been advanced on the personal security only of Denonauth Sein. Their conduct, therefore, does not amount to a ratification of the pledge.

On all grounds, therefore, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment below should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

THE QUEEN v. JOYKISSEN MOOKERJEE * [July, 4, 5, 16, 1862].

On an application for leave to appeal from the sentence of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut (the chief native criminal Court of appeal in Bengal), the Judicial Committee, though of opinion that justice had not been done in the Court below, declined to determine the question of the prerogative of the Crown to admit in appeal in a criminal matter, and to advise such admission, on the ground that such course might be detrimental to the general administration of criminal justice in Her Majesty's Colonial and foreign possessions; but suggested an application by the Petitioner to the executive authorities for relief, with an intimation of their Lordships' opinion of the hardship and injustice of the particular case.

This was a special petition for leave to appeal against the judgment of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut (the native criminal Court of appeal in Bengal), affirming a conviction of the Petitioner, Joykissen Mookerjee, by the Sessions Court of the Zillah Hooghly, on the charge of knowingly and fraudulently uttering [173] a forged and fabricated deed, and the sentence pronounced upon him of imprisonment for five years, with hard labour, the latter commutable for a fine of Rs. 10,000.

The Petitioner, a prisoner in the jail at Alipore, in the Province of Bengal, was a Hindoo inhabitant of Bengal, and was committed with one Pitumber Bose, on the 23rd of February, 1861, by Mr. J. Grant, a Magistrate of Serampore, for trial before the Sessions Court of the Zillah of Hooghly, upon the two following counts of charges. First, for fraudulently and injuriously fabricating a written deed, an Izarah Pottah, dated 18th Assar, 1267, B.S., for one-third of Moklar, for ten years, at a yearly rent of Rs. 902, purporting to have been executed by Meghlal Dhur and Doololl Dhur for selves and co-shareholders of Pitumber Bose; and secondly, for knowingly and fraudulently uttering the above fabricated deed, by presenting it for registration at the Registrar's office, at Serampore, on the 2nd July, 1860.

The Sessions Court of Hooghly, before which the Petitioner and Pitumber Bose were committed for trial, was established by Ben. Reg. IX. of 1793, entitled, "A Regulation for re-enacting, with alterations and modifications, the Regulations passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 3rd December, 1790, and subsequent dates, for the apprehension and trial of persons charged with crimes or misdemeanors."

The trial of the Petitioner and Pitumber Bose upon the above charges, took place on the 30th of March, 1861, and subsequent days, before J. Lillie, Esq., [174] the Additional Sessions Judge of Hooghly, and Moulvee Fyezoollah, the then Mahomedan law officer of the Sessions Court of the Zillah Hooghly.

It appeared from the statements in the petition, that at the trial, the case for the prosecution upon the above charges having been opened, witnesses examined, and the whole evidence for the prosecution taken, when the Counsel for the prosecution applied to the presiding Judge to be allowed to amend the Record, technically called "the calendar," by adding to it a count charging the Petitioner with having caused, or procured, the forgery of the Pottah in question, that the Judge thereupon sent the calendar to the committing Magistrate with an order directing him to amend the same by adding such a count, and to recommit the Petitioner for trial upon such additional charge. That the Magistrate, in compliance with such order, amended the calendar by adding the following count, or charge, namely, "for causing or procuring the forgery of the Pottah" above described, and returned the calendar so amended to the Court of the Sessions Judge. That during the interval between the time of the calendar being sent to the Magistrate for amendment, and of its being returned to the Court of the Sessions Judge, the Petitioner remained in the Court of the Sessions Judge, the Petitioner never having been taken before the Magistrate on such additional charge; that neither the prosecutor nor any of his witnesses attended before the Magistrate to prefer such charge; nor was the Petitioner himself examined before the Magistrate on such charge or called upon to answer the same; nor was any opportunity given to him to produce [175] evidence before the Magistrate to rebut that charge; and that the Petitioner was not in fact committed for trial, or held to bail upon such charge, or in any manner charged or indicted thereon, save only by the addition thereof to the calendar during his absence, as before stated. That after the calendar with the additional count had been so returned to the Court of the Sessions Judge, the Petitioner was called upon to plead, and pleaded "not guilty" to all the counts of the amended calendar. And, that after the Petitioner had so pleaded no further witnesses were examined for the prosecution, but the Petitioner and Pitumber Bose were allowed to proceed to examine their witnesses and to put in their written defence, to which the Counsel for the prosecution replied; and that on the 4th of May, 1861, the Mahomedan law officer delivered his Futwa, whereby he stated his opinion that the first and second counts of the calendar had been established against the prisoner, Pitumber Bose, but not against the Petitioner, and that the third, or additional count, had been established against the Petitioner, whereupon, on the 6th of May, 1861, the Session Judge convicted the prisoner, Pitumber Bose, on the first and second counts of the amended calendar, but disapproving of the finding of the Mahomedan law officer on the third or additional count, proceeded, in accordance with the provisions of section 53 of Reg. IX. of 1793 of the Bengal Code, to complete the trial, and transmitted to the Nizamut Adawlut a copy of all the proceedings, and the Futwa of the law officer, with a separate letter stating the grounds of his disapproval, and awaited the sentence of the Nizamut Adawlut: and that at the same time the prisoner, Pitumber Bose, appealed to [176] the Nizamut Adawlut from the sentence passed upon him by the Sessions Judge. That upon the case so transmitted coming on for trial before the Nizamut Adawlut, the Petitioner's Counsel took objection to the proceedings of the Sessions Judge in sending back the calendar to the Magistrate with orders to add another charge against the Petitioner and proceeding to try the charge upon the same Record with those originally preferred against the Petitioner and Pitumber Bose, and contended that as the trial had been held and completed on the third or additional charge without any evidence having been called for by the prosecutor upon that charge the Petitioner was entitled to be acquitted thereon, but the Nizamut Adawlut disallowed the objection, and on the 9th of July, 1861, passed the following order:—"We remit the Record to the Sessions Judge, with directions that he will retake the evidence of the witnesses as to the third count in proper legal form, and having conducted the whole trial on that count with the assistance of the law officer who sat with him, if he be still there, and if not with his successor, pass on the prisoner, No. 1, Joykissen Mookerjee, whatever sentence may eventually seem just and proper. As, however, the charge against the prisoner, No. 1, cannot be substantiated unless the sentence passed by the Sessions Judge against prisoner, No. 2, who has appealed, be confirmed, the Court proposes to hear and determine that appeal before the order relating to prisoner, No. 1, be allowed to issue." That the Petitioner applied to the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut to review this order, but that Court rejected such application, and resolved that the order of the 9th of July, 1861, should issue in due course: and the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut [177] after hearing the appeal of Pitumber Bose, convicted him of the crime of uttering a forged Pottah, knowing it to be forged, and sentenced him to be imprisoned with hard labour and irons for five years.

The Petitioner being thus compelled to undergo his trial upon the charge of having caused or procured the forgery of the Pottah, resolved to avail himself of the privilege conferred by Reg. VI. of 1832, of the Bengal Code upon all persons professing the Mahomedan faith, which by the 5th section declares, "that any person not professing the Mahomedan faith, when brought to trial on a commitment for an offence cognizable under the general Regulations, may claim to be exempted from trial under the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code; and in such case the Commissioner of Circuit or Judge of Sessions presiding on the trial shall comply with such requisition, and shall proceed in one of the three modes referred to in section 4 of this Regulation, at the same time dispensing with the Futwa of the Mahomedan law officer;" and the Petitioner accordingly, on the 13th of November, 1861, filed his petition in the Court of the Sessions Judge of Hooghly, claiming to be exempted from trial under the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code, on his then approaching trial upon the charge of having caused or procured the forgery of a Pottah, the same being an offence cognizable under cl. 3, sec. 4, Reg. II. of 1807, of the Bengal Code. The Petitioner then set forth the particulars of an unsuccessful application made by him to the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut to modify their order of the 9th of July, 1861, and to leave it open to the Sessions Judge to use his own discretion as to the mode of proceeding to be adopted at the trial of [178] the Petitioner; and further stated that, Moulvee Fyezoollah, the Mahomedan law officer belonging to the Nizamut Court, and who had assisted at the previous trial of the Petitioner, had been removed, and was no longer attached to that Court; and that thereupon the Sessions Judge had obtained an order from the Government, requiring that Mahomedan law officer to repair again to Hooghly, for the purpose of sitting with the Sessions Judge, at the re-trial of the Petitioner, and had moreover received a letter from the Registrar of the Nizamut Adawlut, informing him that the Petitioner's claim to exemption was too late, that it should have been made before the prisoner was arraigned on the charge for which he was under trial, and directing that the Court's instructions (passed in accordance with their resolution of the 9th July, 1861), "should be obeyed to the letter." That accordingly, on the 11th of December, 1861, the Petitioner was brought to trial before the Sessions Judge of Hooghly and the same law officer Moulvee Fyezoollah; but before any step was taken in the trial the Petitioner filed a further petition renewing his claim under Reg. VI. of 1832 to be exempt from trial, under the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code, on the charge of causing or procuring the forgery of the Pottah, and praying that his trial might be proceeded with in one of the three modes referred to in sec. 4 of the Regulation, upon which the Sessions Judge recorded the following order: "The prayer of the petition, being contrary to the express instructions of the Nizamut Adawlut, conveyed to me in the letter of their Register, dated the 24th of October last, is rejected." That the trial of the Petitioner upon the [179] charge of having caused or procured the forgery of the Pottah, thereupon proceeded before the Sessions Judge of Hooghly and Fyezoollah, the former law officer of the Court, under protest from the Petitioner, that the Court so constituted had no jurisdiction to try the Petitioner, but witnesses having been examined, both for the prosecution and defence, Fyezoollah delivered his Futwa on the 23rd of December, 1861, finding the Petitioner guilty of the charge preferred against him; but that the Sessions Judge of Hooghly, being of opinion that the Petitioner was not guilty of the offence with which he was charged, transmitted the proceedings to the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut, according to sect. 53, of Reg. IX. of 1793, of the Bengal Code, together with a letter, stating his reasons for disapproving of the finding of Fyezoollah. The case thus referred by the Sessions Judge came on for hearing before the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut, on the 7th of February, 1862, when the Petitioner's Counsel, before proceeding to argue the case upon the merits, raised several preliminary objections, and, amongst others, the following:—First, that the Sessions Judge exceeded his powers in ordering the committing Magistrate to alter the calendar, and to commit or re-commit the Petitioner on a new and substantive charge. Second, that the Judge, when he ordered the re-commitment of the Petitioner, did not properly follow the course of proceedings, directed by the Circular Order of the Sudder Court, No. 70, dated the 14th of November, 1851, under which he professed to be acting, the effect of which was to embarrass the Petitioner in his defence, inasmuch as two distinct trials were proceeding at one and the same time, [180] the first on the two original counts, and the second on the third or additional count, embracing a new and substantive charge, and that the Petitioner was deprived of the opportunity of claiming his right to exemption from trial, under the Mahomedan Criminal Code, on the third or additional count. Third, that the Petitioner was never properly charged before the Magistrate on the third or additional count, nor examined nor confronted with witnesses in the Magistrate's Court upon that charge, and that no such charge was ever, in fact, made against the Petitioner before the Magistrate, nor any witness examined, or evidence given, before the Magistrate in support of that charge. Fourth, that the Petitioner was never in fact committed, or held to bail in due form of law, to take his trial on the third or additional count or charge, and that, consequently, the Sessions Court was without jurisdiction to try the Petitioner upon the charge contained in that count. Fifth, that the Petitioner, being a Hindoo, was entitled to claim, and had duly and legally claimed, exemption from trial on the third or additional count, under the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code, and that his trial before a Mahomedan law officer was consequently illegal and void. Sixth, that Fyezoollah had vacated his appointment as law officer of the Hooghly Court, before the Petitioner was brought to trial upon the third count, in December, 1861, and was never duly re-appointed, or appointed Mahomedan law officer to conduct the Petitioner's trial. Seventh, that Fyezoollah never accepted such appointment, or the responsibilities thereof, or delivered any Futwa as Mahomedan law officer, presiding at the trial of the Petitioner. [181] Eighth, that Fyezoollah was incompetent to act as law officer on the trial of the Petitioner, he never having taken the proper oath of office as law officer as prescribed by the Regulations; and ninth, that the Futwa, delivered by Fyezoollah, in December, 1861, was informal and void, not having been given under seal as is required by the Regulations. The petition then set forth that the Sudder

Nizamut Adawlut overruled all these objections, and, that the case so made against the Petitioner, on the third or additional count, upon the evidence taken in December, 1861, was heard on the 31st March, 1862, when the Court convicted the Petitioner on the third count, and sentenced him to five years' imprisonment, with hard labour commutable for a fine of Rs. 10,000. That the Petitioner on the 3rd of April, 1862, presented his petition to the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut, praying for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council from the above conviction, and the several orders above-mentioned, whereupon the Court passed the following order:

"This Court is not required, nor warranted by law, to take any steps in criminal matters, which the parties concerned require to have brought before Her Majesty's Privy Council. Any application with that object must be made to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council direct." The petition then stated that the Petitioner, who was at large on bail at the time of his conviction, had since surrendered himself, and was then undergoing his sentence in the jail at Alipore, and had paid the fine of Rs. 10,000, in place of being put to hard labour. And after stating that no Charter, Statute, or Regulation existed, which in any manner regulates or limits the privilege or [182] right of appeal, or the mode of exercising such privilege or right from the sentences or orders of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut, in criminal matters, to Her Majesty's Honourable Privy Council, the Petitioner set forth the grounds upon which he contended that the proceedings and conviction were erroneous, and among others, urged the following objections:—First, that a Sessions Judge had no power to order a committing Magistrate to add a new and substantive charge to the calendar, or to commit upon such a charge, the Magistrate not being a ministerial officer, but being bound to exercise a discretion, according to his own conscience, as to whether the evidence before him warranted him in committing a person accused before him upon a particular charge. That the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut had ruled, in the present case, under the Criminal Code in force in the Courts by which the Petitioner was tried, that the offence of causing or procuring the forgery of an instrument, was a substantive offence, distinct from that of forging or uttering a forged instrument, and that no conviction of the crime first mentioned could have been had under the first or second count, upon which the Petitioner was originally committed. That the committing Magistrate had, consequently, in compliance with the orders of the Sessions Judge, sent up a charge against the Petitioner, which was never preferred before the Magistrate. Second, that supposing a Sessions Judge had the power to direct the Magistrate to commit upon a particular charge, such power was not duly exercised in the present instance. That the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut had distinctly declared that it was the duty of the Sessions Judge, under the [183] Circular Order, No. 70, of the 14th of November, 1851, when, from the evidence given before him on the first two charges made against the Petitioner, he found that those charges were not established by that evidence, at once to have stopped the trial, and ordered the re-commitment of the Petitioner on the third count, in addition to the other two, or to have acquitted the Petitioner on the two counts on which he had been charged, and directed his commitment on the third. That the trial, however, was not stopped, the petitioner being required to plead to a new and substantive charge while his trial on the two former charges was proceeding, the result of which had been to give a pretext for depriving the Petitioner of his right to claim exemption from trial, according to the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code, on the new charge. Third, that the Circular Order above referred to directs, that the Judge shall not exercise the power of remanding a prisoner before the Magistrate, with a view to a fresh commitment being made, except upon the "plainest and strongest grounds:" and that no such grounds existed in the present case was shown by the Judge having disapproved of the Futwa for the Petitioner's conviction, based upon the very evidence upon which he directed the fresh commitment. Fourth, that no proper proceedings were taken to procure the Petitioner's commitment upon the new charge; that when the Sessions Judge thought it expedient that the Petitioner should be committed on a new charge, he ought to have sent the Petitioner before the Magistrate, that the charge might be preferred against him, and the Petitioner examined thereon, and confronted with the prosecutor [184] and witnesses while giving their testimony on oath in support of that charge, with an opportunity to the Petitioner to cross-examine them and produce evidence to rebut the charge. Fifth, that the Petitioner was never in fact committed or held to bail to take his trial on the third count, and that the Sessions Judge was, therefore, without jurisdiction to try him upon that count; that the mere addition of a count to a calendar made in the absence of either the Prosecutor or the person charged, and under the simple initials of the committing Magistrate, wanted all the essentials of a valid commitment, and sets at nought all the decent formalities of criminal procedure. Sixth, that supposing the Petitioner to have been legally brought to trial on the third count, he was entitled to be acquitted thereon when the case was first referred to the Nizamut Adawlut, the Petitioner having pleaded to that count, and the Futwa of the law officer having been taken thereon, which Futwa was in the nature of a verdict, though not supported by any evidence. That the order of the Nizamut Adawlut of the 9th of July, 1861, which the Judges who passed it admitted to be without precedent, was in consequence illegal and improper, and that the Petitioner ought not to have been put a second time on his trial for the same offence. Seventh, that supposing the order of the 9th of July to have been legal, the Petitioner when brought to trial on the third count was entitled to claim, and did duly and legally claim, exemption from trial under the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code. That the opinion of the Registrar of the Nizamut Adawlut, that it was then too late for the Petitioner to make such claim, was erroneous, inasmuch as that Court by [185] remitting the Record for the purpose of having evidence taken on the third count virtually held, that all that had been done on the trial of that count after the Petitioner had pleaded thereto, had been null and void; and, therefore, the Petitioner when brought to trial on that count in December, 1861, was in the contemplation of the law in the same position as if he had only that moment pleaded not guilty. That the Petitioner was debarred the opportunity of making such claim on the occasion of the former trial by the error of the Sessions Judge, in continuing the trial upon the first two counts; that the Nizamut Adawlut erroneously held that the Petitioner waived his right to claim exemption from trial on the third count, under the provisions of the Mahomedan Criminal Code, by going into a defence on the third count before the Mahomedan law officer on the occasion of the first trial. That the Petitioner was obliged on that occasion to go into his defence on the first two counts, and did so filing a written defence that there was not a word in that defence which was not applicable to the first two counts, nor was any mention made of the third count in that defence. That the Petitioner was never in fact put to any defence on the third count, as no evidence had been given in support of that count, and the Petitioner denied that on that occasion he went into any defence on the third count beyond simply pleading "not guilty" thereto. That even if the Petitioner had done so, he submitted, that the trial on the third count after the Record had been remitted to the Sessions Court, was to all intents and purposes a new trial, and that the Petitioner when so brought to trial, was entitled to all [186] the rights conferred by the Legislature on Hindoos, of claiming exemption from trial under a foreign code; and the Petition prayed for special leave to appeal from the above orders, and from the conviction, judgment, and sentence of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut, and that that Court might be ordered to transmit forthwith the transcript of the proceedings and evidence upon which the Petitioner had been tried and convicted, to the Privy Council Office, and that Her Majesty would be pleased to direct that until the hearing of the appeal therein prayed for, the Petitioner might be admitted to bail, or until such other time as to Her Majesty might seem fit.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., and Mr. Hannen, for the Petitioner.—This is a special application to Her Majesty for leave to appeal from the proceedings and sentence of a Native Criminal Court, which have been confirmed by the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut on appeal, in a matter and under circumstances which would enable a party to obtain redress in a Court of Error in this country. The proceedings set out in the petition show that there was such irregularity as well as injustice, that a Court of Error would set them aside. Without entering upon the merits, we desire to show, in the first place, that there is an appeal from this Criminal Appellate Court to the Queen in Council. It cannot be questioned that appeals to the Queen in Council in criminal matters are allowed, being expressly provided for by each of the several Charters creating the Supreme Courts at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, the Judges of those Courts having reserved to them a discretionary power to

[187] grant such appeals, which power has been exercised, Pooneakhoty Moodeliar v. The King (3 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 348), Aga Kurboolie Mahomed v. The Queen (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 161), Aga Yoong v. The Queen (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 72). The cases of The Queen v. Eduljee Byramjee (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 468), and The Queen v. Alloo Paroo (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 488), though cases in which leave to appeal was refused by the Court in India, are yet authorities showing that such an appeal lies, and that the Crown in cases from the Supreme Courts in India has not parted with its prerogative to entertain an appeal in a criminal suit, merely restricting the discretion of allowing such in the first instance to the Judges. The true question here is, whether the Crown has parted with that right in cases tried by the Native Criminal Courts in India. In re Ames (3 Moore's P.C. Cases, 409), this Court entertained no doubt as to its jurisdiction to admit a criminal appeal from the Cour Royale, in the Island of Jersey, though it was afterwards discovered that such a power was restrained by an Ordinance of the Royal Commissioners of Queen Elizabeth, dated the 3rd of April, 1591. The history of the establishment of the Nizamut Adawlut, in India, whose proceedings we complain of, is to be found in the preamble to the Ben. Reg. IX. of 1793. It is there stated to have been originally established in 1772, at Moorshedabad, "for revising the proceedings of the Provincial Criminal Courts in capital cases, and the Committee of Revenue at Moorshedabad were vested with a control over this Court, similar to that which the Collectors of the revenue were empowered to exercise over the Provincial Courts. Upon the abolition of the Committee [188] of Revenue at Moorshedabad, the Nizamut Adawlut was removed to Calcutta, and placed under the charge of a Darogah, or superintendent, subject to the control of the President in Council, who revised the sentences of the Criminal Court in capital cases." It appears that the Court was afterwards re-established at Moorshedabad, but, by a subsequent Regulation, of the 3rd December, 1719, was again removed to Calcutta, and permanently established there by sec. 66, of Ben. Reg. IX. of 1793, the Regulation we are now considering. It appears as well from the preamble as the subsequent parts of this Regulation, that there always was a controlling power reserved to and exercised by the Provincial Government, or its Officers, and from the whole tenor of the administration of criminal justice, it is clear that there was an appeal from the decision of this Court to some superior Tribunal; if so, then, we submit, there must be an appeal to the Queen in Council, as the dernier ressort. The prerogative of the Crown in this respect has been carefully preserved. It is not affected by Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, respecting appeals from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in civil suits to the King in Council; the Statute, 21 Geo. III. c. 70, sec. 21, or in the order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838 (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. IX.), made pursuant to the 3rd and 4th Will. IV., c. 41, sec. 24, which do not touch the criminal jurisdiction. We admit that there is no specific enactment in the above Regulation or Statutes, or in any other of the Regulations, respecting the Native Criminal Courts in India. Reg. VI. of 1796, sec. 2, gives the Nizamut Adawlut power to recommend to the Governor-General a mitigation of [189] punishment after the opinion of the Futwa of the law officer, which is tantamount to a liberty of appeal to the supreme authority, and that being so, makes our case stronger, for the right of appeal is but the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown to revise all legal proceedings, a right inherent in the Crown, and which cannot be abrogated except by the express will of the Sovereign, or by Act of the Legislature, to which the Sovereign is a party. Bac. Abr. Tit. "Prerogative," B. 1; Clutton "On the Prerogative," p. 29. And this is especially the case as regards the Colonies and Foreign possessions of the Crown. Christian v. Corren (1 P. Will., 329. See also, Memorandum, 2 P. Will., 75), and Calvin's case (Coke Rep. Pt. VII., p. 17). In Reg. v. Cowle (2 Burr. 856), Lord Mansfield says, "Upon imprisonments in Guernsey and Jersey, in Minorca, and in the Plantations, I have known complaints to the King in Council, and orders to bail and discharge;" and Sir John Leach, in Cuvillier v. Aylwin (2 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 78), declared that "The King has no power to deprive the subject of any of his rights." Again, in Macfarlane v. Leclair (15 Moore's P.C. Cases, 181), and in re Louis Marois (15 Moore's P.C. Cases, 189), although the sum involved was in both cases under the appealable value restricted by the Canadian Act, 34th Geo. III., c. 6, sec. 30, yet leave to appeal was granted by this Court to prevent injustice. We submit, therefore, that no

Secondly, the whole process in criminal prosecutions is directed and provided for by the Regulation IX. of [190] 1793. It is enough, however, for our present argument, to refer to the fifth and forty-seventh sections. The fifth section provides for the apprehension of offenders, and the manner in which the charge is to be preferred, as well as the form of the warrant. Now, none of the requisites there pointed out were complied with in the charge upon the third account against the Petitioner. The 47th section, which provides the manner in which the trial of prisoners is to be conducted, was equally disregarded. Upon these two grounds alone, which we are prepared to prove, we say that there is enough to entitle us to leave to appeal: there was sufficient irregularity to have invalidated a trial in any Criminal Court in this country, and by analogy there must be a remedy for such irregularity and injustice when committed in Her Majesty's dominions abroad. The irregularities complained of by the Petitioner as being contrary to the mode of conducting criminal procedure, prescribed by Ben. Reg. VI. of 1832, secs. 5 and 6, were presented in a form which would be equivalent to error on the Record in proceedings in the English Courts. He pleaded not guilty to all the charges, and never was heard as to his exemption from trial by the Mahomedan Criminal Code, as that Regulation provides. Again, the Mahomedan law officer was not qualified to try him on the third count of the indictment, and the whole proceedings, therefore, were coram non iudice. In this country, whether in civil or criminal jurisdiction, where there is error upon the Record, the Sovereign has a right, by virtue of the supreme prerogative of the Crown as the fountain head of justice, to inspect the Record, and set it right. The same rule applies in respect to Colonial [191] Courts as to English Courts. In Crawford's case (13 Q. Ben. Rep., 613), a writ of Habeas Corpus ad subjiciendum issued from the Queen's Bench to the Isle of Man: to the Island of Jersey in Carus Wilson's case (7 Q. Ben. Rep., 984), and also in Anderson's case (30 L.J. Q.B., 39), to Canada. These cases show that the power of the Crown in the Colonies is not limited and the right of appeal from the Criminal Courts abroad has not been taken away or curtailed by any local Regulation or Imperial Statute. In Rajunder Narain Rao v. Bhoji Govind Singh (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 181), it was held that this Court had by the Common law the same power as Courts of Record to rectify its judgments when mistakes had crept in by misprision or otherwise. Lastly, we submit, that the irregularity in the proceedings, and the injustice complained of in this case, is such as to render it a fit case for the exercise of the undoubted prerogative of the Crown to admit the appeal.

The Attorney-General (Sir W. Atherton) and Mr. Welsby, for the Crown.—The right of admitting an appeal in criminal cases is not an inherent part of the prerogative of the Crown. The passage quoted from Chitty, "On the Prerogative," does not uphold the contention of the Petitioner's Counsel. It is founded upon Chalmers' Opinions, pp. 117, 202, and such a right has not been granted, so far as India is concerned, by any Charter or Regulation, having the force of law in India, to the subject, from a sentence of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut; therefore, we submit, this Court has no power to grant this application. No analogy exists with respect to the jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Queen's [192] Bench in respect to writs of error, or Certiorari, 4 Coke's Inst., ch. 7, shows the origin of the jurisdiction of that Court. The Court of Queen's Bench is not a final jurisdiction, for a writ of error lies to the House of Lords. With respect to the Regulations in force in India relied upon by the Petitioner, they do not give the jurisdiction contended for. From the year 1790 to the year 1801, the Governor-General and Members of the Supreme Council, constituted the Nizamut Adawlut, as well as the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Ben. Reg. VI., 1793, sec. 2, and by Regs. IX. of 1793, sec. 67, and XLIX. of 1795, the Governor and Council are to be assisted by a Cazi and Muftees. This state of affairs was altered by Reg. II. of 1801, sec. 10, by which the Nizamut Adawlut was composed of a member of the Supreme Council, two Puisne Judges, and two native law officers. Section 16, provides for appeals to the King in Council in civil cases, and for reference to the Governor in Council, but no farther. The constitution of that Court was afterwards modified by Ben. Regs. XV. of 1807, sec. 3, and XII. of 1811, and by XXV. of 1814, power is given to a single Judge to sit in the Nizamut Adawlut. No mention is made of appeals in criminal matters to England, in any of these Regulations.

Statute 21st Geo. III., c. 70, sec. 21, provides for appeals in civil cases to the King in Council, where the subject-matter in dispute shall be of the value of £5000, and the provisions of that Statute, in respect to appeals in civil matters from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, are introduced by Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797. If then, the Crown ever had the prerogative contended for by the Petitioner before the passing of the above Statute, we maintain that it has since been parted with by Statute. [193] The Queen v. Eduljee Byramjee (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 468), The Queen v. Alloo Parron (ib. 494). In the latter case, Lord Brougham doubts the authority of Christian v. Corren, as it was the reasoning of the Reporter himself who was Counsel in that case, and not the judgment of the Court (1 P. Will., 329).

No judgment was then given, and the attention of their Lordships having been afterwards drawn to the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XXV., of 1861, sec. 414, which enacts that, "unless otherwise provided by this Act, or any other law for the time being in force, no appeal shall lie from any order or sentence of a Criminal Court," their Lordships directed the petition to be argued upon the effect of the section of that Act.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., and Mr. Hannen, were heard upon this point. First, we contend that the words of the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XXV., of 1861, sec. 414, do not apply, or assuming that they do, we submit that the Act does not take away the right of appeal claimed by the Petitioner, for not having received the sanction of the Crown, as required by the Imperial Statute, 16th and 17th Vict., c. 95, sec. 26, that Act was ultra vires and void, so far as it affects the prerogative of the Crown. There is no power in the Indian Legislature to interfere with the prerogative of the Crown, without its consent. In this country no Bill can be brought in affecting the prerogative without the consent of the Crown. [The Respondent's Counsel interposed, and cited upon [194] this point the Imperial Statute, 24th and 25th Vict., c. 67, s. 24, which enacts that no Law or Regulation made by the Governor-General in Council should be deemed invalid by reason only that it affects the prerogative of the Crown, and contended that such Statute was retrospective.] By the 54th section of that Statute, it is enacted, that it is not to come into operation till its publication by the Governor-General in Council by proclamation, which event did not take place till the 16th of November, 1861, after the passing of the Act, No. 25, of 1861; therefore, though the clause in question prevented the whole of any Act which contained a clause interfering with the prerogative from being avoided, it did not legalize such interference itself. It cannot be denied that the prerogative of the Crown can only be taken away by express words, which are not to be found in the Act No. XXV., sec. 414, of 1861. It has been so held with respect to the right of Certiorari, The King v. The inhabitants of Cumberland (6 Term Rep., 194), The King v. Eaton (2 Term Rep., 89), Groenvelt v. Burwell (1 Lord Raym., 469), The King v. Jukes (8 Term Rep., 542), Rex v. Moreley (2 Burr., 1048), The King v. Allen (15 East., 333), Smith v. The Commissioners of Sewers (1 Mod., 44), Rex v. Lewis (4 Burr., 2459), The King v. Hanson (4 Barn. and Ald., 519).

The Attorney-General (Sir W. Atherton), Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Welsby, appeared for the Crown, but were not called upon to address their Lordships.

[195] Dr. Lushington.—It appears from the proceedings in the case that a person of the name of Joykissen Mookerjee, has been convicted of a criminal offence, namely, of having procured leases of certain property to be forged. The questions for the decision of their Lordships are, first, whether, as has been argued, there exists on behalf of the Crown, a prerogative right of appeal even in matters of criminal jurisdiction; and, secondly, whether this is a proper case in which the authority of the Crown should be interposed for the purpose of doing justice.

Now, with reference to the existence of the prerogative of the Crown, their Lordships are desirous that no expression should fall from them which in the slightest degree would throw doubt on the existence of that prerogative, not only under the existing circumstances, but in others which might arise, with reference to the other dominions of the Queen which may have been acquired by conquest. They do not think it necessary that they should, on the present occasion, enter minutely into the considerations upon which the prerogative of the Crown is founded. They think it will suffice for the purpose of this case, to assume that it does exist, and consequently, that it is in the power of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, exercising that prerogative right under the Crown, so to advise Her Majesty, if they should think an appeal ought to be allowed on the present occasion.

With regard to the merits of the case itself, their Lordships certainly are inclined to come to the conclusion that justice has not been very well administered in the present case; and, supposing it to [196] have been a civil, and not a criminal case, they would have had no hesitation whatever in recommending to Her Majesty to allow an appeal for the purpose of considering these proceedings, and of doing justice to the party complaining.

But this is a criminal case, and subject to very different consideration. Admitting, therefore, two things—admitting the existence of the prerogative of the Crown, and admitting that this, prima facie and presumptively, is a case of great grievance—their Lordships have now to determine whether, looking at all the circumstances attending the granting of appeals in criminal cases, it would be their duty to advise Her Majesty to grant this appeal or to withhold it.

We must recollect, in the first place, that by granting an appeal is meant an examination of the whole of the proceedings which have taken place. It is not simply for the investigation of any legal question which might have arisen; it is for the purpose of examining the whole of the evidence, and the whole course of the proceedings upon the trial, to enable us to come to a conclusion upon the merits.

Now, it is of no small importance to bear in mind that, notwithstanding the numberless instances in which an application of this kind might have been made to the Queen in Council from all the various dominions subject to Her Majesty, from all those parts of Her dominions that were acquired by conquest, and where Her Majesty has the entire sovereign power of legislating according as she may think fit, either by Orders in Council, or, as was determined on a former occasion, by virtue of Letters from the Secretary of State, it is, I say, to be borne [197] in mind that, in no instance whatever, of any grievance however great, at any time, has any attempt ever been made to apply to Her Majesty for leave to appeal in a criminal case.

We can easily call to memory very many instances which have occurred in the Colonies in which it has been alleged that gross injustice has been done, and even lives sacrificed where they ought not to have been exposed to any danger; but no precedent of an appeal of this nature has existed; and we think it is obvious, upon the least consideration of the consequences, how it is that no such precedent has existed, and how it is that no such precedent would have been created, even if an attempt had been made to call into force the power of the Crown. It may be true that on some occasions it is not very desirable to argue simply from consequences alone; but the consequences of granting an appeal in cases of this description are so exceedingly strong, they are so entirely destructive of the administration of all criminal jurisprudence, that we cannot for a single moment doubt that they are of the greatest importance in guiding us to form a judgment.

Now, if we were to advise Her Majesty to grant an appeal on this petition, how would the case stand? It is simply the case of an individual having been convicted of causing documents to be forged. Would not the same right apply to capital cases? What could be done in a capital case? Is there any distinction which can be drawn? If the prerogative of Her Majesty gives this individual the right of appeal, could any rules or regulations be imposed whereby that right of appeal could be governed or could be restricted? So you would go through the whole [198] catalogue of cases, and there is no doubt whatever that whenever punishment was likely to ensue there would follow an appeal to Her Majesty in Council, and consequently not only would the course of justice be maimed, but in very many instances it would be entirely prostrated.

These are the reasons which operate upon our minds in rejecting this application; not at all forgetting that injustice may have been done in this individual case, and not at all forgetting that the power of the Crown may be invoked in another shape, and that that injustice may be remedied. Their Lordships are of opinion that they cannot, under the existing circumstances, advise Her Majesty to admit this right of appeal, but they doubt not that justice will be done, because they would suggest that an application should be made to the constituted authorities who have the power to afford a remedy, though in a different way. They doubt not that when it is represented to those authorities that this suggestion emanates from the Judicial Committee, they will not be loth to examine into the circumstances of the case, and to do that which justice may require.

We have only one word more to say on the present occasion. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to enter at all into the question which has been discussed at the bar this morning; it would require a very nice examination of the Statutes and the criminal law of India, which could only end in the same way. Whatever might be the result of that examination, we have no hesitation in saying the course we are now about to adopt would be the course we should then recommend Her Majesty to pursue.

We cannot grant this application.

[199] CHARLOTTE ABRAHAM and DANIEL VINCENT ABRAHAM,—Appellants;
FRANCIS ABRAHAM,—Respondent * [Feb. 17, 18, 19, and 20, 1863].

The status of Native Christians, known as “East Indians,” and the law of inheritance and succession, as administered in the Mofussil Court in respect to their rights and property, considered. Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. XVII. provides, that in cases coming within the jurisdiction of the Zillah Courts, for which no specific rule may exist, the Judges are to act according to justice, equity and good conscience; and Mad. Reg. III. of 1802, sec. XVI. cl. 1, prescribes, that in suits before the Native Courts regarding succession, inheritance, caste, etc., the Hindoo law with respect to Hindoos, and the Mahomedan law with regard to Mahomedans are to be considered the general rules by which the Judges are to form their decision. Held, that the latter Regulation applied to Hindoos and Mahomedans, not by birth only but by religion [9 Moo. Ind. App. 243].

Held, also, in a case of succession to the estate of a deceased of pure Hindoo blood, who had married a European wife, professing, with his family, the Christian religion, and whose ancestors for generations had embraced Christianity, that such case was within the provisions of Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. XVII., and was to be decided by reference to the usages of the class to which the deceased attached himself and the family to which he belonged.

Upon the conversion of a Hindoo to Christianity, the Hindoo law ceases to have any continuing obligatory force upon the convert [9 Moo. Ind. App. 241, 242].

The convert may renounce the old law by which he was bound, as he renounced his old religion, or if he thinks fit, he may abide by the old law notwithstanding he has renounced the old religion. For though the profession of Christianity releases the convert from the trammels of the Hindoo law, yet it does not of necessity involve any change of the rights or relations of the convert in matters with which Christianity has no concern, such as his rights and interest in, and his power over, property. The convert, though not bound as to such matters, either by the Hindoo law, or by any other positive law, may by his course of conduct after his conversion, have shown by what law he intended his rights to be governed. He may do so either by attaching himself to a class which in this respect has adopted and acted upon some particular law, or by having himself observed some particular law, family usage, or custom [9 Moo. Ind. App. 243, 244].

The lex loci Act, No. XXI. of 1850, held not to apply where the parties have ceased to be Hindoos in religion.

The status of a member of an undivided Hindoo family who became a convert to Christianity, in reference to parcenership, considered. Such circumstance held to amount, by the Hindoo law, to a severance of parcenership.

Whenever an opinion of the Pundits is required by the Court, and there are many special circumstances which may bear upon the question to be submitted for their opinion, these special circumstances ought to be set forth by the Court in the case submitted to the Pundits.

The principal question involved in this appeal was as to the law which governed the succession to the property of the late Matthew Abraham, a Protestant native of India, resident in the Madras Presidency, and who died intestate in the year 1842. The ancestors of Matthew Abraham, for several generations [200] had been Christians, and Matthew Abraham, who had been baptized in infancy in the Roman Catholic faith, but afterwards became a convert to the Protestant religion, married a European wife in the year 1820, and with her and the children of the marriage conformed in all respects to the language, dress, manners, and habits of English persons up to the time of his death. The Sudder Court at Madras held that the property should be distributed in accordance with the Hindoo law.

In the year 1812, Matthew Abraham, then a youth, [201] was residing at Bellary with his father; and was at that time receiving religious instruction from a Protestant missionary, having become a convert from the Roman Catholic to the Protestant religion. The Respondent, another son of Matthew Abraham's father was born in the year 1813. About the year 1815, Matthew Abraham was appointed to a situation in the Arsenal at Bellary, upon a salary of Rs. 52½ a month. His father died some time prior to the year 1820, without leaving any property. In the last-mentioned year, Matthew Abraham married the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, whose father was an Englishman and her mother a Portuguese. In the year 1823, he opened a shop on his own account at Bellary; and in the year 1827, the Respondent, Francis Abraham, who was then of the age of fourteen, was placed by Matthew Abraham as a writer and attendant in his shop, and on the 2nd of April, 1832, he and a Mr. Richardson were admitted as partners in the shop under a deed of partnership, whereby the then partners were to be entitled equally to the profits. No capital was contributed by the Respondent upon his admission to the partnership. Mr. Richardson retired from the partnership in or about the year 1836, but upon his retirement no new arrangement was made between Matthew Abraham and the Respondent, as to their shares in the shop. Matthew Abraham, besides being a shop-keeper, held a contract from Government for the supply of spirituous liquors to the troops in cantonment at Bellary, called "The Abkarry contract"; and in order to enable him properly to carry out that contract, he erected a large distillery in or near Bellary. The contract was first taken by Matthew Abraham in [202] the year 1827, and the contract was taken by him from year to year, with the exception of the official year 1829-30, until his death in the year 1842, at which time the contract was still subsisting. The distillery business so carried on by Matthew Abraham was separate from the shop, and was carried on by him alone on his own account, and, as it appeared and was insisted by the Appellants, without any partner; but for some time previously to and at the time of the death of Matthew Abraham, the Respondent was employed as a clerk or manager in the distillery business, and during the frequent periods of absence of Matthew Abraham from Bellary, transacted the chief part of that business. On the 10th of July, 1842, Matthew Abraham died intestate, leaving his widow, the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, and two sons, Charles Henry Abraham, who is since deceased, and the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, him surviving. At the time of the death of Matthew Abraham, the other son, Charles Henry Abraham, was of the age of twenty years, and was in England for purpose of his education, and the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, was of the age of nineteen years, and was residing with his mother at Bellary. The property of Matthew Abraham consisted of the benefit of the Abkarry contract, which was still subsisting, and the sum held in deposit for the due fulfilment thereof; and of the distillery business; of the capital employed in the shop at Bellary, and his share of the profits thereof; of a business and property at Kurnoul; of certain houses and property at Bellary; of a policy of assurance on his life for Rs. 6400, in the Madras Equitable Assurance Society; and of ready money and out-standing debts, and money due to him on securities.

[203] At the request of the Respondent, the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, executed a power of attorney, appointing him her attorney to collect all the money, debts, goods, and effects due, owing, payable, or belonging to her as the widow of Matthew Abraham, and for all purposes therein mentioned; and she afterwards herself procured letters of administration of the effects of Matthew Abraham, which were granted to her by the Supreme Court at Madras, whereby she became the sole legal personal representative of Matthew Abraham in the Madras Presidency.

The Respondent, under the authority of the above power of attorney, took possession of the books, papers, money, and securities for money of Matthew Abraham, and collected and received the debts, money, stock, and all other property belonging and due to his estate. The Abkarry contract which was held by Matthew Abraham, and was subsisting at the time of his death, as before stated, expired in the month of April, 1843.

Immediately upon the death of Matthew Abraham, the Respondent obtained permission from the Commissary-General to carry on the business of the Abkarry contract, and accordingly he entered into written engagement, dated the 22nd of July, 1842, to discharge the obligation of the Abkarry contract bond executed by his brother, Matthew Abraham, in the year 1842. Upon the expiration of the contract in 1843, the Respondent obtained a renewal of the contract in his own name, and obtained further renewals thereof from year to year, up to the date of the suit hereinafter mentioned. The deposit which had been made by Matthew Abraham for the due fulfilment of his contract, and which remained lodged at the time of [204] his death, continued as the deposit upon the renewals of the contract to the Respondent up to the year 1848, when he withdrew that deposit and lodged a Bengal promissory note for Co.'s Rs. 5000. The distillery business for the purpose of the Abkarry contract had, ever since the death of Matthew Abraham, been carried on upon the premises built by Matthew Abraham.

The Respondent, after the death of Matthew Abraham, continued to carry on the business of the shop in which he had been a partner with Matthew Abraham, employing the capital which was invested therein at the time of the death of Matthew Abraham. The Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, was admitted for some time in the position of a partner, and drew some small share of the profits, but the Respondent, in the year 1851, kept the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, from the shop, and prevented him from receiving any share of the profits thereof; and since that year the Respondent had carried on the business of the shop alone, and possessed himself of all the profits arising therefrom.

From the correspondence between the Respondent and Charles Henry Abraham, and between the Respondent and the Appellant Charlotte Abraham, which formed part of the evidence in the case, it appeared, that the Respondent had assured the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, and Charles Henry Abraham, that his sole wish and object was to labour for his deceased brother's family, and to further their interest to the utmost of his ability; and though the accounts of the distillery, and of the shop, and generally of Matthew Abraham's estate, were constantly demanded from the Respondent by the Appellant, [205] Charlotte Abraham, the Respondent succeeded from time to time in evading her demands, and quieted the minds of the Appellants by supplying them with money as they required it, and by remitting to England the sums required by Charles Henry Abraham.

At length, in the year 1852, the Respondent denied that he had any accounts to furnish, and asserted that he was not liable to furnish any to the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, or to her sons. He also persisted in refusing to allow the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, to have any share in the management of the distillery business and Abkarry contract, and claimed that he alone was absolutely entitled to that business and contract; and upon the return of Charles Henry Abraham from England to Madras, in June, 1853, the Respondent refused to continue to make any further remittances to him.

In consequence, the Appellants, Charlotte Abraham and Daniel Vincent Abraham, together with Charles Henry Abraham, since deceased, in May, 1854, filed a plaint in the Civil Court of Bellary, against the Respondent, whereby, after stating the facts hereinbefore set forth, and that the property to which they were entitled exceeded the sum of Rs. 3,00,000, they prayed that an account might be taken of what at the time of the death of Matthew Abraham was due to him in respect of the capital of the shop, and of the profits thereof, and that the Respondent might be decreed to pay what should be so found due; and that it might be ascertained what part of the estate of Matthew Abraham had since his death been employed in the shop, and that an account might be taken of [206] the profits thereof since his death; and that the Respondent might be decreed to pay the amount so ascertained and appearing by the account. That an account might be taken of all the capital employed in the distillery business, and of the profits thereof down to the death of Matthew Abraham, received by the Respondent, or to his use, and also of the profits of the distillery since the death of Matthew Abraham; and that the Respondent might be decreed to pay the amounts found due upon the last-mentioned account. That an account might be taken of the estate of Matthew Abraham, generally received by the Respondent, or to his use, and that the Respondent might be decreed to deliver up, or account for the same; and that the Plaintiffs might be put into possession of the distillery business, and the premises, and the benefit of the Abkarry contract; and that the Respondent might be decreed to deliver up to them all deeds, books, and writings, relating to the same respectively, the Plaintiffs offering to make a just allowance to the Respondent for his services in managing the distillery and generally.

The Respondent by his answer, admitted the general statements as to the family contained in the plaint, and for defence, in substance, insisted, that the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, was only entitled to maintenance, and could not claim as co-Plaintiff jointly with her sons. That the property claimed had not been specified in the plaint as required by sec. 3, Mad. Reg. III. of 1802. That Matthew Abraham and the Respondent were the children of natives of Hindoo origin, and members of an undivided family. That upon the death of their father, Matthew Abraham took possession of [207] his property. That in 1823, Matthew Abraham and the Respondent jointly started the shop in Bellary, and that the business of the shop was from time to time carried on by moneys jointly borrowed by them, for which joint bonds were executed. That as Matthew Abraham and the Respondent were undivided Hindoo brothers, labouring for their joint interest, they had each an equal right to all the capital. That the deposit for the Abkarry contract was chiefly made up from sums received from the petty Arrack vendors, and, so far as the deposit was supplied by Matthew Abraham, the same was made out of family property, and that the distillery buildings were built, or enlarged, out of joint funds. That the Respondent was not employed either as clerk or manager of the distillery, but that though the distillery was a wholly separate concern from the shop, he possessed equal rights therein with Matthew Abraham, and his joint interest had been invariably recognized and admitted by Matthew Abraham. That the Abkarry contract for the official year 1836-37, was entered into in the joint names of the Respondent and Matthew Abraham. That the property which existed at Matthew Abraham's death, was the undivided property of the family. That the realization and management of the estate of Matthew Abraham was not entrusted to the Respondent by the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, but that he assumed the same, and was entitled so to do, as being the head of the family. That the letters of administration granted to the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, were solely for the purpose of procuring payment of the money due upon a policy of assurance, and could not alter the law governing the case, which, he insisted, was the Hindoo law. That the Respondent did not [208] obtain successive renewals of the Abkarry contract held by Matthew Abraham, but that he purchased anew the Abkarry contract at public auction in 1843. That the Plaintiffs having no resources of their own had been supported by the Respondent from motives of charity. That no demands for accounts were made by the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, of the Respondent as her agent. That the Respondent was solely entitled to the Abkarry contract, and that the Plaintiffs had no connection with or right to any share from the profits of the contract. That a large portion of the property existing at the time of Matthew Abraham's death was in the possession of Plaintiffs; and finally submitted that, instead of the Plaintiffs being entitled to property exceeding Rs. 3,00,000, they were not entitled to anything from the Respondent.

The Plaintiffs in reply insisted, that the Plaintiffs were correctly joined together in the suit. That it was only in the power of the Respondent to set forth a description and particulars of the property claimed. That the Hindoo law could not apply to parties situated as the Plaintiffs and the Respondent were, and that the course of conduct pursued by the Respondent was inconsistent with the applicability of that law. That even if the case was to be governed by Hindoo law, Matthew Abraham inherited no property from his father, and the position in which the Respondent stood towards Matthew Abraham was such as to show that their interests were separate and distinct. That the Respondent did not become the head of the family on the death of Matthew Abraham, but that the Respondent had actually acknowledged in writing that the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, was the head of the family. That the Respondent, since the death of [209] Matthew Abraham, acted as the agent of the Plaintiffs, and that the Abkarry contract in 1843 was taken by the Respondent after communication and with the consent and permission of the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham. That the Plaintiffs were not Hindoos or subject to Hindoo law, and they denied that they were regarded as Hindoos by law. That the Respondent had been in the habit of honouring drafts drawn by the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, upon him as manager of the distillery, and had advanced moneys from the distillery to other persons at her request and against his own inclination, and that such conduct was inconsistent with the assertion that the Plaintiffs had been supported by him out of charity. That the Plaintiffs never opposed the Respondent with respect to the Abkarry contract, because for several years after Matthew Abraham's death they believed that the Respondent was acting and considered himself as acting as their agent in obtaining the contract, and that the Plaintiff, Charles Henry Abraham, was in total ignorance of the actual position of affairs until September, 1852, and he took proceedings in the suit immediately upon his return to India in June, 1853. That the Plaintiffs were not in possession of the property of Matthew Abraham, with the exception of a dwelling-house, bungalow, furniture, plate, etc., and that their possession of any of the property was inconsistent with the Respondent's claim to be the sole head and representative of the family.

The rejoinder of the Respondent admitted that parties in his position had no status which fell under any particular law, and adduced several reasons with a view to show that the law which should govern the case was the Hindoo and not the English law.

[210] On the 12th of March, 1855, the cause came on before Mr. Story, the then Civil Judge of Bellary, and he proceeded to adjudicate upon the two preliminary objections taken to the plaint by the Respondent in his answer: namely, that the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, had been improperly made a co-Plaintiff, and that the property claimed had not been specified in the plaint in accordance with Mad. Reg. III. of 1802: and upon both of these objections the Civil Judge was in favour of the Respondent, and made a decree non-suiting the Plaintiffs, with costs.

From this decree the Plaintiffs appealed to the Sudder Adawlut, and that Court, by an Order, dated the 20th of August, 1855, after stating that the Civil Judge might have required the Plaintiffs to amend their plaint by stating the particulars of the property, directed the Civil Judge to proceed to dispose of the suit on its merits. The Sudder Court appended to the above order the following instructions to the Civil Judge:—"The Court have to notice that the Civil Judge has pronounced upon a point material to the issue of the suit, namely, the law of inheritance, by which the parties are to be bound, without receiving any evidence whereby to govern his judgment on the subject. Such a question can only be rightly pronounced upon, on consideration of the usage of persons situated as the parties who are described as Christians whose ancestors are of Hindoo stock, and the usage in their particular family as indicated by the acts of the parties and their predecessors, in respect of their property since they have belonged to the Christian community. It will be necessary further to ascertain by whom and under what circumstances the property in issue was acquired, so as to determine [211] whether it was the self-acquired estate of the deceased, Matthew Abraham, or of ancestral origin, after which the rights of the parties thereto, whether under English or Hindoo law, should be declared."

The suit accordingly came again before the Civil Court, and by an Order of that Court dated the 30th of November, 1855, the Plaintiffs were required to amend their plaint by stating the particulars of the property. This order the Plaintiffs were unable to comply with, as they were ignorant of the particulars, and the Civil Court dismissed the suit with costs by an Order dated the 11th of January, 1856.

Upon appeal to the Sudder Adawlut this Order was set aside, upon the ground that in a suit like the present, wherein the particulars of the property sued for were to be known only by information to be furnished by the Defendant, the proper course for the officiating Civil Judge to have taken would have been to seek this information at the Defendant's hands.

The suit was accordingly replaced on the file of the Civil Court, and the following points were recorded for proof by Mr. Irvine, the Civil Judge:—General point. First, each party should prove the practice of families similarly situated to theirs, whether to adhere to the Hindoo law of inheritance, or to be governed by the law of England in that respect. Secondly, each party should also prove what has been the practice of their own family in this respect as shown by their acts.

The Plaintiffs to prove, first, that Defendant's father died insolvent, and that Matthew Abraham took charge of the Defendant then a child, as stated in the [212] plaint. Second, that a considerable sum of money was expended by Matthew Abraham on the Abkarry buildings. Third, the nature and extent of the property left by Matthew Abraham. Fourth, that the Defendant on Matthew Abraham's death was continued in the management of all his estate on the terms mentioned in the plaint, and that he took the renewal of the Abkarry contract for the remaining months of the year in which Matthew Abraham died and in subsequent years, as stated by them. Fifth, that the first Plaintiff lent money from the distillery funds against Defendant's inclination; and by a supplemental point, directed him to prove that Matthew Abraham kept regular accounts of the distillery business.

The Defendant to prove, first, that his father died possessed of property and that Matthew Abraham took possession of it. Second, that the shop was established as stated, and that he and Matthew Abraham raised capital for it by borrowing money jointly for it. Third, that the money deposited with the Government as security for the Abkarry rent was made up from the sums received from the petty renters, and that that money was used as stated in the answer. Fourth, that the first Plaintiff requested that the third Plaintiff should be admitted as a partner in the Abkarry contract. Fifth, that on Matthew Abraham's death the Defendant became the legal head of the family, and as such continued in possession of the estate. Sixth, that he obtained after Matthew Abraham's death the Abkarry contract for his own exclusive benefit, and that he was legally entitled so to do. Each party were to be at liberty to disprove the points given to the other.

Both parts entered into voluminous evidence, [213] and a great many witnesses were examined on behalf both of the Plaintiff and the Defendant.

The documents adduced by the Plaintiffs consisted chiefly of correspondence between the Respondent and Matthew Abraham, generally during the life of Matthew Abraham; and the correspondence between the Respondent and others after the death of Matthew Abraham. From the correspondence during the life of Matthew Abraham, it appeared that he and the Respondent acted in all respects like English persons, being wholly inconsistent with the allegations of the Respondent, that there was a general unity of interest between him and Matthew Abraham, and that they were undivided Hindoo brothers. The correspondence after the death of Matthew Abraham included a long letter addressed by the Respondent to the late Charles Henry Abraham, dated the 19th of August, 1842, shortly after the death of Matthew Abraham, lamenting the great loss he had sustained, and the consequent alteration in his situation, and in which he set forth a statement of the affairs and general assets of the deceased, without making any claim, or allusion to a claim, on his own behalf to any interest therein, except as the general manager of the property, and soliciting the aid and interest of Charles Henry Abraham to procure from his mother (the Appellant) a continuance of his agency or some provision for his future support; the remainder regarded the power of attorney and letters of administration before stated, and the accounts between the Plaintiff and Respondent.

In addition to the correspondence, documentary evidence was adduced by the Plaintiffs, showing the admission of the Respondent as a partner with [214] Matthew Abraham in the shop, on the 2nd of April, 1832, with entries from the distillery cash book, showing drafts from the distillery funds according to the orders of the first Plaintiff, both before and after the death of Matthew Abraham. They put in evidence, also, translation of a bond executed by two persons to Matthew Abraham, therein described as "Contractor of the entire Talook of Bellary," and an abstract of the distillery accounts, rendered to the first Plaintiff by the Respondent, together with the letters of administration before mentioned, and a receipt by the Appellant, the widow, as "Administratrix to the estate of the late Mr. M. Abraham," and by the Respondent, as her attorney, in respect of debts due to Matthew Abraham's estate. The Plaintiffs filed also a return of particulars respecting the Abkarry contract, showing the continuance of the same deposit after Matthew Abraham's death, and other matters as to the renewals by the Respondent; accounts of the distillery brought in by Respondent upon being called upon to do so—such Accounts showing the payments made to the Appellant, the widow, up to the institution of the suit. Two witnesses, Englishmen, and two native Christians who had been well acquainted with Matthew Abraham's father, and with Matthew Abraham, when a youth, were examined by the Plaintiffs, who proved that Matthew Abraham's father was in a state of poverty up to the time of his death, and that Matthew Abraham had been appointed to a post in the Arsenal at Bellary, independently of any exertions of his father on his behalf, and had not come into possession of any property upon his father's death. Many other witnesses, who had been intimately acquainted with Matthew Abraham and the Respondent, [215] proved that the Respondent was a dependent upon Matthew Abraham; that he had never been treated by him or other members of the family as if he were in the position of an undivided brother, and ultimately to become the head of the family; that his partnership with Matthew Abraham was limited to the shop; that Matthew Abraham and the Respondent never adhered to a single Hindoo custom or usage; that the usage and habits of Matthew Abraham and his family, and of the Respondent, were entirely opposed to Hindoo law or customs; and that there was no difference whatsoever between their mode of life and that of any English, or East Indian family, but that, on the contrary, they were always looked upon as members, and even leading members, of the East Indian community, and that they were associated with Englishmen and East Indians in all matters of religious, public, social, and private interest. It was further shown by the evidence of other witnesses, well acquainted with the religion and customs of the different classes, that the only class of persons whose status and position presented a clear analogy to that of Matthew Abraham, were the East Indians, who, strictly so called, were the descendants of a European and a native, or half-caste, and who, when adhering to English habits and customs, were governed by English law, and that that class had not hesitated to admit and recognize both Matthew Abraham and the Respondent as members thereof. It was also proved that, after the death of Matthew Abraham up to Christmas, 1853, the Arrack vendors came to the house of the first Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, every Christmas to pay their respects or do homage to her as the representative of Matthew Abraham, and as such at the [216] head of the distillery, and that the Respondent was present on many such occasions. Four persons, who had been connected with the distillery during the lifetime of Matthew Abraham, deposed to the fact of Matthew Abraham having been solely entitled to the distillery; that accounts were regularly made up for and kept by him, and that the Respondent had no power at the distillery or over the persons employed therein, save such as was delegated to him as manager by Matthew Abraham.

The Respondent was called as a witness for the Plaintiffs, and examined at great length. He stated, amongst other things, that he was admitted a partner in the shop in 1832, under a deed of partnership, which he could not produce; that he was never admitted by Matthew Abraham as partner in the distillery business by any deed, but he alleged that Matthew Abraham had acknowledged that he and the Respondent were joint proprietors of the distillery business; he admitted that he did not, upon Matthew Abraham's death, close accounts or pay over to the Plaintiffs Matthew Abraham's interest in the distillery: that he made no valuation for the transfer to him of the distillery business; that he continued to work the distillery business with the stock and funds that were invested in it at the time of Matthew Abraham's death; that he did not on Matthew Abraham's death give the Plaintiffs intimation that he would carry on the Abkarry contract business for his own exclusive benefit; that Matthew Abraham and the Respondent had not an equal interest in the distillery business as to shares; that Matthew Abraham was the sole contractor, and the Respondent contributed his labour; that he kept no regular account of the property [217] which was in his possession at the death of Matthew Abraham; that he considered that, during the life of Matthew Abraham, he had a proprietary interest in all his property; that he laboured jointly with Matthew Abraham in the contracts for several years previous to his death, and did nearly all the business for several years, and, therefore, claimed a share in it; that the Appellant, the widow, had made several demands for accounts from the Respondent in different years; that he did not furnish any capital for the Abkarry business after Matthew Abraham's death; that he had removed the records of the distillery and had destroyed some since June, 1853; that he had destroyed all the records of the distillery up to May, 1854; and that he claimed the distillery as his own since Matthew Abraham's death, but did not produce any account of the business from the period. The Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, and the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, were examined as witnesses, and their evidence was in the main corroborative of the facts and circumstances above stated.

The documentary evidence adduced by the Respondent consisted of correspondence and other documents. The correspondence during the life of Matthew Abraham was relied on by the Respondent as showing that there was a general unity of interest between him and Matthew Abraham, and that such general unity was recognized by the family. Some of the letters contained among other matters the following expressions in allusion to the Abkarry contract:—"We have nothing else to depend upon," and "We shall have the benefit of it;" and again "We asked for the renewal of it;" and "We have a legal right to it."

The correspondence after the death of Matthew [218] Abraham, consisted of letters from the deceased, Charles Henry Abraham, respecting his father's death and other matters, and from the Appellant the widow to the Respondent, with respect to the funds to meet the expenses of her son in England being supplied out of his father's estate. The Respondents also put in evidence a decree of the Auxiliary Court at Guntoor in a suit for maintenance; the translation of four awards of arbitrators upon divisions of ancestral property; a translation of a power of attorney in Persian signed by the Respondent and the Plaintiff, Daniel Vincent Abraham, authorizing a Vakeel to act for them in certain suits, in which was contained a recital that the Respondent and the third Plaintiff "are the heirs" of Matthew Abraham. Daniel Vincent Abraham, however, in reply to this stated in his examination, that he was about nineteen years of age when the above document was signed, and that he had but slight, if any, knowledge of the Persian language, and did not make himself acquainted with the contents of the document, but having full confidence in the Respondent, signed it. Various instruments dealing with the Abkarry and other property of the late Matthew Abraham, executed both before and after his death by the Respondent, together with the pleadings and decree in a suit instituted jointly by the late Daniel Vincent Abraham, the son, and the Respondent, respecting the affairs of his father, Matthew Abraham, and testimonials, contract bonds, etc., in relation to the Abkarry contract, showing the Respondent as holder of the Abkarry contract since the death of Matthew Abraham, were also put in evidence.

The Respondent's witnesses were examined, chiefly [219] with reference to the law by which native Christians were governed. Several of the witnesses who were East Indians, and considered themselves competent to give an opinion, gave it as their opinion that native Christians, were such Christians as were born in the country, and who have not changed their customs and habits, and that persons who like Matthew Abraham, did not in any way differ from Englishmen, save in native origin, were to be classed with East Indians, and ought, like that class, to be subject to English law. Mr. Ross, one of the Respondent's witnesses, who had been well acquainted with the family, confirmed the fact of Matthew Abraham and the Respondent having been leading members of the East Indian community, and stated that none of the East Indians ever made any distinction between themselves and Matthew Abraham on account of his birth, and of the native dress he had once worn.

Mr. Irvine, the Civil Judge of Bellary, gave judgment in the suit on the 1st of June, 1858, and, as to the law of inheritance in respect of native Christians, rejected all the evidence of East Indians, as not being similarly situated with the Abrahams; but he considered that the documentary evidence of awards and deeds of division between native Christians and the evidence of the native Christians proved that the general state of native Christians was to remain divided, and that the undivided state was the exception. He held that the Respondent and his brother were not undivided in fact; that they were partners in the shop in equal shares; that the Respondent was the agent of his brother, and of the Plaintiffs after his death as to the Abkarry contract, and also agent under the administration and power of attorney; and he decreed accounts to [220] be taken in a certain manner (see Order set out in the judgment, post [9 Moo. Ind. App.], 233), with an allowance to the Respondent, and directing him to pay the costs.

From this decree the Respondent appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

When the appeal came before the Sudder Court, questions (see these questions stated in the judgment, post [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 235) were put to the Pundits that Court, and answers to the following effect given: that property not ancestral, but acquired by all brothers jointly, by means of agriculture, trade, etc., was equally divisible among all of them; that the fact of the elder brother acquiring some property before the younger attained the age of discretion made no difference, especially where, during the latter years of the elder brother's life, the labour fell chiefly upon the younger; that under these circumstances the property should be divided into two shares, and one of them given to the sons of the elder brother and the other to the younger one; that the ignorance of the brothers of their respective rights in law would not affect such rights; and that the absence of intention on the part of the elder brother did not affect the rights of the younger.

The Sudder Court (consisting of Messrs. H. Frere and L. T. Strange), made their decree in the cause on the 5th of November, 1859, reversing the judgment of the Civil Court. This decree, in its main features, was to the following effect:—As to the law of inheritance, the Sudder Court considered that the Civil Judge, whilst deciding on the fact of division or undivision, had failed to pronounce any opinion upon the rule of law; the Court came to the conclusion that there was in India no lex loci, but that the rule of law must be according to the customs and usages of the class to [221] which the parties belonged, and the usage in each particular family, to be ascertained by evidence. The Court founded its judgment on the report of the Indian law Commissioners, and the opinion of the Judges of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, that the English law was not in force in India, except so far as it was introduced by the Charters. The Court said that in seeking a law to apply to parties circumstanced as those in the suit, they were cast upon the rule laid down in section XVII. Reg. II. of 1802, that “in cases for which no specific rule may exist, the Judges are to act according to justice, and equity, and good conscience.” That the Sudder Court, in a case similar to the present in regard to East Indians, who had no Code of law of their own, pointed out, under date the 14th of July, 1828, that the rule of law must be according to the customs and usages of the class to which the parties belonged, which was to be ascertained by evidence; and that on the 25th January, 1836, and the 3rd September, 1844, they gave effect to the same instructions. The Court agreed with the Civil Judge in rejecting the evidence of East Indians, but considered that the change of dress and manners could not alter the law of inheritance, or any local law or usage. The Court considered, that the evidence as to the usages in law of Christian converts from Hindooism was universal; that the Hindoo law as to rights in property, was the rule observed by the class in question, from generation to generation. The Court held that the acts of the family were in accordance with Hindoo law, referring to the suits in regard to the Kurnoul debts by Respondent and his nephew, as joint heirs of Matthew Abraham. In applying the Hindoo law, the Court adopted the opinion of the Pundits, considering that the dealings of the brothers [222] brought them within that law, and held that, according to it, the Respondent was entitled to an equal share in the estate. The Court came also to the conclusion that the Respondent was not a salaried agent, or an agent at all, and that the evidence of the first Plaintiff and her relatives, the first two witnesses in this respect, was unworthy of credit, and that as the Plaintiffs were not justified in bringing the suit, the Court condemned them in all the costs that had been incurred.

The present appeal was from this decree.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellants.—This decree cannot be sustained. It is wrong in law in declaring that the rights of the parties in this appeal are to be governed by the rules and principles of the Hindoo law. It is of the utmost importance to ascertain the status of persons in the position of Matthew Abraham, and the law by which the succession to their property is to be governed. In India the status of religion as regards natives is the status of law; the law is the religion both of Hindoos and Mahomedans. The Hindoo law, therefore, being a law of religion, cannot be applicable to persons who are not Hindoos, that are Christians, and as in this case, as well by descent, as profession, and whose ancestors for several generations have in every respect repudiated the tenets and principles of the Hindoo religion. Our contention is, that the law applicable in this case must be the law appertaining to that class of which the parties become members, or so much of it as is applicable to their peculiar situation. The English law of descent and succession, therefore, in the case of native East Indians, professing the Christian religion, must be the governing law in regard to the rights and possession of their property. This is apparent [223] as well from all sound and legal principles as from the laws enacted in India.

First, by Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. XV. it is provided, that the Court shall proceed to try suits under the same rules and regulations as were prescribed for the trial of suits between individuals; and by section XVII. of the same Regulation it is enacted, that "in cases coming within the jurisdiction of the Zillah Courts, for which no specific rule may exist, the Judges are to act according to justice, and equity, and good conscience." Section XVI. cl. 1, of Mad. Reg. III. of 1802, further provides that, in suits regarding succession, inheritance, marriage, and caste, etc., the Mahomedan laws with respect to Mahomedans, and the Hindoo law with regard to Hindoos, are to be considered as the general rules by which the Judges are to form their decisions. Mad. Reg. V. of 1829, which was passed to modify the provisions of Reg. III. of 1802, as regarding the testamentary dispositions of Hindoos, recognizes the validity of Wills made by Hindoos, if made in conformity with the Hindoo law. Previous to the passing of the Act, No. XXI. of 1850, the lex loci Act, in the case of apostasy, the change of religion on the part of a Hindoo deprived him of his right of inheritance, W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 131; but by that Act it is declared, that notwithstanding a Hindoo becomes a Christian, his rights of inheritance to property as a Hindoo shall not be thereby affected. But the Act, No. XXI. of 1850, never had or can have any application to this case. The Abrahams never were Hindoos in religion; they never professed or acknowledged the religious tenets upon which alone the Hindoo law is founded and by which it is governed. They were, therefore, not as Hindoos [224] within the pale of that law. The Sudder Court has held that there is no lex loci in India, and that the law to govern the case is to be sought in the usage of the class to which the deceased, Matthew Abraham, belonged. As to there being a lex loci or not in India, out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court Charters, the Report of the Indian Law Commissioners of October 31st, 1840, shows clearly, first, that the Commissioners considered that Hindoo law cannot apply to Christian converts; and, secondly, they thought that the English law must in such cases apply, but they seem to have given up that opinion in deference to the opinions of the Judges of the Supreme Court, who laid it down, that the English law was only introduced by Supreme Court Charters, and was co-extensive only with their jurisdiction. The doctrine that there is no lex loci in India is capable of a reductio ad absurdum. Persons who have ceased to be Hindoos have a law, or they have not. If they have not, no Court of Justice can adjudicate. If they have a law, it must be either the lex loci, or the law of usage. But a law of usage implies a continuance, and must have had a beginning; therefore, if there is no class similar to themselves, there can be no law of usage; and if there be a class, that class must for some time have been without a law. The Sudder Court has dealt with the case as one to be determined by usage of persons similarly situated with the deceased Matthew Abraham. The persons similarly situated are Christian converts from Hindooism, and the Judges of the Sudder Court have by their decree held that such native Christians are to be governed, as to their property, by the usage of Hindoo law, and that from the evidence in this case such usage is not inconsistent with the practice of the family. Now, both [225] Courts rejected the evidence of East Indians, persons of mixed European and native blood, whose evidence we insist was strictly pertinent and ought to have been admitted. The class called "East Indians" are generally illegitimate children of a native woman, the father being European. But in such a case the application of Hindoo law depends upon the co-existence with the Hindoo status, and that is the Hindoo religion, Myra Boyce v. Ootaram (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 400). The real question here is, what was the usage of this family? The evidence rejected shows that their usages were in every respect those of English East Indians. They conducted themselves as Englishmen in dress, habits, manners, and customs, and, moreover, held and conformed to the tenets of the Christian religion. Surely, this was evidence of their not being Hindoos; and if they were not Hindoos, then the Hindoo law of inheritance could not apply to them, for such law is part and parcel of the Hindoo religion, and cannot be separated from it. The whole evidence, which is very voluminous, proves most completely that there are four classes of persons belonging to the Christian community in India, namely, first, European Protestants; second, European Roman Catholics; third, East Indian Protestants, or Catholics, being either partially or wholly of native blood, and, as the family of the Abrahams are in this case, Christians by birth and parentage; and, lastly, there are native converts, either Protestants or Roman Catholics. Now, all these parties must have some status and some law to govern their rights, and if the Hindoo law is to apply to them, then they can have no rights of property whatever. This appears from an opinion of the Pundits, in a former suit, which was called for by the Appellants, and in which they stated that in [226] the case of East Indians, the law to be applied depended upon the religion which they professed.

But, secondly, there was no ancestral property in this case, and, therefore, even if the Hindoo law could be shown to be applicable as between the parties, the consequences which the Sudder Court has deduced therefrom would not follow, and the decree on that ground cannot be sustained. The facts are wholly opposed to the conclusion that Matthew Abraham and the Respondent were just and undivided in estate, or that the Respondent had any interest in any part of the property in question, except that which belonged to him by contract, as the partner of Matthew Abraham under the deed of April, 1832; and the fact of Matthew Abraham having admitted the Respondent into partnership in the shop in 1832, under a deed of partnership, is conclusive against the claim which the Respondent now sets up to a general joint interest with Matthew Abraham, which, if it existed at all, must have existed prior to the partnership in 1832. Now, in all cases, within the application of the Hindoo law, where there has been property to start with, which property formed the nucleus of subsequently acquired property, though such is self-acquired property, yet the presumption in law is, that the whole property is in coparcenary, Dhurm Das Pandey v. Mussumat Shama Soondri Dibiah (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 240). The very theory of an undivided family is founded upon the existence of paternal property. But our contention is, that Matthew Abraham and the Respondent did not constitute what the Hindoo law regards as an undivided family, and that the Respondent is not entitled to that special and peculiar right which the Hindoo law regards as attaching to the accretion [227] of property held in coparcenary. One way of testing the Respondent's claim is, to consider whether a claim by him for a general partition during Matthew Abraham's life could have been maintained, which the authorities clearly show could not, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 195, 198-9, 203, 208, 213, 219, 221, 226-7; Id. Vol. II., pp. 346, 357, 365, 370, 371, 375; Inst. of Menu (by Haughten), Ch. IX., sec. 204, p. 319; W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," pp. 43, 51. The Mitacshara, ch. I. sec. 3. From the evidence in the cause it is apparent that this claim of the Respondent was an afterthought. At the time of Matthew Abraham's death, as well as for some time after, he led the Appellants to believe that the Abkarry contract was held after Matthew Abraham's death precisely as it was before.

Then, lastly, we submit, that the Sudder Court was not justified in refusing an account, and that the decree proceeded on an erroneous basis in calculating the sums to be paid to the Respondent, and, under no circumstances, could the case warrant the imposition of the whole costs of the suit upon the Appellants.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Respondent.—There is no lex loci in India. Among Christian native Hindoo families, the rule of property and inheritance is regulated by usage among the class. According to the usage as proved in this case, the Hindoo law is followed by all classes of native Christians. As to the rule of law by which native Christians are regulated, that question is elaborately investigated in the Report of the Indian law Commissioners of the [228] 31st of October, 1810, and after a critical examination of all the decided cases, whether they related to Armenian, Portuguese, French, or native Christians in India, the conclusion arrived at by the Commissioners is, that the English law is confined within the limits of the Charters of Justice, and that there is no lex loci there, but that each class must be regulated by the customs and usage of the class, and each family thereof, and that this result must be arrived at in each case by evidence. In Freeman v. Fairlie (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 321), the Master reported, that the Supreme Court at Calcutta, created by the Statute, 21st Geo. III., c. 70, decided cases according to Hindoo or Mahomedan law, which could not be applied to the government of Christian people, and that there was no uniform lex loci to regulate inheritance, succession, etc. Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, secs. 3 and 4, applies to natives and other persons not British subjects; so Mad. Reg. VII. of 1827. It is true that Ben. Reg. IV. of 1793, section 15, applies only to Hindoos, or Mahomedans, but as the Mofussil Courts are Courts of conscience, they determine questions respecting the law of Foreigners, that is, not Hindoo or Mahomedans, but British subjects. Thus in Durand v. Boillard (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 176), the succession was governed by French law. Joanna Fernandez v. Domingo de Silva (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 227), was a case of Portuguese law, and the cases of Arichuk Tea Statanoos v. Khaya Michael Aratoon (3 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 9), Humrus v. Humrus (2 Borr. Bom. Rep. 496), Aratoon v. Aratoon (7 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 52), Gregory v. Cockran (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 275), related to Armenian Christians. So with [229] Parees, Miherwanjee Noushirwanjee v. Awan Bacc (2 Borr. Bom. Rep. 209), Moder Karkhooscrow Hormusjee v. Cooverbhacc (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 448); likewise Sheik law, Doe d. Kissenchauder Shaw v. Baidam Beebee (2 Morley Dig., 22); also among members of the Sheeah sect of Mahomedans, Raja Deedar Hosssein v. Ramer Zuhoor oon-Vissa (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 441), and by the English law, Hoo v. Peter Marquis (4 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 213). This view of the law, that the Mofussil Courts adjudicate according to the law of parties not being Hindoos or Mahomedans, is strengthened by the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XXI. of 1850, by which it is declared that, notwithstanding a Hindoo becomes a Christian, his rights of inheritance or property as a Hindoo shall not be thereby affected. We insist that with respect to the customs and usages applicable to native Christians, the evidence here clearly establishes that the law of their ancestors, namely, the Hindoo law, was the only guide; that birth and blood must decide, and the adoption of English dress and manners does not and cannot alter the rule of law or change the status of the parties as to the acquisition and transmission of property.

Secondly, according to Hindoo law, the Respondent was entitled to an equal share with his brother, and, after his death, with his family, in all the property, which was joint property. The Hindoo law applicable to the joint acquisition of property by two brothers, although not undivided, is clear, Kashul Chokkurcutty v. Radhanath Chokkurcutty (1 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 335), F. Macnaghten's "Hindoo Law," pp. 45, 66; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 213, and cases collected in [230] Morley's Dig. tit. "Partition," Vol. I., p. 180. The legal result is, that the brothers had an equal interest in the joint acquisitions, even although ignorant of the law, and admitting no intention of creating a joint interest existed. As to the joint acquisition of property by the Respondent and his brother, Matthew, by their joint labour, we submit that the evidence is sufficient, independently of Hindoo law, to create a joint and equal interest between the brothers. This is shown by the confidential and unreserved mode of dealing between them, their living together, their joint purchases and mortgages, and the constant and invariable course of joint and common interest for twelve years succeeding the death of Matthew, without account or claim.

Then with respect to the accounts. If the interest of the brothers is held to be joint, which we insist it was, then Rs. 3,00,000 is to be taken as a basis of calculation, and the amount received by the Appellants added to it, and then the total of the two amounts should form the valuation of the joint property, and this is the mode of taking the account which was finally agreed to by the several parties before the Sudder Court. This proposal was made to avoid the expense and delay of taking accounts generally, and the Court acted upon it, and we contend that, assuming the interest is held to be joint, both parties are bound to have the account settled on that footing, and have thereby waived general accounts.

Lastly, in case of there being no joint interest, the Respondent is entitled to the whole of the Abkarry contract, and the profits thereof, from the 20th of April, 1843, as his exclusive property, he being ready [231] in such case to allow a fair sum for the distillery, plant, and premises.

Their Lordships' judgment was postponed, and was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (June 13, 1863).—The Appellants in this case are Charlotte Abraham, the widow, and Daniel Vincent Abraham, the only surviving child of Matthew Abraham. The Respondent, Francis Abraham, was the only brother of the late Matthew Abraham. Matthew Abraham and the Respondent were by birth Hindoos of pure native blood, being descended from a family of Hindoos. Their ancestors for several generations had embraced Christianity, and they were themselves Christians, originally it appears Roman Catholics, afterwards Protestant Dissenters, and subsequently members of the Church of England. They were of the class known in India as "native Christians." Matthew Abraham was by far the elder of the two brothers; for in early life, when the Respondent was only about two or three years old, he was employed as a clerk in the arsenal at Bellary. In the year 1820, he married the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham. This lady and her father and mother were also Christians: the father an Englishman and the mother a Portuguese. They were of the class known in India as East Indians. There was issue of this marriage the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham, and another son, Charles Henry Abraham, who survived his father, Matthew Abraham, but died pending the proceedings brought before us by this appeal. In the year 1823, Matthew Abraham established a shop at Bellary, the business of which was continued to be carried on up to the [232] time of his decease. Throughout these proceedings it is called the shop-business. In the year 1827, Matthew Abraham entered into a contract with Government for the supply of liquors to the troops at Bellary, and erected a distillery for the purposes of this contract. The contract was renewable annually, and was annually renewed to Matthew Abraham up to the time of his decease, except in one year when it fell into other hands. Throughout these proceedings it is called the Abkarry contract. In the year 1832, Matthew Abraham took Mr. Richardson and the Respondent, his brother, into partnership with him in the shop-business, each party taking a third of the profits. This partnership was dissolved in the year 1837, and the business was thenceforth, until the death of Matthew Abraham, continued by him and the Respondent, his brother, without any new arrangement having been come to between them. The Respondent, some time before the death of Matthew Abraham, also married a Christian lady of the class known as "East Indians." In the year 1842, Matthew Abraham died, leaving the Appellants and Charles Henry Abraham, his widow and children. After his death the Respondent continued to carry on the shop-business, and he also procured the Abkarry contract to be annually renewed in his name, and carried on the business of that contract, and the distillery connected with it. In the year 1854, the Appellants and Charles Henry Abraham instituted against the Respondent the suit out of which this appeal has arisen, estimating the property to be recovered in the suit at Rs. 3,00,000.

By their plaint in the suit they alleged, that the whole of the capital in the shop-business was supplied [233] by the late Matthew Abraham; that the distillery business was carried on by him alone and with his own capital, and that the Respondent was his clerk, agent, or manager, in this business at a salary; that on the death of Matthew Abraham, the duty of collecting his estate devolved on the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, and she intrusted the collection, realization, and management of it to the Respondent, and gave him a power of attorney for that purpose, and that the Respondent had carried on both the shop business and the distillery business by means of the late Matthew Abraham's capital; that he had made payments to and on account of the Plaintiffs, and for the debts of Matthew Abraham, but not nearly to the amount which he had received; and the Plaintiffs accordingly by their plaint, prayed for an account of the late Matthew Abraham's estate received by the Respondent, including the profits of the shop business and of the distillery, subsequently to his decease, offering to make the Respondent a just and sufficient allowance for his services in managing the distillery business since the death of Matthew Abraham.

The Respondent, by his answer to the plaint, insisted, that the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, being the widow of the late Matthew Abraham, could not claim jointly with her sons, the other Plaintiffs; that she was entitled only to maintenance, and must seek it from her sons. He said that Matthew Abraham's situation in the arsenal was procured for him by his father; that the father demised when he, the Defendant, was about two or three years of age, and that the late Matthew Abraham took charge of him, the Defendant, as his guardian, and took charge also of all the property left by their father; that the shop-[234]-business had been conducted by him both in the lifetime and since the decease of Matthew Abraham, but that as the deceased Matthew Abraham and he (the Defendant) were possessed of very little property, they had jointly borrowed money at interest on their joint bonds to carry on their business, and that it was by these means the capital of the business had been raised; and he urged that the late Matthew Abraham and he (the Defendant) were brothers of an undivided native Hindoo family, jointly labouring together for their common welfare, borrowing money on interest for their business upon their joint bonds and security, and mortgaging all their joint property of every description as security for the same; and consequently that the late Matthew Abraham and he, (the Defendant) had an equal right to all the capital, and not the elder brother, Matthew Abraham, alone. He said that the Plaintiffs, Charles Henry Abraham and Daniel Vincent Abraham, were merely junior members of an undivided Hindoo family, and that he (the Defendant) by the death of Matthew Abraham had become the head of the family, and he insisted that the fact of himself and his father and family being Christians could not and did not make them subject to the English law. That their religion was an accident, and that in fact they were Hindoos and undivided and must of necessity, and according to all practice and precedent, be subject to the Hindoo law and no other. He denied that the Akkary contract was the property of Matthew Abraham alone, and alleged that he (the Defendant) had purchased the contract after the death of the late Matthew Abraham on his own responsibility.

The Plaintiffs by their replication submitted, that [235] by whatever law the case was to be decided, they had all a common interest against the Defendant, and that no final decision could be come to in the absence of any of them. They relied upon the family having been Christians for several generations as putting an end to the Defendant's assertion that the case ought to be decided according to the Hindoo law; and after referring to the class of East Indians having always been considered to be governed by the same laws as Englishmen as to their rights of descent and inheritance, and to authorities by which, as they contended, it was shown that in suits between parties who were neither Hindoos nor Mahomedans in religion, the usages of the particular class to which they belonged formed the guide of the Court, and that even in cases to which Hindoo law was applicable, the usages of the family were to be the rule of guidance when they were opposed to the law, they submitted that the Court, before coming to a decision in the case, ought to consult the usages of the class to which the parties in the suit belonged, and ascertain what had been the usages of the family in which they had been reared. They further insisted, that even if the case was to be governed by the Hindoo law, the Defendant had no right to any portion of the late Matthew Abraham's estate. They denied that Matthew Abraham inherited any property whatever from his father, and said that the father died an insolvent and ruined man, and that Matthew Abraham had taken charge of the Defendant and reared him from generosity, and had begun the affairs under litigation when the Defendant was a boy at school, and unable to assist him in them. They insisted that Matthew Abraham and the Defendant were not members of an undivided family in the [236] light alleged by the Defendant, and that even if Matthew Abraham obtained his original appointment under Government through the instrumentality of his father, it would confer no right on a younger brother, but the salary attached to the appointment would, even under the Hindoo law, be considered a separate acquisition.

The Defendant, by his rejoinder, adopted the view insisted upon by the replication as to the principles which ought to determine the law by which the case should be decided, submitting that the Plaintiffs had laid down the correct principle, namely, that the customs and usages of the class to which both parties belonged must be sought for and searched, and, further, that the usages of the particular family to which the parties belonged must be looked to, in order to ascertain what law was to govern their relations to each other.

It appears from the record of proceedings before us that in this stage of the suit the Plaintiffs were non-suited by a decree of the Civil Court of Bellary upon the grounds, first, that the Plaintiff, Charlotte Abraham, the widow, could not take part in the suit, she having no right of inheritance as the family stood; and secondly, that no sufficient description or specification of the value of the property sued for had been given in the plaint: but upon an appeal to the Sudder Adawlut, this non-suit was set aside, and the Civil Judge was directed to dispose of the case on the merits, the Court observing, that the Civil Judge had pronounced upon a point material to the issue of the suit, namely, the law of inheritance, by which the parties were to be bound, without receiving any evidence whereby to govern his judgment on the [237] subject, and that such a judgment could only be rightly pronounced upon a consideration of the usages of persons situated as the parties were, being Christians whose ancestors were of Hindoo stock, and of the usages in their particular family, as indicated by the acts of the parties and their predecessors in respect of their property since they had belonged to the Christian community, and that it would be necessary further to ascertain by whom and under what circumstances the property in issue was acquired, so as to determine whether it was the estate of the deceased, Matthew Abraham, acquired by himself, or of ancestral origin, after which the rights of the parties thereto, whether under the English or Hindoo law, should be declared.

The case was accordingly remitted to the Civil Court of Bellary, and the points stated in the pleadings (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 207) were recorded for proof. A vast mass of evidence upon the points recorded was adduced, both on the part of the Plaintiffs and on the part of the Defendant. Their Lordships do not find it necessary to enter into the details of this evidence. It will be sufficient for them, in disposing of the several points of the case, to state the conclusions at which they have arrived as to the result of the evidence bearing on these points.

By the decree made upon the hearing of the cause by the Civil Court of Bellary, the Court ordered as follows:—That an account be taken of the capital employed in the shop-business and of the profits thereof, both prior and subsequent to Matthew Abraham's death, and that the [238] Defendant do pay to the Plaintiffs one-half of the capital and profits found due. That an account be taken of all the capital employed in the distillery business and of the profits, down to the time of the death of Matthew Abraham, and also of the profits of the distillery business arisen since his death, and that the Defendant do pay to the Plaintiffs the amount of the capital and profits found due. That an account be taken of all other the moneys, goods, debts and property of Matthew Abraham which have been collected or received by, or come into the possession of, the Defendant, or any person by his order or for his use, and that the Defendant do deliver up to the Plaintiffs all such portions thereof as consist in kind or specie, and do pay to the Plaintiffs all such portions thereof as consist of money, and do pay such portions thereof as have been converted into money since the death of Matthew Abraham. That so long as the present contract endures, and so long as the Defendant carries on the business in the Plaintiffs' distillery buildings, etc., and with their capital, stock, etc., he must and shall be considered as their agent, and as such accountable to them for all the profits arising from the said business, and that he shall deliver up to the Plaintiffs all deeds, books, securities, documents, papers, and writings in his possession or power, relating to the said contract or to the said distillery business, or otherwise relating to the property, estate, or effects of Matthew Abraham, deceased; the Plaintiffs being bound, in taking the aforesaid several accounts, to make to the Defendant a just and sufficient allowance for his services in managing the said distillery business, and also for his services in collecting and managing all other the property, estate, [239] and effects of Matthew Abraham, and that the Defendant do pay to the Plaintiffs the costs of the suit.

From this decree the Defendant appealed to the Sudder Court.

The Sudder Court, upon the case being brought before it, submitted a question to their Pundits in these terms:—"Two brothers, governed by Hindoo law, inherit no ancestral property. They live together. The elder acquires some property. The younger brother, as he comes to years of discretion, is subsequently admitted by the elder to take part in the administration of his business. They jointly borrow money for the uses of the business, and both give their labour thereto. The elder of those brothers has demised. During the latter years of the deceased brother the labor fell chiefly on the younger one. Since the demise it has fallen exclusively on him. The elder brother has left two sons. Are the said uncle and nephews to be considered co-sharers; and, if so, in what proportions?"

And the Court afterwards submitted this further question to the same Pundits:—"Supposing the said two brothers and the sons of the deceased brother to be ignorant of their respective rights in law over the said property, would this interfere with the title of one party or the other to recover such right when disputes and consequent litigation occurred between them?"

The opinion given by the Pundits upon these questions having been, that the property ought to be divided into two shares, and one of them given to the sons of the elder brother and the other to the younger one, and that the rights acquired by the sons [240] could not be affected by their ignorance of those rights, the Court as to the legal rights of the parties held that they stood as representing two branches of a family governed, as to rights in property, by Hindoo law, and with equal shares; and having arrived at this conclusion, the Court adopted the estimate of the value of the property made by the Plaintiffs for the purposes of their suit—that it was of the value of Rs. 3,00,000, added to that amount the sums which had been paid to the Plaintiffs and to creditors, and the value of some part of the property in the Plaintiffs' possession, thus bringing up the entire value of the property to Rs. 4,71,414. 10s. 5p., and taking one-half of that amount as the Plaintiffs' share, and deducting from it the sums which had been paid to them, and one-half of the debts, found the balance due to the Plaintiffs to be the sum of Rs. 71,492. 10s. 9½p., which the Court ordered the Defendant to pay to the Plaintiffs in discharge of all obligations due by him up to the date of the suit. The Court was also of opinion that the Plaintiffs were not justified in having recourse to the suit, and accordingly imposed upon them all the costs which had been incurred by it.

It is from this decree of the Sudder Court that the present appeal has been brought.

The first and most important question raised by this appeal is, by what law the rights of these parties ought to be determined. In considering this question it is material in the first place to observe what was the real point in issue in the cause. Laying out of considerations the objection raised by the answer, that the Plaintiff, Charlotte Abraham, as widow, could not sue jointly with the other Plaintiffs, her sons, an [241] objection of misjoinder of parties which, in their Lordships' opinion, was properly answered by the replication, and properly disposed of by the Sudder Court when the case was first brought before it by appeal, the true question at issue in this case is, not who was the heir of the late Matthew Abraham, but whether he and the Respondent formed an undivided family in the sense which those words bear in the Hindoo law with reference to the acquisition, improvement, enjoyment, disposition, and devolution of property. It is a question of parcenership, and not of heirship. Heirship may be governed by the Hindoo law, or by any other law to which the ancestor may be subject; but parcenership, understood in the sense in which their Lordships here use the term, as expressing the rights and obligations growing out of the status of an undivided family, is the creature of, and must be governed by, the Hindoo law. Considering the case, then, with reference to parcenership, what is the position of a member of a Hindoo family who has become a convert to Christianity? He becomes, as their Lordships apprehend, at once severed from the family, and regarded by them as an outcast. The tie which bound the family together is, so far as he is concerned, not only loosened, but dissolved. The obligations consequent upon and connected with the tie must, as it seems to their Lordships, be dissolved with it. Parcenership may be put an end to by a severance effected by partition; it must, as their Lordships think, equally be put an end to by severance which the Hindoo law recognizes and creates. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion, that upon the conversion of a Hindoo to Christianity the Hindoo law ceases to have any [242] continuing obligatory force upon the convert. He may renounce the old law by which he was bound, as he has renounced his old religion, or, if he thinks fit, he may abide by the old law, notwithstanding he has renounced the old religion.

It appears, indeed, both from the pleadings and from the points before referred to, that neither side contended for the continuing obligatory force of Hindoo law on a convert to Christianity from that persuasion. The custom and usages of families are alone appealed to, with a reference also to the usages of this particular family; a reference which implies that the general custom of a class is not imperatively obligatory on new converts to Christianity. The conclusion at which their Lordships have arrived on this point, appears also to be supported by authority; for the opinion expressed as to the Hindoo law by the Judge of the Civil Court at Bellary seems to coincide entirely with the opinions of Pundits reported in W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. pp. 131-2. It is there stated, that on the death of an apostate from the Hindoo faith, his heirs, according to Hindoo law, will take all the property which he had at the time of his conversion; and the marginal note states, that his subsequently acquired property would be governed as to its devolution by the law of his new religion. The religion embraced in that case was the Mahomedan, which regulated the devolution of property. The Pundits, therefore, in their reply, naturally connected religion with the rules of descent of property as an adjunct, but the important point which they declare is the separation of the convert from the binding force of Hindoo law, as to his subsequent acquisitions.

[243] Such, then, being the state of the case, so far as the Hindoo law is concerned, we must next consider whether there is any other law which determines the rights over the property of a Hindoo becoming a convert to Christianity. The lex loci Act clearly does not apply, the parties having ceased to be Hindoo in religion; and looking to the Regulations, their Lordships think that so far as they prescribe that the Hindoo law shall be applied to Hindoos and the Mahomedan law to Mahomedans, they must be understood to refer to Hindoos and Mahomedans not by birth merely, but by religion also. They think, therefore, that this case fell to be decided according to the Regulation which prescribes that the decision shall be according to equity and good conscience. Applying, then, this rule to the decision of the case, it seems to their Lordships that the course which appears to have been pursued in India in these cases, and to have been adopted in the present case, of referring the decision to the usages of the class to which the convert may have attached himself, and of the family to which he may have belonged, has been most consonant both to equity and good conscience. The profession of Christianity releases the convert from the trammels of the Hindoo law, but it does not of necessity involve any change of the rights or relations of the convert in matters with which Christianity has no concern, such as his rights and interests in, and his powers over, property. The convert, though not bound as to such matters, either by the Hindoo law or by any other positive law, may by his course of conduct after his conversion have shown by what law he intended to be governed as to these matters. He may have done so either by [244] attaching himself to a class which as to these matters has adopted and acted upon some particular law, or by having himself observed some family usage or custom: and nothing can surely be more just than that the rights and interests in his property, and his powers over it, should be governed by the law which he has adopted, or the rules which he has observed.

Their Lordships have thought it right thus to state their opinion on this point, as this is the first case in which the question has been brought under their consideration. They consider the decision referred to in the judgment of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in the case of a succession to one of the class of East Indians to be an instance of a just and proper exercise of the discretion entrusted to these Courts. The English law, as such, is not the law of those Courts. They have, properly speaking, no obligatory law of the forum, as the Supreme Courts had. The East Indians could not claim the English law as of right; but they were a class most nearly resembling the English, they conformed to them in religion, manners, and customs, and the English law as to the succession of movables was applied by the Courts in the Mofussil to the succession of the property of this class.

Such, then, being their Lordships' opinion as to the law by which they ought to be guided in the decision of this case, it becomes necessary to see how the case stands upon the evidence.

Their Lordships collect from the evidence that the class known in India as "native Christians," using that term in its wide and extended sense as embracing all natives converted to Christianity, has subordinate [245] divisions forming against distinct classes, of which some adhere to the Hindoo customs and usages as to property; others retain those customs and usages in a modified form; and others again have wholly abandoned those customs and usages, and adopted different rules and laws as to their property.

Of this latter class are the "East Indians," a class well defined in India, the members of which follow in all things the usages and customs of the English resident there, and though they cannot claim the exemption from jurisdiction, nor the privilege of a personal law, which the British subjects, in the limited sense of the terms of the jurisdiction of the Charters of the Supreme Courts, enjoy, in other respects, in the common bond of union in religion, customs, and manners, approach the class of British subjects.

Reverting again to the evidence, their Lordships think that it is to be collected from it that the family from which both the late Matthew Abraham and the Respondent descended was of that class of native Christians which commonly retains native usages and customs, and they consider it probable, therefore, that had the family possessed property they would, so long as those usages and customs were retained, have enjoyed it in common according to Hindoo custom; but their Lordships are perfectly satisfied upon the evidence that the late Matthew Abraham and the Respondent had no ancestral property, and that the property which the late Matthew Abraham had was acquired by him by his own sole unaided exertions, and without any use whatever of any common stock. They fully concur in the finding of both the Courts in India upon this point. They are also quite satisfied upon the evidence that [246] from the time of the late Matthew Abraham's marriage he and the Appellant, Charlotte, his wife, and their children adhered in all respects to the religion, manners, and habits of the East Indians, the class to which the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, belonged.

Previously to the marriage some doubt appears to have been entertained whether the East Indians, the class to which the lady belonged, would receive Matthew Abraham into their society and treat him as one of themselves. The evidence on this point of the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, the first Plaintiff, is corroborated by that of a very respectable witness, on whose veracity no doubt can rest. Before this time Mr. Matthew Abraham had assumed the English dress, and had outwardly conformed to all the habits of the English. Assurances were given that the East Indians of Bellary would recognize her husband as one of their body, and the marriage took place. On one important public occasion when a jury was summoned of East Indians, Matthew sat as one of them, and acted as their foreman.

The evidence on this part of the case appears to their Lordships to be clear beyond all doubt. They proceed, then, to consider its effect. That it is not competent to parties to create, as to property, any new law to regulate the succession to it ab intestato, their Lordships entertain no doubt; but that is not the question on which this case depends. The question is, whether, when there are different laws as to property applying to different classes, parties ought not be considered to have adopted the law as to property, whether in respect of succession ab intestato or in other respects, of the class to which they [247] belong. In this particular case the question is, whether the property was bound by the Hindoo law of parcenership.

Now, Matthew Abraham acquired the nucleus of his property himself. No law imposed any fetter upon him as to his mode of dealing with it. It is not even shown, as a fact, how his ancestors after their conversion dealt with such property, as to the use and enjoyment of it. It is plain that no rule as to such use and enjoyment, which the ancestors may voluntarily have imposed on themselves, could be of compulsory obligation on a descendant of theirs acquiring his own wealth. If a Hindoo in an undivided family may keep his own sole acquisitions separate, as he undoubtedly may, a fortiori a Christian may do the same. Customs and usages as to dealing with property, unless their continuance be enjoined by law, as they are adopted voluntarily, so they may be changed, or lost by desuetude. It was well observed by Mr. Melvill, that custom implies continuance. If a family of converts retain the customs in part of their unconverted predecessors, is that election of theirs invariable and inflexible? Can neither they nor their descendants change things in their very nature variable, as dependent on the changeful inclinations, feelings, and obligations of successive generations of men? If the spirit of an adopted religion improves those who become converts to it, and they reject, from conscience, customs to which their first converted ancestors adhered, must the abandoned usages be treated by a sort of fiction juris as still the enduring customs of the family? If it be not so as to things which belong to the jurisdiction of conscience, is it so as to things of convenience or [248] interest? Surely, in things indifferent in themselves the Tribunals which have a discretion and have no positive lex fori imposed on them should rather proceed on what actually exists than on what has existed, and in forming their own presumptions have regard rather to a man's own way of life than to that of his predecessors. Though race and blood are independent of volition, usage is not.

The law has not, so far as their Lordships can see, prohibited a Christian convert from changing his class. The inconvenience resulting from a change of succession consequent on a change of class is no greater than that which often results from a change of domicile. The argumentum ab inconvenienti cannot, therefore, be used against the legality of such a change. If such change takes place in fact, why should it be regarded as non-existing in law? Their Lordships are of opinion, that it was competent to Matthew Abraham, though himself both by origin and actually in his youth a "Native Christian," following the Hindoo laws and customs on matters relating to property, to change his class of Christian, and become of the Christian class to which his wife belonged. This was no light and inconsiderate step, taken up on a whim, and to be as lightly laid aside. We find in the evidence that there was on one side an exhibition of preliminary caution. The change was deliberate, it was publicly acted upon, and endured through his life for twenty years or more. His family was managed and lived in all respects like an East Indian family. In such a family the undivided family union in the sense before-mentioned is unknown. How, then, can it be imposed on that family of which Matthew Abraham formed the head as [249] father? Not by consent, for there was none; not by force of obligatory law, for there was none; not by adoption, for they had not adopted any Hindoo customs, but, on the contrary, had rejected them all. It could only be imposed, as it seems to their Lordships, by passing over the actual family springing from the marriage, and by absorbing all its members in the original family of which the two brothers were members; by passing over all actual usages, customs, and ways of living; and by supposing, contrary to fact, the prevalence of Hindoo customs, which had been deliberately abandoned. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion, that the undivided family on which the Defendant relies in his answer did not exist in any sense which is material to or assists the decision of the case.

There being then, in their Lordships' opinion, no such undivided family, and the case not being, in their judgment, governed by the Hindoo law, it is unnecessary to discuss the opinion given by the Pundits upon the operation of that law, or to enter into the question, so much discussed at the Bar, whether the late Matthew Abraham's acquisitions ought, or ought not, according to that law, to have been deemed to be his separate estate. It is sufficient, with reference to the opinion of the Pundits, to say, that the case stated for their opinion proceeds upon an assumption which, in their Lordships' judgment, was not warranted by the facts. Their Lordships, however, think it right to add, for the guidance of the Courts in India in future cases, that whenever the opinion of Pundits is required, and there are any special circumstances which may bear upon the question to be submitted for their opinion, those [250] special circumstances ought to be set forth in the case submitted to them. Their Lordships make this observation with reference to the broad and general statements contained in the case which, in this instance, was laid before the Pundits: "that the brothers lived together, and that the eldest acquired some property," unaccompanied as those statements were by any specification of the mode in which, and the circumstances under which, the brothers so lived, and the property was so acquired—circumstances which, to say the least, were important to be considered in forming an opinion upon the point submitted for consideration.

Having thus considered the case so far as respects the law to be applied in determining it, their Lordships will now proceed to consider how the case stands upon the evidence with reference to the point whether the Defendant was entitled to share in the property in question by agreement, or consent amounting to agreement, between him and the late Matthew Abraham; a point which, though not distinctly pleaded on the part of the Respondent, must, as their Lordships think, upon a fair view of all the pleadings in the case, be considered to be open.

In considering the weight of the evidence upon this point, the first thing to be determined is, upon whom does the burthen of proof rest? Their Lordships are of opinion, that it lies on the Defendant. It must be so, even under the Hindoo law, as the nucleus of acquired property was in this case separate, unaided acquisition, unaided either by funds or labour of the claimant. Their Lordships do not propose to enter into a minute examination and consideration in detail of every part of the evidence relied upon, nor [251] of every observation made and argument urged upon it by either side: that course would extend their observations to an unnecessary and unprofitable length. They propose to deal with the presumptions insisted on, on either side, as arising from the conduct of the parties, and to contrast and weigh those presumptions. The case was rightly stated by Mr. Mackeson to be, not a one-sided one; on the contrary, it presents evidence embarrassing to deal with, both in the conflict of positive testimony and of opposing presumptions. For the Appellants, the presumptions from conduct principally relied on are those which arise from what appears upon the evidence as to the following matters: first, the habits of life of the families both of Matthew Abraham and the Respondent, as inconsistent with the nature of the existence of an undivided Hindoo family, Hindoos by origin, but not Hindoos by religion. Secondly, the establishment by Matthew Abraham of a business under his sole name; his introduction into it of his brother and Richardson as partners with himself; his formal public notification of that fact to the world by a notice stating that he had introduced them into his firm; the payment of rent for the shop, both during the continuance of that firm and by the succeeding firm, which then consisted of himself and his brother only; and the consistency of that payment with the joint property in the building and premises. Thirdly, the signatures on several occasions of Francis Abraham as agent; his dissatisfaction with the business at Kurnoul; and his language regarding it as inconsistent with a joint ownership and corresponding voice. Fourthly, after the death of Matthew Abraham, the inconsistency of the Defendant's whole con-[252]-duct for a time, with any notion in his mind that he had a joint legal interest in the whole property of the family. Much stress was laid on the inconsistency of the statements in the Respondent's letter to Charles Henry Abraham, of the 19th of August, 1842, in which, giving an account of all the property of Matthew Abraham, he states that, it was in the bracketed item or items alone he had a half share, the item or items so bracketed not including the distillery, which is afterwards mentioned as a part of the property of Matthew Abraham; on the Respondent's fears expressed in the same letter of being left to seek his fortune; on his expression that he had hoped that his brother would have provided for him; and on the request to Charles Henry Abraham, to intercede with his mother to carry out the presumed intentions of his father. Fifthly, the treatment by the Defendant of Mrs. Charlotte Abraham, as the head of the family; the inconsistency of that treatment with her condition of a widow in a family adopting or retaining Hindoo customs and law in part and by choice; the administration taken out in her name; and his taking a power of attorney from her.

These were treated as inconsistent with the Respondent's position in the family on his hypothesis.

On the other side, the nature of the original family to which the Defendant and his brother belonged; the customs of the Christian class within which that family was included; and the ordinary enjoyment of their property by such families according to the customs of their Hindoo progenitors, were relied on to show that the family dealt with the property as an undivided one.

The dealings of the Defendant in the management [253] of his brother's affairs; the absence of any satisfactory proof that he had received any salary or emolument as agent or clerk; the consistency of all that he did with the ordinary course of dealing in an undivided Hindoo family; the presumed continuance of a state proved to have existed, and not in terms proved to have been interrupted; the execution of the bonds and conveyances referred to in the Respondent's case; and the inconsistency of those instruments with the ordinary dealing of a mere clerk or agent,—were pressed with much force on the attention of their Lordships. The statement of ownership in Francis Abraham contained in his mortgage deed, and the admissions derived from the acts of the third Plaintiff, Daniel Vincent Abraham, in the suits and proceedings relating to the Kurnoul affairs, also referred to in the case of the Respondents, were urged as additional grounds in support of the case of the Defendant, which it was argued the language of a large portion of the correspondence strengthened.

Their Lordships will first consider the evidence on these points, and the presumptions to be drawn from it with reference to the Hindoo law. In this point of view much, if not the whole, of what is urged on the part of the Respondent as to the nature of the original family to which he and Matthew Abraham belonged, and as to the dealings of such families, is sufficiently answered by what has been already said as to the right of Matthew Abraham to change, and as to the fact of his having changed, the class of Christians to which he was attached. As to the absence of proof that the Respondent received any salary or emolument as agent or clerk, independently of the absence and destruction of books and accounts, which cannot [254] but weigh heavily against the Respondent, it is to be observed that there is an equal absence of proof that the Respondent ever received any share of profits as parcener.

The arguments from the dealings of the brothers, so forcibly urged by Sir Hugh Cairns, are certainly as forcible to prove an ordinary partnership as to prove that kind of parcenary which obtains under the Hindoo law. These brothers, when they established a partnership in the shop, established and maintained it on the ordinary commercial basis, in shares, as well when they were the only partners as when Richardson was associated with them. On what ground, then, should a Court conclude, if it thought that a conjoint interest existed in the Abkarry contracts, that it was founded on Hindoo family union, rather than on the model of the shop business? This presumption could only be made by assuming the Hindoo law to govern the case.

As to the bonds and conveyances, it is to be observed, that these instruments are wholly unexplained by the evidence, and that the fact of the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, having been made a party to some or one of them, renders it very difficult to deduce from any of them the inference for which the Respondent has contended; but, what is, perhaps, of still greater importance is this, that there is no proof of the application of any of the moneys raised by these instruments to any other purposes than the purposes of the shop, and that the Respondent by his answer refers to these moneys having been raised for the purposes of the shop business. With respect to the correspondence, their Lordships feel no doubt as to the conclusion to be drawn from it. After care-[255]-fully perusing it, they have been unable to find anything at variance with the statement contained in the letter of the 19th of August, 1842, to which they have above referred. They find much, both in the correspondence and in the other documents, in proof in the cause which tends to confirm what is stated in that letter.

The Respondent, by that letter insists on no right. He merely suggests a similar remuneration to that which he had hoped to receive by way of testamentary gift from his deceased brother. Their Lordships are totally unable to reconcile this letter with the existence of the right since insisted on. After giving due weight to the arguments on both sides on its construction and meaning, they are unable to adopt that reading of it on which the Counsel for the Respondent have insisted. That construction is not, in their opinion, consistent with either the spirit of the composition, viewed as a whole, or with its language.

Then as to the admission contended to have been made by the Appellant, Daniel Vincent Abraham. Neither the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, nor the late Plaintiff, Charles Henry Abraham, is in any way proved to have been privy to, or cognizant of, this admission: the late Plaintiff, Charles Henry Abraham, was absent in England at the time, and he never in any way adopted it. It is, no doubt, evidence against all the Plaintiffs, but, in their Lordships' opinion, undue weight has been ascribed to it in the judgment of the Sudder Court. Whence had this young man of nineteen his knowledge that the family was undivided? It is a mixed and complex proposition of fact and law; and it supposes a status concerning which the Respondent himself seems to have been [256] long uncertain. Had he so understood his position at the time when he wrote the letter of the 19th of August, 1812; had he then considered that he was a half sharer in the whole property, he could scarcely have expressed himself as he did in that letter. Yet to this admission of a youth, ignorant alike of law and business, a binding effect is given against all the Plaintiffs on the record.

Their Lordships are not prepared to follow the Sudder Court in the weight which they have given to this admission. Looking at the whole case, with reference to the Hindoo law, they are of opinion, that the claim of the Respondent to a share of the property in dispute by virtue of that law cannot be supported, and they are not less satisfied that if the case be looked at with reference to the English law—a point of view, however, which, so far as the Respondent is concerned, seems to them to be excluded by the pleadings in the cause—the evidence on the part of the Respondent is insufficient, when weighed against the evidence on the other side, to establish a partnership according to that law. Their Lordships, therefore, have come to the conclusion, that the decree of the Sudder Court cannot be maintained; but, on the other hand, they are not prepared to go to the full length to which the Judge of the Civil Court of Bellary has gone by his decree. The Respondent no doubt stood in a fiduciary position; though he may have been unconscious of the duty arising from his acts, he had, in effect, attorned to the Appellant, Charlotte Abraham, by accepting a power of attorney from her. That character, and the acquisitions under it, should have been renounced before the Respondent asserted an interest adverse to that of his constituent; such [257] an assertion in one acting as agent is not prohibited on grounds of policy alone. It is in itself an unconscientious breach of duty to a principal. The Letters of administration were, indeed, taken out for a special object only; they were not strictly necessary, a certificate would have sufficed. But they were not of a limited character. There were assets in the local jurisdiction, and all parties concerned in interest were either consenting to, or subsequently ratified, the authority delegated by the letters of administration. The administration related back to the death of Matthew Abraham; the possession of the whole property, therefore, from the time of his death must be ascribed to the first Plaintiff, as the Defendant acting under his power could not claim adversely.

Their Lordships are by no means disposed to infringe upon the wise and salutary rules which have been laid down as to the conduct of persons standing in confidential positions; but, on the other hand, they entirely agree with the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in their estimate of the value of the Respondent's services. The property in the Abkarry contract may, by reason of its special character, be said to have been in a great degree preserved to the family by him. The evidence shows that none of the Plaintiffs were competent to the management of the concern. In all probability, but for the Respondent, the contract would have been lost to the family. It is represented to have been the chief source of their income. It differs materially from an ordinary trading partnership. The selection of the contractor is influenced by considerations which might probably have caused the Respondent to be named as the successor to his brother in the contract. The relationship of the [258] Respondent to the family, the devotion of his time and labour to the augmentation of its wealth, the creation, as it were, of the profits of the Abkarry business, establish a great difference between this and the case of any ordinary agency.

In ordinary cases and under ordinary circumstances these services on the part of the Respondent would, no doubt, be sufficiently compensated by the provision in that behalf contained in the decree of the Civil Court, but in this case their Lordships find it proved by the Plaintiff's first witness, that the Respondent on Matthew Abraham's death declared to him that he had worked like a slave in the Abkarry business, and was merely paid for his labour; but that for the future he would not do so unless he received an equal share with the others, meaning his brother's widow and two sons; and the witness says that he soon afterwards mentioned this conversation to the widow. If the widow dissented from this view, she ought, as their Lordships think, to have communicated such dissent to the Respondent, but she never did so. After her having so long availed herself of the Respondent's services, which she knew to be rendered on the faith of his receiving one-half the profits as a remuneration for those services, she and the other parties interested in the estate could not, in their Lordships' opinion, be justly entitled to dispute the right of the Respondent to be remunerated to that extent. Their Lordships, therefore, think, that it ought to have been declared by the decree that the Respondent was entitled to an equal share of the profits of the Abkarry contract accrued after the death of Matthew Abraham as a remuneration for his services in the execution of that contract. Their Lordships [259] think also that, having regard to the evidence to which they have last alluded, and to the Respondent having been permitted for so many years to carry on the Abkarry contracts without any dissent having been expressed to the terms stipulated for by him, the decree of the Civil Court has not dealt properly with the question of costs. They are of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, the costs, up to the hearing, ought not to have been given against the Respondent by the decree, but ought to have been reserved until the accounts were taken. The benefit which may result to the estate may form a material ingredient in considering what ought ultimately to be done as to the costs, and the mode in which the Respondent may account under the decree may also influence that question. The decree of the Civil Court having thus, in their Lordships' opinion, gone too far, their Lordships think that there should be no costs of the appeal to the Sudder Court or of this appeal.

Their Lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend Her Majesty to reverse the decree of the Sudder Court, and to restore the decree of the Civil Court of Bellary, modified as above pointed out (see Varden Seth Sam v. Luckpathy Royjee Lallah, post [9 Moo. Ind. App.], 303).

[260] JUGGOMOHUN GHOSE,—Appellant; KAISREECHUND.—Respondent *
[June 30, July 1, 1862].

On Appeal from the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

Neither by the English nor the Hindoo law, unless there be mercantile usage, can interest be imported into a contract, which contains no stipulation to that effect.

In an action on contract, known as Tajee mundee Chitties, opium wager contracts (before the passing of the Act, No. XXI., of 1848, which prohibited such gambling contracts), the Plaintiff claimed interest on the sum recovered. Held, that as there was no stipulation as to interest in the contract, or satisfactory evidence of mercantile usage at Calcutta to import interest into the contract, the interest claimed could not be allowed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, founded on a verdict of that Court, sitting as a jury, on a new trial had in pursuance of a remit by the Judicial Committee, in an action on promises brought by the Appellant against the Respondent and one Manickchund, since deceased.

The only question on the new trial and urged in this appeal, was whether upon the evidence the Appellant had established any usage of trade at Calcutta so as to entitle him to interest on the principal sum of Rs. 7150. 6a. 3p., awarded to him on the new trial. The nature and circumstances of the case are fully set forth in the report of the former appeal (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 263).

In pursuance of the Order in Council made by Her [261] Majesty on the hearing of the previous appeal, the Appellant set the cause down for a new trial on the former pleadings, and the action was tried on the 1st and 4th of June, 1860, before the Chief Justice, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Mordaunt Wells, in the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

The Appellant, upon the question of mercantile or trade usage, examined eight witnesses, and put in two depositions of witnesses, taken in another action. The effect of their evidence was to show that no such general usage as that insisted on by the Appellant existed; that in cases in which interest was paid between the parties to such opium chitties, it was not by force of the original contract, or the usage of the trade, but under a distinct and substantive agreement, made sometimes in writing and sometimes verbally, between the original parties after the chitties became due and a failure to pay accordingly on the part of the then debtors; and that such new agreement gave further time for the payment of the principal, varying from four or five to twenty days, and providing for the payment of interest at rates varying according to the arrangement of the parties in each separate transaction. The Respondent examined three witnesses, and put in also the deposition of another witness taken in the other action. These witnesses deposed, that there was no known usage of trade, such as that which had been contended for by the Appellant, and agreed with the witnesses of the Appellant, so far as they declared that wherever interest was paid, it was not under the Tazee Munde Chittees, but under a subsequent fresh arrangement made by the parties in respect to the payment of such interest.

Upon this evidence a verdict was given by the [262] Supreme Court for the Appellant, for the principal sum of Rs. 7150. 6a. 3p. only, as on the former trial, without interest.

The Chief Justice, on delivering the verdict, said,—“It appears to the Court that the Plaintiff is not entitled to interest on the principal sum admitted in this case to be due in respect of differences on the opium sales in question; and if the case had not come down to us from the Privy Council for a new trial on this point, we should have been disposed to stop the case, concurring with the Counsel for the Defendant, that the Plaintiff has given no sufficient evidence in support of his claim to interest; but in consequence of Sir John Coleridge's remark in the judgment of the Privy Council (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 282), to the effect that the evidence on the former trial required explanation, we thought it better that the case should proceed, and that the evidence which was forthcoming on the Defendant's part should be gone into, in order that if our decision should again go to the Privy Council, the case might be free from the former objections. Several questions have been raised in argument. The learned Advocate-General in his reply contended that, as this was a case between Hindoos, we were bound to decide this question of interest according to the rules of Hindoo law, without reference to local usage, and that by that law interest was given in many cases, such as on money or goods lent, in which it was not generally recoverable by the law of England. It was not shown that according to Hindoo law interest would be payable under such a contract as this, in which there was no stipulation for interest, and I am not sure that in cases where interest is payable, [263] according to the Hindoo law, it can be recovered merely as damages. If it is recoverable as due by contract, the declaration should be framed accordingly, and the interest should not be claimed merely as damages. I understand that by the Hindoo law, when interest is payable, it is so expressed in the contract, and is due as a right, and that there is no such distinction as in our law of interest being given as damages for breach of contract. Something was said by the Advocate General as a reason for not claiming interest in terms, with reference to this contract being considered as an immoral one; but in that case not only interest but the principal also would be irrecoverable, and we cannot say that this contract is so far illegal as to avoid the claim to interest without avoiding also the right to the principal. The cases, however, already decided in the Privy Council between Hindoos, affirm that these contracts are not void either by English or Hindoo law (see Doolubdass Pettamberdass v. Ramlohl Thakoorseydass, 5 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 109, and cases there cited); and, therefore, if the principal sum would be legally recoverable, it would follow that the interest, if due, might also be recovered. There is, however, no authority cited to satisfy the Court that such a contract bears interest, and there is nothing on the face of the plaint in this action claiming interest or charging the Defendant with a liability to pay it. The plaint, in substance, only states that the contract was not performed and thereby the Plaintiff sustained damage. Is the Court then bound to allow interest, or has it the option here, as in other cases, of giving or withholding it? [264] According to the English law, unless there is some usage of trade, such a demand would not bear interest, and there is no case which shows that according to Hindoo law a different rule applies. We are, therefore, driven to ascertain whether such a usage of trade exists, as that it must be supposed that the parties contracted with reference to it. We are not at all sure that, if such usage was made out, the Court would not be bound to give interest, not as damages, but as a substantial part of what was due by the contract itself. In Calton v. Bragg (15 East, 223), the action was for a balance consisting solely of interest, the principal having been paid. It was there decided, that interest was not allowable by law upon money lent generally without a contract expressed, or to be implied from the usage of trade, or other special circumstances. But there, if the action could have been supported, it would have been for interest as part of the debt, and not as damages. In an action on a Bill of Exchange, where interest is not expressed on the face of the Bill, interest is recoverable merely as damages, but if the Bill contains a stipulation for interest it becomes a part of the debt. It has been laid down that an invariable custom of trade affecting a contract is to be presumed as incorporated into the contract as in view of the contracting parties at the time. If, therefore, this contract had stated that the Defendants would pay the opium differences within three days after the sales, and in case of default would pay interest, the stipulation for interest would be such an integral part of the contract as that the Court would be bound to give it as part of the debt. But it is not so sought to be recovered, but as damages [265] merely. Suppose, instead of an express, there were an implied contract to pay interest from the course of dealing between certain parties, as in the case of tradesmen's bills in this city, which often specify in the heading that interest will be charged at a certain rate if the bill is not paid within a given time; if parties go on dealing with notice of these terms, a jury might infer that the customer agreed to the stipulation to pay interest if he delayed to pay the debt. In such case the interest would be recoverable as due by contract, and not merely as damages for the nonpayment of the demand. Now, the general usage of trade, where established, operates in the same manner as a particular course of dealing between individuals. If, then, there be a well-known usage of trade in reference to particular contracts, a person dealing in the trade, contracts on the terms of the usage; if interest is here recoverable on the difference of the opium sales by virtue of general usage, it is due by contract and not simply as damages. But, whether this is so or not, is comparatively immaterial, for the Court is of opinion, that no such usage of trade has been proved by the evidence. In only one instance, the case of one Neem Mullick, it was said that on a contract similar to the present, interest was paid. In all other instances we find that the payment was made by the Shroffs on behalf of the parties at the time when it became due. There was one witness, Manickjee Rustomjee, who said that he paid interest on such contracts. But the way in which he paid interest was this, it was not on particular Chittees, but he had got a Shroff to issue these Chittees for him; the Shroff paid the losses at [266] due date, and he advised Manickjee of the payments, and debited him with the payments and interest in a general account current between the parties. This, therefore, was a payment of interest not under the opium Chittees, but upon money advanced by the Shroff to pay the opium Chittees, and interest was charged in the usual course of dealing between the parties. In all the other cases of Chittees not being paid when falling due, all the witnesses agree, that the holder would call on the party liable, and if he were unable to pay, there would be a fresh arrangement (sometimes in writing, at other times verbal) giving a certain number of days, varying from four or five to twenty, for payment with interest at various rates. In such cases interest became chargeable by virtue of the new and special arrangement; and this is a strong argument against its being considered by the parties to be due as part of the original contract; for if interest were due according to the term of the original contract, there would be no necessity for a new agreement stipulating for interest. In all these instances, the arrangement was for a short period, of some twenty days at the utmost; and there is no case like the present when the claimant has lain by for ten years, and then claimed interest. It was said by some of the witnesses that the original contracts did not provide for interest in case of default in payment, because the contractors would be considered dishonourable if they contemplated such a contingency as failure to pay; and in fact, as suggested by Mr. Justice Wells, these new contracts for enlarging the time of payment appear to have been made for the purpose of preventing the exposure of the defaulters [267] in the market, and the consequent injury to their credit. It appears to the Court, therefore, that there has been no usage of trade established by the evidence from which they can infer that, when the parties dealt it was an implied term of their contract, that in case of default in payment, interest would be chargeable without any further agreement; and there will, therefore, be a verdict for the Plaintiff for the principal sum which is admitted to be due, viz., Rs. 7150. 6a. 3p., but without interest."

The present appeal was brought from this verdict.

Sir Fitz-Roy Kelly, Q.C., and Mr. W. Paterson, for the Appellant.—This action was brought by the Appellant upon certain contracts, known in India as "Tajee Mundee Chittees," respecting the average price of opium at the first public sale by the East India Company for the year 1846, and the Appellant sought to recover the difference between such average price and the prices mentioned in the Chittees. Upon the former appeal here, Juggomohun Ghose v. Manickchand (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 263-82) a new trial was ordered on the ground that the evidence of mercantile usage, given by the Appellant at the trial, as to allowance of interest upon these Chittees, required to be answered. On the new trial there was ample evidence of usage to pay interest when default was made in paying the principal on Tajee Mundee Chittees, and the Respondent failed to answer it by any satisfactory evidence to the contrary. The verdict of the Supreme Court, setting as a jury, in not giving interest, as damages, we insist was against the weight of the evidence, and cannot be sustained. Again, it is most [268] important to bear in mind that the finding of the Supreme Court at Calcutta is in direct conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court at Bombay and of this Tribunal. In the case of Ramlal Thakur-sidas v. Dulabdas Pitamber (Perry's Oriental Cases, p. 198) it was held, that such wagers by the mercantile usage at Bombay carried interest, and Lord Wensleydale, in pronouncing the opinion of their Lordships in the same case upon appeal, Doolubdass Pitamberdass v. Ramlall Thakoorseydass (5 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 136), says, "As to interest, we think the Court below were warranted in giving it, for it appears that interest was accustomed to be paid on such pecuniary transactions." In the cases of Rughoonanth Sahoo Chotayloll v. Manickchand (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 251) and Rughoonauth Sahoo Chotayloll v. Uggerechund (ib. 262) from Calcutta, interest was not claimed, and the question, therefore, did not arise. Here the Supreme Court at Calcutta, when applied to, refused to allow interest as damages. Now, we submit, that would not be creditable to the administration of justice in India to have conflicting judgments upon the same transaction, although they arose in different parts of the same country, and we contend, that the judgments in the Bombay cases in allowing interest were right. The Chief Justice too was wrong in stating that interest should be claimed by the declaration. It is not necessary expressly to plead such a demand. In the case of Bills of Exchange and Promissory notes, interest is recovered as damages.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Respondent.—This Court, when the case was formerly before it, did not decide that interest could be claimed by the [269] law of India as now insisted by the Appellant, or determine that the mercantile usage upon this point at Calcutta was the same as that at Bombay. All this Court did on that occasion, was to remit the case to the Court below, to enable the Appellant to establish his claim to interest by showing that in Calcutta mercantile usage to allow interest in transactions of this nature existed. Interest is now claimed first, as part of the lex fori, and, secondly, as a custom of trade so well understood as to be within the intention of the parties and impliedly, therefore, incorporated into the contract. But the requisites to support such a claim are, that it be invariable, clearly defined, and the terms fixed. Now, was such a custom established by evidence in this case? Because it must be borne in mind that the onus of proving the usage of trade, relied on by the Appellant as entitling him to interest, lay on him, and we submit, that he failed to prove such usage. The idea of the claim for interest upon these Chittees never occurred to the Appellant until the decision in Doolubdass Pettamberdass v. Ramlooll Thackoorseydass [6 Moo. Ind. App. 251] was pronounced by this Tribunal. The declaration did not contain any count for interest. The argument of the Appellant, that if the judgment of the Court below stands, there will be a conflict of decisions between the Courts at Bombay and Calcutta, and that it is desirable to have uniformity of decisions, is fallacious. In the first place, these wager contracts have been declared illegal by the Act of the Indian Legislature, No. XXI. of 1848, and, secondly, the case really does not involve a point of law to be decided as the rule in future cases. It is simply a question of fact of mercantile usage and trade, and amounts to no more [270] than this: Has the Appellant, by his evidence given in this action proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the custom contended for by the Appellant exists? Our contention is, that he has failed to do so. There is nothing extraordinary that the course of trade and usage as to allowance of interest at Bombay should differ from that at Calcutta. It occurs in this country. Take for example, the custom of Bankers in Scotland and of Bankers in England.

Their Lordships stopped the Respondent's Counsel, and called upon Sir Fitz-Roy Kelly, who was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of which their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—Their Lordships are of opinion, that the judgment of the Court below was perfectly correct and ought to be affirmed.

When this case was before their Lordships on the former appeal, they thought the right to interest must depend on this point, whether there was, or was not, a mercantile usage sufficiently clear to enable the Court to import that condition into a contract which had been made between the parties. Their Lordships were of opinion, that on the former trial that fact had not been sufficiently investigated. There was evidence which required an answer, and that answer had not been given. Their Lordships, therefore, thought it necessary to send it back to India to a second trial.

Evidence upon the point of mercantile usage at Calcutta to allow interest on these Chittees has now been obtained, and their Lordships are clearly of [271] opinion, that the Court below was quite right in holding that it does not sufficiently establish the usage, upon which alone the right to interest must depend.

In the Bombay case [Doolubdass Pettamberdass v. Ramlooll Thackoorseydass, 5 Moo. Ind. App. 109], what their Lordships decided was this; that as there was evidence there given which the Court below thought was sufficient to establish the custom, and as their Lordships were not prepared to dissent from that conclusion, they held that the Court below was warranted in giving interest; and it might well be that such a custom prevails in Bombay and does not prevail in Calcutta.

This case was sent back for the express purpose of trying whether in Calcutta such a custom or usage did prevail there. If it did prevail, there should have been evidence of an overwhelming character to establish it. Such evidence has not been given; and their Lordships are clearly of opinion, that the Court below could come to no other conclusion than that it did not prevail.

The judgment, therefore, was perfectly right, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

[272] MAHARAJAH MAHASHUR SINGH BAHADOOR,—Appellant; BABOO HURRUCK NARAIN SINGH and Others.—Respondents * [July 1, 1862].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adaulut at Calcutta.

Sale for arrears of Government revenue set aside.

The sale advertisement being irregular, first, in not being published in conformity with sec. 6, of Act No. I. of 1845; and secondly, the Mohals not being sold in their consecutive numbers, in the Towjee, or Register of the Collector of the District, as provided by section 14, of that Act.

Such an irregularity is not cured by Act No. IX. of 1854, which relates only to technical errors of procedure in the Lower Court, which are not productive of injury to either parties.

In this appeal the suit was instituted to set aside a sale of an ancestral estate sold under the provisions of Act, No. I. of 1845, for arrears of Government revenue, and to obtain possession, with mesne profits and interest.

The estate, called Talooka Sarungpore, was put up to public auction, and sold by the Government Collector under Act, No. I. of 1845, by reason of the default of the Respondents in not paying the arrears of Government revenue due thereon. At such sale the late Maharajah Roodur Singh, the father of the Appellant, became the purchaser for the price of Rs. 1,02,100; and he was put into possession by the Government officers. [273] He remained in possession up to the time of his decease, when the Appellant, as heir-at-law, succeeded to the same. The chief ground upon which the sale was sought to be set aside was certain alleged informalities and irregularities in the conduct of the sale charged against the Government Collector with reference to the provisions of the above Act.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The Talooka Sarungpore, a permanently settled estate, was the ancestral property of the Respondents; and the kists or instalments of Government revenue payable by them thereon, for the months of Cheyt and Bysack 1255, Fuslee era, corresponding with the year 1848 A.D., were allowed to fall into arrear, and amounted to the sum of Rs. 1,573. 11a. 6p. The instalment payable for the month of Cheyt became due on the first of the next following month, and the instalment payable for Bysack became due on the first of the next month, viz., Jeyt, and not having been then paid, were at these respective dates treated as being in arrear, according to the provisions of section 2, Act, No. I. of 1845. In pursuance of the requirements of section 3 of that Act, a general notification, fixing the latest date for the liquidation of arrears, was published in the Courts of the District and every Sudder and Mofussil office, and under the same notification the latest date for the liquidation of the arrears was the 7th of June, 1848, but at that date the arrears were not paid.

It is provided by section 3 of the Act, No. I. of 1845, that on such default the estate in arrears shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder. On the 9th June, 1848, a proceeding was held by the Government Collector, in which it was declared and [274] recorded that the estate was liable to be sold. In accordance with that proceeding, and in pursuance of the provisions of section 6 of the above Act, a notification in the native language was issued by the Collector on the same date, intimating that the 5th of July following was the day fixed for the sale of the estate. Also, in pursuance of section 7 of the same Act, a proclamation was issued by the Collector on the same day, directed to the Ryots and under-tenants upon the estate, forbidding them to pay rent to the defaulting proprietors from the day after that fixed as the last day for liquidating the said arrears as aforesaid. Two advertisements in the English language were also published, one in the Agra Government Gazette, and another in the Bengal Government Gazette, notifying that the Talook, with others also mentioned, would be sold on the 5th of July, 1848, for the recovery of balances of Government revenue not paid up on the 7th of June, 1848.

Petitions were presented by the defaulters praying that the Collector would exempt, in his discretion, under section 11 of that Act, the estate from sale by receiving the balance due, but the Collector held that he had no power to accede to the application.

On the 5th of July, the day notified, the estate was put up to public auction, and sold by the Collector to the late Maharajah Roodur Singh, as the highest bidder, for the sum of Rs. 1,02,100.

The defaulters presented a petition to the revenue Commissioner against the sale, under section 17 of the Act, No. I. of 1845, containing their grounds of appeal in which they set forth certain alleged irregularities or informalities in the notification of the sale, and in the conduct of the sale on the part of the Collector [275] and prayed an annulment of the sale. These alleged irregularities were stated to be, first, that as by section 14 of the Act, No. I. of 1845, it was clearly laid down that a day was to be fixed for the sale (agreeably to the provisions of section 6 of that Act), it was necessary to hold the sale on that day; and secondly, that the sale was to be consecutive, according to the order of the number; namely, that the Mehal which bore the smallest number on the Towjee, or register of the Collector, was to be first brought to sale; that in like manner, it was necessary to hold the sale of the remaining Mehals in the same succession and order; and that it was not in the power of the Collector, or any other of the officers, to bring any Mehal to sale by a breach of number. That from a perusal of the advertisement contained in the Gazette, it was apparent that Mouzah Bishenpoor Bulabludder, the number of which on the register Towjee is No. 696, was inserted in the first number; Mouzah Luchmeepoor, the register Towjee number of which is No. 652, was inserted in the second number; Talooka Sarungpoor, the number of which is No. 3047, was inserted as the third number; and Mouzah Mutrapoor, the register number of which is 3482, was inserted as the fourth number in the proclamation, and that the sale was so accordingly held; whereas, if the first number had been entered as the second number, and the second number as the first number in the sale proclamation, there would have been no breach of numbers. That by this means, the conclusion of the sale, contrary to section 14 of that Act, was clearly established. That a great informality in the sale existed—the advertise-[276]-ment prescribed by section 6, of the same Act, fixing the 5th of July, 1848, as the day of sale, and forwarded to the printing-office for the information of the auction-purchasers, agreeably to the authority of the Circular letter of the Sudder Board, No. 11, dated 20th June, 1845, and according to which, being printed, it was transmitted, by means of the Government Gazette, to all the civil and revenue authorities in every Zillah, being manifestly erroneous, as it appeared from the heading of the advertisement to be inserted in this form:—"First, that in accordance with section 6, Act I. of 1845, the Mouzahs, mentioned below, would assuredly be sold in the office of the Collector of the District of Tirhoot, dated 5th July, 1848, corresponding with the 19th Assar, 1255 Fuslee (on Wednesday), for the recovery of the balances due to Government from the Mehals mentioned below, at the request of the Collector of the District of Bhagulpore"; whereas in the Talooka in dispute there was no Government arrear demanded by the Collector of the District of Bhagulpore. Second, in the detail of the advertisement, as in the place of Pergunah Suressa, both in English and Persian, Talooka Sarungpoor, Pergunnah Suressa, was inserted. That Pergunnah Suressa was not in the District of Tirhoot. That this error was contrary to section 6, Act No. I. of 1845, and the Circular letter of the Sudder Board, No. 11, dated 20th June of that year, therefore, in consequence of the occurrence of such irregularities, the sale could not be affirmed, as in the event of the affirmation of the sale, according to the notification, the purchasers would be entitled to the possession of the Mehal, the arrears of which might be demanded by the Collector of the District of [277] Bhagulpore, and that Mehal be attached to Pergunnah Sarum, and not, according to law, of Talooka Surungpoor. Pergunnah Suressa.

The Commissioner, after referring the matter to the Collector, refused the prayer of the petition, and on the 10th of August, 1848, affirmed the sale. The Sudder Board of Revenue, when applied to, refused to interfere in the matter.

In consequence thereof, several of the defaulters commenced the suit out of which the present appeal arose, by filing their plaint in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Tirhoot, against the Government, the Collector of the District, and the late Maharajah Roodur Singh, the auction purchaser, as principal Defendants, and also against certain other parties, described as precautionary Defendants, in conformity, as alleged, with the provisions of sec. 19, of Act, No. I. of 1845, within the term of one year from the date when the sale became final and conclusive. The plaint, among other things, stated, that the suit was brought to recover possession of, and for the insertion of the Plaintiffs' names in respect to, Talooka Sarungpoor, the annulment of the proceeding of the Commissioner of Revenue, dated 10th of Pergunnah Suressa, by the annulment of the sale held on the 5th of July, 1848, and August of the same year, affirming the sale; as well as to obtain the sum of Rs. 13,735 3a., the principal and interest and the mesne profits from the date of the sale. The plaint then stated the principal facts contained in the Plaintiffs' petitions filed in the Revenue Courts aforesaid, both before and after the sale, and that, as those Authorities would not annul the sale, the Plaintiffs had brought their suit for that purpose, on the [278] grounds of certain irregularities, the principal of which were, that the notifications or advertisements were informal and erroneous according to section 6 of the Act; that the sale was made in opposition to the provisions of sec. 14 of the Act, inasmuch as the Mehal was alleged to have been out of the order prescribed by that section, and not with reference to its number on the Towjee, or Register of the Collector, with reference to the numbers of the other Mehals; and that it was put up for sale, and sold earlier in the sale than another Mehal bearing a lower number on the Towjee of the Collector, and sold at the same sale. The plaint then stated the reason why the parties called precautionary Defendants were made Defendants, namely, that they were the proprietors of certain Mouzahs included in the Talooka, and would not join the Plaintiffs in bringing the suit, alleging them to be colluding with the other Defendants, and prayed that they might be put in possession of their estates, and have their names recorded in the column of proprietors, by the removal of the name of the auction-purchaser, with mesne profits and interest to the day of the recovery of possession.

The answer of the Government, amongst other things, submitted to the Court the irregularity of making both the Government and Collector parties to the suit, and insisted on the validity of the sale, with reference both to the notifications and proclamations in regard to the provisions of the Act, No. I. of 1845, and the Circular Order of the Sudder Board, dated 18th of April, 1843, and the form appended thereto.

The answer of the Appellant, as the son and heir of the late Maharajah Roodur Singh, who had died [279] pending the suit, after stating several irregularities in the suit, apparent on the face of the plaint, and submitting that the suit should be dismissed, met the several statements in the plaint by denying the alleged collusion, and upholding the sale to Maharajah Roodur Singh, as purchaser at the public sale by auction, as regular and valid. The other Defendants also put in answers.

The hearing of the suit took place before the Principal Sudder Ameen (Mr. E. Dacostas), on the 7th of April, 1853, when he gave judgment and decreed in favour of the Defendants, dismissing the suit with costs. After deciding that there was no ground for a non-suit, he proceeded in these terms:—"I now proceed to the merits of the case. It appears that this sale was held under Act, No. I. of 1845, on the 5th of the month of July, 1848, for a balance of Rs. 1573. 11a. 6p., and was confirmed by the Revenue Commissioner on the 10th of the month of August, 1848, by the dismissal of the Plaintiffs' appeal against the sale. The claimants now come into Court, not denying the fact of being in arrear, but seeking to obtain a reversal of the sale, on pleas of which the following is the substance :—First, that under section 11 of the aforesaid Act, the Collector did not exempt their estate from sale, though he did those of several other defaulters, by receiving their rents subsequently to the last date of payment. Second, that their ancestors' good services to the State have not been taken into consideration. Third, that the payment of the arrears was withheld by the Bankers, in collusion with the Maharajah, the Defendant. Fourth, that the price realized at the sale was inadequate. Fifth, that the Commissioner's order confirming the sale is [280] opposed to sections 11 and 18 of the aforesaid Act. Sixth, that the sale was held contrary to the provisions of sections 6 and 14 of that Act, out of its turn—or, in other words, out of the regular order of the number of the Towjee—and without publication of the notice in the 'Gazette.' Now, it is obvious, that all the foregoing pleas, except the last, or sixth one, are absurd and irrelevant, noways affecting the legality of the sale. By section 24, a revenue sale can only be set aside by the Civil Court, upon the ground of its having been made contrary to the provisions of the Act above mentioned. The fact of the Collector not exempting the Plaintiffs' estate from sale under section 11, and of the Commissioner of Revenue not suspending his final orders on their appeal against the sale, and not representing the case to the Sudder Board of Revenue under section 18, are no infractions of the law. Both these sections vest the Revenue authorities with a discretionary power to grant the favour, but it is clear that, in the present instance, they did not feel justified or warranted in granting the indulgence. Indeed, the Collector, in his letter to the Revenue Commissioner under date the 22nd June, 1848, plainly states, that 'no sufficient reason that I can discover exists to enable me, under section 11, Act, No. I. of 1845, to exempt this estate from sale. On the score of indulgence alone can the boon be granted.' And, notwithstanding that the Plaintiffs did prefer an appeal to the Commissioner against the sale, yet that Authority, seeing no reason to annul the sale, rejected their petition. As regards the sixth or last plea urged by the Plaintiffs, I do not find that the provisions of sections 6 and 14 have been in any way infringed. The records of the [281] case clearly show that the notice of sale prescribed by the first-mentioned section has not been duly and regularly issued, but published both in the English and vernacular Government Gazettes, and that the sale has been conducted in strict conformity to the last-mentioned section. Mouzah Luchmepoor, bearing No. 652 of the rent-toll or Register; Talooka Sarungpoor, the validity of which is contested by this suit, No. 3047; and Mouzah Mutrapoor, No. 3482; forming class first Mehals, have been very properly and correctly classed in regular order, and sold accordingly in the rotation of their numbers in the manner advertised in the Calcutta Gazette of the 21st June, 1848, viz., the lower numbers on the Register preceding the higher ones. Consequently, Mouzah Bishenpoor Bullabhudder; Chuckla Gurjoul, Pergunnah Bisarah; bearing No. 696 of the rent-toll on Register, being of a different species, appertaining to class four of the form annexed to the Circular Order of the Sudder Board, dated the 18th of April, 1845. No. 9 of the Agra Gazette, could not, of course, be intermixed with class first, estates, and classed or sold second. To do so would only be to reverse the regular series of the number of each class of Mehals, prescribed, not only by the said form, but by the rules of section 14. The entries made in the advertisements issued under section 6 correspond with those published in the Calcutta Gazette. The discrepancy in the Agra Gazette is satisfactorily explained by the Collector. It is evidently an error of the printer, and arises from the circumstance of his having (to save the space of the separate notice) placed under an erroneous heading, estates, class one below class four Mehal. This, however, affords no [282] ground for invalidating the sale. In the advertisements printed in the Calcutta Gazette, and those sent to the Courts and other places, under section 6, no error exists. In short, there are no grounds to set aside the sale, which has been conducted in strict conformity with the provisions of Act, No. I. of 1845, and is in every respect good and valid"; and it was accordingly ordered, that the plaint be dismissed.

Two appeals were brought from this decree, which were afterwards consolidated. The hearing of the same took place on the 29th of August, 1856, before Messrs. Trevor, Samuels, and Money, the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, when the Court recorded their opinion, that the only pleas to be considered were—

"First, that the sale advertisements in the Agra and Calcutta Gazettes disagreed with each other, and were not published in strict conformity with section 6, Act, No. I. of 1845; and, secondly, that the Mehals were not sold in their order in the Towjee, in consecutive numbers, agreeably to the provisions of section 14 of the Act above cited. The Appellants state that the Mehals were published in the following order in the Agra Gazette:—First, Bishenpoor Bullabhudder, No. 696. Second, Luchmeepeer, Pergunnah Dhurour, No. 652. Third, Sarungpoor, Pergunnah Sarani, No. 3047.' Whereas No. 652, should have been first, and No. 696, second. That the Collector admits the incorrectness of this advertisement, but explains that the Mehals were sold according to the Calcutta Gazette, which was correctly printed and published. That in the Calcutta Gazette they stand thus:—First, Lu hmeepoor, No. 652; second, Sarungpoor, No. 3047; third, Mutrapoor, No. 3482; fourth, Bishenpoor Bullabhudder, No. 696.' Whereas No. 696, which is fourth, should [283] have been advertised and sold before No. 3047, which is second in the notification. The Defendants contend, that the Plaintiffs have misconstrued the intent of section 3, Act, No. I. of 1845, which relates to Mehals permanently settled; and of section 5, which has reference to various Mehals settled for fixed periods; and also of the Board's Circular Order of the 18th of April, 1845, and the form appended to it. The Mehals of various kinds were advertised in the Government Gazette, in conformity with the above form. That the sale of the estate in question was conducted regularly, with due regard to its consecutive number, according to the provisions of the Act; the three first estates being of the same description—that is, Mehals permanently settled and sold for the realisation of arrears of revenue due from themselves, and the fourth estate being sold for arrears on account of other Mehals; and, lastly, that the estate No. 696, was placed fourth in the Agra Gazette through the mistake of the printer, which would not invalidate the sale, inasmuch as section 6 of the Act does not provide that the notifications enjoined by the Act shall be printed with reference to the consecutive numbers of the Mehals in the Gazette; and section 14, which enjoins that sales shall be made with reference to the consecutive numbers of the estates to be sold, duly provides that they shall be sold with reference to their consecutive numbers in the Towjee; and the sale was duly conducted under the provisions of this section." The Court then finally pronounced their decree as follows:—"Upon the first plea we find no difficulty. The alleged disagreement between the Agra and Calcutta Gazettes appears upon the record, and is admitted by [284] the Collector. It is evident, from a comparison of the notification published in the two Gazettes, that the variance complained of existed; but we are of opinion, that this disagreement between them does not in any way vitiate the subsequent sale, and is no ground for us, under the provisions of section 6, or any other section, of the sale Act, to pronounce the sale of the estate to be invalid. It is necessary, under the law, that there should be a sufficient publication of the estates that are to be sold; but the Act nowhere enjoins that the estates shall be sold in the order specified in those notifications. We proceed, then, to consider the second plea, regarding the sale of the estates in their regular order or sequence, according to the consecutive numbers on the Towjee. The order in which sales are to take place, is distinctly laid down in section 14 of the Act—'It is hereby enacted that, on the day of the sale fixed, sales shall proceed in regular order, the estate to be sold bearing the lowest number on the Towjee or registers in use in the Collector's Office of the District being put up first, and so on in regular sequence; and it shall not be lawful for the Collector to put up any estate out of its regular order by number.' We find that the estates notified in the Calcutta Gazette were sold in the order in which they are placed in that notification—Talooka Sarungpoor, the estate in dispute, bearing the number 3047 in the Towjee, was sold before the 2-anna share of Mouzah Bishenpoor, the number of which was 696 on the Towjee. The Pleaders for the Defendants contend, that these estates were sold in their order, according to their respective classes or descriptions, as laid down at the end of section 5 of the Act, and that, therefore, they were sold according to their [285] consecutive number in the Towjee, and in accordance with the provisions of section 14. The defence set up by the Collector in the Lower Court is to the same effect. In interpreting the meaning of the provisions of this section, we must look at the precise words, and construe them in their literal and ordinary sense. It is only where the meaning of the law is doubtful or ambiguous, that we should be justified in putting any qualification whatsoever upon it. But there is no such necessity here. The words are precise, and the meaning is perfectly clear. We cannot admit the reasoning upon this point of the Counsel for the Defendants, nor the interpretation which the Collector, in his defence, appears to have placed upon his own act with reference to the law. We do not find that he anywhere asserts, that the estate placed fourth in the Calcutta Gazette, which bears a lower number on the Towjee, and was sold after the disputed estate, which bears a higher number, is not a settled estate, or is borne on any other Towjee than that of the general rent-roll of the district. We presume that there is but one Towjee or rent-roll in a District for all settled estates in that District; and as we cannot allow that a classification of estates according to the nature of their arrears and a District Towjee are one and the same thing, we must hold that there has been a clear violation in this case of the provisions of section 14 of the sale law, and consequently, that under the plain terms of that section the sale was illegal. It is possible that the form attached to the Board's Circular of the 18th of April, 1845, may have misled the Collector regarding the order in which the sales of these estates were conducted. But with this we have nothing to do; and indeed, the Board's Circular [286] refers solely to the orders of notification, and has no reference to the sale. As to the argument which has been addressed to us by the Respondent's Pleader, to the effect that an error or irregularity which may have taken place in the conduct of the sale cannot now in appeal be noticed, inasmuch as it was an error or defect of a technical nature, and consequently one which was corrected by Act, No. IX. of 1854, we would observe that that law only refers to errors, defects, or irregularities of procedure in Courts of Civil Judicature, not to rules of law or conditions which affect the substantive rights of the parties. In the transfer of property from a defaulter to a purchaser under Act, No. I. of 1845, the intervention of the Collector is by law necessary, and certain rules are therein laid down, all of which are conditions essential to the validity of the sale. The rules laid down in section 14 of the sale law, are prescribed with a view to prevent the officer holding the sale from capriciously putting up an estate out of its order on the rent-roll, and thereby surprising intending purchasers, and inflicting an injury, it may be, on the defaulting proprietor. They are in their nature, no doubt, purely arbitrary; but, notwithstanding their nature, the observance of them is necessary, under the law, to give a purchaser an indefeasible title, and to prevent the defaulter from setting aside the sale on the score of irregularity. Whether these rules have or have not been strictly observed out of Court is the main point of inquiry. When a suit like the present comes before a Court of Justice, any overlooking, or misconception, or disregard of these necessary, and, therefore, material, though arbitrary rules, is a violation of the conditions of the sale, materially affecting the sub-[287]-stantive rights of the parties before the Court, and necessarily vitiates the sale. Act, No. IX. of 1854, only regards technical errors of procedure in the Lower Courts, which are not productive of injury to either party. If the case has been decided below on the merits, without a proceeding being drawn up under section 10 of Ben. Reg. XXIV. of 1814, or with a disregard of an objection to the over-valuation or under-valuation of suit, or non-sufficiency of stamp, such irregularities of procedure in Court, which cannot interfere with the substantive rights of any party, fall within the purview of Act, No. IX. of 1854, and cannot be noticed in appeal. But, with the substantive rights of parties, or with rules of law which affect those rights, Act, No. IX. of 1854, has nothing to do. These remarks are of general application, and we have thought it necessary to record them from a conviction that a very considerable misapprehension prevails as to the scope of Act, No. IX. of 1854. The effect of the irregularity in the conduct of the sale which has been established in this case, is simply to invalidate the sale, and bring back the parties to their status quo before the sale, and subsequent to the default. It does not remedy the Plaintiff's default, and consequently, does not enable us to restore him to the actual beneficial possession, of which he was deprived on the date of the default, by the operation of the sale law. This being so, we have considered whether it may not be argued, with some show of reason, that inasmuch as the Plaintiffs have sued for a reversal of the sale as a means of recovering possession of their estate, and as we are unable to pass any order regarding beneficial possession, the reversal of the sale only can be of no [288] benefit to them, and is not a remedy to which they are of right entitled. Their interests in the property, it may be argued, ceased from the day on which their default occurred; and subsequent to that date they retained no rights, except to the sale proceeds. The regularity or otherwise of the sale, it may be said, is a matter between the Government, as vendor, and the auction purchaser, as vendee, with which the defaulter can have no concern. This argument, however, assumes, that the defaulter is placed in a very different position from that which, in our opinion, he occupies under the sale law. It is true that if a balance exists against an estate after sunset on the latest fixed day of payment, the owner of the estate cannot, by the payment of the balance, of right retain it. It is open, however, to the Revenue authorities, under section 11 of the Act, to receive his balance at any period previous to the sale, and restore to him his full rights. It is unquestionable, therefore, that the defaulter retains a valid subsisting interest: in fact, the right of ownership—in the property, until its actual alienation by a legal sale; and that if an illegal sale has taken place, it is of the greatest importance to him to obtain its reversal, in order that this right or interest may be revived, and he may be replaced in a position to enable him, through the influence of the Revenue authorities, to recover the actual possession of his estate. We observe, however, that in this case the Plaintiffs do not sue for the reversal of the sale solely as a means of recovering possession. On the contrary, in their plaint, they press their prayer for the reversal of the sale, and that for possession of the estate, distinct from each other; and it is obvious, from their pleading, that possession was not the sole [289] object they had in view; for their contention partly is, that, owing to the estate having been sold out of its order, they have obtained a very much smaller price for it than they otherwise would, and as they cannot calculate the amount of damage which they have sustained by this irregularity, their only remedy clearly lies in a re-sale, and to this we consider that they are, under the law, fully entitled, irrespective of their claim to possession. Under the foregoing considerations, it is ordered, that the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen be reversed; that the sale, in consequence of its having been held in opposition to the provisions of Act, No. I. of 1845, be cancelled; that agreeably to section 25 of that Act, the purchase-money be refunded, with interest, to the auction purchaser by Government; that both parties be restored to the position they severally occupied subsequent to the default and previous to the sale, and that the costs of both parties be charged to Government; that the Appellants recover the costs of this Court, agreeably to the account prepared by the accountant, with interest from this day to the day of final realization from Government; and that, in order to obtain the costs of the Zillah Court, they must petition the Zillah Court, whence, in accordance with a Circular Order passed on the 4th of July, 1836, an order will be passed for the same to be paid."

The present appeal was from this decree.

As the Respondents did not appear, the appeal was heard ex parte.

The Solicitor General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellants. The requirements of the law as to public sale by [290] the Government Collector for arrears of revenue have been substantially complied with, due regard being had to sections 5 and 14 of Act, No. I. of 1845. Admitting that there was an informality or irregularity in the sale, it was immaterial, and is cured by Reg. IX. of 1854, as no special injury or damage to the Respondents has been shown to have resulted therefrom. The sale ought not, therefore, to have been set aside by the Court. The Act, No. I. of 1845, nowhere declares in express terms that a sale shall be void, or shall be set aside, if not made in exact accordance with the provisions of section 14 of that Act; which provisions, we submit, are merely directory as regards the Collector and the executive officers of the Government, and do not affect the title of the auction purchaser. The late Maharajah Roodur Singh was a bona fide purchaser at the sale, which became final and conclusive under the express provisions of section 19 of Act, No. I. of 1845; and, therefore, the sale ought not to have been set aside by the Court on the ground of irregularity on the part of the Collector in its conduct. The remedy, if any, of the Plaintiffs, was a personal action for damages against the Collector, by whose act they considered themselves aggrieved.

The Right Hon. Dr. Lushington:—Their Lordships are of opinion, that the judgment of the Sudder Court, now appealed from, is right. They think it important that the regularity of Government sales, under the Act, No. I. of 1845, for arrears of revenue, should be strictly observed.

[291] MUSSUMAUTH ANUNDMOYEE CHOWDHOORAYAN.—Appellant: SHEEB CHUNDER ROY and Others,—Respondents * [July 2, 1862].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

This Court will not apply to pleadings in the Native Courts, the strict rule, that averments in a plaint not traversed in the answer, are to be taken as admitted.

In a suit to establish a deed of Unoomotee Puttur (permission to adopt), which was never registered, and which power to adopt had not been exercised by the deceased's widow for nearly twenty years, the plaint set out the deed and relied upon the adoption. The answer did not traverse the alleged deed and the adoption made in pursuance thereof, but denied generally the title of the Plaintiff. Held, in absence of proof of the execution of the deed of Unoomotee Puttur, that the omission to traverse the allegation of its execution was immaterial, as the Plaintiff was bound to prove his case by evidence, which he had failed to do [9 Moo. Ind. App. 305].

Quære.—If under section 33 of Ben. Reg. X. of 1793, an adoption by a minor and ward of Court of a son, without the consent of the Court of Wards, is wholly void.

This appeal arose out of a suit instituted by Neelkunth Gooptoo, as the next friend of a minor, named Bhairub Chundro. The object of the suit was to establish the minor's rights, as adopted son, to succeed as heir of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree; and also to set aside the adoption of one Gerish Chundro, under an Unoomotee Putter (a deed giving power to adopt), alleged to have been made by Bhoban Chundro [292] Chowdhuree, the surviving son of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree.

The Appellant's case was, that Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, on the 30th of May, 1828, shortly before his death, executed an Unoomotee Puttur and delivered the same to the Appellant, his wife, which deed authorized her in the event of the death of his two natural sons, who were sickly, to adopt a son: that she had exercised the power so given her, by adopting Bhairub Chundro. The genuineness of the deed of Unoomotee Puttur was denied by the Respondent, and the adoption of one Gerish Chundro, by Hurromonee, the widow of Bhoban Chowdhuree, the surviving son of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, relied upon by him.

The principal facts of the case were as follows:—

Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree died on the 23rd Joistee, 1235, leaving only two sons, Juggut Chundro Chowdhuree, and Bhoban Chowdhuree, his joint heirs, in equal undivided moieties, according to Hindoo law, and the Appellant, his sole widow him surviving.

The two sons were both minors at the time of the death of their father. The elder son did not long survive his father. He died on the 3rd of December, 1828, a minor, intestate, and without having been married, leaving the Appellant, his mother, and, as such, his heir according to Hindoo law, entitled to succeed to his one-half undivided share in the whole of the property left by his father. The other brother died on the 19th of December, 1844, a minor, and intestate, without leaving any issue; but leaving Hurromonee, his sole widow, an infant of tender years, and his heir according to Hindoo law, entitled to his one undivided moiety of the share in the Zemindary, to be held by her for life.

[293] In the year 1846, Hurromonee put forward Gerish Chundro as a son adopted by her under the authority of an Unoomotee Puttur, which deed she alleged had been made by Bhoban Chundro Chowdhuree, her husband. At the time this deed was executed, he was a minor and ward of Court, but there was no authority granted by the Court of Wards, as required by Ben. Reg. X. of 1793, sec. 33, to enable him to adopt a son.

A suit, No. 34, of 1846, was afterwards instituted by Hurromonee in the Civil Court of Zillah Mymensingh, against a third party, for the purpose of indirectly setting up and establishing this adoption. The Appellant intervened in the suit as a party objector, and in a petition denied the validity of Hurromonee's alleged Unoomotee Puttur, and her power to adopt a son. On the 2nd of July, 1847, the Principal Sudder Ameen, after hearing evidence on the point, dismissed the suit.

The Appellant afterwards, on the 30th of November, 1847, under the alleged Unoomotee Puttur from Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, adopted Bhairub Chundro.

In consequence, Hurromonee instituted a suit in the same Zillah Court, against the Appellant, her mother-in-law, and one Bhugobuttu Gooptah, who claimed the right to hold a hereditary Talook, granted by the late Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, as Defendants. In her plaint in that suit, she stated (amongst other things) that Bhoban Chundro Chowdhuree, her late husband, being ill of fever, and being childless, executed in her favour an Unoomotee Puttur, for the purpose of taking five adoptions consecutively, and subsequently died that very night; that she had accordingly adopted a son, under the name of Gerish [294] Chundro, according to the Shasters; that, after that the Appellant by violence dispossessed her of a moiety of the Zemindary, and she alleged, that the Defendant, the Appellant, bought Bhairub Chundro, the son of Neelkunth Gooptoo, in Augroon, 1251, and had adopted him; though, as she charged, she was not competent to make any adoption in the life of the son adopted by herself, and that as it was contrary to the Shasters, she, Hurromonee, claimed the whole of the property of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, with mesne profits. The Appellant, by her answer to the plaint, traversed and denied the making of an Unoomotee Puttur, by the late husband of the Plaintiff, Hurromonee, and alleged that it had been fabricated, and also denied that her husband had ever given Hurromonee any permission to adopt a son. The answer further stated that Appellant had been empowered by the Unoomotee Puttur of her husband, Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, to take, in the event of their two sons' deaths, three other sons, consecutively, into adoption: and that she had accordingly made the adoption of Bairub Chundro.

Neelkunth Gooptoo, the natural father of Bhairub Chundro, then instituted the suit in which the present appeal arose, as the guardian or well-wisher of his infant son. The plaint was filed in the same Zillah Court against Hurromonee, and the Appellant, as widow of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, with some others, as Defendants. The Plaintiff stated, that he sought to recover possession of a one-third of 2 annas 15 gundas of the Zemindary and other property therein described, together with wasilat, by cancelment of an illegal adoption made by the Defendant Hurromonee. The plaint averred, that the late Kirtee [295] Chundro Chowdhuree, the adoptive father of the minor, in order that the funeral cake and water should be perpetuated, and the property protected, had, on the 18th Joistee of the year 1235, executed, in the presence of witnesses, an Unoomotee Puttur, authorizing the Appellant to adopt consecutively three sons, and died on the 23rd of the aforesaid month; and that after this, the Appellant according to the conditions of the Unoomotee Puttur of her husband, being desirous of adopting a son, he and his wife, Kripamoojee Gooptoo, gave their second son, Bhairub Chundro, a minor, on the 15th Augroon of the year 1254; and that the Appellant, in conformity with the Shasters, took and adopted him, naming him Bhairub Chundro Chowdhuree, after performing the putristo jag, etc., and gave information of it to the Judges. The plaint also averred, as to the Unoomotee Puttur set up by the Defendant, Hurromonee, that it was never executed by her husband.

The answer of the Defendant, Hurromonee, did not contain any traverse or denial of the averments respecting the execution by the late Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree of the deed of Unoomotee Puttur, averred in the plaint; nor did the answer contain any denial of the fact also averred in the plaint that his widow, the Appellant, had received authority from him to adopt sons, in the event of their own two natural-born sons dying, but pleaded that, as a period of twenty years had elapsed, under such circumstances the suit was barred under sec. 14, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, and denying generally the Plaintiff's title, relied upon the validity of her own adoption of Gerish Chundro, under the Unoomotee Puttur of her deceased husband.

[296] The replication of the Plaintiff met the plea of the Regulation of Limitations by the Defendant, Hurromonee, by first referring to the Unoomotee Puttur executed by Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, and to the adoption by the Appellant thereunder, on the 30th of November, 1847, of the Plaintiff's son, by which, as it was submitted, he became the rightful successor to his adoptive father's real and personal property, and by then pleading that the suit had been instituted at the expiration of one year from the date of the adoption, which, it was insisted, took the case out of operation of the Regulation of Limitations.

Pending the suit the Defendant, Hurromonee, died, when the Respondent, Sheeb Chundro Roy, as the natural father of her adopted son, the minor, Gerish Chundro, was admitted in place of Hurromonee as a Defendant.

The hearing of both suits took place together, before Norshuree Seeromonee, the Principal Sudder Ameen of the Zillah of Mymensingh, on the 26th of May, 1852, when he pronounced judgment. The material portion of which was as follows:—"Hurromonee has instituted a suit, No. 2, in order to have the alleged adoption by Anundmoyee Chowdhoorayan disallowed, and thereby to recover possession of the property claimed in this suit; and, as the Plaintiff, also being appointed the well-wisher of Bhairub Chundro, the adopted son of Anundmoyee aforesaid, has instituted this suit against Hurromonee and Anundmoyee and others, Defendants, in order to have the adoption of Gerish Chundro by Hurromonee disallowed, and to recover possession of the disputed property; and as the grounds of both the suits are one and the same, it was, therefore, ordered that both suits should be tried and decided [297] together. Accordingly, this suit has been tried and determined along with the above mentioned suit of Hurromonee; and, in my opinion, recorded this day, the adoption of Bhairub Chundro by Anundmoyee has not been satisfactorily proved, the same is set aside, and the suit of Hurromonee aforesaid decreed in her favour, the reasons thereof apply also to this case," and it was ordered, that that suit be dismissed; and the Principal Sudder Ameen further held, that the Unoomotee Puttur executed by Hurromonee's husband was proved, as well as the adoption made under it, and finally ordered, that the claim of Hurromonee was good and tenable, and that the objections of both the female Defendants were false and fraudulent, further ordering that Anundmoyee was to have during her lifetime, food and raiment; and the case was accordingly so decreed.

Neelkunt Gooptoo appealed against this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

The minor, Bhairub Chundro, subsequently died, leaving the Appellant, his adoptive mother, his heir, according to Hindoo law, him surviving; and under an order of the Court, the Appellant was made a party, as his heir, to carry on the appeal.

The decree in Hurromonee's suit (No. 2) was also appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut by the Appellant, and that appeal was marked No. 317, while the appeal in the other suit was marked No. 316.

The hearing of the last-mentioned appeal, No. 316, came on before the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut on the 30th of April, 1855, when it was determined by the Judges of that Court, consisting of Messrs. Abercrombie Dick, Raikes, and Patton, that the other appeal, No. 317, should be heard and disposed of by [298] them first; and that, afterwards, the hearing and decision of the appeal No. 316 should take place. The Court accordingly took up the appeal No. 317, in the suit No. 2 of the late Hurromonee, and entered upon the hearing thereof separately, and thereupon directed the Pleader of the Appellant to confine his argument to one issue, namely, whether the Unoomotee Puttur, under which the late Hurromonee had adopted Gerish Chundro was a valid deed, as that was the ground on which her suit, No. 2, was founded.

The Sudder Dewanny Court delivered judgment on that point, reversing the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen made in that suit, as follows:—"The law declares, that no adoption by disqualified landholders is to be deemed valid without the consent of the Court of Wards, on application made to them through the Collector, sec. 33, Ben. Reg. X. of 1793. It follows, necessarily, that no power to adopt can be granted by such a person without the consent of the Court of Wards. Bhoban Chundro Chowdhuree, the person who granted the power, to adopt, on which the suit is founded, was at the time a ward of that Court, and the consent of the Court of Wards was neither asked for nor obtained. It is, therefore, invalid, and the suit of the Plaintiff must be dismissed. The decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen is reversed, and the appeal decreed, with full costs, against the Plaintiff.

No appeal was brought from this decree.

The Court immediately afterwards took up the appeal No. 316, and on the same day decreed as follows:—"The deed was written several days before the decease of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, the giver of it, and, therefore, might easily have been registered. It was, however, never made [299] public until nearly twenty years after its date. There is no proof that it was ever made known to any of the members of the family. It was not mentioned when the elder of the two legitimate sons of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree died, and, what is more extraordinary, was not produced and acted upon at the time of the decease of the younger son, Bhoban Chundro Chowdhuree. It was at length produced, and a son adopted in virtue of it, after Hurromonee, the widow of Bhoban Chundro Chowdhuree, had adopted a son under an alleged power from her husband. It is, too, in so mutilated and dirty a state as to defy all examination into the nature of the stamp and the date of its sale by the stamp vendor. Under these circumstances, it is utterly unworthy of credit. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs, and the decision of the principal Sudder Ameen, rejecting the Unoomotee Puttur Mussumauth Anundmoyee, confirmed."

The present appeal was from this last decree.

The Respondents did not appear, and the appeal was therefore heard ex parte.

Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—As the fact of the execution of the Unoomotee Puttur by Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree was averred in the plaint, and not traversed or denied by the answer of the Defendant, Hurromonee, it ought to have been considered by the Courts below as admitted on the pleadings, and as not requiring to be established by evidence. Now, the fact of the Unoomotee Puttur having been thus admitted, the adoption under it of the late minor, Bhairub Chundro, must also be taken as having been proved: and such adoption was valid by Hindoo law and custom. As respects the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen, that decree was [300] made on the hearing and consideration by the Judge of the pleadings filed and evidence given in another and distinct suit, to which neither the Plaintiff, nor the minor, Bhairub Chundro, was a party: and that suit was improperly heard by the Principal Sudder Ameen with the suit out of which the present appeal had arisen. It is, therefore, submitted, that any alleged act of the Appellant, as the widow of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, to whom the authority to adopt was given by the deed, or any omission or delay on her part, ought not to have been used by the Sudder Court so as to prejudice, much less to destroy, the rights of the minor, Bhairub Chundro, as the adopted son and heir of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree. If the evidence was weak of the execution of the power to adopt, as it was not impugned, it was sufficient. The substitution by the Court of the Appellant in the place of her deceased adopted son was most irregular: it made her both Plaintiff and Defendant.

The case stood over for consideration.

Judgment was now pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 19, 1862).—The Appellant is the widow of one Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, who died in 1828, leaving two sons. The elder, Juggut Chundro, died a few months after his father, unmarried and intestate. The younger, Bhoban Chundro, died in December, 1844, a minor and childless, but leaving a widow, Hurromonee. Shortly after his death Hurromonee, under an Unoomotee Puttur, or authority to adopt, which she alleged her husband had executed in her favour on the night of his death, adopted one Gerish Chundro, as the son and representative of Bhoban Chundro. And, in the year 1847, the Appellant, who disputed Hurromonee's [301] right to adopt, set up an Unoomotee Puttur which she alleged had been executed in her favour by Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, on the 20th of May, 1828, and under that instrument adopted the son of one Neelkunt Gooptoo as the son and representative of her husband, Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, and gave him the name of Bhairub Chundro Chowdhuree.

These rival adoptions gave rise to two suits, which it will be convenient to distinguish by the numbers 316 and 317, by which they were known in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

Suit, No. 316, in which the present appeal is presented, was instituted in 1849, on behalf of Bhairub Chundro, a minor, by his natural father, Neelkunth Gooptoo, as his well-wisher, or next friend, against the present Appellant, Hurromonee, and several other persons as Defendants. The plaint stated the execution of the Unoomotee Puttur by Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree; the adoption of the infant Plaintiff under it; his title by virtue of that adoption, to one-third of the estate of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree in immediate possession, and to the other two-thirds, subject, as to one of them, to the interest of the present Appellant, as heiresses-at-law of her eldest son; and subject, as to the other, to the life interest of Hurromonee, as heiress of her husband; and it claimed the possession of one-third of the Zemindary, and some personal property as against the two female Defendants with wassilat; and as against Hurromonee, the cancelment of the adoption made by her as legal. The other Defendants had no interest in the property, and seem to have been made Defendants only because they had taken part in the adoption by Hurromonee. To this suit, therefore, the [302] Appellant, though no doubt a friendly, was a substantial, Defendant.

Shortly before the institution of suit, No. 316, Hurromonee had commenced the suit, No. 317. The only Defendants to this were the Appellant and another woman. It set up the adoption made by Hurromonee, and claimed by virtue of that and other acts of the Appellant, the whole of the property as against her, disputing the adoption made by her. In this suit the Appellant pleaded the Unoomotee Puttur alleged to have been executed by her husband, and insisted on the validity of the adoption made by her under it.

Hurromonee died before either suit came to a hearing, and certain proceedings were had by which Geris Chundro, the infant adopted by her, became, through his well-wisher or next friend, a defendant in suit, No. 316, and the Plaintiff in suit, No. 317.

The two suits were heard together by the Principal Sudder Ameen, in whose Court they were pending. In the suit, No. 317 he decided in favour of the Plaintiff, Gerish Chundro, affirming the validity of his adoption by Hurromonee; treating the Unoomotee Puttur set up by the Appellant as not established by proof, and the adoption thereunder as invalid. Upon the same grounds he decided against the title of Bhairub Chundro in suit, No. 316, and dismissed that suit with costs.

Appeals were preferred to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut against both decisions. That in suit, No. 316, was, in the first instance, an appeal on behalf of the infant Plaintiff, Bhairub Chundro, by his father and well-wisher. The appeal in suit, No. 317 was that of the present Appellant.

Before the appeals were heard, Bhairub Chundro [303] died; and the present Appellant (being, on the assumption of his adoption being valid, his heiress-at-law) seems, on her own application, to have been substituted for him as Appellant in suit, No. 316, notwithstanding her character as Defendant in that suit. She thus became, regularly or irregularly domina litis in both appeals.

These appeals were heard by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in 1855. In suit, No. 317, the Court reversed the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen, mainly on the ground that Bhoban Chundro being an infant at the time of his death, had no power to make the instrument under which Hurromonee claimed the right to adopt, without the consent of the Court of Wards; and, therefore, that the adoption of Hurromonee under it was wholly void. Against that decision there has been no appeal.

In suit No. 316, the Court dismissed the appeal, and confirmed the decision of the Zillah Court, holding that the Unoomotee Puttur under which the Appellant adopted Bhairub Chundro had not been proved, and was wholly unworthy of credit. Against this decision the present appeal is preferred.

The decision in suit, No. 317, has determined the interest of the party claiming under the adoption by Hurromonee; and the various deaths that have occurred have vested the whole interest in the estate, at least during her life, in the Appellant.

It is not, therefore, surprising that the present appeal has come on ex parte. Then Lordships, however, do not the less feel the difficulty in which every ex parte appeal places them, of having to decide the questions raised after hearing one side only.

The first and most important question is, whether the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen was, when [304] pronounced, a correct decision of the issues then pending before him between the then parties to the suit. No subsequent event, or devolution of interest, can affect this question; because to give effect to these, should justice require it, would be the office not of an appeal, but of some supplemental proceeding.

The question in the suit was the title of Bhairub Chundro, as the adopted son of Kirtee Chundro Chowdhuree, to recover certain property, and to have another adoption cancelled. The foundation of this title was the Unoomotee Puttur under which he was adopted. If the proof of that failed, he had no title, and his suit was properly dismissed.

It is not now contended, that there is before their Lordships, or was before the Principal Sudder Ameen, testimony strong enough to establish the validity of the instrument, if impugned. But it is argued that the evidence which the Principal Sudder Ameen treated as too weak for that purpose, was irregularly taken, because it was taken in suit, No. 317, to which Bhairub Chundro was not a party. It is further argued that proof of the instrument by witnesses was unnecessary, because the answer of Hurromonee did not impeach, and must, therefore, be taken to have admitted its validity. These two objections shall be considered separately.

Their Lordships are not satisfied that the depositions of the witnesses examined in support of the Unoomotee Puttur (which are not before them) were not substantially taken in both the suits, which were clearly tried together. It appears from a passage in the record before us, that the father and next friend of Bhairub Chundro, in his reasons of appeal, comments on this evidence; and at the hearing in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut the Appellant's Pleader [305] argued upon it. But suppose it to be out of the case, what is the result? Why, that the Plaintiff has given no evidence whatever in support of an averment material to his title. The only question that can remain is, where there has been an admission of that averment sufficient to relieve him from the necessity of giving any such evidence.

Their Lordships cannot answer this question in the affirmative. The answer of Hurromonee denies generally the truth of the Plaintiff's case. If it does not directly impugn the instrument, it does not in terms admit it. The defence is no doubt mainly directed to the avoidance of the adoption by the Appellant by setting up the adoption made by the Defendant, Hurromonee; but it does not admit that if the latter adoption fails, the other is necessarily valid.

Their Lordships cannot apply to the pleadings in these Courts the strict rule that averments not traversed must be taken to be admitted; and they are not prepared to say that the answer contains an admission which, even as between the Plaintiff and Hurromonee, would have dispensed with the necessity of proving the instrument. But when the case was heard, the issue was no longer one between the Plaintiff and Hurromonee. She was dead, and Gerish Chundro had been admitted as a Defendant on the record. He did not come in as the heir of Hurromonee, for, if he were duly adopted, his title was paramount to hers. He would not then have been bound by her admissions of an instrument (even had they been more unequivocal than they are), the execution of which had been formally made one of the issues in the suit. Their Lordships, therefore, can see no ground for disturbing the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen.

[306] The next question is, whether any case has been made for reversing or varying the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. It has been argued that the substitution of the Appellant for Bhairub Chundro which made her both Plaintiff and Defendant in the suit, was grossly irregular. It may have been so; but it was an irregularity of her own seeking. If she had not taken up the appeal, it must either have been prosecuted by the well-wisher and next friend of the deceased infant (if the forms of the Court permitted this), or abandoned by him. Their Lordships must assume that the decree of the Zillah Court, which they think to be correct, would in either case have stood. The Appellant on her own application have been allowed, perhaps irregularly, to contest the correctness of that decree. She has done so unsuccessfully, and it is but fair that she should be left to pay the costs of the proceedings.

The Appellant is now entitled, as a Hindoo female heiress, to the whole estate; if she makes any further adoption, the validity of that adoption will be probably tried between the party adopted and those who will be the heirs of her husband on her death. In any such suit it is difficult to see how these decrees can be admitted as evidence for the purpose of showing the invalidity of the instrument of adoption.

At any rate their Lordships think it would be objectionable to disturb or vary decrees properly made by the Zillah and Sudder Courts in this suit, for the mere purpose of guarding against the possible error of some other tribunal in some future suit, and the only order which they can recommend Her Majesty to make on this appeal is, that it be dismissed.

[307] VARDEN SETH SAM,—Appellant: LUCKPATHY ROYJEE LALLAH, BUNHAH LALL, SADASEVA TANKER, and JAMES OUCHTERLONY.—Respondents * [July 3, 1862].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

Mad. Reg. II., of 1802, sec. XVII., enacts, that in the absence of any positive law to the contrary, in force in the Presidency of Madras, that the decision of the Court is to be according to justice, equity, and good faith.

The Plaintiff was an Armenian and the Defendants, Hindoos, Mahomedans, and Christians. The Plaintiff sought by the plaint to establish a lien on land, created by an equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds. Held (in the absence of any agreement that the transaction was to be governed by any particular local law), that, under Mad. Reg. II., of 1802, sec. XVII., the principles of English law respecting equitable mortgages applied [9 Moo. Ind. App. 324-326].

S. purchased the Muttah of E., and paid part of the consideration money. When the parties came to complete, the vendors had not the title deeds, but they promised to deliver them in a few days, and arranged that the remaining part of the purchase-money should be retained by the purchaser, and they handed over to him the title deeds of another Muttah, called T., to be held as security for their delivering to the purchaser the title deeds of Muttah E., in order to perfect his title. The purchaser, on the faith of this advanced large sums, and paid off a mortgage on Muttah T. This latter Muttah having been sold, S. brought a suit to recover the amount advanced by him on account of that Muttah, claiming to be equitable mortgagee, and to have a charge on that estate for the advances made by him in respect thereof. Held, that the transaction created a lien, and bound the Muttah T. for the advances made by S.

Seemle.—By the Mohamedan law such a deposit for a security in respect of a contingent loss would be in the nature of a trust, not a pawn.

The registration of the name of a party in possession of land on the Collector's books, as owner, is not conclusive evidence of his title, as the land may be affected by prior equitable charges, and it is the duty of a purchaser to investigate the prior title.

The question in this case related to the validity of a lien, created by deposit of the title deeds of an estate called the Muttah of Tirupassur, in the Presidency of Madras, in consideration of pecuniary advances made by the Appellant for the benefit of that estate.

The facts were these:—

In the year 1851, Gulam Asen Khan Bahadoor, [308] and his father, Sharpul Umra Sahib, were in possession of three Muttahs, or Districts of villages, called respectively the Muttah of Tirupassur (otherwise called Tripassur), and the Muttah of Ekattur (otherwise called Yagatoori), situate in Districts of Periyapalam, and the Muttah of Madhuravayal, in the Talook of Sydapetta, all in the Presidency of Madras.

In the month of September of that year, the three Muttahs of Tirupassur, Ekattur and Madhuravayal were attached by the Collector for kist due to Government, amounting to Rs. 8049. 4a.; and the Collector advertised the Muttahs for sale in October following, for the arrears.

In this state of things, Gulam Asen Khan and his father, applied to the Appellant for assistance to prevent the sale, and offered to sell to him the Muttah of Tirupassur for Rs. 4000, and the Muttah of Ekattur for Rs. 11,000, and stated that, except the claim of the Collector for arrears of revenue, there were no incumbrances affecting the properties; and it was, ultimately, on the 15th of September, 1851, agreed between them that the Appellant should purchase the Muttah of Ekattur for Rs. 11,000, and have the option of purchasing that [309] of Tirupassur for Rs. 4000; and that out of the Rs. 11,000, the purchase-money for the Muttah of Ekattur, he should pay to the Collector of the District Rs. 8049. 4a. in discharge of what was due for arrears of revenue.

Under this arrangement, the Appellant, on the 15th of September, paid Rs. 200 to Sharpul Umra Sahib, in part performance of the agreement for purchase of the Muttah of Ekattur. The Appellant also, in order to prevent the sale of the three Muttahs, paid to the Collector the sum of Rs. 8049. 4a. in discharge of the arrears.

The Appellant having thus paid the sums of Rs. 200 and Rs. 8049. 4a., in respect of his purchase of the Muttah of Ekattur, attended on the 14th of October following, at the house of the vendors, to complete his purchase, when Gulam Asen Khan, by the desire of Sharpul Umra Sahib, his father, executed to the Appellant a Bill of Sale of the Muttah of Ekattur, and upon the Appellant calling for the title deeds of that to be delivered up to him, the vendors alleged that they were with some of their relatives, and said they would send for them soon and deliver them to the Appellant. The Appellant, however, insisting that the title deeds ought to have been ready to be given up to him, they proposed and offered that, in the meantime, he should retain the residue of the purchase-money, and that they would deposit with him the title deeds of the Muttah of Tirupassur, to be held by way of equitable mortgage as a security for their delivering up to the Appellant the title deeds of the Muttah of Ekattur, in order to make his title thereto perfect; and, accordingly, Gulam Asen Khan delivered to the Appellant a Bill of Sale of the Muttah of Tirupassur, dated the 29th of December, 1834, [310] from one Tatipatri Bapu Rayar to Arcot Jivana Rayar, and another Bill of Sale of the same Muttah, dated the 30th of June, 1840, from Arcot Jivana Rayar, to Gulam Asen Khan, being the title deeds under which Gulam Asen Khan held the Muttah, and he also delivered to the Appellant a certificate of registration, granted by the Collector of the District to Gulam Asen Khan, dated the 8th of July, 1840.

On the 22nd of November, 1851, the Appellant, by the direction of Gulam Asen Khan, paid to one Rajah Jankeeran, by whom the sale had been conducted, on behalf of the vendors, a further sum of Rs. 300, on account of the purchase-money.

The Muttah of Ekattur consisted of five villages, one of which was the village of Kunnattur, and upon the Appellant proceeding to take possession of it under the sale to him, he discovered that the village of Kunnattur had been already sold by Gulam Asen Khan and Sharpul Umra Sahib to Kakaji Rai and others for Rs. 500. This fact was admitted by the vendors, and it was thereupon agreed between them and the Appellant that the sum of Rs. 500, should be deducted from the purchase-money of Rs. 11,000, by which the purchase-money for the Muttah of Ekattur became reduced to Rs. 10,500, of which sum the Appellant had paid the several sums of Rs. 200; Rs. 8049. 4a., and Rs. 300. In the year 1853, the Appellant further discovered that the vendors had before the sale to him in September, 1851, actually mortgaged the Muttah of Ekattur to one Mahomed Usen Sahib, who had possession of the title deeds thereof, and who had, in the year 1851, commenced proceedings in the Zillah Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Chingleput, to recover what was due to him on such mortgage; and that the Defendants, the vendors, [311] had filed a Razinama, or judgment by confession, in such suit, in which Mahomed Usen's mortgage claim on the Muttah was admitted; and it was agreed that, in default of payment of the sum therein mentioned, the same should be recovered from the Muttah. In the month of November, 1853, Mahomed Usen proceeded to attach the Muttah for the sum of Rs. 5761, then due to him on the mortgage and the Razinamah; and, in order to prevent the sale of the Muttah then under attachment, and to redeem the Muttah, and obtain possession of the title deeds, the Appellant, on the 12th of December, 1853, paid to Mahomed Usen the sum of Rs. 5761, in satisfaction of the Razinamah, and received from him the title deeds of the Muttah.

In this manner, the Appellant had paid the various sums of Rs. 200, Rs. 8049. 4a., Rs. 300, and Rs. 5761, for the purchase of the Muttah of Ekattur, and upon the security of the title deeds of the Muttah of Tirupassur, so deposited with him as aforesaid, making in the whole Rs. 14,310. 4a., being the sum of Rs. 3810. 4a. over and above the amount of Rs. 10,500, the purchase-money of the Muttah of Ekattur, and for the repayment thereof held the equitable mortgage on the Muttah of Tirupassur, by the deposit of the title deeds of that Muttah.

In the month of October, 1855, the Appellant, having discovered that, during his absence from the neighbourhood, Gulam Asen Khan had caused the Muttah of Tirupassur to be transferred in the books of the Collector from his own name to the name of the Respondent, Luckpathy Royjee Lallah, and that they were then endeavouring to sell the same to the Respondent, Ouchterlony; filed a plaint in the Court of [312] the Principal Sudder Ameen of Chingleput, the District in which the Muttah of Tirupassur was situate, against Gulam Asen Khan, Sharpul Umra Sahib, and the Respondent, Luckpathy Royjee Lallah, in the plaint called Set Rakpati Roy Lala Sunkab to recover from them, and, as against the Muttah of Tirupassur, the sum of Rs. 3810. 4a., with interest, amounting to Rs. 803. 15a. 5p., in all Rs. 4614. 3a. 5p., and subsequent interest.

The Defendant, Gulam Asen Khan, by his answer, alleged that the Appellant was indebted to him. He admitted the sale by him to the Appellant of the Muttah of Ekattur, and the payment by the Appellant of the two sums of Rs. 8049. 4a., and Rs. 300, but alleged, that he had not authorized the payment of the sums of Rs. 200, Rs. 500 and Rs. 5761, before mentioned. The answer also alleged, that the Plaintiff borrowed from the Defendant the title deeds of the Muttah of Tirupassur, under the pretence that he wished to see the form of title deeds relating to Muttahs, and had not returned them; he admitted that the third Defendant had purchased the Muttah of Tirupassur from him, and enjoyed it for three years, and afterwards publicly sold it to the Defendant, Ouchterlony, who was then in possession of it. The answer further alleged, that the first and second Defendants had not mortgaged the title deeds of Ekattur to Mahomed Usen for Rs. 5761, and insisted that the Defendant had not authorized the Appellant to pay that sum.

The second Defendant, Sharpul Umra Sahib, made default, and it was ordered that, as against him, the suit should be heard ex-parte.

On the 21st of December, 1855, Ponna Lala, and [313] Sadasiva Takar, as Vakeels for the third Defendant, applied to the Court, praying, under the circumstances therein stated, that they might be permitted to put in an answer and defend the suit generally on his behalf; and on the hearing of such petition, it was ordered that the Plaintiff's Vakeel should include the Petitioners as Defendants in the suit instead of the third Defendant.

A supplemental plaint was then filed, making Ponna Lala and Sadasiva Takar Defendants to the suit; and by their answer they alleged that the third Defendant left in September, 1855, for Biganir, in the Raj of Satadar, which was 2000 miles distant; and that the Plaintiff ought not to have brought the suit in the Chingleput Court, the parties being resident elsewhere; that the third Defendant was under no obligation to the Plaintiff, and that the Plaintiff had obtained no document in connection with the Muttah of Tirupassur; and further, that the Muttah of Tirupassur had been registered by the Circar in the name of the third Defendant and the certificate and Sunnud, etc., issued in his favour, and who had remained in unmolested and public enjoyment thereof up to four years previously; and that a short time previously to the institution of the suit, the Muttah had been sold to the Respondent, Ouchterlony, and was registered by the Circar in his name, and remained in his enjoyment; the answer then suggested that no benefit could be derived from the simple possession of the certificates, etc., of earlier date, by a party who had no interest whatever in them; and denied that any of the facts stated in the plaint in connection with the Muttah of Tirupassur had taken place.

The Appellant afterwards filed a supplemental plaint against Ouchterlony, making him a Defendant to [314] the suit. Ouchterlony by his answer alleged, that he was utterly ignorant of the transactions between the Plaintiff, and the first and second Defendants, and that whatever claims the Plaintiff might have against those Defendants, yet that he had no legal claim whatever upon the Muttah of Tirupassur; he denied having had any conference with the first or second Defendants at any time on any subject; and insisted that the transaction between the third Defendant and him was valid and conclusive; that the third Defendant, alleging that the Muttah or Tirupassur was his own property, asked him to purchase it, and showed a Bill of Sale, which he was then unable to produce, but which was executed a long time ago, either by the first and second Defendants, or one of them, and that the Muttah had been registered in his name by the Collector, and that, as the third Defendant had in himself the title and enjoyment thereof, he, Ouchterlony, purchased it from him just as he had it.

The Appellant entered into evidence, and proved the several matters hereinbefore stated. The first Defendant and the sixth Defendant, also adduced evidence. The cause was heard by T. Alaghia, the Principal Sudder Ameen, on the 14th of April, 1857, when that Judge pronounced judgment, declaring that the absence of a written agreement in favour of the Plaintiff could not vitiate his claim: for that it was quite clear the Plaintiff had a lien upon the first and second Defendants' estates long before the claim of the other Defendant began to exist; and that although those Defendants would not bring to notice in their pleadings the date of the deeds in their favour, it was certain by the depositions of their Vakeels taken at the hearing [315] of the cause, and by the other circumstances connected with it, that they did not acquire their right before the Plaintiffs claim to recover a surplus of Rs. 3810. 4a. 1p. on the security of the estates, came into existence, and the Court decreed that the first and second Defendants should pay to the Plaintiff the amount claimed, with interest up to the date of the decree, and that the Tirupassur Muttah be held responsible for the same, and that the costs should be paid by the first and second Defendants to the Plaintiff, and the other Defendant.

From this decree the Respondents, Ouchterlony and Luckpathy Royjee Lallah, by his attorneys, the fourth and fifth Defendants, appealed to the Civil Court of Chingleput, and the Judge of that Court (Mr. W. Dowdeswell), on the 31st of March, 1858, pronounced the following judgment:—"It appears, from the evidence in this case, that the first Defendant sold the Muttah of Ekattur to the Plaintiff on the 14th of October, 1851, and deposited the title deeds of the Tirupassur Muttah with the Plaintiff as security, until he should deliver up the title deeds of the Ekattur Muttah. The first Defendant has in his answer, admitted the sale, and the delivery of the title deeds of Tirupassur Muttah. It must be here remarked, that the first Defendant had filed a Razinamah, in the suit No. 37, of 1851, on the file of the Principal Sudder Ameen's Court, in which he had admitted Mahomed Usen's mortgage claim over the Ekattur Muttah, and had agreed that, in default of payment of the sum stipulated in the Razinamah, the same should be recovered from the Ekattur Muttah. Notwithstanding this agreement, filed in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen, the first Defendant assured the Plaintiff (as stated in the Bill of Sale) that there [316] were no liabilities whatsoever on the property; and it was entered in the Bill of Sale that 'in the event of there being any claim against the Ekattur Muttah, the first Defendant would hold himself responsible for clearing it off.' Subsequently to this sale having been effected, the Ekattur Muttah was attached in November, 1853, in satisfaction of the Razinamah, filed by first Defendant himself in the suit, No. 37, of 1851; and as the Defendant did not clear off the demand, the Plaintiff was forced to pay the mortgage claim of Mahomed Usen, amounting to Rs. 5761, in order to get the Muttah released from attachment. The evidence shows that this sum of Rs. 5761 was paid by Mr. Lazar, the Plaintiff's agent, and the receipt of it was acknowledged by Mahomed Usen in his petition, No. 705, of 1853. It is clear, then, that the Plaintiff could not have received the title deeds of the Ekattur Muttah till the year 1853, as they were not delivered back to Mahomed Usen by the Court till 1853; and he was clearly entitled to recover all sums paid by him over and above the price of the property which it was necessary should be paid, before the title-deeds could be delivered to him, from the estate of Tirupassur Muttah, of which he held the title deeds as security. The Appellants set forth that the Court had no jurisdiction, the parties being residents in, Madras; moreover, that the Plaintiff had no lien on the Tirupassur Muttah. With regard to the first objection, it is clear the property from which the Plaintiff sought to recover the money due to him, is situate within this Zillah, and, therefore, was cognizable by the Civil Courts. With regard to the second, the Plaintiff has shown he has a lien upon the property, by producing the title deeds of it, and [317] showing he held them as security, previous to the period at which the sale to the third Defendant, whose agents have appealed, was made. The third Defendant, it appears, is abroad somewhere, and his agents; the fourth and fifth Defendants, were allowed to defend the suit on his behalf, and, as they were dissatisfied with the decision of the lower Court, they were allowed to make this appeal on his behalf. In the oral pleadings, the Vakeel on behalf of the third Defendant, stated that the Tirupassur Muttah was purchased by his client in 1852, from the first Defendant, and that a Bill of Sale was executed in his (the third Defendant's) favour, and the transfer of the Muttah to his name, and his possession and enjoyment of the property, conferred on him every title, and that the absence of the title deeds of the property was immaterial. The Civil Judge, however, considers that the third Defendant, by his own showing, neglected to observe even the common precautions which are used when property is purchased and sold, for he admits he did not see the title deeds, and it does not appear that he made any regular inquiry as to whether there were, or were not, claims on the property. The Plaintiff, it has been proved, received from the first Defendant, the title deeds of the Tirupassur Muttah, in 1851, as security for the delivery of the title deeds of the Ekattur Muttah; and, as these title deeds had been so pledged, the first Defendant had no power to effect the sale of the Tirupassur Muttah, until he had delivered the title deeds of the Ekattur Muttah, and the sale thereof to the third Defendant cannot prevent the Plaintiff from recovering the amount he was forced to pay, to enable him to obtain possession of the title deeds of Ekattur Muttah, [318] from the property of the Tirupassur Muttah, the title deeds of which Plaintiff held as security. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs."

From this decree the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Defendants to the original and supplemental suit, presented a special appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, upon the following grounds:—Under cl. 1, sec. 4, Act, No. XVI. of 1853; first that the Plaintiff had no lien on the Tirupassur Muttah; secondly, that the third and sixth Defendants were respectively purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, and with registry of the conveyances to them; thirdly, that neither the Principal Sudder Ameen, nor the Civil Judge, had any jurisdiction as against the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Defendants. And, under cl. 4, of the same Act, first, that the third Defendant was never served with notice to appear or answer, and that the prosecution of the suit in his absence was wholly illegal; and secondly, that making the fourth and fifth parties was also illegal; lastly, that no points were recorded for the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Defendants, or any of them.

The Sudder Court admitted the special appeal, in order to decide whether the sixth Defendant was to be considered a bona fide purchaser without notice, and if so, whether the property purchased by him was affected by the Plaintiff's asserted lien thereon.

The special appeal was heard before Messrs. Hooper, Strange, and Phillips, the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Court, and, on the 23rd of July, 1859, the following decree was made:—"The Courts below have held, that the circumstances of the case give the Plaintiff a lien on the Tirupassur Muttah for the money overpaid by him on account of the Ekattur Muttah, and that the [319] omission of the third Defendant to inquire, as he was in duty bound, for the title deeds of the Tirupassur Muttah, when making purchase of that Muttah, serves to charge him constructively with notice of the Plaintiff's claim. In these opinions we cannot coincide. We consider the above doctrine of constructive notice inapplicable to the circumstances of the country, where, very commonly, old deeds connected with land do not exist, and inquiry for them ordinarily is not made. In the present instance, the third Defendant found the parties with whom he dealt in possession with their names on the registry, and it appears to the Court reasonable that he should have looked for no further proof of title in them, to sell the property to him. In like manner the sixth Defendant found the third Defendant in possession with his name on the registry, and was justified in concluding that he might safely make the purchase from him. The Court hold, therefore, that neither the third nor the sixth Defendant is chargeable with notice, and that the Tirupassur Muttah, after passing to their hands, cannot be liable for any lien thereon which Plaintiff may have possessed. The Court is further of opinion, that the Plaintiff possessed no such lien. On the premises stated by him, he might have insisted on specific performance of the engagement of the first and second Defendants to sell him the Muttah, but this he has not done. On the contrary, he shows that he has receded from that arrangement by demanding back money which might have been taken as advanced towards completion of the purchase, and represents this money as an over payment made on account of the Ekattur Muttah. Now, it is clear, that the deposit with him of the [320] title deeds of the Tirupassur Muttah was not made with the end of holding that Muttah liable in hypothecation for payments made in connection with the Ekattur Muttah: it was a deposit without contemplation of a mortgage, and the Court hold, therefore, that no lien was created. The Court, for the above reasons, resolve to amend the decrees of the Courts below, so far as to declare that the Muttah of Tirupassur is not liable for the Plaintiff's demand upon the first and second Defendants. The costs of the Defendants, from three to six, are to be paid by the Plaintiff."

After an unsuccessful application to the Sudder Court for review of judgment, the Appellant, as the amount at issue was under the appealable value, applied by petition to the Privy Council, and was allowed, in the circumstances, special leave to appeal.

As the Respondents did not appear, the appeal was heard ex parte.

Mr. Teed, Q.C., and Mr. Cracknell, for the Appellant, submitted, that the decree of the Sudder Court could not be sustained, and in support of the appeal relied upon these grounds:—

First, that as the only point open to the Respondents, under the order of the Sudder Court of the 20th of January, 1859, admitting the special appeal, was, whether the Respondent, the sixth Defendant in the original suit, was to be considered a bona fide purchaser, without notice, of the Muttah of Tirupassur, and if so, whether that Muttah, as having been purchased by him, was thereby freed from the Appellant's claim upon it: it was, therefore, not [321] competent to the Court to entertain or determine the question, whether the Appellant had or had not the lien claimed by him on that Muttah under the circumstances of the case.

Secondly, that the Sudder Court ought to have determined that the sixth Defendant was not a purchaser bona fide, without notice, as the evidence in the cause proved notice to him before the institution of the suit: and, that there was no proof in fact of any conveyance of the Muttah to the third Defendant from the first and second Defendants; as the registry in the Collector's books of the third Defendant, as owner of the Muttah, was not proof of his title to it, as shown by the Circular Order of the 17th of September, 1832: neither was there any proof of any payment of purchase-money, or of other valuable consideration, for the purchase of the Muttah having been given by either the third or sixth Defendants, prior to notice of the Appellant's claim, or in fact, prior to the institution of the suit; the purchase by the sixth Defendant, if in fact made, being after the institution of the suit, and, therefore, pendente lite, and could not affect the Appellant's right. That the non-production by the first or second Defendant of any conveyance of the Muttah to them on the purchase of the Muttah by the third and sixth Defendants respectively, ought to have induced suspicion in those Defendants, and led them to inquire for the conveyance and the earlier title deeds, which inquiry, if made, would have made them acquainted with the Appellant's rights, and that, therefore, the third and sixth Defendants ought to be deemed to have had notice of them; and that the defence of being a purchaser bona fide, for value, and without notice of the Appellant's [322] rights, was not sufficiently pleaded by the third and sixth Defendants so as to entitle them to raise that defence.

Thirdly, that the evidence proved that the sale of the Muttah to the third and sixth Defendants respectively, was not made bona fide, but if so made, was made in fraud of the Appellant.

Fourthly, that if the Sudder Court was at liberty to entertain the question whether the Appellant was, or not, entitled to the lien or charge claimed by him upon the Muttah of Tirupassur, it ought to have found that he was entitled to that lien.

Fifthly, that the Judge of the Civil Court of Chingleput having found as a fact, that the first Defendant had sold the Muttah of Ekattur to the Appellant on the 14th of October, 1851, and deposited the title deeds of the Muttah of Tirupassur with the Appellant as security, until he should deliver up the title deeds of the Ekattur Muttah, that finding, being a finding of fact, could not be controverted in the Sudder Court, as it had established the right of the Appellant to the equitable mortgage or lien upon the Muttah of Tirupassur, claimed by him, and confirmed by that decree. Equitable mortgages of land, by the deposit of the title deeds, being a well-known and customary species of security in the Madras Presidency.

Lastly, they contended, that the Sudder Court was wrong in not applying the principles of English law relating to equitable mortgages in deciding the case, and that, as the Appellant was an Armenian Christian, and the other parties Hindoo, Mahomedans, and Christian, the case fell to be determined according to justice, equity, and good conscience, as provided by [323] Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. XVII., as no particular local law was applicable to the transaction (see Abraham v. Abraham, ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 210).

The case stood over for consideration, and their Lordships' judgment was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 19, 1862).—This is an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, reversing a decision in favour of the Plaintiff so far as it established a lien on certain landed property called the Muttah of Tirupassur. This Muttah, which was the property of the first Defendant on the record, had been as the Plaintiff alleged, duly charged in his favour by the first Defendant as a security in respect of the non-delivery of the title deeds of another estate called the Muttah of Ekattur, purchased by the Plaintiff from him. After the creation of such charge the property was transferred, first to the third Defendant, and by him, pending the present litigation, to the last Defendant on the record, Mr. Ouchterlony.

The Plaintiff alleged the existence, continuance, and validity of his security as against the third and the last Defendant.

In the Court of original jurisdiction, and in the first appellate Court, the Plaintiff succeeded in establishing his charge, but on appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras the decree was reversed.

The Plaintiff is a Christian, and, from his name, appears to be an Armenian: the first Defendant is the son of the second Defendant, and both are Mahomedans: the third Defendant is a Hindoo; and the last on the record is a Christian and a British subject.

Though both the third and the last Defendants [324] pleaded, in effect, that they were bona fide purchasers for value, without notice, yet they did not prove that defence, though the Plaintiff charged notice and collusion with the first Defendant.

It appeared in evidence that, on the non-production of the title deeds of the estate, Ekattur, it was promised on the part of the seller that they would be produced in a few days, but this promise was not fulfilled, as they proved to be in the possession of a prior incumbrancer. The Plaintiff was obliged, in order to procure them, to pay off this incumbrance, and, having previously paid a large part of the purchase-money: his whole payments exceeded the purchase-money by a considerable sum (Rs. 3810), for which, with interest, he claimed to be indemnified by his alleged security on the pledged estate. The contract of pledge contained, also, a further stipulation of purchase.

The decision of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, so far as it respects the enforcement of the lien against the third and last Defendants, appears to have proceeded upon the ground that the principles of the English law applicable to a similar state of circumstances ought not to govern the decision of that suit in those Courts. This was correct if the authoritative obligation of that law on the Company's Courts were insisted on. There is, properly, no prescribed general law to which their decisions must conform. They are directed in the Madras Presidency to proceed generally, according to justice, equity, and good conscience. The question then is, whether the decision appealed against violates that direction or not. The Court of appeal, reversing the prior decisions, has decided that the contract was not operative as a [325] hypothecation, or pledge, even between the parties to it. Yet the evidence shows that the Plaintiff looked, not simply to the personal credit of the person with whom he contracted, but bargained for a security on land. If any positive law had forbidden effect to be given to the actual agreement of the parties to create that lien, the Court, of course, must have obeyed that law. If the contract of lien were imperfect for want of some necessary condition, effect must have been, in like manner, denied to it as a perfected lien. But nothing of this sort is suggested in the pleadings, or proved. It is not shown that, in fact, the parties contracted with reference to any particular law. They were not of the same race and creed. By the Mahomedan law, such a contract as the one under consideration, for a security in respect of a contingent loss, would be one, not of pawn, but of trust (Hedaya, vol. iv. p. 208, tit. "Pawns"). It is not declared, that any writing or actual delivery is essential to the creation of such trust by that law; but as the contracting parties are not both Mahomedans, that law would not have governed the question of the validity and force of their contract, even in the Supreme Court. The Plaintiff is a Christian: the contract took place with parties living within the local limits of the Supreme Court of Madras, though it related to land beyond them. It is not shown that any local law, any lex loci rei sitae, exists, forbidding the creation of a lien by the contract and deposit of deeds which existed in this case; and by the General law of the place where the contract was made, that is, the English law, the deposit of title deeds as a security would create a lien on lands; though, as between parties who can convey by deed only, or [326] conveyance in writing, such lien would necessarily be equitable. In this case there is an express contract for a security on the lands, to which, no law invalidating it, effect must be given between parties themselves. The circumstance that the Plaintiff had not sued for a specific performance of the contract to sell the land to him (on which the Sudder Court laid some stress), does not in the least affect his claim for a lien. By the contract this latter interest is immediately created, and expressed to be immediate. The sale is contemplated as future. The first Defendant's own acts, in dealing with his land as he did, would effectually bar him, and those taking derivative titles from him, from insisting on this objection, if it had any original foundation of justice and equity to support it: but, in truth, they are distinct and independent parts of the same contract.

The contract, then, created between the parties a lien on the land. It is immaterial for the decision of this suit to consider or decide, whether that lien between these parties, looking to the power in the first Defendant to convey without writing, is legal or equitable (Doe dem. Seebkristo v. The East India Company, 6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 267).

The question to be considered is, whether the third and sixth Defendants respectively possessed the land free from that lien, whatever its nature. As one who owns property subject to a charge can, in general, convey no title higher or more free than his own, it lies always on a succeeding owner to make out a case to defeat such prior charge. Let it be conceded that a purchaser for value, bona fide, and without notice of this charge, whether legal or [327] equitable, would have had in these Courts an equity superior to that of the Plaintiff, still such innocent purchase must be, not merely asserted, but proved in the cause, and this case furnishes no such proof.

To give effect to the legal estate as against prior equitable title, would be an adoption of the English law; and to adopt it, and yet reject its qualifications and restrictions, would be scarcely consistent with justice. The law in India has not enabled a purchaser of land to look only to the apparent title on the Collector's books, or the presumed title of the owner in possession. It is beyond the province of a Court of Justice to effect by decision a change so important as that which is involved in the principle of this decision.

Their Lordships must, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the decree appealed against and to give to the Appellant the costs of the proceedings in the Court below, and of the present appeal. Any costs paid by the Appellant under the decree reversed must, of course, be refunded.

[328] RAJAH MUHESH NARAIN SING,—Appellant: KISHANUND MISR and RUGHOBUR DYAL SING,—Respondents * [Dec. 5 and 6, 1862].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Agra.

Principles regulating sales under Ben. Reg. XX. of 1795, considered.

The principal object of that Regulation is the security of the public revenue.

Where a purchaser for valuable consideration from a decree holder, had been in possession for nine years before the suit was brought to recover possession of real estate sold in execution of a decree, on the ground of non-compliance with the formalities prescribed by sec. 3 of Ben. Reg. XX. of 1795, the onus lies on the party claiming possession, to prove that the requirements of that section have not been observed.

Although at an auction sale, in satisfaction of a decree, the Collector cannot insist upon a deposit being made before the acceptance of a bidding; yet, in circumstances, showing that persons without means had been put forward to make sham biddings, such being a fraudulent contrivance to frustrate the sale, it was held, that the Collector was justified in inquiring into the trustworthiness of the bidder, before accepting his bidding, as it did not deter other persons really wishing to buy from offering their biddings.

This suit was brought by the Appellant to recover possession of an estate, called Talooka Bazaar Rajah, Pergunnah Gudwarree, from the Respondent, Kishanund Misr, who was in possession thereof under conveyances from purchasers at an auction sale made under a decree of the Civil Court, and which sale was sought to be set aside on the ground of irregularity, [329] informality, and want of compliance with the provisions of Ben. Reg. XX. of 1795, in carrying the sale out.

The sale took place under the following circumstances:—

The Talooka was formerly the property of the Rajah Ramdial Singh, the Appellant's grandfather, who being in arrear with the Government, was obliged, in order to save the estate from sale, to borrow a considerable sum of money from one Petumber Mookerjee, upon bond security, and Petumber Mookerjee, not being able to obtain payment either from him during his lifetime, or his son, Rajah Surnam Singh, upon whom on his death the Raj descended, in the year 1822, instituted a suit against the latter, to enforce his security, and on the 26th of May, 1830, obtained a decree in that suit for Rs. 18,700. 15a. 9p. principal and interest, the arrears then due. His next step was to apply for execution, which he accordingly did on the 25th August, in the same year; but he was prevented from obtaining it by Surruhjeet Singh, Sher Mongul Singh, and Ruchpal Singh, brothers of Surnam Singh, instituting a suit, in which they claimed, as Surnam Singh's brothers, to exempt three-fourths of the Talooka, as being their property, from liability to the decree, whereby an Order was obtained, on the 14th of December, 1830, postponing any award of execution beyond the one-fourth of Surnam Singh's share, until the final decision of that suit.

The effect of this, and other devices of the Rajah for delay, was to induce the decree-holder on the 19th of April, 1833, to agree to accept the sum of Rs. 16,000, in full, by certain instalments, provided that such instalments were regularly paid, and a [330] deed of compromise of that date was accordingly executed to carry out this agreement. Nothing was paid under this deed; and when, in the year 1835, the Zillah Court of Jounpore decided, that the three-fourths claimed by Surnam

Singh's brothers were equally liable with the remaining one-fourth to the ancestor's debt, an appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Court was preferred, creating further delay, and which appeal was not decided until the year 1841, when that Court negatived the claim on the part of Surrubject Singh and his brothers, and expressed their conviction that the suit was merely collusive, and instituted for the purpose of delaying the decree-holder in his execution. Pending this appeal, Petumber Mookerjee proposed to a Mr. Barwise to sell the decree to him, and Barwise with the Rajah's consent, became the purchaser, paid Petumber Mookerjee the full consideration, and took from him an assignment of the decree, dated the 4th of April, 1837. Shortly after this, Surnam Singh died, and was succeeded in the Raj by the Appellant; and Barwise, being unable to obtain from him any satisfactory arrangement for payment of the amount due, in November, 1837, petitioned the Zillah Court for execution of the decree. This petition the Appellant opposed, and it was not until the 4th of May, 1843, that Barwise was able to obtain an effective order for the realization of the amount due under the decree of 1830.

In the course of these proceedings Barwise, on the 4th of April, 1840, obtained an Order for execution of the decree (afterwards rescinded on appeal), by which a sale was fixed to take place on the 30th of July in [331] that year; to thwart which the following plan was resorted to by the Appellant. A sum of Rs. 7000, Government revenue was withheld, in order that if the Collector let the Talooka to farm to obtain payment of the arrears, the Rajah might get the lease taken by some dependent of his own; and the Appellant contrived to get the 16th of July, 1840, fixed for the letting, in order that the lease might precede the execution sale, and thus interpose a five years' term in the decree-holder's title and leave him with a reversion to sell. This plan was defeated by an Order of the Civil Court, which directed that if it should become necessary to lease the Talooka for the arrears, the decree-holder was the person entitled to the lease; and at a later date, in 1843, the revenue being then in arrear, and Barwise having paid the arrears, a lease of the Talooka for ten years was granted to him.

Immediately after the passing of the Order of the 4th of May, 1843, by which execution was awarded, Barwise proceeded to put it in force by applying on the 31st of that month, to the Civil Court of Jounpore for a sale of the Talooka by public auction, through the Collector of Jounpore, with the consent of the Commissioner of the Benares division; filing with his petition the particulars of his claim, and a schedule describing the property as the Talooka Bazaar Rajah, paying a revenue of Rs. 19,406 11a. 6p. In this statement the number of Mouzahs was reckoned as forty-three, which number included the hamlets with the villages, as it was not until a subsequent adjustment that the hamlets were reckoned separately, which made the number of Mouzahs sixty-three, the [332] number sold and sought to be recovered, the jumma and area, however, remaining the same.

Upon this petition the Court submitted to the Commissioner of the Benares division the usual formal application for sale under sec. 16, Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1803, and sec. 2, Reg. XX. of 1795.

This application the Commissioner, on the 16th of June, 1843, forwarded to the Collector, who on the 18th of July, fixed the sale for the 21st of August, and issued the usual advertisements, and forwarding information of the above, together with a statement of the lands required to be sold to the Commissioner. This statement contained the description—"Talooka Bazaar Rajah," area "14,996 beegahs," and jumma Rs. 19,406 11a. 6p., and made no mention of the number of Mouzahs; and on the receipt of it the Commissioner, on the 21st of July, 1843, forwarded his sanction of the sale to the Collector.

After various delays the sale was proceeded with; the decree-holder bidding to the extent of his demand, but one Sheopershad bidding higher, the estate was knocked down to him. Sheopershad was, it afterwards appeared, the Appellant's treasurer, sent by him for the purpose of bidding, and thus to delay the sale; and as the deposit-money required was only Rs. 500, he forfeited that sum, and was not to be found when the sale was to be completed; consequently, a fresh sale became necessary, which was fixed for the 13th of March, 1844. At this sale one Pritheepal Singh became the supposed purchaser at Rs. 47,000; but as no greater earnest than Rs. 500, was required (notwithstanding Barwise's requests to that effect), Pritheepal

Singh, who was also a creature of the [333] Appellant's like Sheopershad, could not be found to complete, and a third sale was fixed for the 15th of May, 1844 : on which occasion, one Pohip Singh another fictitious purchaser bought the Talooka at a lac of rupees, and who absconded in like manner when the completion of the purchase became necessary.

Barwise then requested that at any future sale an earnest of 15 per cent., according to section 2, Ben. Reg. XII. of 1796, should be required, but without any immediate effect, as the same course as on the previous sales was adopted, with the same result, on the 29th of July, 1844, the next day fixed for sale, when the estate was knocked down to Ram Pershad, who paid the deposit, Rs. 500 ; but he could not be found when the balance was required.

Two fresh days of sale were fixed for the 27th of September and the 8th of October, but the notices were in each case irregular ; and on the irregularities being pointed out by Barwise, the sale was ultimately fixed for the 15th of November, 1844. Before this last date the Sudder Board of Revenue passed an order requiring the purchaser to pay a deposit of 15 per cent. on the amount of the purchase-money, instead of the earnest being limited to Rs. 500, as before ; and that requisition was accordingly put in force at the sale (the fifth attempted sale by Barwise). After Barwise had bid Rs. 48,100, Nimkoo Singh, a low caste Kolee, having bid Rs. 48,500, contrived, by a trick upon the Collector, to get away without paying down the deposit ; the result of which was, a new sale became necessary, and it was ordered that on such sale, which was fixed for the 24th of December, 1844, the Collector should demand proof from the bidders of their trustworthiness and ability to purchase.

[334] In consequence of Barwise's determination to persist in the sale, the Appellant and Surrubject Singh so conducted themselves as to lead him to anticipate some attempt at violence on their part, and on the 14th of August, 1844, an order was issued upon his application for their arrest, for the purpose of their being held to bail. This order was, however, evaded, and, on the 15th of December in that year Barwise was murdered. The Appellant was arrested, but acquitted by the Nizamut Adawlut.

Barwise's executors then interfered, and after further delay, the Collector, on the 7th of June 1845, ordered a fresh notification of sale to be given, by which the sale was fixed for the 15th of July then next, and on that day the sale, which is the one complained of in this suit, was effected.

No fresh sanction of the Commissioner of the Benares division was obtained, that of the 16th June, 1843, not having been in any way modified or affected, it being considered sufficient for the purpose.

At this sale Hawes and Gibbons (Barwise's executors) first bid Rs. 48,000 ; upon which the artifices, which had been so effectual on former occasions to delay the sale were again resorted to by the Appellant, and one Hunooman Pershad, a labourer, and one of his dependents, who resided in Oude, out of the jurisdiction, made a bid of Rs. 49,000. Upon inquiry by the Collector, it appeared that he had no earnest money with him ; but he said that his servant was waiting with it. He admitted that he was in service, and said that he made the offer on the part of one Ram Dass, but had no power of attorney or other authority to produce from him. The Collector then proceeded to take other bids, and Shunkur Lall was [335] the next person who offered himself, and who professed to bid Rs. 50,000, on behalf of Sheo Lal, who also lived in Oude ; but Shunkur Lall had no power of attorney or guarantee of any kind, nor did he make any offer of the earnest-money, or appear in any way prepared with it. The Collector then made further inquiries of the first bidder, but his answers were unsatisfactory, and the Collector being of opinion that these biddings were, like the biddings on former sales, mere fraudulent contrivances to defeat the execution, concluded the sale with Hawes and Gibbons, at their bid of Rs. 48,000, which was the only bona fide one at the sale, and on the 21st of July, 1845, this sale was approved of by the Commissioner of the Benares division.

On the 30th of July, the Appellant presented a petition complaining of the sale ; but the only irregularity he alleged was the refusal of the Collector to accept the bids of Hunooman Pershad and Shunkur Lall.

The Talooka was afterwards, on the 12th of November, 1847, sold by Barwise's executors, to Rughobah Sing on behalf of his son, Ramnath, for Rs. 92,500, and by him subsequently sold to the Respondent, Kishanund Misr, who had been in possession for nine years, when the plaint was filed by the Appellant, in the Civil Court of Zillah Jounpore, against him by Rughobar Dyal Sing.

The plaint sought the reversal of the sale on the ground of irregularity. The plaint stated that the suit was brought to recover possession of the Talooka, by cancelment of the auction sale, on the ground of the irregularity and informality of the sale effected by the Collector in execution of the decree, [336] and for the ejection of the Defendants, the successors of the auction purchasers, whose possession rested on, as it was alleged, an illegal basis, and to recover Rs. 17,721. 1a. 1p., as mesne profits, calculated from the date of the expiration of the Government lease or farm, viz. from the 18th of September, 1853, inclusive. The plaint then stated the principal facts before set out and submitted to the Court the two general heads, on which it was contended that the Appellant was entitled to a decree to set aside the auction sale. These were, first, that the original process of execution of the decree and the order of the Civil Court, directing the auction sale in question of the Appellant's family estate was irregular; and secondly, that the Officers who respectively ordered and conducted the sale committed gross irregularities in effecting the same, and the plaint set out in detail these alleged irregularities.

The answers upheld the validity of the sale and objected to the suit for want of parties.

The principal Sudder Ameen (Moulvee Mohmmud Hubeebvolla Khan), by his judgment, pronounced on the 23rd of February, 1855, overruled the Defendants' objection to the regularity of the suit, and decreed in the Appellant's favour, ordering the cancelment of the auction sale and setting aside the deeds of sale to the Respondent.

Against this decision the Respondents appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, North West Provinces, and on the 10th of May, 1856, the Sudder Court, consisting of Messrs. Begbie, Harington, and Unwin, unanimously reversed the Zillah Court's decision. The Sudder Court by their judgment held that the sale was valid under the letter of sanction by the Revenue Com-[337]-missioner, and that though perhaps it might have been more regular, and more agreeable to established usage, if on the renewal for application for execution of the decree, a fresh application to the Commissioner had been made, under the provisions of cl. 4, Ben. Reg. VII. of 1825, but that it was quite clear, that the present Appellant had not sustained any injury by the alleged irregularity, nor had he urged any plea to that effect; and that such being the case, the Court could not admit that it afforded any sufficient ground for the annulment of the sale, and dismissed the Appellant's suit with costs.

The present appeal was brought from this decree, and was argued by the Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant, and Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. Field, for the Respondents.

On the part of the Appellant it was submitted that the sale was void by Ben. Reg. XX. of 1795, sec. 3, as the sanction of the Board of Revenue was not obtained; that the letter of sanction of the Commissioner of the 21st of July, 1843, relied upon by the Sudder Court was restricted in terms to the sale then proposed and specifically referred to, which took place on the 21st of August, 1843, and that being restricted and qualified, it did not legally authorize the Collector to issue notification for another sale to take place on the 15th of July, 1845, embracing other Mouzahs, which sale was directed in a summary suit for execution of the decree: and that such sale, therefore, ought to be declared void on the grounds, first, that the proceedings of the Principal Sudder Ameen, as well as [338] of the Collector which preceded, were irregular; and secondly, that the conduct of the Collector at the sale in refusing to receive biddings, except upon deposit, was contrary to usage in regard to auction sales made in satisfaction of decrees. Further that the estate was sold for an inadequate price. And lastly, that the delay for nine years to bring the suit for annulment of the sale was no legal bar to the suit under the Regulation of Limitation of suits.

For the Respondent it was contended, that the question of sale of the 15th of July, 1845, was not liable to reversal on any of the grounds urged by the Appellant, and that the onus was upon him to establish the alleged irregularities which he had failed to do; and, moreover, that the lapse of time from the Respondents' possession, and the institution of the suit was an answer to the claim for rescinding the auction sale.

Judgment was delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir John T. Coleridge (Dec. 9, 1862).—This is an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Agra, which reversed a decree of the Civil Court of Zillah Jounpore, in favour of the Appellant. The suit in which these decrees were made respectively on the 23rd of February, 1855, and the 10th of May, 1856, was brought by the Appellant to recover back possession of an estate, called the Talooka Bazaar Rajah, Pergunnah Gudwarree, which had been the property of his father, Rajah Surnam Singh, and which had been sold in execution of a decree obtained by one Petumber Mookerjee in May, 1830, in a suit first instituted by him in 1822 [339] for the recovery of a debt. One Barwise, in 1837, had become by purchase the holder of this decree; and the Respondents claimed by purchase for a valuable consideration, and through mesne conveyances, from his representatives, who had been purchasers at the sale held in execution of the decree. The claim in the present suit was rested not upon any supposed miscarriage in the determination of the original suit, nor any defect in the title of Barwise to the benefit of the decree, but on certain alleged informalities and defects in the course of executing that decree, and the sale under it.

In order to understand the questions now raised, a short statement of the material facts will be necessary.

It will be observed that the litigation commenced in 1822, and that the decree in favour of the original Plaintiff was obtained in 1830; seven years were then passed in fruitless attempts by him to carry it into effect; his hopes or his means becoming exhausted, he was induced, for a valuable consideration, to make over this decree to an Englishman of the name of Barwise, who, being in the service of the Government, it was supposed probably by both parties, might be more successful in defeating the various devices by which its execution had been up to that time prevented. It is immaterial to the decision of this case whether he purchased on too favourable terms, or succeeded in obtaining too great advantages. It may have been so—on that we pronounce no opinion. It was not, however, until the 6th of June, 1845, and after he had been murdered, as alleged, by the Appellant, that his representatives obtained the Order from the Zillah Court of Jounpore, on which the sale actually took place, the validity of which is questioned in the present appeal.

[340] We propose now to examine the objections to this sale, adverting only, as we proceed, to the previous circumstances, so far as may be necessary for the understanding and disposing of these objections. The order for this sale is dated June 6, 1845, and is as follows:—"This case was brought up this day. It was found from the report of the Moonshee of execution of decrees, that Rs. 48,522. 0a. 1p., the total estimated value of the claim, composed of Rs. 46,856 14a., entered in the report of the 22nd November, 1844, and Rs. 1,664. 11a. on account of present interest up to the 22nd of May, 1845, and 8 annas for costs, is quite correct. As it appears from the accounts to be right and proper that Talooka Bazaar Rajah, embracing sixty-three original and dependent villages, be sold to realize the amount above specified, it is therefore, ordered that a copy of this proceeding be sent to the Collector of the Zillah, to apprise him of the above-mentioned facts, in order that the said Collector, after the issue of the second notification, may put up to sale the aforesaid estate, the property of the Defendant the debtor, for the sum claimed as above, and afterwards inform this Court of the result."

It will be observed that this Order dealt directly with the Collector of the Zillah, and is silent as to the Board of Revenue. This, it is said, is in breach of the Regulations on this matter, then in force, of Regulation XX of 1795, which directs that, when any Court of Civil Judicature shall have occasion to sell lands in satisfaction of a decree, it shall transmit a copy thereof to the Board of Revenue, which is, with all practicable dispatch, to cause the lands to be disposed of at the Presidency, or in the District in which the lands are situated, as they may deem most advantageous to the proprietor. The objec-[341]-tion founded on the apparent non-compliance with this Regulation was taken, both in the Zillah and Sudder Courts, in this suit, and overruled by both—and, their Lordships think, quite properly. It appears that, when a former order for sale had been made by the same Court in 1843, this Regulation had been fully complied with; that the Commissioner had authorized the sale of the whole Talooka; that as many as four sales had taken place, ineffectual and nominal only because the best bidders on each occasion were men of straw, who had, no doubt, been put forward for the very purpose of rendering the decree abortive. It is said that the order directing these former sales must be considered as having been made in a different suit from that in which the order now in question was made, for that the proceedings had been taken off the file, and the lands to be sold and the sums to be recovered were different in the two orders. There is no foundation for either of these assertions. It would be contrary to general principles, and a senseless addition to all the vexations of delay in the course of procedure, to hold that, when, for any reason, satisfactory or not, the execution of a final decree in a suit fails, or is set aside, and the proceedings as regards that execution are taken off the file, the whole suit is discontinued thereby, and the further proceedings for the same purpose are to be considered as taken in a new suit. Nor is it true, in any material sense, that either the properties to be sold or the sums to be recovered were different; in both, the same whole Talooka, rendering to the Government the same jumma, was directed to be sold, and for the same principal sum; but the number of villages comprised in it, owing to some inaccuracy, was differently stated, and the total [342] sum was increased in the later order by adding the interest which had accrued, due in the interval between the two, with a few annas for the costs. The principal object of the Regulation in question was the security of the public revenue, as appears not merely from its own preamble, but by the modifications which were made in it by Regulation VII., of 1825, tit. ii.; and this object had been fully answered by the communication to the Commissioner in 1843, and the proceedings which were taken by him upon it. If this, therefore, had been a question raised between the original parties to the suit, and if the objection had been made promptly after the sale had taken place, their Lordships would still have been of opinion that it had received its proper answer in the Courts below; but it must never be forgotten that they are now called upon to give effect to it as against a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and, so far as appears, entirely without notice, in a suit commenced in July, 1854, the disputed sale having taken place in July, 1845. What safety could there be, except by the Statute of Limitations, for any man's title, where a judicial sale had taken place, if he were bound to satisfy himself of the decree-holder's compliance with every one of the many formalities prescribed by law for the conduct of it. This is a remark which their Lordships must bear in mind in considering the objection to which they now pass.

The next objection to be noticed is, the alleged want of due notification of the time and place of sale. At the time when this sale was to take place, this matter was regulated by Regulation XX., section 12, of 1795, which requires notices to be affixed one month before the day of sale in the Court Room of the Dewanny or Zillah, the Collector's office, in the principal town or village, and in the office of the Secretary of the Revenue. Now, if it be taken that the burden of proof in respect of these notices can be properly cast on the Respondent, it certainly does not appear to their Lordships that in respect of all of them it is clearly made out that they were duly given; but they are of opinion, that it cannot be so cast, considering how he claims, at what distance of time the objection is made, and the extreme difficulty, if not impossibility, of satisfactorily proving a fact of this nature under such circumstances as are before them. In this country it is in many cases required by Statute, that notices should be affixed on the walls or doors, of Courts, or in other specified places, and for certain specified times, in order to give jurisdiction to Magistrates to do certain acts which are speedily to follow. In such cases there is no injustice in calling upon the party who moves the Magistrates to exercise their statutory jurisdiction, to prove that these requirements have been complied with. But it would be monstrous to make the title to land in a purchaser depend, years after it has accrued, and possession has been enjoyed under it, on his proving the same affirmatively. In the nature of the thing all traces of the evidence may be expected, as to some of the particulars, to perish in a short time; in others, where the document ought in strictness to be filed, it is but too common for the Officer, whose duty it would be to file it, to be neglectful.

Their Lordships are of opinion, therefore, that the onus lay upon the Appellant, and that he has not discharged himself of it.

It was said, in regard of another objection, and [344] might be said in regard of this, that at the time in question he was in prison on the charge of murder; and that was so: but it is clear that he at least knew of the time fixed for the sale, and was able to apply to the Court, because he presented a petition on the 14th of July, 1845, to the Zillah Court for its postponement for two months, which was heard and rejected by the Sudder Ameen of that Court.

The remaining objection is to the manner in which the sale was conducted. It will be remembered that on several preceding occasions, when sales were attempted, the highest bidders had turned out to be unable, or unwilling, to complete them, and so they had been rendered illusory: the Collector, therefore, had been very properly cautioned to satisfy himself of the trustworthiness of a bidder, before he concluded the sale in his favour. On the present occasion, after the representatives of Mr. Barwise had bid a sum of Rs. 48,000, being a little below the amount of the decree, one Hunnooman Pershaud bid Rs. 49,000. The Collector asked if he was prepared with the deposit money; he was not. He was asked who and what he was: he said he was a servant, and was bidding for Ram Das, of Sultanpore. He was asked whether he held a Mookhtarnamah from Ram Das, and he said he did not. On this he was rejected as a bidder. Thereupon one Shunker Lall bid Rs. 50,000, and he was questioned as Hunnooman Pershaud had been. It does not appear whether he answered that he was prepared with the deposit or not, but he stated that he was bidding for one Sheo Lall, a Banker of Dostpoor. Like the former bidder, he had no Mookhtarnamah. The Collector rejected both their [345] biddings: and there being no other bidder, knocked the estate down to the representatives of Barwise for Rs. 48,000.

Both Narain Sing and these two persons, but not either Ram Das or Sheo Lall, petitioned the Court against this proceeding of the Collector. It was urged that a production of the deposit ought not to have been insisted on before the estate had been knocked down, and that the effect of the proceeding was to deter bidders, and so diminish the amount for which the estate was sold. Certainly the payment of the deposit could not be required before the acceptance of the bidding, and the knocking down of the estate; but the Collector was bound, in their Lordships' opinion, to satisfy himself reasonably that these persons were, what they professed to be, real bidders, and the course which he took for that purpose was perfectly justifiable; and so it was held in the Court below—their Lordships think quite correctly: they see not the least reason for believing that it was calculated to deter persons really wishing to buy from offering their biddings, or in any way to damp the sale. It might be unusual; but the circumstances were unusual; as practices had been suffered before in this case, which had made the sales under the Order of the Court mere mockeries, available only for the purpose of defeating the course of justice: the Collector, forewarned, was bound to take care that this sale should be a reality, which it could not be, unless care was taken to distinguish between real and sham biddings. The result shows that his conclusions were correct: if there were such persons as Ram Das or Sheo Lall, or if either of them had, however irregularly, deputed Hunnooman Pershaud or Shunker [346] Lall to bid for them, we may be quite certain that claims would have been made on their behalf by way of petition to the Court. It is said that the estate was sold for less than its value. It may have been; it was certainly sold, some time afterwards, at a great advance by the purchasers: but considering the character of the previous attempts to sell, and all the previous instances of the litigation, this is not to be wondered at. As a fact in itself, it is immaterial to the decision of the case: it is enough that the sale was a real one, conducted justly and regularly.

Their Lordships, in a judgment necessarily so long, have thought it right to take no notice of several matters, important in themselves, but not affecting their decision; they have now disposed of the various points relevant to that decision, and which were urged by the learned Counsel for the Appellant with their usual zeal and ability: but they cannot pass from this case without the expression of their surprise and deep regret, that such a case should have been possible under the system of jurisprudence prevailing in any country under the British dominion.

“ ——— *puget hæc opprobria nobis,
Et dici potuisse et non potuisse refelli.*”

The subject-matter of the original suit a debt, it should seem undisputed, or at least as to which, in substance, no serious dispute was possible, where the Plaintiff's difficulty had not been to establish his right to the judgment of the Court in which he sued, but to make that judgment available when obtained, though the funds were ample for the purpose. By fraud and chicanery, by every possible abuse of the forms and procedure of law, by force and violence, [347] even, it is to be greatly feared, to the shedding of blood, justice was evaded and defied for fifteen years, from 1830, when the decree was pronounced, to 1845, when the final sale took place. The original Plaintiff, wearied out with the long delay and expense, fain to sell the benefit of his decree: the unhappy man who had been substituted for him losing his life, while vainly striving to realize its fruits. And now, in 1862, their Lordships have been called on to dispose of a suit, in which it is sought to invalidate the whole proceeding as against a purchaser for value, the second in succession from the execution creditor, against whom, or the party from whom he immediately purchased, no fraud, no collusion, no knowledge of the supposed defects in the title, has been alleged. They have had to deal with a record of nearly three hundred pages in folio, setting out more than three hundred documents and depositions. Their Lordships do not intend hastily to cast censure on any individuals: the materials are not before them for that purpose, nor is it within their province to do so: but it is useful to point out that a system under which all this is possible loudly called for amendment, administered as it here has been, defeated the very object for which it was instituted.

They will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

[348] RAMASAWMY AIYAN and Others.—Appellants; VENKATA ACHARI and Others.—Respondents * [Feb. 2, 3, 4, 1863].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

Suit by the representatives of the Arya Brahmins, claiming in hereditary right, the Mirassi and exclusive privilege of administering Purohitam (religious rites and ceremonies) to seventeen classes of pilgrims who resort to the shrine of the great Pagoda and other Temples in the Island of Rameswaram in Madras, dismissed; the Plaintiffs failing to establish their right, either (1) by documentary proof of its origin, or (2) by proof of such long and uninterrupted usage as, in the absence of documentary proof, would suffice to establish a prescriptive right.

The Appellants were Arya Brahmins settled at Rameswaram, an Island in the district of the Presidency of Madras, and claimed to have the hereditary right of administering Purohitam, or religious rites, to seventeen classes of pilgrims who resort to the great Pagoda and other temples in that Island, and to the fees paid, or presents offered, by the pilgrims resorting to the shrine. The Respondents were members of a sect or body of Brahmins, known as the Parishai Bhattars, who also administered the Purohitam, and had done so for many years, and who claimed the right from long usage, and were in the receipt of the income derived from the fees paid by the pilgrims resorting to that [349] Island: with the exception of a small portion for the performance of certain inferior duties in the Pagoda, which the Appellants were, as it was alleged, on account of their origin alone competent to perform.

In the year 1849, the Appellants, twenty-seven in number, filed a plaint in the subordinate Court of Madura, against the Respondents, fifteen in number, to recover the rents alleged to be due to them, in respect of fees so received by the Respondents for six classes of pilgrims under a Swamubhogam, or annual rent deed, dated as far back as the year 1786, and for eleven other classes, seeking by the suit to be established in the enjoyment of all these rights. The plaint set forth the grounds of the claim, and the title under which the Plaintiffs claimed, and the loss incurred in connection with the Mirassi privilege of administering Purohitam to pilgrims, and prayed that the Arya Mahajanam should enjoy, without the interference of the Defendants (the Respondents), the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to eleven classes of pilgrims, capable, as alleged, of yielding an annual income of Rs. 1000, and which formed part of the Mirassi originally forcibly seized and then enjoyed by the Defendants: the plaint further prayed that the Defendants should continue to pay annually to the Arya Mahajanam, Brahmins of the Arya sect, and to the body of Gurukals, a community belonging to that sect, pons Rs. 100, or Rs. 126. 12a. 11p., being the amount of rent fixed on the Mirassi for administering Purohitam to the six classes of pilgrims, other than the eleven aforesaid, which were then in the enjoyment of the Defendants as therein detailed; and [350] that, in default of the Defendants so paying it, the Plaintiffs and others should enjoy without the interference of the Defendants, the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to such six classes, capable as alleged of yielding an annual income of Rs. 600. The plaint set forth, first, that from the time the Pagoda of Rameswaram came into existence, the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to all classes of pilgrims resorting to Rameswaram had belonged to the whole community of the Arya Brahmins. That while this privilege had been enjoyed by their ancestors, the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to the Siva Devijas and six other classes of pilgrims had been taken for Swamubhogam, or annual rent, by Sahasranama Dikshitar and Ullitars who were the ancestors of Ramanadha Aiyar and others officiating as Adhyena Bhattachars in the Pagoda of Rameswaram, from the ancestors of the Arya Mahajanam aforesaid, under a document passed one hundred and seventy-five years ago, stipulating an annual payment of pons 50. Secondly, that with regard to the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to the Tatwadi Brahmins, and nine other classes of pilgrims, besides the seven classes therein mentioned, it had been conferred a long time ago by the ancestors of the Arya Brahmins as Sridhana upon the community of the Gurukals. That while the Plaintiffs and Arya Mahajanam continued in the enjoyment of the income derived from the exercise of the Mirassi to the seven classes aforesaid, and also to the other pilgrims, about thirty years previous to the execution of the deed of rent thereafter referred to, Sasha Aiyar, Sonne Bhattan, Parvata Bhattan, Krishenaya Bhattan, Srinivassa Bhattan, and Giri [351] Bhattan (Tatwadi and Telugu Brahmins, who had removed from Manamadurai to Rameswaram, and were the ancestors of the Defendants), engaged to administer Purohitam to six out of the ten classes, namely, the Tatwadi Brahmins, the Tamil Brahmins and Telugu Brahmins of the Khon country, the Kanaris Brahmins, the Northern Brahmins, the Aradhya Brahmins, and the Telugu Brahmins; on condition of paying to the community of the Gurukals two out of ten per cent of the income derived therefrom. That this state of things continued for a few years, when a dispute arose between the Gurukals and Sesha Aiyar, in regard thereto. Thirdly, that both parties having laid the matter before the then Zemindar of Ramnad, that Zemindar convened a body of arbitrators, who decided that Sesha Aiyar should, in co-operation with the agents of the community of the Gurukals belonging to Arya Mahajanam, administer Purohitam to six classes of pilgrims, and that twenty per cent should, as before, be paid to the community of the Gurukals; that all the Tatwadi and Telugu Brahmins of Manamadurai had executed a "Parisha Tiriva Chit" (or deed of rent for administering Purohitam to pilgrims), in favour of the whole community of the Gurukals, belonging to Arya Mahajanam, and that the other five above mentioned had executed a document under date of the 9th Vayasi Parabhava, which passed one hundred and four years ago. Fourthly, that while that document remained in force, one Timmana Achari, the great-grandfather of one of the Defendants, who was a member of the Brahmins of Manamadurai, suppressed the incomes derived [352] from the Purohitam administered to six classes of pilgrims, without fairly accounting for them, notwithstanding that Raghanadha Gurukal and others, members of the community of the Gurukals, remonstrated against the performance of the Purohitam by them. That Timmana Achari executed an agreement in favour of Raghanadha Gurukal, and other members of the community of the Gurukals representing the Arya Mahajanam, under date the 1st Chitra-Chitrabhanu (11th April, 1822), to the effect that, instead of paying two out of ten, or twenty per cent, he should enjoy the incomes derived from the performance of Purohitam for the six classes of pilgrims, on condition of paying, on that account, an annual rent of pons 100, in default of which the community of the Gurukals themselves might resume and enjoy the performance of Purohitam for the aforesaid six classes. That such rent was paid to the community of Gurukals, up to the year 1825. Fifthly, that afterwards, the father of the first Defendant, and others, brought an action in the District Moonsiff's Court of Paramagoody, asserting, among other allegations, that they were the proprietors of the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to twenty-four classes of pilgrims, including also the six classes; that Annasami Vadhiyar and three others, having, in the year Parthiva (1826), administered Purohitam to Sengendi Parishie, one of the twenty-four classes of pilgrims, appropriated themselves the incomes derived therefrom. That thereupon Chinmasami Aiyar and another, members of the Arya Mahajanam, presented an objecting petition, which they substantiated, alleging to the effect, that [353] the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to all the classes of pilgrims, including the twenty-four classes, belonged to them, and Arya Mahajanam alone, and not at all to the Parishai Battawars—i.e., the Brahmins of Manamadurai; and that a decree was passed by the Moonsiff in that suit holding that the privileges aforesaid belonged to the present Plaintiffs and Arya Mahajanam, and they had the enjoyment accordingly. That this decree was confirmed in appeal, by the late Zillah Court, who observed that the Plaintiffs, in that suit—i.e., the father of the first Defendant in this suit, and others—were agents of Arya Mahajanam; and that no special appeal was preferred against such decree. Sixthly, that the Defendants, and other Parishai Battawars had, from the time of their ancestors, dwelt on the grounds belonging to the Pagoda of Rameswaram, and continued to pay an annual quit-rent of pons 60, together with 6 pons for charges. That in a deed of gift executed by Vijaya Raghanadha Setupati, a late Zemindar of Ramnad, in favour of the Pagoda at Rameswaram, it was provided that the pons 66 should be appropriated to "Sukravarakuttalai," or "Friday services," of the Pagoda; and that the ancestors of the Defendants paid likewise an annual tax of pons 24, for the festival of Gangalanadha Swami in the Pagoda. That this tax, together with the aforesaid pons 66, amounting in all to pons 90, was paid by the Parishai Battawars, to the Pagoda, up to the year 1825; but that afterwards, the payments having fallen into arrear for seven or eight years, the fact was brought before the late Principal Collector, Mr. Blackburn, who [354] sent for the Defendants and directed them to pay the money as usual. Seventhly, that the Defendants falsely represented that the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to twenty-five classes of pilgrims belonged to them; that seventeen out of them remained in their unmolested enjoyment; but that in regard to the remaining eight classes of pilgrims, there had been a dispute between them and Arya Mahajanam, and a delay in the payment of the aforesaid pons 90. That the Collector, supposing the representations of the Defendants to be true, without, as it was alleged, conducting a proper examination, passed a decision, under date the 25th of February, 1835, to the effect, that the Parishai Bhattars should enjoy the Purohitam of twenty-one classes, made up of four out of the aforesaid eight classes, and the seventeen classes above referred to; and, that with regard to the Purohitam of the other classes of pilgrims, it should be enjoyed by Arya Mahajanam, who, however, forthwith represented to the Collector, by means of an Arzi, that the decision was unjust in declaring that the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to all classes of pilgrims belonged to the Defendants, and that they did not agree to it. That while this inquiry was going on the Defendants, arrogating the right to the Purohitam, on the strength of the above decision of the Collector, and subsequent to an engagement entered into by one Ramalinga Aiyar, a resident of Rameswaram, under date the 12th Chitra Manmadha (23rd April, 1835), agreeing to pay a rent of pons 61 for the pilgrims of Karvatuand Reddi class to the Plaintiffs and other members of the Arya Ma-[355]-hajanam, who formed a part of the Parishai Battawars - fraudulently administered Purohitam to the aforesaid two classes of pilgrims, and appropriated to themselves the income derived therefrom. Eighthly, that six out of the aforesaid twenty-one classes pertained to the rent above referred to; and four were out of the seven classes taken by the Adhyena Bhattars for Swamubhogam rent. That the Purohitam Mirassi of these eleven classes, ought to be put into the possession of the Arya Mahajanam. Ninthly, that Perya Nayanar, Ramaswami Aiyans, and three other members of the Arya Mahajanam, had instituted a suit, No. 117 of 1835, on the file of the late Zillah Court, representing the history of their title, and praying for the recovery of Purohitam of the above-mentioned twenty-one classes of pilgrims, and the loss incurred in connection therewith; but that the Court dismissed the suit, observing, among other circumstances, that as it appeared upon the face of the plaint itself that there were others entitled to the Purohitam Mirassi, the suit ought to have been brought in conjunction with them; and that that decree was confirmed on appeal, No. 17 of 1840, preferred to the Provincial Court for the Southern Division. That as the original and appealed decrees aforesaid decided that certain other members of Arya Mahajanam should have joined in bringing the suit, No. 117, the Plaintiffs had not preferred a special appeal from the decree in the appeal suit No. 17, intending to bring an original action, inasmuch as the right of the Arya Mahajanam was confirmed in the year 1826, by certain original and appeal decrees, which had become final. Tenthly, [356] that with the fraudulent view of preventing the interference of the Arya Mahajanam and their people, with the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to the aforesaid twenty-one classes of pilgrims, the Defendants, owing to their influence with the Revenue officials, procured the issue of repeated, though unjust, orders, and consequently continued to enjoy the Mirassi forcibly. That since the year 1835, when the Adhyena Bhattars had been deprived of their enjoyment of the Mirassi of administering Purohitam to the aforesaid four classes, and the Arya Mahajanam of their right to the Purohitam of the aforesaid eleven classes of pilgrims, there had been a dispute about them ever since; and the plaint prayed for a decree, adjudging the Defendants (the Respondents) to pay Rs. 2916. 10a. 8p., the loss of income derivable from the exercise of Purohitam Mirassi to the six classes, for twenty-three years, from the year 1826 to 1848, at pons 100 per annum; and also Rs. 4400, the loss of income derivable from the other eleven classes of pilgrims from the year 1845 to 1848, at Rs. 100, for each class of pilgrims per annum, in all Rs. 7316. 10a. 8p., and for a declaration that the Purohitam Mirassi attaching to the above classes of pilgrims, yielding annually Rs. 1000, should be enjoyed by the Plaintiffs and other members of the Arya Mahajanam without the interference of the Defendants; that the Defendants might be directed regularly to pay to the Plaintiffs and other Arya Mahajanam, and the community of Gurukals, the fixed rent of Rs. 126. 12a. 11p. annually, otherwise that the Purohitam Mirassi of the above six classes of pilgrims, yielding annually Rs. 600, should [357] be enjoyed by the Plaintiffs and other members of the Arya Mahajanam and the community of Gurukals without the interference of the Defendants.

The Subordinate Judge of Madura, on the 12th of June, 1849, rejected this plaint, as inadmissible under sec. 10 of Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, being of opinion, that the same question had been decided by the Zillah Court, in the suit, No. 117, of 1835, referred to in the plaint, and confirmed on appeal, by the late Southern Provincial Court, in No. 17, of 1840.

The Appellants appealed to the Civil Judge of Madura from this decision, and that Judge, on the 7th of November, 1849, expressed a similar opinion.

The Appellants then appealed to the Sudder Court at Madras, and that Court by an Order, dated the 20th of November, 1851, after observing, that it appeared that the suit, No. 232 of 1826, was filed before the District Moonsiff of Paramagoody, for recovery of Rs. 126. 7a. 5p., as Priests' emoluments due from one out of the several classes of pilgrims frequenting Rameswaram; and that the Moonsiff decided that the right to this class belonged, not to the Plaintiffs, but to the Arya Brahmins; and that this decree was confirmed on appeal No. 183 of 1826, of the late Zillah Court of Madura; and that the suit No. 117 of 1835, of the late Zillah Court was brought by four of the Arya Brahmins, who asserted themselves to have right over all the twenty-four classes of pilgrims, but sued for emoluments only in respect of four; the sums sued for being Rs. 91. 11a. 3p. and Rs. 200, and that the Zillah Court went into the whole question of the Arya Brahmins' rights, and allowed them to have none; that this was confirmed on appeal by the Southern Provincial Court [358] in No. 17 of 1840; that the plaint in question was brought by twenty-seven of the Arya Brahmins, and was for Rs. 7316. 10a. 8p., a loss incurred by evasion of their rights; and also, to gain possession of the right over eleven classes of pilgrims, yielding Rs. 1100, annually, to confirm the Aryas generally in their rights, and to receive from Defendants annually Rs. 126. 12a. 11p. as rent for six classes held by them, or to recover possession of the said six classes, the total value of the suit being Rs. 9016. 10a. 8p.; that in the suit No. 117, the Zillah Court went beyond the matter brought under the litigation before them, and the decree of that Court could not be considered as disposing of the general claims of the Aryas. That it was admitted in the decree, that all the Aryas were not represented in the suit; neither did the suit, in its subject, or its valuation, comprehend the matter of all their asserted rights. And the Court finally declared that a suit to bring the question of these rights to an issue might yet be laid; and that no bar to the reception of the plaint existed, which the Court accordingly directed to be received; and finally ordered, that the plaint should have been admitted on the file.

The plaint was accordingly filed, and contained the same allegations as the plaint of 1849 (see ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 349).

The Respondents by their answer, denied that the Appellants, or the other Arya Mahajanam, had any right to the Purohitam Mirassi, claiming title to it themselves under a grant from Mavalivana Rajah, dated about 1000 years previously. The Respondents also relied upon the decree in the suit No. 117, of [359] 1835, as a bar to the Appellants' claim; but they did not specifically plead the Regulations of limitation of suits as a defence thereto.

The suit being at issue, the Judge of the Subordinate Court of Madura, on the 6th of May, 1853, directed that the following points should be proved by the Appellants: first, their hereditary and exclusive title and right, as well as that of the other Arya Brahmins, to perform the service as Prohithars or administerers of rites to the people of all classes frequenting Rameswaram as pilgrims, and their ancestors' enjoyment accordingly. Second, that ten classes were granted to the ancestors of the Plaintiffs, twenty-one to twenty-seven, as Gurukalman Saleyars, and that the Defendants' ancestors had since rented from them six classes as specified in the second paragraph of the plaint, engaging to pay them annually 2-10ths of the emoluments thereof, under a written agreement which had been acted under. Third, that under a document the first Defendant's great-grandfather subsequently obtained these same six classes from the above-named Gurukalman Saleyars upon an annual rent of 100 pons, and that such was actually paid up to 1825. Fourth, that the Defendants took illegal possession of eleven other classes as described in the eighth paragraph of the plaint, from the year 1835, and that with the exception of these and the four classes obtained by Adhyena Bhattars, all other classes were under the enjoyment of the Plaintiffs and the other Arya Brahmins; and the Defendants' enjoyment of emolument equivalent to the loss claimed. That the Respondents were also to prove, first, that the litigated right to perform the Purohitam ser-[360]-vice to all classes of people belonged to them and other Parishai Bhattars exclusively, and that the Arya Brahmins had no title thereto, and that such Brahmins settled at Rameswaram posterior to Thundaver. Second, that in accordance with their right, they paid originally an annual Porapad tax amounting to 160 pons to the Zemindar, as fixed by him, and that they, with his consent and authority, subsequently paid 100 pons annually to the Gurukalman Saleyars for their maintenance.

Both parties having entered into evidence the cause came on to be heard (together with an objecting petition which had been presented by four other persons claiming title to the emoluments arising from certain classes of pilgrims) before Mr. A. W. Phillips, the acting subordinate Judge. The decree of that Court, dated the 4th of November, 1854, after stating the evidence in the cause, was in these terms: "The proceedings and documents connected with this case are most voluminous, and much that is introduced is totally foreign to the subject, which, divested of all extraneous matter, consists, after all, of only two points to be decided on, first, as to whom the proprietary right of administering certain rites belongs. Secondly, whether the six classes were rented by the Plaintiffs' ancestors to those of the Defendants, or not. The Aryas (Plaintiffs) claim the hereditary right to the Mirassi of administering certain religious ceremonies to all classes of Hindoos resorting to the shrine at Rameswaram, and, in asserting that they have been unjustly deprived of their right, bring forward no less than twenty-four documents, of one sort or another, to prove the validity of their claim. [361] and to show that the privilege of administering the ceremonies to six of these classes was rented to the Defendant's ancestors by their own, on certain specified terms. The Defendants, on the other hand, deny in toto the hereditary right to be that of the Plaintiffs, and produce documents to back their assertions, declaring at the same time that they, and they only, are the proprietors of the whole, and as such, never could have rented the six classes as stated by their adversaries. The hereditary right of the Plaintiffs has been not only acknowledged, but proclaimed by the individual recognized by all classes of Hindoos (Brahmins included) as their head and High Priest. It has also been acknowledged by Brahmins, not parties to or interested in any way in this suit. The Zemindar of Ramnad, as appears from other documents, acknowledged the same, and directs the Aryas to perform the ceremonies with regard to himself. Several letters are also produced, showing that Maharajah Kistnabhojee Holkar has been in the regular habit of sending down the sacred water of the Ganges and other offerings, and, as the recognized and lawful Priests attached to the shrine in question, the Aryas were forbidden by the late Zillah Court of Ramnad to be taxed by the Zemindar. A separate document shows, that accordingly the Aryas did not pay the tax. Other proofs, too numerous to detail, are produced, all showing, in the plainest possible manner, that the right of the Plaintiffs was generally acknowledged. The Defendants, on their part, appear entirely to fail in establishing their claim by any satisfactory evidence whatever; indeed, the few documents they do produce tended rather to [362] strengthen the claims of their adversaries than their own. The Court feels no hesitation in declaring its opinion, that the Plaintiffs have fully and satisfactorily proved their proprietary right to the whole Mirassi. In support of the other question to be determined, namely, the renting of six classes from the Plaintiffs, and to show that they were rented to the Defendants' ancestors by those of the Plaintiffs, two documents were produced. The first of these is a deed executed by the Defendants' ancestors to the Gurukalman Saleyars (Aryas) about one hundred and twenty-four years ago, engaging to pay the Aryas twenty per cent. upon the income derived from six classes, which they, the Defendants' ancestors, rented of the Plaintiffs. The second is another document executed by the Defendants' ancestors some years subsequent, cancelling the former agreement, and engaging to pay in lieu of any per-centage on the receipts derived from the six classes (and which it appears led to dissensions) an annual fixed rent of 100 pons or Rs. 208. In return to these undeniable proofs, of not only the proprietorship of the Mirassi belonging to Plaintiffs, but of the six classes being rented to the Defendants' ancestors, the Defendants produce documents with the intention of proving that they are the owners of the Mirassi; but anything more crushing to their own case could not have been brought forward, as they plainly show that 100 pons were annually paid to the Gurukalman Saleyars, and tally precisely with what Plaintiffs asserted; and the attempt to show that it was paid by order of the Zemindar, and was a tax levied by him on the Mirassi, having entirely failed, the Court is of [363] opinion, that the second point also, as well as the first, is established in Plaintiffs' favour. The hereditary right of the Plaintiffs to the whole Mirassi right being established, and it having been shown to the Court's satisfaction that the six classes were rented to the Defendants' ancestors on certain terms, it decrees, that Defendants do continue to pay the stipulated rent from 1849, or deliver the six classes and all income derivable therefrom to the Plaintiffs as the rightful owners. It also decrees, that the Plaintiffs are entitled to the other eleven classes, and to all arrears of income as claimed from 1826 to 1848. All costs of suit to be borne by the Defendants."

The Respondents appealed from this decree to the Civil Court of Madura.

The appeal came on for hearing in the Civil Court of Madura on the 29th of June, 1857, when the Judge, Mr. C. E. Baynes, after stating the proceedings in the suit, observed that—"The Sudder Court having overruled the objections taken by the Court below to the entertainment of the suit, as involving a question already finally decided against the Plaintiffs (Respondents), the Civil Judge had only to point to the proceedings of that Court, under date the 20th of November, 1851, as precluding him from taking into consideration the Appellants' first objection"; and, after stating his dissatisfaction with the documents produced by the Appellants (the original Defendants) to which his attention was called by the second objection, and that he could not draw the same conclusive inferences as the Subordinate Judge had done: and that, with the whole subject, before him, on the appeal, he was of opinion, that the evidence adduced did [364] not warrant the original decree: he proceeded thus:—"The Aryas found on a grant by Stree Rama, which certainly is not proved: the Parishais on a grant by Mavalivana Rajah, which is equally destitute of proof. In short, there is nothing on which to rest a judgment, save the apparent and notorious facts of the case, undeniable by either party, namely, that there is a Holy shrine at Rameswaram, to which pilgrims resort. Aryas, Parishai Bhattars, and Gurukals have been worshipping at it, and dwelling in its vicinity from times not only beyond all memory, but all history. Both Aryas and Parishais have been officiating as Probitudus, or ministering guides to pilgrims, each, of late years at all events, claiming a monopoly, and saying the other had no right to do so. The Parishais, it appears, are said to have, out of their profits, come under engagement or order to pay a certain sum annually to the Gurukals: if so, and they fail, the parties entitled have their remedy: but for declaring that either the Aryas or Parishais have any exclusive right to act as Probitudus to all, or any of the pilgrim classes, there appears to be no evidence or ground whatever, or for awarding any damages to either party. The original decree is, therefore, reversed, and it is declared, that both Aryas and Parishai Bhattars have a clear prescriptive right, and are both competent to act as ministering guides, or Probitudus, to any pilgrims who may choose to employ them as such. This recognition of their common right, while it is all to which the evidence adduced on either side appears to entitle them, is all which in the opinion of the Civil Judge could be awarded [365] to them, without infringing on the rights and liberties of third parties, who have hitherto apparently received little consideration in this case, namely, the pilgrims. I doubt if the Court would have any power to parcel out the Hindoo community as a flock of sheep between these rival shearers: and it is evident that the establishment of a legal monopoly in either of them would consign the flock to their mercy. It is necessary that the right of choice should be reserved to the pilgrims. All any minister can ask the Court to pronounce is, that there is nothing to prevent the exercise of his functions towards any party willing to employ him. Under the circumstances of this case, the Civil Judge considers that it would be equitable that each party pay their own costs in the original suit and appeal."

The Appellants appealed from this decision to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, when the Respondents for the first time set up as a defence, that the suit was barred by the Regulations of Limitation.

The appeal came on to be heard by the Sudder Court on the 30th of October, 1858, when that Court, consisting of Messrs. Morehead, Hooper, and Strange, before proceeding on the merits of the case, called upon the Appellants' Pleaders to show cause, why the suit should not be at once dismissed as being barred by the Regulations of Limitation, on the ground, that the cause of action in the case of the arrears of payments on account of the six classes having arisen in 1826, from which time the plaint stated that no payments had been made, and in the case of the eleven classes in 1828, at which time the Plaintiffs in bring-[366]-ing a similar suit had acknowledged that the right of administering to these classes was vested in the Defendants.

After hearing the Pleaders on that point, the Court pronounced the following judgment:—"The Plaintiffs and Defendants are of rival sects, and severally claim the privilege of administering the Purohitam to the classes of pilgrims resorting to Rameswaram. These classes are represented to amount to twenty-five in number; but the suit is laid for compensation as regards seventeen only thereof. These rival sects have already been in repeated litigation; but it is only necessary to refer to the matter appearing in the last suit preceding the present one, which has arisen between them. This is the appeal No. 17 of 1840, on the file of the late Provincial Court for the Southern Division. From the decrees given in that suit, it appears, that the Collector undertook the adjustment of the dispute between these sects; that pending his decision, the pilgrims were left to select to which of the two they would resort; that this state of things subsisted for seven or eight years; that afterwards the Collector, on proceeding to arbitrate in the matter, found that the Plaintiffs' side conceded to the Defendants the privilege as respected seventeen of the classes of pilgrims, and that the contest between them related only to the remaining eight; and that he thereupon awarded four of these to the Plaintiffs' sect and four to the Defendants'. It further appears, that the above suit, No. 17 of 1840, which was instituted by certain of the Plaintiffs' sect, was in regard to the privilege over the four classes allotted [367] by the Collector to the Defendants' sect; and that the present suit is in regard to the seventeen classes excluded from the Collector's decision, as not then being in dispute. The Court thus find that the rights now contended for by the Plaintiffs have been in abeyance to their sect from about the year 1828, or from seven or eight years previous to the Collector's aforesaid decision; and that the claim is consequently barred by the Regulations of Limitation. The Plaintiff's Pleadings being unable to advance anything to relieve them from the above position, the Court resolved to dismiss this suit, and require the Plaintiffs to pay all the costs thereof."

The appeal was from this decree and was argued by Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Cracknell, for the Appellants, and the Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Millar, for the Respondents.

The Appellants in support of the appeal relied upon the following grounds,—

First, that the objection that the suit was barred by the Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, sec. 18, upon which the decree of the Sudder Court was alone founded, was not open to the Respondents, the same not having been pleaded by them, nor raised in any manner until the appeal to that Court.

Second, that, as to the Appellants' claim to an annual rent of Rs. 126. 12a. 11p. for the six classes mentioned in the proceedings, the Respondents were not at liberty to raise objections founded upon any [368] Regulation or rule as to limitation of actions, they being in the position of tenants in possession, under the Appellants as landlords, or owners.

Third, that, even if any such defence were open to the Respondents, there was no Regulation, or rule of limitation of actions or suits, applicable to the case, so as to bar the Appellant's right to maintain the suit.

Fourth, that the decision of the Sudder Court was inconsistent with and opposed to the decision of that Court on the 20th November, 1851, in directing that the Appellants' plaint should be received and prosecuted.

Fifth, that, upon the merits of the case, the Appellants' claim was fully substantiated by the evidence in the cause, and was not barred or affected by the decrees made in the suit No. 117 of 1835, relied upon by the Respondents; that suit being between different parties and for a different subject-matter, the decision in it, so far as it affected the matters in question in the present suit, being extrajudicial and ineffective to bind the Appellants.

Sixth, that the decision of the Judge of the Civil Court of Madura was founded upon a mistaken construction and a misconception of the effect of the documentary evidence, and was otherwise contrary to law, and to the usage of many ages, which had the effect and force of law.

Lastly, that the Judge of the Civil Court of Madura, had omitted to decide upon the Appellants' claim to the arrears and future payments of the annual sum of pons 100, or Rs. 126. 12a. 11p., claimed as or in the nature of rent from the Respondents.

[369] The Respondents contended that the decree appealed from was right, by reason—

First, that the Appellants' suit was barred by the law of limitation.

Secondly, that the Appellants' suit was barred by the decrees made in the original suit, No. 117, of 1835, and upon appeal.

Thirdly, that even if the Appellants' suit was not barred by those decrees, yet that the decrees were decisions upon the merits made, in pari materiâ, and ought to be followed, and

Lastly, that the Appellants upon their own admissions, and upon the evidence in the suit, had not made or proved any case to the exclusive privileges claimed, upon which a decree could be made in their favour.

Judgment was reserved, and now delivered by

The Right Hon. The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (April 27, 1863). The subject of litigation in this case is the right of administering what is called "Purohitam" to seventeen classes or castes of the numerous pilgrims who resort to the great Pagoda and other temples in the Island of Ramaswaram.

The Appellants, the Plaintiffs in this suit, sue, and the Respondents are sued, as representatives of the bodies to which they respectively belong. Whilst, however, the Respondents are all members of a homogeneous class, described indifferently as Tadvadi and Telugu Brahmins, or as Parishai Bhattars, resident in and about Ramaswaram: the Appellants are some of them Arya Brahmins, and other Gurukals: the differences between these two latter classes, their [370] rights and privileges, being some of the matters involved in the question at issue in this suit.

The case put forward by the Appellants is shortly this: they assert that ever since the first foundation of the Pagoda, an event which they ascribed to a very remote age, the Arya Brahmins possessed the privilege, and that an exclusive privilege, of administering Purohitam to all classes of pilgrims resorting to Ramaswaram. They treat, however, this privilege as alienable, or at least capable of delegation: and state that by an instrument bearing a date, which it is now agreed corresponds with A.D. 1765, the Arya Brahmins have, in consideration of an annual payment of 50 pons, transferred to a community called the Adhyena Bhattars, the privilege of administering Purohitam to seven specified classes of pilgrims: and in some way or another, and at some uncertain but distant date, have conferred the same privilege over ten other classes of pilgrims upon the community of the Gurukals. They further state, that the Gurukals again transferred the privilege as to six of those ten classes to the body represented by the Respondents, which it will be convenient to distinguish as Parishai Bhattars, on the condition that the latter would account to them for twenty per cent. of the emoluments derived from the exercise of the right: that a dispute having arisen between these two last named bodies, an arbitration took place A.D. 1726, which resulted in the execution of an instrument, and that difficulties having subsequently occurred in carrying that arrangement into effect, the payment of twenty per cent. on the collections was commuted for a fixed annuity of 100 pons, which, by an agree-[371]-ment, dated the 11th April, 1822, called a deed of rent of pilgrims, dated the 9th Vyasi Parabhava (19th May, 1786), executed by the ancestors of the Defendants to the community of Gurukals, in which they agreed to pay two pons out of every ten pons realized by them out of six classes of pilgrims, the Parishai Bhattars, some time about A.D. 1762, agreed to pay, and did in fact pay up to the year 1825, to the Gurukals. The Appellants' plaint, after stating these facts, notices the proceedings in a suit, No. 232 of 1826, in the Moonsiff's Court, the effect of which their Lordships will consider when they come to deal with the evidence. It also states the effect of a copper-plate grant passed by the late Zemindar of Ramnad in 1794, by which, in A.D. 1714, the then Zemindar of Ramnad granted certain dues payable to him by the Parishai Bhattars, and amounting to 90 pons, to a particular goddess in the Pagoda on account of the Friday services. It also states some proceedings before the Collector in 1835, when that officer endeavoured to compose the strife which had long existed between these rival sects of Brahmins, by an order which, as appears from the decision of the Collector itself, affirmed the rights of the Parishai Bhattars, to administer Purohitam to twenty-one classes of pilgrims, subject to the payment into the Pagoda of 190 pons annually: being the 90 pons for the Friday services, and the 100 pons payable to the Gurukals. This order assumed that the right of the Parishai Bhattars as to seventeen of their classes was not in dispute, and it left either party, if dissatisfied with it, to bring a civil suit. The plaint then shortly notices the proceedings in a [372] suit of 1835, which was brought by some of the Arya Brahmins against some of the Parishai Bhattars in respect of two of the classes comprised in the Collector's order, and was dismissed by a decree of the Zillah Judge, dated the 27th of June, 1840; a decree confirmed on appeal by the Provincial Court on the 28th of December, 1841. It then explains that the claim in the present suit is limited to seventeen of the twenty-one classes comprised in the Collector's order, because the remaining four belong to the Adhyena Bhattars under the deed of 1695; and further, that whilst the claim as to eleven of the seventeen classes is general, as to the remaining six, which were the subject to the instruments of 1726 and 1762, it is limited to the enforcement of the rights of the Gurukals under the latest of these documents. The particular relief prayed, is a decree for the payment of Rs. 2916. 10a. Sp., being the arrears for twenty-three years of the annuity of 100 pons payable to the Gurukals in respect of the six classes; of Rs. 4400, by way of damages incurred in respect of the other eleven classes; for a declaration that the Purohitam Mirassi of the eleven classes is henceforth to be enjoyed by the Arya Brahmins, without the interference of the Parishai Bhattars; and for an order that the Parishai Bhattars do regularly pay the 100 pons to the Appellants and the other Ayras, and the Gurukals, or otherwise that the Mirassi as to these classes also is to be enjoyed by the Appellants and other members of the Arya Mahajanum, and the community of the Gurukals, without the interference of the Parishai Bhattars.

The case set up by the Respondents in opposition [373] to that of the Appellants is, that their ancestors were established in the place or neighbourhood, and invested with the privilege of administering Purohitam to pilgrims resorting to Ramaswaram, by a certain Rajah, about 1000 years ago; that they afterwards from generation to generation enjoyed this privilege, and the emoluments resulting from its exercise, and so acquired the title of Parishai Bhattars; that the Zemindars of Ramnad imposed an annual tax upon them of 160 pons payable out of their receipts, which they continued to pay until the time of one Vijaya Raghunadha, who granted 100 out of the 160 pons to the community of the Gurukals on their complaint of having no income in the Pagoda, and afterwards granted the remaining 60, with some other dues payable by the Parishai Bhattars (making 90 pons in all), for the Friday services of the Pagoda.

They treat the latter grant as made by the copper-plate deed of 1714; but do not show in what precise form or by what instrument the first was made; and assert that after 1714, the whole of the 190 pons was paid into the Pagoda. They state that in 1827, there was an attempt to settle the disputes between their community and that of the Arya Brahmins by a native Punchayet (the failure of which is much to be regretted); that afterwards, in the course of an inquiry before the Sub-Collector, the Ayras admitted that, in respect of seventeen classes, there was no dispute as to right of the Parishai Bhattars, and that the Collector's order of 1835 was made on that admission. They further insist strongly upon the decrees in the suit of 1835 as a bar to the present suit, which they also contend is barred by the Regulation of Limitation.

[374] The issues settled in this suit (see ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 359) threw upon the Appellants the burden of proving, first, the hereditary and exclusive right of the Arya Brahmins to administer Purohitam to all classes of people frequenting Ramaswaram as pilgrims, and their ancestors' enjoyment accordingly; secondly, the grant, as alleged, of the ten classes to the Gurukals, and that the Parishai Bhattars had since rented from the Gurukals six of the ten classes, undertaking to pay them annually two-tenths of the emoluments under a written document which had been acted upon; thirdly, that, under another document, this liability had been commuted for an annual payment of 100 pons, and that the latter had been paid up to 1825; and, fourthly, that the Defendants had taken illegal possession of the eleven other classes, and that with the exception of these and the classes held by the Adhyena Bhattars all other classes were enjoyed by the Arya Brahmins. The issues which the Respondents were called upon to prove were, first, the alleged right of the Parishai Bhattars to perform Purohitam to all classes, that the Arya Brahmins had no title thereto, and had come to Ramaswaram since a particular date; second, that they had originally paid an annual tax of 100 pons to the Zemindar, and subsequently, with his consent, paid the 100 pons annually to the Gurukals for their maintenance.

The suit was first heard by the Judge of the Subordinate Court of Madura, who, on the 4th of November, 1854, made a decree in favour of the Appellants. From this there was an appeal to the Civil Court of Madura, and the Judge of that Court on [375] the 29th of June, 1857, reversed the decree below, and dismissed the suit on the ground that the Appellants had failed to prove the conclusive right which they claimed; but directed each party to pay their own costs. A special appeal was then preferred to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras. That Court on the 30th of October, 1858, dismissed the Appellants' suit with costs, on the ground that their claim was barred by the Regulation of Limitation, the only question which it allowed to be argued before it.

The present appeal is general. It has been argued before this Committee, both upon the merits of the case, and also upon the question whether the suit is effectually barred, either by the decrees in the former suit of 1835, or by lapse of time under the Regulation of Limitation.

Their Lordships propose, in the first instance, to deal with the merits of the case.

The first observation that arises is, that the existence or non-existence of the original and exclusive right to administer Purohitam to all classes of pilgrims, which is claimed by the Arya Brahmins, is an issue which goes to the whole case. It is true that that part of the claim which consists of the arrears of the annual payment of 100 pons, under the instrument of 1762, is founded upon contract. But the contract is one between the Parishai Brahmins and the Gurukals, and it is difficult to see how the Appellants, suing on behalf of the community of Arya Brahmins, can establish any title to relief in respect of this part of the case, unless they prove that the title of the Gurukals to these six classes was [376] derived, as alleged in the plaint, from the earlier and original title of the Aryas, and was so held by the Gurukals that the subsequent disposition of these classes must be taken to have been made for the benefit of the Arya community, as well as for that of the Gurukals.

What, then, are the proofs adduced in support of this first and principal issue?

The earliest in date consists of extracts from one of the Puranas. These, like the statements in the pleadings of the Appellants' case, carry us far beyond the bounds of legal or historical evidence. But it is argued, and fairly and properly argued, that these ancient books may legitimately be used as evidence that a certain state of facts, or a certain state of opinion, existed at the date of their compilation. That date is sufficiently uncertain; for we are not told when this particular Purana is supposed to have been written; and it appears from the writings of eminent Orientalists, that the period during which the eighteen recognized Puranas were composed is a very wide one, extending probably from the eighth to the sixteenth century.

Evidence of the Appellants' right, dating even from the latest of these epochs, would of course be most valuable. Their Lordships, however, fail to find in the extracts before them satisfactory proof that at the time when this Purana was compiled (whenever that may have been), the Arya Brahmins were in the enjoyment of the peculiar and exclusive privilege which is now claimed by their descendants.

There are passages which show that a community known as Arya Brahmins then existed at Ramaswaram. [377] and embody the legends concerning the miraculous origin of their ancestors, and their migration, at the summons of Rama, to the southern coast, from their native seat in Oudh. Other passages undoubtedly recommend in strong terms the ministrations of the Arya Brahmins, and imply that the full spiritual benefits of a pilgrimage are not to be obtained without them. But these do not lead with any certainty to the conclusion that even at that distant period all the pilgrims to Ramaswaram in fact resorted to the Aryas for Purohitam, or were under a positive and well-recognized obligation to do so. The very mode in which the peculiar efficacy of the ministrations of the Aryas is pressed leads to the inference that even then there was some variety of practice and opinion in this matter. Part of the Purana cited in these proceedings is in the shape of a dialogue, wherein one of the interlocutors begins by expressing his doubts whether Puja should be offered through the instrumentality of the Aryas, doubts which are of course ultimately removed. Taking the authority of these texts at the highest—and it must be remembered that there is little or no evidence as to their authority—their Lordships cannot find that they do more than enjoin upon pilgrims who wish to have the fullest spiritual benefit of their pilgrimage, the duty and necessity of resorting to the Aryas for their offices. They do not show that the duty was universally recognized as imperative, or that the enjoyment of the privilege, as it then existed, was exclusive.

Again, the value of the texts, such as it is, as evidence in support of the Appellants' title, is, in their Lordships' opinion, much diminished by the consideration that the privilege now claimed is admitted to be capable of alienation or delegation. They would be of far more weight if the case made were that by positive ordinance or by traditionary usage the privilege of administering certain religious rites had become vested in a particular class of priests, so that in the contemplation of all faithful Hindoos the efficacy of the rite must for all time depend on the Status or character of the ministrant. When the principle of alienation or delegation is admitted, texts to the effect that the efficacy of the rite depends on the character of the ministering priest necessarily lose their force.

Moreover, this quality of the privilege must greatly increase the difficulty of proving its continued enjoyment, supposing that it ever existed. Functions inseparably annexed by the authority of sacred books to a particular order of men will be recognized, preserved, and perpetuated by the religious sentiment of succeeding generations. But the privilege of exercising these functions, when alienable for money, ceases to be the subject of religious sentiment, and becomes a mere proprietary right; and every long-continued enjoyment of the privilege by others is of course capable of being ascribed to a presumed grant or alienation of which the direct evidence is lost.

That the present claim of the Appellants is not supported by any general religious feeling or conviction on the part of the Hindoos, whether founded on the texts of the Puranas or independent of them, may be inferred from the very nature of the disputes which have continued for so many years. It is clear [379] that during that long period there has been great diversity of practice and opinion amongst those who resort to the Pagoda; that out of the vast concourse of pilgrims from all parts of the Deccan, if not of India, some have sought for Purohitam at the hands of the Aryas, others at the hands of the Parishai Bhattars, others, again, at the hands of the Adhyena Bhattars; probably as they have been moved by considerations of race, language, district, or caste. But we have more particular evidence upon this point in the Sreemokum of Sunkar Acharyar which was produced in evidence in the suit of 1835, and is referred to in the pleadings of this suit. That document was in the nature of a certificate from a person described as the High Priest of all the Hindoos of the south of India, and was strongly adverse to the claim of the Aryas. Mr. Elliot, who as Judge of First Instance, decided the suit of 1835, felt it to be of sufficient weight to relieve him from the necessity of pursuing the inquiries which he had directed through Pundits touching the authority of the texts from the Puranas. The Appellants themselves, in their pleadings, seem to admit the general authority of Sunkar Acharyar, but endeavour to take off the effect of his certificate by telling a not very credible story of his having given it when in a fit of irritation against the Aryas. They have also produced, by way of answer to it, Exhibits, consisting of Letters Patent from Sringeri Sankara Acharyar to his disciples. It is sufficient, on this part of the case, to observe that the effect of these conflicting documents is at most to leave the question in doubt, and that the Appellants cannot adduce, in support [380] of this claim, anything like a clear concurrence of opinion upon the part of those who may be supposed to be at the present time authoritative expounders of the ceremonial law and usages of the Hindoo religion.

We now proceed to consider the effect of the other documentary evidence.

The documents which purport to be the earliest in date, except the Puranas, are the deed said to have been executed to the Aryas in A.D. 1675 by the Adhyena Bhattars; the copper-plate deed produced by the Respondents, dated 1714; the deed said to have been executed by some on behalf of all the Parishai Bhattars to the Gurukals in 1726; and the subsequent agreement between the various parties, which purports to have been executed in 1762.

The first of these can at most prove that the Adhyena Bhattars, who are not parties to this suit, claim under a deed, purporting to be of considerable antiquity, the right of administering Purohitam to seven classes of pilgrims, other than the classes which are the subject of this litigation, under a title derived from the Aryas. The Adhyena Bhattars are said to have been since dispossessed of four of these seven classes by the Parishai Bhattars. But whatever may be the merits of that dispute, they are not in question in this suit. This deed can prove nothing here except that in 1675, the Aryas claimed the right of disposing of the privilege as to these particular classes of pilgrims, and that the Adhyena Bhattars then admitted their title.

The effect of the deeds of 1726 and 1762 (if any) upon the issue which we are now considering, viz., the [381] original and exclusive right of the Arya Brahmins to administer Purohitam, is limited to the six classes of pilgrims which are the subject of these instruments. They do not touch the eleven other classes that are in question in this suit.

Their genuineness is questioned by the Respondents, who give an account of the origin of the payment of 100 pons that is inconsistent with them. It has been argued that suspicion is cast upon them by the circumstance that no mention is made of them in the proceedings in the suit between the Gurukals and the Aryas in 1807, although the Parishai Bhattars are there stated to possess the privilege of administering Purohitam to these six classes, and to be subject to the duty of paying 100 pons annually to the Gurukals, and that nothing was heard of them until the suit of 1826. It has been further argued that there is no proof of the custody whence they came, or other evidence to support them. Notwithstanding these arguments, their Lordships are disposed to deal with the case as if both these deeds, as well as the copper-plate deed of 1714, were genuine. They think the two former may well stand with the latter.

The copper-plate deed is, upon the face of it, nothing but the grant of certain subjects in favour of the goddess named in the heading of it, "on account of the Friday services." The annual payment of the Parishai Bhattars on this account appears on the whole evidence to be limited to 90 pons. This instrument, therefore, proves nothing as to the annual payment of 100 pons to the Gurukals, or its origin. It undoubtedly proves that in A.D. 1714, [382] the body which the Respondents represent was known as "Parishai Bhattars," a title which implies some connection with pilgrims, and that, as such, they carried on a business which may reasonably be inferred to have been the administration of Purohitam to some classes of pilgrims. And even if it be assumed that those classes of pilgrims included the six which are specified in the deeds of 1726 and 1762, that hypothesis is not necessarily inconsistent with these deeds, for the earlier deed does not purport to be the original grant of these classes, or to show how the administration of Purohitam to them by the Parishai Bhattars began. It recites the existence of a dispute between the Parishai Bhattars and the Gurukals touching the administration of Purohitam (a dispute which may have been of long standing), an appeal to the Zemindar, a reference to arbitration, and an award which, whilst it left the administration of the rite to the six classes with the Parishai Bhattars, imposed upon them the duty of paying 20 per cent. on their receipts to the Gurukals. The two deeds, 1726 and 1762, therefore, are not inconsistent with the copper-plate deed, which the Respondents may be taken to have proved, though they are inconsistent with their allegations touching the origin of the payment of 100 pons, which they have failed to prove. From the three documents taken together it follows, that before the year 1726, and possibly before 1714, the Parishai Bhattars were in the exercise of the functions involved in the administration of Purohitam to some classes of pilgrims, including, or at least extending to, the six classes which were the [383] subject of the agreement of 1726; but the material question with reference to the issue now under consideration is to what extent that arrangement with the Gurukals, and the description of the Gurukals in the two deeds as "forming the Arya Mahajanum," or "a part of the Arya Mahajanum," or "composed of the Arya Mahajanum," involve any admission or proof of the general title set up by the Appellants.

The answer to this question will be best supplied by a correct definition of the relation in which the Gurukals stood to the Arya Brahmins. Their Lordships must reject the statement upon this point which is contained in the fourth paragraph of the appeal petition, as inconsistent with others made by the Appellants in certain stages of the proceedings, and with the evidence in the cause. It was, in fact, almost given up by Mr. Rolt in his reply, and treated as a mere argument of the Appellants' Pleaders in answer to an objection taken by the Judge in the Court below.

The most credible account of this Gurukal community is probably to be found in the proceedings in the suit of 1807 (the piece of evidence that is next in order of date), since it was given by the Gurukals themselves when engaged in litigation with the Arya Brahmins, and was then admitted by their opponents to be substantially correct. From that it would appear that the Gurukals were Marattah Brahmins invested with the office of performing the puja, or worship, in the interior of the Temples; that they were appointed by the Aryas, and were in the habit of marrying the daughters of Aryas; that the office of Gurukal was not hereditary, but [384] that on the death of any one of them another Marattah Brahmin was appointed in his place; that in 1807, the community of Gurukals were in the receipt of the 100 pons per annum from the Parishai Bhattars, and of fees payable in respect of other classes of pilgrims, by whomsoever the rite of Purohitam was administered; that the net emoluments of this community were divided amongst the members of it, and each man's share again apportioned between him and the particular Arya whose daughter he might have married. The two communities were, therefore, distinct bodies, different in race; and this very suit of 1807, shows that they might have different and conflicting interest. If this be so, the description of the Gurukals as "composing," or "composed of," or "forming part of the Arya Mahajanum," must be inaccurate, unless these words imply a body in which the two communities, though distinct for some, may coalesce for other purposes. Such an hypothesis is not inconsistent with the literal meaning of the words as it may be gathered from "Wilson's Dictionary."

Again, in this suit of 1807, the Gurukals seem to have claimed the right of administering Purohitam to the six and certain other classes of pilgrims as a prescriptive right, without admitting any earlier title in the Aryas. The Aryas, in their answer, seem to set up a joint interest in the emoluments, and speak of a compromise and arrangement effected by a deed, bearing a date which would correspond with 1745, of which there is no proof. Therefore the case made on either side in the suit of 1807 seems to be hardly consistent with that made in the present suit as to the derivation of [385] the Gurukals' title from that of the Aryas. And upon this part of the case it appears to their Lordships that it would be unsafe to infer from the deeds of 1726 and 1762, or from any evidence that has yet been considered, either that the Aryas have a common interest with the Gurukals in the annual payment of 100 pons, or that such title as the Gurukals may have had in the six classes of pilgrims before the arrangement of 1726 was necessarily derived from the original and exclusive title to all classes of pilgrims which is set up by the Aryas. This view of the case is in some degree confirmed by what is called the "Attachi." That paper purports to be a representation made in March, 1822, when the Pagoda was under the management of the Government officers, by some of the Appellants, to the effect, that the Parishai Bhattars have allowed the payment of 90 pons and 100 pons to fall into arrear. It treats the whole money as payable to the Pagoda, and therefore, in the existing circumstances, to the Circar or Government, but describes the 100 pons as the masadanum for the Sabhayar or community of Gurukals.

The rest of the documentary evidence may be reduced to three heads: the proceedings in the Moonsiff's Court in 1826; the proceedings which resulted in the Collector's Order of 1835; and the proceedings in the suit of 1835.

The first suit was brought by some Parishai Bhattars against some Aryas, and it is said to have been collusive. The Plaintiffs in it asserted the title of their body to administer Purohitam to twenty-four classes of pilgrims, admitting the duty of paying annually 190 pons to the Pagoda and the community [386] of Gurukals. But the immediate subject of the suit was the alleged invasion of this right as to a class called "Sangita," which is one of those that were afterwards awarded by the Collector to the Aryas. There is no question about that class in this suit. Other Arya Brahmins intervened by petition, and set up their general title in the Moonsiff's Court. The Moonsiff made a decree against a Defendant who had admitted (it is said collusively) the Plaintiff's claim, and dismissed the suit as against the other Defendants. He also intimated an opinion that the suit, if properly framed, should have been brought against the Arya Mahajanum, which appeared to have been in the enjoyment of the Purohitam of the Sangita class. This judgment has been treated as a decision in favour of the Arya Brahmins, but it cannot be taken for more than an expression of opinion that they might have a good title as to the class of which they appeared to be in possession.

The chief importance of the proceedings which ended in the Collector's order consists in the admission supposed to have been made before Mr. Paris, a subordinate Collector, in the course of a local inquiry made by him in 1829. It is contained in an attested copy of a Mahratta document drawn out in 1827. It is referred to, though it is not very accurately described, by the Collector, (in his decision of the 21st of February, 1835,) and is the basis of his order. It was produced in the suit of 1835, and was proved to the satisfaction of Mr. Elliot, the Judge. He says of it in his judgment, "The Seristadar, it appears, wrote down in the presence of the Sub-Collector of Madura, from the mouths of the Plaintiffs, that they had no dispute respecting seventeen of [387] the twenty-five castes, but only for the remaining eight." Mr. Rolt argued strongly upon the improbability of the Aryas making such an admission so soon after the decision in the Moonsiff's Court. It does not, however, cover this Sangita class, which alone was the subject of the suit before the Moonsiff. And the improbability, such as it is, seems to their Lordships to be outweighed by the consideration that two officers with local experience have, whilst the facts were still recent, treated the document as genuine, and acted upon it. It is, therefore, difficult to suppose that the admission was not made by some at least of the Arya community, and it covers fifteen out of the seventeen classes that are the subject of this suit.

The decision of the Collector was almost immediately followed by the suit of 1835. The original Plaintiffs in this were four only of the Arya Brahmins. Two of them having died, twenty more members of the community intervened by petition, and seem to have adopted and prosecuted the suit. Its object was limited to the enforcement of the alleged right of the Arya Brahmins as to two only of the classes which are the subject of this suit; but the original title of the community was stated in terms as wide as those in which it is now stated, and was distinctly put in issue. It was, moreover, supported by much the same evidence as that which has been adduced in this suit. The decision, however, of the Zillah Judge, confirmed on appeal by the Provincial Court, was that the title was not made out, and the suit was accordingly dismissed.

Their Lordships may dismiss the oral testimony with the observation that it is almost necessarily [388] inconclusive. The question is one in which the Hindoo community has for many years been divided. Each witness, as a matter of course, deposes according to the practice, opinions, or traditions of his own family. Nor will proof of acts done even by so considerable a personage as Holkar do more than prove the practice or opinion of a particular family or individual.

Upon the whole it is their Lordships' opinion that the evidence, though it may establish that the Arya community has existed as part, and a principal part, of the Hierarchy of this Pagoda and its dependencies from a period of remote antiquity, and that the Appellants may be taken to be the actual representatives of that community, fails to show, either by documentary proof of its origin, or by such proof of long and uninterrupted usage as in the absence of a documentary title will suffice to establish a prescriptive right, the existence at any time of the original and exclusive privilege which the Appellants have made the foundation of their title. It also fails to show when and how, if the right ever existed, its enjoyment was first interrupted, and, consequently, leaves it uncertain, whether the interruption was caused by an invasion for which there is now a remedy, or by an actual or presumable act of alienation. It is not proved that the Appellants' community was at any particular time in the actual enjoyment of the privilege of administering Purohitam to eleven out of the seventeen classes which are the subject of this suit; whilst there is evidence that the Parishai Bhattars for some time anterior to 1835 were in the undisputed enjoyment of this privilege as to nine of these classes, and exercised it, [389] though subject to dispute, as to the remaining two. Nor is it inconsistent with the evidence in the cause to suppose that this state of things may have existed in or before the year 1714. And if the evidence as to the remaining six classes shows that the Parishai Bhattars' undisputed enjoyment of the privilege as to these six classes for nearly one hundred and fifty years has been subject to the payment of the 100 pons, under an arrangement which implies an acknowledgment of an earlier title in the Gurukals, it fails, as their Lordships have already observed, to establish either that the Aryas have a common interest with the Gurukals in this annual payment, or that the title of the Gurukals to these classes was necessarily derived from the still earlier and more general title of the Aryas, which the Appellants assert.

The Appellants, therefore, on all points have failed to relieve themselves of that burthen which the necessities of their case, and the particular issues directed in the cause, imposed upon them. Nor is this failure the less fatal to this suit because the Respondents may also have failed to show that they had any exclusive right in the privilege which they enjoy; or because they may be under a liability to the Gurukals in respect of the annual payment of 100 pons, which may be capable of being enforced in a suit properly framed for that purpose.

Their Lordships, taking this view of the merits of the case, are relieved from the necessity of considering whether either the decrees in the former suit of 1835, or the Regulation of Limitation, present an effectual bar to the suit. They rest their decision on the ground that the Appellants have failed to support their claim by any sufficient evidence.

[390] Their Lordships, however, are of opinion, that the Sudder Court ought not to have limited the argument to the single question of limitation; and that it ought not to have thrown on the Appellants the whole costs of the suit. They think that the decree of the 29th June, 1857, sealed and signed on the 1st August in that year, was correct in the direction given by it as to the costs up to the latter date, and they will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree of the Sudder Court ought to be varied, and to stand and be simply for the dismissal, with costs of the appeal to that Court: the Appellants, however, paying the costs of this appeal.

[391] THE ADVOCATE-GENERAL OF BENGAL on behalf of Her Majesty,—Appellant; RANEE SURNOMOYE DOSSEE,—Respondent * [June 29 and 30, 1863].

On appeal from the Supreme Court at Calcutta.

The introduction and establishment of the English Criminal law in India, and its application to Natives as well as Europeans, considered in reference to the prerogative of the Crown to forfeiture of personal property of persons committing suicide in Calcutta.

The English law felo de se, and forfeiture of goods and chattels, does not extend to a native Hindoo, though a British subject, committing suicide at Calcutta. Where Englishmen establish themselves in an uninhabited, or barbarous country, they carry with them not only the laws, but the Sovereignty of their own State; and those who live amongst them and become members of their community, become partakers of and become subject to the same laws [9 Moo. Ind. App. 428].

This rule held not to apply to the early settlement of the English in India, as the permission to the settlers to use their own laws within the Factories, did not extend those laws to the Natives associated with them within the same limits.

The question in this case was, whether the interest of a Hindoo, a British subject, in a fund which was standing to the credit of an account in a cause in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, had been forfeited to the Crown, by reason of his having committed suicide in Calcutta, and found felo de se by a Coroner's jury there.

The question was raised by a petition presented [392] by the Advocate-General of Bengal, on behalf of Her Majesty, for a transfer of this fund to the Crown, on the ground of such alleged forfeiture.

The circumstances which gave rise to the claim were as follows:

Rajah Hurrinauth Roy, a Hindoo, possessing considerable real and personal property in the Province of Bengal, made his Will on the 26th of November, 1832, and soon afterwards died, leaving his mother, Rancee Shoosharmohee Dossee; his wife, Rancee Hurrosoondery Dossee; an only son, Rajah Kistonaath Roy, and a daughter, Gobindsoondery Dossee, him surviving.

On the 28th of September, 1839, Rancee Hurrosoondery and Rancee Shoosharmohee filed a bill in the Supreme Court at Calcutta against Rajah Kistonaath Roy and James Charles Colebrook Sutherland (who with Nathaniel Alexander was named Executor), setting forth the Will, and praying that the trusts thereof might be carried into effect under the decree of that Court. A cross bill was subsequently filed by Rajah Kistonaath Roy against Rancee Hurrosoondery, Rancee Shoosharmohee Dossee, James Charles Colebrook Sutherland and Nathaniel Alexander.

On the 29th of June, 1843, the Supreme Court directed that out of the money then in Court, to the credit of these causes, a sum of Rs. 6,86,700, should be invested and transferred to a separate account; and that out of the interest thereof Rs. 800 per month should be paid to Rancee Shoosharmohee Dossee, and Rs. 1400 per month to Rancee Hurrosoondery Dossee during the term of their respective lives, which was done accordingly. Subject to these charges the fund so set apart belonged to and was part of the estate [393] of Rajah Kistonaath Roy as the only son and general legatee and devisee of the Testator.

On the 31st of October, 1844, Rajah Kistonaath Roy, whose family estates were situate at Berkhamptore in Bengal, out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but who had a residence at Calcutta, committed suicide at Calcutta. He was a Hindoo by birth and religion, and died childless, leaving the Respondent, his widow, his heiress and representative according to the Hindoo law, him surviving.

An inquest was held by the Coroner for the town of Calcutta, and an inquisition was returned by the jury, finding that the deceased died felo de se; and that he had at the time of his death, goods and chattels within the town of Calcutta to the value, including the fund in the Supreme Court, of Rs. 9,87,063. 3s. 5p., and without the town of Calcutta, to the value of Co. Rs. 2,89,500.

On the day on which he committed suicide, the deceased signed a paper-writing purporting to be his Will, whereby, after leaving various legacies, he directed that in the event, which happened, of no son being born to him, the greater part of his Zemindary and landed property should go to the foundation of a school or college, which he solicited the British Government of India to establish from the proceeds of it.

Shortly after Kistonaath Roy's death litigation arose concerning this Will. The Respondent alleged that the Will had been executed by Rajah Kistonaath Roy while of unsound mind; and its invalidity was declared in a suit in the Supreme Court, to which the British Government in India was a party. The Government thereupon gave up to the Respondent [394] all the real and personal property of Rajah Kistonaath situate out of Calcutta, which was at that time in its possession, or under its control, and permitted the Respondent to receive from the Registrar of the Supreme Court, with whom the same had been deposited, pending the result of the suit, all the personal property of Rajah Kistonaath Roy situate in Calcutta, with the exception of the money standing to the credit of the causes, to the possession of which the Rajah, or his representative, was at that time entitled.

The Respondent was advised by Counsel to take proceedings to set aside the verdict of felo de se, as being against the weight of evidence, as well as on the ground of misdirection by the Coroner in his charge to the jury, but no proceedings were taken for that purpose, in consequence of the Government of India, or their legal advisers, stating to her legal advisers that they would not prefer any claim under such verdict of felo de se.

In the absence of any claim to forfeiture by the Government of India, and in accordance with such waiver, the whole of the real estate, and such of the personal estate of the deceased as was not in Court, was absolutely given up to the present Respondent.

Ranee Shoosharmohee Dossee died on the 14th of February, 1848, and shortly after, the Respondent, as the representative of Rajah Kistonaath Roy, made claim to so much of the fund in Court as was not required to meet the sum of Rs. 1400 per month charged thereon in favour of Ranee Hurrosoondery; but the Court refused to make any order on such claim, and directed that the same [395] should stand over pending an application to Her Majesty, on the ground that there had been neither a grant by the Crown, nor any formal intimation on which the Court could act, that the Crown had intended to surrender, or to abstain from urging its right in respect to Rajah Kistonaath Roy's estate.

The Respondent accordingly caused notice of her claim to be served on Her Majesty's Attorney-General, and on the Solicitor of Her Majesty's Treasury in London, and also in 1849, to avoid litigation, presented a memorial to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased either to abandon her claim, or to grant the same to the Respondent as Rajah Kistonaath Roy's widow.

In addition to these notices and memorial, the proceedings on the Coroner's inquest and the finding thereupon were, immediately after they had taken place, communicated to the Solicitors of Her Majesty's Treasury, in London, for instructions, in case Her Majesty should thereupon be advised to prefer any claim to the property of Rajah Kistonaath Roy; but no claim was made by the Crown. And, in August, 1860, a letter was sent by the Secretary of State for India to the Governor-General in Council, stating that the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury waived all claim to the property of the late Rajah Kistonaath Roy so far as the interests of the Crown were concerned, and left it to the disposal of the Indian Government.

On the 16th of January, 1861, the Advocate-General presented a petition to the Supreme Court, claiming that the fund set apart by the Court, subject to the aforesaid charges, belonged to and was part of [396] the estate of Rajah Kistonaath Roy, as only son and general legatee and devisee of the Testator, Rajah Hurrynaath Roy; and that on the felonious suicide of Rajah Kistonaath Roy the right, title, and interest in and to the fund (subject as aforesaid) became forfeited to and was vested in Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors; and the petition prayed, that after retaining so much of the fund as might be required to meet the still subsisting charge of Rs. 1400, per month, and after paying the costs of that application, the remainder of the fund might be transferred to the Secretary of State for India in Council, for and on behalf of Her Majesty, for the purposes of the Government of India.

This petition was heard by the Supreme Court on the 19th of April, 1861, when judgment was delivered by the Chief Justice, Sir Barnes Peacock. After setting forth the facts above detailed, and stating the origin of the claim and the waiver by Her Majesty's Government in England of any claim on account of the alleged forfeiture of the estate of the late Rajah Kistonaath Roy, the learned Judge proceeded:—"Rajah Kistonaath Roy left a widow, Ranee Surnomoye Dossee, his mother, Ranee Hurrosoondery Dossee, and two nephews, Opendar Chunder Nundy and Juggender Chunder Nundy the sons of his sister, Gobindsoondery. These parties have appeared by their respective Counsel. Ranee Surnomoye Dossee, the widow, does not oppose the claim; but it has been contended on behalf of the mother and nephews, that the Crown is not entitled to any portion of the fund, and that according to the law in force in Calcutta it was not forfeited. In addition to that, which was the main argument, it was urged on behalf of the mother of [397] Rajah Kistonaath Roy, that he was never entitled to any part of the fund in Court, and that consequently, even admitting, for the sake of argument, that the law of forfeiture prevailed in Calcutta, no part of the fund passed to the Crown. The case of Mussumat Golah Koomur v. The Collector of Benares (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 246) was cited to show that the forfeiture, even if it existed, could not affect the rights of the mother and widow of Rajah Hurrynaath Roy to maintenance. We entirely concur in that view; but we are of opinion that the mother and widow, although entitled to maintenance, were not entitled to the money brought into Court to secure it. It is sufficient for us to state shortly, that in our judgment, Rajah Kistonaath Roy, at the time of his death, was entitled to the fund, subject to its remaining in Court as a security for the maintenance of the mother and widow of Rajah Hurrynaath Roy until their respective deaths. The interest was one which, according to the law of forfeiture, if in force in Calcutta to its full extent, would pass to the Crown upon a valid finding of felo de se. A preliminary objection was taken, namely, that this claim could not be made by petition without reviving the suits in which the money was ordered to be brought into Court, those suits having abated by the death of Rajah Kistonaath Roy. But we are clearly of opinion that that objection cannot prevail. The case referred to by Mr. Justice Jackson, In re Jerroise (12 Beav. 209), is a decisive authority, if any authority were necessary to that effect. The main question, therefore, to be decided in this case is, whether or not the goods and chattels of a Hindoo are forfeited to the Crown upon its appearing by a Corner's inquisition that he [398] committed felo de se within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at Calcutta. That must depend upon whether the English law by which the goods and chattels of a felo de se are forfeited to the Crown, has ever been introduced into Calcutta, and if so, whether it applies to Hindoos and Mahomedans, as well as to European British subjects. It is a well recognized doctrine, and one which has been acted upon by this Court for more than half a century, that, speaking generally, the first introduction of English law into Calcutta, was effected by the Charter of George the First, by which, in the year 1726, the Mayor's Court was established. It is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of that position; indeed, it was admitted by the learned Advocate-General in his argument in this case. The question is, whether the law by which goods and chattels of a felo de se are forfeited to the Crown, was introduced by that Charter, or at any other time. It is unnecessary to go back to a period antecedent to the Charter, for even if it could be held that British subjects carried with them to India any part of the laws of England—and probably they did, from necessity, carry with them some of their own laws, such as those relating to marriage—it is clear that they did not carry with them any law which could entitle the Crown, prior to the acquisition of sovereignty, to the goods and chattels of a native felo de se, if such a term could be used prior to the introduction of the English law of Felony. We will, therefore, consider, first, whether such a law was introduced by the Charter; secondly, whether it was introduced subsequently by any law expressly extending to Calcutta; and thirdly, whether it was intro-[399]-duced when Calcutta became part of the dominions of the Crown, as a necessary incident of sovereignty. It is clear, from the judgment of Lord Brougham in the case of The Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 272), that in the year 1726, and for many years afterwards, Calcutta was merely a Factory, established for the purposes of trade, by British subjects in a Foreign territory. It was not at that time part of the dominions of the Crown, although the Crown exercised jurisdiction over it as a Factory, in the same manner as the Government of England and other European Governments have done in many similar cases. It is laid down by Lord Brougham, in the most explicit manner, that for a long period of time after the first acquisition, no English authority existed there, which could affect the land, or bind any but English subjects. The situation of Calcutta, at that time, is so clearly pointed out in the judgment, that we cannot do better than read the following extract from it:—'The district on which Calcutta is built, was obtained by purchase from the Nabob of Bengal, the Emperor of Hindoostan's Lieutenant, at the very end of the seventeenth century. The Company had been struggling for nearly a hundred years to obtain a footing in Bengal, and until 1696, they never had more than a Factory here and there, as the French, Danes, and Dutch also had. Till 1678, their whole object was to obtain the power of trading, and it was only then that they secured it by a Firman from the Emperor. From that year till 1696, they in vain applied to the native government for leave to fortify their Factory on the Hooghly, and it was only then that they made a fortification, acting upon a kind of [400] half consent, given in an equivocal answer of the Nabob. Encouraged by the protection which they were thus enabled to afford the natives, many of them built houses, as well as the English subjects; and when the Nabob, on this account, was about to send a Kazi, or Judge, to administer justice to those natives, the Company's servants bribed him to abstain from this proceeding. Some years afterwards the Company obtained a grant of more land and villages from the Emperor, with renewed permission to fortify their Factories. During all this period tribute was paid to the Emperor, or his officer, the Nabob: first, for leave to trade, afterwards as Zemindars, under the Emperor; and in 1757, the year memorable for the battle of Plassey, the treaty with Jaffer Ally, indemnifying them for their losses, ceding the French possessions, and securing their rights, and binding them to pay their revenues like other "Zemindars." Eight years later they likewise received from the native government a grant of the Dewanny or receivership of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa: and of their subsequent progress in power it is unnecessary to speak; enough has been said to show, that the settlement of the Company in Bengal was effected by leave of a regularly established government in possession of the country, invested with the rights of sovereignty, and exercising its powers; that by permission of that Government, Calcutta was founded and the Factory fortified, in a district purchased from the owners of the soil by permission of that Government, and held under it by the Company as subjects owing obedience, as tenants rendering rent, and even as officers exercising, by delegation, a part of its administrative authority. At what precise time, and [401] by what steps, they exchanged the character of subjects for that of sovereign, or rather, acquired by themselves, or with the help of the crown, and for the Crown, the right of sovereignty, cannot be ascertained. The sovereignty has long since been vested in the Crown, and though it was at first recognized in terms by the Legislature in 1813; the Statute, 53rd Geo. III. c. 155, s. 95, is declaratory, and refers to the sovereignty as "undoubted," and as residing in the Crown; but it is equally certain, that for a long period of time after the first acquisition, no such rights were claimed, nor any acts of sovereignty exercised; and that during all that time no English authority existed there, which could affect the land or bind any but English subjects. The Company and its servants were then in the situation of the Smyrna or the Lisbon Factories at the present time.' Such being the case, we will now examine the Charter of George I., in order to ascertain whether the law of forfeiture in the case of a felo de se was introduced by it. In the first place it recites 'that the United Company of Merchants trading in the East Indies have, by a strict and equal distribution of justice within the towns, Factories, Forts, and places belonging to the said Company, in the East Indies, and other parts beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Straits of Magellan, very much encouraged, not only Our own subjects, but likewise the subjects of other Princes, and the Natives of the adjacent countries, to resort to, and settle in the said towns, forts, factories, and places for the better and more convenient carrying on of trade, by which means some of the said towns, factories, and places, are become very populous, and specially the town or place, [402] anciently called Chinapatnam, now called Madraspatnam, and Fort St. George, on the coast of Coromandel, and also the towns, factories, or places called Bombay, on the Island of Bombay, and Fort William, in Bengal, in the said East Indies and parts aforesaid; * * * and that there is a great want, in all the said places, of a proper and competent power and authority for the more speedy and effectual administering of justice in civil causes, and for the trying and punishing of capital and other criminal offences and misdemeanours, committed within the places and districts aforesaid, and in other the said Company's settlements.' Section 1, incorporates the Mayor and Aldermen of Madras. By section 7, a Sheriff is appointed. By section 9, a Mayor's Court is appointed. Section 14, constitutes the Governor, and five senior Members of the Council, Justices of the Peace, and a Court of Oyer and Terminer. Sections 16 to 22 incorporate the Mayor and Aldermen of Bombay, and give them similar powers. By Sections 24 to 30, the same provisions are extended to the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal. A Charter of Statute by which Courts of Justice are constituted, does not necessarily determine the law which they are to administer, but in construing the Charter of George I., there can be no doubt that it was intended that the English law should be administered as nearly as the circumstances of the place, and of the inhabitants, should admit. The words, give judgment according to justice and right, in suits and pleas between party and party, could have no other reasonable meaning than justice and right, according to the laws of England, so far as they regulated private rights between party and party. Such [403] general words could not possibly refer to any law, such as the Mortmain Act, or the Alien laws, which had reference merely to some views of public policy, supposed to be applicable to England, even though private rights might be affected by them. Still less could they be supposed to refer to the rights or revenues of the Crown, depending upon prerogative, and which were wholly inapplicable to a territory to which the sovereignty did not extend. Then, was the law of forfeiture of the goods and chattels of a felon de se introduced by those clauses of the Charter by which the Courts of Oyer and Terminer were established? The only words under which it could be included are those which authorize the Justices of the Peace or Commissioners of Oyer to proceed to the arraignment, trial, conviction, and punishment of persons accused of crimes and offences. It is unnecessary to decide, whether these words impliedly introduced the law of forfeiture in the case of attainder or conviction of Felony (forfeiture being no part of the sentence or punishment), or whether they introduced the whole law of forfeiture for crimes, including the prerogative right of a year and a day, and waste in lands of inheritance of a person attainted, or only some and what part of the law: whether the law, if introduced, extended to Natives, or to British subjects only, and if to Natives, whether their lands were to be considered as lands of inheritance or merely as chattels: or, finally, whether, if that branch of the prerogative which related to forfeiture was introduced, the somewhat similar right of the Crown to deodands was in like manner extended in the case of Natives. These and other nice points of law will have to be determined should the question [404] ever arise. At present we express no opinion concerning them, nor as to the rights of the Crown in cases of crimes made felonies by Statutes passed since the sovereignty was acquired in India. At present we have merely to consider the question, so far as it relates to the goods and chattels of a Native who wilfully and intentionally destroys himself, and who cannot in strictness be called a felon de se: and we now proceed to deal with that question, and with that question alone. It has been decided that the goods and chattels of felons of themselves are a different liberty, from the goods and chattels of felons, and that by the grant of one the other does not pass, The King v. Sutton (1 Saunders, 274 a). They are different in their nature, the former depending upon an inquisition of office taken, as it necessarily must be, after the death of the felon de se, the other resulting from an attainder on conviction of the felon after arraignment and trial in his presence. Now, the Charter of George the First clearly contemplated a trial. The recital is, that there is a great want of proper and competent power and authority for the more speedy and effectual administering of justice in civil causes, and for the trying and punishing of capital and other criminal offences and misdemeanours. It did not, and could not, recite that there was any want of the means of enforcing the Crown's prerogative right to the goods and chattels of felons of themselves, for the Crown had no prerogative rights in Calcutta. The Charter clearly contemplates the trial and punishment of persons accused of crimes, and not the creation of a right for the Crown, or the extension of any of its ordinary sources of revenue to a place in which the rights of sovereignty did not [405] exist. Further, the grant of the right to hold Courts of Oyer and Terminer was made to the East India Company, and upon their petition and for their benefit, and not at the instance of the Crown. No Coroner was appointed, no provision was made for an inquest of office, and no Officer appointed to secure forfeiture. It was contended in argument, that as the Justices of the Peace, and Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, had jurisdiction to try persons accused of murder, so they might hold an inquest of office and inquire by what means a man came to his death, in the same manner as Justice could in England when a body was thrown into the sea or could not be found, and the 3 Inst. p. 54, was cited as an authority. The same rule is laid down in 1 Hale, P.C. 413, for it is said to be within the extent of their commission. But the commission of Oyer and Terminer in England is, to inquire of all murders, felonies, man-slaughters, killings, etc., by whomsoever and by whom, to whom, when, how, and in what manner, and also to hear and determine, etc. Whereas the power given by the Charter is to proceed by indictment or by such other ways, and in the same or the like manner as is used in England, as near as the condition and circumstances of the place will admit of: also to proceed to the arraignment, trial, conviction, and punishment of persons accused of any crimes or offences, in the same manner and as near as the condition and circumstances of the place will admit of, as Justices of the Peace or Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in England by virtue of their commissions. We doubt whether these words or the words immediately following—shall and may respectively do all other acts that Justices of the [406] Peace and

Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer usually and legally do—authorized the Governor and Council to hold inquests of office. But whether they did so or not, we feel confident that they were never intended to give to a finding of felo de se upon such inquisition, the effect of vesting the goods and chattels of the offender in the Crown, to be carried to England, as part of the ordinary revenues of the Crown. If such had been the intention some provision would have been made for allowing the relatives of the deceased to traverse the inquisition, if not true, or to quash it if bad in law. Neither of these powers was given, nor was there any Court in existence which had power to try such traverse or to quash the inquisition. It could not be intended that the Mayor's Court should quash the inquisition of the Court of Oyer and Terminer, or try a traverse of the finding; for, independently of the fact, that the Mayor and Aldermen before whom the Mayor's Court was held were inferior to the President and Council who composed the Court of Oyer and Terminer (an appeal lying from the Mayor's Court to the President and Council), the Mayor's Court was authorized to try any civil suits, actions, and pleas between party and party. No Officer was appointed to appear for the Crown, and no case was intended to be tried before them in which they could not award execution for costs, either against the goods of the person of the Plaintiff or Defendant, as the case might be; a process which could not have been used in the case of the Crown; nor could it be intended to give jurisdiction to the Court of Oyer and Terminer to quash the inquisition taken before themselves, or to try a traverse [407] of the finding upon their own inquisition. Such a power was not one which could be exercised by a Court of Oyer and Terminer in England. We are, therefore, of opinion, that the Charter of George I. did not intend to render the goods and chattels of a felo de se liable to be forfeited to the Crown, even in the case of a British subject. But, even if it did so, it is wholly improbable that such a law should have been intended to apply to Mahomedans and Hindoos, even if the Crown had the power at that time to make a law binding upon them, which is disputed by Lord Brougham. At that time there was no law in India by which property was forfeited by suicide. By the Mahomedan law suicide was not an offence, and did not cause any forfeiture of property. Even wilful homicide was justified, if committed at the request of the person killed. Nor should it be forgotten that at that time Suttee, though not enjoined by the religion of the Hindoos, had not been declared to be a crime; and that the ignorant and deluded votaries of Juggernaut were under the belief that eternal happiness was obtained by self-sacrifice under the wheels of the Idol's car. It can scarcely be imagined that the Crown could have intended to introduce into a Factory in a Foreign territory the prerogative of forfeiture, and to render that prerogative applicable not only to its own subjects but to the subjects of a foreign Government over whom it had no power. Had such an intention been apparent, it would have been beyond the legal powers of the Crown to give effect to it. Having decided that the law was not introduced by the Charter of George I., the question is, has it ever been introduced at any other period? We find nothing to lead us to the [408] conclusion that it has been, nor indeed, has there been any such contention on the part of the Crown. It has not been urged, nor could it in our opinion have been urged with success, that the law was introduced by the 33rd Geo. III., c. 52, s. 157. By that section, the Governor-General in Council at Fort William, was authorized and empowered to appoint as many Coroners as he should think fit for the purpose of taking inquests upon the bodies of persons coming, or supposed to have come, to an untimely end; and such Coroners are vested with the like powers and jurisdictions as by law may be executed by Coroners in England. But there is nothing in that Act to show, that it was intended to introduce any law of forfeiture if it did not previously exist. If a law had existed by which goods and chattels of a felo de se were forfeited to the Crown, the appointment of Coroners might have provided means for putting the law into force, even though it might previously have lain dormant for want of the necessary machinery. The appointment of a Coroner could not alter the law, though it might have provided a means for enforcing a law. The appointment of a coroner could no more render a person in Calcutta liable to forfeiture of his property for felo de se, than it could make the act of wilful and intentional self-destruction in the Mofussil a Felony, in order that forfeiture might be the consequence; and it must not be forgotten that the power of appointing Coroners was not limited to the Presidency towns, it extended to the whole of the Presidencies, and consequently if it introduced the law of forfeiture in the case of a felo de se, it did so not only in the Presidency towns, but also in the Mofussil, where Felony was not known as a crime, [409] and where the Mahomedan criminal law prevailed, by which, as before shown, self-destruction was not a crime. Our attention has been called to the case of The Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavalry Fencible Narainapah (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 500). In that case it was held, that the general right of the Crown to succeed to immoveable property on failure of heirs was not excluded in the case of a Brahmin. The law of escheat was not disputed; the question raised was, whether the Crown could succeed to the property of a Brahmin on failure of heirs. In the present case the general right of the British Crown to succeed to all property, whether moveable or immoveable, upon a total failure of heirs is not disputed. That right attached immediately upon the acquisition of the sovereignty by the Crown as a necessary incident thereto, not only in those places such as the Presidency towns, in which the laws of England had been partially introduced, but in every other part of India over which the Sovereignty had been acquired. The right of the Crown exists, as well in the case of Mahomedans and Hindoos, as in the case of British subjects. Here there is no failure of heirs, but a claim on the part of the Crown by title paramount, upon the ground that the property was vested in the Crown by forfeiture before it came to the heirs. If the property of a Mahomedan, or a Hindoo, were claimed by the Crown upon the ground of a failure of heirs, the question of failure, or no failure of heirs, would not depend upon English law, but upon the Mahomedan or Hindoo law of inheritance, as the case might be. So here the question depends upon the law applicable to the offence. If the English law was [410] introduced as to felo de se, and the property was liable to forfeiture upon the finding of a Coroner's inquisition, the forfeiture would, no doubt, vest in the Crown by virtue of its prerogative. All we have to show here is, that the prerogative of the Crown did not of itself make self-murder a Felony, or subject the offender to the forfeiture of his goods and chattels. If the prerogative of the Crown rendered self-murder a Felony in Calcutta, and necessarily introduced the law of forfeiture as an incident, it must have had the same effect in every part of the British dominions in India over which the right of Sovereignty was acquired. It is not a necessary incident of Sovereignty that every offence for which property is forfeited in England should be a Felony, and cause a similar forfeiture in every part of the dominions of the Crown, otherwise it must follow that the right of Sovereignty introduced the law of a year and a day, and waste, in the case of attainder, in the Mofussil, and also the right to deodands. We hold that the law of forfeiture in the case of felo de se, has never been introduced into Calcutta, and consequently that the estate of Rajah Kistonaath Roy was not forfeited to the Crown. This petition, therefore, must be dismissed. There will be no order as to costs, for it is a petition presented on behalf of the Crown, and we doubt if there is any jurisdiction in this Court to order costs to be paid by the Crown."

The present appeal was from this decision.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellant.—The question in this case is, the right of the [411] Crown to the goods of a felo de se, a Hindoo inhabitant of Calcutta, and a subject of Her Majesty. There is no dispute regarding the commission of the crime within the town of Calcutta, or that the inquisition and finding by a jury before the Coroner of Calcutta, appointed by Statute, 33rd Geo. III. c. 52, sec. 157, was not strictly regular. By the Charter of 1774, sec. 4, which established the Mayor's Court of Oyer and Terminer and Criminal Jurisdiction, the office of Coroner was first introduced into India, the Judges of that Court being appointed Coroners. In this case the finding was officially communicated by the Coroner to the Government and the Accountant-General and Master of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, who had custody of part of the assets of the deceased, as well as notice given to the Collectors of the several Zillahs in which his property was situate, of the forfeiture of the goods and chattels to Her Majesty, and that meets in anticipation any question of delay, or waiver, in making or in enforcing our claim. [Lord Kingsdown: The claim arose twenty years ago. The parties might then have traversed the inquisition.]—The waiver relied on now, is merely an intimation of the Officers of the Crown here, that they did not claim on behalf of Her Majesty; leaving it, therefore, for the Government in India to make the claim, and assert its right.

Now, first, the law prescribing the forfeiture of goods and chattels of a jeu de se, is part of the Common law of England, and under the Charter of the 13th Geo. I., the Supreme Court at Calcutta is bound to administer the Common law of England, as it was in the year 1726, unless such law has been subsequently altered by Statutes extending to India, or by Act of the Legislature of India; and our con-[412]-tention is, that no Imperial Statute, or Legislative Act, has altered the Common law in this respect. The history of the establishment of the British rule in India is elaborately treated of by Lord Brougham, in the case of The Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 175, 272-3), and the rule as to the introduction of English law in Calcutta is furnished by the finding of the Master, and the decision of Lord Lyndhurst in the case of Freeman v. Fairlie (1b. 309, 352), in which it was held, that a Will to pass lands in Calcutta must be attested by three witnesses. The introduction of the English law, as applicable to the Natives of India, must be referred to the establishment of the Mayor's Court by the Charter of 1726, though that Court has been subsequently superseded by the establishment of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, by the Charter of 1774, when the English laws were introduced to their full extent, and with all their consequences, Auber's Analysis of the Const. of the East India Comp. p. 234.—[Lord Kingsdown: When was the English law binding on the people in Calcutta?—It existed in 1726.—[Lord Kingsdown: It certainly could not be binding when Calcutta was a mere Factory for the purpose of trade. Neither could the Criminal law, in all its branches, now be applicable to Hindoo natives. Take the case of Bigamy for instance.]—The English Criminal law, we apprehend, must be taken as generally introduced in India by the Charter of 1726.

[Sir James Colville: The Mahomedan Criminal law was retained by Reg. IX., of 1793, secs. 47, 50, 74, and 75. It was only in 1832, by Reg. VI. of that year, sec. 5, that persons not professing the Mahomedan faith could claim the exemption from being tried under [413] that law.]—By the Statutes, 13th Geo. III., c. 63, sec. 14, and the 26th Geo. III., c. 57, sec. 29, the English law was applied to Natives as well as British subjects. Statute, 9th Geo. IV., c. 74, embodied all the Criminal law of England in India. Suttee was a crime, but was tolerated, in compliance with the reservation of the 37th Geo. III., c. 142, sec. 12, which respects religious usages, but Suttee was abolished by Regulation XVII. of 1829. So with respect to the crime of infanticide: these were, however, exceptional cases coming within the special usages reserved to the Hindoos. Then, the material question to be considered is, whether by the Charters and Statutes, the English Criminal law is not to be taken as imported into Calcutta, and in force there at the time the Rajah committed suicide. He was beyond all question a British subject, and as such was amenable to the law that had been introduced into India by the Charters and Acts of Parliament. The best exposition of the rule as to the governing law, is to be found in the dictum and decision of Lord Mansfield, in the well-known case of Campbell v. Hall (1 Cowp. 208), where he says, "that the law and legislative government of every dominion, equally affects all persons and all property within the limits thereof; and is the rule of decision for all questions which arise there. Whoever purchases, lives, or sues there, puts himself under the law of the place. An Englishman in Ireland, Minorca, the Isle of Man, or the Plantations, has no privileges distinct from the natives." It follows, therefore, that in no case have the Natives of a Colony of Settlement privileges distinct from the settlers, unless such rights have been specially reserved to them. Lord Stowell, in Ruding v. Smith (2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 383), quotes Lord Mansfield's proposi-[414]-tion with approbation, and says, "Huber, too, speaking upon general principles, had before promulgated the same doctrine:—" Pro subjectis imperio habendi sunt omnes, qui intra terminos ejusdem reperiuntur, sive in perpetuum, sive ad tempus ibi commorantur." De Conflict. Leg. lib. I. t. 3, § 2. The question of the extent of the introduction of the English law in Grenada, in the West Indies, was also considered by Sir William Grant in The Attorney-General v. Steward (2 Mer. 160), and to Gibraltar, by this Tribunal, in Jephson v. Riera (3 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 130). Wherever, therefore, the English law has been introduced, including of course the Criminal law, self-murder is a felonious crime. It is viewed by the English law as the highest crime, Stephens, Comms. Vol. IV. p. 108.—[Lord Kingsdown: Do you contented that the law of forfeiture was introduced by the Charter of 1726.] It may not be introduced by Charter, or Statute, in express words, but the appointment of a Coroner assumes the introduction of the English law of felo de se, and that there is judicial machinery for executing it. No reason appears why the law of forfeiture should not apply to Natives as well as Europeans.—[Sir Lawrence Peel: Does not your argument go too far? It would introduce the law of primogeniture and dower among Natives.]—If suicide is a crime, of course to assist a suicide is also a crime. Now, the Indian Penal Code of 1860, applies to the whole Territories vested in the Crown by Statute, 21st and 22nd Vict. c. 106. This Code assumes, but nowhere specifies or defines, that suicide is a crime. The 53rd section enumerates a list of punishments for offences under the Code, and expressly mentions in sec. 62, forfeiture of property [415] for offences; and by sec. 302 it is enacted, that whoever commits murder shall be punished with death, or transportation for life, and shall be liable to fine. Section 306 says, if any person commits suicide, or whoever abets the commission of such suicide, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term, and shall also be liable to fine; and section 309 provides, that whoever attempts to commit suicide shall be punished with imprisonment, for a term not exceeding one year, and shall also be liable to a fine. Now, it would be illogical to suppose that suicide is not a crime; the Code assumes that it is, and the Code applies to Hindoos and Mahomedans, as well as to Europeans.—[Lord Kingsdown: You cannot punish the individual who commits suicide. The Code only applies to those who attempt, or abet it.]

The important question of the prerogative of the Crown was not, however, considered by the Court below, and we contend that the same prerogative must attach in Calcutta as in the other British Colonies, Chalmers' Opinions, Vol. I. p. 232. Now, the right to forfeiture of goods and chattels is part of the prerogative of the Crown in this country. Stephens, Comms. Vol. II. p. 495 (5th Edit.), enumerates the prerogatives, and among them mentions forfeitures for offences. So treasure trove, as by the ancient law of India, Inst. of Menu, ch. VIII. secs. 37, 38, and Royal fish, are most ancient prerogatives of the Crown. In Bacon's Abr. tit. "Forfeiture" B, it is laid down, that if a man be felo de se he forfeits his goods and chattels (see also Megit v. Johnson, 2 Doug. 545); and in the note to Toombs v. Etherington (1 Saunders, 362), it is stated to accrue on inquisition.—[416] [Lord Kingsdown: The Common law, as stated in that case, distinguishes the forfeiture of lands and goods. The former is only upon attainder. Now, in India there is no distinction by Hindoo law between real and personal estate].—Lord Brougham, in The Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 281), enumerates the prerogatives the Crown is entitled to in India. That case, however, does not apply to the question here raised. The law there determined as to aliens holding lands, is by Statute, and is not part of the Common law. No doubt the prerogative attaches in cases of felo de se in India, whether by a British subject, or native Hindoo, if committed within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The Charter, 13th Cha. II., in 1661, upon the petition of the East India Company, granted the Governor, and East India Company, power to judge all persons living under them, and under that Charter the English law was administered in Calcutta. There was no Territorial sovereignty at that time, and, therefore, it did not extend to Natives. The Statute, 53rd Geo. III. c. 155, sec. 95, though it is the first statutable recognition of the sovereignty of the British Crown in the East Indies, was only declaratory of the existing law; for the Charter, 9th and 10th Will. III., expressly says, "The Sovereign right being always reserved over Forts, Factories, etc." Such right, therefore, existed in 1698, and the Statute, 13th Geo. III. c. 63, shows clearly that the Crown and Parliament recognized the Sovereignty of the East India Company. In The East India Company v. Syed Ally (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 555), these rights were upheld; and in the cases of The Secretary of [417] State for India v. Kamachee Boye (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 476; and see The Rajah of Coorg v. The East India Company, 29 Beav. 300), and The Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavalry Vencata Narainapah (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 500) the Government of India was held entitled to take as an escheat a Raj, for want of male heirs. It has been determined that goods of a felon convicted in India are forfeited. That point arose in Bombay, The Advocate-General v. Richmond (Perry's Oriental Cases, 566), and the right was not questioned: the only point raised being, whether the Crown or the East India Company was entitled to the escheat of the felon's goods: a point which does not arise here. In the matter of Govindo Lala (1 Strange's Mad. Cases, 74), goods, the property of a felo de se, were ordered by the Court to be delivered over to the East India Company as grantee of the Crown; and in Khanoo Raoot Kulrekur v. Dhunbajee Kan (2 Borr. Bom. Rep. 273), drift timber was held to belong to the Crown. No instance of forfeiture for Treason can be found.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., and Mr. Cave, for the Respondent.—It lies on the Appellant to establish the proposition advanced by him—namely, that forfeiture of goods and chattels of a suicide is part of the law of India, applicable to Hindoos. The unanimous opinion of the Judges of the Supreme Court was, that the English law of forfeiture of the goods of a felo de se, did not apply to native Hindoos, unless it was specifically introduced by Statute, or Local enactment. The Appellant has failed to produce a single case in which a forfeiture of goods has been enforced by the Government in India for suicide. Govindo Lala's [418] case (1 Strange's Mad. Cases, p. 74), when examined, is no authority for such a proposition. It is simply the case of a Native who died without heirs, or next of kin, and the Court directed his property to be handed over to the Registrar, for the benefit of the East India Company. Being bona vacantia, the Sovereign right accrued. The Bombay case, Khanoo Raoot Kulrekur v. Dhunbajee Kan (2 Borr. Bom. Rep. 273) was a case of flotsam, and the right of the Crown was recognized, which might be in virtue of the tenure under which Bombay is held—namely, as part of the Manor of East Greenwich. These are the only two cases that can be brought to support such a claim as this. Then, there being no direct authority for the position contended for, is there any principle, or analogy of law, to support it? Our contention is, that the English law of Felony by self-murder, and consequent forfeiture of goods and chattels, has never been introduced, and cannot be applied, to Natives in any part of India. In England the ground of forfeiture is stated to be derelict; Bacon's Abr. tit. "Forfeiture," B.—[Lord Kingsdown: Was the forfeiture in England derelict, or was it not a punishment attached to felo de se?]—It may be punishment. A man takes his life away, and leaves goods and chattels; Bacon there lays it down, that the King takes them as the maintainer of public justice. By the feudal law of tenure, if a man deprives the Lord of a vassal, the Lord was entitled to compensation. So if the Tenant dies a natural death, the Lord could seize the best beast, or armour, according to custom, for a Heriot. By the Saxon law, land did not escheat for Felony. Reeve's "Hist. of the English Law," Vol. I. p. 10. So as to right of dower, Co. Litt. 41a; [419] Spelman, "On Tenures," p. 53; and Yorke's "Law of Forfeiture for High Treason," pp. 54, 56. It is doubtful whether forfeiture for felo de se existed in England before the introduction of the feudal system. It appears it did for Murder. In Striernhök, "De-Jure Sueonum et Gothorum," lib. II. ch. 6, and lib. III. ch. 3, forfeiture is spoken of for high Treason, but not for felo de se. He quotes the laws of Alfred, ch. IV, where it is thus laid down:—"Si quis vitæ Regis insidiatur per se, vel per ultores mercede conductos vel seruos suos, vitâ privetur, et omnibus quæ possidet." Then it goes on, "Si quis vitæ Domini sui insidiatur hoc ipso vitam suam amittit, et omnia quæ possidet vel pro ratione aestimationis capitis Domini sui culpa eximitur." And the law of Canute, ch. LIV, is similar:—"Si quis Regi vel Domino insidiatur fuerit, vitam suam perdat, et omne quod habet nisi ad triflex ordalium pergat." Forfeiture is purely a part of the feudal policy which has never been introduced into India, or is capable of being applied to Hindoo Natives under the British rule. The law and customs of the Hindoos have always been respected and preserved to them. This was the provision of the Statute, 21st Geo. III. c. 70, sec. 17, and the assurance given to the Natives by Sir Elijah Impey, the first Chief Justice, when the Charter of 1774 was brought into force. "Memoirs of Sir Elijah Impey, the Ed. by his son," Appx. 427, [8vo. Lond. 1846].

There can be no doubt as a general proposition, that Englishmen settling in an uninhabited country carry with them as their birthright so much of the law of England as is applicable to, and requisite for, the state of the settlement, which will include, of course, so much of the Common law as is applicable to [420] their condition, as well as the Statute law, Chalmers' Opinions, Vol. I. p. 195. But the case of the original Settlements in the East Indies is quite different, as is shown in the history given in The Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company. The first settlers were only traders permitted by the Government of the Nabob of Bengal to reside and have Factories within his dominions. It was not until many years afterwards that they acquired as a Company, first Territorial and then Sovereign rights by Charters and Treaties. It was long after the establishment of the Company as a trading body, that they acquire anything like Sovereign rights. In the first instance, such of the Company's servants within the Factories as chose to adopt the English laws were permitted by the Crown to do so. Indeed, all the authorities show, that the English law was never generally, but only partially, introduced in India. Thus it has been held by the Supreme Court at Calcutta that the laws against Popery did not extend to India, D'Conto v. Da Costa (Morton's Dec. Cal. 356); and that the Statute making carnal knowledge of a female under the age of ten years, a Felony, did not extend to India, Rex v. Chundichurn Bose (Morton's Dec. Cal. 357); and by this Tribunal that the Mortmain law was not in force in India, The Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company (1 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 176; and see on this point, Mitford v. Reynolds, 1 Pill. pp. 185, 192. Whicker v. Hume, 7 H.L. Cases, 124. Attorney-Gen. v. Stenard, 2 Mer. 143. Clark's Col. Law, p. 7). It will only be necessary to trace the introduction of the English law into Calcutta, to show that this branch of the Criminal law was not in force in Calcutta at the time of the [421] commission of this suicide. The third Charter of April 3rd, 1661, gave power to the Governor and Council, where the East India Company had Factories, or places of trade within the East Indies, to judge all persons belonging to the Company, or under their control, in all cases, Civil or Criminal, according to the laws of England. The Charter of 1726, provided for the administration of justice in Civil and Criminal cases within the Factory of Fort William, by creating the Mayor's Court, and for the punishment of persons accused of any crime, to be as near to the laws of England as the condition and circumstances of the place and inhabitants would admit of. The Charter of 1753, substantially repealed these two Charters, and gave to the East India Company, besides further jurisdiction, fines and amercements made by the Court. Then came the Statute, 13th Geo. III. c. 63, sec. 13, and the Charter of 1774, which established the Supreme Court at Calcutta, as a Court of Oyer and Terminer, within the Town of Calcutta and the Factory of Fort William, with jurisdiction over Murder, and other felonies and misdemeanors, had, done, or committed within the Town and Factories. The Statute, 21st Geo. III. c. 70, sec. 17, gave the Supreme Court jurisdiction to entertain suits and actions of the native inhabitants of Calcutta, providing that the inheritance and succession to lands, etc., and contracts should be determined in the case of Mahomedans, by the Mahomedan law, and of Hindoos by the Hindoo law. And section 18 of that Statute expressly enacted, that the civil and religious usages of the Natives were to be respected, and acts done, according to the rule and [422] law of caste, were not to be adjudged as crimes, although the same may not be justifiable by the law of England. Section 19 also provided, that the process of the Supreme Court was to be accommodated to the religion and usages of the Natives. At this period Suttee, as well as infanticide, prevailed in India, and were, therefore, sanctioned by the law and recognized by the Government as part of the religious usages of the Natives. Then came the 33rd Geo. III. c. 52, sec. 157, which, for the first time, appointed Coroners for the Presidencies in India, empowering them to hold inquests in the same manner as Coroners in England. It is this Act that the other side now insists gives the right to the East India Company to seize the goods and chattels of a felo de se. But besides that they have failed to prove that the appointment of such Officers as Coroners would give the Crown a prerogative not previously enjoyed, it is impossible to argue that such a forfeiture would accrue for an offence held not only not blameable by the Hindoo inhabitants of India, but in the case of widows, absolutely praiseworthy, and in accordance with the religion of the country. Felo de se was, in fact, at this time, no offence at all. The Statute, 9th Geo. IV. c. 74, after reciting that many wholesome alterations have been made in the Criminal law of England, and the administration thereof, and that it was expedient that some of the said alterations should be extended to the British Territories in the East Indies, enacts, by section 18, that when any person shall be arraigned upon an indictment or inquisition for Treason, or Felony, the jury empanelled to try such persons shall not be charged to inquire concerning the lands, tenements, or goods, nor [423] whether he fled for such Treason or Felony. But under this Statute, however, there must be a trial for Felony, not an inquisition, or inquiry, as before a Coroner. It is true that, by the 16th and 17th Viet. c. 95, sec. 27, all fines and penalties incurred by the sentence or order of any Court of justice within the Territories under the Government of the East India Company, and all forfeitures for crimes, of any real and personal estate within those Territories, and all property devolving as bona vacantia, for want of a rightful owner, shall belong to the East India Company, in trust for Her Majesty, for the service of the Government of India; and that by the 21st and 22nd Viet. c. 106, the Territories in the East Indies are absolutely vested in the Crown. None of these Statutes, however, introduced the English law of forfeiture of the goods and chattels of a felo de se, which is nowhere designated as a Felony in India, and is not even mentioned until the Penal Code of 1860, which first designated such a crime in India. Sec. 306 of the Code enacts, that if any person commits suicide, whoever abets the commission of such suicide shall be punished with imprisonment for a term not to exceed ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and section 309 enacts, that whoever attempts to commit suicide shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term of one year, and shall also be liable to fine; thus making the aiding and abetting a felo de se a misdemeanour; whereas such aiding or abetting by the Criminal law of England is a Felony, the party being a principal in the first degree. How then can it be argued, that with such a provision as this, there could have been previously anything like the English law of forfeiture prevailing [424] in India? By the Common law of England, to assist another to commit suicide is Murder. This is conclusive, that even at the time the Code was passed, forfeiture for felo de se was not considered part of the English law introduced into India; still less could it have been the law in the year 1774, the date which the Appellant's Counsel insist that this branch of the Criminal law of England was introduced into Calcutta; at a time too when we have shown it was not considered an offence there even if committed.

Supposing, however, the law of forfeiture of goods of felo de se to have been introduced in India, and applicable to Europeans, it does not apply to Hindoos and other Natives, by whom, in many cases, self-destruction is considered not merely legal, but even meritorious. Thus, The Vakeel of Government v. Sohawun (1 Niz. Adaw. Rep. 220) was the case of a Hindoo of the Rajpoot tribe, who had prepared a pit and set fire to the fuel in it, to enable his father, who was ill with the leprosy, to burn himself, and the prisoner was held justified under the tenets of the Hindoo religion, and acquitted under the provisions of the Mahomedan law; and the case of Shiecoo Subace and Chotoo (ib. 292) is to the same effect. Suicide from leprosy, or Suttee, though both are within the letter of sec. 3, Ben. Reg. VIII., of 1799, yet have not been considered by the Nizamut Adawlut within the purview of that section (see note to Sohawun's Case, 1 Niz. Adaw. Rep. 221); which Regulation, as there stated, was intended to preserve the lives of many from the effects of passion or revenge, aided by the enormous prejudice of superstition. The Institutes of Menu treat of punishments for certain offences, but nowhere mention [425] forfeiture for suicide. A Hindoo committing suicide does not alter the rule of succession, Strange's "Hindu Law," vol. I. p. 157.

Another important point, is the question of the deceased's domicile. His domicile was Berhampore, about one hundred miles from Calcutta, and though he commits suicide at Calcutta, that fact will not give the Supreme Court jurisdiction over his personal property. [Sir Lawrence Peel.—He had a residence at Calcutta, which would make him subject to civil process (see Baboo Janakey Doss v. Binabun Doss, 3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 175).]

Lastly, regard being had to the proceedings of the Indian Government, and to the absence of any claim on the part of the Crown, and the ultimate waiver of its rights, if any, it would be inequitable to enforce the law of forfeiture, if it exists in India, which we deny, against the estate of Rajah Kistonaath Roy. If the Crown had insisted upon its prerogative, under the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV. c. 85, the inquisition might have been traversed, which could have been done with effect, Toomes v. Etherington (Saunders, 363a), 1 Hale, P.C. 417, first, as being against evidence, and, secondly, on the ground of the misdirection of the Coroner. The Government have stood by for twenty years without asserting its claim.

The consideration of the case was adjourned, and their Lordships' judgment was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 22, 1863).—The question in this case arises on the claim of the Crown to a portion of the personal estate of Rajah Kistonaath Roy, who destroyed himself in [426] Calcutta on the 31st of October, 1844, and was found by inquisition to have been folo de se.

We understand that the Rajah had a residence in Calcutta, though his Raj, or Zemindary, was at some distance from that city. He was a Hindoo both by birth and religion.

On the morning of the day on which he destroyed himself he made a Will, by which he left a large portion of his property to the East India Company for charitable purposes.

The Will was disputed by his widow, who was his heiress, and a suit was instituted by her against the East India Company and others, to determine its validity. It was agreed between the litigating parties that the question should be tried by an issue at law. The widow insisted, amongst other objections, that the Testator was not in a fit state of mind to make a Will at the time of its execution.

The issue was tried, and a verdict was found by the Judges against the Will, upon what ground does not distinctly appear, and the verdict was acquiesced in by the Indian Government.

If the Crown, by virtue of the inquisition, was entitled to all the personal property of the Rajah, the validity or invalidity of the Will was, as regards his personal estate, of no importance.

Now, the inquisition had found that the goods and chattels of the Rajah when he committed self-murder amounted within Calcutta to Rs. 9,87,063, and without the town of Calcutta to Rs. 2,89,500; and it stated that all this property was claimed by the widow.

No claim to any part of it appears at that time to have been set up by the East India Company on be-[427]-half of the Crown, and very large sums were from time to time, by the order, or with the consent of the Indian Government, paid over to the widow in the years 1846 and 1847.

A portion, however, of the Rajah's personal estate, amounting to between six and seven lacs of Rupees, was secured in the Supreme Court, in order to provide for the payment of life annuities to two ladies, both then living. The existence of these charges seems to have been the only reason why this fund was not transferred to the widow with the rest of the estate.

One of the annuitants is now dead, and the fund reserved to answer her annuity is of course set free. This fund is now claimed by the Indian Government under the finding on the inquisition of 1844.

It is stated in the affidavit of a gentleman who was Manager for the widow on the death of her husband, that he was advised in 1844, by three English Counsel of eminence, whom he names, that the verdict on the inquisition might be set aside on the ground both of misdirection by the Coroner, and as being against the weight of evidence, but that proceedings were not taken for that purpose, because the Government represented, through its law agents, that no claim would ever be made under the verdict.

If the facts be such as we have stated, it is impossible not to feel some surprise at the present demand; and, if we differed from the Court below, it would deserve much consideration whether a claim which seems to have been abandoned in 1844, ought now to be entertained. But these facts do not seem to have been noticed by the Judge in India; there may [428] possibly be circumstances with which we are unacquainted to account for the course taken by the Government, and we think it better to dispose of the case on the merits.

At what time then, and in what manner, did the forfeiture attached by the law of England to the personal property of persons committing suicide in that country, become extended to a Hindoo committing the same act in Calcutta?

The sum of the Appellant's argument was this:—that the English Criminal law was applicable to Natives as well as Europeans within Calcutta, at the time when the death of the Rajah took place, and the sovereignty of the English Crown was at that time established; that the English settlers when they first went out to the East Indies in the reign of Queen Elizabeth took with them the whole law of England, both Civil and Criminal, unless so far as it was inapplicable to them in their new condition; that the law of jelo de se was a part of the Criminal law of England which was not inapplicable to them in their new condition, and that it, therefore, became part of the law of the country.

Where Englishmen establish themselves in an uninhabited or barbarous country, they carry with them not only the laws, but the sovereignty of their own state: and those who live amongst them and become members of their community become also partakers of, and subject to the same laws.

But this was not the nature of the first settlement made in India—it was a settlement made by a few foreigners for the purpose of trade in a very populous and highly civilized country, under the Government [429] of a powerful Mahomedan ruler, with whose sovereignty the English Crown never attempted nor pretended to interfere for some centuries afterwards.

If the settlement had been made in a Christian country of Europe, the settlers would have become subject to the laws of the country in which they settled. It is true that in India they retained their own laws for their own government within the Factories, which they are permitted by the ruling powers of India to establish; but this was not on the ground of general international law, or because the Crown of England or the laws of England had any proper authority in India, but upon the principles explained by Lord Stowell in a very celebrated and beautiful passage of his judgment in the case of The Indian Chief (3 Rob. Adm. Rep. 28).

The laws and usages of Eastern countries where Christianity does not prevail are so at variance with all the principles, feelings, and habits of European Christians that they have usually been allowed by the indulgence and weakness of the Potentates of those countries to retain the use of their own laws, and their Factories have for many purposes been treated as part of the territory of the Sovereign from whose dominions they come. But the permission to use their own laws by European settlers does not extend those laws to Natives within the same limits, who remain to all intents and purposes subjects of their own Sovereign, and to whom European laws and usages are as little suited as the laws of the Mahometans and Hindoos are suited to Europeans. These principles are too clear to require any authority to support them, but they are recognized in the judgment to which we have above referred.

[430] But if the English laws were not applicable to Hindoos on the first settlement of the country, how could the subsequent acquisition of the rights of sovereignty by the English Crown make any alteration? It might enable the Crown by express enactment to alter the laws of the country, but until so altered the laws remained unchanged. The question, therefore, and the sole question in this case is, whether by express enactment the English law of jelo de se, including the forfeiture attached to it, had been extended in the year 1844 to Hindoos destroying themselves in Calcutta.

We were referred by Mr. Melvill in his very able argument, to the Charter of Charles II. in 1661, as the first, and indeed the only one which in express terms introduces English law into the East Indies. It gave authority to the Company to appoint Governors of the several places where they had or should have Factories, and it authorized such Governors and their Council to judge all persons belonging to the said Company, or that should live under them, in all causes, whether Civil or Criminal, according to the laws of the Kingdom of England, and to execute judgment accordingly.

The English Crown, however, at this time clearly had no jurisdiction over native subjects of the Mogul, and the Charter was admitted by Mr. Melvill (as we understood him) to apply only to the European servants of the Company; at all events it could have no application to the question now under consideration. The English law, Civil and Criminal, has been usually considered to have been made applicable to Natives, within the limits of Calcutta, in the year 1726, by the Charter, 13th Geo. I. Neither that nor the [431] subsequent Charters expressly declare that the English law shall be so applied, but it seems to have been held to be the necessary consequence of the provisions contained in them.

But none of these Charters contained any forms applicable to the punishment, by forfeiture or otherwise, of the crime of self-murder, and with respect to other offences to which the Charters did extend, the application of the criminal law of England to Natives not Christians, to Mahomedans and Hindoos, has been treated as subject to qualifications without which the execution of the law would have been attended with intolerable injustice and cruelty.

To apply the law which punishes the marrying a second wife whilst the first is living, to a people amongst whom polygamy is a recognized institution, would have been monstrous, and accordingly it has not been so applied.

In like manner, the law, which in England most justly punishes as a heinous offence, the carnal knowledge of a female under ten years of age, cannot with any propriety be applied to a country where puberty commences at a much earlier age, and where females are not unfrequently married at the age of ten years.

Accordingly, in the case referred to in the argument, the law was held not to apply.

Is the law of forfeiture for suicide one which can be considered properly applicable to Hindoos and Mahomedans?

The grounds on which suicide is treated in England as an offence against the law, and punished by forfeiture of the offender's goods and chattels to the King, are stated more fully in the case of Hales v. Petit, in Plowden's Reports, p. 261, than in any other book [432] which we have met with. It is there stated, that it is an offence against nature, against God, and against the King. Against nature, because against the instinct of self-preservation; against God, because against the commandment "Thou shalt not kill," and a felo de se kills his own soul; against the King, in that thereby he loses a subject.

Can these considerations extend to native Indians, not Christians, not recognizing the authority of the Decalogue, and owing at the time when this law is supposed to have been introduced no allegiance to the King of Great Britain?

The nature of the punishment also is very little applicable to such persons. A part of it is, that the body of the offender should be deprived of the rites of Christian burial in consecrated ground. The forfeiture extends to chattels real and personal, but not to real estate; these distinctions, at least in the sense in which they are understood in England, not being known or intelligible to Hindoos and Mahomedans.

Self-destruction, though treated by the law of England as Murder, and spoken of in the case to which we have referred in Plowden as the worst of all Murders, is really, as it affects society, and in a moral and religious point of view, of a character very different not only from all other Murders, but from all other Felonies. These distinctions are pointed out with great force and clearness in the notes attached to the Indian Code, as originally prepared by Lord Macaulay and the other Commissioners. The truth is, that the act is one which in countries not influenced by the doctrines of Christianity has been regarded as deriving its moral character altogether [433] from the circumstances in which it is committed:—sometimes as blameable, sometimes as justifiable, sometimes as meritorious, or even an act of positive duty.

In this light suicide seems to have been viewed by the founders of the Hindoo Code, who condemn it in ordinary cases as forbidden by their religion; but in others, as in the well-known instances of Sutte and self-inmolation under the car of Juggernaut, treat it as an act of great religious merit.

We think, therefore, the law under consideration inapplicable to Hindoos, and if it had been introduced by the Charters in question with respect to Europeans, we should think that Hindoos would have been excepted from its operation. But that it was not so introduced appears to us to be shown by the admirable judgment of Sir Barnes Peacock in this case; and if it were not so introduced, then as regards Natives, it never had any existence.

It would not necessarily follow that, therefore, it never had existed as regards Europeans. That question would depend upon this, whether, when the original settlers, under the protection of their own Sovereign, were governed by their own laws, those laws included the one now under consideration; whether an offence of this description was an offence against the King's peace, for which he was entitled to claim forfeiture; whether the Factory could for this purpose be considered as within his jurisdiction. In that case it might be that the subsequent appointment of Coroners by the Act of the 33rd Geo. III. would render effectual a right previously existing, but for the recovery of which no adequate remedy had been previously provided.

[434] We are not quite sure whether the Court below intended to determine this point or not. Much of the reasoning in the judgment is applicable to Europeans as well as to Natives, but the Chief Justice in his judgment says:—"At present we have merely to consider the question, so far as it relates to the goods and chattels of a Native who wilfully and intentionally destroys himself, and who cannot in strictness be called a jelo de se; and we now proceed to deal with that question, and with that question alone" (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 404).

The point so decided we think perfectly clear, and it is not necessary to go further. Since the New Code, which confines the penalty of forfeiture within much narrower limits than existed previously to its enactment, and does not extend it to the property of persons committing suicide, the case can hardly again arise.

We have no doubt that it is our duty in this case, humbly to advise Her Majesty to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

[435] PRANNATH CHOWDRY,—Appellant; RANEE SURNOMOYE DOSSEE,—Respondent * [Feb. 23, 1863].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

A Zemindar granted his Zemindary by Pottah, or lease, as a Putnee Talook, at a fixed annual rent. Adjacent to the demised lands were other lands called Bheel Bhurruttee lands, to which the Zemindar had only a temporary interest, but which lands were included in the Pottah. The Bheel Bhurruttee lands were afterwards resumed by the Government under Ben. Reg. II., of 1819, and assessed separately from the Zemindary, the jumma being paid by the lessee for a period of nine years. Held, in a suit brought by the lessees against the lessor's representative for remission of the rent paid on the resumed lands, out of the fixed annual rent, that by the terms of the Pottah, the Bheel Bhurruttee lands were not included in the fixed annual rent.

In this suit, the question was, whether the Appellant was entitled to a reduction of the sum of Rs. 714. 11a. per annum, on the fixed annual rent of Rs. 16,001, reserved to Rajah Kistonaath Roy, under two separate sets of instruments. The first set being [436] a Pottah, or lease, of the Respondent's late husband, Rajah Kistonaath Roy, which created an hereditary Putnee Talook, and a corresponding Kaboolat, executed by the Putneedar, or lessee; and the second set, including a similar Pottah and Kaboolat, executed by the Respondent as Zemindar in succession to her husband, and the Appellant and Cassinath Chowdry, as purchasers of the Putnee Talook, and as such the assignees of the original Putneedar. The right to the reduction of the rent was contended for by the Appellant on the ground, that the Appellant and Cassinath had entered into a settlement with the Government Collector for the payment of the sum of Rs. 714. 11a. per annum, as Government revenue, in respect of a small piece of land, described as Bheel Bhurutte land, previously only temporarily settled, and which settlement had expired by effluxion of time within less than a year of the dates of the first Pottah and Kabooleat. This new settlement, however, it appeared, was made voluntarily, and for their own benefit, by the Appellant and Cassinath previously to applying for the Pottah from the Respondent and executing the Kabooleat, by which they expressly undertook to pay to the Respondent, as Zemindar, the full amount of the fixed annual rents reserved by the original instruments, without any deduction whatever. There was a further question raised in the Court below, whether the Appellant was entitled to recover from the Respondent the gross sum of Rs. 7861. 9a., with interest out of the fixed annual rent of Rs. 16,001, which the Appellant had paid under these instruments, for a period of nine years, previous to the time when the suit was brought. This sum of Rs. 7861. [437] was the aggregate amount of the payments of Rs. 714. 11a. per annum, charged by the Appellants on account of the Government revenue during the period of nine years and upwards. The Zillah Court decided the two points in favour of the Appellant, but without allowing interest, and the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut on appeal, reversed that decree on both points. Hence this appeal.

The following were the facts of the case:—

Rajah Kistonaath Roy was possessed of a hereditary Zemindary, called Dehee Hajeepore Dehee, Nabudenttee, etc., appertaining to Pergunnah Boorun, otherwise Lockenathpore, the annual Government revenue payable for which, under the permanent settlement, was Rs. 9976. 8a. 4p., and was recorded as proprietor in the books of the Collector of Zillah Nuddea. It appeared that there was near or adjoining to the Zemindary a piece of reclaimed land, described as Bheel Bhurutte (filled up), which was not included in the perpetually settled lands of the Zemindary, but subsequently assessed for a short fixed period, this piece of land was, under the ordinary proceedings taken on behalf of Government. This resumption took place while the Rajah was a minor, and thereupon his guardians entered into a temporary settlement with Government for the land, for a period of ten years, ending in the years 1251 B.E., corresponding with the year 1844-5 C.E. The revenue assessed by the Government officer, and made payable under that settlement, was paid separately from the Government revenue payable for the Zemindary, first by the guardians, and subsequently by the Rajah; and this payment was made, as it appeared, not into the Collectorate of Zillah [438] Nuddea, where the Government revenue for this Zemindary was paid, but into the Collectorate of Barasett in the adjoining Zillah of the 24 Pergunnahs.

On the 18th of July, 1844, the Rajah, in consideration of Rs. 20,000, paid down, and an annual fixed rent of Rs. 16,001, exclusive of Suranjamee (collection expenses) and Malikanah (proprietor's maintenance allowance), reserved and made payable for ever to the Zemindar, gave to J. D. Herklotts, and his heirs, as a reward for past services as his manager, a beneficial lease of his Zemindary and Zemindary rights; and a Pottah was accordingly executed by the Rajah of that date, which created and granted to Herklotts and his heirs for ever, a tenure called a Putnee Talook, of the Zemindary, recognized and sanctioned by Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1819, to be held and enjoyed by Herklotts and his heirs and assigns, subject to the payment of the above annual fixed rent to the Zemindar. This Pottah described the premises granted by the Rajah as a Putnee Talook:—as “My Zemindary in Zillah Nuddea, the Sudder jumma of which is entered at Co.'s Rs. 996. 8a. 4p. in the Collectorate of the Zillah, together with the Modafat, the Mouzahs, the entire Zemindary rights, with the settled Churs resumed Chukeran, Khangee Lakhiraj Kureedgee (purchased), Dawuttur, Chuppur, and Backuppore (inhabited and uninhabited), Chuckbustee, in possession and out of possession, movable and immovable, the whole of the Mehals, together with the lands settled under Reg. II.” And the Pottah, after providing, that “whatever orders are in force, and such as may hereafter be issued from the authorities of the Collectorate, etc., [439] you will obey and act accordingly,” concluded as follows:—“The Zemindary rights that I have in the Dhees (villages) aforesaid have been made over to you in Putnee, the boundaries of which, as they have existed in possession, you will preserve, and, paying the Malguzaree, you will continue to hold and enjoy from generation to generation."

The Kabooleat, or counterpart of the Pottah or lease was executed by Herklotts, followed entirely the Pottah, repeating only its provisions, with this addition, viz.:—"I will make Jurreep (measurement) Jummabundee (assessment) of rent payable by the Ryots) of the said Mehal (estate), and whatever excess (i.e., of rent) may arise thereby shall be my right. The same will have nothing to do with you."

The Rajah committed suicide (see as to the effect of felo de se, the case of The Adm. Gen. of Bengal v. Ranee Surnomoye Dossee, ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 391), whereupon the Respondent instituted a suit in the Supreme Court in Calcutta, as his widow and heiress-at-law, claiming to be entitled to the estate and property; and she was put into possession of the estate and property of the Rajah.

Before this took place, and on the 7th of December, 1844, Herklotts entered into an agreement with the Appellant and Cassinath to sell to them the Putnee Talook, and all his rights under the Pottah and Kabooleat, for the sum of Rs. 42,815, and Rs. 11,000, of that amount was on that date paid to Herklotts, as earnest-money. The Kubula (instrument of sale) was executed by Herklotts on the 10th of January, 1845. That instrument set out the premises in the language of the before-mentioned Pottah and [440] Kabooleat, the agreement for sale and payment of the earnest-money aforesaid, as well as the payment of the balance of the purchase-money, viz.—Rs. 31,815; and that Herklotts had on his part undertaken to put them in possession of the Putnee Talook, and to have the purchaser's names registered by the Zemindar, in the place of his own, as Talookdars; and that the latter would, on their part pay, according to the stipulations of my Putnee Pottah and the Kabooleat Kistbundee, Rs. 16,001, as Malguzary, to the Rajah, from year to year, and hold possession from generation to generation over the proceeds of the Putnee Talook aforesaid.

It appeared that the Appellant and Cassinath also got possession of the piece of Bheel Bhurruttee in the Zillah of 24 Pergunnahs, together with the lands granted to Herklotts in Putnee, situate in the Zillah Nuddea.

The temporary settlement of this piece of land being about to expire, a remeasurement of the same on the part of Government took place in the year 1251, when the same was set down at 1340 beegahs 1 cottah; and on the expiration of the term of the Settlement, the Government Collector made a new settlement, on the basis of the last measurement, and accordingly assessed the lands in question at the rate of 8 annas $6\frac{1}{2}$ gundahs, payable as Government revenue annually, per beegah, making the aggregate amount Rs. 7114. 11a., from which, however, was then deducted 12 per cent, on account of allowance for Surunjamee (collection) and other expenses, leaving a fixed annual revenue of Rs. 628. 14a. 16p., payable to Government, including the Malikanah of [441] Rs. 62. 14a. 8p. annually. It appeared, also, that on the application of the Appellant and Cassinath Chowdry, without communicating with the Respondent, as the heiress-at-law, or with the Court of Wards, a settlement was made with them by the Government Collector in respect of that piece of land, on the terms aforesaid, and for a settlement for a new term of ten years, commencing in the year 1252 B.E., and ending in the year 1261 B.E., and that, by such settlement, it was expressly provided that the Ijardars (farmers), should pay the Malikanah and should deposit the same in the Government treasury, having been calculated first at the rate of 13 per cent, being Rs. 81. 12a. 4p. per annum; but afterwards, on 10th of March, 1851, at the reduced rate of 10 per cent per annum, making Rs. 62. 14a. 3p., per annum, and that on the 17th of June, 1845, the Appellant and Cassinath without the privity of the Respondent, took an Amulnamah Pottah, or Ijarah (farming) lease of the Bheel Bhurruttee land from the Government, on the terms of the above settlement.

Subsequently, and in accordance with the provisions of Ben. Reg. VIII., of 1819, they, as purchasers of the Putnee Talook, applied to the Respondent, as heiress-at-law of her late husband, for a confirmation of the purchase and registration of their names in the Zemindary books, offering security for their due payment of the fixed annual rent of Rs. 16,001, in respect of their Putnee Talook.

Their names, as such purchasers, were accordingly registered in place of the Herklots, in respect of the Putnee Talook, in the records of the Zemindary by the Appellant, on their executing the usual Ikrar [442] Kabooleat (agreement to pay rent). This Ikrar Kabooleat, executed on the 20th September, 1849, had no reference to, and made no mention of, the piece of Bheel Bhurruttee land, or of the new settlement thereof.

In accordance with custom, a Pottah of confirmation was executed and delivered by the Respondent to the parties, on the 19th of October, 1849. That Pottah recited the Ikrar Kabooleat, and concluded as follows:—"It is necessary that you, considering yourselves confirmed as Putneedars of the Mehals above mentioned, according to the stipulations of your respective Kabooleats and Ikrars, remain in possession of the Mehals, and enjoy the same, and that you, from month to month, and Kist to Kist, according to Kistbundee, pay the rent due from each, and in nowise depart from the Kabooleats and Ikrars given by you separately."

From the dates of the Pottahs and other deeds respectively, to the filing of the plaint in the suit, the Appellant and Cassinath paid to the Respondent, without making any objection, or protest in performance of their covenant in that behalf contained in their Ikrar Kabooleat, the fixed annual rent of Rs. 16,001, according to the prescribed instalments in the Kistbundee. And also paid into the Government treasury for the Respondent, the sum of Rs. 62. 14a. 3p. per annum, Malikanah allowance, together with the amount of Government revenue—Rs. 566. 0a. 7p.—making together the sum of Rs. 628. 14a. 10p., so reserved and made payable by them as such farmers of the piece of Bheel Bhurruttee land under the new settlement with the Government, without any objection on [443] their part, and it was not until the plaint hereinafter mentioned was filed, that any intimation was conveyed to the Respondent, that the Appellants considered themselves entitled to claim any deduction from the fixed annual rent of Rs. 16,001, on the ground of their having entered into the new settlement, and thereby undertaking to pay revenue in respect of that piece of Bheel Bhurruttee land.

The suit out of which this appeal arose was commenced by the Appellant and the others in the Zillah Court of the 24 Pergunnahs. The principal facts above set forth appeared in the plaint; which sought to recover the gross sum of Rs. 11,692. 4a. 13p., on account, as the Plaintiffs alleged, of rent twice paid, being the sum of Rs. 714. 11a., from the year 1252 to 1260 B.E., a period of nine years and five months, and it prayed that such sum of Rs. 714. 11a. might be deducted from the fixed annual rent of Rs. 16,001, of the Putnee Talook, and that the sum of Rs. 15,286. 5a. be fixed as the annual jumma of the Putnee Talook. The plaint did not allege that the Respondent was ever applied to by the Plaintiffs to enter into the new settlement with Government in respect of the piece of Bheel Bhurruttee land, or that there was any undertaking on the part of her late husband, that he or his heirs would do so.

The answer of the Respondents denied the right of the Appellants to recover, stating the circumstances under which the Putnee Talook was granted to Herklotts, and denied that the instruments creating the Putnee included, or that it was the intention of the Rajah and Herklotts to include, the jumma of the resumed lands within the permanent jumma of the Putnee tenure. [444] and the answer submitted to the Court that the Appellants were not entitled to recover the principal moneys claimed; and that, in any case, interest was not payable.

The suit being at issue the original Putnee Pottah and Kabooleat executed by the late Rajah and Herklotts respectively; the Kubbala, executed by Herklotts in favour of Appellant and Cassinath; the Pottah of confirmation executed by the Respondent were put in evidence.

The Respondent filed, as evidence, the Kabooleat executed by the Plaintiffs to the Respondent, containing their covenant, binding themselves to pay in full, without deduction, the fixed rent of Rs. 16,001, expressly reserved by the Respondent's Pottah, and applied that the Appellant and Cassinath might be examined, which the Court refused.

The hearing of the suit took place before Mr. J. S. Torrens, the Judge of the Zillah 24 Pergunnahs, on 6th of August, 1855, and his decree was made on the 19th of September, 1855, in favour of the claim of the Plaintiffs; the material part of this decree was as follows:—"On consideration, as it appears that the Plaintiffs have been obliged to pay jumma twice over on their Putnee, owing to Defendant not fulfilling her part of the contract as far as in her power. I give a decree for the deduction; but as the claim must be calculated according to the engagement as exchanged at the time the Putnee was constituted, I deduct from this the jumma on the thirty-five beegabs measured in excess of the settlement as existing when the Putnee was given; also the Surrunjamee allowed to Plaintiffs by the Collector, viz., Rs. 83. 8a. per annum [445] on the jumma paid, the deduction henceforward from the Putnee jumma, and the refund on past collections to be calculated accordingly, subject to Defendant having a right to demand at any time from Plaintiffs the right of entering herself into settlement as Zemindar, and, in doing so, receiving the original Putnee jumma; such arrangement being in conformity with the object of the prayer of the plaint, which is only to avoid double payment. It does not appear either that the plaint sets forth that the demand for restitution was made to the Rance before the institution of the suit, and I, therefore, do not allow interest previously accruing; only that from date of the action. Costs to be modified accordingly."

The Respondent appealed from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, on the merits and on the special ground, that the Judge had refused to take the evidence of the Appellant and Cassinath. The Appellant also appealed against the decree, so far as it did not give interest on the claim.

The hearing of the two appeals came on before the full Bench of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, consisting of Messrs. C. B. Trevor, G. Loch, and H. V. Bayley, on the 30th of April, 1858; when the Court reversed the decree of the Zillah Judge, and delivered the following judgment:—"After giving our best consideration to the arguments of the Pleaders and the circumstances of the case, we are of opinion, that neither the terms of the lease generally, nor the special words relied on, 'settled Churs,' and 'lands settled under Reg. II., of 1819,' include, or can be fairly construed to include, the lands in suit. The lease is definite and distinct throughout as to its [446] being a lease for Mehal Dehee Hajeepoor and Dehee Nabudcuttee, in Zillah Nuddea, paying a jumma there of Rs. 9996. 15a. 8p. The 'settled Chur,' and 'lands settled under Regulation II.,' and the other supplementary definitions of what is included in the lease, refer to the appurtenances of the Putnee Mehal, with its above jumma, as paid into the Nuddea Collectorate; and to no separate Mehal, such as Bheel Bhurruttee lands in suit. We observe that the Zillah Judge refers to the admission made by the Defendant as to Herklotts having received these lands along with his Putnee; but this is not so. The words in the answer are, that such rights in the Bheel Bhurruttee as the Rajah had, were given to Herklotts. But those rights were merely those of settlement, and we cannot see that there is any admission here that the Bheel Bhurruttee lands formed part of the Putnee lease. We further observe, that the revenue of the Putnee Mehal was paid into the Nuddea Collectorate separately, and that of the Bheel Bhurruttee lands into the Twenty-four Pergunnahs Collectorate separately; that the Plaintiffs got possession simultaneously of the Putnee Mehal and separate Bheel Bhurruttee land; that the Plaintiffs paid the rents of the Putnee and Bheel Bhurruttee independently and separately, for nine years and more, without protest, although they had full and obvious occasion for making such protest when they registered themselves as Putneedars in the Zemindari Sherishta, and when they received the farming lease of the lands in suit. These facts show an acquiescence by Plaintiffs, which affords a strong legal presumption that the lands in suit were not included in the Putnee lease. Under these circum-[447]stances, it is needless to give our opinion at any length as to the evidence of Defendant's witnesses. We deem it, however, in itself vague and unsatisfactory as to the point of the parties intending and speaking of the intention that the lands in suit should be considered included in the Putnee, and insufficient of itself to rebut the evidence to the contrary afforded by the terms of the deed and the facts of the case. We, therefore, reverse the decision of the Judge in the appeal, No. 157, and decree the appeal, with costs, on the Plaintiffs. In the appeal No. 158, in which Prannath Chowdry appeals on the point of interest, we dismiss his appeal as a necessary consequence of our judgment in the foregoing case, with costs."

The Sudder Court refused leave to appeal, but upon special petition leave was granted by the Judicial Committee (see case reported upon this point, 7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 553).

Mr. Rolfe, Q.C., and Mr. W. M. Jervis, for the Appellant, in support of the appeal, contended that the resumed lands in question were originally appurtenant to and included within the Zemindary of Rajah Kistonaath Roy, and that the lands were resumed and a summary settlement made under Ben. Reg. II., of 1819, with the guardians of the Zemindar for ten years from April, 1835, to April, 1845, and the Putnee Pottah of the 18th of July, 1844, expressly included the lands settled under that Regulation, and bore date before the settlement made with the guardians of the Zemindar [448] had expired. That the subsequent instruments in like manner included the lands so settled under that Regulation, and insisted that there were no other lands settled under the Regulation to which the Putnee Pottah and other instruments could refer. That even if the resumed lands were in any way referred to as the Putnee Pottah, there was no reasonable grounds for contending that such Pottah comprised only the Zemindary right to a settlement with Government in respect thereof, and did not comprise the land itself as covered by the purchase money and annual Putnee jumma. That the acts of the Respondent and the deceased Zemindar, whom she represented, were consistent only with such a construction of the Pottah. And they further contended, that the payment of the Government jumma of the resumed lands into the Collectorate of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs and not into the Collectorate of Nuddea, was a mere fiscal arrangement, which could not affect the construction of the contract between the parties.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, appeared for the Respondent, but were not called upon.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—Their Lordships are of opinion that this case is perfectly clear,—and that there can be no doubt that the judgment of the Sudder Court must be affirmed.

The Rajah held the Zemindary at a jumma rent of nearly Rs. 10,000, he sells the Zemindary to a purchaser for Rs. 20,000, and a jumma rent of Rs. 16,000.

In addition to the Zemindary, which he held in perpetuity, there were certain lands which were added [449] by accretion to the Zemindary, which he held for a term of ten years at a jumma rent, with a right of renewal, more or less defined, but at all events with some preferential rights.

In that state of things he sells his Zemindary, and says nothing about the other lands. What does he sell then? He sells, of course, the interest he had; he sells the perpetual interest he had in the lands he held in perpetuity, and he sells the interest he had in the lands he held for ten years for the remainder of that term. At the time the sale is made, it appears that there were only ten months of that term to run. The jumma was a simple one, and it was not necessary to mention the rent for that jumma in the contract. The expiration of the term, namely, at the expiration of the ten months, the purchaser asks a renewal of the term. He has the right of renewal, or the right of throwing up the lands, but he has no contract or engagement with the vendor that will run for his benefit; but he makes a renewal, and he makes a renewal by which he engages to pay a certain rent, he continues to pay a certain rent to the Government, and, having engaged to pay that rent, he continues to pay it for nine years, and then he and others, institute a suit for the purpose of obtaining repayment of what he has thus paid, insisting that he was entitled to it, and asking to have deducted out of Rs. 16,000, which he had engaged to pay to the Ranee. He had obtained by some reason or other a renewal of the grant from the Ranee, and in it he stipulates for payment of Rs. 16,000, per annum, from which he now says Rs. 714. 11a. are to be deducted.

Their Lordships are satisfied that there is no ground [450] for the claim, and will advise Her Majesty to dismiss the appeal with costs, as the appeal in their opinion was groundless.

THE COLLECTOR OF MADURA.—Appellant: VEERACAMOO UMMAL.—Respondent * [June 30, 1863].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

Suit by Government for possession of the Polliam of Erasaca Naiknoor in Madras, as an escheat for want of male heirs, dismissed. The Government having acquiesced in the right of female succession to the Polliam, and possession had for a period of eighteen years after the alleged escheat.

Females are not precluded by any rule of descent, custom, or usage of the Cumbala Tottier caste, from succeeding to a Polliam.

In this case the appeal was brought from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, by which decree the Appellant, as sole surviving heiress of her deceased father, was declared entitled to the Zemindary of Erasaca Naiknoor, with mesne profits.

The facts of the case were these:—

In the year 1802, Mooltalagari Naiker was put into the possession, as Polligar, of the Polliam of Erasaca Naiknoor, by the Government, upon condition of payment of tribute, and other conditions specified [451] in the Moolchilka executed by Mooltalagari Naiker, dated the 17th of December, 1802. It did not appear that any Sunnud-i-Milkeut Istimrar had been granted by the Government of the Polliam in question.

Mooltalagari Naiker died on the 9th of December, 1814. Upon his death the Government did not assume possession of, or interfere with the Polliam, but the same remained in the charge of Ellappa Mudali, the Manager who had conducted the affairs of the Polliam during the lifetime of Mooltalagari Naiker, for the benefit of his son, Chinnobola Naiker, who became the Polligar of Erasaca Naiknoor. Chinnobola Naiker died in the year 1835, without male issue, leaving two widows, named Chinnammal and Papanmmal, by the latter of whom he left one daughter, the Respondent, Veeracamoo Ummal. Shortly after the death of Chinnobola Naiker, one Shuckama Naiker, who had entered upon the management of the affairs of Erasaca Naiknoor Polliam, claimed to be entitled thereto as the nearest male heir of Chinnobola Naiker; whereupon the two widows presented a petition to the Board of Revenue, praying to be put in possession of the Polliam: and an Order having been passed by the Board, granting the prayer of the petition, the Collector of Madura issued a Sunnud on the 4th of April, 1836, putting them in possession.

Disputes arose between the widows as to the joint enjoyment of the Polliam; and, in December, 1836, Papanmmal filed a plaint in the Court of the Sudder Ameen of Madura, against Chinnammal and five other Defendants, for the recovery of half the value of the produce of the Polliam. The Sudder Ameen made a decree in favour of Papanmmal, and from that decree Chinnammal appealed to the [452] Zillah Court of Madura. After putting in her answer, Papanmmal died. The Zillah Court pronounced judgment on the appeal on the 4th of December, 1839, and thereby determined that Chinnammal, as the sole surviving widow of the late Zemindar, should remain in full possession of her husband's Zemindary and other immoveable property; and that, after her death, the deceased widow's only daughter, the Respondent, was the sole heiress.

On the 29th of October, 1841, Shuckama Naiker instituted a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Madura, against Chinnammal, whereby he claimed the Polliam as an undivided cousin and nearest male heir of the late Chinnobola Naiker; and a decree was made in that suit in his favour by the Subordinate Judge. Against that decree an appeal was brought by Chinnammal to the Zillah Court of Madura; and on the 15th of December, 1848, that Court reversed the original decree, and nonsuited Shuckama Naiker.

Chinnammal leased the Polliam to Chockalinga Pillay, in the year 1818, for a term of nine years.

On the 12th of July, 1853, Chinnammal died, and upon her death the Respondent, and Radurasawmy Naiker, the son of Shuckama Naiker, then deceased, put in their several claims to the Polliam of Erasaca Naiknoor, and severally claimed to be put in possession thereof by the Collector of Madura. The Respondent's title was founded upon being the grand-daughter of Chinnobola Naiker, and upon the before-mentioned two decrees of the Zillah Court of Madura, made upon appeal. Radurasawmy Naiker grounded his claim on the fact that Chinnobola Naiker, the last male Polligar, was of the Cumbala Tottier caste, [453] and the custom in that caste, by which he insisted, females were excluded from succeeding to a Polliam, and relied on certain declarations alleged to have been made by Chinnobola Naiker in favour of his branch of the family.

The then Collector of Madura made a report to the Board of Revenue, dated the 6th of September, 1853, upon the respective claims to the Polliam, and reported that it had escheated to the Government. He, at the same time, drew attention to the fact of the lease by Chinnammal to Chokalinga Pillay, and recommended that, as the conditions of the lease had been performed by the lessee, it should stand ratified and confirmed for the period which then remained unexpired; and he also submitted for consideration, whether, in the case of the property being declared to have escheated, a pension should be granted by the Government to the Respondent.

In the year 1854, proceedings were taken by the Respondent in the Court of the Subordinate Judge and in the Zillah Court of Madura, with a view of obtaining a precept in the execution of the before-mentioned decree of 1818, on appeal, requiring the Collector to place her, as the daughter and heiress of Papammal, in possession of the Polliam. Those proceedings resulted in an order of the Zillah Court, directing that the Polliam should be delivered over to the Respondent. Upon appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, however, the Order of the Zillah Court was, on the 26th of February, 1855, set aside, upon the ground, that the Collector was in possession, and was not a party to the suit in which it had been decided that the Polliam should go to the Respondent upon the death of Chinnammal.

[454] The Government shortly afterwards declared that the Polliam of Erasaca Naiknoor had escheated by the failure of male heirs.

In consequence of which, the Respondent, on the 2nd of January, 1856, instituted the present suit in the Civil Court of Madura, against the Collector of Madura and three other Defendants, one of such three Defendants being the adopted son and heir of Chokalinga Pillay, and the other two Defendants being sub-lessees of portions of the Polliam by virtue of leases from Chokalinga Pillay. By the plaint the Respondent prayed for a decree awarding to her the Polliam of Erasaca Naiknoor, together with the mesne profits, amounting to the sum of Rs. 113. 13a. 7p.

The Collector of Madura by his answer insisted, first, that according to the custom of the Cumbala Tottier caste, to which he alleged the Respondent belonged, females were not competent to succeed to a Polliam, and secondly, that the enjoyment of the Polliam by Chinnammal and Papammal was merely permissive on the part of the Government, and that the Respondent could derive no title as against the Government from a decision in a suit in which the Government was not a party. The second Defendant, by his answer, insisted upon the validity of the lease from Chinnammal. The other Defendants did not appear.

The Respondent put in evidence a decree of the Southern Provincial Court, in a suit, No. 10 of 1824, concerning the possession of a Zemindary, called Sandayoor, by which it was decided that the widows of the late Zemindar were entitled to that Zemindary; and examined three witnesses with reference to the custom of females of the Cumbala Tottier caste succeeding to a Polliam.

[455] The evidence adduced by the Collector was solely documentary, the chief of which consisted of copies of answers from Zemindars of the District in which Erasaca Naiker Polliam was situate (one of them being the copy of answers given by Chinnobala Naiker, the last Polligar of Erasaca Naiknoor), with respect to the succession to their respective Polliams. These answers were given at the request of the Government, and were to the effect, that females were debarred from inheriting landed property. A letter to the Board of Revenue from the Collector of Madura, dated the 31st of January, 1804, with respect to Zemindaries to which females could not succeed, was also put in.

After great delay arising from the sickness of the former Collector of Madura, as the suit had not then come to a hearing, the then Collector, on the 11th of February, 1859, presented a petition to the Civil Court, praying the Court to reopen the case and examine his witnesses, and allow him to file documents in support of the statement in the answer that no female of the Cumbala Tottier caste could succeed to a Polliam, and by such petition he submitted, that the right decision of that question was of grave importance, not only to the Government, but to the numerous Polligars, of that caste in the South of India. The Civil Judge, however, on the 14th of February, 1859, passed an order refusing the application.

The officiating Civil Judge, Mr. R. R. Cotton, pronounced judgment on the merits on the 30th of March, 1859. The material part of his judgment was in these terms:— "In the present case it appears clear, that the Plaintiff has been declared the heir and successor to her father's estate after the death of [456] her stepmother, Chinnammal, and that though the first Defendant, on the plea that it was not usual for females to succeed to estates, has prevented her being put in possession of the Erasaca Naiknoor Polliam, he has entirely failed to show that such custom has either the force of law, or is acted up to; on the contrary, he admits in opposition to it that females have been, by order of the Revenue Board, and with his sanction, for the last eighteen years, in enjoyment of this very estate, while the Plaintiff has shown a like enjoyment by females of Sandayoor estate since 1824. With regard to the first Defendant's arguments, that the decree in appeal, No. 20, of 1838, cannot effect the present suit, inasmuch as the Plaintiff was not a party to it, or the estate the property litigated for, the officiating Civil Judge considers them erroneous; it is evident that the Plaintiff on the death of her mother became a party to the suit, as appears from the questions put to the Pundits, and their answer in that case, and that although the suit was brought for recovery of a sum of money, the proprietary right to the estate was the basis on which the suit was brought. As regards the claim made against the second Defendant, as the lease was continued and endorsed by the first Defendant, he must be considered the responsible party. The second Defendant pleaded, that the profits were too highly calculated, and was directed to show this; he filed eight exhibits, receipts for money, which, however, do not disprove the claim of the Plaintiff, whose documentary evidence supports it. It is difficult to reconcile the fact of the first Defendant ignoring the late Chinnammal's right to the estate, and his acknowledging and endorsing an agreement made by her (though at most a life [457] tenant) extending over seven years, and four beyond her decease. Under the above circumstances, the officiating Civil Judge considers that the Plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, and he, therefore, decrees, that the first Defendant do make over to her, as sole surviving heiress of her deceased father, the estate of Erasaca Naiknoor, and do also pay her the mesne profits sued for, and all her costs in this suit. The first and second Defendants will each pay their own costs."

From this decree the Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, and that Court, consisting of Messrs. T. L. Strange and H. Frere, on the 10th of July, 1860, pronounced the following decree—"The Court is of opinion, that the first Defendant is precluded from challenging the succession of females to the estate in issue by the act of the Revenue Board, representing the Government, in installing Chinnammal and Papammal as the legitimate heirs of the previous Polliar, a condition of things that was kept up unchallenged until the death of the survivor of the widows, eighteen years afterwards. It has not been shown that this recognition of the widows was made under any limitation, or reservation. It must be taken, therefore, to have been absolute. It is urged that Polliams of the description of that in question, namely, not assured by Istimirar Sunnud, are not hereditary, but are held at the will of the Government, who on each lapse may appoint thereto whom they please. This plea, the Sudder Court notice, was not advanced in the Court below. The plea there urged was, in fact, inconsistent therewith. It was there contended, that the estate had fallen to the Government by escheat from lack of heirs, implying, [458] therefore, clearly, that had there been an heir, that person would have been entitled to the property. The plea is also inconsistent with the installation and recognition by the Government of Chinnammal and Papammal as heirs of the preceding Polligar, and with the allegation that the Plaintiff's pretensions are to be negatived, not because such is the will of the Government, but, as she is a female, a certain rule, being a rule of descent, being urged against her. The Court declines to entertain a plea thus urged upon them, not only novel in its nature, but inconsistent with the former pleadings upon which the defence has been based. The Court do not view the decrees cited by the Civil Judge as declaring the Plaintiff's heirship to be conclusive against the Government, who were no parties to the suits in which they were given, but it being clear that on the demise of Chinnammal, without personal heirs, the estate reverts to the line of her husband, whose daughter the Plaintiff is, it is apparent to them that the Plaintiff is the next entitled to succession. The Court, finding no ground for interfering with the decree of the Civil Judge, dismiss this appeal with costs."

The present appeal was from this decree.

As the Respondent did not appear the appeal was heard ex parte.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellant, contended. First, that by the rule and custom of the Cumbala Tottier caste, to which the Polligars of the Polliam of Erasaca Naiknoor belonged, no female could succeed to the Polliam, and the Respondent, [459] therefore, had no title, and further that, at the death of the last male possessor in 1835, in default of male issue, the Polliam, which was not assured by Istinnirar Sumud, escheated to Government, although the Government permitted the widows the enjoyment thereof for their lives.

Secondly, that there had been a miscarriage of justice, as evidence to prove the rule and custom of succession to the Polliam, which had been tendered to the Civil Court of Madura, before the hearing of the suit, had been refused, and it was submitted that on that ground the case should be remitted to India to take further evidence.

Their Lordships, after observing upon the delay on the part of the Government in asserting their claim to the Polliam by escheat for the want of male heirs, and the evidence as to the custom and usage for females to succeed to the Polliam in question adduced by the Respondent, expressed their opinion, that the judgment appealed from was perfectly right, and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

On appeal from the Supreme Court at Madras.

Act, No. XXX. of 1858, of the Legislative Council of India, for the administration of the estate, and payment of the debts of the late Nabob of the Carnatic, empowered the Supreme Court of Madras, to investigate in a summary manner, claims against the Nabob's estate. Held, that the provisions of that Act not only limited the extraordinary remedy which it gave to certain defined classes of debt, but threw upon a Claimant more than the ordinary burthen of proof; by compelling the holder of any written acknowledgment, or security, to prove the actual consideration given for it; and upon those claiming the price of the goods delivered, proof of the fair and actual value of such goods.

It is not the practice of the Judicial Committee to disturb the finding of the Court below upon mere issues of fact, unless their Lordships are clearly satisfied that there has been some miscarriage, either in the reception, or in the appreciation, of evidence.

In cases that turn upon the credibility of the testimony given, the appellate Court is disposed to defer to the judgment of the Judges who, with the advantage of local experience, have had the means of seeing the witnesses under examination, and of inspecting the original documents.

This appeal was brought from such part of an Order of the Supreme Court at Madras, made in the matter of a claim of the Appellant, Ghoolam Moor-[461]-toozah Khan Bahadoor, as a creditor of the estate of the late Nabob of the Carnatic, as did not allow certain sums of money and interest claimed by him against the Nabob's estate.

The Nabob and his family, under the provisions of the Treaty by which the territory of the Carnatic was ceded to the British Government, was by Act of the Legislative Council of India, No. I. of 1844, exempted from process of the ordinary Courts of justice in Madras.

The last Nabob of the Carnatic died on the 7th of October, 1855, leaving debts and liabilities to a large amount unsatisfied, some of which were contracted by himself and some by Azeem Jah Bahadoor, as Nabob Regent, or Naib-i-Mooktar, during the infancy of the late Nabob.

By an Act of the Legislative Council of India, No. XXX. of 1858, provision was made for the appointment of a Receiver for the administration of the estate of the Nabob, and with respect to the satisfaction of all such debts as should be proved to have been fairly and justly contracted by the Nabob, or on his behalf, during his minority by Azeem Jah Bahadoor, as Nabob Regent. Section 14 of that Act enacts, that "Any person claiming to be a creditor of the said late Nabob, who, within the period of three months from the passing of this Act, shall file in the office of the Registrar of the said Supreme Court (at Madras), a written declaration, stating that he is willing to receive in full discharge of all his claims against the said late Nabob, or any property to which the said late Nabob at the time of his death was entitled, either at law or in equity, or which is liable either at law or in equity to satisfy the debts of the Nabob, such amount as shall be [462] ascertained by the said Supreme Court to have been justly and fairly due to him from the said late Nabob at the time of his death, or to be a charge upon such property, and to remain unpaid (the amount to be estimated in respect of moneys at the amount which shall be proved to have been actually advanced to or paid for the use of the said Nabob, and in respect of goods supplied or other matters at the amount which shall be proved to have been the fair and actual value thereof at the time when such debts were incurred), together with such interest (if any) not exceeding the rate of six per cent. per annum, as shall be awarded by the said Court; and that he is willing to give up any mortgage or security which he may hold upon any part of such property as aforesaid, or which shall have been charged with the debt,—shall be entitled, upon giving up such mortgage, or security, to the said Receiver, to have the amount of his claim ascertained by the said Court, in manner hereinafter mentioned."

Section 22 of the same Act, so far as the same is material in this case, was as follows:—"Upon the day so fixed, or upon any other day to which the Court may think fit to postpone the investigation, the Court, after proof of the service of the notice required by section 19 of this Act, shall proceed to ascertain and determine, in a summary way, what amount is justly and fairly due from the estate of the said Nabob at the time of his death to the Claimant, whether the debt be payable by instalments or not, and whether or not the day or days fixed for the payment thereof shall have arrived. In ascertaining such amount the said Court shall not allow to any person claiming to be a creditor in respect of money lent or advanced, any larger sum than the amount which shall be [463] proved to have been actually advanced to or for the said late Nabob. * * * *"

It appeared from the evidence adduced before the Supreme Court in support of the Appellant's claim, that the Appellant was the nearest male relative of the late Nabob, and many years older than the Nabob, and, having been associated with him from his early childhood, was upon terms of the greatest intimacy with him: that he had been brought up by the Nabob's grandmother, commonly called the Nabob Begum, and was the intimate friend and confidential agent of the Nabob Begum; and also of the Nabob's mother, Ennayet Oonissa Begum, commonly called Bhow Begum; that prior to the year 1843, the Appellant received from the two Begums gifts of houses and other property, and also large sums of money, to the amount of about 4 laes of Rupees; but in consequence of his extravagance, he was obliged to take the benefit of the Indian Insolvent Act in July, 1843; that subsequently to that period, the Appellant was constantly employed by the young Nabob, who had been installed in August, 1842, in obtaining loans of large sums of money for him through money-lenders; and there appeared to have been numerous confidential pecuniary transactions between the Nabob, his mother and grandmother, and the Appellant; that in the year 1848, the Nabob, being involved in debt, established an office called Istafa Cutcherry, or an office for the settling of accounts; and from that office Bonds were issued in settlement of accounts ascertained to be due, such Bonds bearing or not bearing interest, according to the terms thereof; that shortly after the establishment of the Istafa Cutcherry, the Appellant sent in a document, purporting to be an [464] account of balances due to him; but, inasmuch as such account was a mere abstract, without any particulars, and the particulars, though demanded, were never obtained from the Appellant, his account was not settled, as were the accounts sent in by other persons, and the same remained unsettled at the time of the death of the Nabob in 1855; that the Nabob's mother died some time before the month of May, 1849; the Nabob's grandmother in the year 1857; and the mother of the Appellant about the same time.

On the 19th of November, 1858, the Appellant filed a written declaration, in the term prescribed by section 14 of the Act, No. XXX., of 1858, in the office of the Registrar of the Supreme Court, and thereby claimed to be a creditor of the late Nabob. Notice of such declaration was subsequently given to the Solicitor of the Government at Madras, together with the particulars of his claim, filed by him, and showing as due to him from the Nabob's estate, upon a balance of account, the sum of Rs. 13,50,958. 8a. 7p.

The particulars of claim consisted of two parts; and in the first part—the items in respect of which a claim for principal and interest was made—were described as follows:—1st item. “1846, January 10.—To cash deposited by this Claimant's mother with Ennayet Oonissa Begum, the mother of the late Nabob, prior to the date, which money was admitted by the late Nabob to be due and payable by him to this Claimant, in a letter addressed to this Claimant, written by his order and signed by Salar-ool Moolk, his private secretary, dated the 11th day of Shaban, 1271, the original of which is filed herewith. This Claimant is unable, as he does not know when [465] these moneys were paid, to give the dates of the payments; but on this 10th of January, 1846, the late Nabob executed and delivered to this Claimant's mother a bond for Rs. 7,00,000, payable to Mr. J. Arathoon, or order, which bond was given to this Claimant by his mother, and was delivered up by this Claimant to the Istafa Cutcherry, on or about the 1st September, 1851, Rs. 9,00,000.” 2nd item. “1847, September 1.—To cash lent on or about this date by this Claimant's mother to the said Ennayet Oonissa Begum, the mother of the late Nabob, in cash; which money the late Nabob promised to repay to this Claimant, with interest at 6 per cent., by monthly instalments of Rs. 2000. Rs. 1,00,000.” 3rd item. “1841, September 1.—To cash paid by the grandmother of the late Nabob of the Carnatic to his the Nabob's mother, in trust to pay the same to this Claimant as a gift, Rs. 2,00,000.”

In the second part of the particulars, the items in respect of which a claim for principal and interest was made were described as follow:—1st item. “1847, January 1.—To cash paid by this Claimant to the late Nabob of the Carnatic himself, prior to this date, the dates and particulars of which he is unable to give; but, in 1847, this Claimant furnished an account, containing this item, to the Istafa Cutcherry. Rs. 43,462.” 2nd item. “1855, March 5.—To cash paid by this Claimant on this date to the late Nabob of the Carnatic for his use, in cash, Rs. 70,475. 4a. 6p.”

The Claimant was examined and many documents were adduced by him, of which those principally relied on in support of the first item, were, in substance, as follow:—A memorandum in the handwriting of the late [466] Nabob, being an account of loans received by the Nabob from his mother, from January to July, 1843, such loans amounting in the aggregate to Rs. 6,26,132. A document, purporting to be an account of moneys deposited by the mother of the Claimant with the Nabob's mother, and showing Rs. 2,50,000, so deposited in September, 1842, and Rs. 4,50,000, in January, 1843—total Rs. 7,00,000—and also purporting to comprise an account of the amount borrowed by the Nabob out of that sum, setting forth Rs. 6,27,132 as the amount so borrowed prior to August, 1843, and showing Rs. 72,868, as since borrowed up to January, 1844, making together the whole sum of Rs. 7,00,000. A document, purporting to be an account of the moneys borrowed by the Nabob between January and April, 1844, to the amount of Rs. 2,00,000, out of a sum of that amount stated to have been deposited by the Claimant's mother with the Nabob's mother, on the 22nd of January, 1844. A document purporting to be an account of the moneys deposited by the Claimant's mother with the Nabob's mother, and shewing Rs. 2,50,000, so deposited in September, 1842, Rs. 4,50,000, on January 7, 1843, and Rs. 2,00,000, in January, 1844—total Rs. 9,00,000. With respect to the last three documents, no evidence was adduced to prove when or by whom they were written. Though they were found among a miscellaneous collection of papers in a bundle brought from the Nabob's palace, it was urged by the Government that they were open to considerable suspicion, from the fact of the late Nabob's records having been kept in boxes, or bags, which had not, since the death of the Nabob, been securely [467] protected, and were accessible to many persons; and also from the fact of their not having been known to exist by the Officers of Government before the hearing of the claim, although such Officers had been for some time engaged in investigating the claim, and had required all documents bearing thereon to be produced. Another document, called "Memorandum of the account of balances down to the 31st day of December, in the year of Christ, 1847," alleged to have been submitted for settlement by the Claimant to the Istafa Cutcherry shortly after its establishment, which contained the following, amongst other, items:—"The former balance, without any document, Rs. 2 lacs." A document, written on the 10th of January, 1846. "The limited time for repayment is the 31st of December of the said year, for Rs. 7 lacs." A petition of the Claimant to the Nabob, having reference solely to the fact of the Nabob having mortgaged the house in which the Claimant resided. A Letter from Salar-ool Moolk, the Private Secretary of the Nabob, written according to the statements of Salar-ool Moolk and his brother-in-law, Gholam Mahomed, from the dictation of the Nabob, and stated to be, in reply to the above petition. This letter was the document referred to in the statement of this first item in the particulars, and commenced as follows:—"My respected Sir.—In conformity with the Order of His Illustrious Highness, I beg to inform your Honour, in reply to your petition, that, out of the sum of 9 lacs of rupees which belong to the mother of your Honour, and which was, at different times, deposited in the presence of His Highness, in charge of the respected [468] mother of His Highness, a sum of 7 lacs of Rupees was, on one occasion, applied to her use by the respected mother of His Highness, and a bond was thereupon given for it by His Highness, with his signature, under date the 10th day of the month of January, of the year of Christ, 1846." The Claimant also produced a promissory note, dated the 10th of January, 1846, signed by the Nabob in favour of John Arathoon, for 7 lacs of Rupees, which, from indorsements thereon, appeared to have been satisfied by payments from the Istafa Cutcherry, the first payment being of 6 lacs of Rupees on 1st of September, 1851, and the other payment of 1 lac of Rupees, on 28th August, 1852. This promissory note was alleged by the Claimant to have been given by the Nabob on account of the amount alleged to be shown to have been borrowed by the Nabob out of moneys deposited with his mother by the Claimant's mother. The Claimant was examined with reference to his knowledge of the pecuniary transactions between the Nabob and his mother, but all his knowledge was derived solely from certain alleged conversations with those parties; and his evidence as to the subject and effect of any conversation could not be relied on, as he confessed to an exceedingly defective memory.

The principal evidence as to the second item of the first part, namely, Rs. 1,00,000, was as follows:—A document, purporting to be a statement of the amount of loan received by the Nabob's mother from the Claimant's mother, to be repaid by instalments of Rs. 2000; such amount being 1 lac of Rupees. There was, however, no evidence as to when, or by whom, the above document was written. A letter [469] from the Nabob to his Dewan, in which the following passage occurred:—"I then caused the payment to be made, by adding to the fund the sum of two thousand rupees, on account of the instalment of Moomtazool Moolk, which my deceased mother used to pay, in discharge of the balances, amounting to fifty-eight thousand rupees."

The Claimant claimed this second item as against the estate of the Nabob, upon the ground, that he took possession of his mother's property upon her death, but no evidence was adduced as to the amount of such property.

No evidence was given by the Claimant in support of the statement in the particulars as to this second item, namely, that the late Nabob had promised to repay the sum to the Claimant, with interest at six per cent., by monthly instalment of Rs. 2000. Nor was any evidence adduced to show any liability on the part of the late Nabob, or his estate, in respect of the sum comprised in the second item; on the contrary, the Claimant himself stated that he did not include this second item in the account sent in to the Istafa Cutcherry, because it was not the debt of the Nabob, but was the debt of the Nabob's mother.

The principal evidence as to the third item of the first part of the claim, namely, Rs. 2,00,000, was as follows:—A document purporting to be an account of money deposited by the Nabob's grandmother with the Nabob's mother, for the use of the Claimant, on the 4th of September, 1841, to the amount of 2 lacs of Rupees: and also purporting to contain an account of the amount borrowed by the Nabob out of that sum, from time to time, between the years 1844 and 1847, showing the whole sum to have been so borrowed prior [470] to August, 1847. The before-mentioned letter from Salar-ool Moolk which contained the following passage:—"Besides this, a sum of 2 lacs of Rupees which was, one year previous to the coronation of His Highness, deposited with great secrecy with the respected mother of His Highness, by the respected grandmother of His Highness, namely the Nabob Begum Sahib, who had brought you up, and who had deposited it for your use like your mother, was also at the same time applied by His Highness to his own use. Documents and instalments will be caused to be issued to your Honour for the same. The omission of this item in the account sent by your Honour to the Istafa Cutcherry was, it is believed, owing to the ignorance of your Honour respecting this matter. You having written your petition to His Highness, that His Highness has altogether forgotten your transactions; but since a transaction of which you were not aware has been made known to you, it is manifest that His Highness has not forgotten your transactions."

According to the evidence of the Claimant himself, he never knew anything about the alleged deposit of this sum of 2 lacs of Rupees until the receipt of the last-mentioned letter in 1855, although he admitted he was in constant communication with the Nabob's grandmother.

In the particulars as to the first item of the second part, viz., Rs. 43,462, the Claimant stated, that he furnished an account containing this item to the Istafa Cutcherry in 1847. In the account to which, according to his evidence, the Claimant thus referred, there was no such item as Rs. 43,462, but the Claimant stated that such sum was made up of a portion of an [471] item and of other items comprised in that account, the portion of an item being the sum of Rs. 25,000 and odd, part of a sum of Rs. 55,000, described in such account as "paid to His Highness on different occasions," but part of which, viz., the sum of Rs. 29,000, and odd, was stated not to have been paid by the Claimant, but by a person, called Rajah Coondun Lall, and the other items in that account, alleged as making with the sum of Rs. 25,000 and odd, the sum of Rs. 43,462, being as follows:—"On account of Cotarya Nund Loll and others, Rs. 8150; for the expenses of the feast called Eed-ool Fitus, Rs. 1000; purchasing a horse from Arathoon, Rs. 400; purchasing two horses, Rs. 1000; two watches, with chains, etc., Rs. 840; composed of various kinds, for discharging the money of the Bond belonging to the Meer-i-Somany, or the Commissariat department of the Durbar, Rs. 1050; the account of Miller, for the purchase of utensils, etc., Rs. 4666. 8a.; for the purpose of sending the servants of His Highness to Ennore at night, Rs. 400."

With respect to the sum of Rs. 25,000 and odd, being, after deducting the other items from the sum of Rs. 43,462, the sum of Rs. 25,955. 8a., no evidence was adduced, except certain statements of the Claimant, alleging that the sum was due to him. The claimant was not able to state when or for what sum, or whether any part thereof, was paid by him, and he did not produce any accounts, in fact he admitted that he never kept any regular accounts at all. With respect to the sum of Rs. 8150, the Claimant confined his claim to the sum of Rs. 5000, part thereof, and such sum was awarded to him by the judgment of the Supreme Court. With respect [472] to the next sum of Rs. 1000, there was no evidence whatsoever, except the fact of such sum being included in the account, and the statement of the Claimant that he had paid such sum for the Nabob, but the Claimant was unable to produce any corroborative evidence, or even to state in what year such alleged payment had been made. With respect to the next sum of Rs. 400, for the purchase of a horse from Mr. Arathoon, the Claimant was unable to depose as to the amount he paid Arathoon. Mr. Arathoon, in giving evidence, said that he had no recollection of the Claimant purchasing a horse for Rs. 400; but, upon the production of his account-book for the year 1846, it appeared that he had in that year sold a horse to the Claimant for Rs. 350. The sum of Rs. 350 was awarded to the Claimant by the judgment of the Supreme Court. With respect to the next sum of Rs. 1000, for the purchase of two horses, the only evidence given was that of the Claimant and of Arathoon. The Claimant did not recollect whether he bought the horses from Major Taylor, or Arathoon, nor clearly as to the price given by him; and Arathoon knew nothing whatsoever about the price, though he recollected the purchase of two horses from Major Taylor. With respect to the next two sums, of Rs. 840 and Rs. 1050 the Supreme Court deemed the evidence sufficient, and awarded the same to the Claimant. With respect to the next sum, of Rs. 4666. 8a., in addition to the statement of the Claimant that he had paid that sum, Mr. Miller was examined, and he proved the payment by the Claimant of Rs. 4000, on account of the Nabob, on the 10th of May, 1847. The sum of Rs. 4000, was awarded to the Claimant by the judgment of the [473] Supreme Court. With respect to the next sum of Rs. 400 there was no evidence whatsoever, except the fact of its being an item in the account.

With respect to the second item of the second part, viz., Rs. 70,475. 4a. 6p., the present appeal had no reference, as the Supreme Court, deeming the evidence in support thereof sufficient, awarded the same to the Claimant.

The evidence adduced on behalf of the Government in opposition to the claim, comprised the following documents, namely, a letter from Gholam Mahomed, the Moonshee of the Istafa Cutcherry, to the Claimant, which showed that the Claimant was called upon to furnish a full and detailed account of the debts contracted by the Nabob through or with the Claimant, in lieu of the account which had then been sent in, and was described in such letter as "an abstract account." A letter from the Nabob to the managers of the Istafa Cutcherry, which was as follows:—"Gentlemen.—In answer to your letter, bearing this day's date, it is written, that certainly the matter of Moomtaz-ool-Bahadoor, in consequence of there being no satisfactory documents, showing the receipts and balances, etc., as to afford entire satisfaction to you, the members have no right to obtain a speedy and complete settlement. Nevertheless, it appears to me just and proper, that for the present the settlement of the money that stands payable by my deceased Auliya (or Highness, meaning thereby the Nabob's mother)—that is to say, six lacs of Rupees, which is a part of the money mentioned in the bond for seven lacs of Rupees now remaining with the said Bahadoor—should, one way or other, be made in the first instance, in order that she may not be subjected to any demand or [474] caption in the day of resurrection, which in my opinion, and according to my principles, is worst of all things. After this, respecting other matters of the said Bahadoor, anything that is to be done in accordance with the rules of those gentlemen will be done. What more should I trouble you with?—Mohummud Ghous."

It appeared that shortly after the above letter, and in consequence thereof, the sum of six lacs of Rupees was paid by the Istafa Cutcherry to the creditors of the Claimant, and an indorsement of such payment made on the promissory note as hereinbefore mentioned. The terms of the above letter were directly opposed to the allegations of the Claimant as to the promissory note having been given by the Nabob in respect of moneys borrowed by him out of the nine lacs of Rupees, alleged to have been deposited by the Claimant's mother with the Nabob's mother. A letter from Gholam Mahomed to the Claimant, reproaching him for his negligence, and requesting him immediately to send in his accounts and notes of hand: and another letter from Gholam Mahomed to the Claimant, stating that no answer had been received to his previous letter of the 14th of September, and pressing for the accounts, in order that they might be submitted to the Nabob, were also produced.

The claim was heard before Sir Adam Bittleston, the Officiating Chief Justice, in the months of June, September, and October, 1860; and on the 14th of December, 1860, that Judge pronounced judgment and passed an Order thereon. By such Order and judgment the Supreme Court disallowed the whole of the items comprised in the first part of [475] the Claimant's particulars, with costs; and with respect to the second part of such particulars, the Court awarded to the Claimant the several sums of Rs. 70,475, 1a 6p., Rs. 5000, Rs. 350, Rs. 840, Rs. 1050, and Rs. 4000, and interest and costs of and incident thereto, and disallowed the residue of the claim to the items in such second part, with costs.

The Claimant being dissatisfied with the Order and judgment of the Supreme Court, obtained leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against so much thereof as did not allow to him the moneys and interest claimed in his particulars, over and above the sums and interest mentioned as allowed in the Order and judgment (save only as to the sum of Rs. 3150, paid by the Istafa Cutcherry, as admitted by the Claimant, and his costs thereof), and also against so much of the Order and judgment as directed the payment by him of such costs, as in that Order mentioned.

Before any proceedings were taken in the appeal, Ghoolam Moortoozah Khan Bahadoor died, having by his Will appointed George Gilbert Keble Richardson and James Scott Savery Richardson, two of his executors thereof, who, on the 24th of April, 1862, proved the same in the Supreme Court at Madras. By an Order in Council, dated the 3rd of February, 1863, the appeal was revived, and leave was given to them, as executors, to prosecute the appeal, which was accordingly done.

In support of the appeal, the Appellants by their case contended, that the judgment of the Supreme Court at Madras was erroneous.

First, as the Government were bound by the [476] admissions of the late Nabob, that he was indebted to the Claimant for the amounts claimed for money advanced to and paid on account of the Nabob.

Second, that there was sufficient evidence to show that the sums in question were advanced and paid on account of the Claimant; and Third, that the Supreme Court ought not in equity to have ordered the Claimant to pay the Respondents the costs of appearing and opposing his claim at the hearing.

The Government submitted, that the Order and judgment was right—

First, as respected the first and third items of the first part, that there was no trustworthy evidence of the Claimant's mother having made the alleged deposits with the Nabob's mother, and that the means and the conduct of the Claimant's mother, so far as the same appeared in evidence, were opposed to the supposition of such deposit having been made.

Second, that with regard to the second item of the first part, there was no trustworthy evidence of the Nabob's grandmother having made the alleged deposit with the Nabob's mother, and that the conduct of the Nabob's grandmother was opposed to the supposition of such deposit having been made.

Third, with regard to the items of the first part, that even if the alleged deposits by the Claimant's mother and the Nabob's grandmother with the Nabob's mother were in fact made, it was not proved that the Nabob borrowed, or appropriated to his own use, the sums so deposited, or any of them.

Fourth, as respected all the items of the first part, even if the moneys were, in fact, deposited, and the [477] Nabob did actually borrow or appropriate the same to his own use, the claim of the former Appellant in respect thereof was not such a claim as could be allowed, consistently with the provisions of Act, No. XXX. of 1858, under which the claim was preferred.

Fifth, as respected the sums and portions of sums comprised in the first item of the second part, which were disallowed by the judgment appealed from, that there was not sufficient evidence to prove that such sums, or portions of sums, were justly and fairly due to the former Appellant from the Nabob at the time of his death; and

Lastly, that the parts of the Order appealed against were in accordance with the probabilities of the case, and no other Order with respect to the subject-matter of the appeal would have been warranted by the evidence adduced in the case.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Ayrton, were heard for the Appellants.

At the conclusion of their argument, their Lordships, without calling upon the Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, who appeared for the Government, directed the case to stand over.

After consideration, judgment was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 9, 1863).—This case stood over after the Appellant's Counsel had been heard, in order that their Lordships might have an opportunity of examining the evidence on which the questions raised by the appeal depend. [478] They have accordingly done so, and having considered it carefully, and fully weighed the arguments advanced on the part of the original Appellant, in the course of which everything that can be found in the record favourable to his case, was well connected and arranged, they have come to the conclusion that the appeal cannot be supported.

It is brought against an Order of the Supreme Court of Madras, disallowing some, while it allowed other items of a claim preferred by Ghoolam Moortoozah Khan Bahadoor, the deceased Appellant, under the Act passed in 1858, by the then Legislative Council of India, for the administration of the estate and for the payment of the debts of the last Nabob of the Carnatic.

The claim was made under the 14th section of the Act, No. XXX. of 1858. By that and the subsequent sections it is provided, that any person claiming to be a creditor of the late Nabob, who shall file a declaration stating that he is willing to receive in full discharge of all his claims against the Nabob, or his estate, such amount as the Supreme Court shall award under the provisions of that Act, shall be entitled to have his claim investigated in a summary way, and to receive the amount awarded out of the assets of the late Nabob, in the hands of the Receiver appointed under the Act, if these shall be sufficient for the purpose; and if they shall be insufficient, out of the Public Treasury. The Court, however, in the exercise of this summary jurisdiction, is by the 22nd section forbidden to allow to any Claimant, in respect to money lent or advanced, any larger sum than the amount which shall be proved to have been actually advanced to or for the late Nabob, with simple interest [479] thereon, not exceeding the rate of six per centum per annum; or to any Claimant in respect of goods supplied, or of any other matters, any larger sum than the amount shall be proved to have been the fair and actual value thereof at the time when the debt was incurred, with simple interest, not exceeding the rate aforesaid, if the Court shall consider the Claimant entitled to interest. It would seem, therefore, that the Act not only limits the extraordinary remedy which it gives to certain defined classes of debt, but throws upon the Claimant more than the ordinary burden of proof, compelling the holder of any written acknowledgment, or security, to prove the actual consideration for it; and those claiming the price of goods delivered, to prove the fair and actual value of them.

The late Appellant, who was a kinsman of the Nabob, and was always on terms of intimacy with him, appears to have been an extravagant, and, for many years, a needy person. In 1843, he took the step, most unusual, as we understand, for a person of his rank, of passing through the Insolvent Court. In 1851, on the occasion of making a final settlement with his creditors, he was assisted by the issue, by the Nabob, of some securities, known as the Istafa Cutcherry Bonds, to the extent of seven lacs of Rupees. These Bonds were handed over to creditors of the late Appellant; they have been since paid, and are not now in question. It is said on the part of the Appellant that they were given in part discharge of a large debt due from the Nabob, but that this payment left other demands still unsatisfied, which are the subject of the present proceedings.

The principal item now in controversy, is founded [480] upon moneys said to have been placed by the mother of the late Appellant in the hands of the mother of the Nabob; three lacs by way of loan, two lacs by way of deposit in trust for the late Appellant.

For these sums it is not pretended that the Nabob was originally liable, but it is stated, that he received them from his mother, and thereby became liable for them, and acknowledged his liability. The debt of seven lacs of Rupees was said also to have consisted mainly of moneys advanced in the same way by the mother of the Nabob, and secured by his promissory note.

The story told on behalf of the late Appellant seems to their Lordships full of the grossest improbabilities. It is highly improbable that his mother, who appears to have been in the receipt of a small pension only, should have had the means of advancing, as she is said to have done, no less than ten lacs of Rupees to the mother of the Nabob, especially within the short period within which these sums are alleged to have been advanced. It is equally improbable that these advances, if in fact made by the late Appellant's mother, should have been made, as they are alleged to have been, without his knowledge. If these sums were really due, it is scarcely to be credited that the claim for them should not have been prosecuted in 1818, when the account was sent in to the Istafa Cutcherry,—an account, it is to be observed, in which written documents not now produced are referred to as vouchers for some of the items. Again, it is most improbable that the grandmother of the Nabob should have deposited two lacs of Rupees with the Nabob's mother as a provision for the late Appellant, and that no communication should for several years have been [481] made to him upon the subject. Yet there is no trustworthy evidence to explain any of these improbabilities, or to support the ingenious theories suggested at the Bar. The promissory note for seven lacs of Rupees, part of these alleged advances, is not given to the lady who is said to have made the advances, but to Arathoon, who appears to have been engaged in other pecuniary transactions with the Nabob. No reliance can, in their Lordships' judgment, be placed on the letters alleged to have been written by or by the direction of the Nabob admitting the late Appellant's claims, or upon the extracts alleged to have been made from the Nabob's accounts. The letter of the 26th of April, 1818, in their Lordships' opinion, bears upon the face of it palpable marks of having been concocted for the mere purpose of sustaining the late Appellant's claims, and cannot be relied upon to support them; and if this document be fabricated, the fabrication is all but fatal to the Appellant's case. Beyond this, it is plain upon the evidence, that the Istafa Cutcherry disputed the late Appellant's claims. He was called upon for accounts and particulars. He rendered none, and did not prosecute his claim in the lifetime of the Nabob. Moreover, the evidence shows that the late Appellant for some time at least acted as agent for the Nabob, and was in receipt of moneys on his account, and there is no proof of these moneys having been fully accounted for by him. Their Lordships are satisfied that the Court below was quite right in holding that no sufficient evidence had been offered in support of this charge.

Nor have they been able to satisfy themselves that any of the smaller items which have been disallowed [482] on the second part of the claim ought to have been allowed. It is unnecessary to consider whether some of the items disallowed, if satisfactorily proved, would have constituted debts recoverable under the 14th section of the Act, because their Lordships think that they are not proved. It is not the course of this Committee to disturb the finding of the Courts below upon mere issues of fact, unless it is clearly satisfied that there has been some miscarriage, either in the reception or in the appreciation of evidence. In cases that turn upon the credibility of the testimony given, it is disposed to defer to the judgment of those who, with the advantage of local experience, have had the means of seeing witnesses under examination, and of inspecting the original documents. Their Lordships also feel that in the exercise of this Statutory and peculiar jurisdiction, the Court below was almost bound to insist on the utmost strictness of proof. For it needs but little knowledge of human nature, as it exists in India, to see that a scheme involving the payment out of the public Treasury of the debts of a native Prince, who seems to have lived and died in a state of chronic insolvency, was calculated to bring forth a host of Claimants not likely to be very scrupulous, either in the statement of their demands, or in the manufacture of evidence to support them. And, it is obvious that the Government which has thus undertaken to pay the debts of the Nabob, must be without many of the means which an ordinary representative of a deceased person would have of resisting claims, either wholly false or dishonestly swollen.

Upon the whole case their Lordships are unable to see any sufficient ground for disturbing the judgment [483] of the Court below, and they must, therefore, humbly recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

RAJAH LELANUND SING.—Appellant; THE GOVERNMENT OF BENGAL, KALYPERSHAD (Ghatwal), the son and heir of BIKRUM SINGH, deceased, and GOOMAN SINGH,—Respondents * [Nov. 26, 27, 28, 1863].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

The Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, at Calcutta, acting as Special Commissioners, under Ben. Reg. III. of 1828, in resumption suits have jurisdiction in a summary way to direct payment of wasilat, or mesne profits, of lands taken possession of by Government for resumption, to the party entitled to the same, upon a decree declaring the lands not liable to assessment.

If the Court is not satisfied with the title of the party claiming the wasilat, the proper course to pursue is to direct inquiries to find the party entitled.

In this case the appeal was brought from such part of a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, dated the 29th of February, 1860, as did not award to the Appellant, the wasilat, or mesne profits, of certain Ghatwally lands released from assessment by such decree. The decree in question was made in a suit instituted by the [484] Bengal Government to resume and assess certain Ghatwally lands. The lands consisted of thirteen mouzalis, situate in Pergunnahs, Wusluh and Mahalat Khurruckpore, in the Zemindary of Khurruckpore, to which the Appellant, as heir of his father, the late Rajah Bidanund Sing, succeeded as Zemindar; and were held of that Zemindary by the Ghatwals, for the protection of the Zemindar's other lands, by guarding the ghats, or passes, in the neighbouring mountains from the invasions of Hill men and robbers. A decree, in the first instance, was made in the suit in favour of Government by the Special Deputy Collector, which decree was reversed on appeal by the Zillah Judge, exercising the powers of a Special Commissioner of Government under Ben Reg. III. of 1828. The decision of the Zillah Judge was, in its turn, reversed, and the decision of the Deputy Collector substantially restored by the Officiating Judge of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, exercising the powers of a special Commissioner under that Regulation. Subsequently, a decree was made by Her Majesty in Council in an analogous case (Raja Lelanund Sing Bahadoor v. The Government of Bengal, 6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 101, where the nature and tenure of Ghatwally is fully described) wholly inconsistent with the decree in the present case, and in consequence thereof the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut by three of its Judges, also exercising the powers of Special Commissioners, upon a petition for review, pronounced a final decree, a part of which was now appealed from, and by such decree it was declared, that the resumption and assessment of the lands in question was illegal and the relinquishment thereof by Government ordered. The Court, how-[485]-ever, refused to decide on the right of the Appellant, as Zemindar, to have from the Government the wasilat, or mesne profits, of the lands in question, being a portion of his Zemindary, after the resumption and during the long period they were in the possession of the Government, or of the other parties with whom the Government made a temporary settlement thereof.

By the Order made in the appeal of Raja Lelanund Sing Bahadoor v. The Government of Bengal (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 132), known as suit, No. 2045, their Lordships reversed the decree in that suit made by the Special Commissioner, and declared that the Ghatwally lands in that suit were not within the meaning of cl. 4, sec. 8, Reg. I. of 1793, as included in allowances made to the Zemindar for Police establishments; but that they formed a part of the Zemindary of Khurruckpore, and were included in the Permanent Settlement for that Zemindary, and covered by the jumma assessed upon it.

In consequence of that decision the Appellant, on the 9th of July, 1856, presented a petition in another resumption suit, which, with many others relating to the same subject and in the same Zemindary, had been instituted by the Government, to the Special Commissioner of Calcutta, stating the judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee in the above appeal, submitting that the two cases were similar, and that the decree ought to be the same in both, and praying that an order might be made admitting a review of the judgment and decree of the Special Commissioner made on the 14th of August, 1851, in the present suit. This petition, although it [486] had special reference to the present appeal, applied also to eighty-two other cases in which the Government had sued to resume Ghatwally lands within that Zemindary, and had obtained decrees in its favour. The Ghatwals were not represented by Vakeels before the Commissioners.

The hearing of the petition for review took place on the 29th of February, 1860, before Messrs. H. T. Raikes, C. Binny Trevor, and E. Alexander Samuels, three of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, acting as Special Commissioners, when they pronounced judgment, granting a review of the judgment complained of, as well as that passed by the Court, sitting as Special Commissioners, in the eighty-three, and two other cases specified, but they declined to decide the question of the Appellant's right to the wasilat, or mesne profits, as being beyond their jurisdiction, the Ghatwals not being represented by Vakeels, and refused to make any Order in respect of a sum of money paid by the Zemindar to the Government. The material part of this decision will be found in the judgment of their Lordships on this appeal (Post [9 Moo. Ind. App.], pp. 487-8).

The Appellant presented a petition for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, from so much of his decree as was adverse to the claim of the Appellant, to the wasilat, and possession of the mouzahs in question.

On the 7th of February, 1861, an Order was made by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, upon the petition of the Appellant, directing that the names of Kallypershad, Ghatwal (son of Bikrum Sing), and Gooman Singh, a purchaser, should be inserted as Respondents, with the Bengal Government: such insertion [487] was accordingly made, and subsequently the appeal was admitted.

The Government of Bengal alone appeared before the Privy Council to support the decision of the Special Commissioners.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant, argued—First, that the Mouzahs in respect of which the wasilat accrued, were a portion of the Zemindary of the Appellant, for which the revenue had been and still was under the Permanent Settlement paid to Government by him, or those through whom he claimed title as Zemindar, and consequently any mesne profits received by the Government in respect of the mouzahs ought to have been paid over to him the Appellant, as Zemindar.

Second, that as to that portion of the wasilat which was paid out of the Government Treasury to the Appellant, under a former decree in his favour, the same having been subsequently deposited by him with the Government under protest to abide the result of the litigation as to the resumption of the lands themselves by Government, the same ought to have been refunded to the Appellant, as a matter of course, on the final decision in his favour.

Third, that even as between the Zemindar and the Ghatwals, the Court below had jurisdiction to determine any question of right as to the mesne profits, regard being had to the powers formerly exercised by the ordinary Courts of Judicature in like cases under cl. I. sec. 31, Ben. Reg. II. of 1819, to grant redress in any case in which the Revenue authorities should violate the rights secured to a Zemindar by the Per-[488]-manent Settlement, and with reference to the powers of Special Commissioners, appointed under Ben. Reg. III. of 1828, section 2, for the final determination of like cases, in place of the ordinary Courts, whose powers are by such Regulation expressly taken away, and the decree of such Special Commissioners made final: and further that if there was any defect of parties, by reason of the Ghatwal not appearing by Vakeel, on the hearing on the petition for review the court might have ordered such defect to be remedied, and, if necessary, might have postponed the hearing for that purpose, so that complete justice might have been done in that suit.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Bengal Government, contended, first, that the right to demand payment of the wasilat and interest thereon from the Government Treasury was in the Ghatwal, if in any one, as the Ghatwal was in possession of the lands in question at the time of the institution of the resumption proceedings, and he had paid into the Government Treasury the principal sum claimed by the Appellant, the Zemindar, and that there was nothing to show that, independently of those proceedings, such possession could have been interfered with, and

Secondly, That no claim was made to the wasilat before the Special Commissioners on the part of any person other than the Appellant, and, therefore, the Court below could not properly have adjudicated upon the claim to the wasilat between the Ghatwal and the Zemindar.

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The appeal in this case is by the Zemindar of Khurruckpore, from a portion of a decree pronounced in the year 1860, by three Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, acting as Special Commissioners under Regulation III. of 1828. The Government of Bengal, the only party besides that has (whether both or either of the other Respondents, or nominal Respondents, could or could not have) appeared here is content with the decree, has submitted to it, and desires to support it as it stands.

The matter arose thus:—Some years before the year 1855, the Government of Bengal claimed a right to resume or reassess lands of considerable extent and value within the Zemindary of Kurruckpore in the possession of various Ghatwals, who held them by Ghatwally tenure under the Zemindar. The claim was enforced by the Government, though opposed on the part of the Zemindar, and for some time at least on the part of some, if not all, of the Ghatwals. There was a great and complicated mass of litigation upon the subject before various Tribunals, with various success; sometimes one party gaining a decision, sometimes another. The suits were numerous. At last the Zemindar brought one of them by appeal before Her Majesty in Council, and upon that appeal (Raja Lelanund Sing Bahadoor v. The Government of Bengal [6 Moo. Ind. App. 101]) the Judicial Committee, in 1855, decided against the Bengal Government on grounds fatal in principle to its entire claim of resumption and reassessment as to all the Ghatwally lands. That decision was in the same year sanctioned by Her Majesty. [490] The case, with the judgment delivered here by Lord Kingsdown on the part of the Judicial Committee, is reported in Mr. Moore's Sixth volume of "Reports of Indian Appeals," p. 101, a report to which their Lordships refer, and which has, during the argument on the present appeal, been cited more than once. This decision the Bengal Government, or the Special Commissioners, determined very properly to consider binding as to all the Ghatwally lands that had been resumed, or reassessed, and the invalidity of the resumption and reassessment from the beginning may be treated as now established. But there remained a material question—the question as to the right to recover from the Bengal Government the large sums which, as rents, or profits, they had wrongfully or erroneously, by means of the invalid resumption, or reassessment, obtained from the Ghatwals. The Government had latterly not disputed, nor does dispute, its liability to make good this amount with interest to some person or persons, but for some years has, in consequence of the decision of 1855, considered itself, as owing the amount with interest to or holding it for some person, or persons. After the judgment of 1855, the Zemindar instituted, or continued a proceeding before the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, as Special Commissioners, for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of that judgment, and payment of the principal and interest of the sums which in respect of the lands or part of the lands the Government had wrongfully or erroneously received. This proceeding was brought to a hearing in 1860, and upon it the Judges made the decree now under partial appeal as already stated. The material portion of it is as follows:—"The Government Pleader argues [491] that it is nowhere contended that these lands when resumed were not in the possession of the Ghatwals, who paid, in some instances, a small quit-rent to the Zemindar, and in others, nothing at all; but they were bound in either case to render certain public services, as the conditions of holding their tenures. That, as the services of the Ghatwals were excused during the resumption of their lands, they might, with some reason, claim a refund of the past collections on the release of the lands, minus the value of the services they would have performed if no resumption had taken place; that the landlord cannot, however, under any circumstances, be entitled to this refund; that, moreover, the Ghatwals themselves have raised no claim for refund, and are not represented before the Court; and as the Zemindar has paid nothing, he has no right to demand the wasilat. It appears to us that, under the circumstances thus disclosed in the statements of the parties before us, the applications for a review of the several judgments passed by this Court, as Special Commissioner, at different times in the eighty-three cases now under consideration, should be granted; and, as the only point for determination is the applicability of the decision passed by the Privy Council on the 13th of August, 1855, in case No. 2045, to the cases now before us, and that point is conceded by the Government, who has also intimated to us, through the Government Pleader, that out of deference to the decision of that High Court of appeal, the lands have been already restored to the Ghatwals, it seems to us unnecessary to postpone judgment in these cases. On the authority, then, of the Privy Council's decree, and for the reasons set forth therein, we [492] reverse the decision passed in the several cases brought up for revision before us, and direct that the resumed lands be released from assessment. As to the wasilat, which has been taken by the Government from the parties in possession, if the contest before us was confined to the simple question whether the Government was liable or not to the Zemindar for the amount, we should have no hesitation in declaring, that as the Government Officers are held to have had no valid ground for the proceedings under which they resumed and assessed the lands dispensing with the services previously rendered by the Ghatwals, and not showing that any expenditure was made for the employment of others in their place and vocation, so they cannot be allowed to appropriate these collections for the benefit of the State, on the grounds and assignments set up by the Government Pleader in this case. But the contest is not confined to this question, but involves the rights of the Applicant and others, the Ghatwals, not now before the Court, whose rights are altogether denied by the Zemindar to receive the refund. Now, prima facie, the right to receive the sums collected, with deductions for quit-rent due to the Zemindar, is with the Ghatwals, and not with the Applicant before us. But, be that as it may, it is not within the competency of this Court, acting as Special Commissioners, under Reg. III. of 1828, sec. 3, summarily to determine a question of disputed private right of this nature, the more especially when one of the parties interested has not appeared before us, and is probably ignorant that such a question would be mooted in these proceedings. Such question must be left to be decided by the regular Civil Courts of the country. It is only [493] necessary to add, that as the resumption proceedings have been determined to be contrary to law, we award to the Zemindar the entire costs of these proceedings in the resumption Courts, with interest thereon, from the date on which he filed his application for review of their judgment. Copy of this Order to be filed in the other eighty-two cases, to which it equally applies."

The Zemindar complains here of the omission to decide as to the right to the fund, which, as has already been mentioned, the Government did not then and does not now claim to retain for its own use, and contends that it ought to have been wholly adjudged to him. The Bengal Government, on the contrary, supports the title or alleged title of the Ghatwals, or their representatives, to receive back the money which was unduly, or in an improper manner, taken from them. To this appeal one Ghatwal and a purchaser from him have been added, at least nominally, as parties Respondents. Neither of them, however, has appeared here, nor are their Lordships convinced that without the consent of the Zemindar, either of them would have been allowed to appear as a Respondent on this appeal.

Part of the fund claimed was, during a period of temporary success on the Zemindar's part against the Government, paid to the Zemindar under an express liability to pay it back if there should be a subsequent decision against him, as there was, and he paid it back, and with regard to this portion of the fund claimed it has been, in an especial manner, strongly urged for him that it ought clearly to be now restored to him, whatever may be done as to the rest. Their Lordships, however, considering the circumstances in which the amount received by [494] him came to his hands and left them again, are of opinion that both portions of the fund ought to be dealt with on one and the same principle. Their Lordships are also of opinion, that the Judges who pronounced the decision now under appeal, though acting as Special Commissioners, had, from the nature of the subject, jurisdiction to direct payment of the whole money in dispute, with interest, to the person or persons entitled; that jurisdiction their admitted power of deciding as to the correctness or incorrectness of the resumption appears to us to have included. The Judges, therefore, who made the decree of 1860, should, in their Lordships' view of the matter, have not been silent as to the title to the money, but have declared and acted on it, if able, from the materials and parties before them to do so, or if not so able, have directed an inquiry to ascertain the person or persons entitled. Now, the Ghatwals were not represented, or were imperfectly represented, before the Court, when the decree of 1860, was made, and their Lordships from the materials before them are not satisfied that a portion at least of the fund does not belong to the Ghatwals from whom it was received, or their representatives. In using these expressions their Lordships treat the controversy as extending to all the sums received by the Government under the resumption or reassessment, though their conclusion would be substantially the same if it were treated as confined to the fund strictly subject specifically to the particular proceeding in which the Order of 1855, or the decree of 1860 was made. That a portion of the fund belongs to the Zemindar their Lordships think highly probable, if on account only of his quit-rent or [495] quit-rents, fallen into arrear, but possibly also he may have a just claim on more than this portion, or even the whole fund, in respect of services which the Ghatwals were, or had been, under an obligation to perform, and have, from any cause whatever, not performed. Subject to that deduction, or those deductions, as the case may be, in favour of the Zemindar, there appears to their Lordships a title fit to be considered to the whole fund in the Ghatwals who were in the actual enjoyment of the lands, or their representatives. But their Lordships are of opinion, that they have not, and that in 1860, the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut (the Special Commissioners) had not before them, sufficient materials to enable them to direct safely, or without hazard to justice, the payment, apportionment, or distribution of the fund or any part of it, and that accordingly the decree of 1860, should be added to, and that it should be declared that the Special Commissioners, the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, had and have jurisdiction to decide upon the true title to the funds in question upon this appeal, and to direct the payment and disposition of those funds, with interest, accordingly, but that, at the hearing on which the decree under appeal was made, it did not sufficiently appear who was or were the person, or persons, justly entitled to the money, and that an inquiry ought to have been directed by the Court on that subject; and that with this declaration the case should be remitted to India, in order to be further dealt with by the Special Commissioners on that footing. We conceive that the Government ought to pay the costs of this appeal. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly.

[496] KHAJAH MOHAMED GOUHUR ALI KHAN,—Appellant; ASHRUFOONISSA, KHAJAH WAHED HOSSEIN KHAN and WAJED HOSSEIN KHAN, heirs of KHAJAH BURKUTOOLLAH KHAN, and KHAJAH HOEBEOOLLAH KHAN, heir-at-law of the late Khajah Wahed Ali Khan, deceased.—Respondents * [July 15 and 16, 1863].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

In an action of ejectment to recover real estate, the Plaintiffs claimed as heirs. The issue directed by the Court was, whether the party in possession, under a decree made in a summary suit, pursuant to the Act, No. XIX. of 1841, was legitimate. In such circumstances held, that as the title of the Plaintiffs depended upon the illegitimacy of the Defendant, they were bound to prove by sufficient general evidence, their heirship, in order to throw upon the Defendant the onus of proving his legitimacy.

The evidence upon that issue being unsatisfactory, the case was remitted to India for further proof.

It is the duty of a Judge in India trying a suit to state in his judgment, the grounds upon which he has arrived at the conclusion he has formed upon the evidence: and not simply to state, in a general manner, that a party was entitled, as such a course does not afford the appellate Court the assistance it is bound to expect from the Court below.

This appeal was brought from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, by which that Court decreed to the Respondents ten shares of the real estate of Ibrahim Khan, otherwise called Newab Jan.

Khajah Burkutoollah Khan and Khajah Wahed Ali [497] Khan were the uterine brothers of one Khajah Aboo Mahomed Khan, who was the father of Ibrahim Khan, and who, besides Ibrahim, had another son, called Wuzeer Jan, otherwise called Abdool Kadir Khan, who, with Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan, were the heirs of Ibrahim Khan, and entitled to the shares of his estate which was decreed to the Respondents, if it was established that Wuzeer Jan died without leaving legitimate issue. The Appellant alleged that he was the lawful son of Wuzeer Jan by Mussumat Alarukhee. The Respondents denied that such was the case, and the only question in the appeal was, whether the Appellant had made out his alleged heirship by satisfactory evidence.

The circumstances of the case were these:—

Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan and Aboo Mahomed Khan, were the sons, by different mothers, of Bahadour Beg Khan, a Mahomedan of wealth and high position: and on his death, his property was divided between the three sons as his heirs. Aboo Mahomed Khan had two sons Ibrahim Khan and Wuzeer Jan. Ibrahim Khan was married, during his father's lifetime, to Khudijah Begum. Wuzeer Jan, the other son, as it was alleged by the Respondents, was of weak intellect from his birth, a cripple and impotent, and never married.

In the year 1840, Aboo Mahomed Khan died, leaving surviving his widow, Fatimatoonnissa, Ibrahim Khan, and a daughter named Soorut Begum, who became entitled to his property in certain proportions, and who, on the 6th Mough, 1250 (1843), executed a Tukseennama, or deed of partition, by which Ibrahim Khan took nine anna, the widow two, and Soorut Begum four anna shares; and they enjoyed the property [498] accordingly until the death of Soorut Begum, who died childless, in 1848, when a fresh partition was made between Ibrahim Khan and Fatimatoonnissa, who held possession until Ibrahim Khan's death, in May, 1850, and, upon his death, the right to the property devolved in equal thirds upon his mother, Fatimatoonnissa, and his uncles Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan.

Shortly after Ibrahim Khan's death, the Appellant, who was then an infant, was set up as the child of Wuzeer Jan.

It appears that Ibrahim Khan, who had been married to Khudijah Begum, was, on the 28th of July, 1845, divorced from her, and, as was alleged, never cohabited with her afterwards. Notwithstanding, however, that the effect of the divorce was to deprive Khudijah Begum of all right to any share in the succession of Ibrahim Khan, she, upon his death, claimed her share as if she had remained his wife, and accordingly she filed a petition under the Act, No. XIX. of 1841, claiming a four anna share. Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan also filed petitions in a similar suit under that Act, claiming their two-thirds as the uncles of Ibrahim Khan.

On the summary suit under Act, No. XIX. of 1841, being brought to a hearing, on the 30th of September, 1850, when the Appellant was put in possession, and Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan were put by the Court to a regular suit, and after an ineffectual appeal to the Sudder, a plaint was filed by them in the Zillah Court of Patna, on the 14th of February, 1852, against Alarukhee for herself, and as guardian of the Appellant, a minor, Khudijah Begum and Meer Ismael, as executor and Mutowallee of the late Fatimatoonnissa Begum, as Defendants. [499] The suit was brought to obtain possession from the Appellant of two-thirds out of three-thirds of the property left by Ibrahim Khan, deceased, and to reverse the Order of the Judge of the City of Patna, of the 30th of September, 1850, and the Order made on appeal therefrom of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, affirming the same. The plaint stated, amongst other things, that the Plaintiffs claimed title as uncles and heirs of the deceased, and alleged, that Wuzeer Jan was by nature insane and impotent, and so continued up to his death, notwithstanding his father's endeavours, by the aid of doctors, to restore his powers of manhood; that he died without having ever been married, and without leaving any issue; and it was then further stated and the plaint charged, that Ibrahim Khan died, leaving the Plaintiffs, his uncles, and the late Fatimatoonnissa, his mother, his only heirs him surviving; his wife, Kudijah Begum, having been legally divorced in his lifetime. The plaint then stated the proceedings had under Act, No. XIX. of 1841, including the above-mentioned two Orders of the Zillah and Sudder Courts.

The answer of Alarukhee Begum set up the Appellant's title as her son by Wuzeer Jan, as displacing the alleged title of the Respondents; and insisted that Wuzeer Jan, her husband, was neither insane, nor impotent; alleging that Wuzeer Jan married her according to the forms of the Mahomedan law; that the marriage was consummated; and that the Appellant was his son by that marriage; she further alleged, that the Appellant was married to the daughter of a highly respectable person named Meer Suyd Ali, brother of the late Fatimatoonnissa; [500] and that the latter and Meer Ismael had admitted the Appellant's heritable rights in the former proceedings under Act, No. XIX. of 1841.

Khudijah Begum's answer simply raised the question, whether there had been cohabitation between her and Ibrahim Khan after the divorce.

Of the issues directed by the Court, the only material one was the fourth, namely: Was the Appellant the son of Wuzeer Jan?

The evidence upon this point was contradictory. The Appellant, in support of his claim, filed documentary evidence and examined witnesses. The documentary evidence consisted of proceedings subsequent to Ibrahim Khan's death, and to which Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan were not parties, in which the Appellant was treated as the nephew and heir of Ibrahim Khan. A vakalutnamah by Syud Ali, brother of Meer Ismael, dated the 10th of March, 1851, in which the Appellant was also so described. Pottahs, mortgages, and Kabooleats, executed by or to Alarukhee Begum in the years 1851 and 1852, as guardian of the Appellant, in which he was also treated as heir; also a declaration of the recognition of the Appellant as Wuzeer Jan's son by Fatimatoonnissa, and a conditional sale to the Appellant's wife. Four witnesses were examined to prove the fact, that he was the legitimate son of Wuzeer Jan by Alarukhee Begum, his wife, and of his having been as such recognized as the heir of Ibrahim Khan on his decease. On the other hand, Burkutoollah Khan and Wajed Ali Khan called several witnesses, who deposed to the alleged incapacity of Wuzeer Jan, and that the Appellant was Alarukhee Begum's son by one Lal Darogah.

[501] The hearing of the suit took place on the 31st of May, 1854, before Mr. William Travers, the Judge of the Civil Court of the City of Patna; when that Judge delivered judgment, the material part of which was in these terms:—"For trial of the fourth issue, there were adduced in evidence three papers filed before the Judge of Patna on occasion of his deciding the case under Act, No. XIX. of 1841, on account of which this action is laid. Two of these are copies of petitions presented by the Defendant, Meer Ismael, and the third is a petition from Khudijah Begum. All three are stated to afford proof of Alarukhee Begum being a concubine and not a married woman; but, in my opinion, no such inference is to be deduced from them. Both Meer Ismael and Khudijah Begum were at the time earnestly engaged in the endeavour to establish a title of their own; and, in doing this, certain unguarded expressions seem to have escaped them, to the effect, whether Alarukhee Begum was a married woman, or not, and her reputed son, Gouhur Ali, legitimate, or otherwise, still that neither contingency could affect the claim of the Defendants. Loose expressions of this kind convey nothing more than a spiteful imputation, and when cited as evidence are simply ridiculous. On this issue I decide against the Plaintiffs, for the same reason that I rejected their suit on the preceding one—namely, worthless evidence. It is unnecessary to consider the fifth point noted for trial, since, as concerning the merits, it would only become liable to adjudication in the event of the third and fourth issues being decided for the Plaintiffs. This case is certainly nothing less than a conspiracy. Independent of the circumstances, almost unpre-[502]cedented in a high family holding large possessions, of two such contingencies occurring as a separation by divorce, and the impotence of the male heir, both of which are suddenly made public at the same time in a case of disputed succession, under Act, No. XIX. of 1841, notwithstanding that they are stated to have come about at a long interval of time one from the other, it is quite clear to me, from the evidence, both oral and documentary, filed by the Defendants, that they are the rightful and lineal heirs of Ibrahim Khan, and his brother, Wuzeer Jan. It is, however, unnecessary to consider the evidence in detail, since the claim is in itself so inherently weak and fallacious as to be incapable of standing alone, and needs no argument to disprove it."

The hearing of the appeal in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut took place on the 22nd of December, 1857, when the Court, consisting of Messrs. B. J. Colvin, A. Seonce, and J. S. Torrens, reversed the decree of the Judge of the Zillah Court, and pronounced the following judgment:—"We consider that the onus probandi in this case rests with Gouhur Ali, the Respondent, as he does not contest the position of the Appellants as uncles to deceased. They have, therefore, a clear right to share in his estate, unless Gouhur Ali can establish a valid marriage of his alleged father and mother, and his own birth as a son by that marriage. Now, the oral evidence adduced by him to prove these two facts is deficient in the requirements laid down in the decision of the 21st May, 1851. The witnesses were not, excepting one or two of them, members of the [503] family, or persons of consideration, and their depositions betray ignorance of circumstances which acquaintance with the family would have brought to their knowledge. Thus, they could not tell Alarukhee's connections, or her father's name or residence, and similar particulars usually known regarding family relationship. Nor is the documentary evidence more satisfactory, for it consists of proceedings of Court in which Gouhur Ali appears as one of the parties in succession to Ibrahim Khan, but these are of dates subsequent to the decision in the Act, No. XIX. of 1841 case, dated the 30th of September, 1850, by which he was virtually acknowledged by rejection of Appellants' claim. Therefore, and for being in possession of the estate, he could sue or be sued without risk of challenge as to title. He can, however, derive no benefit from them in support of his present allegations. The Judge has based his judgment upon the insufficiency of the Plaintiff's witnesses to prove their denial of Gouhur Ali's filial relationship to Wuzeer Jan; but, although they may have failed in this respect, it was for Gouhur Ali, who made the counter-assertion, to establish its truth. This he has not done; while the Appellants have advanced much to support their statement that Wuzeer Jan had not been married, and, in consequence, that Gouhur Ali could not be his legitimate son. Great weight is due to the fact that no Kabinnamah had been executed in the case of Wuzeer Jan, as in that of his brother, Ibrahim Khan, and no recognition of Gouhur Ali, in any way, previous to the Act, No. XIX. of 1841 case, is shown to have been made, although fitting occasions for it had occurred on the death of Wuzeer Jan, and when the Tukseemnamah [504] was executed after Aboo Mahomed's death in 1840. We, therefore, reverse that portion of the decision of the Judge which recognizes Gouhur Ali as entitled to share in the estate of the deceased, in virtue of being the issue of the marriage of Wuzeer Jan and Alarukhee. But we see no reason to interfere with it as respects the recognition of Khudijah Begum, alias Hosseinee Begum, as the undivorced wife of deceased, as whose widow she must, therefore, be regarded; for no objection to the Judge's finding on this point has been raised in appeal before us. The estate of deceased becomes divisible, therefore, by Mahomedan law, as assented to by the Pleaders of both parties, as follows:—Reckoning it to consist of twenty-four parts, Khudijah Begum, the widow, or her heirs, will receive six parts; Fatimatoonnissa, or her heirs, will receive eight parts; while Plaintiffs, the Appellants, will receive ten parts between them, or five parts each. We, therefore, in reversal of the Orders passed in the Act, No. XIX. of 1841 case, adjudge to Appellants ten of twenty-four parts of the real estate of Ibrahim Khan, deceased, as sued for. We find, from the pleadings, that there is a contention between the parties relative to the value of the personalty left by deceased, and to the eight houses at Dholepore whether they belonged to the estate or had been purchased by the private funds of Fatimatoonnissa. No decision having been pronounced upon these points by the Judge, a remand of the case for their disposal might have been necessary; but Moonshree Amer Ali, for Appellants, has waived all claims to both items of property. This decree is, therefore, restricted to awarding Appellants ten shares of the real estate. [505] They will receive proportionate costs of both Courts from Gouhur Ali, and will pay to Khudijah Begum her costs."

A petition for review of judgment was afterwards presented and refused.

The present appeal was from the above judgment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—It is an admitted proposition, that the burthen of proving the case lies on a Plaintiff, and we insist that, in the present instance, the onus of proof lay upon the Respondents, as they sought by the suit to eject the Appellant from the land in which he was in actual possession, and they also sought to set aside the decree of the Zillah Judge, and of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut affirming that decree on appeal, which decrees confirmed the possession of the Appellant in the Respondents' summary suit brought under the provisions of the Act, No. XIX. of 1841. In the view taken by the Sudder Court, contrary to the opinion of the Judge of the Zillah Court, that the onus of proof lay on the Appellant, the justice of the case, as well as the practice of that Court, required that the suit should have been remanded to the Zillah Court, to take fresh evidence and for a new trial. The evidence of the Respondents' witnesses is, moreover, so unsatisfactory, that this Court cannot but remit the case to India for further proof.

Mr. Field, for the Respondents, Khajah Wajed Hossein Khan, and Khajah Hooobeboollah Khan, insisted, that the Appellant had failed to prove his [506] alleged heirship, as legitimate son of Wuzeer Jan by Alarukhee, by satisfactory evidence. On the contrary, that the evidence established the fact, that Wuzeer Jan was a person of weak intellect from his birth, and moreover a cripple and impotent, and, notwithstanding efforts made to cure him, he remained so till his death; and that consequently he was never married, and died childless during his father's lifetime, and that there is not the slightest trace of any recognition of the Appellant by any of the members of the family, as the son of Wuzeer Jan.

Judgment was reserved and now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 29, 1863).—It is with great regret that their Lordships in this case find themselves unable to dispose of the case upon the evidence as it stands.

The facts on each side are such that they must, from their very nature, be capable of clear and distinct proof. If Adool Kadir Khan, alias Wuzeer Jan, was the miserable object which has been described by the Respondents, it must have been a fact known not only to all the members of the family, but to the medical men who attended him, and to all respectable people in the neighbourhood who were in the habit of associating with him. On the other hand, if he was a married man and contracted a legal marriage with Alarukhee Begum, as is alleged, and the son of that marriage lived in the family, and on the death of the father was acknowledged as his heir, that is a fact which must be equally capable of proof. Unfortunately the witnesses on both sides are of such a character that it is impossible for the Court to place any reliance upon their testimony.

[507] The Judge of the Zillah Court has pronounced in the strongest terms his opinion, that the Appellant in this case is entitled, and that the case against him is a conspiracy (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 501). But instead of stating the grounds upon which he arrived at that conclusion, he confines himself to alleging that as his opinion, and that he has no doubt about it. He has not afforded to the Court that assistance which it is entitled to expect, and which I believe by the Regulations he is bound to afford. On the other hand, we cannot say that the Sudder Court has proceeded in a manner which is entirely satisfactory. They hardly seem to have allowed sufficient weight to the circumstance that the Respondents (who are the Plaintiffs) were the parties who had to make out the case. They have not only to prove their relationship, which is not disputed, but their heirship, which depends upon the illegitimacy of the Appellant; and they must give sufficient general evidence to throw upon him the onus proving his legitimacy.

Their Lordships, therefore, must advise Her Majesty to remit the case to India. Probably the proper Order will be, to affirm the decree of the Sudder Court, so far as it reversed the decree of the Zillah Judge, to reverse the Sudder decree in other respects, and to remit the cause to the Sudder Court, with directions that they shall send it back to the Zillah Court to receive such further evidence as either party may offer, and to proceed afterwards to the regular hearing and adjudication of the cause.

There will be no costs in this appeal.

[508] KHAJAH MOHAMED GOUHUR ALI KHAN, —Appellant; KHAJAH AHMED KHAN, the heir-at-law of KHUDEJAH BEGUM, deceased, —Respondent *
[July 16, 1863].

For head note, see ante, p. 496.

This also was an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, dated the 22nd of December, 1857, affirming the decree of the Judge of the Court of the City of Patna, by which a suit brought on behalf of this Appellant, then a minor, by his mother and guardian, was dismissed, with costs. The suit was instituted under the 17th sec. of Act, No. XIX. of 1841, against Khudijah Begum, since deceased, for the reversal of two several Orders, the one an Order of the Judge of the City of Patna, made in a summary suit in which the Defendant was the Petitioner, and brought by her under the Act, and the other an Order of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut affirming the same. These orders simply retained Khudijah Begum in the possession of certain property, both real and personal, forming part of the estate of the late Ibrahim Khan, deceased, the Appellant's paternal uncle, and in which property the Begum claimed to be entitled to a one-fourth share, as his widow, according to the Mahomedan law. [509] alleging herself to have continued the wife of the deceased up to the time of his death, which allegation was denied by the Appellant.

The case arose out of the previous appeal, and was heard at the same time, and involved a similar issue. As the Respondent did not appear, the appeal was heard ex parte.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, appeared for the Appellant.—Their Lordships, after delivering judgment in the previous appeal (ante, [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 506), said, that with respect to the decision in this case, it must stand over until the result of the proceedings in the previous case was known, the Appellant being the same in both cases; and intimated that if the Appellant did not make out any title in the other case, he would have no interest in this.

[510] RAMALINGA PILLAI.—Appellant; SADASIVA PILLAI.—Respondent *
[Feb. 3 and 4, 1861].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adaulut, at Madras.

Adoption by a childless Hindoo of the Vaisyas, or third class of Hindoos, of his sister's son, upheld.

The sole question in this appeal was, whether the Respondent was the adopted son of one Shammuga Pillai. The Respondent was the son of Chengamalam, the sister of Shammuga Pillai.

The Respondent filed a plaint in the Civil Court of Cuddalore against Chedumbara Pillai and Tillai Pillai, his brother-in-law, and thereby claimed to recover the property pertaining to his one-half share, consisting of lands assessed at Rs. 3099. 3a. 9p. a year; houses, etc., valued at Rs. 6378. 2a. 3p.; cattle, valued at Rs. 740; jewels, etc., worth Rs. 4288. 4a.; and ready cash Rs. 26,500; with the right of recovering outstanding debts, estimated at Rs. 3850. 8a.; amounting in the whole to Rs. 49,881. 10a. The statements in the plaint were, in substance, as follows: that Shammuga Pillai was issueless, and that, having fallen sick [511] in Ani of Khara (July, 1831), he, in the presence of his two wives, adopted the Respondent and died a few days afterwards; that, as the family was undivided, the Respondent was maintained by Muruga Pillai, the elder brother of Chedumbara Pillai, and, after his death, by Chedumbara Pillai; that the funeral ceremonies of Shammuga Pillai were performed by the Respondent by proxy on account of his youth; that the Respondent had performed the annual funeral ceremonies of Shammuga Pillai and of other members of his family; that the Respondent and Chedumbara Pillai were equally entitled to the family property, and that the Respondent had been in the habit of joining in the management of the estate; and further stating that Chedumbara Pillai had refused to allow the Respondent his share of the property, and that he had been induced so to refuse by Tillai Pillai, the other Defendant.

Tillai Pillai, by his answer, disclaimed any interest in the property.

Chedumbara Pillai, by his answer alleged, that Shammuga Pillai never adopted the Respondent: that Shammuga Pillai died of cholera the day after he was attacked; that the Respondent's father died of cholera four days prior to the death of Shammuga Pillai, and could not have given the Respondent in adoption as alleged; that Shammuga Pillai was under pollution on account of the death of a relative at the time of the alleged adoption, and, therefore, could not have made any such adoption; that the Respondent was of a different gotram, and could not have been adopted consistently with Hindoo law; that the funeral ceremonies of Shammuga Pillai were performed by Chedumbara Pillai, and not by the Respondent; that Shammuga Pillai did not die in Ani of Khara (July 1831), but in Ani of Mandana (July, [512] 1832); that the Respondent, being the brother-in-law of Chedumbara Pillai, was employed by him in the management of the property, and was dismissed for improper conduct; that the Respondent had caused a false statement to be introduced in certain depositions made by Chedumbara Pillai, and had, by trickery, obtained a copy of the depositions; that Chedumbara Pillai had no ready cash, and that there were no family jewels as mentioned in the plaint.

A supplemental plaint was filed, correcting the date of the adoption and death of Shammuga Pillai, and Chedumbara Pillai filed a supplemental answer, in which he pleaded that the Respondent attained the age of discretion in September, 1845, and that twelve years and four months had intervened between that date and the date of plaint, and that, consequently, the suit was barred by the Regulation of limitations cl. 4, sec. XVII., Reg. II. of 1803.

A replication and a rejoinder upon the question of the bar by the Regulation of limitations were filed by the respective parties.

Witnesses were examined. Their testimony was contradictory. The Respondent's witnesses deposed to the actual adoption of the Respondent by Shanmuga Pillai. Seven of those witnesses, one of whom was the second wife of Shanmuga Pillai, declared that they were witnesses of the adoption, that all the ceremonies necessary to render the adoption valid were duly performed, that Sinevasa Pillai's death took place a month before such adoption, and that Shanmuga Pillai did not die until four or five days after the adoption. Other witnesses deposed to the fact that the Respondent, at first by proxy, and afterwards in person, performed the funeral ceremonies of Shanmuga Pillai and of his elder wife. The Respondent filed three [513] depositions of the Defendant, dated the 6th of April, 1853, the 5th of December, 1853, and the 25th of August, 1854, before the Sheristadar in respect of a security Bond, containing admissions by him of the fact of adoption of the Respondent. Five of the witnesses for Defendant, Chedumbara Pillai, declared that they were present at Neyvasal at the time when the adoption was stated to have taken place, and denied that there was any such adoption. Those witnesses and five others also declared that the funeral ceremonies of Shanmuga Pillai were performed by Chedumbara Pillai as the sole surviving relative. Several of his witnesses stated to the effect, that a relative named Ambalavana Pillai died two or three days before Shanmuga Pillai, and that the Respondent could not have been given in adoption by his father, and could not have been adopted, as he was under pollution, and that Shanmuga Pillai was also under pollution from some time previously to his death until his death, on account of the death of a relative, so as to prevent the exercise by him of the power of adoption.

On the 16th of June, 1859, the Civil Judge, Mr. George Ellis, decreed in favour of the Respondent, holding, first, that the Regulation of Limitations did not apply, on the ground that the cause of action only arose on the refusal of the Defendant to consent to a partition of the property, and that, supposing the parties to be members of an undivided family, the time did not run between co-parceners until the refusal of a demand for partition, which was only made one year before the suit, and finally held that the adoption of the Respondent by Shanmuga Pillai was proved; principally relying upon the before-mentioned three depositions of the Defendant, as containing a conclusive admission by him of such adoption.

[514] From this decree the Defendant, Chedumbara Pillai, appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras; and that Court, consisting of Messrs. H. D. Phillips and H. Frere, on the 29th of August, 1860, dismissed the appeal with costs, considering that (without entering into any of the objections to the alleged adoption) the Defendant, by express written admissions, had recognized the fact and validity of the adoption, the Court relying upon the three depositions on which the Civil Court had rested its judgment.

From this decree the present appeal was brought.

Pending the appeal the Defendant, Chedumbara Pillai, died leaving the Appellant, his heir.

The appeal was argued by the Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. W. W. Makeson, for the Appellant. Mr. W. H. Melvill appeared for the Respondent, but was not called on.

The Appellant's case was, first, that the adoption of the Respondent by Shanmuga Pillai was not proved, the genuineness of the three depositions being impeached by him as fabricated documents; and it was contended, that even if they were established, the admissions of the adoption in those depositions were not conclusive. Mr. Justice Bayley's ruling in Heane v. Rogers (9 Barn. and Cress., p. 586) was referred to on this point, where it was laid down, that the express admissions of a party to the suit, though evidence against him, yet he was at liberty to prove that such admissions were mistaken, or were untrue, and was not estopped or concluded by such admissions. Lord Lonsborough's case (4 De. Gex., Mac. and Gor., 411), Taylor "On Evidence," Vol. I., § 741 [3rd edit.], was also [515] referred to. Secondly, that the adoption, if proved as a fact, was illegal; (1) from impurity, as Shanmuga Pillai was under pollution from his father's, Sinevasa Pillai's death, and then incapacitated from engaging in the religious rites necessary to an adoption. Strange's "Manual of Hindoo Law," § 63, p. 18 [2nd edit.], his death, it was alleged, having taken place only six or seven days previous to the adoption;

the custom in the family, as deposed to by the witnesses, being to observe pollution for fifteen or sixteen days; and (2) as the Respondent and Shanmuga Pillai were Vaisyas, among which class adoption of a sister's son was forbidden, 1 Strange's "Hindu Law," pp. 83-84 [2nd edit.], referring to Datt. Min. sec. ii., par. 32, and note on Id. § 102.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—This is an appeal from the decree of the Sudder Court at Madras, affirming a decree of the Civil Court of Cuddalore, by which the Respondent was declared to be entitled, as the adopted son of Shanmuga Pillai, to a moiety of certain family property, both real and personal. The only question argued before us has been, whether there was a valid adoption of the Respondent. The Counsel for the Appellant not only questioned the fact of the adoption, but also contended, that no legal adoption could have taken place, as at the time it is alleged to have occurred, Shanmuga Pillai was under pollution in consequence of the recent death of a relative, Sinivassa Pillai; and they also alleged, that the adoption was illegal, as the Respondent was the adopter's sister's son,—but upon this latter objection very little was [516] said. Upon the fact of the adoption, it appears from the evidence, that Shanmuga Pillai having been attacked with cholera at Neyvasal, where he had gone a few days previously, the parents of the Respondent, hearing of the illness, took the Respondent, then an infant of a year and a half old, to Neyvasal, where on the day previous to the death of Shanmuga Pillai, certain ceremonies were proved to have taken place which were sufficient to constitute an actual adoption. Several witnesses, whose testimony is not directly impeached, deposed to these facts, but it was urged in argument, that many other persons were present on the occasion who ought to have been produced on the part of the Respondent. Where, however, there is sufficient evidence of a fact, it is no objection to the proof of it, that more evidence might have been adduced. There is not only no impeachment of the credit of the witnesses who speak to the fact of the adoption, but the circumstances under which they allege it to have taken place are highly probable. It appears, that there had been some promise made by the parents of the Respondent that they would give their son to Shanmuga Pillai for adoption, and nothing is more natural than that hearing of the illness of Shanmuga Pillai, they should have taken the infant to him in order to secure the adoption, which had been previously proposed. There can be no fair ground, therefore, for discrediting the witnesses who prove the actual adoption.

But the Appellant's Counsel contended, that assuming the fact of an adoption of the Respondent, it could have no validity on account of his being the son of a sister of Shanmuga Pillai, and also because Shanmuga Pillai was under pollution in consequence of the death of his relative, Sinivassa Pillai. It [517] appears that the period of pollution, according to Hindoo law and custom, is sixteen days, and proof was given that the death of Sinivassa Pillai took place a month before the act of adoption of the Respondent. The Appellant, on the other hand, proved by several witnesses, that Sinivassa Pillai died only six or seven days before Shanmuga Pillai, and he produced to the same effect a copy of a leaf from a Book kept by the Brahmins for recording the time of the deaths of persons for whom annual ceremonies were to be performed. There was thus a conflict of evidence as to the time of Sinivassa Pillai's death, and it was for the Courts below to determine upon which set of witnesses they could best rely. There are, however, certain documents produced in evidence, which, if genuine, would appear to leave little doubt upon which side the balance ought to incline. These consisted of three depositions made by the Appellant's father upon the occasion of his becoming surety for persons appointed to the office of Sheristadar, in all of which, in answer to inquiries directed to ascertain the value and other particulars relating to the lands offered as security, he stated that "the Respondent was the adopted son of the deceased Shanmuga Pillai, and that there were no other co-parceners." The Appellant's father, however, upon being called as a witness by the Plaintiff (the Respondent), and these documents being shown to him, swore that the signatures to them were not his, and upon looking into the depositions themselves, said as to each, that "as to the depositions stated about adoption," it was not made by him. The learned Counsel for the Appellant disputed the genuineness of the documents on another ground. In the course of the proceedings in the Courts in India, alleged copies of these documents were put in [518] evidence, which, though substantially agreeing with the supposed originals, yet varied in certain particulars as to the signatures and as to the names and number of the witnesses.

It should be observed that these discrepancies between the copies and the originals, which at present are inexplicable, were not pointed out to the Courts in India, where possibly a satisfactory explanation might have been given of them. It is difficult to understand, however, what bearing these variations in alleged copies can have upon the genuineness of the original documents, nor is it easy to discover when and how and by whom the alleged fraud upon the originals could have been committed. In the opinion of the Judge of the Civil Court, the documents bear no traces of having been tampered with or fabricated, and the Appellant's father swears that they were not signed by him, therefore, it must be supposed that the official persons who took the securities from the Appellant's father after he had signed the depositions substituted others for them, or that afterwards the Respondent, or some one on his behalf, induced the person who had the legal custody of them to give them up, and receive the fabricated ones in their stead. The Appellant's Counsel also contended, that the documents are shown not to have been genuine, from the fact of the securities having been taken from the Appellant's father alone; and they referred to a Circular Order containing instructions to the Collectors, as to the security to be given by public servants, in which they are required "to ascertain whether the property offered in security is free from mortgage, lien, etc., and whether the cousins (of the persons offering securities), if there be any, are willing to tender such securities and obtain from them Kara-[519]-namahs to the same effect," and urged, that as the depositions produced show that there was an adopted son who was a co-parcener with the Appellant's father, it was not likely that the Collectors would have so entirely disregarded their instructions as not to have obtained additional security. If, however, the Collectors were satisfied that the portion of the property belonged to the Appellant's father was an ample security, they might be a little remiss in this respect; but at all events if the choice as to the integrity of these documents lies between a slight dereliction of duty on the part of the Collectors, or a gross fraud committed by them, or by some other persons for the benefit of the Respondent, there is little difficulty as to the conclusion which ought to be adopted. If the genuineness of the depositions is established, of which their Lordships entertain no doubt, they are decisive of the case. In them the Appellant's father three times deliberately styles the Respondent an adopted son. Now, if there were no adoption at all, or if the actual adoption were for any reason legally invalid, the Respondent would of course not be entitled to that designation. They amount, therefore, to a complete admission of the whole title of the Respondent, both in fact and in law, and show that the objections which have been urged to his claim, in the opinion of the Appellant's father, who probably was well acquainted with all the circumstances, and may be assumed to have known the Hindoo laws and customs, had no foundation. Their Lordships, therefore, will recommend to Her Majesty to affirm the decree appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

On Appeal from the Supreme Court at Bombay.

According to the law of inheritance prevailing in Bombay, sisters succeed to the estate of their deceased brother, if the estate has been separately acquired by their father, in preference to their father's brothers' sons.

The Appellants filed a Bill in the Supreme Court at Bombay against the Respondents. The Bill stated, in effect, first, that Bhugwantrao Vencajee was a Hindoo inhabitant of Bombay, and the possessor of large moveable and immoveable property, and died in May, 1851, leaving a widow, the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, and three daughters, Naneebaee, Soondrabaae, and Socabaae, the other Respondents, and also an infant son, Gujanon, who died in June, 1853, at the age of little more than two years; secondly, that Bhugwantrao Vencajee made a Will in the English language, by which he appointed the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, Executrix; the material part of the Will, so far as it related to the question raised by the Bill and the present appeal, was as follows:—"All the outstanding debts due to me must collect, [521] and, after paying legal debt due by me, and the expense of the funeral and other ceremonies during the first year of my death, the remainder property, both moveable and immoveable, etc., I give and bequeath to Luxumeebaee, my dearly beloved wife, and my little son, Gujanon an infant; the joys, etc., I have made for my wife and children, they belonging themselves respectively"; third, that the Executrix had proved the Will, and possessed herself of the property; fourth, that the Plaintiffs were the sons, sole heirs and legal personal representatives, according to the Hindoo law, of Anundrow Vencajee, the Testator's sole brother, who died in May, 1853, after the Testator, but a little before Gujanon; fifth, that as such, they were the ultimate sole heirs and legal personal representatives, both of the Testator and his infant son, and were, according to the Hindoo law, absolutely entitled to all his property, subject only to a life interest in his widow; and sixth, that the Executrix had been guilty of certain acts and omissions prejudicial to the estate, and of which the Plaintiffs had a right to complain, such as lending part of it without security to her father making improper investments, selling immoveables, and the like; and the Plaintiffs charged that the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, was only entitled to a life estate in the estate and effects of her deceased husband, either under the Will, or according to Hindoo law, and that the Will, if it purported to give the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, a larger estate than an estate for life, was inoperative and void as against the Plaintiffs, according to the Hindoo law; and the Plaintiffs further charged that they were the ultimate sole heirs and legal personal representatives of Bhugwantrao Vencajee [522] and his son, Gujanon, according to the Hindoo law, and that they, the Plaintiffs, were entitled upon the decease of the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, to take and enjoy the whole of the estate of Bhugwantrao and his son, in undivided shares, as and for an estate of inheritance; and the Bill further charged that whatever might be the quantity, or the quality of the estate vested in the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, and formerly belonging to her deceased husband, she had no power of disposing of the same, or, at least, of the immoveable part of the same, by Will, or otherwise, and that the same, after the decease of the Respondent Luxumeebaee, would devolve, according to the Hindoo law, upon the Plaintiffs, as remainder-men, for an estate of inheritance; and the Bill prayed for a declaration of the Plaintiffs' title, that the estate might be accounted for and secured, and the Executrix restrained from wasting it.

To this Bill a demurrer was filed by the Defendants. The grounds of demurrer were, first, that the Plaintiffs had not by their Bill shown that they were the heirs or legal personal representatives of the above-named Bhugwantrao Vencajee, or of his son, Gujanon, according to the Hindoo law; or that the Plaintiffs, or any of them, were entitled, upon the decease of the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, to take and enjoy the whole or any part of the estate of Bhugwantrao Vencajee, or his son, in undivided shares, or otherwise, as or for an estate of inheritance, or any other estate; or to take or enjoy any of the rents, profits, or proceeds thereof respectively; or that they the Plaintiffs, or any of them, were interested in the accounts of or in the premises, or any of them; secondly, that the husbands of the Re-[523]-spondents, Naneebaee, Sundrabaae, and Socabaae, were not parties to the suit; and lastly, for want of equity generally.

The demurrer was heard before the Supreme Court, consisting of Sir Matthew R. Sausse, Chief Justice, and Sir Joseph Arnould, on the 22nd of February, 1861. It appears that the Plaintiffs' claim as to the immoveable property was alone pressed in argument at the hearing, that as to the moveable property being tacitly abandoned. On the merits of the case, as distinguished from the point of pleading, it was contended on the part of the Respondents, first, that under the Will of the Testator, whose power to dispose of the estate was not questioned in argument by the Appellants, the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, and her infant son took an absolute interest in the entirety as joint tenants, and that, on the death of the son, the mother became absolutely entitled by survivorship; secondly, that the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, as the sole heir of her son, Gujanon, at the time of his death (which it was not denied that she was), became entitled to everything of which he was absolute owner, and that, consequently, if the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, and her son, took as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, the result was the same as if it had been a joint tenancy; lastly, it was contended that the Respondents, Naneebaee, Soondrabaae, and Socabaae, the sisters of Gujanon, and not the Plaintiffs, his paternal first cousins, were his heirs according to the Hindoo law. The objection, for want of parties, was also pressed.

The judgment of the Court, allowing the demurrer, was delivered on the 21st of March, 1861, by the Chief Justice as follows:—"The case set up by [524] the Bill is as follows:—Bhugwantrao Vencajee (the deceased husband of the Defendant, Luxumeebaee, and the deceased father of the three other Defendants) and one Annundrow Vencajee (the deceased father of the Plaintiffs) were brothers, and, as the Bill alleges, the sons and sole heirs and legal personal representatives, according to the Hindoo law, of one Vencoba Mancojee. Vencoba Mancojee died intestate in 1832. Bhugwantrao Vencajee died in May, 1851, leaving, as the Bill, in the third paragraph, alleges, his brother, Annundrow Vencajee, the Defendant, Luxumeebaee, his widow, the other Defendants, Naneebaee, Soondrabaae, and Socabaae, his three daughters, and one son, Gujanon, then an infant of the age of about three months, him surviving. He left, also, considerable property, both moveable and immoveable, and a Will, to be more particularly noticed presently. Annundrow Vencajee, the brother of the Testator, and the father of the Plaintiffs, died in May, 1853, having made a Will (not set out), and leaving the Plaintiffs his sole heirs and legal personal representatives him surviving. Gujanon, the infant son of the Testator, died in June, 1853, leaving the Defendant, Luxumeebaee, his mother, the other Defendants, his sisters, and the Plaintiffs, his cousins, him surviving. The Will of Bhugwantrao Vencajee, which is very short, is set out in the sixth paragraph of the Bill. By this instrument, after making provision for the due celebration, according to Hindoo law, of his funeral rites and ceremonies, he directs his wife to get his three daughters, Naneebaee, Soondrabaae, and Socabaae, married at reasonable charges, to collect outstandings and pay debts, to defray the expenses of his funeral and other ceremonies during the first year [525] after his death. He then devises as follows:—'The remainder property, both moveable and immoveable, etc., I give and bequeath to Luxumeebaee, my dearly beloved wife, and my little son, Gujanon, an infant; the joys, etc., I have made for my wife and children, they belonging themselves respectively [meaning apparently they belong to them respectively]. I do hereby constitute and ordain Luxumeebaee sole Executrix of this my last Will and Testament. She will manage the whole affairs of my estate and property, but by the advice and consent of my father-in-law, Bhasker Shamjee, until my little son, Gujanon, attain to his proper age.' Such are the material portions of the Will. Luxumeebaee, the Bill alleges, immediately after her husband's death, took possession of the whole of his moveable and immoveable estate, and in July, 1851, took out probate of his Will. It is alleged by the Bill that she has paid all her deceased husband's debts and funeral expenses, had got his three daughters (the co-Defendants) suitably married, and defrayed their marriage expenses out of his estate. The Bill charges that Luxumeebaee is not entitled, either under the Will, or by the Hindoo law, to more than a life estate in the estate and effects of her deceased husband; that the Will, if it purports to give her more than a life estate, is void as against the Plaintiffs, who, according to Hindoo law, are the ultimate sole heirs and legal personal representatives of their deceased uncle, and of his deceased son, Gujanon; and that, as such, they are entitled, on the decease of Luxumeebaee, to take and enjoy the whole estate of Bhugwantrao and his son, in undivided shares, as and for an estate of inheritance. The Bill then alleges against Luxumeebaee, in her management of the estate, various acts and [526] omissions in the nature of waste, and also charges her with attempting to adopt one of her brother's sons, as the son and heir of her deceased husband. The Bill then prays, amongst other things, that the Plaintiffs may be declared entitled to the estate and effects of which Bhugwantrao Vencajee died possessed, or at least of so much thereof as consist of immoveable estate, as the ultimate heirs thereof in remainder for an estate of inheritance. That the Defendant, Luxumeebaee, may be restrained by injunction from selling or disposing of any part of the estate, from committing waste, and from adopting one of her brother's sons. It further prays for an account, and for a receiver, if necessary. To this Bill the Defendants have demurred, on the grounds, that the Plaintiffs have not shown themselves to be, according to Hindoo law, heirs or legal personal representatives of Bhugwantrao Vencajee, or his son, Gujanon, or that they or any of them are or is entitled, on the decease of Luxumeebaee, to take and enjoy the whole or any part of the estate of Bhugwantrao, or his son, in undivided shares, or otherwise for an estate of inheritance or for any other estate; or that they or any of them are or is interested in the account as prayed. There is a further ground of demurrer for want of parties, in respect of the non-joinder of the husbands of the three daughters, which, on the view the Court takes of the case, it will not be material to consider, for, in our opinion, the Defendants are entitled to succeed on the other grounds on which they have relied. It was admitted that the property which was the subject of Bhugwantrao's bequest and the present suit must be taken upon the pleadings to have been (as in fact it was) separately acquired property by him. Although [527] alleged in the Bill, yet it was not contended before us in argument, that Bhugwantrao had not an absolute disposing power over his separate estate. No question was, in effect, raised as to Luxumeebaee's right to take the moveable property absolutely. It appears to us that the devise may be construed as giving to Luxumeebaee and Gujanon, first, either a joint tenancy for life; or second, a tenancy in common for life; or third, a joint tenancy in quasi fee; or fourth, a tenancy in common in quasi fee. If the first construction be adopted, Luxumeebaee takes a life interest in the entire estate by survivorship, and the reversion vests as an undisposed of residue in Bhugwantrao's heir, who was Gujanon, and upon the death of the latter it went to his, Gujanon's, next heir. On the second construction, Luxumeebaee would take her moiety for life, and Gujanon's share would, with the reversion in Luxumeebaee's moiety upon his death, descend upon his next heir. On the third construction, Luxumeebaee would take under the Will an absolute interest by survivorship in the residue. On the fourth construction (that of a tenancy in common in quasi fee), Luxumeebaee's share vested in her absolutely, and on Gujanon's death his moiety descended upon his next heir. The substantial question for decision is, in whom, upon the pleadings as they stand, is the absolute interest in the property of Bhugwantrao Vencajee now vested? According to all the authorities recognized at this side of India, Luxumeebaee, as mother of Gujanon, became his heir, and if she were to take an absolute estate in the property, the Plaintiffs could have no title. The quantum of estate which she is allowed to take in the character of heir to her son is not free from doubt; although [528] in the category of those who take as heirs to a separated brother, there is no distinction of difference made between the quantum of estate taken by a mother from that taken by a son, a father, a brother, or any other relative, who admittedly takes in such an inheritance the most absolute estate known to Hindoo law.—(See Menu, Yagnyavalkya, Mitacshara, ch. II., sec. iii.; Mayucha, ch. iv., sec. 8, etc.). Where the quantum, of estate has been cut down to a life interest, when the inheritance descends upon a female, it must be ascribed to the influences of usage, as the restriction is not to be found in the early Canons of inheritance. In Dencooverbai's case (see post [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 321), this Court held that the widow of an intestate, childless, and separated brother, took the moveable property absolutely, and the immoveable for life only, with remainder to the heirs of the intestate. That decision was very much based upon the principle of allowing the law of usage to control the letter of that portion of the written law which was in favour of the widow. See Mitacshara, 'On Inheritance,' ch. II., sec. i., where the order of succession is declared; and par. 39, of that section where the Commentator, after discussing all the various opinions, sums up in conclusion, as follows:—'Therefore, it is a settled rule that a wedded wife, being chaste, takes the whole estate of a man who, having separated from his co-heirs and not subsequently reunited with them, dies leaving no male issue.' However, in the view which we take of this case and for the purposes of this demurrer, it will not be necessary to decide whether a mother takes by inheritance from her son the absolute interest, or an estate for life only; that she is entitled to the latter may be taken to be conceded upon the pleadings, and [529] there cannot, in our opinion, be any doubt upon that point at this side of India. Supposing, then, Luxumeebaee to take a life estate only in the descended inheritance, the reversion vests in the next heir of Gujanon, and upon the best authorities recognized in this Presidency, that heir is his sisters, who are Defendants in this suit. This appears, from Mayucha, ch. iv., p. 19, where, after enumerating the mother (see pp. 14 and 15), the uterine brother and his sons (secs. 16 and 17), the paternal grandmother (sec. 18), (and no paternal grandmother of Gujanon is shown to be in existence on the face of this Bill), the Commentator, in sec. 19, proceeds thus:—'In default of her (the paternal grandmother) comes the sister, under this text of Menu. To the nearest Sapinda (male or female) after him (or her) in the third degree, the inheritance next belongs, and thus of Bruhuspitia, where many claim the inheritance of a childless man, whether they may be paternal or maternal relations or more distant kinsmen, he who is the nearest of them shall take the estate.' And the next rank is hers (the sisters), both from her being begotten under the brother's family name and there being no further reservation with respect to the gentile relationship. Neither is she mentioned in the texts as an occasion of taking the wealth, but as next of kin she succeeds. Considering the high authority of the Mayucha on this side of India, this might alone seem sufficient to establish the position that the sister comes next in order of inheritance after the paternal grandmother; but, according to certain Commentators on the Mitacshara, the sister comes next in order of inheritance after the brother. [530] The passage in the Mitacshara is contained in the first paragraph of ch. II., sec. iv.: 'On failure of the father, brethren share the estate.' Nanda Pandita and Balam-Bhatta, says Mr. Colebrooke in his note to this passage, consider that, as including 'brothers and sisters,' in the same manner in which 'parents' have been explained 'mother and father,' and conformably with an express rule of grammar (Panini, sec. 12, 68). They observe, that the brother inherits first, and, in his default, the sister; this opinion, Mr. Colebrooke states, is controverted by Camalacara and the author of Vyavahara-Mayucha. It certainly is so in sec. 16 of chaps. iv. and viii. of the Mayucha, p. 105; but, it should be observed, that in p. 15 of the same commentary the doctrine of the Mitacshara, now generally regarded as established as to the words 'parents' including both 'mother and father,' is controverted, and on precisely the same grammatical grounds. Sir Thomas Strange, vol. I., p. 146 [2nd edit.], after stating generally that the sister is excluded from succession, adds:—'Such appears to be the law of the Bengal Provinces; but is not to be taken as universal, opinions existing, that the term 'brethren' in the enumeration of heirs in the Mitacshara, includes 'sisters,' as 'parents' have been seen to do 'father and mother'; but, observes Sir Thomas Strange, 'they stand controverted.' For this position he refers to the Appendix in his 2nd vol., ch. vi., pp. 243, 244, and especially to the mark of Mr. Colebrooke there printed. In the passage thus referred to Mr. Colebrooke observes, 'Commentators on the Mitacshara allow the sister to come in, on failure of brothers. This opinion is, however, controverted,' and, to show that is so, [531] Mr. Colebrooke refers to the very passage already cited from the Mitacshara, from Mr. Colebrooke's notes to which it appears that one of the two authorities cited as controverting the position is the Mayucha; and, on reference to the Mayucha, it further appears that the opinion as to the generic word 'brethren' including 'sisters,' is controverted there in precisely the same grammatical grounds on which the same authority had controverted the opinion, that the generic word 'parents' includes the mother; which latter opinion Sir Thomas Strange regarded as well established. The expression, therefore, in Sir Thomas Strange's first volume, that the opinion in question stands controverted (if by such an expression he meant, is conclusively or finally controverted), must be regarded as too strong. A similar construction should apparently be given to the words 'parents' and 'brethren.' He no doubt adds, on the authority of Mr. Colebrooke, that Jagannatha observes, it is now here seen that sisters inherit the property of their brothers; but Jagannatha, whatever the case may be on the other side of India, is not of binding authority on this. It would, on the whole, appear a safe proposition to lay down that, in this part of India, even if the opinion be not established, that the term 'brethren' includes 'sisters,' and, therefore, if sisters do not inherit on failure of brothers or brothers' sons, yet, at all events, that the doctrine of the Mayucha must be held to prevail, and that sisters come next in succession to the paternal grandmother. Either doctrine, however, will entitle the sisters to succeed to the inheritance of Gujanon upon the death of Luxumeebaee. As to the mode in which the sisters take, it [532] would appear, by analogy, that they take as 'daughters.' In a passage from the Commentary of Nanda Pandita, cited by Mr. Colebrooke in his annotations, in par. 5 of the 5th section of the second chapter of the Mitacshara (p. 351), occur these words: 'The daughters of the father and other ancestors must be admitted, like the daughter of the man himself, and for the same reason'; but the daughters of the man himself take absolutely, and so, therefore, do the sisters. In Deucooverbaee's case (a) [533] this Court in 1859, after lengthened

(a) The judgment of the Chief Justice Sausse in this case, nom. Pranjeevandass Toolseeydass v. Deucooverbaee, was transmitted with this appeal, and was, in its material parts, as follows:—"In this suit there are two ground of claim: first, that the Plaintiffs were entitled to property as members of an undivided family; second, that even if Ramdass was to be considered as having separate estate, yet that he willed it in such a way to charity that the bequest was void for vagueness and, therefore, they, the Plaintiffs, were entitled to come in as heirs with Bhagmandass. I have already decided and given reasons for thinking that the property was not undivided, but separate property, and, therefore, that Ramdass had power to will it away, and that his Will operated on it. So far the Plaintiffs' case failed, and they ought then to show they had a locus standi in Court as heirs under a void bequest. The first question remaining is, whether this devise is a good charitable devise.—[Here followed the reasons for holding that the devise was void, and that the property became undisposed of residue, according to the Hindoo law.]—The Testator left a widow and daughters, and we must consider first what estate the widow took, the husband dying leaving separate property. I have felt considerable difficulty in coming to any decision, as the schools are so conflicting, and it is difficult to follow the reports of the Adawlut. The Books that are of authority in this part of India are three—Menu, Mitacshara, and Mayucha. Mr. Colebrooke, the celebrated author of the Digest, speaks of the Mayucha in a letter set out in 1 Strange's 'Hindu Law,' p. 318 [2nd edit.]; the next in authority is the Mitacshara, which Mr. Borradaile mentions in his Reports, and he says there are three Books generally referred to in this part of the country. I also had inquiries made of the Shastrees here and at Poonah, and they say these three Books establish the usage, and have been referred to for the last eighty years at least as authorities here on the law of inheritance. The Daya-Bhaga referred to in Sir Thomas Strange's work is of the Bengal school. I was led to make these inquiries because Strange refers to Bengal Books—the Bengal law being different. Then, according to these three Books, what estate does the widow take? All the authorities, both in Bengal and here, are in unison as to the right of the widow to succeed where the property is separate, and in the former to undivided also, but her power over it is said to be limited on the Bengal side, and she is merely treated as tenant for life. But on this side there appears to be a different practice.

consideration of all the accessible authorities, and after consulting the [534] Shastrees, both in Poonah and in the Sudder Adawlut of Bombay, held that daughters, on this side of [535] India, taking by inheritance, takes an estate absolutely. This doctrine was mainly based on the authority of the Mayucha, ch. iv., sec. 8, para. 10, p. 103, and on that of the Mitaeshara, ch. II., sec. 2, paras. 1 and 2, p. 341. The passage from the Mayucha is as follows:—'In default of the wife, the daughters succeed, even as Menu says. The son of a man is even as himself, and the daughter is equal to the son: how, then, can any other inherit his property but a daughter, who is as himself?' In the case of Deuceoverbaee, each Shastree rested his opinion as to which appears to be founded on the authority of the Books I have mentioned. In 1 Strange's 'Hindu Law,' p. 247, he says the restrictions on the widows' power is limited and concerns land only—but as to personal estate greater latitude is given. He cites the Bengal Reports, and Borradaile's Reports. I cannot get the Bengal Reports, but Borradaile does not bear him out. In Sp. Summery, published by the Bengal Government in 1825, it is stated, that the widow holds the moveable property absolutely; but of land is merely tenant for life. He then refers to the Mitaeshara, which says, therefore, it is a settled rule that the widow takes the whole estate when separate, if living chaste. The Mayucha lays down the proposition very much in the same way, and says the widow takes the moveable and immoveable property. On the question submitted to the Shastrees, it appears that the widow has power over the whole estate for proper purposes, and over the immoveable property she is limited to the use of it for life, but can mortgage or sell it for necessary purposes—but she is bound to exhaust the moveable before resorting to the immoveable property, the latter being an object of care to the Hindoo law, with a view to preserve it for the heirs. The cases are very conflicting, but I find over the moveable she has power, but that it is denied over the immoveable, and that a widow may give during her life personal property, but cannot will it (the learned Judge here referred to 2 Morley's Dig., p. 69). On the whole, I think the spirit and practice of the Hindoo law as existing in Western India, will be best construed by treating the widow as having uncontrolled power over the moveable estate, but not having more than a life use over the immoveable estate. The widow has by the text Books a number of duties thrown on her as to spending money, but they are of that character that it would be impossible for the Court to carry them out. In Bengal, dealings by a widow with the immoveable estate are legally but not morally good, but I am not aware that it has been so held here. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion, that in regard to immoveable property her estate is in the nature of that of a tenant for life. The widow, therefore, not having full power, we must see who are entitled. In this case there are daughters. Now, according to all the authorities, the daughters take next after the widow. But what is the nature of the estate they take? And here there are differences of opinion; but dealing with the question according to the three Books I have mentioned, it appears to me that the daughters take an absolute estate. That the separate property they take by inheritance from the father ranks as Stridhana, is asserted by the Mitaeshara; but this is denied by Strange. But the practice, so far as my search goes, does not agree with the Mitaeshara; therefore, I think it is not expedient or consonant with practice to hold that property coming to daughters by inheritance is Stridhana, but merely the immoveable part of it. Strange says, 'Neither does such property go as Stridhana, but, according to southern authorities, it classes as Stridhana;' but going to the fountain of law, Menu, as quoted in the Mayucha, p. 103, s. 10, we have laid it down that, in default of sons, the daughters are treated as sons, and take absolutely. With reference to this point, also, I consulted the Shastrees both here and at Poonah, the question being, whether daughters could alienate any and what portion of the property derived from their father, who died separate? The answer was, that daughters obtaining property could alienate it at their will and pleasure; and in this the Shastrees of both places agree. On reviewing the authorities, and 3 Colebrooke's Dig., p. 465, where it was held that daughters have a right to alienate property inherited, I have come to the conclusion that daughters take the immoveable property absolutely, when it comes to them after the death of the mother; and that the Plaintiffs have no locus standi in this Court. Therefore, in this cause, the Bill must be dismissed.

the inheritability of the daughters on this same passage of the Mayucha, referring to it as a work of high and generally received authority, not only in Guzerat, but in Bombay and the Deccan; that is to say, over the larger and more important portion of this Presidency. Of the general authority of the Mitashara on this side of India there can be, and, in fact, never has been, any doubt; and on this point the Mitashara is not less clear and explicit than the treatise already cited. The text of the Mitashara already referred to is in ch. II., sec. 2, on the 'right of the daughters and daughters' son.' In par. 1 it is laid down—'on failure of her (i.e. the widow) the daughters inherit.' Par. 2 is as follows:—Thus Catyayana says, 'Let the widow succeed to her husband's wealth, provided she be chaste; and, in default of her, let the daughter inherit, if unmarried.' Also Vrihaspati, 'The wife is pronounced successor to the wealth of her husband, and in her default, the daughter. As a son, so does the daughter of a man proceed from his several limbs. How, then, should any other person take her father's wealth?' In the face of authorities so clear and explicit as these are, [536] and so generally regarded as binding on this side of India, it becomes immaterial to examine the case referred to in the argument as having been decided in Bengal, where a different school of doctrine prevails, as to some portions of the line of Hindoo inheritance. We will observe, that the above expression in Catyayana, 'let the daughters inherit, if unmarried,' is shown by the following sections in the Mitashara not to be restrictive, but preferential only as between married and unmarried daughters. It thus appears, that upon no construction of Bhugwantra's Will have the Plaintiffs, on the face of the Bill, shown that they are entitled, upon the decease of Luxumeebaee, to take the whole of the estate of Bhugwantrao for an estate of inheritance, or any other estate. They have of course equally failed in showing that they are interested in the account as prayed; and the demurrer must be allowed with costs."

The present appeal was from this judgment.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. G. Lake Russell, for the Appellants.—The question raised is one of inheritance and succession by the Hindoo law. The Appellants are the sole ultimate heirs and legal personal representatives of Bhugwantrao, and of his son, Gujanon, according to the Hindoo law, and entitled, as we insist, upon Gujanon's death to a moiety of his estate, subject to the life interest of the Respondent, Luxumeebaee, and upon her decease absolutely to the whole estate of Bhugwantrao and his son, in undivided shares. Luxumeebaee, as a Hindoo widow, is, by the Hindoo law, at the most, entitled only to a life estate in the moveable and immoveable estate of her husband, whether [537] she takes under the Will, or by inheritance. Keerut Sing v Koolalul Sing (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 331), and cases cited in Morley's Dig., Vol. I., p. 614, pars. 8, 15. If the Will purports to give her a larger estate than an estate for life, the devise is inoperative and void in law as against the Appellants; but whatever be the quantity or quality of the estate now vested in Luxumeebaee, and formerly belonging to her deceased husband, whether as tenant for life, or as joint tenant, she has no power of disposing of the same, or at least of the immoveable part thereof, by Will, or otherwise, and the same, on Gujanon's death, descended to the Appellants, subject to Luxumeebaee's life estate, and at her decease, will devolve, according to the Hindoo law, upon the Appellants as remainder-men for an estate of inheritance. This view holds good whether the family be considered as undivided, or separate, or whether the property be considered as ancestral, or property separately acquired. In any event, the Appellants, the male cousins, as the male representatives of Bhugwantrao and Gujanon, succeed as heirs in preference to daughters. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 144-6, [2nd Edit.,] ib. vol. II., pp. 243-248. Mitashara, ch. II., sect. 4, par. 7, p. 348. Morley's Dig., Vol. I., pp. 321-2, pars. 125-7, 180-3. Deucooverbaee's case, referred to in the judgment of the Court below (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.] p. 532), only decided that the widow had a life estate; and though it was there held that her daughters succeeded on her death, yet such holding is contrary to the authorities. Even in cases where females take by succession, or descent, from the parent or brother, they take life estates only, and not absolutely. Again, the daughters [538] being married, and their marriage portions paid, excluded them from participation.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Wickens, for the Respondents, were not called on.

Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—The question raised by the demurrer, the subject of this appeal, is, whether the Plaintiffs in the suit, the Appellants, have by the statements in their Bill shown any interest in the estate of Bhugwantrao, the Testator in the cause, or any concern with it. If they have not, the demurrer was rightly allowed.

Bhugwantrao was a Hindoo, resident at Bombay. He died in the year 1851, having made his Will in the English language, in that year. He appointed his wife one of the Respondents, now his widow, sole Executrix, and in addition to some directions, which need not be now particularly mentioned, he expressed himself thus:—"All the outstanding debts due to me must collect, and after paying legal debt due by me, and the expense of the funeral and other ceremonies during the first year of my death, the remainder property, both moveable and immoveable, etc., I give and bequeath to Luxumeebaee, my dearly beloved wife, and my little son, Gujanon, an infant." Then follows an expression which has with propriety been the subject of observation, namely, the expression, "the joys, etc., I have made for my wife and children, they belonging themselves respectively." Their Lordships, however, consider that the word "respectively" has no application to the gift of the residue, but refers [539] only to whatever may have been meant by "the joys, etc."

The Testator, as has been said, died in the same year, survived by his wife, the Executrix, one of the Respondents, and her three daughters by him, who are also Respondents, and by the infant son, Gujanon, who died in the year 1853, a child under four years of age.

Observations have been very properly made concerning the true construction of the words of the gift of the residue—whether as giving, or not giving, an absolute interest, and whether as giving, or not giving, an interest in the nature of what English lawyers call a joint tenancy in common. In the circumstances that happened, their Lordships do not think it necessary to give an opinion upon that point or those points of construction, for whether the gift was absolute or not absolute, whether in common, as we call it, or in joint tenancy, upon the Testator's death, the widow and his son took the whole between them, at least in possession, and upon the death of the son, an infant of tender years, the widow became in every possible view entitled to the whole, at least for her life. There is no possible claim to an interest in possession in the Appellants.

Their claim is thus founded. They contend that upon the death of Gujanon the absolute interest in the whole, or a moiety, subject to a life interest in the widow, devolved upon his heirs, and that those heirs were the Appellants, and not the three daughters of the Testator, the co-Respondents with the widow. They make out, they say, proposition by the nature of their relationship, namely, that they were the sons of the brother of the Testator, and being so related in [540] the male line they excluded by law, they say, the sisters of Gujanon from the heirship to him, a proposition which the Respondents deny.

Now, upon the question of the capacity of the sisters to be heirs to their brother, different views of the law appear to have been taken in different parts of India, and a general leaning in favour of excluding the sisters in such a case appears to prevail in Bengal, but appears not to prevail in the territories of Bombay. It is a point upon which, probably, it may be said, that a reasonable difference of opinion may be entertained; but the authorities most regarded in Bombay, whence this case comes, seem to be in favour of preferring the claim of the sisters to the claim of the male paternal relatives, the cousins. The Chief Justice in giving his judgment in the present case, quotes a Book with which we are not familiar here, but which seems to be well known in Bombay, and to be considered and treated as an authority there. He says (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 529), "Supposing, then, Luxumeebaee to take a life estate only in the descended inheritance, the reversion vests in the next heir of Gujanon, and, upon the best authorities recognized in this Presidency, that heir is his sisters, who are Defendants in this suit. This appears, from Mayucha, ch. iv., p. 19, where, after enumerating the mother (see pp. 14 and 15), the uterine brother and his sons (secs. 16 and 17), the paternal grandmother (sec. 18) and no paternal grandmother of Gujanon is shown to be in existence on the face of this Bill. The Commentator, in section 19, proceeds thus:—'In default of her (the paternal grandmother) comes [541] the sister, under this text of Menu. To the nearest Sapinda (male or female) after him or her in the third degree, the inheritance next belongs: and thus of Bruhospitia, where many claim the inheritance of a childless man, whether they may be maternal or paternal relations, or more distant kinsmen, he who is the nearest of them shall take the estate.' And the next rank is hers (the sister's), both from her being begotten under the brother's family name, and there being no further reservation with respect to the gentile relationship. Neither is she mentioned in the texts as an occasion of taking the wealth, but as next of kin she succeeds. Considering the high authority of the Mayucha on this side of India, this might alone seem sufficient to establish the position that the sister comes next in order of inheritance after the paternal grandmother; but, according to certain Commentators on the Mitacshara, the sister comes next in order of inheritance after the brother. The passage in the Mitacshara is contained in the first paragraph of ch. II., sec. 4: 'On failure of the father, brethren share the estate.' Nanda Pundita and Balam-Bhatta, says Mr. Colebrooke, in his note to this passage, consider that as including 'brothers and sisters' in the same manner in which 'parents' have been explained 'mother and father,' and conformable with an express rule of grammar. They observe, that the brother inherits first, and in his default the sisters; this opinion, Mr. Colebrooke states, is controverted by Camalacara and the author of Mayucha. It certainly is so in sec. 16 of chapters iv. and viii. of the Mayucha, p. 105; but it should be observed, that in p. 15 of the same Commentary, the doctrine of the Mitacshara, now [542] generally regarded as established as to the word 'parents' including both 'mother and father,' is controverted, and on precisely the same grammatical grounds.'

Their Lordships desire not to be understood as expressing an opinion that the general course said to be taken in Bengal upon this subject, or upon the construction of the word "brethren," is wrong, but certainly neither are they satisfied that the construction put by the passage in the Mitacshara, which has been mentioned, and generally adopted as it seems in Bombay, is wrong. Their Lordships come to the conclusion that the general rule in Bombay has long been, and is, to treat the sisters as heirs to the brother rather than the paternal relatives of the description of the present Plaintiffs. Accordingly their Lordships think that they may safely and properly, in the present instance, adopt or accept that rule. They consider that in Bombay, at least, the sisters, in such a case as this, are the heirs of the brother. The consequence is, that in whatever possible manner the Will of the Testator is read, the entire interest in the property in question must, we think, be viewed as vested in the widow and her daughters, or some or one of them, and that, therefore, the Appellants here, the sons of the brother of the Testator, are suing in a matter in which they have not shown the slightest interest, nor with which they have any concern. The result is, in their Lordships' opinion, that the demurrer was rightly allowed, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

It ought to be added, as to the argument that the marriage of the daughters and their marriage por-[543]-tions excluded them from participation, that their Lordships think there is no ground for that argument either in principle or otherwise.

KATAMA NATCHIER.—Appellant: SRIMUT RAJAH MOOTTOO VIJAYA RAGANADHA BODHA GOOROO SAWMY PERIYA ODAYA TAVER.—Respondent * [April 27, 28, 29, and 30, May 30, and June 1, 1863].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

The Zemindary of Shivagunga in Madras is in the nature of a Principality, impartible, and capable of enjoyment by only one member of the family at a time [9 Moo. Ind. App. 592].

By the law of inheritance prevailing in Madras and throughout the southern parts of India, separate acquired estate descends to a widow, in default of male issue of the deceased husband.

The interest of a Hindoo widow so succeeding to her husband's estate is similar to that of a tenant in tail by the English law, as representing the inheritance.

In a united Hindoo family where there is ancestral property, and one of the members of the family acquires separate estate, on the death of that member such separate acquired estate does not fall into the common stock, but descends to the male issue, if any, of the acquirer, or in default, to his daughters, who, while they take their father's share in the ancestral property, subject to all the rights of co-partners, inherit the self-acquired estate free from such rights.

Where property belonging in common to a united Hindoo family has been divided, the share of a deceased member of the family goes in the general course of descent of separate acquired property; but if there is a co-partnership between the different members of the united family survivorship follows.

Upon the principle of survivorship, the right of the co-partners in the undivided estate overrides the widow's right of succession; but with respect to self-acquired property of a member of the united family, the other members of the family have neither community of interest, nor unity of possession, therefore, the foundation of the right to take by survivorship fails.

A decree in a suit by A. against B., claiming as widow, to succeed to her husband's estate, in preference to B., his nephew, on the ground of the family being divided, held not to operate as res judicata, or capable of being pleaded in bar to a suit by C., a daughter, claiming to succeed to her father's estate on A.'s death, on the ground that the property was self-acquired by her father. Such judgment, though viewed otherwise by the Court below, determines only an issue raised concerning a particular person, and is not a judgment in rem, but simply a judgment inter partes.

In this case the appeal was brought from a decree of the Civil Court of Madura, dated the 27th of December, 1847, by which the Respondents' father, Gowery Taver, the son of Oya Taver, was held entitled to the Zemindary of Shivagunga, as heir to the Appellant's [544] father, Gowery Vallabha Taver, in preference to Anga Moottoo Natchiar, the surviving widow of the latter, on the ground that Appellant's father and his elder brother, Oya Taver, were undivided brothers. The appeal also embraced the decrees of the Sudder Adawlut Court at Madras, dated the 19th of April, 1852, the 5th of November, 1859, the 3rd of March, 1860, and the decree of the Civil Court of Madura of the 25th of August, 1859, in which it was held that the Appellant, claiming as heir in remainder after the death of the surviving widow, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, was not entitled either to appeal from the decree of the 27th of December, 1847, or to prosecute a new suit to recover the Zemindary.

The property claimed comprised the Zemindary of Shivagunga, a Zemindary of very great value, situate in the District of Madura in the Presidency of Madras, together with other property and mesne profits to a very large amount.

The circumstances of the case, the history of the Zemindary of Shivagunga, and of the extensive litigation respecting the succession, were as follow:—

The Zemindary of Shivagunga was created by [545] Sadut Ally Khan, Nabob of the Carnatic, in the year 1730, and it was given as an hereditary fief by him to Shasavarna Odaya Taver, of the family of Nalcooty, of the Marawa caste, in reward for his military services. Shasavarna was on his death succeeded by his only son, Vadooganada, who was killed in battle. Vadooganada had an infant daughter by his wife, Ranee Velu, but no other child. It appeared that two persons named Vella Murdoo and Chinna Murdoo then usurped the actual government of the Zemindary, and ultimately wrested from the Nabob of the Carnatic his acquiescence in the nominal tenure of the Zemindarship by Ranee Velu. Velu gave her daughter by Vadooganada in marriage to one Vengam Odaya Taver. The daughter died in giving birth to her first child, and the child survived its mother but a short period. Both died in the lifetime of the Ranee Velu, who was thus left issueless. It also appeared that the Appellant's father lived at Shivagunga with the Ranee, who, it was alleged, had adopted him. The parties who then appeared to be entitled to the Zemindary were two brothers, Oya Taver and Gowery Vallabha Taver, collateral descendants from the progenitors of Shasavarna. Gowery Vallabha Taver was at this time about twenty-nine years of age. Oya Taver was his senior in years, but sickly and infirm. The two brothers were the nearest relations of Vadooganada, and also of Shasavarna. Vellu Murdoo and Chinna Murdoo, on the death of Ranee Velu, expelled Oya Taver and Gowery Vallabha Taver from the Zemindary, and joined a rebellion against the Government. This rebellion was put down by the East India Company.

By the Treaty of the 12th of July, 1792, all sovereign power over the Poligar countries, including the Zemindary of Shivagunga, was transferred in perpetuity by the then Nabob of the Carnatic to the East India Company.

[546] By a proclamation of Lord Clive, dated the 6th of July, 1801, the Government transferred the Zemindary, which, it appeared, was treated by the Government as an escheat for want of lineal heirs, to the Appellant's father, Gowery Vallabha Taver, otherwise called Permettoor Worria Taver, or Woya Taver, who was collaterally descended from the progenitors of the first Zemindar, and appointed him Zemindar of Shivagunga.

By a Sunned i Milkeat Istimrar, or deed of permanent settlement, dated the 22nd of April, 1803, the Zemindary was confirmed to the Appellant's father, to hold in perpetuity, with power to transfer the same by sale or gift, on payment to the Government of a permanent annual jumma. From the time of his investiture in 1801, until his death in 1829, Appellant's father continued the sole Zemindar.

The principal questions involved in the appeal were, first, whether the Appellant's father and his brother, Oya Taver, were divided brothers; and, secondly, if the Zemindary was the self-acquired estate of the Appellant's father. It was alleged by the present Appellant that her father, and his elder brother, Oya Taver, had divided their ancestral and other property at Padamattoor and elsewhere, which they held as principal Ryots under the former Zemindary of Shivagunga. This division it was said was effected by deeds executed in the year 1792, after which Appellant's father remained with Ranee Velu at Shivagunga, which was some distance from Padamattoor, where Oya Taver continued to reside, Padamattoor having fallen to his share on the division. It appeared that by a Moolchilka, or lease, dated the 17th of July, 1803, the elder brother, Oya Taver, leased from the Appellant's father eight villages, part of the Zemindary, in permanent lease, at a fixed teerva (rent) of [547] Pons 3157. These villages were held under the Moolchilka by Oya Taver until his death on the 17th of April, 1815, he having paid the teerva to his brother, with the exception of some arrears due at his death. By a Moolchilka, dated the 24th of July, 1815, Moottoo Vadooga Taver, also called Woya Taver, the eldest son of Oya Taver, rented the same villages at the same rent in a similar manner from the Zemindar, at the same time binding himself to pay the arrears due from his father. In the year 1820, Moottoo Vadooga made claim to the eight villages as Zemindar of a separate Paliaput, at Padamattoor and created some disturbance, refusing to pay the rent to his uncle, the Appellant's father.

This gave rise to a suit being instituted on the 21st of March, 1823, by the Appellant's father against Moottoo Vadooga and his two brothers, Gowery Vallabha and Bodha Gooroo Swamy Taver, the three sons of Oya Taver, to recover the eight villages as forfeited for non-payment of teerava, founding his right upon the gift of the Zemindary to him by the Government in 1801, and the two Moochilkas in 1803 and 1815. Moottoo Vadooga and his two brothers filed their answer and thereby set up, by way of defence, first, that they were entitled to the whole Zemindary of Shivagunga as the elder branch of the family, and that the Proclamation of Lord Clive in 1801 was in favour of their father, and that it treated the Appellant's father as a mere manager for his elder brother; secondly, that the eight villages of Padamattoo formed a sub-Paliaput attached to Shivagunga, which had been enjoyed by Oya Taver and his ancestors as their own property; thirdly, that the Moochilkas were fabrications of the Appellant's father; and lastly, that the Zemindary was [548] not the self-acquisition of the Appellant's father, but had been enjoyed by him and his brother as undivided brothers. The Appellant's father, by his replication, denied that the eight villages formed a separate Paliaput, and rested his case upon his self-acquisition of the Zemindary, and upon the Moochilkas.

This suit was compromised by a Razinamah, dated the 5th of January, 1826, to the effect, that the Defendants had no right whatever to the Shivagunga Zemindary, or to the other estate thereto belonging, as stated in the answer; and it was agreed that the Defendants should enjoy the eight villages under the Appellant's father, paying to him a kist, of 1000 pagodas annually, and that the Defendants should also pay a part of the arrears of kist, the rest being remitted by the Appellant's father.

Under this arrangement Moottoo Vadooga and his brothers held the eight villages, paying the kist to the Appellant's father, until his death, which event took place in the year 1829.

On the death of the Appellant's father, Moottoo Vadooga produced an alleged Will of the Appellant's father, dated the 17th of June, 1829, the day of his death, which purported to give him the Zemindary, in case the child of which the Zemindar's fifth wife was then enceinte should prove not to be a male.

The Appellant's father during his lifetime had seven wives. He died without leaving any male issue, but left three widows, one of whom, Purvata Natchiar, was enceinte. Parvata Natchiar, the sixth wife and second widow, was, after the death of her husband, delivered of a female child, whereupon the Government made over the Zemindary to Moottoo Vadooga. Claims were, [549] however, preferred to the Zemindary by the three surviving widows, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, Purvata Natchiar, and Moottoo Veray Natchiar; and a claim was also set up by the son of Cota Natchiar, a daughter of the late Zemindar, as having been adopted by Parvata Natchiar. The claims of Moottoo Vadooga being supported by many of the family, the three widows were induced to give up their claims and that of the alleged adopted son of Cota Natchiar, and on the 29th of July, 1830, to execute a Razinamah admitting the right of Moottoo Vadooga as Zemindar, upon having certain lands made over to them for their maintenance. Moottoo Vadooga was then installed as Zemindar of Shivagunga by the Government, acting upon the Razinamah of the widows. On the 21st of June, 1831, Moottoo Vadooga died, and was succeeded, and possession of the Zemindary taken, by his son, Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver.

On the 23rd of March, 1832, Velli Natchiar, a daughter of the Appellant's father, on behalf of her infant son, Moottoo Vadooga Taver, filed a plaint, No. 4, of 1832, in the Provincial Court of the Southern division of Madras against Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver to recover the Zemindary, on the ground that her son was the senior grandson of the first wife of the Appellant's father, and as such his heir, according, as alleged by her, to an answer of the Appellant's father to Government touching the succession, dated the 11th of April, 1822, by which grandsons through daughters were to be preferred to widows, and she insisted that the Appellant's father and his brother constituted a divided family, and that the alleged Will was a fabrication.

Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver by his answer to this suit insisted, that the Appellant's father had only acted as [550] Zemindar by sufferance of his elder brother, Oya Taver; that the Appellant's father, by an order of succession dated 22nd of September, 1806, had pointed out his nephews as his heirs in case of failure of sons; that the Will of the Appellant's father was a valid Will: and that in case of partible estates, nephews were preferred to daughters' sons, and widows; and in his rejoinder to the Plaintiff's reply he urged in addition, that the self-acquisitions of an undivided brother descend, on his death without male issue, to his brothers and nephews in preference to widows and daughters and daughters' sons.

Points were recorded by the Court, but the point of division, or no division, was not included, and the opinion of Pundits of the Sudder Court was taken on the following case:—"A Zemindary was held by a certain person, after whom it was enjoyed by his son, his son's widow, and his son's daughter. The daughter having been married, produced a daughter, who died without issue. All of the above parties being dead, the Government published a proclamation, that the hereditary right of succession to the Zemindary was extinct, and that the Zemindary had escheated to the State. The Government therefore conferred the Zemindary on A., who was collaterally descended from the original Zemindar, and granted him the usual Sunnud of permanent property for it.

A. married seven wives, of whom three were living at the time of his death. The first wife had a daughter, who bore three sons and a daughter. The second wife had a daughter who bore a daughter. The third wife had three daughters, the first of whom bore a son and two daughters, the second a [551] son, and the third was not married. The fourth, fifth, and seventh wives had no issue. The sixth wife had a daughter, who was not married.

A. had an elder undivided brother, B., who died before A., but some years after the Zemindary had been granted to A., leaving three sons, the eldest of whom, C., on the death of A., took possession of the Zemindary, and continued to hold it, until his death, after which he was succeeded by his son, D., who is now in possession of the Zemindary.

Question first.—The Zemindary having escheated to the Government, and having by them been granted anew to A., and being therefore in the light of self-acquired property, to whom ought it, after his death, under the principles of Hindoo law, to have descended—to the widows of A. and their descendants, or to C., the son of the elder brother, B.?

"Question second.—Supposing the line of descent to be in the widows and their descendants, who should be considered the heir—the eldest surviving widow, or the eldest son of the daughter of the first widow deceased?

"Question third.—Would it have been consonant with Hindoo law for A. to have adopted one of his grandsons (daughter's son) as his son?

"Question fourth.—Supposing A. to have left a Will in favour of his elder brother's son, C., constituting him heir to the Zemindary and to the rest of his property, to the exclusion of his wives, daughters, and grandchildren, would such Will be valid under the principles of Hindoo law?"

To this case the Pundits on the 28th of October, 1833, returned the following answers:—"To the first Query.—The Zemindary granted by Government [552] to A. should descend, after his death, to the son of his eldest undivided brother.

"To the second Query.—As the Zemindary should so descend, the widows of A. and their offspring are not entitled to it.

"To the third Query.—A. should have adopted one of his daughter's sons, 'Dowhittras,' and it would have been agreeable to the Hindoo law.

"To the fourth Query.—If A. had left a Will entitling his nephew, C., to the Zemindary and other property, to the prejudice of his widows, his daughters, and to his grandsons, such a Will will be consonant to the Hindoo law; but the nephew is, however, bound to allow maintenance to the widows of A. Such are the texts propounded in Vignyaneswara, Smriti Chandrika, and so forth."

Witnesses were examined to prove the alleged fact of the division between the Appellant's father and his brother, Oya Taver; the self-acquisition, the forging of the Will, and the opinion of the Appellant's father on the order of succession in 1822, whereupon the Provincial Court, acting on the opinion of the Pundits, passed a decree in favour of the Defendant.

Anga Moottoo Natchiar then asserted her claim, as eldest widow of the late Gowery Vallabha Taver, as heir to the Zemindary, and in the year 1833, filed a plaint in forma pauperis, No. 3 of 1833, in the Provincial Court of the Southern division of Madras against Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver, claiming the Zemindary as heir to her husband, and stating that the last Rancee had adopted her husband, to whom the Government confirmed the Zemindary by sunnud: that the Defendant had taken forcible possession of her husband's property and deeds: that he had forged a Will; and [553] that advantage had been taken of her to execute the Razmanah in ignorance of her rights, as being a Hindoo widow she was not allowed to appear in public.

The Defendant by his answer denied the alleged adoption, and stated that the management of the Zemindary was conceded by Oya Taver, the rightful heir, to his younger brother: he denied also that the Will was a forgery, and set up the order of succession in the arzee of 1806, and relied also on the Razmanah executed in July, 1830, by the widows.

The issue of division or non-division, of the brothers, was not raised in this suit.

The Provincial Court, by a decree made on the 5th of September, 1834, in this suit, decided in favour of the Defendant, on grounds that no adoption of Appellant's father by the Rancee had been proved: that his claim to the Zemindary was from the free choice of the Government: and (assuming that the brothers were undivided) that the self-acquired estate of an undivided brother, dying without male issue, descended to his nephew in preference to his widow.

The Provincial Court also, by a decree dated the 5th of December, 1834, decided against the Plaintiff in the suit, No. 4, of 1832.

The Plaintiffs in the two suits of 1832 and 1833 appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Court at Madras.

Upon the appeals coming on for hearing, the Sudder Court submitted to the Pundits attached to that Court the following questions:—First, is the succession to the separate self-acquired property of a member of an undivided family governed by the same rules as the succession to the joint property of such family? Second, the self-acquired property of an individual [554] not being liable to division, according to the Hindoo law, how can it be maintained that such property can be inherited by the brother in preference to the widow of the possessor?

The answer of the Pundits, dated the 16th of January, 1837, to the first question was, "By saying that the separate self-acquired property of a member of an undivided family is not liable to division, is meant nothing more particular than that, at the time of partition of the common things, the acquirer of the said property, or his son, son's son, or grandson, need not give a share to the cousins out of the said property. Consequently, the succession to the separate self-acquired property of a member of an undivided family who died leaving no son, son's son, or son's grandson, is governed by the same rules as the succession to the joint property of such family." And to the second question, "The Dharma Sastras declare, as sanctioned by the established usage, that among the undivided brothers if one die without male issue the rest of his undivided brothers, etc., shall take the whole of his wealth and support his widows; but they do not declare, nor is it customary, that the separate self-acquired property of an undivided brother dying without male offspring should be given away to his widows. As it is, therefore, settled that the widow of an undivided brother who died leaving no son is entitled only to receive a maintenance, but not to succeed to any kind of property to which her husband had possessed a right, it cannot be properly maintained that such self-acquired property can be inherited by the undivided brother of the possessor in preference to his widow." Authorities: "The text of Vrihaspaty and its commentary, clearly show [555] that the widow shall take the whole estate of a man who, being separated from his co-heirs, dies leaving no male issue, and that the whole property of her husband who lived in a united family and died leaving no male offspring shall devolve on his father, brothers, etc., who were not separated from him. The text of Narada propounds that, among the undivided brothers if one die without male offspring or enter a religious order, the rest of the brethren shall divide his wealth, except the wife's separate property. Consequently, the texts of Vrihaspaty and Narada, and the commentaries thereof, and the text of Yajñawalkya, declaratory of the right of the widow, daughters, etc., and the commentary thereof (contained in the law Book Mitacshara), furnish an authority to maintain that the self-acquired property of an undivided brother can devolve on his undivided brothers after his death."

On the 17th of April, 1837, the Sudder Court pronounced a decree in the two appeals, dismissing the appeal on behalf of Moottoo Vadooga Taver, and deciding in favour of Anga Moottoo Natchiar's appeal, on the grounds, that no adoption had been made by the Appellant's father; that a widow was preferred to a daughter's son; that the Appellant's father and his brother were divided; that the self-acquired property of a divided brother descended to his widow in preference to his brother's son; that the Will was a forgery; and, lastly, that the Razinamah of 1830, was not binding on Anga Moottoo Natchiar.

The decree of the Sudder Court being founded on the assumption that the two brothers were divided, Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver applied for a review of judgment, on the ground, that the Appellant's father had, in three suits, in the year 1804, [556] pleaded that he and his brother Oya Taver were undivided, but the Sudder Court refused such review. Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver then appealed to Her Majesty in Council from the decree of the Sudder Court, and, having died pending the appeal, the appeal was, on the 15th of January, 1842, revived by Gowery Taver, his brother, the Respondent's father. On this appeal a decree was made by the Judicial Committee, and confirmed by an Order in Council, dated the 18th of June, 1844, by which the decree of the Sudder Court of the 17th of April, 1837, was reversed, on the ground that no points had been recorded in the Court below, as required by Mad. Reg. XV., of 1816, on the question of division or no division of the family; but leave was given to the widow to bring a new suit within three years, their Lordships stating that the question of division was a most substantial question, and, without making any order on the subject, intimated that the question of division or no division appeared to be the only point on which the title would ultimately depend (see case reported, 3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 278).

On the 2nd of September, 1844, Gowery Taver was put into possession of the Zemindary by Order of the Sudder Court.

In consequence of the leave given in the above appeal by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Anga Moottoo Natchiar filed a plaint in forma pauperis, No. 2, of 1845, in the Civil Court of Madura, against Gowery Taver and his younger brother, Namasivaya Taver, to recover the Zemindary. The plaint set forth the facts hereinbefore detailed, and the Plaintiff claimed to be heir of her deceased husband, shaping her case in [557] a twofold manner; first, on the assumption that it was incumbent on her to prove that her husband and his brother, Oya Taver, were divided; that the divided character of the family was established by the division and deeds which it was alleged had been taken possession of with the other documents by Moottoo Vadooga, on the death of her husband; by the adoption of her husband by the Rane, and his separate residence with the Rane for many years; by the self-acquisition of the Zemindary from the Government, and the homage paid to him by his elder brother; by the Mochilkas and leases of Padamattoor and the eight villages by her husband to Oya Taver and his sons; by the separate residence of the latter at Padamattoor, a long distance from Shivagunga; and by the Razinamah in 1826 of Bodha Gooroo Swamy Taver, admitting that the Zemindary was the self-acquired and separate estate of her husband, and that his elder brother had no right to it. Secondly, she alleged that the question of division or no division, was really immaterial, on the ground that, according to the Hindoo law, undivided brothers had no right to share in the self-acquired and separate estate of their brother, either in his lifetime or by descent, and she set out in detail the alleged forgeries of Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver to prove the undivided character of the family, and claimed the Zemindary and the mesne profits thereof, with other personal property.

Gowery Taver, the first Defendant, by his answer, set up the answer of the Appellant's father of 1806 as to succession; the alleged Will; the Razinamah of the widows, and the Pundits' opinion in the Sudder Court in 1837; he contended, moreover, that the Plaintiff ought, in the suit, to have confined [558] herself to the question of division or no division; that the acquisition of Appellant's father was by right of cousinship and by consent of the elder brother, and he denied the adoption and division, contending that the division ought to have been set up by Plaintiff in her former suit, and in the appeal before the Sudder Court, and he further denied the Hindoo law set up by the Plaintiff, as to the descent of selfacquisitions of an undivided brother; he also denied that the forgeries were the work of his brother.

Witnesses were called by the Plaintiff to prove the deeds of division and the actual division between Appellant's father and his brother in 1792, of the Padamattoor lands, and all their property, consisting of Nunja and Punja lands, Ulava and Kaval lands, cows, sheep, some ornaments, coins, and debts; that the house at Padamattoor was taken by the elder brother, and the house at Scruvagal by the Appellant's father; that the brothers always lived separate, the Appellant's father living with Rancee Velu, at Shivagunga.

On the other hand, the Defendants called witnesses to prove the brothers were undivided; that the brothers enjoyed the house and Padamattoor lands in common till the year 1794 (most of the witnesses spoke to this period, which was only two years' difference from the Plaintiff's witnesses; that they performed religious ceremonies jointly, as well before as after the year 1794. Some of the witnesses deposed that the Padamattoor lands were enjoyed in common, though when pressed they admitted that kist was paid for the eight villages by Oya Taver to his brother, Gowery Vallabha Taver, as the Zemindar. The witnesses accounted for the separate residence of Oya Taver at Padamattoor, by reason that the water [559] of Shivagunga did not agree with him, and on an alleged admission by the Appellant's father, whilst the suit of 1823 was pending, that he did not then set up a division.

On the 27th of December, 1847, the Civil Judge, Mr. Baynes, passed his decree, which was, in substance, to this effect, that the only point was the division of the brothers in the year 1792; and he was of opinion that the oral evidence on either side was equally worthless, but, if anything, that the Defendant's witnesses were least credible; that the Moochilkas proved no division; that the Razinamah, in suit, No. 4, of 1823, though by it the Defendant's father renounced "the right to compel Appellant's father to divide the Zemindary in his lifetime," did not prejudice his right as undivided heir; that the opinion of the Appellant's father, on the succession in 1806 and 1822 was more consistent with the fact of no division having taken place. That the depositions in the suit, No. 4 of 1832, on the point of division, though bearing the probability of truth on them as having been given on an incidental point, were not to be implicitly relied on, and, therefore, they were rejected by the Court altogether; that the Razinamah of the widows in 1830 was binding on them, though given when they were ignorant of their rights; that the forgery of the Will by the Defendant's father ought not to be pushed against him as betraying any consciousness of a want of title; and the decree concluded by deciding that the brothers were undivided, and dismissed the suit with costs. At the same time the Court held that the Plaintiff as widow was entitled to an adequate maintenance.

This was the first of the appeals now brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

[560] From this decree Anga Moottoo Natchiar appealed, in forma pauperis, to the Sudder Dewanny Court at Madras: the appeal being entitled, No. 7, of 1849.

Pending the appeal Gowery Taver died, and left the Respondent, his eldest son and heir, then an infant, who revived the appeal.

The appeal, No. 7, of 1849, having been heard, the Sudder Court reserved its judgment; but, in the meantime, on the 23rd of June, 1850, Anga Moottoo Natchiar died childless, and the appeal was held by the Sudder Court to have abated; and the Court issued a notice to the heirs of Anga Moottoo Natchiar to come forward within six weeks and continue the suit.

The sixth and seventh widows having pre-deceased Anga Moottoo Natchiar, several claimants presented themselves as heirs in remainder to the Zemindary, as being the separate estate of Appellant's father, but these claimants were afterwards reduced to two. First, the Appellant as the younger daughter of the Zemindar by his third wife, who had died in his lifetime, the Appellant then having a husband and sons, and joining with her two sisters, Bootakha Natchiar and Kota Natchiar, both of whom were since deceased. Secondly, Sowmea Natchiar, a daughter of the Zemindar by his sixth wife, the second widow.

On the 24th of August, 1850, the Appellant and her two sisters filed their petition in the Sudder Court, claiming to carry on the appeal, as heirs in remainder to the Appellant's father, in succession to Anga Moottoo Natchiar deceased, as agreeing between themselves for the enjoyment successively, by Bootakha Natchiar and Kota

Natchiar, for their successive lives, with ultimate remainder to the Appellant; and Sowmea Natchiar filed her petition, claiming to [561] carry on the appeal as heiress, niece and devisee of Anga Moottoo Natchiar.

Vadooga Taver, on the 26th of September, 1850, the Plaintiff in the original suit of the 23rd of March, 1832, No. 4 of that year, filed a petition claiming as heir also, as being descended from the senior wife of the Appellant's father, but his claim was not prosecuted.

On the 26th of September and the 17th of October, 1850, the Respondent by his guardian filed counter petitions praying the Court to refuse the Appellant, and the other alleged heirs in remainder, leave to carry on such appeal, and also praying the Court to refer them to the institution of a new suit, on the ground, that in such new suit he might be able to set forth particular objections to their claims from their individual acts, such as accepting maintenance from his father and other members of his family.

An Order was passed by the Sudder Court, on the 21st of October, 1850, declaring that none of the claimants could be accepted as the heir of the deceased Appellant, as she was a childless widow, but that they might simply plead a right of succession on her death as the daughters of the Zemindar, and that, although the decision of the appeal might materially affect such right of succession, still that would not vest in them the right to continue it, but the Court at the same time, observed that their order would form no bar to the institution by any of the claimants of a new action for the recognition of their alleged claims, if instituted on or before the 30th of April, 1851, and that at the expiration of that period the decree of the Civil Court would be considered final.

[562] On the 25th of November, 1850, the Appellant and her sisters filed their petition for a review of the Order of the 21st of October, 1850, stating that Anga Moottoo Natchiar, as widow, had a life interest only in the Zemindary, and that it was only at her death that a title accrued to them as the heirs in remainder, and that during her lifetime they could not have instituted a suit, and they claimed to be entitled to a term of twelve years from the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar to prosecute their claim.

Upon the presentation of these petitions the Sudder Court, on the 7th of March, 1851, submitted the following question to the Pundits of that Court, for their opinion as to what person should supply the place of Anga Moottoo Natchiar in the appeal:—"A Zemindar, A., who had married seven wives during his lifetime, died, leaving behind him his fifth wife, B.; his second wife's daughter, C.; his third wife's daughters, D. and E.; his sixth wife's daughter, F.; and his wife's grandson, G., by her daughter. B. instituted a suit claiming the succession to the Zemindary, on the ground that a family division had taken place before the death of A. Supposing the suit of B. grounded on family division to be just, you will explain who of the above mentioned individuals are entitled, under the Hindoo law, to supply the place of B., and carry on the suit?"

The Pundits give to this question the following answer:—"Neither of the parties marked C., etc., in the question, as being the offspring of B.'s husband by his other wives, is legally entitled to conduct the appeal referred to; neither the daughters of rival wives, nor their sons, being authorized by the Hindoo law Books, Vijnaneswara, etc., prevailing in this [563] part of the country to perform funeral rights or inherit property. In prescribing the order of succession the law Book, entitled 'Vijnaneswara,' draws no distinction between a woman's peculiar property called 'Stridhana' and that which devolved upon her by inheritance; it on the contrary treats them jointly in propounding heirs to succeed to the property of a childless woman; further, the said law Book makes no mention of the daughter, or of the son of the daughter of a rival wife equal in class, although it speaks of the daughter of a rival wife being superior by class. The said authority likewise, in propounding the distribution of the property of a childless woman, declares that the property of a childless woman, who had been married in any of the forms denominated 'Brahma,' etc., shall (after her demise) devolve upon her husband, and on failure of him upon his nearest kinsmen sapindas; but who these sapindas are the work does not describe (in the particular place where the said succession is mentioned); it, however, in treating upon the succession to the property of a sonless man, adverts to the text which says, 'The relation of the sapindas, or kindred connected by the funeral oblation, ceases with the seventh person.' From this is to be gathered that all the kindred sprung from the same family, or from the same primitive stock, and reaching the seventh degree in direct descending line, are 'sapinda,' kinsmen of each other; such sapindaship cannot by any possibility exist in step-daughters or their sons mentioned in the question. It is further observable, that the right of succession to the property of a deceased person is generally dependent upon the successor's competency to confer benefits [564] on the deceased by the performance, as it is stated by the Hindoo law-givers, of the deceased's funeral rites, but in the compact series of heirs competent to perform such executorial rights step-daughters and their sons are nowhere mentioned. It is for these reasons that we have stated in our answer of the 13th instant, 'that the daughters of a rival wife or their sons, are no heirs.' 18th of March, 1851. The head Translator of the Court having in returning this paper conveyed to us the Registrar's requisition that we should set forth the particulars of sapindas, and specify whether or not a maiden daughter is a sapinda, and as such entitled to succeed to property, we beg to submit the required particulars as follows. — 1. The law Books 'Vijnyaneswara,' etc., declare that of a woman dying without issue, and who had become a wife by any of the four modes of marriage denominated 'Brahma,' 'Daiva,' 'Arisha,' and 'Prajapatya,' the whole property belongs in the first place to her husband, and on failure of him to his nearest kinsmen 'sapindas,' who are his mother, father, uterine brother, step-brother, uterine brother's son, step-brother's son, paternal grandmother, paternal grandfather, sons of ditto, grandsons of ditto, paternal great-grandfather, sons of ditto, and their issue, these persons being in the chapter 'on succession to the estate of a sonless man,' declared to be the nearest 'sapinda' kinsmen of the man destitute of male issue. 2. In the Book called, 'Varadarajeyum,' chapter 'on succession to the estate of a sonless man,' section 'on daughters' succession,' the author declares a maiden daughter to be 'sapinda' of her father to enable her to inherit his property in preference to his married daughter; [565] but in the chapter 'on succession to the property of a childless woman,' the said author does not declare a daughter entitled to inherit the property of her step-mother. The sapindaship of an unmarried daughter is but temporary, inasmuch as it ceases with her marriage. It only tends to invest her with inheritance in preference to married daughters who are not 'sapindas,' but it cannot give her any right to succeed to the property of her step-mother who leaves no issue behind her. Impressed with this opinion, we have stated that daughters of rival wives are in general not entitled to inherit the property of their step-mothers."

On the 28th of April, 1851, the Sudder Court put to the Pundits this further question—"Your attention is requested to the annexed genealogical trees, and you will be pleased to state whether anything thereon leads you to modify the opinions expressed by you on the 18th and 20th of March, 1851, and to that question the Pundits made the following reply:—We have perused the four genealogical trees annexed to the foregoing question, and observe that all the parties therein referred to are B.'s step-daughters, and their sons and daughters, who by the Hindoo law Books, 'Vijnyaneswara,' etc., which prevail in this part of India, are not entitled either to perform funeral rites or to inherit property. We, therefore, see nothing to induce us to modify the opinion already expressed by us that the said parties have no right at all."

On the 1st of May, 1851, the Sudder Court revoked their Order of the 21st of October, 1850, and directed the appeal to be replaced upon the file and the present Appellant and the other [566] claimants to be made supplemental Appellants, and the Court resolved at once to hear the appeal, and that if it should be sustained, the Court would then determine (in order that the rights of Appellant and the other supplemental Appellants as against each other and as against the Respondent might be tried) whether the record should be remanded to the Court of original jurisdiction, or whether any other more appropriate course could be pursued in regard to the same.

Accordingly the Appellant and the other heirs in remainder prosecuted the appeal suit, No. 7 of 1849, as supplemental Appellants, and several proceedings were had therein.

On the 22nd of March, 1852, the Sudder Court put the following question to its Pundits in reference to the appeal suit, No. 7 of 1849:—"A Zemindar, A., married during his life seven wives, and died, leaving behind him B., his fifth wife; C., his daughter by his second wife; D. and E., his daughters by his third wife; and F., his daughter by his first wife; and G., the son of his daughter by his first wife. The fifth wife also died subsequently. Supposing the family to be divided, can the above-mentioned individuals be admitted to be the heir, or heirs, of the deceased Zemindar, A.? If such admission is made, who are his heirs? You will explain this subject."

On the same day the Pundits returned the following answer:—"According to the passage in the section on the right of inheritance to the estate of a man dying without male issue, B., the fifth wife of A., succeeded to the whole of his estate on his death. Neither the daughters of A., nor the descendants of such daughters, have a right to the said estate during [567] the lifetime of the said B. Therefore, the estate having devolved on B. by the death of her husband, her daughters and others must be her heirs. Neither the daughters of A., nor the descendants of such daughters who belong to a line different from that of B., can be recognized as heirs to the said estate."

The Sudder Court afterwards put the following further question to the Pundits, in reference to the suit, No. 7 of 1849:—"A., a Zemindar who had married seven wives during his lifetime, died leaving behind him B., C., and D., the fifth, sixth, and seventh wives; E. his daughter by the sixth wife, C.; F., his daughter by the first wife; I., J., and K., daughters by the third wife, and nine individuals his grandsons, by his daughters by the first and second wives who died before him. Subsequently C. and D. died, and B., the fifth wife, a few years after them. Supposing the family of A. to be divided, can any of the above mentioned individuals be admitted as heir, or heirs, to the Zemindary, and if such admission is made, who shall be considered as heir? You will explain this."

The Pundits gave to that question the following answer:—"Although the fifth, sixth, and seventh wives, who survived the Zemindar, A., possessed the power of wives, yet the Hindoo law, entitled Smriti Chandrika, confers the right of the Zemindary upon the sixth wife, because she has a daughter. The daughter of the sixth wife is, therefore, entitled to the Zemindary after her mother's death."

When the supplemental appeal came on to be heard, the Sudder Court, by an Order dated the 19th of April, 1852, reversed their Order of the 1st May, 1851, on the ground that, as the Appellant and the other parties [568] claiming as heirs did not claim as representatives to the late Appellant, the widow, but on their own distinct rights as descendants of Appellant's father, they could not be substituted for her, and carry on her appeal, but the Court informed the Appellant and the other parties claiming as heirs in remainder, that they could pursue their rights in the Zillah Court in the first instance, and the Court struck the appeal suit, No. 7 of 1849, off the file, as having abated on the death of the Appellant, Anga Mootoo Natchiar.

This was the first decretal Order now appealed from.

The Respondent, by his guardian, being dissatisfied with this Order, filed a petition in the Sudder Court, insisting that though upon the abatement of the appeal suit by the death of the widow, the next heir after her claiming under the same title might be entitled to revive such appeal, yet she could not institute a new suit in the Zillah Court, after a judgment by such Court in the suit by the widow claiming as previous heir, and submitted, that it was competent for the Sudder Court to admit the party next in descent, claiming under the same title, as a supplemental Appellant, and in his petition he entered at great length into the hardship of being obliged again to litigate the question of division or no division of the family, and finally prayed for a review of the Order of the 19th of April, 1852.

By an Order of the 16th of September, 1852, the Sudder Court adhered to their previous Order of the 19th of April, 1852.

The Appellant then, in the first instance, applied to the Civil Court of Madura for leave to issue in forma pauperis, and that Court, by an Order of the 16th of June, 1854, referred certain questions upon points of [569] Hindoo law raised in the case to the law officers of the Court, and after receiving the Futwah of the Pundits, rejected the Appellant's application, by an Order of the 6th of November, 1854; and after several other Orders made by the Civil Judge, and appeals to the Sudder Court, the latter Court ultimately by a further Order, dated the 10th of March, 1856, declared that the Order of the Civil Judge disposed simply of Appellant's application to sue in forma pauperis, and that it was no bar to her prosecuting her claim in the usual form.

Accordingly, on the 5th of December, 1856, the Appellant filed her plaint in a suit, No. 10 of 1856, in the Civil Court of Madura, against the guardian of Respondent, then a minor, and the Collector of Madura, as agent of the Court of Wards, for the recovery of the Zemindary and also of the profits thereof for six years; claiming the Zemindary as having been the divided and self-acquired estate of her father; contending that, even if the brothers were undivided, the self-acquired property of an undivided brother descended to his widows and daughters in preference to his nephews; and that she was entitled as the next heiress in remainder of the Zemindary, after the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar.

The guardian of the Respondent (the minor Zemindar) by his answer objected to the competency of the suit, as the cause of action had arisen upwards of twelve years previous to the institution thereof, and was barred, under cl. 4, sec. 18, Mad. Reg. II. of 1802, as the Appellant's father had died in June, 1829; and he set up the Orders of the Sudder Court of the 21st of October, 1850, the 1st of May, 1851, the 19th of April and 16th of September, 1852, as a bar to the [570] suit. The answer also denied the Appellant's title as next heiress, and challenged the fact that the Zemindary had been the divided estate of Appellant's father, entering at great length into the merits to prove that the estate was undivided.

The other Defendant, the Collector of Madura, by his answer disclaimed any right in the Zemindary.

Sowmea Natchiar, claiming to be the sole heiress of Gowery Vallabha Taver, as his only daughter by his sixth wife, then commenced a suit, No. 4 of 1857, against the Respondent to recover the Zemindary. The Respondent, among other things, pleaded the decree of the 27th of December, 1847, in bar to that suit.

No evidence was allowed to be entered into by the Appellant in the suit, No. 10 of 1856, nor were any points recorded therein.

On the 25th of August, 1859, the Judge of the Civil Court, Mr. R. Cotton, dismissed the suit of the Appellant, and of her sister, Sowmea Natchiar, in the suit No. 4 of 1857. The material part of the decree made in both suits was as follows:—
“The Plaintiffs in both the suits sue the guardian of the present minor Zemindar, and the Collector of Madura, as the agent for the Court of Wards, for the recovery of the Shivagunga Zemindary, each averring herself to be the sole heiress of the deceased Zemindar, Gowery Vallabha Taver, who died in 1829. The Plaintiff in the original suit, No. 10 of 1856, as his only surviving daughter having male issue; the Plaintiff in the original suit, No. 4 of 1857, as the only daughter of the widow (sixth) who survived her husband—both assert their father was divided from his brother, Oya Taver. The Plaintiff in the suit, No. 10 of 1856, states, that she sues [571] for the estate solely as the only surviving daughter of her father the late Zemindar, having male issue, not as heir or successor to Anga Moottoo Natchiar; that her suit is based on the pleaded division between her father and his brother, and that if they were undivided she has no claim to the ancestral property, but still claimed the Zemindary, as the self-acquired property of her father, under the law contained in pages 33, 152, 153, and 155 of Macnaghten's “Hindu Law,” Vol. II. If the brothers were divided, she asserts that the law, as propounded by the Madras Pundits in appeal, No. 20 of 1838, and by the Bengal Pundits in their Futwah of the 23rd of February, 1837, and enumerated in a paper put in, establishes her right. The Plaintiff in the original suit, No. 4 of 1857, states, that she sues as the daughter of the Zemindar's surviving widow—the other two widows (fifth and seventh) who survived the Zemindar having died childless; she avers, however, that had they been living now they would have no right to the estate: thus admitting that her right to the estate commenced on the death of her mother in 1832, when she was in her sixth year, and that her present plaint was presented only on the 24th of June, 1856, or twenty-three and a half years after the death of her mother; that if her father and his brothers were divided, as she pleads, her right is clear by the Futwahs of the Madras and Bengal Pundits; if undivided, by that of the latter only. The Court proceeds to determine—first, whether it is competent to allow the plea of division to be advanced. The facts of the case are briefly as follows:—Anga Moottoo Natchiar, the mother of the Plaintiff in the original suit, No. 4 of 1857, instituted a suit, No. 3 of 1833, before the Southern Provincial Court; her suit [572] was dismissed; the Judges considering that as the late Zemindar and his brother were undivided, the Pundits' Futwahs clearly showed she had no right to succeed her husband. In appeal, the Judges of the Sudder Court were of opinion, that the evidence adduced was sufficient to show that a division had taken place; and the law officers of their Court having, under these circumstances, declared the widow was the heir of her husband, they reversed the lower Court's decision, awarding the estate to Anga Moottoo Natchiar. On appeal to Her Majesty in Council, it was discovered that the very material question of division or non-division, on which the case hinged, had never been made a point, nor had evidence been cited to prove it; the Judicial Committee, therefore, dismissed the appeal, but, for certain reasons given, they declared that the Plaintiff, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, might bring a fresh action for the estate, if she did so within three years. She accordingly instituted the original suit, No. 2 of 1845, when the point of division or non-division, to which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had restricted further investigation, was tried, and the late Judge, Mr. Baynes, on a full and careful consideration of all the evidence, oral and documentary, decreed that division had not been proved: on the contrary, he conceived that the Defendant had, as clearly as the circumstances would admit of, shown that the Brothers were undivided, and he, therefore, dismissed the suit, as might have been expected. The Plaintiff appealed (No. 7 of 1849), but before the case was determined, she died: on which several parties petitioned to be allowed to carry on the appeal. Their petitions were first rejected, but the Court, apparently considering that justice required [573] that the lower Court's award should not become immediately final, gave permission to the Petitioners (the Plaintiffs) to bring regular actions for recovery of the estate, provided they did so before the 30th of April, 1851. Instead of taking advantage of the Court's period of grace allowed them, the Plaintiffs petitioned the Court for review of their proceedings, the result of which was, that the Court overruled their former proceedings, and adjudged that the Plaintiff's petitions could be admitted to carry on the appeal, No. 7 of 1849. Subsequently, on a petition from the Defendant, the Sudder Court again took up the case, and finally revoked their proceeding of the 1st of May, confirming the principle laid down in those of the 21st of October, 1850, namely, that the Plaintiffs could not be allowed to carry on the appeal, which, having abated on the death of the Appellant, the Sudder Court struck off their file, referring the Plaintiffs to the regular Court of original jurisdiction as those in which they should prefer, in the first instance, any claims they might have to the estate. It will be observed that the period originally allowed them for bringing an action had then expired, and no second period of grace was given. Upwards of four years after this final Order of the Sudder had been passed, the Plaintiff in No. 10 of 1856 brings the present action, and a year later the original suit, No. 4 of 1857, is likewise filed. The original suit, No. 2 of 1845, was specially brought to determine the status of the late Zemindar, and for no other purpose: the evidence was restricted to that point, and, consequently, if ever there was a judgment in rem, the decree in that suit, No. 2 of 1845, is one: in that decision it was clearly [574] determined that the late Zemindar and his brother were undivided. This judgment the Court is not competent now to question, still less to overrule; as a judgment in rem, it is conclusive against all the world, and no evidence can be admitted against it, unless it can be shown it was collusively or fraudulently given (Norton's 'Law of Evidence,' § 470; Taylor, 'On Evidence,' Vol. II., § 1489). Taylor, in the section quoted, says, 'This rule appears to rest partly, if not principally, upon the broad ground of public policy, it being essential to the peace of society that the social relations of every member of the community should not be left doubtful, but that, after having been clearly defined by one solemn adjudication, they should conclusively be set at rest.' And in the following section, 1490, it is further stated, that 'the decision cannot be impeached in the same or another Court, by showing that the facts on which it immediately rests are false.' The Court is not aware on what grounds permission was granted by the Sudder Adawlut to the Plaintiffs to bring the suits, the avowed object of which was to impeach this judgment in rem; but the period of grace passed without any suit being brought, and no further period was allowed. Possibly the Sudder Court, in reconsidering the matter, discovered that they were not competent to grant it; or the omission may have been an oversight. As, however, on the former occasion, the Court gave only eighteen months, it is to be presumed further grace, if it had been given, would not have exceeded a like period. Be this, however, as it may, in the absence of any precedent warranting such impeachment of a judgment in rem, and being of opinion 'that nothing can [575] be more inconvenient or dangerous than a conflict of decisions in different Courts; and that if judgments in rem are not regarded as binding upon all Courts alike the most startling anomalies may occur' (Taylor 'On Evidence,' § 1493), this Court is unable to accept the pleadings of the Plaintiffs on the status of the late Zemindar, save as an undivided brother. This status being thus determined, it only remains to see if the Plaintiffs have by law any claim to the estate. The Plaintiff, in original suit, No. 10 of 1856, admits she has none, save on the ground that it was self-acquired, and pleads the law as laid down in Vol. II. of Macnaghten's 'Hindu Law,' pp. 33, 152, 153, and 155, as establishing her right. A reference to which by the Plaintiff's Vakeel would have shown him that the law therein propounded has reference solely to 'partition of property,' not 'succession,' and that it is clearly laid down in the preceding para., in p. 33, that, after the death of the widow, the property becomes 'vested in the heirs of her husband,' but here she is, not a widow, but a daughter; the law, therefore, which treats of widows is of no avail to her, but rather the contrary. The Pundits of the Madras and Bengal Sudder Courts are unanimous that the estate of the late Zemindar would descend to his widow only if he was of a divided family. Under the above circumstances, this Court is of opinion, that the Plaintiff in the original suit, No. 10 of 1856, has no claim in law to the estate sued for, and, therefore, directs that the suit be struck off the file without going into the other objections raised by the Defendant in his answer, the Plaintiff paying all costs. The Court's reasons for refusing to allow the Plaintiff, in suit, No. 10 of 1856, to plead that the brothers [576] were divided, are equally applicable to the case of the Plaintiff in the suit, No. 4 of 1857. She bases her claim to the estate on the law propounded in the Futwahs of the Pundits filed in this and the suits referred to above; these, however, all refer to widows, and not daughters, and declare widows only entitled to succeed to their husband's ancestral and self-acquired estate when he is one of a divided family. The Court, therefore, is of opinion, that she also has failed to show that she has any claim at law to the estate sued for (vide Strange's "Manual," pars. 346, 337, 339, 340, and 342); and, without going into the other objections raised in the answer to her right to sue, resolves to strike off her suit likewise from the file, she paying all costs. The Court, in continuance, would observe, that though it has taken the late Judge's decision in suit, No. 2 of 1845, as a judgment in rem, and, therefore, not to be impeached, yet that, after a careful study of the whole case (which has occupied it almost incessantly for a period of six weeks), it fully concurs with the late Judge in all he has urged in that decree and the judgment awarded by him. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in their judgment (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 294), distinctly declare 'it exceedingly desirable that it should be known (not by the parties to the suit alone, but) to all those who are interested in this property, that the question of fact as to division or no division appears to be the only point on which the main question of title to the property will ultimately depend.' By thus declaring, this Court understands that the question of status being about to be [577] decided, all interested were then invited to come forward to prove their assertions to division or non-division, as the decision given would be final. There cannot be a doubt that the Plaintiffs in the above suits were thoroughly acquainted with the decree of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and it was for their interest to have assisted Anga Moottoo Natchiar to prove division, and see that all the evidence procurable was then advanced, and that the decision passed on the merits by the Civil Court (unless such decision is ruled to be only equivalent to an adjudication of settlement by order of Justice) is conclusive against all the world as regards the status of the late Zemindar; but allowing that the decree in the suit, No. 2 of 1845, was not final when it was passed, because appealed from, it appears to this Court that it is undoubtedly so now, inasmuch as it cannot be affected by any other suit, and there are no parties competent now to question it in appeal. It is laid down in the Sudder Adawlut decrees, No. 58 of 1851, No. 66 of 1855, No. 10 of 1852, No. 5 of 1857, and Sudder Adawlut decrees, No. 86 of 1854, par. 19, that non-division is to be presumed until division is proved; non-division was the alleged state of the family when the suit was brought; non-division was the decision passed after a prolonged and patient investigation in the suit, No. 2 of 1845, and non-division was the status when the Plaintiff (Appellant) died. Such being the case, how can the Plaintiffs' claims, which are based and only sustainable on the ground that division had taken place, be admitted? If they can be, where is the limit, and what becomes of the rule, that judgments in rem are conclusive against all the world?"

[578] The Appellant appealed to the Sudder Court at Madras against this decree, praying that the suit might be remanded for adjudication on the merits.

On the 5th of November, 1859, the Sudder Court, by its decree, affirmed the decree of the Civil Judge of Madura of the 25th of August, 1859, on the ground that the question of division had been finally set at rest by the decree in the suit, No. 2 of 1845; that although that decree had been appealed from by the then Plaintiff, Anga Mootoo Natchiar, on her death without heirs the appeal had dropped; and that the appeal could not be opened, because the title of the Appellant had not at the time of that decree come into existence.

This was the second decretal Order appealed from to the Privy Council.

The Appellant petitioned the Sudder Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against the last-mentioned Order, which that Court on the 3rd of March, 1860, refused, on the ground, that the decree of the Civil Judge of the 25th of August, 1859, was final under sec. 10, Reg. II. of 1802, and cl. 2 and 10, sec. 5 of Reg. XV. of 1816.

This was the third decretal Order appealed from.

Leave was afterwards granted by their Lordships, upon special petition to Her Majesty in Council, to the Appellant to appeal from the decree of the Civil Court of Madura, dated the 27th of December, 1847, which, with the decrees of the Sudder Court of the 19th of April, 1852, the 5th of November, 1859, and the 3rd of March, 1860, and the decree of the Civil Court of Madura, dated the 25th of August, 1859, were those now appealed from.

The Appellant's two sisters, Bootaka Natchiar and [579] Kota Natchiar having died, the Appellant succeeded to their rights, and all the other legal heirs in remainder, after the death of Anga Mootoo Natchiar, withdrew their claims, except Sowmea Natchiar, who, however, died pending the appeal in England.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Appellant.—Our first proposition is, that the Zemindary in question, which constitutes a Raj, or principality, and impartible, was the separate and self-acquired estate of the Appellant's father, Gowery Vallabha Taver, and, secondly, that the family property had been divided in his lifetime. He and his eldest brother, Oya Taver, were, we contend, by the Hindoo law divided brothers, and the real point now in issue lies between the Appellant, as representing one line of heirs, the lineal female descendants of Gowery Vallabha Taver on the one hand, and the Respondent, the lineal descendant of his elder brother, Oya Taver, on the other, and is narrowed to the validity of the decree of the Civil Court of Madura of the 27th of December, 1847, which decree, we submit, was manifestly erroneous. If the sole question to be tried in that suit was division, or no division; the evidence was all one way, and in favour of the Appellant's father and his elder brother Oya Taver, being divided brothers. The fact of the division was established by the deeds of division, and the actual division in the year 1792 was fully proved by the witnesses in the suit, No. 2 of 1845, as well as by other witnesses incidentally in the suit, No. 4 of 1832. The division was also proved by the fact of the residence of the Appellant's father with the Ranees at Shivagunga, and his livings separate from his [580] divided brother at Padamattoor, previous to and until his installation as the Zemindar under the grant from the Government. The adoption of the Appellant's father by the Ranees, which, whether regular or not, was inconsistent with the Respondent's contention of his continuance as part of an undivided family. Then there is the further fact of his installation as Zemindar, and his living alone at Shivagunga, from the year 1801 until his death in the year 1829, separate from his brother and his family, who resided at Padamattoor. These are all circumstances inconsistent with the supposition that he was a member of an undivided family. Again, the leases granted by him as Zemindar to his brother and nephews, and the payment by them of kist, are all acts which by the Hindoo law are considered the strongest evidence of division. So again, by the Razinamah made in the suit, No. 4 of 1823, after a claim to the division of the Zemindary as co-heirs, in which the nephew, Moottoo Vadooga, and his brothers, admitted that they had no such right. Separation of interest, or division, is a sole question of fact, which the evidence here fully establishes. In W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 51, he says, the criterion of division seems to consist of members of the family entering into distinct contracts, and other similar acts, which tend to show that they have no dependence on or connection with each other. Coleb. Dig. Vol. III. pp. 415; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. pp. 225-7 [2nd Edit.], ib. Vol. II. p. 397, are authorities which establish the same proposition. A partition is presumed if they have separate possession of property. Than Sing v. Mussumant Jeettoo (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 324). The only evidence in support of [581] the theory of the family being an undivided family is, that some of the religious ceremonies were jointly performed by both brothers. But such circumstance, even if proved, is held by the Hindoo law to be but slight evidence in favour of the family being undivided, the religious ceremonies being constantly performed by divided brothers. Strange's "Manual of Hindoo Law," sec. 296 [edit. 1863]. But we take a higher ground; we contend that even if part of the ancestral estate was at one time common property, yet that the Zemindary was self-acquired by the Appellant's father. The grant by the East India Company to Gowery Vallabha Taver was an act of sovereignty, the Zemindary having escheated for want of lineal heirs. Being by Sunnud the grantee takes as purchaser, and the Zemindary must, therefore, be considered as self-acquired property, as in the case of confiscation. The East India Company v. Syed Ally (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 578), Ellavambadoo Mootiah Moodeliar v. Ellavambadoo Nincapah Moodeliar (2 Strange's Mad Cases, 333), Keonour Budh Singh v. Seonath Singh (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 92), Mulapat Singh v. The Collector of Benares (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 32). Again it is an established principle of Hindoo law that property acquired without using the patrimony by one another living in partnership belongs to him exclusively. W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," vol. II. pp. 33-152-3-5. It belongs at his death to the acquirer's individual heir. Strange's "Manual of Hindoo Law," sec. 238.

This brings us to the first point, who by the Hindoo law prevailing at Madras is to succeed to the Zemindary on Gowery Vallabha Taver's death? If held in severalty, after his death it undoubtedly goes to his widow, who has, however, no right [582] to dispose of it. W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 19, ib. Vol. II. p. 33; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. pp. 121-137 [2nd edit.]; Mohun Lal Khan v. Rancee Sirmomunnee (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 32), Keerut Sing v. Koolahul Sing (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 331; S.C. 4 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 9), Nund Koowur v. Tootter Sing note to Mussumant Gyan Koowur v. Dookhurn Singh (4 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 330), Musst Lalchee Koowur v. Sheopershad Sing (7 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 22), Cossinauth Bysack v. Hurrosoondery Dossee (Morton's Cal. Rep., 86). The widow's right in Madras, to inherit her deceased husband's property, he dying without issue male, and the family divided, is fully discussed in the Mitacshara on Inheritance, ch. II. sec. 1, pl. 39; and in the Daya-Bhaga, ch. XI. sec. 1, pl. 3, 4, 14; Coleb. Dig. Vol. III. ch. CCCXCIX.; Strange's "Manual of Hindoo Law," secs. 315, 326 [edit. 1863]; Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. pp. 134-5 [2nd edit.]; ib. Vol. II. p. 231, and the opinion of Sir William Jones, cited in Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 250. The Sandayar case (a) [583] is on all fours with the present case and strongly in our favour. And in a work called "The Principles of Hindu and Mohammadan Law," by W. H. Macnaghten, edited by H. H. Wilson, it is laid down at pp. 21, 24, 5 [2nd edit., 1862], that according to the doctrine of the Smriti Chandrika, a widow, being the mother of daughters, takes her husband's property, both moveable and immoveable, when the family is divided, and in default of the widow the daughter inherits, ib. p. 22. Therefore, on the widow's death the Appellant, as daughter having male issue, succeeded to her father's estate. Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 137 [2nd edit.]; Mitacshara, ch. II. sec. 2, p. 341, ib. sec. 4, p. 346; Strange's "Manual of Hindoo Law," sec. 353 [2nd edit.]

(a) The decree of the Provincial Court for the Southern division, in the suit

Secondly, we are not bound by the decree of the Civil Court of Madura, in 1847, which does not preclude our right to ask this Court, to determine the question of descent to the Zemindary, which, we contend, was self-acquired property by Gowery Vallabha Taver. It never could have been the intention of this Tribunal when the case came before it in the year 1844 (see Srinut Moottoo Vijaya Rayhanadha Gowery Vallabha Perria Woodia Taver v. Rang Anga Moottoo Natchier, 3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 294), while observing, that the point of division was the substantial question, to shut out altogether the other material points at issue, [584] raised in that case. We contend, therefore, that even if the brothers were undivided as to their ancestral property, the self-acquisition of one undivided brother dying without male issue, descended to the widow; and after her death to daughters, in preference to his brother and nephews. This rule of succession in Madras, is clear law, according to the authorities already cited.

Thirdly, the opinion of Pundits taken in the suits, as to the right of succession, cannot be relied on. The opinions which appear to have governed the Court below proceed on the assumption that the Text Books they cite apply to the case they were called to report upon, but the opinions unaccountably neglect to say if such authorities are applicable to the particular facts stated. The daughter's right to succeed not being mentioned in the texts cited, the Pundits seem to consider that the Appellant is not entitled. The cases of Myna Boyee v. Oottaram (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 400) and Abraham v. Abraham (ante, p. 199) are authorities showing the value to be attached to the Pundits' opinions, and the necessity of the appellate Court testing their accuracy, as well as that the questions put by the Court correctly state the point at issue.

Fourthly, as to the effect of the Razinamah executed by the widows in 1830, being binding on them, we submit, that a native woman can never be deemed sufficiently sur juris to be bound by her personal acts. Error and ignorance of their rights as widows rendered the agreement invalid. Narummal v. Lutchmana Naic (2 Strange's Mad. Cases, 16), Chellummal v. Garrow (ib., 159), Rajunder Narain Rae v. Bijai Govind Sing (2 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 181).

[585] Lastly, we insist, that the refusal of the Sudder Court to allow the Appellant to revive the appeal from the decree of the Civil Court of Madura of the 27th of December, 1847, was arbitrary and contrary to equity. Notwithstanding the proceedings by her in the suit, No. 10 of 1856, the Appellant was entitled to appeal from that decree. She, as daughter, having male issue, was heir to her father's estate, and like a remainder-man in England the proper party to revive the suit. Lloyd v. Johnes (9 Ves., 57), Osborne v. Usher (6 Bro. P.C. Cases, 20) Macqueen's "Prac. of the House of Lords," pp. 242-250. It must not be forgotten that her title only accrued on the widow, Anga Moottoo Natchiar's death, Roopchund Tilukchund v. Phoolchund Dhurmchund (2 Borr. Bom. Rep., 616), Loll Munnee Koonwaree v. Rajah Nemiyerem (6 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 255-7). The interest of a daughter in the estate of her deceased father is similar to that of a widow, Hurrydoss Dutt v. Sreemutty Uppagornah Dossee (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 433); but even if it Coopasawmy Coolapa Naik v. Yatakamaul, dated the 13th of October 1826, was filed in this case.

The question there raised was, who was entitled to succeed to the Zemindary of Sandayar. From the statements laid before the Pundits of the Sudder Court for their opinion, it appeared, that the Zemindary was an undivided estate, and it was the property of a common ancestor, A.; that it was inherited in regular succession By B., C., and D.; that D., having no issue, transferred it in his lifetime to his uncle, E., who was the next male heir entitled to inherit, in satisfaction of a claim for money preferred by the latter.

The Provincial Court's questions to the Pundits were, first, whether such transfer could be held to constitute the estate the separate acquisition of E.; and, secondly, if such transfer to the exclusion of co-heirs was illegal, whether the widows of F., who succeeded the father E., and died without issue, were entitled to the Zemindary, or whether the Plaintiff's title as grandson of the common ancestor was preferable?

The Pundits' opinion was, first, the gift by D. to E. of the Zemindary was good, and that it descended to his son F., and, secondly, that as F. died without issue the Zemindary devolved upon his widows.

should be held that she was not entitled to appeal from the decree of the 27th of December, 1847 she certainly was not bound by it, The Zemindar of Ramnad v. The Zemindar of Yettiappooram (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 454-5), and in that view that decree could not be pleaded as res judicata, or held to be a bar to her original suit, No. 10 of 1856, which was instituted in due time after the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Mr. Hobhouse, Q.C., and Mr. C. P. Phillips, for the Respondent.—First, we insist, that Oya Taver and Gowery Vallabha Taver were undivided brothers, and that from Gowery [586] Vallabha Taver the Zemindary has come by lawful descent to the Respondent, his nephew. The testamentary disposition in his favour by the Appellant's father is not material to our title. We deny the alleged fact of the self-acquisition of the Zemindary by Gowery Vallabha Taver. It is true that there may be self-acquisition by a member of an undivided family, but the Hindoo law presumes such acquisition for the joint benefit of himself and his co-heirs. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 199-225, and the onus lies on a member of a joint family claiming exclusive right to prove that it was separately acquired, Dhurn Das Pandey v. Mussumat Shama Soondri Dibiah (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 229), Gour Chunder Raj v. Hurish Chunder Raj (1 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep., 162), Naragunty Lutchmedarmah v. Vengama Naidoo (ante, p. 66), W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 54, and such presumption of joint partnership must be rebutted by clear evidence of a division of the joint family. What is considered as evidence of division is fully treated by the text writers. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 225-7 [2nd edit.]; ib., Vol. II., p. 333. Mitaeshara, ch. II., sec. 12, pl. 3 and 4; and the cases collected in Morley's Dig., Vol. I., p. 483. Here the division is alleged to have taken place in the year 1792, but the evidence only proves separate residence after the year 1804. The different stations and duties and the health of the elder brother explain their separation, and the distance between their residences was as little as was compatible with those causes. The fact of the impartibility of the Zemindary and Polyaput of Padamattoor, coupled with the fact of the infirmity of Oya Taver, satisfactorily account for their separate residences. It has been decided that a [587] grant to A., because he is the descendant of B., does not create a self-acquisition in A. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 216 [2nd edit.]. Here the lineage of Gowery Vallabha Taver to the common ancestor, Shasavarna, was the cause of the grant by Government of the Zemindary to him. Oya Taver's personal incapacity alone prevented his installation as Zemindar. The deed of settlement did not limit the succession to the heirs of Gowery Vallabha Taver, or do more than confirm the previous grant by Government to him. Now, self-acquisition cannot be the property of one divided in family. It is never mentioned in the text books, except as to property of an undivided member, and as part of the common stock. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 120, 213, 215 [2nd edit.]. The Zemindary, it is admitted, is a Raj and impartible, and held by a single person; if it had been otherwise, the co-heirs would have shared in the Zemindary. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 218 [2nd edit.]. And they must have been parties to any alienation of it. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. II., pp. 439, 441, 450 [2nd edit.]. It certainly was not divisible from them, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., p. 260 [2nd edit.], where it is laid down that the issue of self-acquired property inherits as far as great-grandson. ib., pp. 209, 210. Failing male issue, it goes to his undivided brothers and their issue. Strange's "Manual of Hindu Law," sec. 351, p. 84 [2nd edit.]. If the descent of self-acquired property differs from descent of the property of an undivided man, the Appellant should prove that to be the law. The silence of the Books and authorities on any such difference is strongly in the Respondent's favour. The Pundits in the case submitted to them in 1837 have laid it down that there is no such difference. The Sandayar [588] case (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 582), relied upon by the Appellant to show the descent to self-acquired property, does not apply, as that case related to a divided family and ancestral estate. Transactions between co-parceners, in order to raise a rebuttal of the presumption of non-division, must be in relation to the property enjoyable by them in common. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I., pp. 227, 8, 9, 230 [2nd edit.]. Families living together, and carrying on their transactions in common, constitute co-parcenary to which survivorship attaches, ib., Vol. I., p. 120. Living separately does not per se constitute division.

The next point is the title of Anga Moottoo Natchiar as a Hindoo widow to succeed. Women are generally incompetent to inherit. It could only be to property of a man divided in family. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 134; Mitacschara, ch. II., sec. I., pl. 39. A Hindoo widow has only the right of enjoyment in her deceased husband's property. It is laid down that with respect to property derived by inheritance from her husband, a widow is little more than tenant for life, and trustee for the ulterior heirs. Strange's "Manual of Hindu Law," sec. 159, p. 38 [2nd edit.]. A Hindoo widow must, in a suit by her for her late husband's realty, wherein she claims under his character as a divided member of a Hindoo family, represent the whole series of his heirs, and a decree in that suit against her negating such division is res judicata, and must bind them, because a contrary conclusion would, so long as the descent passed through females, invoke the possibility of endless litigation of such fact of division.

Next, we contend, that the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar in 1850, operated as an abatement of the suit, subject to revivor by the next of kin of Gowery [589] Vallabha Taver, and we insist, that this Tribunal cannot now entertain an appeal from the decree of the Civil Judge of Madura made in 1847, or enter into any question of division or self-acquisition. First, as to the question of division. The suit of 1845, and 1849, were wholly abated. The Appellant was not a party thereto, and her claim to immediate heirship to her father on the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar had never been established, and has always been denied by the Respondent; secondly, as to the question of self-acquisition, that fact was clearly not in issue in the suit, No. 2 of 1845, nor dealt with by the decree of 1847. Further, with respect to the decree of the Sudder Court refusing the Appellant to revive the appeal, we submit it was perfectly regular, as the Sudder Court could not decide the question of heirship. That was a question for the Provincial Court, and thither the Appellant should have, in the first instance, gone. The Appellant's proper course was pointed out to her in the year 1850. The suit that the Appellant ought to have brought, and which it was plain the Sudder Court intended her to bring, was one in the nature of a Bill of revivor, or a Bill of supplement, limited to the object of obtaining from the Provincial Court a declaration that she, as the daughter of Gowery Vallabha Taver, had established her right to stand in the place of Anga Moottoo Natchiar, but she perversely disregarded it, and filed the suit, No. 10 of 1856, to establish her right and to which suit she did not make the other claimant's parties Defendants. In Giffard v. Hart (1 Sch. and Lef., 386), it was held that a decree made in a suit, without making parties whose rights were affected thereby, [590] was fraudulent and void as against those parties. Here she attempted to deceive the Provincial Court, by alleging an Order from the Sudder Court, directing the suit, and by concealing her previous claim as third daughter, and the agreement with her sisters, and thereby only raised the issue of division, and did not properly raise the issue of heirship.

Having previously disregarded her proper course pointed out in the year 1850, and twelve years having elapsed since that date, the Respondent ought not to be restrained from setting up the Mad. Reg. of Limitations II., of 1802, sec. 18, cl. 4, in bar to any proceedings the Appellant might hereafter take to revive the appeal from the decree of 1847. She was barred by laches and lapse of time from maintaining any original proceeding for the recovery of the Zemindary.

As to the appeal from the decree of 1859, we submit that that decree was right, because the decree of 1847, on the fact of division, could not in fact be appealed by the heirs of Gowery Vallabha Taver claiming after Anga Moottoo Natchiar, and as to any claim under the alleged self-acquisition of the Zemindary, that was disposed of in the suit of 1833, and by this Tribunal in 1844, or if not, it was raised in suit of 1845.

Lastly, we insist, that the Appellant not having taken the proper proceedings, is not entitled to revive or continue the litigation commenced by Anga Moottoo Natchiar. Assuming, however, that the decree of the Zillah Court in December, 1847, bound the party succeeding at the death of the widow, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, the only remedy the Appellant, claiming as a remainder-man, now has, is for this Court to remit the case to the Sudder Court to determine the ori-[591]-ginal appeal against the decree of the Civil Court of Madura. This Tribunal, as a Court of final appeal, will not adjudicate upon that point until a decree has been made by the Court below, which alone can give it jurisdiction.

The Solicitor-General, in reply.—Admitting that a Hindoo widow has only a right of enjoyment in her husband's property, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 124, ib. Vol. II. pp. 251-3 [2nd edit.], Daya-bhaga, ch. XI. sec. 1, pl. 56, and that the widow's litigation was ill conducted, yet her husband's heirs, who succeed on her death, are not bound by her miscarriage. A remainder-man may rectify error, or supply omissions, Lloyd v. Jones (9 Ves., 60), where the point is carefully considered by Lord Eldon. Here the Appellant, as daughter, was the heir of her deceased father, Coleb. Dig. Vol. III. pp. 186, 489, 491, 498, Daya-bhaga, ch. XI. sec. 2, pl. 1, the Sandayar case (ante, p. 582), and had a right to bring a new suit, and raise the proper question relating to the succession of the Zemindary, namely, the separate acquisition of the Zemindary by her father, which fact was established in evidence, and, consequently by the Hindoo law, even if they were an undivided family, neither his brother nor his nephew, could succeed to the Zemindary, Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 156.

Judgment was reserved, and now delivered by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (Nov. 30, 1863).—The subject of this appeal, and of the long litigation which has preceded it, is the Zemindary of Shiva-gunga, in the District of Madura and Presidency of Madras.

This Zemindary is said to have been created in the year 1730, by the then Nabob of the Carnatic, in favour of one Shasavarna, on the extinction of whose lineal descendants in 1801, it was treated as an escheat by the East India Company, which had then become possessed of the sovereign rights of the Nabob of the Carnatic, and was granted by the Madras Government to a person whom we shall distinguish by one of his many names, as flowery Vallabha Taver. He had an elder brother named Oya Taver, who predeceased him, dying in 1815. The Zemindar himself died on the 19th of July, 1829.

He had had seven wives, of whom three only survived him. Of the deceased wives, the first had a daughter (since dead), who left a son named Vadooga Taver; the second had a daughter named Bootaka Natchiar; the third had two daughters, Kota Natchiar and Katina Natchiar, the present Appellant; and the fourth was childless. The three surviving widows were Anga Moottoo Natchiar, Purvata Natchiar, and Moottoo Veray Natchiar. Of these Purvata Natchiar was enceinte at the time of her husband's death, and afterwards gave birth to a daughter named Sowmia Natchiar. The two others were childless.

Oya Taver, the brother, left three sons, of whom the eldest was named Moottoo Vadooga.

The Zemindary is admitted to be in the nature of a Principality—impartible, and capable of enjoyment by only one member of the family at a time. But whatever suggestions of a special custom of descent may heretofore have been made (and there are traces of such in the proceedings), the rule of succession to [593] it is now admitted to be that of the general Hindoo law prevalent in that part of India, with such qualifications only as flow from the impartible character of the subject.

Hence if the Zemindar, at the time of his death, and his nephews were members of an undivided Hindoo family, and the Zemindary, though impartible, was part of the common family property, one of the nephews was entitled to succeed to it on the death of his uncle. If, on the other hand, the Zemindar, at the time of his death, was separate in estate from his brother's family, the Zemindary ought to have passed to one of his widows, and failing his widows to a daughter, or descendant of a daughter, preferably to nephews; following the course of succession which the law prescribes for separate estate. These propositions are incontestable; but Gowery Vallabha Taver's widows and daughters have advanced a third, which is one of the principal matters in question in this appeal. It is that, even if the late Zemindar continued to be generally undivided in estate with his brother's family, this Zemindary was his self-acquired and separate property, and as such was descendible, like separate estate, to his widows and daughters and their issue preferably to his nephews, though the latter, as co-parceners, would be entitled to his share in the undivided property. Upon this view of the law the question whether the family were undivided or divided becomes immaterial. The material question of fact would be whether the Zemindary was to be treated as self-acquired separate property, or as part of the common family stock.

Whichever may have been the proper rule of succession, it is certain that, if not on the death of Gowery Vallabha Taver, at least on the failure of his [594] male issue, being demonstrated by the birth of his posthumous daughter, his nephew, Moottoo Vadooga, obtained possession of the Zemindary. He seems to have set up an instrument which in the proceedings is called a Will. On the Appellant's side this is treated as a forgery. The Respondent, denying the forgery, does not now treat the document as a testamentary disposition, or as material to his title; and it may, therefore, be dismissed from consideration. Moottoo Vadooga obtained possession with the concurrence of various members of the family, and of Government and its officers. He afterwards obtained from the then three surviving widows the Razinamah, or agreement. He continued in possession without litigation, if not without dispute, until his death, which took place on the 21st of July, 1831; and was then succeeded by his eldest son, Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Taver.

Soon after this event began the litigation concerning this property, which has now continued upwards of thirty years. Its history may be conveniently divided into three periods: the first beginning with the institution of suit, No. 4, of 1832, and ending with the Order of the Queen in Council in 1844; the second beginning from the date of that Order, and ending with the death of the widow, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, on the 23rd of June, 1850; and the third being that which covers the proceedings which have been had since Anga Moottoo Natchiar died.

The suit, No. 4 of 1832, was brought by Velli Natchiar, the daughter of Gowery Vallabha Taver by his first wife, on behalf of her infant son, Moottoo Vadooga. It claimed the Zemindary for the infant by virtue of an Arze said to have been sent by the Collector to Gowery Vallabha Taver in 1822, according to which the succession would be to the son of a daughter in preference [595] to his widows, and a fortiori in preference to his brother's descendants. The defence to this suit insisted that the Zemindary had been granted to Gowery Vallabha Taver solely in consequence of his relationship to the former Zemindars, and was, therefore, to be treated as part of the undivided family estate, and, as such, descendible to the eldest of the male co-parceners in preference to any descendant in the female line from Gowery Vallabha Taver. The reply did not raise any distinct issue as to the character of the family, whether divided or undivided, but insisted that the Zemindary was to be regarded as the self-acquired and separate property of Gowery Vallabha Taver, and ought to pass by virtue of the Arze to the Plaintiff.

In 1833, two other suits were instituted against the Zemindar in possession. Of these, that distinguished as No. 4 may be left out of consideration, inasmuch as the Plaintiff in it rested his title on an alleged adoption by Gowery Vallabha Taver, of which he failed to give satisfactory proof. Such a title, if established, would of course have been paramount to the claims of either the nephews or the widows.

Suit 3, of 1833 is, however, the most important, with reference to this appeal, of the three suits now under consideration. It was brought by Anga Moottoo Natchiar, the fifth wife, and the elder of the three widows of Gowery Vallabha Taver. She set up an adoption, or quasi adoption, of Gowery Vallabha Taver, by the widow of the last Zemindar of the elder line, and treated this as the consideration, or a principal consideration, for the grant of the Zemindary made to him by the East India Company, and she insisted that Moottoo Vadooga Taver, on her husband's death, got possession of the Zemindary, of which she was [596] the legal heiress, by means of the forged Will. The defence to this suit, so far as it related to the title of the Zemindar in possession, was substantially the same as that made to the suit, No. 4 of 1832; but it also denied the alleged forgery of the Will, and insisted on the Razinamah executed by Anga Moottoo Natchiar and the other widows to Moottoo Vadooga Taver. In her reply, Anga Moottoo Natchiar did not raise any distinct issue as to the division or non-division of the family. She submitted, as an issue of fact, that the Zemindary had been acquired by the sole exertions and merits of her husband; and as an issue of law, that what is acquired by a man, without employment of his patrimony, shall not be inherited by his brothers and co-heirs, but if he dies without male issue shall descend to his widows, his daughters, and parents, before going to his brothers or remoter collaterals.

These three suits were all dismissed by the Provincial Court. We have not the decree or decrees of dismissal, but it seems probable that they were heard and disposed of together. It also appears that, although there was not in any of them a distinct issue, whether Gowery Vallabha Taver and his nephews were or were not an undivided Hindoo family, some evidence was given in the suit, No. 4 of 1832, to show that he and his brother were separate in estate. There was an appeal in each of the three suits, and these were heard together, and disposed of by the decree of the Sudder Court. That decree dismissed No. 4 of 1833, on the ground that the Plaintiff had failed to prove his alleged adoption by Gowery Vallabha Taver, and it dismissed No. 4 of 1832 on the ground that the succession to the Zemindary was governed by the general Hindoo law, and not by [597] any particular or customary canon of descent; so that, if descendible as separate estate, it would go to the widows of Gowery Vallabha Taver in preference of a grandson by a daughter. In the suit, No. 3, of 1832, it was decided, first, that as a matter of fact the Zemindary was the self-acquired and separate property of Gowery Vallabha Taver: secondly, that according to the opinion of the Pundits whom it had consulted, the rule of succession to the Zemindary, though self-acquired, would depend on the fact whether the brothers had or had not divided their ancestral estate; that in the former case it would belong to the widow, and in the latter to the nephew: thirdly, that upon the whole evidence the brothers must be taken to have divided their ancestral property; and lastly, that the Plaintiff, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, was entitled to recover the Zemindary, not having forfeited her rights by the execution of the Razinamah.

Against this decree the Zemindar then in possession appealed to Her Majesty in Council. The Order made on that appeal on the 19th of June, 1844, was that the decree of the Sudder Court should be reversed, with liberty to the Respondent, Anga Moottoo Taver, to bring a fresh suit, notwithstanding the decree of the Provincial Court, at any time within three years from the filing of that Order in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. The grounds on which their Lordships who recommended this Order proceeded were, as appears from the judgment delivered by Dr. Lushington, that the Sudder Court had miscarried in deciding the question of division, which was not one of the points reserved in the cause, nor was expressly raised upon the pleadings, but that the Respondent ought to be allowed to remedy the [598] omission in a new suit. And their Lordships added, that though they could make no Order on the subject, it would be exceedingly desirable that it should be known to all those who were interested in the property that the question of division or non-division appeared to be the only point on which the main question of title to the property would ultimately depend.

On the 20th of August, 1845, Anga Moottoo Natchiar commenced her second suit in forma pauperis. In the interim Bodha Gooroo Swamy Taver had died, and the Zemindary had passed to his brother, Gowery Vallabha Taver, the father of the Respondent, and he with a younger brother were the Defendants to the new suit. In her plaint the widow, after stating the pedigree of the family, some of the former proceedings, and the desire of Velu Natchiar, the widow of the last Zemindar of the elder line, to make Gowery Vallabha Taver, the first of that name whom we have mentioned, her successor, proceeds to allege, that with that object she had caused him and his elder brother, Oya Taver, to make a partition of their ancestral property as early as the year 1792. The Plaintiff then excuses her omission to plead this fact in the previous suit by saying that she had been advised it was only necessary for her to show that her husband had been adopted by Velu Natchiar, and that the Zemindary was his self-acquisition. She then proceeds to allege, that on the death of Velu Natchiar, he actually became Zemindar until he was dispossessed by the usurpers; on whose defeat and destruction by the East India Company, he was again put into possession under their grant. She also in this suit makes the alternative case, that even if no partition of their ancestral [599] property took place between Gowery Vallabha Taver and his brother Oya Taver, she, as the eldest widow, was entitled to the Zemindary, as a separate acquisition, in preference to that brother's descendants, and pleads the decision, in what is called the Sandayar case, to prove that such is the Hindoo law, and that the opinion given in the former case by the Pundits to the contrary was erroneous.

In his answer, the first and principal Defendant recapitulated the several facts relied upon by Bodha Gooroo in the former suit as constituting his title. He insisted that by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the contest was narrowed to the issue whether the brothers were undivided in estate or not, and that the Plaintiff should have rested her claim on that issue. He contended that there had been no partition. The points recorded in the suit are thus somewhat vaguely stated :—" The Plaintiff to prove, by means of documents and witnesses, that division took place in 1792. As the defence is but a denial of this circumstance, the Defendant cannot be called upon to establish the negative side by direct proof. But the Defendant will have to prove the points mentioned in paragraphs 2 to 5 of the answer; and he is required to use, if possible, strong arguments against the points particularly spoken of by the Plaintiff."

A large body of evidence is, in fact, given by each side on the question of division or non-division. The case was heard by the Civil Judge, Mr. Baynes, whose decree is dated the 27th of December, 1847. The effect of it was, that the only question really open between the parties was that of division or non-division; that the Plaintiff had failed to prove the partition between Gowery Vallabha Taver and his [600] brother, Oya Taver; and that her suit must be dismissed with costs.

Against this decree, on the 6th of April, 1848, Anga Moottoo Natchiar appealed to the Sudder Court. The Defendant, Gowery Vallabha, then died, and his infant son, the present Respondent, came in, and on the 5th of November, 1849, filed an answer to the appeal. Before the appeal was heard, and on the 24th of June, 1850, Anga Moottoo Natchiar also died, and with her death ended the second stage of this long litigation.

On the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar the Court seems to have issued a notice in the form ordinarily used on the abatement of an appeal by the death of an Appellant, calling upon the heirs of the deceased to come forward and prosecute the suit. This form of notice, it is obvious, was not strictly applicable to a case like the present, where, upon the death of a Hindoo widow, the right of action formerly vested in her devolves not upon her heirs; but upon the next heirs of her husband; and to this circumstance may be traced some of the confusion which is observable in the subsequent proceedings. Such as it was, however, the notice brought into the field three sets of claimants. The first consisted of Bootaka Natchiar, the daughter of Gowery Vallabha Taver by his second wife, and Kota Natchiar and the present Appellant, his daughters by his third wife. They claimed as the rightful heirs of the Zemindary, if it passed as separate property, next in succession to the widow, Anga Moottoo Natchiar; but considering its impartible nature, they expressed their willingness that it should be enjoyed first by Bootaka Natchiar for her life, next by Kota Natchiar for her life, and lastly by the Appellant. They treated Sowmia Natchiar, the daughter by the [601] sixth wife, as excluded from the succession by reason of her marriage with Bodha Gooroo, and of her being then a childless widow.

Sowmia Natchiar, however, came forward by a separate petition, claiming to be heiress both to Anga Moottoo Natchiar and the Zemindary, by virtue of an instrument alleged to have been executed by Anga Moottoo Natchiar in her lifetime.

A third claimant was Moottoo Vadooga, the Plaintiff in the dismissed suit of 1832. His contention was, that though the decree in that suit may have been right in preferring to his claim that of Anga Moottoo Natchiar, his title as grandson was nevertheless preferable to that of daughters, and that on the death of the widow he became entitled to the Zemindary.

Counter-petitions were filed on behalf of the Respondent, objecting to the revival of the appeal by any of these claimants; and it is observable that he then insisted that they ought to be compelled to bring fresh suits for the trial of their alleged rights, in order to give him the means of alleging and proving certain special matters of defence against them, of which he would not have the benefit in the suit of Anga Moottoo Natchiar.

The Sudder Court, in dealing with these claims to prosecute the appeal, has made three different and inconsistent orders.

By the first, dated 21st of October, 1850, it held that none of the claimants could prosecute the appeal, which it directed to be removed from the file, but left any of them at liberty to bring a new action to enforce their respective claims, provided it was commenced before the 30th of April, 1851.

They all petitioned for a review of this Order; counter-petitions were filed on behalf of the Re-[602]-spondent; and the Court, by its Order of the 1st of May, 1851, notwithstanding an adverse opinion given by its Pundits on the 7th of March, preceding, reversed its former Order, and directed the appeal to be replaced on the file, and the several claimants to be made supplemental Appellants; resolving to hear the appeal, and, if it should be sustained, to determine the mode in which the rights as against each other and the Defendant should be tried.

On the 19th of April, 1852, the Court, apparently of its own mere motion on taking up the record of the appeal, reversed this Order of the 1st of May, 1851, and ruled that the several claimants could not be heard on the appeal, but might prosecute their respective rights in the Court of first instance, which Court was to be guided in the admission and hearing of their claims by the Regulations in force, and the appeal was again removed from the file.

Thereupon the Respondent shifted his ground, and by a petition dated the 30th of June, 1852, objected to the last Order and prayed for a review of it. His contention then was, that the heirs next in succession to Anga Moottoo Natchiar, according to that course of succession, might have been admitted to carry on the appeal, and that it was a hardship on him to have to litigate his title with them in a new suit. The Court, however, by its proceedings of the 16th of September, 1852, adhered to its Order, giving at the same time a not very intelligible explanation of it.

Of the three daughters of Gowery Vallabha Taver who joined in the first of the above-mentioned applications to the Sudder Court, the Appellant alone brought a fresh suit. The plaint was not filed until the 5th of December, 1856, but there seem to have been various intermediate proceedings before both the Zillah and [603] Sudder Courts. These are referred to in the Appellant's petition of appeal, but are nowhere stated in detail. Her plaint stated, that her father and his brother, Oya Taver, were divided in estate prior to 1801, and were then living separately; that the Zemindary was granted exclusively to the former, and was, therefore, his self-acquisition, and enjoyed by him in exclusion of his brother.

The Appellant's title in succession to Anga Moottoo Natchiar is thus stated:—"The Zemindary, which is the self-acquisition of the Plaintiff's father after his division with Oya Taver, belongs on the death of his widow, Anga Moottoo Natchiar, to his second daughter, the Plaintiff, who has male and female issue: whilst his first daughter, Bootaka, has no issue, and the third daughter, Sowmia, is a widow." In the seventh paragraph (though the point is not taken so distinctly as in the suit of Anga Moottoo Natchiar) she claims the Zemindary as her father's self-acquisition, irrespectively of the alleged partition with his brother, and the question of division.

The answer took a formal objection to the suit, namely, that it was brought against the guardian of the infant Zemindar, and not, as it ought to have been, against the infant jointly with his guardian. It also insisted on the Regulation of Limitation and the decree of the 27th of December, 1847, as bars to the Appellant's claim. It further impeached her title as the heir next in succession to Anga Moottoo Natchiar in that line of succession, alleging that there were descendants of Gowery Vallabha Taver through his elder widows, and it again pleaded many of the facts put in issue in the suit of 1845, as constituting the title of infant Zemindar.

The estate being then in the custody of the [604] Court of Wards, the Collector was made a Defendant, and put in a similar answer. Replies and rejoinders were filed; but without settling any issues or taking any evidence in the cause. The Zillah Judge, Mr. Cotton, on the 25th of August, 1859, dismissed the suit, together with the suit, No. 4 of 1857, which had been instituted by Sowmia Natchiar, but with which we have no concern. His reasons for dismissing the Appellant's suit were:—first, that upon the question of division she was concluded by the decree of 1847, which he treated as a judgment in rem, made final by the removal of the appeal from the file; and, secondly, that it was clear upon the opinions of the Pundits, that the Zemindary, whether self-acquired or not, could not descend to the widow, nor, a fortiori, to a daughter, except in the event of the Zemindar having been of a divided family.

The Appellant appealed from this decision to the Sudder Court, praying that the suit might be remanded for adjudication on the merits. Her appeal was dismissed by a decree, dated the 5th of November, 1859. The Sudder Court seems also to have considered that by the dropping of the appeal on Anga Moottoo Natchiar's death the decree of 1847 had become final, and, as such, was an effectual bar to the Appellant's claim. On the 3rd of March, 1860, the Sudder Court refused to give the Appellant leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council; but special leave was afterwards given on the recommendation of this Committee.

The present appeal is against the decree of the Sudder Court of the 5th of November, 1859, and its Order of the 3rd of March, 1860, and the decree of the 25th of August, 1859. It is also against the Order of the Sudder Court of 1852, and the decree of the Civil Court of Madura of the 27th of December, [605] 1847. If, therefore, the latter decree is in truth a bar to the Appellant's obtaining effectual relief in her original suit, the appeal seeks by reopening that decree to remove the bar.

And here, before going further, their Lordships deem it right to remark shortly upon the extraordinary doctrine touching this decree which was propounded by the Zillah Judge when dismissing the suit of 1856; because if unnoticed here, as it seems to have been unnoticed by the Sudder Court, it may find acceptance with other unprofessional Judges, and embarrass the course of justice in India. Their Lordships would otherwise think it unnecessary to observe that a judgment is not a judgment in rem, because in a suit by A. for the recovery of an estate from B. it has determined an issue raised concerning the status of a particular person or family. It is clear that this particular judgment was nothing but a judgment inter partes; and the only question which could properly arise concerning it in the suit of 1856 was to what extent, as such, it was binding on the Appellant.

Their Lordships also feel constrained to observe that the various proceedings which have taken place since Anga Moottoo Natchiar's death have signally failed to do justice between the parties, or to dispose of the matters in dispute between them by anything approaching to a regular course of trial and adjudication. When Anga Moottoo Natchiar died, the decree of 1847 was not a final decree. An appeal was pending against it. Either it was binding upon those who in the event of her title being a good one would succeed to the Zemindary, or it was not. Those persons were obviously not her heirs, but the next heirs of her husband according to the canon of Hindoo law, [606] which defines the succession to separate estate. It ought not, their Lordships conceive, to have been a difficult matter to ascertain the persons answering to this description. If the decree were in its nature binding on them, they, when ascertained, ought to have been allowed to prosecute the appeal. If the decree were not binding upon them, it ought not to have been treated as an obstacle to the full trial and adjudication of their rights in an original suit. The Sudder Court, however, after making two other and inconsistent Orders, referred the parties to an original suit; and yet a suit of that nature when brought by the Appellant has been since disposed of against her summarily, and without taking evidence, on the ground that the main and essential issue in it was concluded by the decree of 1847. Therefore, she has fallen, so to speak, between two stools. She has had neither the benefit of the appeal against the decree of 1847, nor a fair trial of her right in a new suit.

It has been ingeniously argued here that for this result the Appellant is herself solely responsible; that the suit which she ought to have brought, and which the Sudder Court intended her to bring, was one in the nature of a Bill of revivor, or a Bill of revivor and supplement, limited to the object of obtaining from the Zillah Court a declaration that she had established her title to stand in the place of Anga Moottoo Natchiar, and carry on the former suit. Whether the procedure of the Courts of the East India Company admitted of such a suit (and no precedent of one has been produced), their Lordships are not prepared to say. But they have a very strong and clear opinion that such was not the nature of the suit which the Sudder Court had in its contemplation [607] when it made its Order of 1852. The omission to reserve the hearing of this appeal until the determination of the new suit; its removal from the file, which seems to be tantamount to its dismissal for want of prosecution, and has been so treated in these proceedings; the contention of the Respondent himself in his counter-petitions filed in opposition to the first applications for leave to prosecute the appeal—all point to the conclusion that the new and original suit intended was one in which the whole title of the claimants should be again pleaded and litigated.

The subsequent and obscure Order of the 16th of September, 1852, is hardly inconsistent with this, though it seem to contemplate that the decree of 1847 might prove an effectual bar to the suit which the Court itself had directed. Yet if there was ground for this apprehension, in what a position had the Sudder Court placed the claimants? It had denied to them the power of prosecuting the appeal: it had thereby made final that which was not in its nature final: and having thus tied their hands it sent them to wage a contest in a new suit in which, so bound, they could not but fail. If, therefore, the decree of 1847, when final, was binding on the claimants, the Sudder Court ought either to have dealt with the appeal on the merits, or it ought to have declared the claimants at liberty to bring and prosecute the new suit, notwithstanding that decree.

In either view of the case, therefore, there was a grave miscarriage of justice in the earliest Order of the Sudder Court which is appealed against, viz. that of the 19th of April, 1852.

It seems, however, to be necessary, in order to determine the mode in which this appeal ought to be disposed of, to consider the question whether the [608] decree of 1847, if it had become final in Anga Moottoo Natchiar's lifetime, would have bound those claiming the Zemindary in succession to her. And their Lordships are of opinion that, unless it could be shown that there had not been a fair trial of the right in that suit—or, in other words, unless that decree could have been successfully impeached on some special ground, it would have been an effectual bar to any new suit in the Zillah Court by any person claiming in succession to Anga Moottoo Natchiar. For assuming her to be entitled to the Zemindary at all, the whole estate would for the time be vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though, in some respects, for a qualified interest: and until her death it could not be ascertained who would be entitled to succeed. The same principle which has prevailed in the Courts of this country as to tenants in tail representing the inheritance, would seem to apply to the case of a Hindoo widow: and it is obvious that there would be the greatest possible inconvenience in holding that the succeeding heirs were not bound by a decree fairly and properly obtained against the widow.

But, then, assuming that the succeeding heirs would be so bound, it was strongly insisted on the part of the Respondent that this Committee can do no more than remit the cause, with directions to the Sudder Court to hear and determine the appeal against the decree of 1847: that it cannot itself deal with the merits of a decree of the Civil Court, until they have been determined by the appellate Court. Their Lordships, however, are not of that opinion. The appeal was ripe for hearing by the Sudder Court. Their Lordships have before them all the materials for a decision upon the merits, which have been fully [609] argued before them. They conceive, therefore, that they are not bound to yield to this technical objection. On the contrary, they think that it is competent to them to advise Her Majesty to make the Order which the Sudder Court ought to have made in 1852, and that it is their duty to do so.

The substantial contest between the Appellant and the Respondent is, as it was between Anga Moottoo Natchiar and the Respondent's predecessors, whether the Zemindary ought to have descended in the male and collateral line: and the determination of this issue depends on the answers to be given to one or more of the following questions:—

First. Were Gowery Vallabha Taver and his brother, Oya Taver, undivided in estate, or had a partition taken place between them.

Second. If they were undivided, was the Zemindary the self-acquired and separate property of Gowery Vallabha Taver? And if so—

Third. What is the course of succession according to the Hindoo law of the south of India of such an acquisition, where the family is in other respects an undivided family?

Upon the first question their Lordships are not prepared to disturb the finding of Mr. Baynes in the decree of 1847. There are undoubtedly strong reasons for concluding that Gowery Vallabha Taver and his brother, after the acquisition by the former of the Zemindary, lived very much as if they were separate. But this circumstance is not necessarily inconsistent with the theory of non-division, if, as was likely, the family and undivided property was very considerable in comparison of the separately enjoyed Zemindary. And Anga Moottoo Natchiar, having admitted that the brothers had been joint in estate, and alleged a partition [610] at a particular place and time, took upon herself the burden of proving that partition; a burden from which it must be admitted she has not satisfactorily relieved herself. Nor can their Lordships in considering this question be unmindful of the presumption which arises from the lateness of the period at which the allegation of division was first made; and from the silence of the parties in the suits of 1832 and 1833, as well as in the suit of 1823, which is mentioned in these proceedings, upon the subject of a partition which, if it had ever taken place, must have been in the knowledge of all the members of the family.

The second question their Lordships have no hesitation in answering in the affirmative. Every Court that has dealt with the question has treated the Zemindary as the self-acquired property of Gowery Vallabha Taver. Their Lordships conceive that this is the necessary conclusion from the terms of the grant, and the circumstances in which it was made. The mere fact that the grantee selected by Government was a remote kinsman of the Zemindars of the former line does not, their Lordships apprehend, bring this case within the rule cited from Strange's "Hindu Law," by Sir Hugh Cairns.

The third question is one of nicety and of some difficulty. The conclusion which the Courts in India have arrived at upon it, is founded upon the opinion of the Pundits, and upon authorities referred to by them. We shall presently examine those opinions and authorities; but before doing so, it will be well to consider more fully the law of inheritance as it prevails at Madras and throughout the southern parts of India, and the principles on which it rests and by which it is governed. The law which governs questions of inheritance in these parts of India is to [611] be found in the Mitacshara, and in ch. II., sec. 1, of that work the right of widows to inherit in default of male issue is fully considered and discussed.

The Mitacshara purports to be a commentary upon the earlier institutes of Yajnyawalkya; and the section in question begins by citing a text from that work, which affirms in general terms the right of the widow to inherit on the failure of male issue. But then the author of the Mitacshara refers to various authorities which are apparently in conflict with the doctrines of Yajnyawalkya, and, after reviewing those authorities, seeks to reconcile them by coming to the conclusion "that a wedded wife, being chaste, takes the whole estate of a man, who, being separated from his co-heirs, and not subsequently re-united with them, dies leaving no male issue." This text, it is true, taken by itself, does not carry the rights of widows to inherit beyond the cases in which their husbands have died in a state of separation from their co-heirs, and leaving no male issue; but it is to be observed that the text is propounded as a qualification of the larger and more general proposition in favour of widows; and, consequently, that in construing it, we have to consider what are the limits of the qualification, rather than what are the limits of the right. Now, the very terms of the text refer to cases in which the whole estate of the deceased has been his separate property, and, indeed, the whole chapter in which the text is contained, seems to deal only with cases in which the property in question has been either wholly the common property of a united family, or wholly the separate property of the deceased husband. We find no trace in it of a case like that before us, in which the property in question may have been in [612] part the common property of a united family, and in part the separate acquisition of the deceased; and it cannot, we think, be assumed that because widows take the whole estates of their husbands when they have been separated from, and not subsequently re-united with, their co-heirs, and have died leaving no male issue, they cannot, when their husbands have not been so separated, take any part of their estates, although it may have been their husband's separate acquisition. The text, therefore, does not seem to us to govern this case.

There being then no positive text governing the case before us, we must look to the principles of the law to guide us in determining it. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the general course of descent of separate property according to the Hindoo law is not disputed. It is admitted that, according to that law, such property descends to widows in default of male issue. It is upon the Respondent, therefore, to make out that the property here in question, which was separately acquired, does not descend according to the general course of the law. The way in which this is attempted to be done, is by showing a general state of co-parcenaryship as to the family property; but assuming this to have been proved, or to be presumable from there being no disproof of the normal state of the co-parcenaryship, this proof, or absence of proof, cannot alter the case, unless it be also the law that there cannot be property belonging to a member of a united Hindoo family, which descends in a course different from that of the descent of a share of the property held in union; but such a proposition is new, unsupported by authority, and at variance with principle. That two courses of descent may obtain [613] on a part division of joint property, is apparent from a passage in W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," title "Partition," vol. I, p. 53, where it is said as follows: "According to the more correct opinion, where there is an undivided residue, it is not subject to the ordinary rules of partition of joint property; in other words, if at a general partition any part of the property was left joint, the widow of a deceased brother will not participate, notwithstanding the separation, but such undivided residue will go exclusively to the brother."

Again, it is not pretended that on the death of the acquirer of separate property, the separately acquired property falls into the common stock, and passes like ancestral property. On the contrary, it is admitted that if the acquirer leaves male issue, it will descend as separate property to that issue down to the third generation. Although, therefore, where there is male issue, the family property and the separate property would not descend to different persons, they would descend in a different way, and with different consequences: the sons taking their father's share in the ancestral property subject to all the rights of the co-parceners in that property, and his self-acquired property free from those rights. The course of succession would not be the same for the family and the separate estate; and it is clear, therefore, that, according to the Hindoo law, there need not be unity of heirship.

But to look more closely into the Hindoo law. When property belonging in common to a united Hindoo family has been divided, the divided shares go in the general course of descent of separate property. Why, it may well be asked, should not the [614] same rule apply to property which from its first acquisition has always been separate? We have seen from the passage already quoted from Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," that where a residue is left undivided upon partition, what is divided goes as separate property; what is undivided follows the family property; that which remains as it was, devolves in the old line; that which is changed and becomes separate, devolves in the new line. In other words, the law of succession follows the nature of the property and of the interest in it.

Again, there are two principles on which the rule of succession according to the Hindoo law appears to depend: the first is that which determines the right to offer the funeral oblation, and the degree in which the person making the offering is supposed to minister to the spiritual benefit of the deceased; the other is an assumed right of survivorship. Most of the authorities rest the uncontested right of widows to inherit the estates of their husbands, dying separated from their kindred, on the first of these principles (1 Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 135). But some ancient authorities also invoke the other principle. Vrihaspati (3 Coleb. Dig. 458, tit. cccxcix; see also Sir William Jones' paper cited in 2 Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 250) says: "Of him whose wife is not deceased half the body survives; how should another take the property while half the body of the owner lives?" Now, if the first of these principles were the only one involved, it would not be easy to see why the widow's right of inheritance should not extend to her husband's share in an undivided estate. For it is upon this principle that she is preferred to his divided brothers in the succession [615] to a separate estate. But it is perfectly intelligible that upon the principle of survivorship the right of the co-parceners in an undivided estate should override the widows' right of succession, whether based upon the spiritual doctrine, or upon the doctrine of survivorship. It is, therefore, on the principle of survivorship that the qualification of the widow's right established by the Mitacshara, whatever be its extent, must be taken to depend. If this be so, we can hardly, in a doubtful case, and in the absence of positive authority, extend the rule beyond the doubts for it. According to the principles of Hindoo law, there is no co-parcenaryship between the different members of a united family, and survivorship following upon it. There is community of interest and unity of possession between all the members of the family, and upon the death of any one of them the others may well take by survivorship that in which they had during the deceased's lifetime a common interest and a common possession. But the law of partition shows that as to the separately acquired property of one member of a united family, the other members of that family have neither community of interest nor unity of possession. The foundation, therefore, of a right to take such property by survivorship fails; and there are no grounds for postponing the widow's right to any superior right of the co-parceners in the undivided property.

Again, the theory which would restrict the preference of the co-parceners over the widows to partible property is not only, as is shown above, founded upon an intelligible principle, but reconciles the law of inheritance with the law of partition. These laws, as is observed by Sir Thomas Strange, are so intimately connected that they may almost be said to be blended [616] together; and it is surely not consistent with this position that co-parceners should take separate property by descent, when they take no interest in it upon partition. We may further observe, that the view which we have thus indicated of the Hindoo law is not only, as we have shown, most consistent with its principles, but is also most consistent with convenience.

A case may be put of a Hindoo being a member of a united family having common property. He may be desirous to provide for his widow and daughters by means of the separate property, and yet wish to keep the family estate undivided. But if the rule contended for were to prevail, he could not effect his first object without insisting on the partition, which, ex hypothesi, he is anxious to avoid.

The case standing thus upon principle, we proceed to consider the opinions of the Pundits and the authorities referred to by them.

The case appears to have been referred to the Pundits on several occasions. The first of these references was made by the Zillah Court in 1833, in the suit No. 4 of 1832. The answer of the Pundits bears date the 28th of October in that year. It is unnecessary, however, to examine this particularly, since whatever is there laid down is included in the fuller statements which will be next considered.

The fuller statements were made by the same Pundits in answer to references directed by the Sudder Court before making the decree of the 17th of April, 1837 (see questions and answers, 3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 282). The answers are dated the 28th of December, 1836, and the 16th of January, 1837.

On examining the reasons on which the Pundits [617] rest their opinions, it is to be observed that they proceed upon the assumption that the texts cited by them apply to the case which they were called upon to consider. They seem to have done so, both as to the passages cited from Vrihaspati and as to the text in the Mitacshara to which they refer; but they leave untouched the question which they ought to have considered, whether these authorities do or do not affect this particular case. What we have already said as to the text from Mitacshara, and what we shall presently say as to the passages from Vrihaspati is, we think, a sufficient answer to this part of the reasons on which the Pundits found their opinion. Then, again, they point to the distinction between obstructed and non-obstructed heritage; and because the widow's right is not mentioned as obstructing the heritage, they infer that she cannot be entitled.

But the whole of this last argument seems to be founded on the passages in the Mitacshara contained in clauses 2 and 3 of section 1, chapter 1; and these passages, when examined, clearly appear to be mere definitions of "obstructed" and "non-obstructed heritage," and to have no bearing upon the relative rights of those who take in default of male issue. If, indeed, the argument which the Pundits have raised upon these passages be well founded, it would, as it seems, prevent the widow from taking in any case.

It remains, then to consider the authorities on which the Pundits rely in support of their opinions. They consist of the text from the Mitacshara, to which we have already so frequently referred, and of passages from Vrihaspati and several other commentators on the Hindoo law. We have already intimated our opinion that the text from the Mitacshara [618] does not apply to this case, and as to the passages from the Commentators they are all of equivocal import. They may, or may not, have been intended to apply to a case like the present, and if there was nothing more to be found upon the subject they might or might not be thought sufficient to warrant the opinion which the Pundits have founded upon them; but these passages seem to be the same passages, or passages similar to those, which were brought forward before the time of the Mitacshara, to show that widows were not entitled even where the property was wholly separate. We may instance the passage from Nareda. These authorities failed when contrasted with conflicting passages in the works of other Commentators, of which the Pundits in this case have taken no notice, to negative the right of the widow where the property was wholly separate; and as they have failed to this extent, we cannot but think that the Pundits in this case have gone much too far in bringing them forward as uncontradicted authorities in favour of the opinion which they have formed that the widows are not, in this case, entitled to the separately acquired property. It seems to us, too, that the decision in the Sandayar case (ante [9 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 580) — a decision also founded on the opinion of the Pundits of the Sudder Court — is wholly at variance with the opinion of the Pundits in the present case. Whether the Pundits in that case were or were not right in the opinion, that the Zemindary became the separate property of the uncle by the transaction between him and his nephew, it is quite unnecessary to consider. All that is important to be considered is, that holding the Zemindary to have become the separate [619] property of the uncle, they held that the widows of the uncle's son became entitled to it, and that the Court followed that opinion. The Pundits, in the present case, attempt to reconcile the conclusions at which they have arrived with the opinion given by the Pundits in the Sandayar case, by assuming that the Pundits in that case proceeded upon an idea that the descendants of the common ancestor had been separated, but we see no foundation whatever for that assumption. On the contrary, the facts of the case seem to us to negative it. If, indeed, there had been any such separation, we do not see how there could have been any question as to the rights of the widows.

The case, therefore, stands thus upon the authorities. On the one hand, we have the opinion of the Pundits in this case, which seem never to have been acted upon by any final decree. On the other hand we have the decision in the Sandayar case, and the other authorities cited for the Appellant at the Bar, particularly the passage from Menu, in Sir William Jones's paper, given at Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. II., p. 250 [2nd Edit.], and the opinion of the Pundit, Kistnamachary, (2 Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 231), the latter and material portion of which is not open to the objection taken to the passage which precedes it by Messrs. Colebrooke and Dorin.

In this state of things their Lordships cannot but come to the conclusion that the balance of authority, as well as the weight of principle, is in favour of the Appellant's contention.

We proceed, then, to consider how the Sudder Court ought to have dealt with this case after Anga Mootoo Natchiar's death, and we are of opinion that [620] that Court ought upon the applications made by the different parties claiming to prosecute the appeal, to have determined which of the parties was so entitled. We are of opinion, that Sowmia Natchiar and the grandson were not so entitled, and that their claims, therefore, ought at once to have been dismissed. The claims of the Appellant and her two sisters were founded on a right common to them as against the Respondent; and we think that the Court ought to have held them entitled to prosecute the appeal without prejudice to their rights inter se, founded upon the agreement which appears to have been entered into between them. It would then have been open to the Court to decide the case upon the merits; and upon the merits we are of opinion, for the reasons above given, that the Appellant and her sisters were well entitled to the Zemindary, as against the Respondent. We have, of course, not failed to consider the judgment of this Committee in 1844. Nor have we failed to observe that, in a recent edition of his Treatise on the Hindoo Law of Inheritance, Mr. Strange, one of the Judges of the Sudder Court of Madras, has expressed an opinion adverse to the conclusion at which we have arrived. But we think it probable that the case was not so fully discussed and examined in 1844, as it has been on the present hearing; and, at all events, we do not feel ourselves justified in holding the Appellant bound by the opinion which was then expressed; which, though of course entitled to the greatest possible respect, was not necessary to the decision then arrived at. And, as to the opinion expressed by Mr. Strange, it seems to rest upon the opinions of the Pundits, and the proceedings of the Courts which we have now been called upon to review. [621] If that opinion had been supported by a uniform course of decisions, we should perhaps have felt some difficulty in contravening it; but as the case stands upon the authorities, we feel bound to give effect to the conclusion at which we have arrived.

We shall, therefore, humbly recommend Her Majesty to reverse the decrees and orders complained of by this appeal: to declare that the suit of 1856, which appears to us to have resulted from erroneous directions given by the Sudder Court, ought to have been and ought to be dismissed; and in the suit of 1845 to declare that Sowmia Natchiar and Mootoo Vadooga were not, nor was either of them, but that the Appellant and her sisters were, as against the Respondent, entitled to prosecute the appeal, and to recover the Zemindary—this declaration to be without prejudice to the rights of the Appellant and her sisters inter se; and, further, to declare that an account ought to have been and ought to be directed of the rents and profits of the Zemindary received by the Respondent, or by his order, or for his use, since the death of Anga Moottoo Natchiar, with directions for payment to the parties entitled of what should be found due upon the account; and also to declare that the Zemindary ought at once to be put into the hands of the Collector, or of a Receiver to be appointed by the Court, with liberty to the Appellant and her sisters, or any of them, to apply at the Court as they may be advised. We shall further recommend that the case be remitted to the Sudder Court, with directions to carry these declarations into effect; but we shall not recommend that any costs be given of the suit of 1856, or of this appeal, or of any of the proceedings below. But any costs to which the Appellant has been subjected must be refunded.

REPORTS OF CASES heard and determined
by the Judicial Committee and the Lords
of the Privy Council, on Appeal from the Supreme and Sudder Dewanny Courts in the East Indies, 1863-65. By EDMUND F.
MOORE, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. X.

MOHUN LALL SOOKOOL,—Appellant; GOLUCK CHUNDER DUTT, Son of DABEE DOSS, deceased, and Others,—Respondents * [Nov. 30, 1863].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal.

The provisions of Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1814, sec. 10, cl. 3, directing the Court to record the points at issue, are imperative and must be strictly observed.

Where, therefore, in a suit to recover lands in possession, as the Plaintiff alleged, of the usufructuary Mortgagees under a conditional sale, the substantial question raised by the answer was, whether certain foreclosure proceedings under Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, sec. 8, taken by the Mortgagees effectually barred the equity of redemption, but the Judge of the Court of First Instance did not record that point; upon appeal the case was remitted by the Judicial Committee to India with directions that the question of foreclosure should be tried upon an issue regularly settled [11 Moo. Ind. App. 14].

Held further, that as the account of the mesne profits and expenditure by the mortgagees in possession was unsatisfactory, an account, whether as incidental to the question of foreclosure, or redemption, was to be taken, as provided by Ben. Regs. XV. of 1793, sec. 11, and I. of 1798, sec. 3.

If the interest of the Mortgagor in the mortgage estate has been sold under a decree, and the sale takes place before the notice to foreclose was filed, such notice, to be effectual, must be served on the purchaser, or decree holder.

This suit was brought by the Appellant, a decree-holder under a sale of a Mortgagor's equity of redemption, to recover possession of lands held, as he contended, by the Respondents, as usufructuary Mortgagees, and who had repaid themselves the [2] principal money and interest out of the perception of the mesne profits. The Respondents' case was, that by certain foreclosure proceedings taken by them under Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, sec. 8, the equity of redemption was barred.

The facts of the case were as follow:—

In the year 1828, one Lalla Tiluck Chunder, deceased, mortgaged a Zemindary called Seetadulput (with the exception only of droons 33, 3, 15, 1 of land belonging to Mouzah Jafferabad, one of the villages), by way of conditional sale, to Chuttro Narain, Ram Doss and Nilmoney Dutt, to secure the repayment to them of the principal sum of Rs. 4900, advanced to Lalla Tiluck Chunder.

This mortgage was effected through means of two written instruments, one being a Bilawuz Heba, or deed of sale, dated the 12th Phalgun 1889 (1828 A.D.) which was executed by Lalla Tiluck Chunder, and by which he purported to sell to Chuttro Narain, Ram Doss and Nilmoney Dutt, for the consideration aforesaid, the entire Zemindary, with the exception of the 33 droons, etc., of Mouzah Jafferabad, in order that they might possess the same and enjoy the profits thereof. The other instrument, called an Ikrar, or deed of agreement, bore the same date, having been executed contemporaneously by the last mentioned [3] persons, who then delivered it in exchange for the deed of sale to Lalla Tiluck Chunder. This agreement, after reciting the before-mentioned deed, provided, that if the Mortgagor paid off the principal money at the termination of seven years, then the Mortgagees would return to him the deed, and deliver up the possession of the estate; and that if such money was not then repaid the agreement would be deemed of no effect, and the deed of sale remain valid.

It appeared that the Mortgagees in the first instance got possession of only a portion of the lands, and were driven to a suit to obtain possession of the remainder. The Mortgagees under a decree made in that suit entered into possession of the whole of the mortgage premises, and continued to receive the mesne profits thereof until the death of Chutter Narain, one of the Mortgagees, who died, leaving Dabee Doss, since deceased, and Traheeram Dutt, his sons and heirs-at-law, him surviving, who, together with the surviving Mortgagees, continued in possession.

Afterwards one Bridreenath Bajpae, the representative of a person who had obtained a decree in the Civil Court against Lalla Tiluck Chunder, the Mortgagor, and one Augustine Penheiro, who had become by purchase the decree-holder, issued out an attachment in execution of the same, and seized and attached the Zemindary in order to sell the lands and realize the amount due under that decree.

The usual proceedings in a summary suit were taken in the Zillah Court by the Mortgagees, who objected to such intended sale on the ground of their conditional purchase of the Zemindary. The Principal Sudder Ameen overruled their objection, and, by his proceeding of the 17th of July, 1850, ordered the [4] sale to take place, giving notice at the time of the existence of the mortgage.

In the month of September, 1850, the Mortgagees served notice of foreclosure on the widow and heirress of the Mortgagor, insisting that as the principal money and interest was not paid the mortgage had become absolute.

On the 8th of January, 1851, an Order was made in the appeal by the Mortgagees in the summary suit, affirming the Order of the Principal Sudder Ameen. The estate was accordingly sold, in execution of the said decree, to the Appellant and one Lalla Prosunno Lall (since deceased) in equal undivided moieties, for the sum of Rs. 4300, which was paid by them in equal proportions.

After some proceedings before the Foudary Court respecting the Mortgagees' possession, the suit out of which the present appeal arose was brought by the Appellant and Lalla Prosunno Lall, in the Zillah Court of Chittagong, against Ram Doss, since deceased, the Respondent, Nilmoney Dutt, Dabee Doss, and Traheeram Dutt, Ranoo Debia, as widow of the late Lalla Tiluck Chunder, and others. The plaint set forth the principal facts before-mentioned, and charged that such of the Defendants as were the Mortgagees, or their representatives, had been paid out of the mesne profits of the mortgage lands in their possession, the whole of the mortgage money and interest, and that accordingly the Plaintiffs were entitled to have possession of the estate as such purchasers under the decree as aforesaid; and prayed that an account might be taken by the Court, and that if it should then appear that the Mortgagees had received the principal and interest, the Plaintiffs should be decreed possession of the estate.

[5] The answer of the Mortgagees stated, that they had not realized the amount of the mortgage money, and that up to that time the principal with interest due to them remained still unpaid; and admitting possession of the estate to have been obtained under the suit instituted by them, they alleged that, after allowing for expenditure, the interest of which was stated to amount to Rs. 588, per annum, on the mortgage debt, which had not been discharged, there was due to them Rs. 11,976. 9. 0. 2. The answer also stated, that the lands of Mouzah Jufferabad had not been attached and sold in execution of the aforesaid decree, and that portions of the other lands had been since washed away by the river. The Mortgagees also insisted that, having presented a petition to foreclose the mortgage, according to sec. 8 of Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, neither Ronoo Debia nor her representatives, the Plaintiffs, having paid off the mortgage debt, after the expiration of the one year of grace the foreclosure had become absolute, and that the suit was barred.

The answer of the Defendant, Ronoo Debia, after admitting the mortgage, denied the validity of the sale in execution and purchase under it, and asserted her claim, as widow representing the Mortgagor, to the mortgaged lands, and also submitted that no suit would lie until the principal and interest should be realized by the Mortgagees, which was not the case, and which she alleged would appear on taking the account.

The other Defendants filed formal answers.

On the 5th of August, 1853, the proceeding to record the issues in the suit, under Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1814, section 10, was held by the Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Chittagong, when he recorded for trial the following issues: First, what quantity of [6] land of Turruf Seetadulput, after excluding the Kharijah of Seetudan, was purchased by the Plaintiffs in execution of the decree; and what quantity of land of the aforesaid Turruf in the survey was measured as being in the possession of the Mortgagees; and of what quantity of land, in accordance with the decision of the Civil Court, the Mortgagees obtained possession. Secondly, whether or no the lands of Mouzah Jufferabad were attached by the Plaintiffs and had come under their purchase. Thirdly, whether or no, the principal and interest due to the Mortgagees having been liquidated from the collections of the disputed land, the disputed land was entitled to release; and whether or no, objection having been raised by Ronoo Debia to the purchase of the Plaintiffs in reference to the sale made to Augustine Penheiro, the purchaser, having been made on the back of the decree, the said purchase was correct.

Evidence was entered into and an account filed by Plaintiffs, and another prepared by the Ameen of the Court, but it was urged that no true account of the mesne profits was filed by the Defendants, the Mortgagees. The Defendants, the Mortgagees, filed a copy of a notice to Ronoo Debia, purporting to have been issued and addressed to her from the office of the Civil Court of Chittagong, and to bear date the 26th of September, 1850, requiring her to pay the mortgage-money, or be foreclosed. This document was not proved, nor was the service of it either admitted on the pleadings or proved. No issue was recorded by the Principal Sudder Ameen to try either the authenticity of this document, or the fact or legal effect of the foreclosure.

On the 5th of February, 1855, the hearing took [7] place before the Principal Sudder Ameen, who made a decree on that date, dismissing the suit, on the ground that the debt due to the Mortgagees had not been discharged.

The Plaintiffs appealed against that decree to the additional Judge of the Zillah Court, and on the 21st of April, 1855, that Judge, by his decree, remanded the case for trial, upon certain directions which are not material to state.

On the 31st of December, 1855, the re-hearing of the suit came on before another Principal Sudder Ameen, and it was ordered that the Plaintiffs were entitled to recover possession of the Mouzahs specified in their deed of sale by cancellation of Defendant's Mortgage.

The Defendants, the Mortgagees, appealed against that order to the additional Judge of the Zillah of Chittagong. In the grounds of appeal they urged that the Plaintiffs could not sue for possession until they were proved to be the legal representatives of the Mortgagor; and that they, the Defendants, having presented a petition of foreclosure, agreeably to sec. 8, Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, the conditional sale had become absolute, and that they became the rightful owners of the lands in dispute.

On the 9th of December, 1857, the hearing of the appeal came on before E. Radcliffe, Esq., the additional Judge of the Zillah Court, who by his decree held that the mortgage was liable to cancellation, and the Plaintiffs entitled to the possession of the Zemindary.

The Defendants, the Mortgagees, presented a petition to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, praying for special leave to appeal, which Messrs. Patton and Sconce, two of the Judges of that Court, admitted. [8] The hearing of the special appeal took place on the 11th of February, 1859, before Messrs. Colvin, Trevor, and Loch, three of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, who reversed the decrees of the Lower Courts. The material part of their decree was in these terms:—"The appeal was admitted to try two points: first, that inasmuch as the Plaintiffs, within one year from the issue of the notice, did not discharge the debt, whether they did not, by such failure, lose their right to redeem? And, secondly, whether the Lower Courts have erred in extending the account of collections beyond the year of notice down to the date of decision? There can be no doubt, as stated in the remarks of the Judges who admitted the special appeal, that the Court below has erred in ruling that the Defendants have no right to foreclosure, inasmuch as their case was struck off the file on the 4th of January, 1851, previous to the expiry of the year of grace. The Appellants issued notice of foreclosure on the 24th of September, 1850; and after everything necessary to be done by them had been done, the case was struck off the file on the 4th of January, 1851. This formal act has no effect upon the rights of the Mortgagor and Mortgagees. The Mortgagor, or his representative by purchase, must, within one year from the 24th of September, 1850, have paid every pice due under the mortgage, or on that date the sale became absolute; and looking to the second point, on which the special appeal has been admitted, we would observe that the account must be made up to that date only, and not to any subsequent period. Macpherson, on Mortgages in the Mofussil, pp. 213-214. With a view, however, of altogether getting rid of the effect of the notice, and non-pay[9]-ment under it, it has been urged that the decision of the Judge of Chittagong, dated the 30th of September, 1831, converted a transaction which was in the nature of a usufructuary conditional sale into a pure usufructuary mortgage. We have attentively perused that decision, and we find that there is not the slightest ground for this allegation, which is now mentioned for the first time. The Plaintiff in that case, the Defendant in this, sued for possession of the estate which had been mortgaged to him, to which he was, under the terms of the deed, entitled. The Court accepted the interpretation for which the Plaintiff contended, and declared him entitled to possession during the remainder of the term mentioned in the mortgage deed, or until the debt was paid, with interest. To this extent the Court acted; but as to the Court's converting a transaction of one nature into one of another, it neither had the power to do, nor did it, in fact, so act. It remains, then, for us to inquire whether, on the expiry of the year of grace, any sum remained due to the Mortgagees. It is, of course, quite competent to the Mortgagor or his representative, in a mortgage like that before us, to omit to make any payment during the year of grace; but this omission is at his own risk, and if one pice be on that date found to be due, the mortgage becomes irredeemably foreclosed and the conditional sale has become absolute. Now, looking to the accounts which have been accepted by the Courts below, and which we cannot now question on a special appeal, we find that on the last day of the year of grace a considerable sum, viz. Rs. 2419, was due to the Mortgagees. Such being the case, we hold that the Plaintiffs have lost their equity of redemption and that the special appeal [10] must be decreed, and the decisions of the Lower Courts be reversed, with costs; and that the Appellants, according to the account prepared by the Khurchanuvees, must receive from the Respondents the costs of this Court, together with interest from this date up to date of realization; and that for the costs of the Zillah Court they must prefer an application in the Zillah Court, from whence, in conformity with the Circular Order of the 4th of March, 1836, the necessary Order will be passed in regard to their payment."

The Sudder Court refused to admit an appeal to England, but special leave to appeal was granted by their Lordships, upon evidence that the real or market value of the subject-matter in dispute was of the value of Rs. 10,000 (see case reported upon this point, 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, pp. 193, 492).

As the Respondents did not appear, the appeal was heard ex parte.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant, Mohun Lall Sookool, contended, that the Sudder Court's decree was erroneous:—First, as it was founded upon the alleged foreclosure proceedings, concerning which, though set forth in the pleadings, no issue had been recorded in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen, as required by Ben. Reg. XXVI. of 1844, sec. 10, Maharajah Koonwar Baboo Nitrasur Singh v. Baboo Nund Lall Singh (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 199), the provisions of which were similar to the Mad. Reg. XV. of 1846, sec. 10, Srimut Mootoo Vijaya Raganadha v. Rang Anya Mootoo [11] Vatchiar (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 278); and upon which point it was not competent for either party to go into evidence.

Secondly, that the two former decrees of the Principal Sudder Ameen and additional Zillah Judge ought to have been affirmed; or the case remanded to the lower Court, with directions that the Defendants in the suit should, under Ben. Regs. I. of 1798, sec. 3, and XV. of 1793, sec. 11, deliver in a true and correct account, on oath or solemn declaration, of their receipts and expenditure as Mortgagees in possession; and that an account should then be taken by the Lower Court in order to ascertain whether anything, and what, was due and owing to the Defendants in respect of the mortgage money and interest at the date when it is alleged the foreclosure proceedings, if valid, took effect. And Thirdly, that the Defendants failed to prove either that they were entitled to foreclose the mortgage, or that, if so, the same was duly foreclosed in such manner as required by Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, sec. 8, as to operate as a bar to the Plaintiffs' right.

Judgment was delivered by

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (Dec. 1, 1863).—This appeal arises on a litigation which commenced, at the latest, in the year 1852, but in a sense earlier, on the question whether a mortgage continued subject to redemption; and if it did, what, if anything, was due upon it: a litigation that might and ought to have been less complex, less prolix, and less tedious than it has unhappily been. That there was a mortgage is plain; it may be taken also as equally plain [12] that if it is redeemable, the present Appellants (for it may be considered that there are two Appellants) are the persons entitled to redeem, and that the Respondents are the actual Mortgagees in possession, who, if the mortgage is redeemable, are liable to be redeemed.

By two decrees, dated respectively the 31st of December, 1855, and the 9th of December, 1857, the latter being made on the appeal of the Mortgagees from the former, the Mortgagors' representatives (the Appellants) were not only declared entitled to redeem the mortgage, but were also declared entitled to do so without making any payment; and this on the ground that, as then decided, the Mortgagees in possession had fully paid themselves by receipt of rents and profits.

These Zillah decisions, the Mortgagees having been dissatisfied with them, led to a special appeal on their part to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, which Court in 1859 reversed them, upon the ground (which was in fact the only question before the Court on the special appeal) that certain proceedings taken by the Mortgagees with a view to foreclosure had effectually barred the equity of redemption, and, consequently, that the Appellants' suit ought to be dismissed with costs.

That led to the present appeal, in which the Appellants contend for the relief given to them by the decrees of 1855 and 1857, or at least for something less advantageous to them than the decree of 1859.

Upon the materials before their Lordships, their opinion is not in favour of the decrees of 1855 and 1857, or either of them, nor is it in favour of the decree of 1859. They conceive that the materials before the [13] Court which pronounced the decree of 1855, or before the Court which pronounced the decree of 1857, were not nor are sufficient, as to the matter of debt, to support either of those decrees; and that, on the other hand, the Court which pronounced the decree of 1859 was not, by the state of things then before it, enabled to make that decree

Their Lordships consider that it did not appear sufficiently before the Court in 1855, or before the Court in 1857, that, on the assumption of the redeemable condition of the mortgage, there was not anything then due to the Mortgagees on their security.

The Zillah Courts, in coming to this conclusion as to the state of the accounts, seem to have proceeded not upon proof of the actual collections which were or ought to have been made by the Mortgagees, but upon materials which were in a great measure speculative and conjectural. And this objection to the mode of taking the accounts has in fact been taken by the Appellants' Counsel at their Lordships' Bar, when contending against the application by the Sudder Court of the account so taken to the question of foreclosure.

The other objections taken to the decree of 1859 are—first, that the Sudder Court ought not to have decided the cause on the question of foreclosure, because that question, though raised upon the pleadings, had not been made one of the issues settled in the Court of First Instance, where alone evidence could be taken; and, secondly, that the Court came to an erroneous conclusion in treating the proceedings of which there was any evidence as an effectual bar to the Appellants' right of redemption. Their Lordships consider both these objections to be well [14] founded. It is clear that there has been no such trial of the question of foreclosure as the Regulation which prescribes the statement of formal issues, and indeed substantial justice, require. And in dealing with this question the Sudder Court seems to have directed its attention to the erroneous reasons assigned by the Zillah Judge for holding that no right of foreclosure existed rather than to the effect of the proceedings proved.

In September, 1850, when they filed their notice of foreclosure, the Mortgagees not only had notice that the interest of the original Mortgagor had been taken in execution, but were actively disputing in a summary suit the right of the decree-holder to put up that interest for sale. There had been a decision against their objection, and their appeal against that decision was pending. The appeal was decided against them on the 8th of January, 1851, and the equity of redemption was sold to the Appellants on the 7th of April, 1851. It is quite clear upon the authorities that, if the sale had taken place before the notice of foreclosure was filed, that notice, to be effectual, must have been served on the purchaser; and, in the circumstances above stated, their Lordships conceive that it ought to have been served upon the decree-holder. Yet there is no evidence of any attempt to serve it upon any one except the widow and heiress of the original Mortgagor.

Their Lordships, therefore, think that the question of foreclosure ought to be further and fully tried upon an issue to be regularly settled; and that the mortgage account, whether as incidental to the question of foreclosure or to the question of redemption, ought to be properly taken. They desire, however, [15] to leave undisturbed the findings of the Zillah Courts upon the title of the Appellants to sue as the representatives of the Mortgagor, and upon the extent and nature of the lands which are the subject of litigation.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that each of the three decrees of 1855, 1857, and 1859 should be discharged, and that the cause should be remitted to India, and that the High Court at Calcutta, or, under its direction, the proper Zillah Court, should inquire whether the Appellants' right, or equity of redemption, as concerning the mortgaged estates in question, or any and what part of them, has become foreclosed or barred; and if it has not become so as to the whole of the estates, then to take an account of what, if anything, is due to the Respondents, or any of them, on the security, and for that purpose to take the usual accounts as to rents and profits and disbursements, with just allowances, and upon the result of that account to deal with the matters in dispute accordingly. The parties respectively to be at liberty to adduce evidence, in addition to that now before us, upon these issues, upon the determination of which the final decision of the cause must depend. The costs of the trial, including those of this appeal, to abide the event.

[16] JOYKISHEN MOOKERJEE.—Appellant: THE COLLECTOR OF EAST BURDWAN AND BRIJO ROY, Phareedar.—Respondents * [Feb. 15 and 16, 1864].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adaulut at Calcutta.

Chakeran lands in Bengal, held anterior to the Decennial Statement, under the Zemindar of Burdwan, not merely in lieu of wages for personal services to the Zemindar, but also for the performance of the duties of village watchman, are not resumable as Tannahdary lands by the Government, under sec. 8, cl. 4 of Ben. Reg. I. of 1793, but are, by sec. 4 of Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1793, annexed to the Malguzary lands, and responsible for the public revenue assessed on the Zemindary.

Chowkeedars, or village watchmen, are liable to services to the Talookdar, but Chakeran lands held by them for such services are not liable to be resumed by the Talookdar for his own use discharged of the obligation to which they are subject. So held by the Judicial Committee, affirming the judgments of the Zillah and Sudder Courts, in a suit for resumption by the Appellant as Talookdar, under a purchase of certain lands from the Zemindar of Burdwan, which he alleged to be Gram Surunjamee (rent-free village lands), but which were proved to be Chakeran lands, appropriated to the maintenance of Chowkeedars in the Talook in which the lands were situate.

The right of appointing Chowkeedars belongs to the Talookdar, such officers being liable to the performance of services to the Talookdar: and as by usage in the Zemindary of Burdwan, Chowkeedars had been accustomed to render such services to the Zemindar, the Chowkeedar was held entitled to possession of the Chakeran lands under such tenure.

The question raised in this appeal was the right of the Appellant, the Talookdar of Mouzah Gobindopore, to the possession of certain land within the limits of his Talookdary, included in the Decennial Settlement, which the Collector of East Burdwan insisted were, previously to and at the time of that Settlement, [17] Chakeran lands (lands set apart and appropriated as a remuneration for services), and had so continued up to the institution of the suit.

The Appellant's case was, that these lands were Gram Surunjamee Chakeran, or lands appropriated in lieu of wages as a remuneration for personal services rendered to the Zemindar, and that upon the cesser of such services he was entitled to take possession of such lands; while the contention on the part of the Respondent, the Collector of East Burdwan, was, that the lands were Tannahdary, or Chowkeedary Chakeran, or lands appropriated as remuneration for Police services, and that as such they were not resumable by the Appellant, as Talookdar, at all events, while the holder of the lands continued to perform the Police services.

The circumstances of the case and the nature of the tenure, were as follows:—

Prior to the Decennial Settlement the landholders, and Sudder Farmers of land, were bound by a clause in their engagements (see Harington's Analysis, p. 459), to keep the peace, to prevent robberies, and arrest offenders; and for these purposes they retained in their service an establishment of Tannahdars (Police officers) and Pykes or Chowkeedars (village watchmen).

Mouzah Gobindopore, to which the lands in dispute belonged, was at the time of the Decennial Settlement a part of the large Zemindary of the Rajah of Burdwan: and the nature of the Police establishment of the Zemindar of Burdwan, in the year 1788, is referred to in the 5th Report of the Select Committee on the affairs of India in the following terms:—"His Police [18] establishment, as described in a letter from the Magistrate of the 12th of October, 1788, consisted of Tannahdars, acting as chiefs of Police divisions, and guardians of the peace; under whose orders were stationed in the different villages, for the protection of the inhabitants, and to convey information to the Tannahdars, about 2400 Pykes, or armed constables. But, exclusive of these guards, who were for the express purpose of Police, the principal dependence for the protection of the people probably rested on the Zemindary Pykes: for these are stated by the Magistrate to have been in number no less than 19,000, who were at all times liable to be called out in aid of the Police " (5th Report, 1812, p. 71). The Tannahdars and Pykes were remunerated by the Zemindar, either by an appropriation of Chakeran lands or by money payment, and in the calculation of the jumma of the Zemindary to be assessed, with a view to the Decennial Settlement, the profits of the Chakeran lands were not brought into account, and deductions were allowed in favour of the Zemindar for the charges for such Pykes as were paid in money, and the Decennial Settlement was carried into effect upon such a calculation (Mr. Shore's minute, 1789, 5th Report, p. 198).

Ben. Reg. I. of 1793, which declared the assessment of the Decennial Settlement fixed for ever, in the 4th cl., sec. 8, provided as follows:—"The jumma of those Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, which is declared fixed in the foregoing articles, is to be considered entirely unconnected with, and exclusive of, any allowances which have been made to them in the adjust-[19]-ment of their jumma, for keeping up Tannahs, or police establishments, and also of the produce of any lands which they may have been permitted to appropriate for the same purpose; and the Governor-General in Council reserves to himself the option of resuming the whole or part of such allowances, or produce of such lands, according as he may think proper, in consequence of his having exonerated the proprietors of land from the charge of keeping the peace, and appointed officers on the part of Government to superintend the Police of the country. The Governor-General in Council, however, declares that the allowances or produce of lands which may be resumed, will be appropriated to no other purpose but that of defraying the expense of the Police; and that instructions will be sent to the Collectors, not to add such allowances, or the produce of such lands, to the jumma of the proprietors of land, but to collect the amount from them separately."

By Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1793, which amended and enacted the rules for the Decennial Settlement, after declaring, in section 36, that the assessment was to be fixed, exclusive and independent of all existing Lakhiraj lands, it was, in section 41, provided as follows:—"The Chakeran lands, or lands held by public officers and private servants in lieu of wages, are also not meant to be included in the exception contained in section 36. The whole of these lands in each Province are to be annexed to the Malguzary lands, and declared responsible for the public revenue assessed on the Zemindaries, independent Talooks, or other estates in which they are included, in common with all other Malguzary lands therein."

[20] In order to correct abuses arising from the Zemindary police establishments, and to afford more effectual protection to person and property, a new system of Police was established by the Government on the 7th of December, 1792, the rules of which, with amendments, were re-enacted in Ben. Reg. XXII. of 1793. That Regulation provided, that the Police of the country should thenceforward be considered under the exclusive charge of officers appointed by the Government, and that each Zillah should be divided into Police jurisdictions of a certain extent, each superintendent by a Darogah; and by sec. 12 all the village watchmen were thereby declared subject to the orders of the Darogah; and, amongst other duties, by section 13, the Police Darogahs were directed to keep a register of the village watchmen declared subject to their orders; and, upon the death or removal of any of them, the landowners or others to whom the filling up of the vacancies might belong, were required to send the names of the persons whom they might appoint to the Darogah of the jurisdiction that they might be registered by him.

For the more complete formation of the register of village watchmen, and to enable the Zillah and City Magistrates at all times to ascertain what number and descriptions of watchmen and guards were maintained in aid of the Police throughout their respective jurisdictions (see Harington's Analysis, p. 513), it was enacted by section 21 of Ben. Reg. XII. of 1807, that "every landholder, farmer, merchant, or other person employing Pykes, Chokeedars, Pasbans, Nigabans, Burkundazes, or any other description of watchmen or guards, shall, within three [21] months after the promulgation of this Regulation, transmit a list thereof, specifying the names, occupations, places of residence, and allowances in land or money, of the several persons entertained by them, to the Magistrate of the Zillah or City in which they were employed. They shall also transmit to the Magistrate a similar list in the first month of each succeeding Bengal, Fusily, or Willaity year (according to the era current in the district), made up to the last day of the preceding year. Any neglect to furnish such lists (especially after being called upon by the Magistrate), as well as any wilful omission to include in them persons actually employed as guards or watchmen, of whatever denomination, shall be liable to a fine to Government not exceeding Rs. 200, to be determined by the Magistrate, according to the situation of the party and circumstances of the case." The object of the above-stated section was subsequently further provided for by Ben. Reg. XX. of 1817, sec. 21.

It appeared that at about the time of the Decennial Settlement one Srishteedhur had possession of the lands in dispute as a remuneration for his services as Tannaladar in the establishment of the Zemindar of Burdwan, and, subsequently to the alterations in the Police system before referred to, he continued to hold the lands in the capacity of Pyke, or Chowkeedar, under the Talookdar of Gobindopore, who held that Talook in putnee (in perpetuity) of the Zemindar, and, as appeared from the Records of the Foujdary Court of Zillah Burdwan, he was returned as so holding in the lists transmitted to the Zillah Magistrate in conformity with section 21, of Ben. Reg. XII. of 1807. Srishteedhur died about the year [22] 1836, and Nundololl Roy, who was appointed to succeed him, entered into possession of the lands in dispute, and his name was entered in the Records of the Zillah Magistrate, as holding the lands in the capacity of Phareedar (village station policeman) of Gobindopore. Upon the death of Nundololl Roy, Krishto Nayek was appointed Phareedar, and entered into possession of the lands accordingly; and, upon the death of Krishto Nayek, in the year 1850, Ahmed Buksh was appointed, and entered into possession of the lands, and held the same in the year 1852, when the Talook of Gobindopore was purchased by the Appellant.

Shortly after the appointment of Ahmed Buksh as Phareedar of Gobindopore he was appointed by the Magistrate to discharge the duties of Phareedar at a neighbouring station, Doloybazar; and the Appellant having ascertained this circumstance when he entered into possession of the Talookdary, insisted that he had a right to dispossess Ahmed Buksh, and to take possession of the lands in dispute for his own purposes. Upon proceeding to take possession, however, the Appellant was resisted by Ahmed Buksh, and eventually, in 1855, he instituted a suit to enforce his alleged right, by filing his plaint in the Moonsiff's Court of East Burdwan against Ahmed Buksh, and the Respondent, the Collector. The material statements in the plaint were to the effect, that Ahmed Buksh from the time of Appellant's purchase had not been present to take care of the Zemindary Office of Gobindopore village, or to keep a watch, or do any other business, although he continued to hold the lands in dispute as Chakeran lands, and forcibly retained possession; that the lands were never held at any time as service lands [23] for Tannahdary (Police duties), and that it was not laid down by any Regulation that service lands for the village Chowkeedars must be given by the Talookdars or Zemindars; that the lands were Gram Surunjamee lands, of which the Appellant was owner, and that, by sec. 41 of Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1793, as such lands had been included in the settlement with the Zemindar's rent-paying lands, the Appellant was entitled to the lands as liable to pay rent to him; and the plaint prayed, that upon the Zemindary rights being established, he might be put in possession of the disputed land, containing 19 beegahs 1 cottah and 13 chutacks, of the estimated value of Rs. 200, together with mesne profits, pendente lite, and interest until the time the amount of decree should be realized.

The Respondent, the Collector of East Burdwan, insisted that, by the records of the Criminal Court, it was manifest that Srishteedhur had possession of the land in dispute as Phareedar in the year 1813, and that his successors in that capacity had also held the land; that the land was never Gram Surunjamee, but Chakeran land for the performance of Police Chowkeedary duties, and had been held as Chowkeedary Chakeran land for forty-two years at the least, and was probably so held before the commencement of the Decennial Settlement.

The Appellant in his replication repeated his claim to the land as Gram Surunjamee land, and his title thereto, under Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1793, sec. 41, and contended that, inasmuch as the powers of the Zemindar of Burdwan, the original proprietor, with respect to the land, were then vested in him, the Chakeran land which the Defendant and his prede-[24]cessors obtained for attending the Zemindary duties in lieu of salary, were then, since he did not perform the Zemindary business, liable to resumption by the Appellant. The replication also stated that Deedar Buksh had been appointed in the room of the Defendant, Ahmed Buksh, as Phareedar of Doleybazar, but that he did not attend to the Chowkeedary of the Pharee Gobindopore, nor look after the Zemindary duties in any way.

In consequence of the appointment of Deedar Buksh he was made a Defendant to the suit in the place of Ahmed Buksh.

Issues were prepared on the part of the Appellant, and of the Respondent, the Collector, and after the same were settled by the Moonsiff, the parties proceeded to produce evidence in relation thereto. The Appellant gave in evidence a document purporting to be a copy of statement taken from the records of the Criminal Court of the year 1813, under the title of "A statement of the village of Gobindopore, in Pergunnah Shahabad, under the jurisdiction of Tharra Koochut," in which the Tannah was stated to be distant four miles from the village, and Srishteedhur Tannahdar was stated to hold 19 beegahs 17 cottahs (the land in dispute) as service land, and also certain other documents, which were principally copies of, or extracts from, correspondence between the Collector of Burdwan and other officers of the Government in relation to service lands within the district of Burdwan. Three witnesses were called by him to prove that Srishteedhur Tannahdar and his successors had never performed police services, but had transacted Zemindary business solely, and on that account held the land in dispute.

[25] The Respondent gave in evidence certain documents in relation to the Decennial Settlement concluded with the Zemindar of Burdwan in the year 1789, comprising the engagement of the Zemindar, and the Dowl Bundobusts, or particular statement of the jumma of the Zemindary, and of the net jumma payable in conformity with the settlement; and also other documents, consisting of copies of correspondence between the officers of the Government in relation to matters connected with the question in dispute.

On the 30th of April, 1856, the Moonsiff, relying upon the witnesses for the Appellant, found that the land entered in the statement, from the Criminal records of the year 1813, as in the possession of Srishteedhur, had been granted to him for Zemindary services solely, and that such land, being included in the Decennial Settlement, was rent-paying land; and after declaring his opinion, that as the Zemindary services were no longer performed the holder could not retain the land, he pronounced a decree, giving to the Appellant possession of the land, together with mesne profits, interest and costs.

The Respondent, the Collector, appealed to the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Burdwan, and on the 7th of December, 1857, the Principal Sudder Ameen made a decree dismissing the appeal, with costs.

Application was made to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, for the admission of a Special appeal from the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen in this suit and in other similar suits raising the same question; and on the 28th of June, 1858, such application was granted by the Sudder Court on the following grounds:—"These suits were instituted [26] under the provisions of sec. 41, Reg. VIII., 1793, to resume certain lands held by the Defendant as Chakeran, on the plea that they were Malguzary lands assigned to the parties in possession for the performance of certain duties connected with the Zemindary, and that as these duties had ceased to be performed, the Zemindar was entitled to resume them. It is, however, admitted by the Zemindar, that the Defendants performed both Zemindary and Police duties, but for what period is not distinctly stated. The Government (one of the Defendants in these cases) pleaded that the lands were Tannahdary lands, assigned to the Chowkeedars for the performance of Police duties which they still continue to execute. It is not denied by the Defendant (special Appellant) that sec. 41, Reg. VIII., 1793, applies to these lands, but the lower Courts, without determining the issue which arises out of the Defendants' pleadings, viz. whether the lands were or were not assigned for Police duties, have declared that the Plaintiff had authority to resume the land under the section quoted above. As this point has not been de-terminated, the decisions are consequently imperfect; and as the Zemindar (the real Respondent in these suits) has appeared in this Court, we remand them for the trial of the following issues, which arise out of the pleadings:—First, what were the duties performed by the party in possession of these lands at, or antecedent to, the Decennial Settlement, or for a long series of years? Secondly, if the duties were wholly Zemindary, has it been proved that these duties have ceased, so as to entitle the Zemindar to resume? Thirdly, if the duties performed were partly Zemindary and partly Police, whether, on proof of the cessation of the Zemindary [27] duties, though the Police duties continue to be performed, the Zemindar can resume the lands?"

The suit accordingly came before the Zillah Court for trial upon the issues directed by the Sudder Court; and on the 17th of November, 1858, the Appellant presented a petition to the Zillah Court, stating that the Police station at Doloybazar had been abolished, and the Defendant, Deedar Buksh, discharged from his situation, and that Brij Roy had been appointed Phareedar at the Police station at Gobindopore, and had taken possession of the disputed land, and praying that Brij Roy might be made a Defendant.

The Respondent, Brij Roy, was then made a Defendant by order of the Zillah Court, and put in an answer in the suit.

Additional evidence, both documentary and oral, was adduced by the parties. The evidence was contradictory. Two witnesses were examined on the part of the Appellant, who proved special services performed to the Talookdar, and that the land was held on condition of performing these services since the time of Srish-teedhur. Amongst other documents given in evidence by the Appellant, was a copy of a statement of service land in Tannah Koochut for the year 1792, which purported to state that there were 104 beegahs of such land in Pergunnah Shahabad belonging to that Tannah. The Collector filed Reports of Officers of Government and lists of the names of Pykes and of the Chakeran land held by them, including the name of Srish-teedhur. Two other witnesses deposed that no service had ever been rendered to the Zemindar by the persons who successively held the lands in question.

[28] On the 29th of July, 1859, Mr. C. Hobhouse, the Judge of the Zillah Court, pronounced his judgment; and, as to the first issue, said:—"On a careful consideration of all the documents and papers, and of the riwâz evidence produced, and the laws quoted, Reg. XXII., 1793, and sec. 21 of Reg. XX. of 1817, by both parties, I am of opinion, that it has not been substantiated on the part of the Plaintiff, that the duties performed by the servants in occupation of the lands in dispute have been chiefly Zemindary, and only partly Police; nor, on the part of the Defendants, that the duties have been wholly Police; but that the duties, both before, at the time, and since the Decennial Settlement, have been partly Police and partly Zemindary, as follow:—Zemindary, first (personal to the Zemindar), to collect or enforce collections of rents; to guard Mofussil treasuries; and, perhaps, to escort Mofussil treasure. Second (common to the village community), to keep watch at night, to secure the harvests. Police—to maintain the peace; to apprehend offenders under orders of the Tannahdars; to report criminal occurrences; to convey public money to the Sudder treasury (this duty has ceased since the Decennial Settlement); to serve as guides to travellers. I may add, that it is notorious, and in my personal knowledge, that most of these duties are at this present time performed by the village watchmen in Burdwan." As to the second issue, the Zillah Judge referred to his opinion upon the first issue; and as to the third issue, the Judge stated his conclusion as follows:—"On the whole argument on this third issue my judgment is as follows: that the duties performed by the servants in possession of the lands in dispute have been proved [29] to be partly personal to the Zemindar, partly common to the village community and to the public generally, and partly special to the State; and that although the Zemindar's personal duties have ceased to be performed, yet that he has not thereby acquired any right to resume the lands. First, because of the fact that although the lands are included in the Mal estate, yet they are excluded from the rental paid under the permanent settlement, and the principle of equity which follows upon this fact, that the Zemindar cannot claim a something for which he has not given any equivalent; and, secondly, because of the fact that the conditions on which the lands were held were not wholly personal to the Zemindar, but were common to him, the village community, the public, and the State, and enjoyable by all pro tempore Zemindars, and because of the equity following on this fact, that he, the one of several parties having interests, present or possible, in the lands, should not have the power to resume and dispose of the lands at his own pleasure only." In accordance with the above-mentioned judgment, the Zillah Judge made a decree dismissing the suit with costs.

The Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. The appeal came on for hearing before Messrs. Raikes, Trever, and Samuells, three of the Judges of that Court; and on the 17th of April, 1860, the decree of the Zillah Court was affirmed by the judgment of the majority of the Judges, Messrs. Trever and Samuells (the other Judge, Mr. Raikes, being dissentient), and a decree passed dismissing the appeal with costs.

Mr. Trever (Mr. Samuells concurring) delivered the judgment of the Sudder Court, and declared, as [30] to the first issue, that from the earliest periods there were Tannaludary, or Chowkedary Chakeran, but that with that description of service land the Court had no concern in the case before them; and that another and distinct species of service lands was called "Zemindary Chakeran," held by village watchmen, under the names of Paiks and Pasbans, and upon this issue expressed his opinion, that from a period antecedent to the Decennial Settlement, the lands in dispute had been held by parties on the condition of performing services both to the village community and to the Zemindar; and, as to the second issue, declared that, on the finding that the lands in dispute had been before, at, and since the Decennial Settlement, held on the condition of the performance of double service, viz. as village watch and Zemindary Pykes, it was competent to the Zemindars to resume the land on the tenant refusing to perform the duties of Zemindary Pykes. The decree then, amongst other things, dealing with the Decennial Settlement, declared as follows:—"The ownership of the soil was at the same time declared to be with the Zemindars, and it became necessary for Government to determine to whom the land held by the Chowkedars and Zemindary Pykes belonged; with that object, by sec. 41 of Reg. VIII. of 1793, it was declared that 'the Chakeran land, or lands held by public officers and private servants in lieu of wages, are also not meant to be included in the exception contained in section 36,' which declares the assessment fixed, exclusive and independent of all existing Lakhiraj lands. The whole of these lands in each Province is to be annexed to the Malguzary lands, and declared responsible for the [31] public revenue assessed on the Zemindary, independent Talooks, or other estates in which they are included in common with all other Malguzary lands therein. The question then arises as to the meaning of this law. Does it at once absolutely transfer the lands to the Zemindar, and with the lands the right of doing with them as he pleases, and at once assessing them? or does it only transfer them to the Zemindar subject to all those burdens with which the Common law or custom has burdened them, so long as the public service or private convenience requires that they should be burdened? Unfortunately the law is silent on the point. It appears to me, however, that this important section only declares that the right of ownership in these lands is with the Zemindar; that though they are not a portion of lands on which the assessment was actually based, still they are to be annexed to those lands; and that when public service or private convenience no longer requires that they should be devoted to the purpose which, under the customary law, they have hitherto been devoted to, the right of resuming and assessing them is with the Zemindar, as owner of the estate in which they are settled. In carrying out this law in the case of Zemindary Pykes, no question could ever arise in the Courts. The Zemindar is alone the judge of the necessity of the retention of the services of his own servants, and he may dismiss them or retain them at his pleasure; but the case of village watchmen is different: their services are not personal to the Zemindar, but they are performed, first and mainly, for the village community; and consequently, as long as that community exists, the lands are liable to the charge of keeping up [32] the watch. A letter of the Board, dated 13th October, 1700, has been cited by the Appellant, but that letter leaves the meaning of sec. 41, Reg. VIII. of 1793, just where it was." And, after other observations, the judgment concluded in these terms:—"Allusion has been made by the Judge, and also in this Court, to the deduction of Rs. 50,000, allowed to the Rajah of Burdwan at the Decennial Settlement, on account of Nugdea Pykes. Those Pykes were of a semi-military nature: were commanded by a European Officer, and kept up to guard the frontier from the incursions of the Mahrattas. The force is totally unconnected with the subject before the Court, and it consequently is unnecessary further to notice the circumstances connected with it. The foregoing remarks have indirectly met the chief arguments adduced by the Counsel for the Plaintiff. From what is there stated, it will appear that at the Decennial Settlement the service lands—both those of the village watch and the Zemindary Pykes—were not included in the assessment on which the Settlement was based, neither was any remission of revenue made in lieu of them; that appropriated as they were to particular purposes before the Decennial Settlement, so they remained after it; that, burdened with these charges, they were declared to be the property of the Zemindar; and though, in the case of Zemindary Pykes, the Zemindar can, at his pleasure, resume the lands, in that of the village watch he cannot; but that whilst the public service requires them, they must remain appropriated to those purposes. It follows, from this view, that the lands are burdened by the operation of law, and not by a private contract [33] between the Zemindar and the tenant Chowkeedar, and that, consequently, an unauthorized act of the latter can in no way justify the resumption of them by the former, as, under other circumstances, it might have been done."

The third Judge, Mr. Raikes, being dissentient, delivered a separate judgment, in which he stated at length his reasons for considering that the Appellant was entitled to recover possession of the lands, and that the decree of the Zillah Judge should have been reversed. The material part of his judgment was as follows:—"It has been admitted by the Government Pleaders, that where these services have been purely Zemindary, the practice (right or wrong) has been to resume, whenever the Zemindar chose to dispense with such services; but that, in the present case, as the occupant of the land has performed the duties both of a Zemindary Pyke and a village Chowkeedar, the Zemindar, in consequence of the village Chowkeedar being also a Police officer and a servant of the State, cannot resume the lands on a cessation of the Zemindary services. Now, I cannot allow that the village Chowkeedar is a Police officer, or a servant of the State. Section 13, Reg. XXII. of 1793, enacts, that 'All Pykes, Chowkeedars, Pashans, Dusauds, Negabans, Harees, and other descriptions of village watchmen, are declared subject to the orders of the Darogah. He shall keep a register of their names; and upon the death or removal of any of them, the landowners or others to whom the filling up of the vacancies shall belong, shall send the names of the persons who they may appoint to the Darogah of the jurisdiction, that they may be registered by him as above directed.' The next section describes the [34] particular duties these men are expected to perform, and provides 'that Pykes, Pashans, or other village watchmen, who shall not act in conformity with this section, shall be dismissed from the station by the landholders, or other persons by whom they are employed, upon the requisition of the Magistrate; and shall be further punished as the law may direct,' etc. These two sections appear to me to recognize in the plainest terms that these Pykes, Pashans, or village watchmen, are servants of 'the landholders or other persons by whom they are employed,' and are not servants of the State. At page 44 of the Fifth Report of the Select Committee on the affairs of the East India Company, mention is made of the above Regulation in the following words:—'The Pashans, Pykes, and other description of village guards, who still have their subsistence from the village establishment, are, by the Regulation then above cited, placed under the authority of the Darogah, who keeps a register of their names, and on a vacancy occurring in their number, calls on the Zemindar—to whom the privilege still appertains—to fill it up.' And again, at page 71 of the same Report, when treating of the Police under the system introduced in 1793, we find it stated, that 'the village watchmen, and such as remain undismissed of the Zemindary servants, are by the public Regulations required to co-operate with the Darogah; but a provision of this nature, without the means of prompt enforcement, has not been attended with the desired effect.' These extracts show that it was not the village watchmen only who were declared bound to obey the Darogahs, but all the Zemindary servants, as such: and if the argument be good, that a person who acts as Zemindary [35] servant, and as village Chowkeedar, and holds lands for these services, becomes through the above Regulation a Police officer and servant of the State, for precisely the same reason any other Zemindary servant must be a Police officer and servant of the State, and equally independent of the Zemindar who feeds and employs him, and remunerates him either with land or money. I feel no hesitation in coming to the conclusion, that when the persons here alluded to as village watchmen perform, as in the case before us, the duties of a Zemindary Pyke and of a village Chowkeedar, and hold land rent free, they are not Police officers of the Government, but servants of the Zemindary establishment, and the tenure of the land is a service tenure, that the occupant holds it, in lieu of wages, for services to be performed to the proprietor, and not, as alleged by the Government Pleader, exclusively for services rendered to the State, and for any services he may render to the community of the village; and, I believe, a separate charge may be legally made." And he concluded as follows:—"I have no hesitation in holding that the Chakeran lands, of which it is admitted the present lands form a part, were made over to the Zemindars as a part of their Malguzary lands, and that consequently any one who holds a portion of these lands without paying rents is bound to prove his right to do so. In the present case the Defendant justifies his right to rent-free occupation on the ground that he performs the duties of village Chowkeedar. But he has failed, in my opinion, to show that the lands were bestowed upon his predecessors for such services only; whereas I consider the Appellant has shown good ground to establish the belief that these lands were [36] held exempt from payment of revenue, in consequence of the holder rendering services to the Zemindar in collecting the revenue, and that the exemption was not made in consequence of the protection he is supposed to afford to the village community. For that protection, I believe, as stated by Mr. Brooke, the community are bound to pay in Burdwan as well as in other parts of the country. Hence I am of opinion that, on failure of the services which the Chowkeedar Defendant was bound to render to the Zemindar, and of which the Appellant was most arbitrarily and illegally deprived by the Commissioner of Police, the Appellant is entitled to resume his tenure; and I would reverse the judgment of the lower Court accordingly."

As the value of the subject-matter in dispute was under the prescribed amount, Rs. 10,000, the Appellant petitioned Her Majesty in Council for special leave to appeal against this decree; and, in consideration of the important question at issue, and also that other suits were pending involving the same point, leave to appeal was granted (see case reported on this point, 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 265).

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—This case is of considerable importance, as the decision in this appeal will govern a great many other suits in which the Government of Bengal, Zemindars, Talookdars, and rent-free holders are interested. Our broad proposition is, that the land in question was always an integral portion of the Malguzary land, within the Talook of the Appellant, and held on a service [37] tenure; in respect of which Talook, Government revenue was assessed at the Decennial Settlement, and covered by that Settlement, as Gram Surunjamee, by the predecessors, of the second Respondent, on a personal service tenure to the Talookdar for protection of the Zemindary by performance of certain duties. Raja Lelanund Sing Bahadoor v. The Government of Bengal (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 101). The onus, that the second Respondent was entitled to continue in possession of the land without payment of rent, or rendering service to the Appellant, lay upon the Respondents, who claim the exemption, Maha Raja, Dheeraj Raja Mahatab Chund Bahadoor v. The Bengal Government (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 466). But the Government rested their defence on the allegation that the land was at the time of the Decennial Settlement, Tannahdary Chakeran, or Police service lands, within the meaning of Ben. Reg. I. of 1793, sec. 8, cl. 4, yet the decree of the Sudder Court declared that it was not of that tenure but Zemindary Chakeran, or service land, and the property of the Appellant, as Talookdar, under Ben. Reg. VIII., 1793, sec. 41, and had been so held since the Decennial Settlement, on condition of performing services both to the village community, as village watchmen, and to the Talookdar. If so, and as the land was Zemindary Chakeran, and the second Respondent had failed to perform the conditional personal service to the Talookdar, on which the same was held, the Appellant, having been arbitrarily deprived to those services, ought to have been declared by the decree, under the last-mentioned Regulation, entitled to resume possession [38] of the lands. The Government really had no interest whatever in the matter.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Respondent, the Collector of East Burdwan.—The Appellant failed to make out his case, and he had no right to take possession of the lands in question, such lands having always been appropriated and held as remuneration for services which were wholly or in part Police duties, and not solely personal service to the Zemindar, and if those services were discontinued the Appellant had no right to resume the lands. On account of the nature of the services, no assessment in respect of the jumma of the lands was made at the time of the Decennial Settlement. Upon the nature of the tenure in dispute they referred to the 5th Rep. of Select Com. on the affairs of India, in 1812, pp. 44, 71, 198, 317, 319, 404-6; Wilson's Glos., voce. "Pyke," and "Parik," pp. 388, 591. Harrison's Analysis, p. 513. Ben. Regs. I., 1793, sec. 8, cl. 1; VIII., 1793, secs. 36, 41; XXII., 1793, secs. 1, 13; XII., 1807, sec. 1; XX., 1817, sec. 21.

The consideration of the appeal was reserved: judgment was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (May 5, 1864). The question in this case relates to a small quantity of land, consisting of nineteen beegahs and some cottahs, in the Talook of Gobindopore. This Talook originally formed part of the great Zemindary of Burdwan, [39] and previously to its purchase by the Appellant it had been granted in Putnee by one of the Rajahs of Burdwan. In the year 1852 it was put up to sale by the Collector of the Zillah of East Burdwan, under the provisions of Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1819, in order to realize the amount of arrears of rent due from the then Putneedar. The Appellant became the purchaser, and entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the Talook, and it must be assumed that, as Putneedar, he became entitled to the same rights in the subject-matter of the suit which were enjoyed by the Zemindar.

At this time the lands now in dispute were in the possession of a person named Ahmed Buksh, who paid no rent for them either to the Government or to the Talookdar, but, instead of rent, performed certain services. What was the nature of those services is one of matters now in question. Another is, what is the character of the lands thus held by these services: are they legally appropriated for the performance of these services, or are they lands which are the free and absolute property of the Talookdar, and which he is at liberty to resume and dispose of as he may think fit, either dispensing altogether with the services, or providing from other sources for the performance of these services if he be under any obligation to secure their performance?

On the 11th of January, 1855, the plaint in the present suit was filed, and the Collector of East Burdwan, as representing the Government, was made a Defendant. The plaint insisted that the lands in question were part of the Talook; that the lands were what are called "Mâl Surunjamee" or "Gram Surunjamee" held for the performance of services personal to the [40] Zemindar, and for the protection of his property; that Ahmed Buksh had ceased to perform any Zemindary services: and that the Plaintiff had appointed another person to perform such services, and was entitled to resume possession of the lands.

On the 9th of January, 1856, the Collector of East Burdwan filed his answer, and he thereby insisted, "that the land in question was not Mâl Surunjamee (service land for taking care of the Mâl or Zemindar's property), but Chakeran land for the performance of Police or Chowkeedary duties; that the land being Chowkeedary Chakeran land, the Zemindar has no power to interfere with the property as long as the Policemen carry out their various duties."

The main issue raised between the parties, therefore, was as to the nature of the tenure on which the land was held: the contention on the part of the Appellant being that they were of one description and subject to the performance of no Government services, and the contention of the Respondent that they were of another description and subject to the performance of no services to the Zemindar. Shortly before the Collector put in his answer, the Foujdary Court of East Burdwan had issued an order "that a Perwannah be sent to all the Darogahs of this jurisdiction, that the Chowkeedars under their control be instructed not to attend to Zemindary duties."

It appears that these Zemindars were entrusted, previously to the British possession of India, as well with the defence of the Territory against foreign enemies, as with the administration of law and the maintenance of peace and order within their district; that for this purpose they were accustomed to employ not only armed retainers to guard against [41] hostile inroads, but also a large force of Tannahdars, or a general Police force, and other officers in great numbers, under the name of Chowkeedars, Pykes, and other descriptions, as well for the maintenance of order in particular villages and districts as for the protection of the property of the Zemindar, the collection of his revenue, and other services personal to the Zemindar.

All these different officers were at that time the servants of the Zemindar, appointed by him and removable by him, and they were remunerated in many cases by the enjoyment of land rent free or at a low rent in consideration of their services.

The lands so enjoyed were called Chakeran or service lands. These lands were of great extent in Bengal at the time of the Decennial Settlement, and the effect of that Settlement was to divide them into two classes:—

First, Tannahdary lands, which, by Ben. Reg. I. of 1793, sec. 8, cl. 4, were made resumable by the Government; the Government taking upon itself the maintenance of the general Police force and relieving the Zemindar from that expense.

Second, All other Chakeran lands, which by Ben. Reg. VIII. of 1793, sec. 41, were, whether held by public officers or private servants, in lieu of wages, to be annexed to the Malguzary lands, and declared responsible for the public revenue assessed on the Zemindars' independent Talooks or other estates, in which they were included in common with all other Malguzary lands therein.

It is clear upon the evidence, and in fact was not disputed at the Bar, that the lands in question are Chakeran lands of the second class, and it follows [42] that, if resumable at all, they are resumable by the Appellant; and secondly, that if the services on which they are held are Police services at all, they are the services of Chowkeedars, or village watchmen.

The Zemindar had an interest in the performance of the duties of the village watchmen, inasmuch as they protected his property; but the public also had a great interest in their maintenance, and in the peace and good order which they were employed to preserve, and the Government, as representing the public, reserved therefore a strict control over them.

Accordingly, various Regulations were passed for the purpose of enabling the Government to effect this object. Registers were required to be kept of the different persons filling these offices in each Zemindary, with a statement of the funds allotted for their support. The officers themselves were made subject to the orders of the Darogah, or Superintendent of the Police of the District. The Zemindar was required to remove them on complaint of their misconduct by the Darogah, and, finally, they were made removable by the Magistrate on sufficient cause. But we can find nothing in these Regulations which takes from the Zemindar the right of nomination of these officers, or which deprives him of the power of himself removing them and appointing other fit persons in their stead, and nothing which deprives him of the right of requiring from the Chowkeedar such services as he was bound by law or usage to render to the Zemindar. It might well happen that, either by long usage or by the original contract, when the lands were granted, the village watchman might become liable, in addition to his Police duties, to the performance of other services personal to the Zemindar, as [43] the collection of his revenue and the like. Indeed, the rules laid down for the Decennial Settlement appear to us to recognize the interests both of the Zemindars and the public in lands of this description. They were not to be included in the Malguzary lands for the purpose of increasing the jumma, because the Zemindars had not the full benefit of them; but they were to be included in the Malguzary lands for the purpose of securing the assessment, because in the event of a sale upon default of payment of the assessment, it would be important that they should be transferred to the purchasers under the Government, with whom the appointment of the person whose duty would in part be to attend to public interests would vest.

Such being in our opinion the general law, let us look at the facts of this particular case. It is found by the Zillah Judge (see ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 28) that the duties performed by the persons in possession of these lands, both before and since the Decennial Settlement, have been partly Police and partly Zemindary, as follows:—Zemindary: First (personal to the Zemindary). To collect or enforce collection of rents; to guard Mofussil treasures, and perhaps to escort Mofussil treasures. Second (common to the village community). To keep watch at night, and to secure the harvests. Police: To maintain the peace; to apprehend offenders under the orders of the Tannahdar; to report criminal occurrences; to convey public money to the Sudder Treasury (this duty has ceased since the Decennial Settlement); to serve as guides to travellers. The Judge adds:—"I may add that it is notorious, and in my certain knowledge, that most of [44] these duties are at this time performed by the village watchmen in Burdwan."

From this finding their Lordships see no reason to dissent.

But it may well be that although these lands have been held by the predecessors of the Defendant, Ahmed Buksh, and were held by him as Chowkeedar, liable to perform services to the public as well as to the Zemindar, yet that there has been no legal appropriation of the land for that purpose, and that the Appellant may be entitled to recover the land, though he may be under an obligation to provide for the performance of such services as a Chowkeedar is liable to perform for the public.

The evidence appears to stand thus:—

At the time of the Decennial Settlement, though these lands were included in the Zemindary, their annual value does not seem to have been taken into account in fixing the jumma. This is consistent at least with the hypothesis that they were then appropriated to the payment of some officers whom it would be necessary for the Zemindar, either for his own or for the public interest, to maintain. We find that in 1813, the particular lands in question were in this Talook held by Srishteedur, who is described as Tannahdar, and they appear ever since to have been held by persons succeeding him in the same character. They were not held as Tannahdary lands in the strict sense of the expression—lands of that description had already been resumed by the Government—but as Chowkeedary lands: lands appropriated to the maintenance of an officer who performed, and was liable to perform, duties as a village watchman. We think that these circum-[45]-stances are sufficient to warrant the inference that the lands in question were at the time of the Decennial Settlement appropriated, and still are liable, to the maintenance of such an officer, and that the Talookdar has no right to take possession of them for his own purposes, and hold them, discharged of the obligation to which they are subject.

On the other hand, it is established by the evidence that the Chowkeedars in this district have always been accustomed to perform services personally to the Zemindar as well as to the Police. This is distinctly stated to be the fact by Mr. Skipwith, the officiating Collector in 1837, and by the Judge of the Zillah Court in the present case, and it is admitted by the Government. We think, therefore, the order of the Foujdary Court in December, 1855, forbidding the performance of Zemindary services by the Chowkeedar, was without any warrant in law.

Cases of this description must, as it seems to us, depend mainly if not wholly for their decision upon the question, what was the tenure or character of the lands at the time of the Decennial Settlement, and how they were dealt with in that Settlement.

In this case the result, in our opinion, is, that both parties have insisted on more than they were entitled to. One side has contended that the holder of these lands is liable to the performance of none but Zemindary duties; the other, that he is liable to the performance of none but Police duties.

Under these circumstances, we feel considerable difficulty as to the course which we ought to take. If we advise the affirmance of the judgment, we may seem to countenance the opinion that the Government has the right to take possession of these [46] lands, and to appoint a person to perform, as Chowkeedar, general Police duties, to the exclusion of duties to the Talook and the Talookdar: and this is very far from being our opinion.

On the other hand, we think that we cannot advise the reversal of the judgment, having regard to the form of the pleadings, without maintaining the position assumed by the Appellant, that these are Gram Surunjamee lands, not liable to the performance of any but personal services to the Appellant ; and from this opinion also we dissent.

The state of the pleadings prevents us from reaching the real merits of the case. It is not for us to say how these merits may best be reached. It may be that the Appellant having appointed a fit person to discharge the duties of village watchman, and to perform the duties personal to himself, may be entitled to recover the land for the purpose of its being held by the person so appointed, or it may be that the person so appointed may himself be entitled to recover the land. On these points we give no opinion. But on the whole, having regard to the Appellant being Plaintiff in the suit, and having failed to make out the case which he set up, we think that we shall best discharge our duty by humbly advising Her Majesty to affirm the judgment complained of, but without giving any costs, and to declare that the lands in question are to be considered as appropriated to the maintenance of a Chowkeedar or village watchman in this Talook, and that the right of appointing such officer belongs to the Talookdar, and that such officer is liable to the performance of such services to the Talookdar as, by usage in the Zemindary of Burdwan, Chowkeedars have been [47] accustomed to render to the Zemindar, and to declare that the affirmance of the judgment is to be without prejudice to any (if any) other suit which the Appellant may think fit to institute in respect to the matters in dispute in this cause.

THE ZEMINDAR OF RAMNAD,—Appellant; THE ZEMINDAR OF YETTIAPooram,—Respondent* [June 27, 28, 1864.]

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

Disputes respecting the boundaries of the Zemindaries of Yettiapooram and Ramnad, in the District of Madura, having led to acts of violence by the Ryots, the Government, in the year 1836, to preserve the public peace, attached the disputed lands and took possession for the benefit of the party to whom the lands should be judicially awarded. At and before the time of the Government taking such possession, the Zemindar of Yettiapooram was in possession of certain lands adjacent to and taken as a part of the lands in dispute. The lands remained under attachment by Government for a period of nearly twenty years ; no steps having been taken regarding them till the year 1855, when the Zemindar of Yettiapooram brought a suit against the Collector of Madura and the Zemindar of Ramnad, to recover possession of the land so formerly occupied by him, and for the mesne profits thereof while in the possession of the Government. Although no clear title in this suit was proved by either Zemindar, it was held by the Courts in India and affirmed on appeal by the Judicial Committee, that the fact of possession of the lands by the Zemindar of Yettiapooram before and at the time of the attachment by the Government was, in the circumstances, evidence of title, and the Government was ordered to restore the lands to him.

In this appeal the question was one of boundary, involving an issue whether certain lands which had been taken possession of by the Collector of Madura, to await a judicial decision upon the title thereto, the subject of the suit, belonged to the Zemindary of [48] Ramnad, or to the Zemindary of Yettiapooram. Disputes respecting the boundaries of these Zemindaries, and suits respecting it, had taken place between the Zemindars anterior to the institution of the present suit.

The circumstances of the case were these:—

The Zemindary of Yettiappooram, in the district of Tinnevely, was bounded on the north and east by the Zemindary of Ramanad, in the district of Madura. The village of Budalapuram, and another village in Yettiappooram upon the north, join the village of Paralachi, in Ramanad; and the village of Mavaliodai, and two other villages in Yettiappooram upon the east, join the village of Perunali, in Ramanad. The lands in question in this appeal were the northern lands alleged by the Respondent as belonging to Yettiappooram, in the village of Budalapuram, adjoining the village of Paralachi, in Ramanad. Prior to the year 1819, such lands in question, which were mostly uncultivated, were in the possession of the Zemindar of Yettiappooram, and portions thereof were from time to time brought into cultivation by the Ryots of Budalapuram, and cultivated by them as being within the limits of that village. In that year a representation was made to the Collector of Madura by the Tahsildar of Ramanad, to the effect that the Ryots of Budalapuram had encroached upon lands to the extent of 550 Kuruhams attached [49] to the village of Paralachi, and were proceeding to cultivate them; and upon that representation being communicated by the Collector of Madura to the Collector of Tinnevely, the last-mentioned Collector, on the 26th of January, 1819, issued orders to the Zemindar of Yettiappooram, directing him to investigate the matter and to submit a report thereon. An investigation was accordingly made, and the result of the inquiry was that the lands in question in this appeal remained in the possession and enjoyment of the Zemindar of Yettiappooram. It appeared that the Ryots of Budalapuram proceeded to bring into cultivation divers waste portions of the lands in question, and in the month of January, 1825, a complaint was made to the Collector of Madura, by the Ameen of Talook Kamudai, the Talook of Ramanad, in which the village of Paralachi is situated; that the Zemindar of Yettiappooram had encroached upon 2000 kurukhams of land attached to Paralachi; and upon such complaint being made known to the Collector of Tinnevely, he deputed a native Officer attached to his collectorate to proceed to the spot, and hold an inquiry into the matter, and ordered the Zemindar of Yettiappooram to send an authorized Vakeel to give evidence and information before such native officer. Orders were given to the people of the Zemindary of Ramanad to be present upon the spot on the day of the inquiry. The native officer deputed to hold the inquiry arrived at the village of Budalapuram on the 30th of March, 1825, and on the following morning, in company with the Vakeel of the Zemindar of Yettiappooram, proceeded to the lands which were the subject of the complaint. No person connected with the Zemindary of Ramanad attended, and, [50] after investigation, a report was made by the Officer, that the lands within the boundaries specified were under the enjoyment of the Zemindar of Yettiappooram.

In the year 1829, Ramasami Setupati, the Zemindar of Ramanad, the late husband of the Appellant, preferred another complaint to the Collector of Madura, against the Zemindar of Yettiappooram, stating that the inhabitants of Budalapuram had encroached upon 3000 kurukhams of land lying within the limits of Paralachi, and also that the inhabitants of Mavaliodai had encroached upon 4000 kurukhams lying within the limits of Perunali.

It appeared that arrangements were made by the Collector of Madura for the settlement of the disputes between the villagers of Mavaliodai and Perunali, and with respect to the lands in dispute within the villages of Budalapuram and Paralachi which were alone in question in this appeal, and that the Collector of Madura had sent a letter to the Zemindar of Ramanad, stating that arbitrators had been named by the Zemindar of Yettiappooram, who would be upon the lands in dispute on a certain day, and directing the Zemindar of Ramanad to name arbitrators who should attend on his behalf on that day; but he neglected to send such arbitrators, consequently no final settlement was effected.

In the year 1834, proceedings were had with respect to the lands in dispute between the villages of Mavaliodai and Perunali, and such proceedings resulted in an award being made by Mr. Blackburne, the Collector of Madura, on the 23rd of August, 1834, which awarded the lands to the extent of 1016 kurukhams to belong to the Zemindary of Ramnad, and, in accordance with [51] such award, boundary stones were fixed between the eastern side of the Zemindary of Yettiapooram and the Zemindary of Ramnad. The Zemindar of Yettiapooram was dissatisfied with Mr. Blackburne's award, and after divers proceedings in the Courts in India, was successful in getting the same set aside by a decree of the Sudder Court. That decree, however, was reversed upon appeal by the Judicial Committee, who made an order maintaining the award (see Case reported, 7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 441).

Shortly after the award of 1834, in favour of the Zemindar of Ramnad, the claim to the lands in question, which were not affected by such award, was again set up, and the disputes between the Ryots of the villages of Budalapuram and Paralachi assumed so formidable a character that steps were taken at the end of the year 1835, with a view to the attachment of the lands by the Government, and in the month of January, 1836, the Collector of Madura, under instructions from the Board of Revenue, attached and entered into possession of the lands, in order that the public peace might be preserved.

At the time of the attachment by the Collector, the Zemindar of Yettiapooram was, as he had been before, in the possession of the lands in question. The lands remained under attachment for a period of about twenty years prior to the institution of the suit in which this appeal was brought, and the rents were paid into the Collector's treasury.

On the 5th of March, 1855, Jagaveera Rama Venkataswara, the then Zemindar of Yettiapooram, and the father of the Respondent, filed his plaint in the Civil Court of Madura against the Collector of Madura, and the Appellant, the widow of Ramasami [52] Setupati, deceased, whereby, after stating the boundaries of the lands and generally to the effect that the same belonged to the Zemindary of Yettiapooram, and that his possession thereof had been interfered with, the Plaintiff prayed that the Court would put the lands in his possession, and recover for him from the defendants the amount of tirva of the lands collected during the twenty years of attachment.

The Collector, by his answer, stated that the surplus profits of the lands claimed, after deducting necessary expenses, amounted to Rs. 6096. 8. 2., and that he was ready to pay that amount, and to give up the lands to the party in whose favour the Court might give judgment; and it was submitted that, as the attachment was made solely in order to preserve the public peace, one of the Zemindars ought to pay his costs of the suit.

The answer of the Appellant, in substance, was, that the lands did not appertain to the Plaintiff's Zemindary, nor were they enjoyed by him; that the lands were in the Appellant's enjoyment, as could be proved by evidence; that the lands were marked off from the Plaintiff's Zemindary by Uranis (tanks), dug as boundary marks by the people of Ramnad; that the disturbances were caused by the Plaintiff, who, in the year 1819, and again in 1832, neglected to send arbitrators to the lands in dispute. That, amongst other documents, to show that the lands appertained to Paralachi, there were particulars of an attachment by the Court, and also a Bill of sale at auction of certain of the lands as part of that village.

The Plaintiff in his reply, so far as respected the answer of the Appellant, pleaded, that the lands sued for did not appertain to Paralachi, and that they were [53] never enjoyed by the Zemindar of Ramnad, but were in the enjoyment of the Zemindar of Yettiapooram up to the time of the attachment; that the Uranis were not dug by the Zemindar of Ramnad as boundary marks; that the disturbances were caused by the Zemindar of Ramnad, and that it was the fault of that Zemindar that the dispute had not been settled by arbitration; and denied that the particulars of the attachment and the Bill of sale, upon which reliance was placed in the Respondent's answer, were of use in support of his case.

The following points for proof were recorded by the Judge of the Civil Court of Madura. The Plaintiff to prove his right to the lands mentioned in the plaint, and his enjoyment thereof, either at the time of their attachment by the Government in 1835, or for any period immediately preceding it. The second Defendant to prove her right to the lands mentioned in the plaint, and her enjoyment thereof, either at the time of their attachment by the Government in 1835, or for any period immediately preceding it. The first Defendant (the Collector) to prove that he is bound to make good to the party obtaining a favourable judgment the balance of the mesne profits collected during the time of the Circar attachment, and no further sum.

The Plaintiff's case was established by the production of attested copies of documents in the records of the Collectors of Madura and Tinnevely, which comprised the communications and documents relating to the disputes in the years 1819, 1825, and 1829, hereinbefore referred to, and also a copy of a Panchayat decree, dated the 24th of May, 1784, [54] awarding the lands within the disputed boundaries to the Zemindar of Yettiapooram. The Appellant tendered, among other documentary evidence, divers Cadjan measurement and other accounts alleged to relate to the lands in question, but they were rejected by the Civil Court as being unauthenticated, and there being no proof as to their genuineness.

Several witnesses were examined, and a plan showing the lands in question, and also the lands on the eastern side of Yettiapooram, which were awarded to the Zemindar of Ramnad by Mr. Blackburne, in 1834, and marked off by boundary stones placed by him, as hereinbefore mentioned, was called for by the Civil Court. From an inspection of that plan it appeared that the boundary stones were so placed as to mark off the eastern lands awarded to Ramnad from the lands in question which belonged to Yettiapooram.

On the 30th of July, 1860, the suit came on for final hearing before Mr. R. R. Cotton, the Judge of the Civil Court, and that Court made the following decree:— "That the first Defendant (the Collector) do make over to the Plaintiff the land in dispute and under attachment, together with the net revenues of the same, in deposit, from the time it was taken possession of by the Government to the present date; and that the second Defendant (the Appellant), as the admitted originator of the attachment and consequent cause of this action, do pay her own and first Defendant's costs, as well as those of Plaintiff, on the amount decreed." In giving judgment, the Civil Court stated that, in addition to the documents tendered as evidence by the Plaintiff and [55] the second Defendant, which were rejected, as hereinbefore stated, the Court discarded the whole of the oral testimony as most unsatisfactory and unworthy of any reliance being placed upon it. The judgment mainly proceeded upon the fact of the possession and enjoyment by the Zemindar of Yettiapooram of the lands in question up to the attachment by Government, as established by the Plaintiff's exhibits, and upon the fact that, although there had been disputes about the lands between the Zemindar of Ramnad and the Zemindar of Yettiapooram in the year 1819 and subsequent years, the Zemindar of Ramnad had always shrunk from an investigation into the alleged title; and the Court stated as their opinion, that the second Defendant (the Appellant) had entirely failed to establish the fact of her having any legal title to the lands in question.

An appeal against this decree was made to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras, and on the 15th of July, 1861, that Court, consisting of Messrs. H. D. Phillips and H. Frere, pronounced a decree affirming the decree of the Civil Court, and dismissing appeal with costs.

The present appeal was brought from this decree of affirmance.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Pontifex, appeared for the Appellant; and The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Respondent.

For the Appellant it was contended, first, that his claim to the land was sufficiently established, and that the Respondent had not proved his title; secondly, [56] that as evidence adduced by him had been improperly rejected by the Court below, the case ought to be sent back to India for further inquiry, as it would be a denial of justice to uphold the Sudder Court's decree in such circumstances.

On the part of the Respondent it was insisted, that the lands for many years prior to the attachment by Government had been in possession of the Zemindar of Yettiapooram, and that the case presented to the Court below was such as to afford a strong presumption of title in the Respondent, who was entitled to be reinstated in the possession of the lands, as the Appellant had utterly failed in making out any right or title of himself, or any preceding Zemindar, to the lands, and that all that he had done for years was simply to object to the Respondent's possession; and it was submitted that, even assuming that neither of the parties had shown a good title, yet that the Respondent, as being the occupier of the land at the time of the Government attachment, was to be presumed the owner, and entitled to possession.

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown.—This suit was instituted for the purpose of establishing the right of the Plaintiff to certain lands which he said belonged to his Zemindary of Yettiapooram. The result of it was, that neither the Plaintiff nor the Defendant could make out any clear title, and the Plaintiff was only able to establish that he had had possession of the property at the time of, and prior to, the attachment by the Government. Under these circumstances, the Civil Judge thought that the best course to be adopted was to restore possession of [57] the lands to those from whom it had originally been taken.

It was an uncultivated district, lying between the Zemindaries of Yattiapooram and Ramnad; and it would seem that in the year 1819, the Ramnad Zemindar complained that, although the land in question belonged to her village of Paralachi, it had been encroached upon by the Ryots of Budalapuram, a village belonging to Yettiapuram, to the extent of 550 kurukhams. An inquiry was ordered by the Collector of Madura, the result of which appears to have shown that the Ryots were only doing that which they had always been accustomed to do.

No further steps were taken, and the party complaining seems to have been satisfied that there was no sufficient case, and the lands in question continued to remain in the possession and enjoyment of the Zemindar of Yettiapuram. In the year 1825 another complaint was made to the Collector of Madura, by the Zemindar of Ramnad, of another encroachment upon land belonging to the village of Paralachi. An officer was deputed to make inquiries. He proceeded to the village of Budalapuram, and commenced an investigation. Notice was given of the purpose for which he had arrived, but no one attended on behalf of the Zemindary of Ramnad; so that the Officer was obliged to go away without hearing anybody in support of the complaint.

There is no reason to doubt that at this period the lands were occupied by the Zemindar of Yettiapuram. In 1829, a complaint was again made by the Zemindar of Ramnad of encroachments on his territory, and again, although he received due notice, he neglected to proceed with his complaint. Then, [58] in the year 1834, proceedings were had with reference to the eastern lands, and the Zemindar of Ramnad appears to have abandoned all claims to the northern lands. Mr. Blackburne then makes his award in favour of the Zemindar of Ramnad, and the Zemindar of Ramnad on this revives the dispute as to the northern land, and thereupon the lands were attached by the Government in 1836, and have since remained in their hands. These facts, in our opinion, go to show that in 1836, at the time when the lands were attached by the Government, and long prior thereto, the lands in dispute were in the possession of the Zemindar of Yettiapooram. We think that the title of the Respondent must be preferred, and their Lordships will, therefore, advise Her Majesty to dismiss this appeal with costs.

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Upon special application, permission to appeal was granted in December, 1860, upon condition of the Appellant depositing with the Registrar of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the sum of £300, for costs. The record was transmitted from India and the Respondent brought in his printed case, but the Appellant, though served with a peremptory notice, did not lodge his case or take any other step in the matter. In such circumstances, on application by the Respondent, the appeal was dismissed, and the Respondent's costs directed to be paid out of the sum deposited in the Council office, the balance to be returned to the Appellant.

In this case leave to appeal had been granted by the Judicial Committee in December, 1860, upon the terms of the Appellant giving security in the sum of £300, for the costs, in case the appeal should be dismissed. This sum was deposited with the Registrar of the Privy Council, and the transcript of the record transmitted from India. The Respondent lodged his printed case; but the Appellant, although served with peremptory notice to lodge his case, took no step to bring the appeal to a hearing.

In these circumstances,

Mr. Cave, for the Respondent, moved to dismiss the appeal, and for payment of [60] the Respondent's costs out of the £300, deposited with the Registrar of the Privy Council; and

Their Lordships made an Order in those terms, directing the residue of the sum, after payment of the Respondent's costs, to be paid over to the Appellant.

The Respondent's costs were taxed, and the residue of the £300, paid to the Appellant's Solicitor.

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

In the district of Ganjam, situate in a remote part of the Presidency of Madras, the administration of justice is by the Act of the Legislative Council of India, No. XXIV. of 1839, vested in an Officer called "The Agent of the Governor of Madras," who exercises both judicial and revenue authority, within the district. The Court there established is not subject to the Madras Regulations applicable to the ordinary Tribunals. In these circumstances, it was held, that it was not to be expected that the proceedings before such a Court should be conducted with all the attention to technical rules observed in the regular Courts in Madras, and, therefore, that it was sufficient if the proceedings had been such, in point of form, as to enable each party fairly to bring forward and establish his case, and the decision of the Agent consistent with law and justice [16 Moo. Ind. App. 63].

A Razinamah to compromise a suit, and a Bond, arising out of the same transaction, recognizing a right in one-fourth of a Talook, declared null and void, as having been obtained by fraud and intimidation by the Manager of the Agent's Court at Ganjam, who used his official character, as a pressure upon a Zemindar in difficulties in that district, to effect from him the execution of such instruments.

These appeals were brought from two judgments of the Sudder Dewanny Court at Madras, which [61] confirmed two previous decrees made by the Agent of the Governor of Madras at Ganjam in the Presidency of Madras, in suits instituted before that Agent.

The first suit was brought by the Appellant against the Respondent and one Sree

Ramachandra Manasing Santa, since deceased, in which he claimed under a Bond, one fourth part of the Talook of Aragada, belonging to the Respondent, with mesne profits. This suit was dismissed on the ground that the instrument under which the Appellant claimed was obtained by intimidation exercised by means of his official position, as chief manager of the Agent's Court at Ganjam, from the Respondent under pressure and without consideration; which decree was confirmed on appeal by the Sudder Court at Madras. The second suit, instituted by the Respondent against the Appellant, sought to set aside and cancel a Razinamah, or compromise of a suit between the Appellant and Respondent. By the decree of the Agent of the Governor at Ganjam the Razinamah was, in the circumstances, declared null and void, and such decree was upon appeal affirmed by the Sudder Court.

When the transactions in question arose, the relations of the parties stood thus:—The Appellant was [62] the chief manager of the Agent's Court at Ganjam. The Respondent was a person in high position, the Zemindar of the Talook of Kallikota and Aragada, residing within the jurisdiction of the Agent's Court.

The administration of justice in Ganjam, a District situate in a wild and remote part of the Presidency of Madras, is, under the Act of the Legislature of India, No. XXIV. of 1839, vested in an officer called "The Agent of the Governor of Madras," before whom the suits out of which these appeals arose were brought.

The evidence with respect to the execution of the above-mentioned instruments, and the questions raised by the appeals, are sufficiently stated in their Lordships' judgment.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. F. J. C. Millar, appeared for the Appellant in both appeals; and Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. A. S. Ayrton, for the Respondent.

Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (July 23, 1864).—These appeals arose out of certain transactions which have taken place between the Appellant and the Respondent, in the District of Ganjam, within the Presidency of Madras.

Ganjam is situate in a remote and wild part of that Province, and is governed by an Officer called the Agent of the Governor of Madras, who appears to exercise both judicial and revenue authority within the district.

[63] The Courts of Justice there are not subject to the rules prescribed by the Government Regulations for the guidance of the Tribunals in more settled and civilized parts of the country; and, under such circumstances, it is not to be required or expected that the proceedings should be conducted with all the attention to technical rules which might be reasonably demanded from Courts differently constituted. It is sufficient if the proceedings have been such, in point of form, as to enable each party fairly to bring forward and establish his case, and if the decision appears to be consistent with law and justice.

In the year 1855, the Appellant was the chief manager of the Agent's Court at Ganjam. His brother held the office of Moonshee to one of the assistant Agents.

The Respondent is a Zemindar of wealth and considerable position within the District. He seems at this time to have been a very young man, and to have been acting in the management of his affairs under the advice of his uncle, Sree Ramachunder Manasing, who lived with him in his palace.

The questions in these two appeals are, whether certain instruments executed by the Respondent in favour of the Appellant were obtained from him fairly, or were the result of fraud and intimidation practised on him by the Appellant.

The facts appear to be these:—

In the year 1854, the Respondent purchased at a public auction the Talook of Aragada. The property was put up for sale by the Government in consequence of the failure of the former Talookdar to make payment of the revenue due from him.

[64] The purchase-money paid by the Respondent was Rs. 1,51,000.

In 1855, it was agreed between the Appellant and the Respondent that the Appellant should become the Manager of this Talook on behalf of the Respondent. The Appellant alleges, that the offer was made to him by the Respondent and that he accepted it, and gave up his situation under the Government in order to take this office, but that when in the year 1856, he came to take possession of it, the Respondent refused to appoint him; and for this breach of his agreement the Appellant demanded compensation.

The Respondent alleges, that the offer to become Manager of the Talook came from the Appellant, who represented that he was not willing to continue in the service of the Agent: that he, the Respondent, accepted the offer, but afterwards declined to employ the Appellant, upon two grounds: first, because he did not come to undertake the duties of his office until, in consequence of his delay, the Respondent had been obliged to engage another manager; and, secondly, because he had discovered that the Appellant had given up his office under the Government, not for the purpose of entering upon the management of the Talook, but from apprehension that he would be turned out of his place under the Government for misconduct and corruption as soon as his principal, who had been for some time absent from his office, should return to it.

In order to recover damages from the Respondent for his alleged breach of contract, the Appellant instituted a suit against him in the Civil Court of [65] Ganjam, in the month of August, 1857, to which the Defendant put in a plea denying all claim on the part of the Appellant.

Nothing further appears to have been done in this suit, which in the present record is termed suit No. 29 of 1857.

In a few months afterwards, in April, 1858, the Respondent and his uncle were accused of having ill-used a native called Mudhava Dalai, and on this charge they were both arrested and placed in custody.

On the 18th of May, 1858, while they were thus in custody, the Respondent executed two instruments, the validity of which is the subject of the present dispute.

The one related to the settlement of the suit, No. 29 of 1857, and professed to be a compromise of that suit. It is termed a Razinamah, and is in the form of a memorial presented to the Court in the suit by the Defendant, and assented to by the Plaintiff in these terms:—"The Defendant begs to represent that as the Plaintiff in this suit had entered into an amicable settlement, I agreed to pay him, in eight days from the date hereof, Rs. 5441 $\frac{3}{4}$, made up of Rs. 3790, the amount claimed; of Rs. 1380, for nine months and six days from the date of the plaint, etc., the 13th August, 1857, to the present date, at Rs. 150 a month; and of Rs. 271 $\frac{3}{4}$, the value of the stamp for the plaint and other costs. Further, under the conditions entered into by me, to continue paying to the Plaintiff for his life, at Rs. 150 a month, in consequence of my having effected his removal from the office of Manager of the Agent's Court, I agree to pay to the Plaintiff for his life, on or before the 19th of every consecutive month, Rs. 150 a month, from the 19th instant, with-[66]-out regard to the service held by the Plaintiff or any business carried on by him. In the event of my not paying the same the Court is at liberty to collect the amount by enforcing this Razinamah, and pay it to the Plaintiff. Further, I have undertaken to pay my own costs. I, therefore, request the Court will be pleased to hold diary proceedings accepting this Razinamah, and directing the payment of Rs. 5441 $\frac{3}{4}$, being the plaint amount and others aforementioned, and of Rs. 150 a-month, by me to the Plaintiff for his life. The Plaintiff begs to say that as I have agreed to the conditions above-mentioned, I request the Court will enforce the same.—18th of May, 1858."

The other instrument is called an "Instalment Bond," and is in these words:—"Instalment Bond executive by Sri Sri Sri Narayana Mardaraz Devu, Zemindar of the Talooks of Kallikota and Aragada, to Pakala Balakrishna Patula, on the 18th of May, 1858. Having sold to you for Rs. 42,000, one-fourth share of the Talook of Aragada, which I have purchased in auction, and received from you the sum of Rs. 23,125, out of the said purchase-money, both of us now enter into the following settlement, i.e. that the sale of the one-fourth share in question should be cancelled. That on this condition I should pay you Rs. 29,000, according to the instalments hereunder specified, and obtain receipts from you. And that in the event of my paying the money without failure of instalments, and taking receipts from you, neither you, nor your heirs, should ever and on any ground claim the portion of the Talook from me or my heirs. I shall, therefore, pay you the said amount accordingly and take back this document. If I fail to pay [67] the money according to the instalments, I shall receive from you the balance of the sale amount, get the subdivision of the Talook registered, and deliver it over to you with the past produce. Thus I have of my free will and consent executed this instalment Bond.

" Amount to be paid in eight days from the date hereof is . . .	Rs. 18,000
Ditto to be paid in six months from the date hereof is . . .	Rs. 11,000
	<hr/> Rs. 29,000 "

A third instrument was executed, which was an acknowledgment by the Respondent of the terms contained in the papers already stated, and an engagement to abide by them on his part, and was as follows:—" Nadava Sunnud (Deed of acquittance) executed by Pakala Balakrishna Patrulu to Sri Sri Sri Narayana Mardaraz Devu, Zemindar of the Talooks of Kallikota and Aragada, on the 18th of May, 1858. As you have sold to me, for Rs. 12,000, one fourth share of the Talook of Aragada, which you have purchased in auction, and received from me the sum of Rs. 23,125, out of the purchase-money, I have this day, as desired by you, become friend to you, and entered into the following settlement, i.e. that the sale of the one-fourth share in question should be cancelled. That you should pay me Rs. 29,000, according to the instalments hereunder specified. That on payment to me of the money according to the instalments, and obtaining receipts from me, I should forego my right to the said one-fourth share; and that with respect to my allowance, provision having been made in the Razinamah, filed in suit, No. 29 of 1857, [68] I should have no other claim against you. Having acceded to these conditions, I have executed this deed of acquittance. On payment of Rs. 29,000, according to the instalments fixed, I shall return to you the instalment Bond you have this day executed to me, and neither myself nor my heirs shall for ever, and on any ground, claim from you or your heirs for the said one-fourth share. Thus I have executed this deed of acquittance of my free will and consent.

" Amount to be paid in eight days from the date hereof is . . .	Rs. 18,000
Ditto to be paid in six months from the date hereof is . . .	Rs. 11,000
	<hr/> Rs. 29,000 "

It will be seen that by the instalment Bond a sum of Rs. 18,000, was to be paid in eight days from the date thereof. This would be on the 26th of May. On that day the Appellant and his uncle were discharged out of custody on depositing Rs. 1000, and entering into an engagement to appear in person to answer the charges against them when required by the Government. Fourteen days afterwards the Rs. 18,000, were paid by the Respondent to the Appellant. It is fit to observe that there is no direct evidence to connect the discharge of the prisoners with the execution of these instruments and the payment of this money, but the coincidence is certainly remarkable, and considering the situation which had been held by the Respondent and the situation which was still held by his brother, it is difficult to believe that the release of the prisoners was entirely unconnected with the transactions which had then taken place, or that the [69] Appellant had not something to do with their discharge. There seems to have been no reason why, if the accused parties were entitled to be discharged on their own recognizances on the 26th of May, they should not have been equally entitled to be released on bail when the charge was first made against them, instead of being exposed to the inconvenience, and, what they seem to have felt much more, the degradation and outrage on their personal dignity consequent upon their arrest and imprisonment.

These instruments were of a character in themselves to excite suspicion, particularly when executed by a person who at the time was under duress.

The suit, which was compromised by the Razinamah, had not been prosecuted. If the facts alleged by the Respondent were true, he had a complete answer to the demand. He had up to this time denied all liability to the Appellant, and yet by this document he submitted to all the demands of the Appellant in this suit, and engaged to make payments and incur obligations to the Appellant far beyond anything which any Court of Justice could have awarded to him if he had established all his allegations.

When this Razinamah was presented to Mr. Thornhill, the Principal Assistant Agent for registration, he seems to have been so much struck by its extreme improvidence that he ordered the head of the police in Ganjam to see the Respondent, and learn from him whether it really was his spontaneous act. This was on the 19th of May, and notwithstanding a certificate from the police officer that he had seen the Appellant, who acknowledged that he had acted from his own free will, Mr. Thornhill required the [70] personal attendance of the Appellant. The Appellant accordingly, after some remonstrance, attended, and was examined, and after this the Razinamah was allowed to be filed, and the Rs. 5441½ mentioned in it were paid, but Mr. Thornhill seems still to have been far from satisfied, for the order for registration was in these terms:—"22nd June, 1858.—The Zemindar having personally appeared before me and assured me that he agrees to these terms, this Razinamah may be filed; but the settlement as to the filing of this Razinamah being very dubious, it cannot burden the estate with this allowance after the death of the Zemindar."

The effect of these acts of recognition we will consider when we have dealt with the case as to the instalment Bond.

With regard to the instalment Bond, it seems that the Respondent refused or neglected to pay the instalment of Rs. 11,000, which, by the conditions of that instrument, were due on the 18th of November, 1858. On the 13th of January, 1859, the Appellant filed a plaint, dated the 18th of November, 1858, against the Respondent, joining his uncle as a Defendant, on the ground that he was aiding and abetting the Respondent. The plaint stated the effect of the instalment Bond, and insisted that the Respondent had forfeited his right to repurchase the quarter share of the Talook, by reason of his neglect to pay the second instalment on the day, and he prayed to have a conveyance of the quarter share, together with mesne profits from the year 1855.

It is obvious that the Appellant's title to this relief depended entirely upon the truth of the facts which are recited in the Bond. If there had been such a [71] purchase of the quarter share as is therein stated, and such a payment as was therein alleged to have been made of part of the purchase-money, there was nothing unreasonable in the subsequent agreement. It amounted only to this, that the Appellant consented to give up his purchase on the condition of receiving a certain premium for doing so, with a right to retain his purchase if the conditions of the Bond were not performed.

His right, therefore, in this suit rested entirely on the first agreement, and not on the second. The instalment Bond was, in truth, according to the Respondent's construction, at an end. The Appellant insisted that, by the failure of the Respondent to perform its conditions, he, the Appellant, was remitted to his original rights. The matter for him to prove, therefore, was the first contract.

Now, the Respondent by his defences asserted, that the recital in the instalment Bond was a pure fiction, and that there had been no such sale by the Respondent, and no such payment by the Appellant, as were stated in the Bond, and he insisted that if there had been any such sale, a Bill of sale must have been executed on stamp paper, and that the Plaintiff should prove that a proper stamp had been purchased. Likewise, that if the Plaintiff had paid Rs. 23,000, he would have obtained a receipt, and the receipt should be produced. He alleged, also, that both this instrument and the Razinamah had been obtained from him under circumstances of pressure and intimidation while he and his uncle were both in custody on a false charge; that such charge had been contrived and instigated by the Appellant in order to force the Respondent to comply with his unjust demands; that [72] he had required the Respondent not only to pay him a large sum of money, but also to give him a share of the Talook; that he had threatened, with this view, to set up false charges against both the Respondent and his uncle, and that the Respondent was induced to execute these instruments by threats and promises of the Plaintiff, in the hope of relieving himself and his uncle from this persecution.

On the 29th of June the Judge of the Court gave out to the parties a statement of the points which each should endeavour to prove.

The Plaintiff was to prove the due execution of the alleged sale contract, and the payment by him of Rs. 23,000 on account of the purchase-money and the Bill of sale, and receipts were to be produced in Court.

The Defendant was to prove his statements regarding the threats and promises used by the Plaintiff in the interview during which the Bond was executed; secondly, to put in a concise statement of the grounds on which he believed the criminal charge against his uncle and that on which he was himself then under trial to have been the work of the Plaintiff; thirdly, to state briefly the nature of his connection with the Plaintiff, and the cause and date of the rupture between them.

As regards the Plaintiff, he failed to give any proof whatever of the execution of any sale contract or of the payment of any sum of money whatever on account of it, or to produce any document purporting to be such Bill of sale or receipt, or to show, as he had been challenged to do by the Defendant, that any stamp paper had been purchased on which the Bill of sale could have been written.

[73] On the other hand, the Defendant proved by a return from the proper officer that no sale appeared to have been made at the Stamp Office for this district of a stamp applicable to this transaction between the months of July and September, 1855, the Bill of sale being alleged to have been made on the 28th of September, 1855.

The Plaintiff had alleged in his replication that the Bill of sale and other documents were in the possession of the Defendant, but he gave no evidence of this fact, nor did he either prove, or indeed allege, any circumstances which could reasonably account for such an unusual circumstance as the delivery to the vendor of the title-deed of the purchaser.

Destitute of all other proofs, the Plaintiff relied entirely on the evidence afforded by the recital in the Bond, and the circumstances under which it was executed and afterwards recognized. Now, with respect to the circumstances under which it was executed, it appears that on the 17th of May, the Defendant, being in custody on the charge already alluded to, signed a paper addressed to Mr. Thornhill, the principal Assistant Agent, in these words:—"I have to speak to Pakala (describing the Appellant) touching the matter of the suit No. 29 of 1857, on the file of the Agent, and, therefore, request you will be pleased to direct the Circar Peons watching at my gate not to prevent Pakala from coming in." It will be observed that this note makes no allusion to any dispute about the sale of any share of the Talook, but is confined to the suit of 1857. The Judge in the Zillah Court considers this application to have been a contrivance on the part of the Appellant to obtain access to the Respondent, and not the spontaneous [74] act of the Respondent. But however this may be, it certainly does not indicate that at this time he was contemplating any arrangement with respect to the Talook, of which he had been for years, according to his representations to the Agent, resisting the attempts of the Appellant to obtain a share.

Yet we find that, without any intermediate communication, this note having been sent on the 17th of May, an interview takes place on the 18th between the parties, and the result of that interview is, that the Respondent signs this Bond, by which he recognizes the right of the Appellant to one fourth part of the Talook, and agrees to pay Rs. 29,000, for its re-purchase.

It seems very much as if these two papers must have been taken, ready prepared, by the Appellant to the Respondent, and no evidence is given to explain under what circumstances or with what assistance the Respondent consented to sign them. The only fact relied on by the Appellant is this—that more than once after the execution of the instruments, and after the Respondent had been discharged out of custody, he expressly recognized them, and paid a sum of Rs. 5441 $\frac{3}{4}$ on account of the Razinamah, and Rs. 18,000, on account of the instalment Bond.

But if the account given by the Respondent be true of the influence under which he acted, that influence continued at the time when the recognition took place, and under such circumstances recognition goes for very little. His object was not merely to get out of custody, but to relieve himself from the persecution to which he and his uncle had, as he conceived, for two years been subjected by the Appellant in consequence of their refusal to comply with his demands.

[75] With respect to the proof which the Respondent was called upon to give, he did not offer any evidence of the threats and promises alleged to have been used by the Plaintiff at the interview during which the Bond was executed, but he put in the statement required by the Judge, and also various documents in support of it.

The statement contained detailed particulars of the constant intrigues which he alleged to have been carried on against him and his uncle by the Plaintiff from the time of the rupture between them in 1856, and of the reasons by which he was led to believe that the charge by Madhava Dalai had been concocted at the Plaintiff's instance.

The documents which he put in to support this statement consisted of a great number of Arzees, or Memorials, presented by him to the Government during the year 1856, and subsequent years, and of other Arzees presented by his uncle on the same subject. The earliest of these papers seems to have been dated on the 25th of July, 1856, and the latest in 1858, and they contain statements of alleged acts of violence and threats by the Appellant against the Respondent and his uncle, of the arrest and conviction of the uncle on a false charge, which conviction was afterwards reversed by the Agent; this and other acts being attributed to the contrivance of the Appellant and to the abuse by the Appellant's brother of his authority as Moonshee to one of the Assistant Agents. These Arzees, supposing them to be true, would abundantly support the charges brought forward in the pleadings and subsequent statements.

But it is urged, and with truth, that these Arzees [76] are no proof of the facts alleged in them, and that there is no direct evidence that they were ever communicated to the Appellant. But for the purposes of this suit, the important question is, what was the impression on the Respondent's mind and under which he acted, rather than whether the impression itself was or not well founded; and we think that the Arzees contain sufficient evidence that at the time when the Respondent executed the instruments in dispute he was really under the influence of the feelings by which he alleges that he was induced to grant them, viz. that he believed that it was in the power of the Appellant, through his own influence and that of his brother with the Government authorities, to injure and to ruin him, and that for two years he had been suffering under such influence, and that the only way of relieving himself would be to comply with the exactions of the Appellant.

When regard is had to the nature of these instruments, and to the relative situation of the parties when they were executed, we think that more evidence would justly have been required to support them than was produced in this case by the Appellant, even if the transactions had taken place in Europe. But here they took place in a wild part of India, where exaggerated notions are entertained by the natives of the extent of power possessed over them by the Officers of the Government, and no great confidence seems to be felt in the honesty of the subordinate Officers, or the vigilance with which they are controlled by their superiors.

Now, upon these important points the Judge of the Zillah Court must be far more competent to form a [77] correct opinion than persons unacquainted with the district: and in his judgment in both the cases he expresses himself in the strongest terms upon the subject. In one of his judgments he uses these expressions: "It is clear from the public records that the Zemindars of Ganjam entertain the belief that the public servants possess the power of injuring or befriending them, and they have been in the habit of furnishing their local Agents with large sums to secure their goodwill. Hence the Defendant's plea that he feared the influence of a man like the Plaintiff, conversant with all the details of public business, and enjoying the confidence of the then authorities, is consistent with the ideas and practice of his class." He then remarks (a fact which must be within his own knowledge) that the Respondent first began to dispute the validity of these instruments about the time when the Appellant had fallen under the displeasure of the Agent on account of his intrigues in other Zemindaries, and when, therefore, the terror occasioned by his supposed influence with the Government authorities was removed, or at all events diminished, in the mind of the Respondent.

The Judges of the Sudder Court, who are gentlemen also well acquainted with the modes of thought and feeling amongst the natives of India, have unanimously concurred in the judgment appealed from, and on application for a review have persisted in their opinion.

It was said that in the Razinamah suit there was really no evidence. In strictness that seems to be so. But the suits were substantially suit and cross-suit, and the evidence in the one might very properly be looked at in the other. The effect of the decision in the [78] Razinamah suit is only to remit the Appellant to the prosecution.

of his original claim, towards satisfaction of which, if he has any just demand, he seems already, under the Razinamah to have received between Rs. 5000 and Rs. 6000.

Upon the whole, we must humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm both the decrees complained of, with costs.

RAJAH PERLADH SEIN.— Appellant; BABOO BHOODOO SINGH,—Respondent *
[Nov. 28, 1864].

On appeal from the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta.

By a decree of the Sudder Court at Calcutta a suit was remanded to the Zillah Court to be tried de novo. An appeal to England from this decree was refused, but upon special application was admitted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; whereupon the Appellant applied to the High Court at Calcutta to stay proceedings pending the appeal to England, on the ground, that the decision of the appellate Court would govern the question at issue, which application that Court refused. The Appellant then presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council, and applied ex parte for the same relief, but the Judicial Committee, in the Respondent's absence, refused to make any order, though without prejudice to the Petitioner's further application when he had served the Respondent.

By an Order in Council, dated the 27th of July, 1863, special leave was given to appeal from a decree of the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta, dated the 7th of February, 1863, refusing an appeal from a [79] decree of the late Sudder Court of the 27th of September, 1860. By this latter decree the Court remanded the suit to the Zillah Court to be tried de novo; the question at issue being the validity of a deed of sale and an account.

The Appellant, after the admission of the appeal in England, presented a petition to the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta, setting out the Order in Council allowing the appeal, and submitted that the decree of the 27th of September, 1860, having been appealed from, could not be carried out against the Order in Council of the 27th of July, 1863. This application came on for hearing before the High Court on the 16th of September, 1864, when the Respondent appeared and objected to the proceedings being stayed, and the Court was of opinion, that there were no sufficient grounds for staying the further execution of the decree of remittal.

The Appellant now presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council praying that the proceedings in India might be stayed, pending the appeal; and submitted, first, that the hearing of the suit in the Zillah Court, if proceeded with under the remand, would involve much litigation and expense, and might turn out wholly unnecessary, as the validity of the instrument of sale would in fact depend upon the decision come to upon the appeal; and secondly, that the proceedings by the High Court under the remand of the suit, as well as the refusal to stay proceedings and the execution of the decree, was a violation of the Order in Council granting him leave to appeal; and he prayed that the proceedings ordered to be taken before the Zillah Judge under the remand by the decree of the 27th of September, 1860, as well as [80] execution thereof, might be stayed, pending the appeal, and until the same had been heard.

The Respondent, being in India, was not served with notice of the application, which was made ex parte.

Mr. Leith, for the Petitioner, urged the above grounds, and, by analogy, referred to the practice of the House of Lords, Macqueen's Prac., pp. 236-8, in staying execution of proceedings pending an appeal to that House.

The Lord Justice Knight Bruce. — Their Lordships feel great difficulty in making any Order upon this petition. It is an ex parte application, novel in its circumstances and nature. Upon the whole, they think the petition must be dismissed; but, if the Petitioner desires it, his petition may stand over, with a view to enable him to try to bring the Respondent here, by serving him in India. If the Petitioner desires it a fresh application can then be made.

Mr. Leith elected to adopt this course, and by an Order in Council, it was ordered, that the petition be dismissed, without prejudice to any further application to their Lordships.

[81] RAJAH LELANUND SINGH BAHADOOR,—Appellant: MAHARAJAH MONESHUR SINGH BAHADOOR, and by revivor, MAHARAJAH LUKHMISSUR SINGH, his son, MAHARAJAH RUHMUT ALI KHAN and Others, and the Government,—Respondents * [Dec. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, 1864].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Benegal.

In a question of disputed boundaries the onus probandi lies upon the Plaintiff to prove by independent evidence his right to recover. But in the circumstances held, that the mere failure on the Plaintiff's part to support the burthen of proof cast upon him, as to part of the lands claimed, was not conclusive as it would be in ejectment, and the case remitted to India for further inquiries [10 Moo. Ind. App. 111, 112].

Upon a reversal of the Sudder Court's decree, costs of the suit already paid by the Appellant ordered to be refunded, and the Court below directed to deal with those costs and all other costs, including those of the appeal, according to the result of the inquiry.

The suit out of which this appeal arose was brought by the Appellant's father, Rajah Bidianund Singh, deceased, against the Respondent, Maharajah Moheshur Singh Bahadoor, and Maharanee Wujhoonissa, the Government, and the other Respondents, tenants [82] of the lands in dispute, to recover possession of a large tract of hill and forest country, containing 175,000 beegahs, claimed by the Plaintiff as belonging to and forming part of his Zemindary of Khurruckpoor, generally known as the Nizamut Mahals of Khurruckpoor, in the district of Monghy, in the province of Behar. The Appellant's father and the Respondent, Maharajah Moheshur Singh, were proprietors of separate estates conterminous with an estate of the latter, called Pergunnah Havelee Khurruckpoor, which had been formerly a Mahal or portion of the Zemindary of Khurruckpoor, but separated from it by the Government resumption lands, and completely surrounded on all sides by the revenue-paying lands belonging to the Appellant. Maharajah Moheshur Singh claimed the tract of land in dispute as being included from ancient times within, and as belonging to Pergunnah Havelee, and of certain resumed lands taken out of the Zemindary of the Appellant.

The question raised by the suit and upon appeal was solely one of boundaries. The documentary and oral evidence was of a most voluminous character, consisting chiefly of village papers, maps, proceedings and records. The important portion of the evidence adduced on either side which bore upon or is material to the question at issue, and the arguments, are sufficiently referred to in their Lordships' judgment.

The appeal was argued by

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant; and Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for Maharajah Lukhmissur Singh Bahadoor, the heir of the first Respondent.

[83] Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., also appeared for the Government.

The case after argument stood over for consideration. Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (May 6, 1865).—The outline of this case is as follows:—At the time of the perpetual Settlement, the large Zemindary known as the Khurruckpoor Mehals in Zillah Bhagulpoor was settled with Maharajah Kadir Ali Khan, who in or before the year 1790 was in possession of it. It consisted of twenty-six Pergunnahs, of which five were alleged to be and were then held as Lakhiraj. Of these alleged Lakhiraj Pergunnahs it is only necessary to specify Pergunnah Khurruckpoor Havelee, which has throughout the argument before us been conveniently called "Havelee." Of the Malguzary, or revenue-paying Mehals, it is sufficient to name Pergunnahs Suhrooe, Sukrabadee, and the most important of all, Purbutparah, which was subdivided into Tuppahs, Lodhwah and Semroum, Daygee, Mullia, and Bhudra.

The Settlement above mentioned was made, as in other cases, by Pergunnahs, without any survey or measurement of the lands comprised in them; and as this vast Zemindary included a great deal of wild, uncultivated mountainous and forest land, it may be supposed that, however well ascertained may have been the boundaries of the whole, those of its component parts, or Pergunnahs, inter se, were not very clearly defined. The effect of the Settlement was to fix permanently and for ever the revenue payable in respect of the Malguzary, or, as they are [84] termed in these proceedings, "the Nizamut Mehals," and to leave the Lakhiraj Mehals free from the payment of revenue, but subject to the right reserved to the Government by Ben. Reg. XIX. of 1793, to resume and assess the lands, should the tenure, under which they were claimed to be held Lakhiraj, thereafter be found to be invalid. Kadir Ali Khan on his death was succeeded by his eldest son, Ikbul Ali Khan, who also died some time before the year 1836, and was succeeded by his brother Ruhmut Ali Khan.

In 1836, the Government impeached the Lakhiraj title of the Zemindar. Pergunnah Havelee was resumed and separately settled. The proceedings which resulted in the settlement of it will hereafter be fully considered. At present, it is sufficient to say that they began in the year 1836, and continued until the 9th of April, 1844, when a temporary settlement for twenty years was made with the Maharanee Wujhoonissa, to whom the interest of her husband, Ruhmut Ali Khan, had been transferred.

Pending the proceedings for the resumption and settlement of this Pergunnah, Ruhmut Ali Khan suffered the Government revenue on the Nizamut Mehals to fall into arrear, and these Mehals were accordingly sold by public auction for such arrears, and on the 11th of August, 1840, were purchased by the Appellant's father, Rajah Bidianund Singh, and another person, who afterwards transferred his share to Rajah Bidianund Singh. This sale, of course, put an end to the unity of ownership of the Nizamut Mehals and of Havelee; Rajah Bidianund Singh thenceforward being the Zemindar of the former, with all the rights possessed by the original Zemindar at the date of the perpetual Settlement; whilst the latter, [85] subject to the rights of Government in respect of the revenue to be assessed thereon, continued to belong to Ruhmet Ali Khan, and after him to Wujhoonissa.

In 1845, Wujhoonissa having failed to pay the revenue assessed on Havelee, that estate was also sold for the arrears, and was purchased by Maharajah Rooder Singh, the grandfather of the present Respondent, Lukhmissur Singh, on the 5th of November, 1845.

The estates having thus become separate, boundary disputes took place between the owner of the Nizamut Mehals, or his tenants, on the one side, and the owner of Havelee, or her tenants, on the other. It may be necessary hereafter to refer more particularly to the proceedings to which these disputes gave rise. At present, it is sufficient to say that the controversy was continuing during the proceedings of the Government surveyors engaged in making a topographical survey of the Zillah Bhagulpoor in the years 1846 and 1847.

It appears to have been the duty or practice of the Officers employed in this survey, to lay down the boundaries of estates or other divisions of land, where there was any dispute concerning them, according to the evidence which they might find of the actual possession of the lands. In the present case they had to deal with a controversy touching the boundary line between Havelee and Pergunnah Purbutparah, and the other Nizamut Mehals contiguous to it. The owner of the latter, on the one hand, insisted that this had been conclusively determined at the time of the settlement of Havelee by a map prepared after actual survey and admeasurement by a Captain Ellis, under the instructions of the settlement officers. The [86] owner of Havelee, on the other hand, disputed the accuracy of Captain Ellis's map, if it purported to be a map of the entire Pergunnah Havelee, and questioned the intention to include the whole of Havelee in that map. The Officers of the survey, relying for the most part on the evidence which they had, or thought they had, of actual possession, came to a conclusion adverse to the Appellant's ancestor, and prepared the map known in the proceedings as "Captain Sherwill's map," by which upwards of 175,000 beegahs of land in excess of that comprised in Captain Ellis's map was attributed to Havelee, and taken out of the Nizamut Mehals, as laid down in that map. The effect of these proceedings was to leave somewhat doubtful the question, whether this land was included, or intended to be included, in the settlement of 1841, or whether it was a Towfeer or surplus which the Government was still entitled to assess de novo.

Some further proceedings afterwards took place in the Foujdary Courts and elsewhere, touching the right to the possession of this land; but the effect of these proceedings was to remit the Appellant, or his father, Rajah Bidianund Singh, to a regular suit, in which alone the title could be litigated.

The suit of which this appeal has arisen was accordingly instituted by the Appellant on the 5th of June, 1851. Its object is to recover as part of the Nizamut Mehals the 175,000 beegahs of land laid down by Sherwill's map as within Havelee, in excess of the land attributed to Havelee by Ellis's map; but the plaint divides this land in certain proportions between certain specified Mouzals, the names of which occur in the lists of the villages, comprised in Pergunnahs Purbutparah and Sukrabadee, which [87] were prepared at the time of the perpetual Settlement, or shortly subsequent to it. The Defendants to the suit, the Respondents to this appeal, are the Government, Maharajah Lakhmissur Singh, and some of his tenants, and they insist that the 175,000 beegahs of land in question properly belong to Havelee.

The suit was heard first by the Principal Sudder Ameen of Bhagulpore, who by his decree, dated the 9th of July, 1855, dismissed the suit on the ground that the Plaintiff had failed to establish a title to recover the lands in question. This decision was based upon proceedings of the Government surveyors, and seems to imply that the land was Towfeer.

On appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, that Court, by a majority of two Judges to one, confirmed the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen, but did not adopt its grounds. The two Judges appear to have held that something in excess of the lands comprised in Captain Ellis's map was included in the Havelee settlement, that the extent of that excess was undetermined, and that it lay upon the Plaintiff to show what he was entitled to recover, which he had failed to do. The dissentient Judge, on the contrary, held that no part of the land in dispute was included in the settlement of Havelee; that, therefore, ex necessitate, the whole must be taken to form part of the contiguous Nizamut Mehals, and that the Plaintiff had established his title to recover it.

According to the view, therefore, both of the affirming Judges and of the dissentient Judge, the decision of this suit depended on the question whether the land claimed, or any, and if any, what defined part of [88] it, was included in the Havelee settlement; and we think that this was a correct view of the case. It was incontestable that the land in question formed part of the Zemindary which by the perpetual Settlement was assured to Kadir Ali Khan; but that Zemindary consisted partly of the Nizamut or revenue-paying Mehals, in respect of which the revenue payable by the Zemindar was then finally settled, and partly of the Mehals, including Havelee, which were alleged to be Lakhiraj, and on which, therefore, no revenue was assessed. The land in dispute is so situated that it must necessarily belong either to Havelee or to the contiguous Nizamut Mehals; but the perpetual Settlement unfortunately omitted to define the boundary line between Havelee and these Mehals; had it done so the question in the cause could not have arisen, since, we need hardly say, no Court would disturb what had been fixed by the perpetual Settlement. The resumption of Havelee afforded a fresh occasion for the definition of these boundaries, even whilst both Havelee and the Nizamut Mehals belonged to the same owner; because Government, by virtue of the resumption, acquired the right of assessing revenue upon all that lay within the boundaries of Havelee, whilst it had no right to assess any fresh revenue upon a single beegah of land within the Nizamut Mehals. Subsequent events severed the ownership of Havelee from that of the Nizamut Mehals, and the question of boundary then arose in this suit, not as a question of revenue between the Government and a Zemindar, but as one of title to land between the Zemindars and proprietors of two contiguous and separate estates, the Nizamut Mehals and Havelee.

In dealing with this question it must, as we have [89] said, be assumed that so much of the land in dispute as was not included in Havelee belongs to the Nizamut Mehals; and in considering what was included in Havelee the Court below could only deal, as we upon this appeal must deal, with the Havelee settlement as it stands. For the purposes of this suit that settlement must be considered as valid and subsisting. If the boundaries of Havelee ascertained by it are at all capable of being corrected, they certainly cannot be corrected in a suit of this nature. All that we can determine in this suit is whether, according to the true construction and effect of the Havelee settlement taken as it stands, the whole, or what part of the lands in question, belongs to Havelee, or the whole, or what part of them, is included in the lands which were the subject of the perpetual Settlement.

In considering this question three views of this Havelee settlement present themselves for our consideration.

The first is that it included, and was intended to include, the whole of Pergunnah Havelee, and that all which it did include is within the limits of Ellis's map. The second is, that it included, and was intended to include, the whole of Pergunnah Havelee, but that some portion of what it did include lies beyond the limits of Ellis's map, and is to be found in the district of which the ownership is now in dispute. The third is, that it did not include the whole of Pergunnah Havelee, but that, either from accident or design, the large district in question, or some undefined portion of it, was omitted from the settlement, as well as from the map, and is now what in these proceedings is called a Towfeer or surplus.

[90] We proceed, therefore, to consider the intention, extent, and effect of the Havelee settlement proceedings with reference to these views.

The first of these proceedings is that of the 1st of July, 1836. By it Mr. Travers, the Deputy Collector of the Zillah Monghyr, on grounds which, for the purposes of this suit, must be deemed sufficient, decided against the claim of Ruhmut Ali Khan to hold Havelee and the other four Pergunnahs to which we have before referred Lakhiraj, and affirmed the right of Government to resume and assess them.

There was an appeal against this Order, pending which the Government, not being able to affect an arrangement with the Zemindar as to the intermediate collections of Havelee, assumed the management of it by a Tehsildar of their own appointment. The appeal was dismissed on the 30th of November, 1837, by a Special Commissioner acting under Ben. Reg. III. of 1828, and the title of Government to assess the whole of Havelee thus became complete.

It then became the duty of the Deputy Collector, or the Settlement Officer, under Ben. Reg. II. of 1819, sec. 21, cl. 4, "to ascertain the limits of the land" (i.e. of the whole of Pergunnah Havelee), and to fix the assessment: and various proceedings were had with this object. Most of these proceedings are found in extenso in the first volume of the printed record, and we must refer to the more important of them.

On the 9th of April, 1838, Mr. Farquharson, described as the Superintendent of the Khas Mehals, but acting as the Settlement Officer in the case, held a proceeding as to Havelee. After reciting that the Surhudbundee and Rookbabundee (the specifica-[91]-tions of boundaries and area) were not with the record, it ordered Ruhmut Ali Khan to file a list of the villages of Havelee, and also of Pergunnahs Subrooe, Sukrabadee, Singhool, and Luckhumpore, Pergunnah Purbutparah (these being doubtless assumed to be the contiguous Nizamut Mehals), accompanied by a Surhudbundee thereof. It also ordered the Putwarrees to file the Surhudbundee and Rookbabundee of their respective Mouzahs. The object obviously was to obtain a definition by metes and boundaries both of the whole Pergunnah and of its component villages.

In the proofs and documents filed by the Plaintiff we have the actual process issued in respect of Rounuckabad, a principal village of Havelee, under this order, and the return to it. The dates are the 17th of April and 31st of May, 1838, and there is a proceeding in the office of Khas Mehals of the 14th of April, 1838, before Mr. Farquharson. It complains of the omission of a village named Bheembandh, though part of Havelee, and that two other villages have been returned as waste, though in fact they were inhabited. It directs the attachment of Mouzah Bheembandh as far as Koh Marug, Tuppah Dighee, and gives other directions that are not material to the present question. It orders notice to be sent to Ruhmut Ali Khan that no settlement will be concluded with him unless he file correct Jummabundee papers.

On the 11th of November, 1838, Mootee Lall, the Tehsildar appointed by Government, reported to Mr. Farquharson that two Mouzahs adjoining the Beembandh, one named Goormah, the other Pakum, were west of Beembandh in the hills, and asked for an inquiry concerning them.

[92] This led to Mr. Farquharson's proceeding of the 23rd of January, 1839. In that, after stating that it had come to his knowledge that two villages (there called Tolahs) are situate in Bheembandh, but had not been attached, he directs the issue of a Purwannah to Mootee Lall, ordering him to bring these Tolahs under collection, and to explain why they had not been resumed along with Bheembandh.

Then we have the report of Mootee Lall, the Tehsildar of Khas Mehal, in answer to this order: it is dated the 8th of April, 1839. It appears to be indorsed on the Purwannah, and reports that after the issue of it, Mr. Farquharson had arrived at Khurruckpoor and had given a verbal order to relinquish Mouzah Kormaha (which is obviously the same place as that previously called Goormah), and to have the survey of Kita Bakum (before called Pakum) made with Bheembandh; that afterwards a Purwannah of the 23rd of March, directing a separate survey of Bakum, had arrived, and that accordingly Mouzah Kormaha had been relinquished, and Mouzah Bakum would be surveyed. On this report Mr. Farquharson has indorsed "That this be put up with the record: May 16th, 1839."

Intermediately Mr. Farquharson seems to have taken the depositions of Meer Dad Khan, a former Tehsildar of Havelee, and of Blowanni Lall, described as an inhabitant of Havelee, but Peshkar of Pergunnah Purbutparah. The former was taken on the 8th of April, 1839, the other was taken on the 15th of March, 1839. They may have conducted to Mr. Farquharson's determination to relinquish Kormaha.

In the evidence there are detailed measurements [93] of the lands of Mouzahs Rounceekabad, Bheembandh, and Mudhobun. The second alone is dated, and as the date is the 24th of March, 1839, it may be inferred that Kita Bakum, which by the report of the 8th of April is treated as about to be separately measured, was not included in this measurement.

On the 15th of April, 1839, Ruhmut Ali Khan who describes himself as Malik or Zemindar of the entire Mehals of Khurruckpoor, presented a petition, which, as we understand it, is confined to Bakum as a Kita or part of his Nizamut Mouzah Bhorebhundaree. He protests against its inclusion in Havelee. The petition seems to have been presented to Captain Ellis, then engaged in surveying Havelee and making his map. He on the 22nd of April, 1839, directed a copy to be sent to the Settlement Officer (Mr. Farquharson), who on the 6th of May, 1839, directs the officer (Ellis) to be informed that the case is pending in that Cutcherry. The decision was adverse, for we have a further petition from Ruhmut Ali Khan, which (and as it seems wilfully) confounds Bakum with Kormaha, alleging that the former though relinquished had been separately surveyed by Mootee Lall: that the measurement papers of Havelee are being prepared and Kita Bakum inserted in the English map, and stating that he objects to take attested copies of the English map because Kita Bakum (a Nizamut Mehal) is inserted in it. The order indorsed on this petition is dated the 8th of July, 1839, and is, that it be rejected.

On the 14th of September, 1839, a summary settlement was concluded by Mr. Farquharson with Ruhmut Ali Khan for one year, i.e. from the 1st of [94] May, 1839, to the 30th of April, 1840, and this by a subsequent order was confirmed and extended to April, 1841.

It was during the currency of this temporary settlement that the Nizamut Mehals were sold, and Ruhmut Ali Khan's interest became limited to the resumed Mehals.

It is also probable that during the same period Mr. Beadon, who had succeeded Mr. Farquharson, began the investigation which resulted in the proposal for a permanent Settlement, next to be considered, and that, in aid of that investigation, Captain Ellis, by his proceeding of the 30th of June, 1840, directed "the measurement papers of the Mouzals of Havelee, filed by the Ameens, which had on comparison with the English measurement papers been found to correspond," to be forwarded to the Superintendent of Khas Mehals.

Mr. Beadon's final settlement proceeding is dated the 16th of December, 1841. It gives a summary of the former proceedings, and states that "whereas a perpetual Settlement of that Mehal (Havelee) was proper, and the Mehal having been surveyed by the Revenue Surveyor (who from the mention of his name in the next paragraph is clearly Captain Ellis), the measurement papers are forthcoming in the office. Hence, after inquiring into the Jumna bundee, from the statements and papers of the cultivators and Putwarrees, a perpetual Settlement had been, conformably to Regulation VII. of 1822, concluded from the 1st of May, 1841."

The proceeding then details at great length the principles upon which this Settlement had been effected. It seems sufficient to state that Mr. Beadon [95] took the area as measured at 123,207 beegahs and a fraction. From this he deducted 60,433 beegahs and a fraction as absolutely jungle, waste, and unculturable, leaving a balance of 62,774 beegahs and a fraction. This again, when subdivided, was found to consist of 18,998 beegahs and a fraction of land actually cultivated, and producing, or capable of producing, rent; and of 43,775 beegahs and a fraction of land which, though not cultivated, he describes as "culturable." The annual revenue derivable from the cultivated land he estimated at S. Rs. 15,517, to which he added S. Rs. 738. 2, the amount of Sayers or miscellaneous revenue (a description of revenue which will require further consideration), making the total revenue S. Rs. 16,255. 6. The moiety of this, being, when converted from sicca Company's rupees, 8666 and a fraction, he fixed as the revenue payable perpetually, abandoning all further claim to revenue from either the 43,775 beegahs of culturable, or the 60,433 beegahs of unculturable land.

It is to be observed that Bakum (spelt Bakhum) is included in the list of villages, its measured area being stated to be 129 beegahs 19 biswas. It follows, therefore, that whether the Bakum resumed by Mr. Farquharson be in Ellis's map or not (a question hereafter to be considered), its measured area is included in the 123,207 beegahs, the basis of the Settlement.

It is further to be observed that there is no trace of Goormah or Kormaha in this or the subsequent Settlement proceeding.

Again, it is to be observed that the total of the miscellaneous revenue, Sayers, or cesses, was taken by Mr. Beadon to be S. Rs. 738. 2., of which [96] S. Rs. 576 consisted of rents payable by the lessees of the Sayer Mehal, according to the deposition of Ameen Dad Khan, taken on the 14th of March, 1841, and the rest consisted of the Sayers returned by the Putwarrees and Ameens. We may here observe, too, that in the S. Rs. 576 is included an item of S. Rs. 400 payable by Rujjib Ali as farmer of "Ghauts Marug and Kurrailee, etc.," touching which we have also his deposition, taken the 24th of March, and the Ummulnameh of 1248 (1841), a document which may be of some importance with reference to the present inquiry: for whilst it gives the names of various Ghauts as proposed to be included in the lease to which it refers, it seems to indicate that the lease was to comprise not only such tolls as may be conceived to be leviable from persons passing the Ghauts, but Bunkur, which properly is a right of cutting wood, and Phulkur, a right of gathering fruit—rights indicative of a certain dominion over the soil in a given locality.

On the 16th of September, 1843, Mr. Beadon's proposal of a permanent Settlement on this basis was overruled by the Commissioner, who, on the 25th of the same month made over the estate to Mr. Joachim Piron, to be settled de novo.

Shortly before this, and on the 13th of June, 1843, the transfer of Havelee from Ruhmut Ali Khan to Wujhoonissa had taken place.

Mr. Piron's first step was to ask whether he was to make a new measurement.

He was told to test the former measurement : to adopt it if he found it to be correct : to make a new one if he found it to be incorrect.

Mr. Piron's general report bears date the 20th of June, 1844 ; his settlement proceeding of the same [97] date : the Doul Settlement. The report states that he made a settlement for twenty years with Wujhonnissa, of which the other papers give the details and the principles. His report also states expressly that the measurement which he tested was that completed under Captain Ellis : that he found it correct in every instance ; and that his only objection to the former survey regarded the classification of the various qualities of land and the rates assessed thereon.

The result of Mr. Piron's settlement was somewhat different from that of Mr. Beadon. But it is perfectly clear that both Officers dealt with the same measured area, viz. the 123,207 beegahs and a fraction defined by Captain Ellis. Mr. Piron, however, making a somewhat different classification of the lands, fixed the amount of revenue derivable therefrom by the proprietor of Havelee at S. Rs. 20,678. 3. 17½. In this he included the sum of S. Rs. 2336. 8. 9¾ for Sayers, cesses or other miscellaneous revenue. Instead of leaving, as Mr. Beadon had done, free from any direct assessment of revenue 60,443 beegahs of unculturable + 43,775 beegahs of culturable land, making together 103,209 beegahs of land, he excludes from assessment only 4447 old fallow land, + 35,051 rocks with jungle, + 42,586. 8. 4 of jungle, making a total of 82,084 beegahs and a fraction of land free from assessment.

The result of Mr. Piron's proceedings was a settlement with Wujhonnissa for twenty years at the moiety of the gross rental as estimated by him, which, when converted into the Company's rupees, amounted to C. Rs. 11,028. 12. 10.

The documents by which this arrangement was carried out with her, and her petition, Kaboolat, and [98] Mr. Piron's final order, all of the 9th of April, 1844, are all among the papers in the case. In the Kaboolat she describes herself as occupier of the entire Pergunnah Havelee, and says " 123,186 beegahs and a fraction of land of the Pergunnah have been taken by me from you under temporary settlement at an absolute sum of C. Rs. 11,128. 12. 10, being a moiety of the jumma, including Julkur, Bunkur, Phulkur, etc."

We stop at this point in order to state the conclusions at which we arrive from the proceedings and documents above referred to, in so far as they do not relate to the Sayers or cesses, or miscellaneous revenue—conclusions which in our judgment are no way affected by what has already appeared, or by what we shall presently state, as to these Sayers and cesses, or miscellaneous revenue. We are satisfied from these proceedings and documents that the settlement officers throughout intended to resume and settle and assess the revenues of the whole of Pergunnah Havelee, and that they throughout proceeded on the assumption of the correctness of the survey, measurements, and map made by or under the inspection of Captain Ellis. Looking to the great care and the minute attention which was given to the settlement of this Pergunnah, it cannot be supposed that any portion of it was designedly omitted from the settlement ; and if any portion of it was omitted by accident, this is not a suit in which the accident can be set right. We think, therefore, that the third view of this settlement, to which we have above referred, may for the purposes of this suit be laid out for consideration, and that no part of the district in question can for any of those purposes be considered as Towfer, or surplus. We are also [99] satisfied from the evidence afforded by these proceedings that Bakum was included not only in the measured area of 123,186 beegahs, but also in Ellis's map. The objection expressed by Rulmur Ali Khan in his rejected petition, to take attested copies of the map because it included, or was about to include, Bakum, is, we think, sufficient to prove this to have been the case.

Again, we are satisfied from these proceedings, and especially from the report of Mootee Lall, and Mr. Farquharson's mode of dealing with that report, and from the absence of all mention of Goormah or Kormah in the subsequent settlement proceedings, that that village was advisedly relinquished by Mr. Farquharson as part of the Nizamut Mehals, and probably as part of Mouzah Bhorebundharee in Pergunnah Purbutparah.

It may be convenient also here to add, although it has no immediate reference to the foregoing proceedings, that from the proceedings by Mr. Beadon, officiating special of Deputy Collector of the 27th of August, 1841, the case of Mouzah Ghorak-hore appears to have been solemnly decided in favour of the Nizamut Mehals, and that, in our opinion, the proceedings of the Officers of survey, of the 11th and 24th of June, 1848, are not entitled to weight as against that decision. We think, indeed, that the settlement of 1844 affords the only safe criterion for determining what belongs to Havelee, and what to the Nizamut Mehals.

It results from what we have already stated that, looking at this case without reference to the Sayers, cesses, or miscellaneous revenue, we should have come [100] to the conclusion that Havelee as settled consisted only of the measured area of 123,186 beegahs; that this was all comprised within Ellis's map, and that the Appellant, by showing this, had at least shifted the burthen of proof, and established a good prima facie title to recover the whole of the disputed territory; but it certainly cannot be denied that what appears upon the record before us as to these Sayers, or cesses, and this miscellaneous revenue, raises a very serious question whether some territory in excess of the measured area, and beyond the limits of Ellis's map, does not belong to Havelee, and was not included in the settlement of it. It is necessary, therefore, to see how the case stands as to these Sayers, or cesses, or miscellaneous revenue. By Mr. Beadon's settlement the revenue derived from these sources is stated to amount to S. Rs. 738. 2; and we have already shown how that sum was made up. By Mr. Piron's settlement the Sayers or cesses are stated as amounting to Rs. 2336. Sa. 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ p., made up partly of the sums returned by the Putwarrees and Ameens as the Sayerat of their respective villages, and partly of sums aggregating S. Rs. 1116, which were not so returned; this last-mentioned item being thus entered in the settlement proceedings:—"Bunkur and Boondee Mehal, besides the Putwarree's paper, whatever came to light by the depositions of farmers and persons informed, and by the perusal of Pottahs, etc., S. Rs. 1116." We have here, therefore, some, at least, of these Sayers, or cesses, described as Bunkur and Boondee Mehals; and other parts of this voluminous record contain the same or a similar description of them. We are of necessity, therefore, led to [101] inquire what these Bunkur and Boondee Mehals really were; and to some extent, at least, the evidence leaves no doubt upon this point.

Mr. Piron himself says that the S. Rs. 1116 was made up of S. Rs. 785 inserted in the Pottah of Peer Khan Soobahdar; of S. Rs. 251 inserted in the deposition of Rajee Singh, son of Durshun Singh; and S. Rs. 80, inserted in the deposition and Pottahs of Posun Pasee and others.

Now, we have Peer Khan Soobahdar's examination, which seems to have been taken on the 20th of January, 1844. He is described as farmer of Mehal Bunkur and Boondee Koh Marug, and Kurrailee, etc., Pergunnah Havelee. He professes to hold, but in the name of his son, Wahid Khan, Ghauts Marug, Kurrailee, Tabawee, Kuru Khataun, Hursa Poteeah, Burramupea, Shakole, and several other hills and Ghauts, for the names of which he refers to the Pottah, at a rent of S. Rs. 785, and to pay the rent to Ruhmut Ali Khan.

Again, we have the examination of Rajputtee Singh, the son of Durshun Singh, taken on the 30th of January, 1844, from which and the proceedings of Mr. Piron of the 26th of that month, we learn that Durshun Singh, was farmer of Mehal Bunkur Ghaut Koolurhea, attached to Mouzah Mudhoobun, Pergunnah Havelee; that he, during the subsistence of his lease, paid a jumma of S. Rs. 251 to Ruhmut Ali Khan, who on the expiration of the lease in April, 1844, was about to bring that Bunkur Mehal under his personal collection.

The S. Rs. 80 "inserted in the depositions and Pottahs filed by Posun Pasee and others" we have been unable to trace in the record.

[102] Again, Mr. Quintin, who was the superintendent of surveys of Zillah Bhagulpore, in his letter of the 19th of October, 1848, addressed to Mr. G. F. Brown, the Commissioner of Revenue for the division of Bhagulpore, refers to a variety of Ghauts as included in Piron's settlement; and so far as we can see they can have been so included only under the head of Bunkur and Boondee Mehals.

Again, it is clear upon the evidence that Ghauts Marug and Kurrailee, and possibly other Ghauts held by Peer Khan Soobahdar in the name of Wahid Khan at the date of Mr. Piron's settlement, were, at the date of Mr. Beadon's settlement, held by Rujjib Ali, and, indeed, that the whole of the property, whatever it was, the revenue of which Mr. Beadon estimated at S. Rs. 576, is included in the property of which the revenue was estimated by Mr. Piron at S. Rs. 1116.

It is clear, therefore, that Mr. Piron's settlement did include under the head of Bunkur and Boondée Mehals the revenue coming from certain Ghauts, of which the most prominent are Ghauts Marug and Kurrailee; and that Mr. Piron was right in including rights in these Ghauts as part of the assets of Havelee is, we think, almost proved to demonstration by the village papers in the second and third volumes of the Appendix to which Mr. Melvill directed our attention.

Some of these are produced by the Appellant, others by the Respondent, and the two classes show, with a correspondence in minute details that proves their genuineness, that long before the resumption the proceeds of these Ghauts were uniformly treated by the owners of the whole Zemindary as part of the revenue [103] of the Lakhiraj Mehal, Havelee. Against this evidence it is vain to set the award of Ruhmut Ali Khan of the 13th of April, 1837, after the date of the resumption, or the Kabooleats, or the occasional entry in the village accounts of Morkhut as Marugkhat. They would at most support the theory that there may have been more than one Ghaut of the same name, or different rights resulting from the same Ghaut: the two former classes of evidence may, indeed, more plausibly be referred to the desire, after the resumption, to claim these Ghauts for the Nizamut Mehals, which until the sale of those Mehals, it was Ruhmut Ali Khan's interest to do.

It must be taken, then, that Mr. Piron not only included, but properly included, the revenue arising from Ghauts Marug, Kurrailee, and other Ghauts in his settlement: but then the question is, What was this property, and does the ownership of it imply the ownership of any land in excess of the measured area, and beyond the confines of Ellis's map?

There is much evidence bearing more or less directly upon this point. There is the Ummulnaneh, to which we have already referred, and there are the various suits and proceedings arising out of the long-continued litigation concerning these Ghauts.

The earliest of these proceedings which we find is under date the 12th of March, 1842. It was before the Magistrate in the Criminal Court under Act, No. IV, of 1840, and arose out of the alleged forcible dispossession of Rujjib Ali, the farmer under Ameer Buksh, of Ghaut Bhoondée, and Koh Marug, etc., by Munniar Rae, claiming the same subjects under a Pottah granted by Ruhmut Ali Khan, in his [104] capacity of Zemindar of the Nizamut Mehals. Rajah Bidianund Singh intervened in the suit, objecting that it was brought in collusion with the former proprietor of the Nizamut Mehals, Ruhmut Ali Khan. This may have been the case, but the very objection shows that there was then a dispute whether the parcels in Rujjib Ali's farm, or some of them, belonged to Havelee, or to the Nizamut Mehals. The decision as to possession was in favour of Rujjib Ali.

The proceeding of the 24th of March, 1841, before Mr. Beadon, shows that during the investigation which led to his settlement there were disputes between the auction purchaser and the owner of Havelee touching certain stone quarries stated to be with the hill Mar and part of the Boondée Mehal. The report of Ronshun Lall, Record Keeper of the Khass Mehal department, of the 21st of September, 1841, was obviously made in answer to a reference made in some suit arising out of the same dispute touching these Ghauts, which we have been unable to trace. It shows that as early as the 21st of September, 1841, Mr. Beadon had included the Ghauts held by Rujjib Ali in the settlement of Havelee.

The question, whether these Ghauts belonged to Havelee or to the Nizamut Mehals continued to be litigated in one shape or another during the whole period which elapsed between the dates of the settlement by Mr. Beadon and that by Mr. Piron.

One instance is the suit of Kishna Tewarry, of which the final proceeding is that of the 12th of June, 1845, which gives the history of the whole litigation. It began with a summary suit brought before the [105] Collector by the Naib of the auction purchasers of the Nizamut Mehals (we presume in their name) against the Plaintiff for rent. The Collector has under the Regulations no jurisdiction to entertain such a suit unless the relation of landlord and tenant subsists between the parties. He, nevertheless, made a decree against Kishna Tewarry for the sum sued for. Thereupon Kishna Tewarry, alleging that he was not the tenant of the purchasers of the auction Mehals, but a sub-tenant of the owners of Havelee, brought his suit in the Civil Court (the Moonsiff's) against Rajah Bidianund Singh to quash the Collector's decree as made without jurisdiction. The Moonsiff decreed in his favour. There was an appeal to the Principal Sudder Ameen, who was against him. This was followed by a special appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, which Court remitted the cause back to the Principal Sudder Ameen, with directions to try the proprietary right. This protracted and animated litigation, ostensibly for a sum of less than Rs. 7, was obviously made a mode of trying the question of title between Rajah Bidianund Singh as the purchaser of the Nizamut Mehals, and first Ruhmut Ali Khan and afterwards Wujhounissa (each of whom intervened in the suit as an objecting party), as the owner of Havelee. The proceedings show that the real issue was, whether certain subjects, as to which all parties were agreed, including Ghauts Marug and Kurrailee, belong to Havelee or to the Nizamut Mehals. The proceeding and report of the 9th December, 1843, are set fully forth in the evidence, showing that Ghauts Marug, Kurrailee, etc., were included in Mr. Beadon's settlement, were before the Court. The decision was, that [106] the Moonsiff's decree should be upheld, and that it was impossible to determine the proprietary right except in a regular suit, in which the two claimants should be Plaintiff and Defendant. Not the least important part of this proceeding is that Rajah Bidianund Singh, in his answer in the suit, alleged that the Ghauts did not appertain to the rent-free Pergunnah Havelee, that the Revenue Surveyor had excepted them from the measurement. The objectors do not contest this last proposition, but insist that they are attached to Havelee, and do not belong to Purbutparah. Both sides, then, seem to admit that the subject of dispute was beyond the measured area and the confines of Ellis's map. There are similar decisions to the above in other suits specified and set forth in the Court below. The last is as late as the 15th of July, 1847.

Another instance of litigation involving the same issue is that in which Syud Reaz Ali, claiming as farmer of Tuppah Lodwah, was the suing party. By a proceeding of the 20th of November, 1843, the Collector of Monghyr, before whom this person had brought a summary suit to recover rent alleged to be due from one Omachurn, then an occupier of part of the Boondee Mehal, the Defendant having pleaded that the property in respect of which he was sued was part of Havelee, and had been settled with Ruhmut Ali Khan, called for the Settlement proceeding, and, in its absence, for a report from the Collector of Bhagulpore whether Mehal Boondee of Ghauts Kurrailee and Komaruk (obviously the same as Koh Marug) was comprised within the Settlement rights of Ruhmut Ali Khan, or was appended to any other Mehal.

[107] There is a report of the Record keeper which purports to bear date the 13th of November, 1843, which was apparently made in answer to this requisition, though there is an inaccuracy in the printed date. It confirms the fact of the settlement as alleged by the Defendant. On this coming in, the suit was finally disposed of by Mr. Vansittart, the Collector, who dismissed the suit as one which he was incompetent to try, with liberty to the Plaintiff to sue in the Civil Court, if so advised. By this proceeding, it appears that Wahid Khan, the then farmer of Ghauts Marug, Kurrailee, etc., under Havelee, had intervened in the suit against his sub-tenant.

Again, the proceedings of the Collector of Bhagulpore of the 11th of November, 1843, those of the 9th of December in the same year, and the proceeding of the 19th of March, 1844, on the petition of Syud Reaz Ali, a farmer of Tuppah, Lokwah, all point to the conclusion that during the investigation which led to the settlement of Mr. Piron, Meaz Reaz Ali, claiming title under Rajah Bidianund Singh, if not Rajah Bidianund Singh himself, was unsuccessfully resisting the inclusion of the Bunkur of Ghauts Marug, Kurrailee, etc., in the settlement of Havelee. The proceeding of the same Collector of the 11th of May, 1844, is also some evidence of this.

It appears that Peer Ali Khan Soobahdar delivered over possession of Ghauts Marug, Kurrailee, and the other Ghauts comprised in his farm, to the purchaser of Havelee at the sale for arrears of revenue in November, 1845, or attorned as tenant to him.

These contentious proceedings certainly afford a strong inference that Ghauts

Marug, Kurrailee, and others, which were included in the settlement, were some [108] thing beyond the limits of the measured area and Captain Ellis's map. It is impossible to read them without believing that the parties knew well what they were disputing about, and that each was claiming the same things. It is not probable that these things were within the measured area. Rajah Bidianund Singh could hardly push his pretensions so far as to claim anything within that area. On the contrary, as we have seen in Kishna Tewarry's case, his contention was that the things claimed were beyond the measured area, and, therefore, belonged to him, and the opposite party seems to have admitted the fact and denied the consequence. Had one of the parties been claiming a Ghaut in one part of a mountain range, and the other insisting on his right to retain a Ghaut of the same name in another part of the range, it is inconceivable that there should be no trace of such a mistake in the pleadings of the parties, the reports of the Collectors, and the judgments of the Courts. In truth, the mention of the farm sometimes of Rujjib Ali, sometimes of Wahid Khan, in these proceedings, almost establishes the identity of the subject in dispute with the subject of the settlement.

The proceedings of the Officers employed in the topographical survey also bear upon this point.

Of the reports of Talib Kurream and Syud Hossein, Thachabust Ameens, dated respectively the 28th of February and the 10th of February, 1847, both in answer to the petitions from Rajah Bidianund Singh and the orders thereon, it is sufficient to say that if they have no other value, they at least prove that when these persons passed from admitted portions of Pergunnah Purbutparah in the course of their survey into the disputed territory, they were met by [109] claims on the part of Rooder Singh and his tenants; and a bona fide contention whether the land on which they stood, which they went to survey, and as to the locality whereof there could be no mistake, belonged to the Nizamut Mehals; or, as appertaining to some of the Ghauts in question, was part of Havelee.

Then came the proceeding of Mr. John Brown on the 5th of April, 1847, in which both the parties were in presence. Mr. Brown's conclusion is no doubt against the view contended for by the Respondent, that the ownership of the revenue of these Ghauts imports the ownership of land in excess of the measured area, but his proceeding sufficiently shows that what the parties were claiming was in the disputed territory; one witness at least (Lushkurree Lall) connects the property claimed with the former holding of Soobahdar Khan; and though Mr. John Brown, in his eight reason, suggests that the Ghauts Marug and Kurrailee, that were settled, are within the measured area, he does not point out where they are situated. Nor was there any suggestion on the part of the opposite party that Rooder Singh had shifted the locality of the property, so long in dispute between Havelee and the Nizamut Mehals. Mr. Brown's decision seems to have been overruled by Mr. Quintin, mainly on the ground that it proceeded on his construction of the settlement without regard to the evidence of possession.

Then followed the proceeding of the Deputy Collector, Surfraez Ali, of the 29th of December, 1847, in which there may be some false reasoning as to some of the points before him, but which clearly establishes that the Ghauts there claimed as comprised in the settlement of 1844, were the Ghauts of those names in the [110] disputed territory, and were sworn to by Soobahdar Khan, who seems to have ceased to have any interest in the question, to be the Ghauts that were comprised in his lease. It seems very difficult to question the finding of this Officer making a local investigation, that the identity of the Ghauts claimed with those settled was made out.

Again, Captain Sherwill, the Revenue Surveyor, was a European officer of rank and of scientific reputation. He is at least entitled to credit for knowing his own business of topographer. He seems to have come by another road to the same conclusion as the Ameens, viz. that a large hilly district belonging to Havelee, and comprising these Ghauts, had been omitted from Ellis's map. He may be no authority touching questions of property, but he must at least be taken to have laid down accurately in his map the positions of the Ghauts known in the district as Marug, Kurrailee, and by other names, about which the parties were disputing before the Ameen. His personal examination of the district is recorded in Mr. Quintin's final proceeding of the 24th June, 1848, at p. 171. On the other hand it is to be observed that Captain Ellis's map does not profess to fix the sites of these Ghauts. Their existence within its boundaries is mere matter of speculation suggested by the ingenious and able argument of the Attorney-General, who did not attempt to point out precisely where they were situate.

This evidence, however, seems to us to point for the most part rather to what was claimed as belonging to Havelee than to the nature and character of the Bunkur and Boondee Mehals above mentioned, and of the revenue arising from the Ghauts, of which, in part at [111] least, they consisted; and certainly it does not satisfy us that Havelee, if entitled to any part, was entitled to the whole of the land in question in right of these Bunkur and Boondee Mehals and Ghauts. It is to be remembered that we have here to deal with a tract of land of enormous extent surrounded by Havelee and other Pergunnahs, and it is not easy to suppose that so large a tract of land should have escaped the attention of Captain Ellis, if the whole of it belonged to Havelee at the time of its being resumed; neither can we easily suppose that this large tract of land could have been intended to have been included in the Havelee settlement under the description of Sayers and cesses, when we find that other land of precisely the same quality and character was in that settlement described as land. We find, too, that the Officers of the survey have, as we have already pointed out, given to Havelee more than in our opinion belongs to it, and looking to the whole of the evidence in the case, we cannot see our way to conclude judicially that they have been right in giving to it the rest of the land in question.

We agree, indeed, with the majority of the Sudder Judges, that the Appellant has failed to prove that no part of the disputed territory was included in the Settlement, and that he has failed to prove by independent evidence his right to recover the Mouzals specified in the plaint; but we cannot think that they were right in determining the case upon the mere failure on his part to support the burthen of proof cast upon him. Their judgment is not like one in ejectment under the old procedure: it is as final and conclusive between the parties as an adjudication on the merits would be. And its effect, as we have shown, is to [112] give to Havelee some things which, on the evidence, we think belong to the Nizamut Mehals.

In these circumstances, the case, we think, is one which calls for further inquiry; but in saying this we by no means mean to intimate that the Appellant can be relieved from the burthen of proof. On the contrary, we think that there has been so much of possession on the part of Havelee that the burthen of proof must still rest upon the Appellant.

For the reasons which we have given, we think that this decree cannot be supported in its integrity, and the Order which we shall humbly recommend Her Majesty to make upon this appeal will be,—

To reverse the decree, but without prejudice to any question which may arise upon the inquiries to be made as after directed;

To declare the Appellant entitled to the Mouzals Goormah and Ghorakhore, and the lands comprised therein and belonging thereto, and to all such other parts of any of the lands in question in the suit as are not included in the settlement of Havelee;

To declare that the settlement of Havelee comprises only the measured area of 123,207 beegahs, and so much of any of the land in dispute as upon the inquiries after directed may appear to belong or be properly attributable to the Bunkur and Boondee Mehals in the pleadings mentioned, or to the Ghauts, of which the same in part consist; and that the rights of Havelee in respect of Bakum do not extend beyond the 129 beegahs and 19 biswas mentioned in Beadon's settlement, and which are included in the 123,207 beegahs;

To inquire what is the nature and character of the Bunkur Boondee Mehals, and of the Ghauts comprised therein respectively which are included in Piron's settlement, and are therein estimated at S.Rs. 116; and whether the same, or any, and which of them, included any and what part of, or any and what right or interest in the land in question in this suit;

To declare that so much of the land in question in this suit as may upon such inquiry appear to be comprised in the said Bunkur and Boondee Mehals or Ghauts belongs to Havelee, and that the Appellant is entitled to recover the residue of the land in question, and to direct the Court to proceed in the suit as upon the result of such inquiry may appear to be just;

To direct any costs of the suit already paid to be refunded, and the Court to deal with such costs, and all the other costs of the suit, including the costs of this appeal, as may seem just, having regard to the declarations aforesaid, and to the result of the said inquiry :

To declare that this Order is to be without prejudice to any proceedings which may hereafter be taken for the settlement of Haveli.

[114] SALIGRAM and HURNARAYUN.—Appellants: MIRZA AZIM ALI BEG.
Respondent * [Dec. 12, 1864].

On appeal from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of the Province of Oude.

By sec. 9 of the Limitation Rules for the guidance of Civil Courts in Oude, as explained by the Circular Order of the Judicial Commissioner, No. 104 of 1860, the limitation of suits is fixed for three years in "suits for money lent for a fixed period, or for interest payable on a specified date, or dates, or for breach of contract, unless there is a written engagement or contract, and where Registry Offices existed at the time such engagement was registered, within six months of its date." That section held not to apply in the case of a Bond executed in 1855, before the annexation of Oude, when there was no Registry at the place it was made, and sued for in 1860, such transaction falling within section 14 of that Circular Order, where the period of limitation is, six years for "all suits on Bonds registered within six months of their date, or on Bonds formally attested when there was no means of registry, and all other suits for which no other limitation is expressly provided by these rules"; and a decree of the Judicial Commissioner of Oude, holding that a suit on the Bond was barred by the three years' limitation, provided by section 9 of the rules, reversed on appeal.

Quære, whether the rule of limitation as a bar to the suit, can be entertained without being pleaded [10 Moo. Ind. App. 120].

This appeal was brought from a decision of the Judicial Commissioner for the Province of Oude, which affirmed a judgment of the Civil Judge of Lucknow, by which the suit of the Appellants brought to recover Rs. 10,000 and interest was dismissed on the ground that it was barred by the rule of limita-[115]-tion applicable thereto. The question raised by the appeal turned solely on the point of limitation.

It appeared that on the 23rd of November, 1855, the Respondent being indebted to the Appellants, then carrying on business as Bankers at Lucknow, in the sum of Rs. 10,000, gave them a Bond for the repayment of that amount and interest, by monthly instalments of Rs. 1000. This Bond was executed by the Respondent according to the native method which prevailed at that time between Bankers and their customers in Lucknow, but was not registered, there being no Registry Office or law or Regulation in force at that time by virtue of which it could have been registered.

In the beginning of the year 1856, the Kingdom of Oude was annexed to the Territories of the East India Company, and was thenceforward known as the non-Regulation Province of Oude, and on the 4th of February in that year, by a despatch of the Governor-General of India, the Courts of the Judicial Commissioner and Civil Judge were established for the administration of justice in that province.

At the time of the annexation of Oude the Respondent had paid nothing on account of the Bond. After the annexation the Appellants continued to demand payment of their money, but the Respondent put them off on various pretexts. In the meantime the rebellion broke out, and the Appellants were obliged to leave Lucknow. On the restoration of the British authority, the Appellants again applied to the Respondent for payment, and were again met by various excuses; in consequence, the Appellants, on the 7th of August, 1860, filed a plaint in the Court of the Civil Judge at Lucknow, for recovery of the principal and [116] interest due on the Bond, then amounting to Rs. 18,630.

The Respondent put in a plea, in which he alleged that the money for which the Bond was given had been borrowed by him as Agent for the ex-King of Oude, and that he had executed the Bond in his own name only in accordance with the then prevailing custom. He also objected that the date of the Bond had been altered, and denied that he ever had received the money.

The suit was heard, and on the 15th of October, 1860, Mr. Fraser, the Civil Judge, delivered his judgment, in which, after fully investigating the accounts between the parties and over-ruling the Respondent's objections, he dismissed the suit, on the ground that it had not been brought within three years from the date of the Bond. The Civil Judge in his judgment, after stating that the interval which had elapsed between the date of the Bond and the institution of the suit was four years, eight months, and fourteen days, proceeded as follows:—"Circular Order, No. 104 of 1860, supersedes the previous rules of limitation, and this suit was instituted after the promulgation of the new rules. These contain no prospective period of warning, so that I feel precluded from acting on the Officiating Judicial Commissioners' construction of Circular Order, No. 51 of 1859, which gave such Bonds as the present, the limitation of six years, as well attested Bonds, for when that Circular was cancelled, the Order, which is merely a construction of its provisions, was in effect cancelled too. But there remains a point which I suppose must have been fully considered, though it stands unexplained. Circular [117] Order 104 introduces Act, No. XIV. of 1859, as of immediate effect, while the last section of that Act prohibits its taking effect in any non-Regulation Province until two years after notice."

The Appellants being dissatisfied with this judgment, proceeding, as they contended, upon an erroneous view of the law of limitation applicable to their case, appealed to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner.

The Judicial Commissioner (Mr. G. Campbell) by his judgment, pronounced on the 14th of December, 1860, after observing that he had laid down his interpretation of the law of limitation as affecting such cases in Circular, No. 181, dated the 11th of December, 1860, proceeded as follows:—"It is quite clear to me that the Bond in this case is not one formally attested after the native method, and which should rank with registered Bonds. On the contrary, it is a mere unattested note of hand, and I think that not only the law, but equity, would give a short limitation in such cases under circumstances such as this. The defence is, that the money was drawn for matters connected with the Defendant's position as an Official of the late Government, and the informal character of the document favours the idea of its being an affair for prompt settlement. I think, therefore, that the three-year limit applies." After remarking that the case seemed a somewhat hard one, and that he should have been glad if a compromise could have been effected, the Judicial Commissioner confirmed the decision and dismissed the appeal, directing each party to pay their own costs in both Courts.

There being no provisions by Statute or Charter for [118] appeals from the decision of the Judicial Commissioner of the Province of Oude, in order to prevent the denial of justice leave to appeal was, upon special petition, allowed by the Judicial Committee under the Statute, 3rd and 4th Will. IV. c. 41 (see case reported on this point, nom. Salik Ram v. Azim Ali Beg, 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 270).

As the Respondent did not appear, the appeal was heard ex parte.

Mr. Hobhouse, Q.C., and Mr. Cave, for the Appellants.—At the date of the contract, which was prior to the annexation of Oude by the Government, the Mahomedan law was in force in Oude, and by that law there was no rule of limitation to bar the Plaintiff's suit. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Moohumadan law," ch. XII., sec. 1, p. 76. Since the annexation various rules of limitation have at different times been regarded as in force in Oude, some of which were promulgated by Circular Orders of the Judicial Commissioner, without, as we submit, any authority for that purpose. At first the general twelve years rule, established by Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec 14, appears to have been considered in force in Oude, although Oude being a non-Regulation Province, the Regulations were not applicable thereto. In December, 1856, the Punjab Amendment of that rule by which the limitation of actions of debt or contract, excepting partnership accounts, was reduced from twelve to six years, appears to have been applied to the Province of Oude, and was considered to have come into operation on the 1st of June, 1857, in accordance with notice to that effect; and again, the Circular [119] Order of the 26th of March, 1859, No. 51, introduced further alterations in the rule of limitation after six months from the promulgation of that Circular; but the only legislative enactment imposing limitations of that kind is the Act, No. XIV. of 1859. That Act, however, does not bar the Appellants' rights, for two reasons: first, it is framed so as not to affect suits instituted, as this case is, in a non-Regulation Province within the period of two years from the date of the extension of the Act to that Province; secondly, if it affected this suit, it would allow the period of limitation to be six years, being founded on a written contract, which at the time and place of its execution could not be registered. Assuming the Circular Orders to have the force of law in Oude, the rules in force when the suit was instituted was No. 104 of 1860, which superseded Circular Order No. 51 of 1859; and the limitation for such a suit as the present is, by Circular Order, No. 104 of 1860, six years, as the suit, being founded on a written contract incapable of registry, falls within the exception of Rule 9, and is, therefore, provided for by Rule 14 of that Order. Section 10 certainly does not apply, as it refers to money lent for no definite period. Even if it could be held that the law in force when the suit was commenced was the Circular Order, No. 51 of 1859, the suit would fall within the six-year rather than the three-year limit, being founded on a Bond formally attested and duly executed.

Although the Respondent in his pleadings has admitted his execution of the Bond, yet he has not raised the defence of limitation at all. All he pleads is an unfounded hypothesis that the date was fraudulently altered by the Appellants.

[120] The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner.—There are some points in this case upon which their Lordships do not think it necessary to give any opinion.

They give no opinion upon the question whether the Regulation of limitations could or could not be made available without being pleaded; or upon the question whether this Bond ought to be considered as a Bond "formally attested" within the meaning of the Circular Order, No. 51 of 1859, or upon the question whether there is or is not in force, in the Province of Oude, any period of limitation.

These points may, as their Lordships think, be laid out of the case; and as to the Circular Order No. 51, they are of opinion, that it cannot be resorted to or applied in the present case, because there was a proclamation on the 31st of July, 1860, before this action was brought, by which that Circular Order was expressly repealed.

The Circular Order, No. 51, being then out of the case, the question to be decided must depend upon the Act of the 4th of May, 1859 (No. XIV. of 1859), or upon the Circular Order, No. 104 of 1860.

As to the Act of the 4th of May, 1859, it is clear, in their Lordships' judgment, that it cannot affect the question, because it was not to come into force in any non-Regulation Province until two years after a period to be fixed by proclamation, and those two years had not elapsed when the plaint was filed.

The case, therefore, is reduced to the single point, what is the effect of the Circular Order, No. 104?

Now assuming, as their Lordships do (that being the view most favourable to the Respondent), that this Order was in force (and their Lordships observe [121] that it was upon this Order the case appears to have been considered in the Court below to depend), its effect must, in their Lordships' judgment, rest entirely on the 9th and 14th sections of the Order; the 10th section, which was referred to in the argument, relating exclusively to "suits for money lent for no definite period," and it being clear that this suit was for money lent for a definite period. Let us consider, then, first, the effect of the 9th section, which has reference to suits in which the period of limitation is to be three years. It is in these terms: "Suits for money lent for a fixed period, or for interest payable on a specified date or dates, or for breach of contract, unless there is a written engagement or contract, and where registry offices existed at the time such engagement was registered within six months of its date, and signed by the party to be bound thereby, or his duly authorized agent."

Their Lordships understand this section, especially when contrasted with the 10th section, to mean that the rule referred to in it, is not to apply where there is a written engagement, and where, there being a written engagement, it is registered within six months of its date in cases in which a Registry Office existed at the date of the engagement; and there being, in this case, a written engagement and no Registry Office at the date of the engagement, they think that the section does not affect the case.

Then section 14, which has reference to suits in which the period of limitation is to be six years, is in these terms: "All suits on Bonds registered within six months of their date, or on Bonds formally attested when there were no means of registering, and [122] all other suits for which no other limitation is expressly provided by these rules."

Now, as their Lordships have said, they give no opinion upon the question whether this is to be considered as a Bond "formally attested when there were no means of registering." If, on the one hand, it be so considered, the case clearly falls within the first branch of the section: but if, on the other hand, it be not so considered, the case as clearly falls within the other words of the section, "all other suits for which no other limitation is expressly provided by these rules."

Upon this ground, therefore, their Lordships are of opinion, that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the Plaintiffs in the action. It may be right to add, that the Circular Order, No. 181, has not been overlooked, but that their Lordships do not consider it effectual to alter the view which they have taken of the case. The Plaintiffs are, in their Lordships' opinion, entitled to judgment for the debt and costs, and they must have the costs of the appeal. Their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty so to order accordingly.

[123] RANEE SURNOMOYEE.—Appellant: MAHARAJAH SUTTEESCHUNDER ROY, Bahadoor,—Respondent * [June 17, 18, 1864].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

Suit by a Zemindar against a mesne tenant of his Zemindary, holding by hereditary tenure, in the nature of a Mouroosee Istemraree, to enhance the rent of the lands which had been held by the tenant and his predecessors anterior to the Decennial Settlement at an invariable fixed rent, dismissed.

By section 5 of Ben. Reg. XLIV. of 1793, it is provided, that when a Zemindary is sold by public sale for discharge of arrears due from the Zemindar, or others, to Government, "all engagements which such proprietor shall have contracted with dependent Talookdars, whose Talooks may be situated in the lands sold, as also all the leases to under farmers and Pottahs to Ryots for the cultivation of the whole or any part of such lands (with the exception of the engagements, Pottahs and leases, specified in secs. 7 and 8), shall stand cancelled from the day of sale, and the purchaser, or purchasers, of the lands shall be at liberty to collect from such dependent Talookdar, and from the Ryots or cultivators of the lands let in farm, and the lands not farmed, whatever the former proprietor would have been entitled to demand according to the established usages and rates of the Pergunnah, or District, in which such lands may be situated, had the engagements so cancelled never existed." And the 7th section provides, that section 5 is not to authorize the assessment of any increase upon the lands of such dependent Talookdars as were exempted from increase by sec. 41 of Reg. VIII. of 1793 at the Decennial settlement of 1793.

In 1823, a Zemindar fell into arrears of revenue, and Government sold the Zemindary at public sale for discharge of the arrears due, whereby the auction purchaser acquired such rights to cancel leases, etc., as then existed: but he took no steps under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822, secs. 30, 32, 33, which gave power to a purchaser to cancel the leases, or to enhance the rent, nor was any claim in that respect made by subsequent purchasers from him, until the year 1856, when the Zemindar then in possession brought a suit to enhance the rent. Held, reversing the Sudder and Zillah Courts' decree:

First, that the tenure, a Mouroosee Istemraree, under which the Defendant held was hereditary, and as it had been uninterruptedly held anterior to the Decennial Settlement at a fixed rent, the Zemindar had no power to enhance the rent.

Secondly, that such a tenure was not cancelled, ipso facto, by the sale in 1823, as the language in sec. 7 of Ben. Reg. XLIV. of 1793 showed that what was intended by sec. 5 of that Regulation was not the destruction of the tenure, but the enhancement of rent, under certain specified and equitable limitations.

Whether such power is not confined to the auction purchaser himself, and not to those claiming under him. Quære.

When false witnesses or forged documents are produced to support a case, such fact naturally creates suspicion; but if the appellate Court has to deal with a just case, though foolishly and wickedly attempted to be supported by false evidence, such circumstance will not prejudice the judgment on the merits, when the case is supported by independent evidence.

So ruled, when their Lordships were satisfied from the evidence that an ancient tenure existed, which was endeavoured to be supported by a forged document and evidence [10 Moo. Ind. App. 149, 150].

Such document being impeached, as being forged on the face of it, the case was directed to stand over for the original document to be transmitted from India for inspection at the hearing of the appeal.

The Appellant, a Talookdar, holding under the Respondent as Zemindar, was in possession of lands, on which certain buildings were erected, situate in [124] Dehee Shurruck Gobindnuggur, in Pergunnah Ookhra, under a Mouroosee Istemraree, an ancient tenure, which had been held at a perpetual fixed rent for sixty years previous to the Decennial Settlement.

The Respondent, who was a purchaser under mesne assignment from, and deriving title through, a previous purchaser of the Zemindary in the year 1823, at a public sale for arrears of Government revenue, under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822, claimed the right to enhance or raise the rent hitherto paid by the Appellant, and those under whom she derived title. The suit was brought by the Respondent's father for that object.

The facts of the case were these:—

[125] Alexander Seaton, a former Collector of the Zillah of Nuddea, obtained previous to the Decennial Settlement from the then Zemindar, Maharajah Kisto Chunder Bahadoor, a Mouroosee Istemraree Pottah, creating an hereditary tenure in respect of 128 beegahs and 4 cottahs of land situate within his Zemindary, called Pergunnah Ookhra, at a perpetual fixed rent of Rs. 64. 1p. 12a. Seaton sold the land and factories erected thereon to Rajah Lokenauth Roy, Bahadoor (the grandfather of Rajah Kristonauth Roy, the husband of the Appellant), who paid to the Zemindar for the time being the same fixed rent. On Rajah Lokenauth's death, his son, the late Rajah Hurrenauth Roy, Bahadoor, succeeded, as his heir-at-law, to the land, also paying the same fixed rent.

About this time the Zemindar in possession allowed the Government revenue payable by him in respect of the Zemindary to fall into arrear; and, in consequence, in the year 1823, the Government Collector, under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822, sold the Zemindary by public auction to one Moodoo Soodun Sandial.

After the sale, Rajah Hurrenauth Roy attorned to Moodoo Soodun Sandial, as such purchaser, and the latter received payment of the same fixed rent from the Rajah during the time that he remained the proprietor of the Zemindary. The purchaser did not take any proceedings under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822, secs. 30, 32, and 33, with the view of avoiding or annulling the tenure on which the land was held or to enhance the rent payable in respect thereof; nor did he in any manner question the title of the Rajah, or the validity of the tenure; but received the same rent. Subsequently, a Mr. Harris [126] purchased the Zemindary from Moodoo Soodun Sandial, and he also received from Rajah Hurrenauth Roy the same fixed rent.

On Harris's death, his widow became the proprietor of the Zemindary, and received the same fixed rent from the Rajah. On the Rajah's death, his son, Rajah Kristonauth Roy succeeded as heir to the land. In the year 1845, Maharajah Sreesh Chunder, Bahadoor, became the purchaser by private sale of the Zemindary, from Mrs. Harris. Some time in the year 1846, Rajah Kristonauth Roy died, leaving the Appellant his widow and heiress-at-law.

It appeared that by an Ijará (lease), dated the 15th Cheyt, 1256 (1849), Sreesh Chunder Roy leased the Dehee Shurrack Gobindnuggur for six years to one Sreenauth Roy (who was originally made a Defendant, but who was no party to the appeal), upon the terms that a measurement should be made at the joint expense of the lessor and the Ijaradar; and that afterwards, in the year 1855, the Ijaradar not being able to concur in making the measurement, a measurement was made by the Zemindar, and in such measurement it was found that the Appellant was in occupation of the land in question, and was paying an inadequate rent according to the current Pergunnah rates. Accordingly, on the 25th Jeyt, 1263 (1856), a notice of an intended enhanced rent under sec. 9, Ben. Reg. V. of 1812, was issued with the jumma wassil papers.

On the 15th of August, 1856, a suit was instituted in the Civil Court of Zillah Nuddea by the Respondent's father, Maharajah Sreesh Chunder Roy, Bahadoor, against the Appellant, and Sreenauth Roy, [127] to recover from her an enhanced rent, estimated at Rs. 1470, according to the rates current in the village, of the houses and lands in her occupation.

The Appellant, by her answer, among other things, stated that more than sixty years before the year 1856, and previous to the Decennial Settlement, Seaton took of the then Zemindar a Mouroosee Istemraree Pottah on an annual rent of Rs. 64. 1a. 12p., and having erected some factories and buildings, sold his interest to Lokenauth Roy, Bahadoor, the Appellant's husband's grandfather; that on his death it passed to his son, Hurrenauth Roy, and from him to his grandson, Kristonauth Roy, the Appellant's husband, and from him to her; that on the 23rd Bysack, 1230 (1823), during Hurrenauth Roy's lifetime, he, not being able to lay his hands on the Mouroosee Pottah granted to Seaton, in consequence of confusion in his office during his minority, obtained from Muddoo Soodun Sandial, who had purchased the Zemindary at auction sale for arrears of Government revenue, a Mouroosee Pottah at the same rent, with a condition that the rent should "never undergo any increase or diminution;" and the Appellant further alleged, that the rent having been paid, it was not competent to the Zemindar, who claimed as a private purchaser under Muddoo Soodun Sandial, the auction purchaser and grantor of the Pottah, to enhance the rent. She further objected that Seaton's Pottah being for the erection of a factory, the case fell within the fourth exception out of the 26th sect. of Act, No. I. of 1845, and was, therefore, exempted from enhancement of rent within the meaning of that section. The Appellant filed with her [128] answer the alleged Pottah of the 23rd Bysack, 1230, from Muddoo Soodun Sandial.

The Respondent in his replication (his father Shreesh Chunder Roy having died in the meantime) denied all the allegations in the answer in reference to the creation of any lease at a fixed and permanent rent; and, with regard to Mr. Seaton, he observed that, before the Decennial Settlement, to which period it was necessary to carry the creation of the tenure back to make it binding on an auction purchaser, there was a prohibition against the grant of perpetual leases to Europeans holding office in the Mefussil; and, in reference to the Pottah by Muddoo Soodun Sandial, he alleged that in several proceedings since the alleged execution of it, no mention of it whatever was made, when, if it existed in fact, it would have been mentioned.

The material issue was, whether the possession of the Appellant of the land, which was sued for, was held under a Mouroosee title, with a Mocurrery Istemaree jumma.

No evidence was offered by the Respondent in proof of the statements made by him in his pleadings, or to disprove any of the Appellant's statements or the facts which were proved by her witnesses.

The Appellant put in evidence the alleged confirmatory Pottah; the dakhilas, or receipts for rent, a Mooktearnmah signed and recorded by the late Maharajah Sreesh Chunder, Bahadoor, as well as a petition and report signed in the name of the late Maharajah, which acknowledged the title of the Appellant's husband and herself to the land in question. No document was put in evidence anterior to [129] the alleged confirmatory Pottah of 1823. Six witnesses were examined. Four of these witnesses deposed to the signing and delivery of that instrument by Muddoo Soodun Sandial. Among the other witnesses, one proved the dakhilas for rent given by the late Zemindar, Mr. Harris; another, who was at the time in the Respondent's service as Mooktear, proved the signing the dakhila, which bore the name of the first Ijardar of the late Maharajah; and a third proved the signing and granting the three other dakhilas, bearing the name of the second Ijardar of the late Maharajah; and each of which dakhilas acknowledged the Mouroosee tenure, or Mouroosee jumma (perpetual rent), under which the land in question was held.

The hearing of the suit came on before Ray Ram Lockun Ghose, Bahadoor, the Principal Sudder Ameen, who considered the Pottah a forged document, and on the 19th of November, 1857, a decree was pronounced by him in favour of the Respondent at an enhanced rent of Rs. 822. 3., which enhanced rent the Appellant was decreed and ordered thereafter to pay in respect of the lands in question.

The Appellant appealed from this decree to the Zillah Court of Nuddea, and an appeal was also brought against a portion of the Sudder Ameen's decree by the Respondent.

The hearing of the two appeals took place on the 21st of July, 1858, when the Judge, Mr. A. Littledale, made a decree, the material part of which was in these terms:—"The Plaintiff sues to re-assess certain lands in the occupancy of Defendant, in accordance with the rates of the Pergunna. The Defendant denies his right to do so, on the ground of her holding [130] the lands under a Mocurrery lease, granted to her deceased husband's father in 1230 by a former proprietor, Muddoo Soodun Sandial, in recognition of a similar lease granted to Mr. Seaton before the Decennial Settlement, by the ancestors of the Plaintiff, who were at that time owners of the estate. The question admits of two points for inquiry. First, whether the validity of the Mocurrery lease granted in 1230 is satisfactorily proved; secondly, whether, irrespective of that lease, the right of Defendant to hold the lands without re-assessment is established. The objections taken by the Principal Sudder Ameen against the document, on account of incorrect spelling observable in it, are, in my opinion, weak and unimportant. It is urged on the part of the Rajah that it neither bears the seal of the grantor nor the names of any persons as subscribing witnesses. The first of these objections is of more weight than the second, and is entitled to consideration. As to the second, it is not usual for leases to be signed by witnesses. The document in question, according to the date of it, was written more than thirty years ago, and, considering the length of time that has elapsed since its alleged execution, the appearance of it is calculated to raise strong suspicion as to its ever having been written at that period; and unless satisfactorily supported by other evidence, I do not hold it in itself entitled to credit. Four witnesses have come forward to swear to its genuineness; but that circumstance alone throws suspicion upon it: for it cannot be considered otherwise than surprising that it should so happen, that after the lapse of more than thirty years there should be found four persons who all remember to have been present at the execution of a document, which is not of such a very important nature as to cause [131] the recollection of it likely to be indelibly fixed on their memory; but, with the exception of the evidence of these witnesses, there is none of any other kind to support it. It is not shown to have been ever before produced; and there is not a document of any kind in which mention of it is made. Under these circumstances, I concur with the Principal Sudder Ameen in rejecting it as unworthy of credit. Coming now to the second point forming the subject of this issue, it is first argued on the part of the Defendant, that the Plaintiff is debarred from re-assessing the lands by reason of their being of the nature described in the fourth exception in section 26, Act, No. I., 1845. Of this there is no proof, the original lease under which the lands are said to have been granted not being forthcoming. The Pleader on the part of the Defendant next refers me to the Sudder Court's decision, in the case of Janubee Dasse, on the 27th May, 1848, p. 175, which he urges is of a nature very similar to the present suit. In that case the Plaintiff was not a purchaser at a sale made for arrears of revenue; whereas in this suit the plaintiff is the successor (by right of purchase) of one who was such, and consequently stands in his place, and must be held as entitled to exercise the same rights. Now, the simple question is whether (the authenticity of the alleged lease of 1230 by Muddoo Soodun Sandial, not being established) the Defendant can be considered to have proved her right to hold the lands on a fixed jumma, or not? She has produced no grant or document constituting the original Mocurrery tenure, and has failed to prove the payment of a fixed jumma for twelve consecutive years previous to the Decennial Settlement, or for a period of sixty years. Granted [132] that it has not been shown that Defendant has ever paid more than a jumma of Rs. 64. 1. 12., and that such has been stated to be the case by the Plaintiff's predecessor, Mrs. Harris, that cannot be, in the absence of all proof as to the lands having been held as Isteuraree or Mocurrery at a fixed jumma more than twelve years before the Decennial Settlement, or for sixty years at that rent, any bar to the Plaintiff's right to enhance the rent of the lands. The only documentary evidence produced in support of the payment of the alleged fixed jumma are seven dakhilas for a period commencing from 1250. I consider, therefore, that on this second point there is an entire failure of proof in favour of the Defendant, and that the Plaintiff's right to enhance the rent of the lands is clear:—and with the exception of a variation of the amount of that enhanced rent the Zillah Judge confirmed the Sudder Ameen's decree.

The Appellant presented a petition of special appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, stating therein the following grounds of appeal:—First, that although the reasons contained in the decision of the Zillah Court for rejecting the Pottah of 1230 B.S. were defective and groundless; yet, independent of that, when possession from ancient times by payment of a Mocurrery rent had been proved, and the Pottah of 1230 could not but be deemed to be worthy of confirmation, then no assessment of rent could take place, either by law or justice. That, in fact, it clearly appeared that one fixed rent was uniformly paid from the time of Mr. Seaton, who was appointed Collector of Zillah Nuddea in 1797. That under such circumstances, a suit for assessment of rent could not, either by law or justice, be right or [133] proper. Second, that Mrs. Harris, of whose rights the Plaintiff was a private purchaser, had in her petition, dated 7th Bysack, 1251, distinctly acknowledged that, from the time of Mr. Seaton, the rents of this land had been regularly paid at Rs. 64. 1. 12.; consequently the Plaintiff, who represented her, could never possess the right to assess the rent. Third; that Maharajah Sreesh Chunder Roy, the father of the Plaintiff, had in a kyfeut dated the 6th Falgoun, 1253, and in a petition dated 18th Aughrum, 1252, after acknowledging the Mouroosee right and fixed rent, prayed to obtain the same, and for that reason the suit for assessment should be dismissed.

The hearing of the special appeal took place before Messrs. A. Sconce and H. V. Bayley, two of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and on the 26th of March, 1859, the following judgment was delivered:—The first point in the special appeal is, that as the under-tenure existed about the time of the Permanent Settlement, the Plaintiff could only carry an order for enhancement on proof that it was liable to be enhanced under the provisions of cl. I. sec. 51, Reg. VIII. of 1793. But this plea obviously falls from its own statement. The word used is "about," that is, it is assumed that the lands in question was first granted to Mr. Seaton, the Collector of the district in 1797; but the Petitioner can only claim the support of the law quoted, on the assumption, that her tenure existed at the time of the Permanent Settlement, not seven years later. And, secondly, it is contended, that the suit is barred, as Plaintiff's predecessors in the estate admitted the existence of the tenure. But we find no admission to sustain this plea. Harris, a former proprietor, [134] once remarked in a petition, that the tenants had paid rent as they chose; and in another petition, the Plaintiff's father spoke of the tenure as a Mouroosee jummah; but we have no intimation at all that any of the proprietors of the estate had recognized the existence of the tenure under distinct terms as to the land comprised in it, and the rent which it bore.

As the rules of the Sudder Dewanny Court with respect to the value of the subject-matter in dispute prevented an application being made to that Court for leave to appeal to England, the Appellant, without applying there, presented a petition for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, which, in the circumstances, was granted (see case reported on this point, nom. Sree Mutty Ranee Surnomoye v. Maharajah Sutteeschunder Roy, 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 165).

The appeal came on in the first instance on the 28th and 30th days of November, 1863, when the genuineness of the original Pottah, dated the 23rd Bysack, 1230 (4th May, 1823,) being impeached by the Respondent as a fabricated document, their Lordships * directed the appeal to stand over for that document to be transmitted from India (see the cases of Mussamat Khoor Komwur v. Baboo Moodnatain Singh, 9 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 10; McCarthy v. Judah, 12 Moore's P.C. Cases, 47; and Mason v. The Att.-Gen. of Jamaica, 4 Moore's P.C. Cases, 228, in which similar Orders to transmit original documents impeached, as in this case, were made). [135] This was accordingly done and the appeal was again argued.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—This question is of great importance, as it affects numerous other persons like the Appellant holding under ancient tenures similar to the one in suit. It is submitted, that the decrees of the Zillah Sudder Courts appealed from cannot be sustained. By those decrees it was declared, that the Plaintiff, a remote purchaser by private contract, deriving title through a purchase of the Zemindary at a public sale to realize arrears of Government revenue, was "entitled to exercise the same rights" as the last-mentioned purchaser, including the extraordinary powers given by the Regulations to purchasers at Government sales for arrears of revenue to avoid and annul sub-tenures created since the Decennial Settlement, but, even if the decree rightly decided the general principle, which we deny, it was wrong in applying the provisions of the public sale law contained in sec. 26 of Act, No. I. of 1845 of the Legislative Council, those provisions being restricted to purchasers of estates sold under that Act, which was not the case in respect to the Zemindary of the Respondent. Regulation XI. of 1822, was the sale law under which the Zemindary of the Respondent had been previously sold in the year 1823, to realize arrears of Government revenue, and from that Regulation the powers of the purchaser, Muddoo Soodun Sandial, to annul or avoid such tenures were exclusively derived. Two important considerations arise upon the construction of secs. 30, 32, and 33, of Reg. XI. of 1822. First, it is a penal Regulation, [136] and must be construed strictly, or equitably in favour of the sub-tenant. Secondly, it declares that the original purchaser "may" exercise this extraordinary power, but this discretion, we submit, must be within a reasonable time after the purchase, and that such right would be absolutely barred after twelve years by the Regulation of Limitation III. of 1793, sec. 14; but Reg. XI. of 1822, which was in force at the time of the sale, has been repealed by Act, No. XII. of 1841, sec. I. without any attempt by the original purchaser to exercise the powers conferred by the last-mentioned Regulation, long before the Plaintiff took any step to exercise the same. The new or substituted powers given by that Act are restricted to purchasers of estates sold under it. The onus was upon the Respondent, to prove that as Zemindar he was entitled to enhance the rent of this ancient tenure, Reg. VIII. 1793, sec. 51, cl. 2, which he failed to do.

Next, with respect to the merits. It appears by the evidence that the lands had always been held as Mouroosee Istemraree by the Respondent and those under whom she derived title, as an ancient hereditary tenure created previous to the Decennial Settlement, subject only to the payment to the Zemindar and of an uniform fixed rent, and the same rent has also been paid by five tenants successively since Seaton's grant. The Appellant has no power of enhancing a fixed rent, S.D.A. Rep., Vol. 11. p. 515, year 1848; S.D.A. Rep., Vol. 16, p. 365, year 1853. Again, the purchaser of the Zemindary at the public sale and those who subsequently became proprietors thereof, from whom the Respondent derived title, have admitted and confirmed [137] the ancient hereditary title of the Appellant to hold the lands in question of the Zemindary at a uniform invariable rent, payable to the Zemindar. A possessory title is made out by the Appellant, and the Respondent is estopped by his own acts and proceedings from disputing the right and title of the Appellant to hold the lands as an ancient hereditary tenure at a uniform fixed rent.

With regard to the evidence, the case divides itself into two heads, first under the confirmatory Pottah, and secondly, the evidence of tenure, independently of it. Now, we submit that the confirmatory Pottah of Muddoo Soodun Sandial, after his purchase at the public sale, was sufficiently proved by the evidence of the attesting witnesses, and moreover that no evidence was given by the Respondent to contradict them, or to show that the signature to the Pottah was not in the grantor's handwriting. But secondly, without such Pottah, even if it be a fabricated document, the other evidence was sufficient to show that the lands were held at an unvarying yearly rent.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Field, Q.C., for the Respondent.—First, the Respondent deriving his title under Muddoo Soodun Sandial, the purchaser at a Government sale under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822, for arrears of revenue, is entitled to enhance the rents of the lands in question, and such lands were liable to be assessed by the Respondent at the current Pergunnah rates. The Respondent has acquired all the rights which Muddoo Soodun Sandial had when he purchased the Zemindary in 1823. By Reg. XLIV. of 1793, sec. 5, such a tenure upon the Government sale, ceased [138] ipso facto to exist without any act being done by the purchaser; and the Respondent, as subsequent purchaser by private contract, is entitled to avail himself of that enactment, as he has the same rights as the "purchaser at public sale" mentioned in the 5th section, and by this Regulation, which is not repealed, to cancel the lease. This lease is not, as contended by the Appellant, a Mouroosee, or inheritable tenure. In the answer the Appellant calls the lands Mocurrery (fixed) and Istemraree (perpetual). Wilson's Glos. It may be that the Court below was wrong in applying the provisions of sec. 26 of the Act, No. I. of 1845, to this case, as it is restricted to sales for Government arrears made under that Act, and, therefore, could not apply to a sale made in 1823, but that arose from the Appellant referring to that Act in her answer. The cases cited by the Appellant do not apply.

Second, there is no evidence of a grant of any Pottah at a fixed and invariable rent to Mr. Seaton at any time before or since the Decennial Settlement. The alleged grant of a confirmatory Pottah by Moodoo Soodun Sandial bears on the face of it evidence of being a fabricated document, and the witnesses examined in support of it, as was held by the Court below, are wholly unworthy of credit. If the Pottah was not made previous to the sale, the purchaser and those claiming under him hold the Zemindary freed of the tenure.

The Attorney-General in reply.—Section 5 of Reg. XLIV. of 1793, which the Respondent relies on as having ipso facto, upon the sale of the Zemindary in 1823, cancelled the [139] Mouroosee Istemraree Pottah under which we hold, is qualified by section 7 of the same Regulation, and at the most, according to a strict construction of those sections, empowers the purchaser to enhance the rent upon equitable principles. In fact, that Regulation was passed to free purchasers from improvident grants made by Talookdars, and to set them free from such obligations. But section 5 of that Regulation if not expressly, is impliedly, repealed by Reg. V. of 1812, sec. 9, and XI. of 1822, sec. 30, 22 and 33, so far as respects hereditary tenures giving a transferable right. The hardship upon grantees and subordinate interests by

Reg. XLIV. of 1793 was so great that an Act was passed in 1859 to modify it. That Act, however, was not in force when this decree was made. Supposing the confirmatory Pottah to be forged and the evidence of the witnesses in support thereof unworthy of credit, that instrument may be left out of consideration, as the other independent evidence of this property being an ancient tenure held at an invariable fixed rent is conclusive.

The judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee, after being reserved, was now delivered by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (July 23, 1861). This was an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta of the 26th of March, 1859, from a decree of the Judge of the Zillah Court of Nuddea, in Bengal, of the 21st of July, 1858, confirming substantially, a decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Nuddea, in Bengal, of the 19th of November, 1857. The suit was originally brought [140] by the Respondent's father, and the relations of the parties to each other were those of Zemindar and Talookdar, the Appellant holding as mesne tenant a portion of the Zemindary. The object of the suit is to enhance the rent at which the Appellant holds that portion, and no question is made upon the Respondent's general title, nor upon the relation in which the Appellant stands towards him. She does not dispute his right, under other circumstances, to bring this sort of action against her, and their Lordships, therefore, do not enter into the question whether the action has been properly so brought. They give no opinion on that point. What the Appellant insists upon is, that this present action must fail because her tenure is hereditary and at a fixed rent, which the Zemindar has no power to enhance.

It will be convenient in the first place to state what, upon the evidence, their Lordships consider to be established as to the Appellant's title, omitting for the present some parts of the evidence on which she relies, and to which too much importance has been, as it appears to their Lordships, attached in the Courts below. The interest which she represents was first created by grant in favour of a Mr. Seaton at some date prior to the commencement of this century. On parts of the land comprised within his grant he laid out gardens and erected factories and other buildings, but there is no direct evidence that the grant was made for these purposes. He appears to have been a Civil servant of the East India Company; and after some years, when leaving India for England, he sold the whole property to the grandfather of the Appellant's husband; on his death it [141] descended to the father, and thence in due course to her husband, from whom she has inherited it as his widow. A portion of the land during this course of years has been granted to the Government, and a public College erected thereon. And during the whole time of the occupation of these five tenants, the same rent has always been paid. Upon this state of facts the Appellant contends that she is not merely a Mouroosee tenant, that is, one holding by hereditary tenure, but that she holds at a fixed rent, and under such circumstances as protect her from any enhancement of it.

The state of facts on the part of the Respondent is this: It appears that while Hurrenauth Roy, Bahadoor, the father of the Appellant's husband, was in possession, the Government revenue payable by the Zemindary fell into arrear, and the property was, therefore, put up to public auction; one Muddoo Soodun Sandial became the purchaser, and he acquired the rights which the then subsisting Regulations gave to a purchaser at such a sale. After some time he sold the Zemindary by private contract to Mr. Harris, from whom, on his death, it passed to his widow; from her it was purchased by the Maharajah Srees Chunder Roy, now deceased, who in August 1856, commenced the present suit, and on his death the Respondent, inheriting the Zemindary, has continued it.

Upon this state of facts the Respondent contends, that as he claims under Muddoo Soodun Sandial, he has acquired all rights which Muddoo Soodun Sandial had, and that as he purchased at a Government auction, he was entitled by the Regulations then in [142] force to cancel the lease under which the Appellant's ancestor was holding, and of course to impose new terms as to the rent.

It is, as it seems to their Lordships, necessary to the Respondent's success, that Muddoo Soodun Sandial should have had in him, at the time when he sold to Mr.

Harris, the rights above stated, so that he himself might at that time have enhanced the rent of these lands: that these rights should have passed to Mr. Harris, and the subsequent purchasers of the property down to and including the Respondent's father; and that they either could not have been or have not been in fact waived by the Respondent's father or by any one of the prior owners, for unless this be the case, their Lordships see no ground on which the hereditary tenure could be disturbed or the rent enhanced.

The reliance of the Respondent is on some one of the Regulations which have been made at different times in regard to purchasers at Government auction sales in the case of Zemindaries, from which the Government income has not been duly paid. These Regulations have been couched in different language, but all with the same policy in view, as regards the present question. It has been assumed, as the foundation of them, that the default of the Zemindar may have been occasioned by improvident grants of Talooks and other subordinate tenures at inadequate rents: that this was in breach of the condition on which the fund was originally created by the Sovereign Power; and the purchaser, therefore, has been set free from the obligation of these grants, with certain specified exceptions, and with certain limita-^[143]tions of his power as to new tenancies to be created. These laws, however, cannot but occasionally operate very hardly on the grantees of subordinate interests, and they have, therefore, been materially modified by an Act of 1859, not in force when this decree was made, and not, therefore, directly applicable to it; but such Regulations must on general principles receive a strict construction. There seems to have been doubt in the minds of the Respondent's advisers on which of these Regulations his case could safely be rested, and it would appear from the proceedings in the Court below that it was intended to rest it on Regulation Act, No. 1 of 1845, which certainly would not have supported it, because the sale relied on was not effected under that Regulation, and its provisions are limited to sales so effected. Upon the argument before their Lordships the Counsel for the Respondent relied on the fifth section of Regulation XLIV. of 1793, which is the earliest of the Regulations on this subject, and they contended that, although subsequent Regulations upon the subject have been passed in different language and repealed, this fifth section of Regulation XLIV., 1793, has never been repealed, but was in force at the time when the sale in question was made and this action was commenced. Whether upon the true construction of all the Regulations taken together this particular section ought to be taken to have been repealed or not, their Lordships did not think it necessary to determine. They assume in favour of the Respondent that it stands unrepealed and in full force, and will deal with the case upon that footing. The language of this section is no doubt favourable to the Respondent's case. It provides that when a Zemindary is sold at a public ^[144] sale for discharge of arrears due from the proprietors to the Government, "all engagements which such proprietors shall have contracted with dependent Talookdars, whose Talooks may be situated in the lands sold, as also all leases to under-farmers and Pottahs to Ryots (with the exception of the engagements, Pottahs, and leases specified in sections vii. and viii.), shall stand cancelled from the day of sale, and the purchaser or purchasers of the lands shall be at liberty to collect from such dependent Talookdars, and from the Ryots or cultivators of the lands let in farm, and the lands not farmed, whatever the former proprietor would have been entitled to demand according to the established usages and rates of the Pergunnah or District in which such lands may be situated had the engagements so cancelled never existed." But the seventh section of this same Regulation provides, that this is not to authorize the assessment of any increase upon the lands of such dependent Talookdars, as were exempted from increase at the Decennial Settlement of 1793.

Their Lordships do not, upon any evidence in the case, on which they think it safe to rely, see their way to the belief that the Appellant brings her case within the seventh section, but they cite it because it may have a bearing on the construction of the language of the fifth section. The Respondent contends that by the operation of the words "stands cancelled from the day of sale," the existing interests of the Talookdar, ipso facto, ceased to exist, without any act done by the purchaser; that it was incapable of confirmation or being set up by him or his successors; and that where, from the acquiescence of the purchaser or those claiming under him, the possession ^[145] had remained in the Talookdar and those claiming under him undisturbed, and the original rent had been received, no matter for how long a period, or through whatever number of mesne conveyances, it still remained a bare possession at the will of the Zemindar for the time being, and the rent always liable to enhancement. In this hard and literal construction of the words cited above, their Lordships do not concur. They think, that their meaning is properly to be collected from the policy and intent of the Regulation, from the language used in other parts of the same section, and from the seventh section, which creates an exception out of the provisions of that section. English lawyers are familiar with this principle of construction applied as early as the time of Lord Coke (see 1st Inst. 45) to the disabling Statute of 1st Eliz., c. xiv. sec. 5, and in several modern reported cases between landlord and tenant, on clauses of forfeiture in leases. Words which make a Bishop's grant "utterly void and of none effect to all intents, constructions, and purposes," have been held not to prevent the grant from being good and binding on the grantor, and in some cases confirmable by the successor; and so a proviso in a lease, that it should be void altogether in case the tenant should neglect to do a certain act, has been held only to make it voidable at the option of the landlord. Their Lordships do not cite these as authorities governing this case, but mention them only as illustrating a general principle of construction which for its justice, reasonableness, and convenience, must be considered of universal application. In the present case the object of the Government was that [146] the jumma should be duly paid, and that the means of paying it should not be withdrawn by the improvident grants of the Zemindars who had made default; but cases of default might often arise where no improvident grant had been made, where the Talookdars and the Ryots held at proper rents, and the default was owing to extravagance, mismanagement, or other cause, —in such cases the Government cannot be supposed to have intended a wanton and unjust disturbance of vested interests. It is true that the section makes no distinction in terms between the two classes of cases, and it would be unsafe in construction to make any such; but the consideration furnishes reason for such limitation, both as to time and extent of operation, as the words will admit, indeed seem to require, in order to give effect to the whole sentence. Now, looking at what follows in the same clause, it is obvious that no such absolute cancellation was intended, for the power expressly and affirmatively given to the purchaser supposes the Talookdars and the Ryots to remain in all respects as before, except that they become liable to a certain limited increase of rent, "according to the established usages and rates of the Pergunnah or district;" words in themselves showing, that the section was directed to cases in which grants had been made with reservations of rent below those usages and rates. It is to be observed also that in terms this power is given only to the purchaser himself, which would ordinarily suffice to remedy the mischief in contemplation. The language of the exception, too, in section seven shows, that what was aimed at by section five, was not the destruction of [147] tenure, but the increase of rent, under certain specified and equitable limitations.

The conclusion at which their Lordships have arrived as to the construction of the section is this—that a power was given by it to the purchaser at a Government sale for arrears to avoid the subsisting engagements as to rent, and to increase the rent to that amount at which, according to the established usages and rates of the Pergunnah, or District, it would have stood had the cancelled engagement so avoided never existed. This gives it a just and reasonable operation, and virtually it would have had none, when the existing rent was already according to the usages and rate of the Pergunnah.

This conclusion is of great importance in the determination of the remaining questions. The sale to Muddoo Soodun Sandial, according to the Respondent's own case, took place some time before 1823, and he found those under whom the Appellant claims holding the land at an old rent of Rs. 64. 1a. 12p.; he did not attempt to disturb the occupation or increase this rent, but received it during all the time he remained owner. He sold by private contract to Mr. Harris, from whom it passed to his widow, Mrs. Harris, and from her again by private contract to the Respondent's father, Maharajah Sreesh Chunder Roy, as has been already stated. During all this time (and for a considerable period before, so far as appears indeed from the very creation of the tenure—more than sixty years ago), the same rent has always been paid; and there is no evidence that when first imposed—nay, even when the purchase was made, it was not a perfectly adequate rent for the [148] property. Great changes in the value of property have now arisen, and the Respondent demands by his plaint an annual rent of Rs. 1470, or nearly twenty-three times the amount of the original rent, according, as he states it, to the actual rate current in the village.

If the section in question did not authorize the purchaser to disturb the possession, and left him an option to confirm the existing rate of rent, there seems to be the strongest evidence that he exercised that option in favour of the Talookdar; and even if the same rights passed from him unimpaired to Mr. Harris, and in succession to those who claim under him, the evidence is equally strong—nay, as regards Mr. Harris personally, it is stronger. It is, therefore, unnecessary to decide whether the section is to be construed as giving a power only to the purchaser, or to him and his heirs, or a power attached to the Zemindary, which passed to subsequent purchasers. Their Lordships, moreover, observe that the power given is to collect what the former proprietor would have been entitled to demand, if the cancelled engagement had never been made; words which seem to point to something to be done on the change of ownership, not to something to be done after any indefinite lapse of time; and, as before remarked, in terms the power is given only to the purchaser himself, as to whom reasons might apply which would not extend to subsequent purchasers from him. Their Lordships, however, pronounce no opinion on this question, it not being necessary to decide it. They say no more than that a construction which would render the title to property unnecessarily uncertain, ought not, in [149] their judgment, to be given to a power of this description.

On examining the Regulations their Lordships are satisfied that the Respondent's case can rest only on the powers given by the section in question; and they are of opinion that those powers, assuming them to be in force, will not support the present action. They are glad to find that it is not their duty to support a claim which appears to them to be unjust. During the long period for which this property has been held at a small unvarying rent, it has been bought and sold, and changes and improvements have been made, no doubt at a considerable expense, and upon the faith of the rent to the Zemindar continuing unchanged: he has purchased while that state of things existed, and it must be presumed for a price calculated accordingly; and it is manifestly unjust that he should be allowed to disturb it.

It will have been observed that their Lordships have arrived at their conclusion without considering either the parol evidence of the Appellant, or a confirmatory Pottah produced by her as having been granted by Muddoo Soodun Sandial, which, if received by the Courts below, would have concluded the case in her favour. Both these Courts, however, treated the whole of the parol evidence as unworthy of credit, and the Pottah as a forged instrument; and their Lordships regret that on the fullest consideration they are not prepared to differ from them in these conclusions. When false witnesses or forged documents are produced in support of a case, the fact naturally creates suspicion as to [150] the case itself; and if the evidence on which their Lordships act depended in any degree for its credibility or weight on such witnesses, or document, they would have paused as to their conclusion. The fact is not so, however, in the present case; their Lordships believe they have to deal with a just case foolishly and wickedly attempted to be supported by false evidence. This misconduct must not mislead them in the advice they will have to tender to Her Majesty, which will be that the appeal be sustained, the decrees complained of reversed, the plaint in the suit dismissed, and any costs which may have been paid by the Appellant in the Courts below re-funded, but that no costs of the appeal, or of any of the proceedings below, be allowed to the Appellant.

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

Suit by A. to recover real estate in the possession of B. and of his predecessors, whose title had been unchallenged for forty-four years, on the ground that the estate was mortgaged only by A.'s ancestors, and that B. and those claiming under him were only usufructory mortgagees in possession. Held, that the onus probandi was on A., who could not succeed by the strength of his own title, and not by reason of the weakness of B.'s title [10 Moo. Ind. App. 160].

If a party put in evidence in support of his title, documents proved to be forged, but the other evidence adduced by him is not impeached, the Court, in rejecting the forged documents, will take the unimpeached evidence into consideration, and if satisfied, adjudicate thereon [10 Moo. Ind. App. 162].

Act No. XVI. of 1853, c. 4, enacts, that no special appeal shall lie, nor shall any decision be reversed, altered, or remanded by any of the Sudder Courts upon the ground that the decision of any question of fact is contrary to, or not warranted by, evidence taken, or any probability deduced from the record. Held, that such enactment was to be carried to its full legitimate extent, except where the decree of the inferior Court is founded on an inference of law, when a special appeal lies to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut [10 Moo. Ind. App. 163, 164].

Thus when the Judge of the inferior Court stated that the inclination of his opinion was, that there had been a sale, but that the Defendant could not rely upon that defence, because he had attempted to strengthen his case by a forged Bill of sale, and that the estate, if not sold, must have been mortgaged, as insisted by the Plaintiff, and thereupon decided without further proof that the estate was mortgaged; such judgment was held not to be a finding of fact, but an inference of law, and analogous to a misdirection of a Judge to a jury, and, in such circumstances, a special appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut lies from such decree.

The suit was brought in the subordinate Court of Combaconum by the Appellant, the Zemindar of Madukur, against the Respondent and others, to [152] recover the village of Udayamarttandapuram, which had been in the uninterrupted possession of the Respondent and those under whom he claimed for upwards of forty-four years before the institution of the suit.

The case of the Appellant was, that one Tayilaya his grandmother, in the year 1805, mortgaged the village and the title deeds to one Palaniyappa Chetti for 300 pons, under a mortgage Bond, and put him in possession, stipulating that he should enjoy the same in lieu of interest, and restore the village on repayment of the mortgage money. The Respondent, on the other hand, relied on his length of possession, contending that Palaniyappa Chetti, through whom he claimed, became the absolute owner of the village under a Bill of sale, dated the 15th of May, 1805, executed by Valoji Maikken Gopalar, the Appellant's grandfather, in consideration of the sum of 250 pons, and he submitted, that the burthen of proof was on the Appellant to prove the allegation that the village was, as he alleged, mortgaged and not sold.

The plaint was filed in September, 1849, against Parvatiachi, the widow of Palaniyappa Chetti, Selvanayaka Tevan, his heir, Selvanayaka Chetti, Subba Chetti, and Vaidilingar Chetti, the sons of one Gopala Chetti, and the Respondent, Chinna Nayana Chetti. The plaint alleged that Tayilaya, through whom the Plaintiff traced his title, had, in the year 1805, [153] mortgaged the estate to Palaniyappa Chetti, and that the alleged Bill of sale in that year by the Appellant's grandfather, Valoji Maikken Gopalar, was a forgery, as he had died in 1799, before the date of the alleged Bill of sale, and prayed for the delivery back of the village on repayment of the mortgage money.

The Respondent alone appeared, and, by his answer, relied on the fact that the estate in question had not been in the possession of the Appellant or his ancestors for the last forty-four years, but had been in the possession during that time, with the mirassi and other rights, of the first Defendant's husband, and then of the third Defendant's father, afterwards of the third Defendant, and the Respondent successively; that the Appellant's grandfather, Valoji Maikken Gopalar, had sold the village to Palaniyappa Chetti, by a Bill of sale dated the 17th of May, 1805, for 250 pons, and that the village had been registered in Fusli 1215 (1805), in his name, as the sole proprietor; that as the second Defendant was a minor, his mother and guardian, Parvatattu Achi, sold the village to the third Defendant's father, Gopala Chetti, on the 18th of February, 1813, for 250 pons, put him in possession thereof, and got it registered in his name as the sole proprietor; that Gopala Chetti, on the 16th of July, 1837, sold it to his son, the third Defendant, who continued in possession for a great number of years, having improved it at a great outlay; that the estate, having been for a long time in Defendant's possession by virtue of a mortgage lien derived from the third Defendant, was afterwards sold to him on the 13th of July, 1845, for Rs. 12,250, under a registered Bill of sale, and that the Respondent had further repaired and improved it at a large outlay. It was [154] further insisted, that the suit was barred by cl. 4, sec. 18, Mad. Reg. II. of 1802; and that that Plaintiff's allegation that his grandfather died in 1799 was not true, and that he was alive in the year 1805.

The cause being at issue the Appellant examined witnesses to prove the alleged mortgage by Tayilaya to Palaniyappa Chetti, and of the demands and promises at different times to restore the village. The Respondent put in evidence, among other documents, the alleged Bill of sale by Valoji Maikken Gopalar to Palaniyappa Chetti, of the estate in question, dated the 15th of May, 1805, and the receipt of the same date. As the witnesses to this instrument were dead, three witnesses were examined to prove some of the attesting witnesses' handwriting. These instruments were challenged by the Appellant as forgeries.

The acting Judge of the subordinate Court of Combaconum (Mr. G. M. Swinton), by his decree, dated the 17th of November, 1851, declared that the estate was only mortgaged, and ordered the Respondent to relinquish the village to the Appellant on receipt of 300 pons, and to pay the Appellant's costs.

The Respondent appealed from his decision to the Civil Court of Combaconum, and among his grounds of appeal, again relied on the Bill of sale in 1805.

On the 26th of October, 1854, Mr. Scott, the Judge of the Civil Court, gave judgment on the appeal as follows. "I agree with the acting subordinate Judge in thinking that the Plaintiff's grandfather, Valoji Maikken Gopalar died before the date of the exhibits 3 and 4 (the Bill of sale and receipt of the 15th of May, 1805), and consequently that these documents must be considered as fabrications, the assumption now advanced by the Appellant, that [155] they were in reality executed by Valoji's younger brother, but were drawn up in the name of the elder, because the mirass was still registered in his name, being without any proof whatever. The Appellant has, therefore, failed to show that the village was sold to Palaniyappa Chetti, and if it was not sold, it must have been mortgaged, as contended by the Plaintiff, and I must, therefore, affirm that part of the decree of the lower Court which decides that the village was mortgaged. At the same time, judging from the various documents obtained by the Appellant from the Collector's Office, I am inclined to think that the village was sold, and that the Bill of sale has been lost, and I am of opinion, that the Appellant has broken down his own case by making it rest on title deeds that are evidently fabrication; he has resorted to forgery to establish his claims, and he must take the consequences of his own act. The Court is not at liberty to assume for him a position which he has himself rejected. Although, therefore, I affirm that part of the subordinate Judge's decree, I cannot concur with him in thinking that either justice or the practice of the Courts requires that a village, so greatly improved as to be worth upwards of Rs. 12,000, should be delivered up to the mortgagor for less than a twentieth part of the sum. The mortgagee is entitled to be remunerated for the improvements he has made, but for the purpose of ascertaining what they are, and in order that a fresh decree may be passed on that point only, I remand the suit to the Court of original jurisdiction. The parties will pay their own costs of appeal."

The Respondent presented a special appeal to the Sudder Court against the above decree of the Civil [156] Court, but it was dismissed on the ground that the Court could not admit a special appeal, while the suit was remanded.

The suit being remanded to the subordinate Court, for the purpose of taking evidence in regard to the improvements by the mortgagee and those claiming under him, witnesses were called for that purpose by the Respondent.

The subordinate Judge (Mr. Innes), by his revised decree, decided that the decree originally passed should stand without alteration.

The Respondent appealed from this revised decree to the Civil Court, but the Civil Court dismissed such appeal.

Whereupon the Respondent presented a petition of special appeal to the Sudder Court for the following reasons: that the decree in the appeal which dealt with the title to the property, was erroneous. That the Civil Judge would evidently have found in Petitioner's favour, only for the Bill of sale and receipt. That no attempt had been made to show that these documents, if forgeries, were fabricated by him, and he submitted that his title, which was admitted by the Civil Judge to be sufficiently proved from other sources, could not be vitiated by the mere fact that two fabricated documents were handed over to him when he purchased the property. That the Plaintiff in ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title, and that this had been found against him by the Civil Judge. That the Plaintiff's claim was barred by the Regulation of Limitations. That the decree of the Civil Judge was also erroneous, since the evidence proved that considerable sums had been laid out in improve-[157]-ments, and that mere variance, or vagueness, as to the precise amount, did not justify him in utterly rejecting the claim.

On the 6th of September, 1858, an Order was made by the Sudder Court, admitting the special appeal.

After hearing the appeal on the 5th of March, 1859, the Judges of the Sudder Court (consisting of Messrs. Hooper, Strange, and Philips) reversed the decrees of the Court below and dismissed the suit. The material part of the decree was in these terms:—"In a case like the present, where there has been lengthened occupancy, with repeated transfer from one party to another, it was imperative on the Plaintiff to show that, during this long interval, his alleged rights had been acknowledged; but it is plain from the decree of the Civil Judge that he has not accepted whatever evidence the Plaintiff may have adduced in proof of such recognition of title in him. The Civil Judge, in concurring with the Subordinate Judge that the Defendant's exhibits, Nos. 3 and 4 are forgeries, observes, that as the Defendant has failed to show that the land was sold to Palaniyappa Chetti, it followed that he must have received it on mortgage. The Sudder Adawlut cannot concur in such a conclusion. Indeed, in the next succeeding paragraph the Civil Judge himself demonstrates it to be untenable. He there records his opinion, based upon various documents obtained by the Defendant from the Collector's office, that the land actually was sold, that the Bill of sale has been lost, and that the Defendant has propped up his case with fabricated documents. The Civil Judge has thought that such resort on his part pre-[158]-cludes him from giving a decree in his favour. It is apparent to the Sudder Court that, owing to a presumed legal bar, the Civil Judge has given a decision on a point of fact against his own conviction. The Sudder Adawlut are, therefore, of opinion that there is no such bar in the case. The land has passed from hand to hand; and it is hard to fix the presumed forgeries upon the Defendant. He may very well have derived the documents as the muniments of title from the last vendor. Nor, in a case like the present, should the Plaintiff gain his cause upon the weakness of the evidence on the other side. But, as above observed, the Judge has found documentary evidence derived out of the Collector's records, establishing, in his opinion, the fact of the disputed sale; and it is clear to the Sudder Adawlut that the Defendant is entitled to the benefit of this opinion."

From this decree the present appeal was brought.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Appellant.

First. A special appeal ought not to have been admitted by the Sudder Court, as none of the grounds allowed by Act, No. XVI. of 1853, with respect to special appeals, existed. It was not competent for that Court to reverse, or alter, the decree of the Civil Court, on any question of fact, upon the assumption that such decisions were contrary to or not warranted by the evidence taken in the suit, or upon any probabilities suggested by the Sudder Court.

Secondly, upon the merits, we submit the decree was erroneous. The estate was mortgaged by the Appellant's grandmother to Palaniyappa Chetti in the [159] year 1805, and could not have been lawfully sold by her. The right of redemption was kept alive by demands upon and admission made by the mortgagee, or those claiming under him ever since. The Bill of sale and the receipt of the 15th of May, 1805, were satisfactorily proved to be forgeries, and there is no other evidence from which any valid sale could be established or even presumed.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Pontifex, appeared for the Respondent.

Their Lordships, however, without calling upon them, delivered judgment by

The Master of the Rolls (The Rt. Hon. Sir John Romilly).—Their Lordships are of opinion that the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut must be affirmed.

Two questions are raised in this appeal: first, whether the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut had power under the Act, No. XVI. of 1853, to permit a special appeal in this case: and secondly, whether on the merits, the decision of the inferior Court was correct. On both these points their Lordships concur with the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut: but in order to explain the view they take of the application of the Act, No. XVI. of 1853 to this case, it will be convenient to refer to the facts of this appeal, and in doing so to consider the merits of the case.

It is a suit instituted by the Appellant in September, 1849, to recover possession of a village which has been held without disturbance since the year 1805. The Appellant alleges, that in the month of May in that year Tayilaya, the widow of the former owner, Valoji Gopalar, who had no power [160] to sell, made a mortgage of this village for 300 pons to Palaniyappa Chetti, and put him into possession on an agreement that the usufruct of the village should be set off as against the interest on the mortgage.

To succeed in such a case as this, it is obvious that the burthen of proof lies on the Appellant.

A Plaintiff who alleges that his ancestor, forty-four years ago, made a mortgage to the ancestor of the present possessor of a property, and by virtue thereof seeks to dispossess the present possessor, must prove his case clearly and indefeasibly. He must succeed by the strength of his own title, and not by reason of the weakness of his opponent's. It would be contrary to all principles of law and justice, that upon such an allegation, a Plaintiff should be able to require the present possessor to prove his title, and if he failed in doing so to dispossess him of the land in question.

The first material thing, therefore, is to examine how far the Plaintiff's evidence establishes the fact of the mortgage. The original mortgage is not produced; no copy of it is produced; it never was registered. The whole of the evidence respecting it is that of three witnesses, Ananda Pillai, 76 years, Tambi Servagaram, sixty-eight or sixty-nine years, and Venkateshia, Ayyar, seventy years, who all swear that a mortgage of the village in question, for 300 pons, was executed by Tayilaya, in her house, at 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning, and that she received the 300 pons in Tanjore fanams.

Notwithstanding the minute accuracy of these witnesses' recollection, their Lordships are of opinion, that it would be too dangerous to act upon this [161] evidence, if unsupported by any other testimony, in order to disturb an uninterrupted possession of forty-four years.

There is also evidence of some applications by the Plaintiff, and by the preceding alleged owners of the equity of redemption, to redeem the mortgage. But with this exception, the Plaintiff's case is in fact wholly unsupported by any other evidence adduced by him. The Court of original jurisdiction seems indeed principally to have relied on the Defendant's evidence for the support of the Plaintiff's case. It may undoubtedly sometimes happen that the evidence adduced by the Defendant, instead of supporting his case, may establish that of his adversary. It remains to be examined whether that is so in the present instance. The Defendant alleges that Valoji Gopalar sold the village to Palaniyappa Chetti, through whom the Defendant claims. He puts in evidence a Bill of sale purporting to be executed by Valoji Gopalar and supports it by many witnesses. This document is clearly shown to have been a forgery, and it is not only sufficient to destroy this supposed Bill of sale, but to throw discredit on the oral testimony which the Defendant adduces. But their Lordships are of opinion that it goes no farther, and that it does not follow, because the Bill of sale adduced by the Defendants is forged, that the evidence adduced by the Plaintiff must be correct. It might be possibly an advantageous rule if, as Mr. Scott expresses in his judgment, that where a party "has resorted to forgery to establish his claim, he must take the consequences of his own act, and that the Court is not at liberty to assume for him a position which he has himself rejected" (ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 155).

[162] But their Lordships are unable to arrive at that conclusion, and are apprehensive that if such was the practice adopted, some cases might occur in which the Court could not determine the point in issue in favour of either party. We think also that in this case, even if this rule were adopted, it is pushed too far, as, though the Bill of sale is found to have been forged, the knowledge of the forgery is not brought home to the Defendant. We find also in a recent case, Ranee Surnomoyee v. Maharajah Sutteeschunder Roy (ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 124), this Committee gave effect to the Defendant's title, although a document by which she sought to strengthen it was found to be a forgery.

The evidence which is not susceptible of being forged is prima facie strongly in favour of the Defendant.

Possession of the village, by persons through whom the Defendant claims, is proved by accounts registered in the years 1805, 1806, 1807, 1829, 1839, 1844. An arzee of 23rd of March, 1816, addressed by the Tashildar of Mannargudi to the Collector of Tanjore, and the answer of the Collector of the 2nd of April following, speaks distinctly of the village having been sold to Gopalar Chetti in 1804, a year previous to the period alleged by the Plaintiff as the date of the mortgage by the Tayilaya.

We think the preponderance of evidence is in favour of the Defendant, even if the burthen of proof lay on him. However much the want of trustworthiness in the evidence of cases from India is to be regretted, we cannot by reason of the proof that a document adduced by one party is forged, transfer the property in which he and those through whom he [163] claims have been in possession at the date of the suit for forty-four years, to another, who has not, in the opinion of their Lordships, established any right to it himself. If, therefore, the case had come before their Lordships, unfettered by any question on the Act, No. XVI. of 1853, they would have had no hesitation, in concurring with the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, in holding that the Plaintiff had not established his case, and that his plaint ought to be dismissed.

The remaining point on which the Appellant mainly relies is, however, one of great importance; and, if determined in his favour, supersedes the question of merits.

The point is that by reason of the proviso in the 4th paragraph of the 4th clause of the Act, No. XVI. of 1853, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut had no power to admit the special appeal. The words of the clause are these: "Provided always, that no such special appeal shall lie, nor shall any such decision be reversed, altered, or remanded by any of the said Sudder Courts, upon the ground that the decision of any question of fact is contrary to or not warranted by the evidence ~~only~~ taken in the cause, or any probability deduced from the record."

Their Lordships think it of great importance that this provision should be carried to its full legitimate extent, and that no appeal should be allowed on account of difference of opinion as to the value of evidence. But their Lordships concur with the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut that this is not the present case. Mr. Scott, whose judgment is appealed from to the Sudder Court, does not find, as a fact, that the Plaintiff had proved the mortgage he alleged. On the contrary, he states the inclination of his opinion [164] to be, that the evidence proved a sale, but that the Defendant was not at liberty to rely on that evidence by reason of his having adduced and relied on a forged Bill of sale. What Mr. Scott does find is a conclusion of law. His words are these: "The Appellant has failed to show that the village was sold to Palaniyappa Chetti, and if it was not sold, it must have been mortgaged, as contended by the Plaintiff, and I must, therefore, affirm that part of the decree of the lower Court which decides that the village was mortgaged" (ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 155).

The Sudder Dewanny Adawlut considered this not to be a finding of fact, but an inference of law, and accordingly allowed a special appeal. Their Lordships concur in this view. By way of testing the accuracy of it, it may be supposed that the case has been tried before a jury in this country, and that the Judge had directed the jury in the words of the Civil Judge which I have just read, namely: "The Appellant has failed to show that the village was sold to Palaniyappa Chetti, and if it was not sold it must have been mortgaged, as contended by the Plaintiff. It is your duty, therefore, to find that the village was mortgaged."

Their Lordships entertain no doubt that a Bill of exception or misdirection to the jury would have been sustained if such direction had been given. That is, that such a statement would have constituted a misdirection in point of law, upon the reliance of which, the jury found the fact of the mortgage.

Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion, that the Act, No. XVI. of 1853, does not prevent a special [165] appeal in this case, and that the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut was right in admitting the appeal, and dismissing the Plaintiff's plaint. This appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

A purchaser of a Zemindary at a Government sale under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1822, to satisfy arrears of revenue, is entitled as purchaser, first, to immediate possession of such lands as were at the time of the sale in the possession of the Zemindary; and secondly, under secs. 30, 32, and 33 of that Regulation, to set aside by suit all sub-tenures created since the Decennial Settlement by the Zemindar last seized, or his predecessors [16 Moo. Ind. App. 168].

Mouzahs, forming a Shikmee Talook before the Decennial Settlement and held of the Zemindar by Mocurrery tenure at a fixed rent, are not liable to redemption by a purchaser under Reg. XI. of 1822, secs. 30, 32, and 33.

A sale took place in 1833. Possession of the Mouzahs was taken from the purchaser in 1841, who shortly afterwards died, leaving a widow, who, under a power from her deceased husband, adopted an infant son. In 1853 she instituted a suit for recovery of the Mouzahs. Held that the death of the purchaser and minority of the heir took the case out of the Ben. Reg. of Limitations III. of 1793 [10 Moo. Ind. App. 170].

Although in Indian proceedings the presumption in favour of the genuineness of documentary evidence is very weak, yet there is no presumption in favour of forgery [10 Moo. Ind. App. 173].

Thus, when a long series of documents are produced, showing a reasonable origin of title, nearly a century ago, a regular deduction of that title, and a possession consistent with it, the evidence of intrinsic improbability must be very strong to counterbalance the weight of such evidence.

These were two appeals by the same parties from decrees of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. The first [166] appeal was brought from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Calcutta, dated the 30th of July, 1858, which reversed a decree of the Zillah Court of Mymensingh in a suit instituted by the second Respondent to obtain possession and eject the Appellants from twelve and a half annas shares of mouzahs, Dakin Khalikaprosad Surrabad, and other mouzahs, which were held together as a Shikmee Talook, dependent on the Zemindary, Tappala Cooreekhuy, under an ancient hereditary Mocurrery tenure, at a fixed and perpetual annual jumma, reserved and made payable by the Talookdars to the Zemindar for the time. The second appeal was from a decree of the same Court of the same date, made in another suit brought by the first Respondent to recover an eight annas share of part of the same mouzahs.

The two suits, the subject of the appeals, were in substance identical, the parties being the same, and, although relating to different parts of the property, were under the same title, and substantially one suit.

The facts of the case and the principal grounds of the argument sufficiently appear in the judgment.

The Appellant's contention was, first, that the [167] mouzahs formed a Shikmee Talook before the Decennial Settlement held of the Zemindar by a Mocurrery tenure at a fixed rent, and not liable to alteration. Second, that as the purchase was made in 1833, and the suit brought in 1853, the claim was barred by the Ben. Reg. of Limitations III. of 1793, sec. 14, which prescribes twelve years for the recovery of the estate.

The Respondents' case was, that the mouzahs formed part of the Zemindary, and were held Khas by the Zemindar at the time of a sale of the Zemindary, under Ben. Reg. XI. of 1832, to realize arrears of Government revenue, and that the purchaser, and those claiming under, become thereby entitled to the mouzahs.

Upon the hearing of the first appeal, the Solicitor-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, appeared for the Appellants; and Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Field, for the Respondents;

When their Lordships reserved judgment until the hearing of the second appeal. On the second case coming on,

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, again appeared for the Appellants; and Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Respondents.

Their Lordships' judgment having been reserved, was now delivered by [168] The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner.—In the month of December, 1833, a Zemindary called Tuppah Cooreekhuy, in the Collectorate of Zillah Mymensingh, was put up for sale by public auction to satisfy arrears of Government revenue under Regulation XI. of 1822.

It was purchased by or on behalf of Bhubanny Acharjee Chowdry, and it was not disputed that the purchaser acquired whatever rights in the Zemindary belonged to the Zemindar at the time of the Decennial, or Perpetual Settlement. He was entitled to the immediate possession of such lands as at the time of the sale were in possession of the Zemindar, and he had a right under the Revenue sale law to set aside by suit all sub-tenures created since the Decennial Settlement by the Zemindar, or any of his ancestors.

Within this Zemindary were certain mouzahs, which, or portions of which, are the subject of the two suits now in appeal. These suits relate to different parts of the same property, are between the same parties, depend on the same evidence, and are substantially one suit.

The mouzahs in question were alleged by persons now represented by the Appellants to form a Shikmee Talook created before the Decennial Settlement held of the Zemindar by Mocurrery tenure, i.e. at a fixed rent, not liable to alteration.

The purchaser, on the other hand, whose interests are now represented by the Respondents, insisted that these mouzahs were part of the Zemindary, and were held khas by the Zemindar at the time of the sale, and that the purchase, therefore, became entitled to them. Possession of the Zemindary was ordered [169] to be delivered to the purchaser, and his agent was put into possession of the lands in question as part of the Zemindary. His possession, however, was disputed on the grounds already stated by the persons claiming as Talookdars, who insisted that they were in possession of the lands in that character at the time of the sale. After much litigation, the Sudder Court was of opinion, that the Talookdars had been in possession at the period in question, and ordered the possession to be restored to them, the purchaser being left to institute a regular suit to set aside such possession.

Under this order the persons claiming as Talookdars were put into possession of part of the lands in dispute in December, 1840, and of the rest early in 1841, as appears by certain dakhulnamahs in evidence in this case.

This decision left the right undermined, and settled only the question of possession, and it became necessary for the purchaser of the Zemindary, if he meant to institute any suit for the recovery of the lands, to institute it within twelve years from this time. But about this time, that is, in the year 1840 or 1841, Chowdry, the purchaser, died, leaving a widow, and the widow and the mother of Chowdry became his representatives. The widow, as she alleges, under a Will made by her husband, had power to adopt, and adopted, a son, and neither the validity of the Will nor the fact of adoption is in controversy in this case. She instituted a suit in 1853 for the recovery of this property, which failed upon merely technical grounds, for want of a sufficient stamp on the proceedings, or for some such reason. In 1855, the first suit now under appeal was commenced. As regards any bar arising from the Regulations of Limitations, this suit must be treated as if it had begun in 1853.

The Appellants, in their pleadings insist, that the period from which the Respondents' obligation to sue commenced is to be calculated from the time of the purchase in 1833, and they therefore, insist on the Regulation for the limitation of actions in bar of the present claim; but they do not by these pleadings insist on such bar if the period is to be calculated from the time when the possession was taken from the purchaser in 1840 and 1841; and we are clearly of opinion, that this is the period from which the time must be computed. The death of the purchaser and the minority of the heir would clearly take the case in that view out of the Regulation of Limitations. The rights of the parties, therefore, must be decided on the merits.

The real question, which is one of some difficulty, is whether the lands in question were constituted a Talook previously to the Decennial Settlement in 1790-91, by the then Zemindar, as alleged by the Appellants, or whether they were at that time held khas by the Zemindar as part of his Zemindary, as alleged by the Respondents.

The title set up by the Appellants is this: they allege that the lands in question were granted by Ghous Khan, the then Zemindar, by two Sunnuds, one dated in 1779, and the other dated in 1784, at a fixed rent to his sister, Amina Bebee, as Talookdar, in mududmash, or for her maintenance at a fixed rent.

If these documents be genuine, there seems to be no reasonable doubt about the Appellants' right.

[171] The Judge in the Zillah Court was of opinion that they are genuine, and he, therefore, dismissed the Respondents' suit.

The Sudder Court, on appeal, was of a different opinion, and made a decree, in favour of the Respondents.

The first of these suits was heard before us, on appeal, in February, 1863. It appeared that the second suit was coming on for hearing, and we were of opinion that it might be material to see some of the original documents, and also to consider other evidence not at that time before us, and we, therefore, directed that the decision on the first suit should be delayed till the second had been heard, and that the Sunnuds relied on by the Appellants should be sent over to this country.

Some additional evidence has been printed, and the papers purporting to be the original Sunnuds have been sent over, and the question now to be determined is whether, upon the whole, the Appellants have sufficiently established their case.

It is not disputed by the Appellants that these lands, being situate within the Zemindary purchased by the Respondents, are prima facie to be considered as part of the Zemindary, and that it is for them, the Appellants, who insist on the separation of these lands from the general lands of the Zemindary, and on their settlement as Shikmee Talook, to establish their title.

To prove their case they produce papers purporting to be the two Sunnuds to which we have already referred.

Nothing has been pointed out to us in the appearance of these papers throwing any suspicion upon [172] them, nor have we been able to discover anything which does so.

We have three deeds of sale, by Amina Bebee, and persons purchasing from her, professing to convey different portions of the lands as parts of a Talook. One of these deeds is dated in 1808, and another in 1821.

There are also produced two other Sunnuds, one purporting to be dated in 1813, by Asheena Bebee, the then Zemindar, to Aymun Bebee (a purchaser, from Amina), and another in 1815, by Ibrahim Khan, the then Zemindar, to Khosh Kuddun, a purchaser of a part of this Talook, from Aymun Bebee. These Sunnuds purport to recognize and confirm the title of the purchasers.

In proof that Amina Bebee had possession of these lands as a Talook, in conformity with the Sunnuds granted, we have Chittas, or measurement papers, signed by Ameens employed on behalf of the Zemindar to measure the lands of the Zemindary in the years 1787, 1788, 1789, 1790, 1791, and 1792. These Chittas describe the lands as the Talook of Amina Bebee.

We have further the detailed accounts of the agent in receipt of the rents of these lands in the year 1790, describing them as the Talook of Amina Bebee.

There are other measurement papers or Chittas affording the same evidence in the years 1807 and 1816.

There are then produced dakhilas or receipts for rent on behalf of the Zemindar for the Talook of Amina Bebee in the years 1780, 1805, 1817, 1820, and 1828.

[173] Several other documents are in evidence showing, if they be genuine, the same fact, that at an early date and before the Decennial Settlement a Shikmee Talook had been constituted in favour of Amina Bebee at a Mocurrery jumma, and that the lands included in it were held by her or persons claiming under her up to the time or nearly up to the time of the sale of the Zemindary in 1833.

It was established by the Order of the Court restoring the Appellants to the lands in the year 1840, that they were in possession of them at the time of the sale, for the Order was made entirely upon that ground, and decided nothing as to the title.

Against this great body of evidence there is really nothing which can be called evidence on the part of the Respondents, but they allege and undertake to show that all the documents relied on by the Appellants are forgeries.

A long experience in Indian appeals has no doubt satisfied us that the presumption in favour of the genuineness of documents offered in evidence in that country is very weak; but still it must not be held that the presumption is in favour of forgery; and when a long series of documents is produced showing a reasonable origin of title nearly a century ago, a regular deduction of that title, and a possession consistent with it, confirmed by the all-important fact of such possession existing at the time of the commencement of the Respondents' title by purchase in 1833, the evidence of intrinsic improbability should be very strong indeed which is to counterbalance the weight of such testimony.

Still circumstances may be sufficiently strong for [174] this purpose, and they have been held to be so in this case by the Judges of the Sudder.

We will remark upon the principal of these circumstances, but it is material to consider them with reference to the case set up by the Respondents.

The case set up by them is shortly and accurately stated in the judgment of the Sudder Court in these terms:—"The general allegation of the Plaintiff is, that Ibrahim Khan, the proprietor of the Zemindary, up to the time of the revenue sale, fraudulently set up this Talook for his own benefit, for which purpose he has found it convenient to use the names of his relations and connections, Aymun Bebee (one of the alleged purchasers from Amina) being his wife, and Amina Bebee, the professed Talookdar of the Sunnuds of 1186 (1779) and 1191 (1784), being his aunt and the sister of the then Zemindar, Ghous Khan."

If this case be true, no doubt the Sunnuds purporting to create this Talook half a century before the sale, and the various documents long before the sale referring to it, must be forgeries. On the other hand, if these documents be genuine, then the Respondents' case must be untrue.

No direct evidence is offered against the genuineness of the Sunnuds, but it is said that they cannot have been made at the time when they bear date, for several reasons, of which these are the principal:

First, it is said that the Talook is not mentioned in the Decennial or Quinquennial Settlement as such, and that the lands are included in the Decennial Settlement, as part of the Zemindary for which the jumma is assessed on the Zemindar.

[175] We have not before us the particulars of these Settlements, but assuming the statements to be accurate, the fact does not seem to afford any strong inference against the existence of the Talook.

If it had been an independent Talook it would have been liable to direct assessment by the Government, and would have been the subject of assessment on the Talookdar, but being only a Shikmee Talook, paying rent to the Zemindar, the Talookdars were not required to mention it, nor was it necessary for the Zemindar to do so.

It is then said that if the Sunnuds and the various instruments by which conveyances of portions of the Talook are alleged to have been subsequently made had been really executed, those instruments, or at all events some of them, would have been registered, and that none of them have in fact been registered.

No Regulations have been pointed out to us by which the registration of these Sunnuds or of this Talook (created, if at all, before the Decennial Settlement) was made necessary; and though the observations of the Judges of the Sudder, "that the deeds want the authentication which registration would have afforded," and "that the Talook wants the corroboration which registration and its mention in the quinquennial papers would have afforded," be perfectly well founded and entitled to weight, it must be considered whether, without this evidence, the proof be not sufficient.

A circumstance more strongly relied on by the Respondents' Counsel was this, that these Sunnuds were never produced or mentioned by the Appellants on several occasions on which, it is said, if they had really been in existence at that time, they ought [176] to have been produced, and certainly would have been produced.

First, it is said that a litigation went on from the time of the sale in 1833 up to the year 1840 with respect to the possession of these lands, and that in the course of that suit no allusion was made to these documents. But the answer given to this objection much diminishes its force, viz., that the question then before the Court was not one of title but of possession, and that it was only on the question of title, as to which the Court had no power in that suit to pronounce any decision, that the production of the original Sunnuds was of importance. Though these Sunnuds were not produced, the title under them was asserted, and the Sunnud of confirmation of 1813 from Asheena Bebee to Aymun Bebee seems to have been actually produced on the 2nd of July, 1839.

Another objection which was much pressed at our bar was this:—These Sunnuds describe the lands as La-khiraj and Muddudmash, whereas it is said that they were not alleged to be La-khiraj at the time of the Decennial Settlement, but were included in the lands subject to assessment, and that it was not till a much later period (not very long before the sale) that they were claimed to be La-khiraj, and these instruments must, therefore, have been fabricated after that claim had been set up.

Now, the force of this argument depends on the allegation that these lands were not claimed or pretended by the then Zemindar to be La-khiraj before the Settlement. But of this we find no sufficient evidence. It is well known that before that time, and especially about that time, a great number of [177] fictitious claims to exemption from assessment of lands as La-khiraj were set up by different proprietors, and although it was held in what is called the Alluvion suit that the lands were not in fact La-khiraj, and that the Firman of the Sultan purporting to make them so had been forged by Ibrahim Khan, yet that fact by no means shows that at the dates of these Sunnuds the then Zemindar did not claim or pretend them to be so. Whether they were or not included in the assessment was a question depending on the description contained in the Decennial Settlement : and though the Government officer was satisfied after much inquiry that they were in fact covered by the assessment, such descriptions are generally vague and uncertain, and the difficulty of identifying lands is greatly increased in a long lapse of years when it appears that the lands adjoin the great river Burhampooter, and are subject to be submerged and have their boundaries changed by not unfrequent overflows or changes in the course of the stream.

The last objection which we think it necessary to notice, and to which we confess we are inclined to attribute the most weight, is that in 1836, Mr. Glass, the partner, as we understand it, with Mr. Wise, one of the present Appellants, insisted upon a title to a portion of these lands under a lease alleged to have been granted to him by Ibrahim Khan, the late Zemindar, whereas Mr. Wise now claims under a purchase subsequently made by him and Glass from Aymun Beebee in 1840, and insists that Ibrahim Khan was never in possession of the lands, and that they were not part of the Zemindary, except as being part of a dependent Talook.

[178] Undoubtedly these two titles are inconsistent, but it is not impossible that Mr. Glass might first procure a lease from Ibrahim Khan, supposing him to be the owner, and might afterwards, when the title of the Talookdars was insisted on, and seemed likely to succeed, make a purchase from them, in order that he might, under any circumstances, be secure in the enjoyment of his indigo plantations.

The probability of this being so is strengthened by the statement in the petition of Glass to the Sudder Court in 1838, in which he alleges " that he had for a long time been making indigo cultivation on the lands after taking izara pottahs of them from the proprietors, i.e. Talookdars and Zemindars."

We are very far from thinking that the various objections thus made to the title of the Talookdars, and so ably urged at our Bar, are without force. But against them we must set the evidence produced by the Appellants in confirmation of their title.

Now, any evidence which proves the existence of this Talook at a period antecedent to that at which the Respondents allege it to have been falsely set up by Ibrahim Khan tends more or less strongly to disprove their case. The Appellants' evidence upon that point seems to us very strong.

In the year 1819, there is a proceeding in the appeal Court of Jehangur Nuggur, in which the question was, whether certain lands belonged to this Talook or were part of the khas lands of the Zemindar.

In 1824, we have a petition from a person complaining that Khosh Khuddum had agreed to sell to him a portion of his share of the Talook, but had refused to perform his contract.

[179] In 1833, we find an Order made in a suit which had been instituted in the year 1831 by Aymun Beebee against her husband, Ibrahim Khan, by which a part of the lands of this Talook was ordered to be sold to satisfy fees due to the Pleaders.

In 1843, we find it stated upon the result of an inquiry then directed by the Civil Court of Mymensingh, that when the Talook was about to be sold the Plaintiff's Mooktar deposited in the Treasury of the Collectorate the sum demanded.

These proceedings are very important, not only because they show that in 1833 a portion of this Talook was dealt with by the Court as the property of Aymun Beebee, but because it makes the supposed collusion between Ibrahim Khan and his wife, Aymun Beebee, which is essential to the Respondents' case, in the highest degree improbable.

That the Sunnuds in question have not been fabricated since the institution of these suits is clear from the proceedings in the suit with the Government as to the alluvion lands, which are of great importance.

It appears that some time before 1843 a tract of land which had been covered by the waters of the Burhampooter was left dry by some change in the course of the stream. This tract was within the limits of Cooreekhuy. If these were now derelict lands they would be subject to assessment to the Government ; but it was insisted by the purchaser of the Zemindary and the Talookdars that they were lands which had originally been part of the Zemindary, had been submerged and again left dry ; the Zemindars insisting that the lands were part of the Zemindary, and the Talookdars that they were a part of their Talook.

[180] After some proceedings in other Courts, which failed from some irregularity, a proceeding was instituted by the Government in the office of the Collector of Mymensingh, under Regulation XI. of 1819, for the purpose of determining the right of the Government. To this proceeding Ibrahim Khan, the present Respondent, Bhoobun Moyee Debia, and the Appellants, Aymun Beebee and Khosh Kuddum, were parties.

A great deal of evidence was gone into, and, amongst other documents, the Sunnud of 1779 now relied on, and some of the chittas and other papers produced by the Appellants in this suit, were put in by them, and the same case which they now set up was stated and insisted upon.

Whether the other Sunnuds now produced by the Appellants and all other papers were produced, we cannot clearly make out.

The Sunnud of 1779 was the subject of investigation at that time, and it appears by the Order made in the proceeding, and which dismissed the claim of the Government, that on the 5th of April, 1845, in order to attest, as it is called (meaning, no doubt, to test the genuineness of), the aforesaid Sunnud of 1779 (which seems to have been disputed), the Record Keeper was directed to produce any other papers which might tend to show the truth, and the witnesses named by the Defendants to prove their case were summoned.

It is then stated, that subsequent thereto the Record Keeper filed a Kyfeut stating that along with the papers of Nattoora Mehal of Tuppah Cooreekhuy has been found a Sunnud sealed by Mahomed Ghous, and signed by him in the Persian [181] character, and that the seal and Persian character thereon tally with the Persian character and seal on the Sunnud filed in this case. It is then stated, that Aymun Beebee produced some chittas and a terij and jumna bundy, and produced witnesses who deposed that Ameena Beebee had in the year (worm-eaten) acquired a Sunnud of the Talook of these mouzals from Mahomed Ghous, Zemindar, had held possession since that year, and sold the same, and that in proportion to the said shares, Khosh Kuddum, Aymun Beebee, and Messrs. Wise and Glass, paid the rents of the Talook and held possession.

Now, it is said that the only question in that case was as to the right of the Commissioner to assess the lands as to which all the Defendants had a common interest, and that as co-Defendants the Respondents could not have disputed the evidence of the Appellants if they had had any interest to do so.

This may be true, although it is not easy to perceive why any inquiry into the truth of the Talookdar's title, or the genuineness of the documents produced in support of it, should have been made unless some contest on the subject had taken place between the Zemindar and the Talookdars. But, at least, at this time (in 1845), the Respondents having been turned out of possession in 1840, on the grounds which we have stated, had full notice of the title set up by the Appellants and of the evidence by which it was to be supported, and were bound to bring forward their claim in reasonable time. Yet these suits are not instituted for several years; and then, after every opportunity had been afforded of giving evidence to disprove these documents, no direct testimony against them is produced, and many [182] of the witnesses who were examined in 1845 may very probably be dead or not forthcoming. We have already expressed our opinion that, for the reasons which we have stated, the Respondents' claim is not barred by the Regulation of Limitations, but much allowance must be made for the difficulties which they have imposed on the Appellants by so long delaying a suit in a country where documentary evidence is peculiarly liable to destruction or effacement, as appears by the papers in this case.

Upon the whole, we must humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the decrees complained of, and to restore the decrees of the Sudder Ameen, and we think that all the costs of these suits, subsequent to the last-mentioned decrees, including the costs of these appeals, must be paid by the Respondents. We have thought it right to go at so much length into the circumstances of the case, because we are at all times extremely reluctant to reverse a unanimous judgment of the Court below on a question of fact, and because it is due to those learned Judges to show that we have not done so without having carefully considered and weighed the evidence.

[183] BABOO GOPAL LALL THAKOOR,—Appellant: TELUCK CHUNDER RAI and Others,—Respondents * [March 2, 3, 1865].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat at Calcutta.

Suits by a Zemindar claiming as purchaser at a sale for arrears of Government revenue, to enhance the rents of certain Talooks, which formerly constituted one Talook held of the Zemindary at a fixed or Mocurrery jumma; dismissed by the Sudder Court, and such dismissal affirmed on appeal by the Judicial Committee, as the evidence established that each Talookdar had paid a fixed and invariable rent anterior to the Decennial Settlement, and consequently was not liable to an enhancement of rent.

The onus of proving that a Talook had been held at a fixed and invariable rent twelve years antecedent to the Perpetual Settlement lies on the Defendant.

This was an appeal from an order of the Sudder Dewanny Court at Calcutta, dated the 26th of February, 1859, made in five several special appeals to that Court from the decree of the Zillah Court of Backergunge, bearing date the 17th of July, 1858; and also from the last-mentioned decree, made in five appeals from the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen.

The five separate suits were rendered necessary by [184] the rules of procedure of the Courts in India. In each of these suits the Appellant was Plaintiff, and the several Respondents were respectively Defendants. The object of the suits was to obtain decrees for the enhancement of rent under Ben. Reg. V. of 1812, secs. 9 and 10, modified by Act, No. VIII. of 1848, in respect of five Talooks held by the Respondents respectively, of the Appellant, as Zemindar of Tuppah Nazirpore, in the Province of Bengal.

The facts appear from their Lordships' judgment.

As the Respondents did not appear, the appeals were heard ex parte on a single case, which was argued by

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) for the Appellant. Mr. Leith, who was with him, was not called on.

After consideration, their Lordships' judgment was now pronounced by

The Right Hon. The Lord Justice Knight Bruce (March 29, 1865). The question on this appeal, which has been heard ex parte, is upon the alleged right of the Appellant, as Zemindar of Tuppah Nazirpore, in the Zillah of Backergunge, and Province of Bengal, to reassess and increase the rents payable in respect of certain lands forming part of his Zemindary, which formerly constituted one, but were afterwards divided into five dependent Talooks.

The Appellant derives his title to the larger part of his Zemindary from a sale for arrears of Government revenue, which took place in 1819. Fourteen [185] sixteenths were thus purchased, partly by the Appellant's father and cousin jointly, and partly by one Petumber Mozumdar. All these shares have since, by descent or sub-purchase, become vested in the Appellant. The remaining two sixteenths are stated to have been acquired in 1830 by private purchase from a Mr. John Panioty and others in whom they were then vested.

To enforce his claim to enhance the rents of the five Talooks it was necessary for the Appellant to institute five separate suits. The amount involved in each of them was below, whilst the aggregate amount involved in the five exceeded, the sum for which an appeal to Her Majesty in Council lies as of right. The Order of the 22nd of February, 1860, giving special leave to appeal, provided that in case the parties in India should consent that the Order to be made by Her Majesty in one suit should govern the others, there should be an appeal in one suit only (reported on this point, 7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 548). This consent has, unfortunately, not been given: the proceedings in all the suits have been sent home and are now before their Lordships. The argument of the learned Counsel for the Appellant embraced all the suits, and this judgment must be taken to be given in each of them.

The five suits were commenced in September, 1855. Each was founded on the alleged right of the Zemindar claiming, in part at least, as purchaser at a sale for arrears of Government revenue, to enhance the rents of a Talook described as Tashkhisi Zimma, or a sub-tenure held upon payment of a rent variable according to the current rates of the district.

[186] The title set up by the Respondents is to this effect. They allege that as early as 1701 (being the year 1111 of the Bengal era), one Mookondo Ram Chuckerbutty took, in the name of his son, Ram Chuckerbutty, an Amildari Pottah of the lands in question in the five suits, from Syud Shumsuddeen Mahomed, the then Zemindar, and held them as one Talook; that, on his death, his three sons, the said Ram Chuckerbutty, Gungadhur Shedhanto, and Gopeenath Chuckerbutty, held the Talook in thirds, making a separation by guess of part of the land, but holding the other part jointly; and that in 1755 A.D. (or 1162 B.E.) they made a settlement, witnessed by the seal of Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed, the descendant of Syud Shumsuddeen Mahomed, whereby the rent of the waste lands being postponed for future arrangement, they undertook to pay for the remaining and productive land a joint jumma of Rs. 1901. They further allege, that afterwards a complete separation between the brothers took place: that Gungadhur took his share of the lands held jointly, as well as those cultivated by him separately, and formed thereout a separate Talook called Sheeb-Kant (a name compounded of the first syllables of the names of his two sons); that Gopeenath Chuckerbutty made in the same way a separate Talook out of his share, which he named Lukhee-Kant after one of his sons; that the remaining share continued as a third Talook in the possession of Ram Chuckerbutty, or of his two sons, Beeshodeb and Gobind Prosad; and that this division was sanctioned by the Zemindar, and the consequent mutation of names effected, on the 26th of Bysack 1164 (A.D. 1757), by a writing, under the seal of Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed, which provided that the jumma [187] or rent should be assessed according to the quantity of land held by each person as ascertained by subsequent measurement. They state, however, that before this measurement took place Ram Chuckerbutty's share was sub-divided between his two sons, Beeshodeb and Gobind Prosad, and a further mutation of names effected in 1762, one of these sub-divisions becoming Talook Ram-Lukhun, the other Beeshodeb. They further allege that after this, the contemplated measurement and survey took place; that the Talook of Sheeb-Kant Chuckerbutty was then assessed at a fixed Mocurrery jumma of Rs. 691. 9a. 2g.; that the Talook Lukee-Kant Chuckerbutty was assessed at a like jumma of Rs. 643. 15a. 13g.; that Talook Ram-Lukhun Chuckerbutty was in like manner assessed at Rs. 335. 6a. 9g.; and that of Beeshodeb, existing under the name of Ram Chuckerbutty, at Rs. 337. 6g.; and that accordingly on the 14th Joistee, 1174 (being some time in the year 1767), separate bundobusts, or settlement papers, under the seal and signature of the Zemindar, Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed, were granted to the holders of each Talook, and contained these words: "The above amount of jumma being paid in current coin year by year, no increase shall be made to it, nor shall you give any."

Thus far the title of the Defendants in each of the five suits is common to all. The subject of the first suit is the Talook Sheeb-Kant Chuckerbutty; that of the second, Ram-Lukhun Chuckerbutty; that of the third, Lukhee-Kant Chuckerbutty; that of the fourth, Radha-Madub Chuckerbutty; and that of the fifth, Ramchunder Chuckerbutty; the two last named Talooks having, after the death of Beeshodeb, been [188] formed out of this Talook on a partition and division between his two sons, Radha Khristo and Radha Madub, in or some time before A.D. 1807. The Defendants in the several suits derive their title from the Tolookdars with whom the settlements of 1767 were made, some by descent, others by purchase; but it is not necessary for the determination of the present appeal to state these devolutions of title in detail.

From what has been said it is obvious that the principal question in each suit was, whether the Tolook that was the subject of it had been held from a period considerably anterior to the Decennial Settlement at a fixed or Mocurrery jumma, or was held on a rent variable, and, therefore, subject to enhancement.

The other material issues in each suit were,—

First, whether the claim of the Plaintiff was barred by the Regulation of Limitations. And, secondly, whether the notice required by law as a preliminary to a suit for enhancement of rent had been duly served.

The five suits were heard together by the Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Backergunge on the 20th of January 1858. His decision was in favour of the Appellant on all points. The Defendants in each suit appealed to the Zillah Judge (Mr. Kemp), who, on the 17th of July, 1858, reversed the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen, and decided in favour of the Defendants. His judgment proceeded on the ground that the Defendants had established by evidence that each Talook had paid a fixed and invariable rent for more than twelve years anterior to the Perpetual Settlement, and was consequently not liable to further assessment.

[189] The Appellant then carried the five causes to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut on special appeal, upon certain grounds. These seemed to have resolved themselves into the following objections:—First, that the Judge having determined that the suits were barred by the Regulation of Limitations, was in error in afterwards going into the merits of them: and secondly, that he was in error in holding that a suit for enhancement of rent must be brought within twelve years from the date at which the Plaintiff's title accrued.

The judgment of the Sudder Court dismissed the special appeals on the ground that the Judge had in fact decided the suits, not on the question of limitation, but upon their merits, and that his decision, being one of questions of fact, could not be reviewed by that Court on special appeal.

Their Lordships, in dealing with the present appeal, will assume that the Appellant's claim is not barred by lapse of time, and that he has duly served the notices required by law. These points appear to have been decided below in his favour, and their Lordships see no ground to doubt the correctness of that decision. They propose, then, to confine their attention to the question whether it was sufficiently proved in the Courts below that the present Talooks had been held at a fixed and invariable rent for more than twelve years antecedent to the Perpetual Settlement, it being admitted that, as the law stood in 1858, the burthen of proving this lay on the Defendants.

The principal documents on which the Defendants rely in support of their title are the settlement of the 21st of Srabun, 1162; the Kharijee Likhons, or mutation papers, of the 16th and 26th of Bysack, 1164; the similar document of the 13th Joistee, [190] 1169; the four Bundobusts, or settlements of the 11th and 14th Joistee, 1174; the Furud of 1198; the petition of 1810; the Dakhilas, or receipts for rent. The mutation paper of Choitro, 1214, bears only on the partition in 1807 between the sons of Beeshodeb, and the titles of the Defendants in the fourth and fifth suits.

What then is the effect of these documents if taken as genuine? The first establishes the existence of the dependant Talook, Ram Chuckerbutty, in the year 1755; the two next prove the division of that Talook into three in the year 1757, and the further subdivision of one of these into two in 1762. But all these fail to show that these Talooks were held at a fixed and invariable rent. The first is at least consistent with the hypothesis that the rent of the parent Talook might vary with the amount of land brought under cultivation; the others import that the rent of each of the four derivative Talooks was not to be settled until after survey and measurement. On the other hand, the four Bundobusts or settlement papers of 1174, if genuine, prove that in 1767 A.D., the rent of each of the four Talooks became fixed and invariable; and the Dakhilas support the contention of the Defendants that they and their predecessors had ever since continued to hold their lands at these rents. The Furud shows that in 1792, and the petition shows that in 1810, the Zemindar for the time being recognized the Bundobusts of 1174, and admitted the title of the Defendants. Unless, therefore, this evidence can be successfully impeached, it seems fully to warrant the conclusion of the Zillah Judge that the Defendants had relieved themselves of the heavy burthen which the law cast upon them, and [191] established the immunity of their lands from further assessment.

Before, however, considering the objections taken to the genuineness or credibility of the Defendant's evidence, their Lordships desire to notice the objection taken by the Attorney-General, to the effect that these documents, if genuine, contain no "words of inheritance" (to use the English phrase), i.e. no expression importing the hereditary character of the alleged tenures. Their Lordships conceive that this objection, which does not appear to have been taken in the Courts below, is not open to the Appellant in these suits. He is not suing for the recovery of the lands, or to disturb the possession of the Defendants, in which case he might have been successfully met, and no doubt would have been met, by a plea of the Regulation of Limitations. His suits are for the enhancement of rent. The pleadings consequently admit the existence of the tenures, and the lawful occupation of the Defendants. The only question between the parties is, whether the Talooks are Tashkhis or Mocurrery; i.e. whether they are held at a variable or at a fixed and invariable rent. Moreover, if the objection were open to the Appellant, it could hardly prevail against the evidence which the record affords, that for upwards of a century these Talooks have been treated as hereditary, and as such have both descended from father to son, and been the subject of purchase. It may further be observed that in the mutation papers of 1807, the Talook of Beeshtodeb is expressly termed "hereditary."

What then are the objections to the proof offered by the Defendants? The first, and not the least formidable, is that based upon the fact, established, if [192] not admitted, that Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed died in 1192 B.E. or 1785 A.D. This applies directly only to the Furud, and to some of the Dakhilas. It affects the more material documents (the Bundobusts of 1174) in so far only as it tends to deprive them of the important corroboration which they derive from the Furud, if genuine, and to throw suspicion generally on the Defendants' case.

It is clear that the Furud bearing the seal and "Sri" signature of Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed has not been concocted recently, or for the purposes of these suits.

That it existed in 1806, and was filed with other documents in the suit before Mr. Winden, is shown beyond reasonable doubt. It is very unlikely that it should have been fabricated for production in that suit, which was one between the Talookdars and their sub-tenants. On the other hand, it appears that the Perpetual Settlement of this Zemindary, the most important transaction in its history, was concluded several years after Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed's death, in his name, though possibly without the use of his seal. This was six years later than the date of the Furud. There is abundant evidence of the appearance of his seal and of his "Sri" signature upon other Zemindary documents purporting to bear a date later than that of his death. If such documents have been rejected in some cases, they have been admitted and acted upon in others. Weighing the evidence on both sides, their Lordships are not disposed to dissent from the conclusion of Mr. Kemp, that the date of Syud Imamoodeen Mahomed's death is not a fatal objection to the genuineness of the Furud, and the Dakhilas im-[193]-peached on the same ground; but that all may, nevertheless, be taken to have come from the Sharista or office of the Zemindar.

It is then objected, as a suspicious circumstance, that though the Furud was produced in 1806, the Bundobusts or settlements of 1174, to which it refers, were not then produced. The answer to this is, that their production was not necessary for the purposes of that suit. Documents are not produced in the Courts of India without some risk; and of all men the dependent Talookdar has the greatest reason to be careful of his title-deeds, since, whatever may have been the recognition of his title by his existing Zemindar, he may at some future time have to establish that title by the strictest proof against one coming in by purchase at a sale for arrears of revenue.

Another objection taken to the genuineness of the Bundobusts of 1174 is that no mention of them is made in the copy of the Quinquennial paper for 1227 B.E., corresponding with A.D. 1820. That there is some foundation for this objection their Lordships do not deny; as that document is not very well authenticated.

Little, if any, weight seems to have been attached to it even by the Principal Sudder Ameen, whose judgment was in favour of the Appellant. The inference founded on the omission to mention certain papers is not conclusive against their existence; and, indeed, there is in the last column of this Quinquennial return a general reference to papers other than those mentioned in the preceding columns. Whatever may be the force of this inference, it seems too slight to outweigh the corroborative proof of the existence of the Bundobusts long before 1820, which [194] is afforded by the Furud, and by the Zemindar's petition.

The evidence that has been given on either side, to prove or to disprove, that the enjoyment of the Talook has been consistent with the hypothesis that the tenures were Mocurrery, remains to be considered. The earlier Dakhilas produced (the objection to such of them as are subsequent in date to the death of Syud Inamooddeen Mahomed having already been disposed of) prove that for upwards of twelve years prior and up to the perpetual Settlement the Talooks were held and enjoyed at the fixed rents specified in the several Bundobusts. So far, then, the Defendants have given the proof which the Regulations require from them. But then it is objected that jumma wasil Bakee papers produced by the Appellant show that at a subsequent period the rents were variable. These papers are for various years between the year 1203 and 1216, and purport to show the collections in these years made either by the Receiver appointed by the Court of Wards during the minority of the Zemindar, or by a lessee named Mozoomdar. They do not mention the Talook Sheeb-kant Chuckerbutty, which is the subject of the first suit; and the title of the Defendants in that suit is, therefore, unaffected by them. It is perhaps for that reason that so little notice of them is taken by Mr. Kemp in his judgment. On the other hand, if genuine, they do show that during these years rents higher than those which the Defendants contend to be fixed or invariable were demanded and realized in respect of the other Talooks, and that those rents were to some degree variable in amount. But all these accounts appear to be of a date earlier than 1810. In that year, it appears from [195] the Zemindar's petition, the Talookdars remonstrated against certain exactions to which they had been subjected, asserted the title which their successors now assert, and obtained a recognition of it from the then Zemindar. There is no evidence that since that time the rent paid in respect of any of the Talooks has varied, and it is shown that for fourteen years after he had full notice in the proceeding before Mr. Knott, that the Defendants relied on the alleged settlement of 1174, the Appellant continued to receive the rents so fixed without seeking to enhance them. The conclusion, therefore, to which their Lordships would come upon the evidence is, that between 1768 and the date of the Perpetual Settlement the enjoyment of these Talooks was consistent with the Bundobusts of 1174, that it has been equally so since 1810, and that if higher and varying rents were exacted in respect of any of the Talooks during the period covered by the jumma wassil Bakee papers, such exaction was wrongful, and was remedied in 1810, when the recognition of the Zemindar remitted the Talookdars to their original rights. This argument assumes the genuineness of the jumma wasil Bakee papers, as to which there may be some doubt. They are certainly inconsistent with the Dakhilas for those years produced by the Defendants.

On the whole, their Lordships, though labouring under the disadvantage of having heard only the able, but at the same time candid, argument for the Appellant, have failed to find any sufficient grounds for disturbing the judgment of the Court below upon a pure issue of fact. The order, therefore, which they most humbly recommended Her Majesty to make is that this appeal be dismissed.

[196] MUSSUMAT JARIUT-OOL-BUTOOL.—Appellant: MUSSUMAT HOSEINEE
BEGUM,—Respondent * [June 19, 1865].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut North-West Provinces.

Within six months after decree and prior to the admission of an appeal therefrom to England, the Sudder Dewanny Court upon an ex parte application, without notice, issued an execution Order putting the decree-holder in possession. This was done without calling for security as provided by sec. 4, Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797. The Appellant, on the admission of the appeal, applied to the Sudder Court for security from the party in possession pending the appeal, but that Court held that as the decree-holder was in possession under an execution Order, which could not be appealed from, they had no power to interfere. On petition the Judicial Committee, in the circumstances, and upon affidavit of waste, made an Order, declaring that it was competent to the Sudder Court to require security to be given for protection of the property pending the appeal, notwithstanding execution of the decree had issued, and gave permission to the Appellant to apply to the Sudder Court with an intimation of that opinion.

This was an application by the Appellant for an order that the Respondent, who was in possession as a decree-holder, under an execution order of the Sudder Court, to give security for the protection of the property in suit pending the appeal to England.

The petition alleged, that the Respondent instituted a suit against the Appellant, claiming possession of an estate called Purlut, and certain villages; that a decree was made in favour of the Respondents; the [197] Petitioner appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for the North-Western Provinces, and that Court affirmed the decree of the Civil Court, and dismissed the appeal; but allowed an appeal to the Privy Council, the transcript record of which appeal arrived in England on the 1st of February, 1865.

The petition set out the circumstances which gave rise to this application, from which it appeared that, prior to the admission of the appeal, the Respondent applied for execution of the decree of the Civil Court, as affirmed by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and the same was ordered to be carried into execution, whereupon the Respondent was put in possession of the estate. This order was made and carried into effect without taking any security from the Respondent. The mode for proceeding, and the course to be pursued by the Sudder Court in case of an appeal, is prescribed by Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, which, by sec. 4 provides that—"In cases of appeal to His Majesty in Council, the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut may either order the judgment passed by them to be carried into execution, taking sufficient security from the party in whose favour the same may be passed, for the due performance of such order or decree as His Majesty, his heirs or successors, shall think fit to make on the appeal, or to suspend execution of their judgment during the appeal, taking the like security, in the latter case, from the party left in possession of the property adjudged against him." Notwithstanding the provisions of the above-mentioned Regulation, the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut did not take security from the Respondent upon the admission of the appeal of the Petitioner; and [198] although the Petitioner caused several applications to be made to that Court, with a view to security being taken from the Respondent, such applications were rejected. The last of those applications was rejected by the Court on the 20th of November 1863, when the opinion of the Court was recorded in the following terms:—"The first point to be considered is, whether we can take this application into consideration. On this point we are of opinion that, as this application is preferred under sec. 4, Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, it is unnecessary to refer to the provisions of Act, No. VIII. of 1859, relative to reviews of judgments. The next point is, whether this application can be granted. On this point we are of opinion that, as execution of decree has been completed, the Court are not in a position to call upon the decree-holder to furnish security. Had the application been made in due time before execution of the decree had taken place, there would have been no difficulty in complying with it. The law above quoted does not contemplate the cases of decrees already executed. Sec. 92, Act No. VIII, of 1859, is, in our opinion, inapplicable. We accordingly reject the application."

The petition then alleged, that the Petitioner, finding it impossible to obtain redress in India in the matter of security from the Respondent, had been compelled to wait until an application could be made on her behalf to Her Majesty in Council, and that this application was made at the earliest date at which it was possible to have made the same; and it was insisted, first, that it was the duty of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, upon or after the admission of the Petitioner's appeal, to have taken security from the Respondent for the property which [199] had been transferred to her, by reason that the Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, so far as respects the taking of security, was imperative, and gave the Court no option or discretion in the matter. Secondly, that the opinion of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, to the effect that the Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, did not contemplate the cases of decrees already executed, was erroneous, and that, on the contrary, the Ben. Reg. V. of 1798, referring inter alia to cases of appeal under Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, and providing a mode of enforcing security by attachment of the property, expressly includes cases of executed judgments, and that thus a strong presumption was afforded that Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797 (in the absence of any expressed exception) was intended also to include such cases; and the Petitioner submitted that, under the provisions of the Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1797, she, having lodged her appeal within the time fixed by that Regulation, was plainly entitled to the benefit of the security prescribed by the same. That as no appearance had yet been entered on behalf of the Respondent to the appeal, and as considerable time must necessarily elapse before judgment can be obtained upon the appeal, the Petitioner had good reason to fear that, unless security be taken from the Respondent, the property which has been transferred to the Respondent in execution of the decree appealed from would be almost entirely wasted pending the appeal, and the Petitioner unable to reap the benefit of the decision upon appeal, if the same should be in her favour; and the petition prayed that the Respondent might be ordered within six weeks from the service of an Order upon her to that effect, to give full and sufficient security to the Sudder Dewanny [200] Adawlut for the North-Western Provinces for the due performance of such decree as Her Majesty in Council shall think fit to make on the appeal, and that the amount of such security might be calculated and determined by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and that in such calculations the mesne profits which have accrued from the property since the transfer thereof to the Respondent, as well as the value of the property transferred, may be taken into account; or that in default of the Respondent giving the required security within the before-mentioned period, then that so much of the property transferred to the Respondent as is now in her possession or power may be placed under attachment pending the appeal; that the requisite directions may be given for the purposes aforesaid, or for other relief.

Affidavits were filed confirming the facts contained in the petition, and of the waste committed by the party in possession.

Mr. W. H. Melvill, and Mr. Ahmaric Rumsey, for the Petitioner.—First: We are entitled to an Order directing the Sudder Court to obtain security from the Respondent pending the appeal. The affidavits show that the estate is being wasted. In re Rajah Vassaveddly Lutchmeputty Naidoo (5 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 300) is a case which illustrates our position that the estate may be entirely lost by the Court below neglecting to take security. The Sudder Dewanny Court should not have allowed the Order for the execution to the decree-holder without taking security. Ben. Reg. XVI. of 1897, sec. 2, which embodies Statute, 21st Geo. III. c. 70, [201] sec. 21 of Ben. Reg. XIII. 1808, sec. 11, cl. 3: Circular Orders of the North-West Provinces, Vol. I, p. 513. [Sir John Coleridge: Why was not an application made to stay execution?] We had no notice that the Order would be applied for. When the appeal was admitted six months had not expired, therefore we were not too late in applying for security. Ben. Reg. V. of 1798, secs. 5 and 6, provides for additional security after appeal. [Sir James Colville: Does not the Act, No. VIII. of 1859, provide that there shall be no appeal from an Order directing execution?] It may be that such Order was not appealable, but, notwithstanding, this Court can admit an appeal. The East India Company v. Syed Ally (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 555). Secondly, if there is any doubt as to the power in this Tribunal to grant the prayer of the petition, we ask for leave to apply to the Sudder Court for security, with an intimation of your Lordships' opinion on the question of law, as In re Muir (3 Moore's P.C. Cases, 150). If an Order cannot be made in either of these forms, we are in the alternative prepared with a petition for special leave to appeal from the execution Order, and to have the question argued nunc pro tunc, as was done in Erq. Minchin (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 220).

The Lord Justice Turner.—Their Lordships have felt some difficulty in dealing with this case, which in the circumstances is new. But, on examining the Regulations and considering the nature of the case, they are of opinion, that an [202] Order may be made upon this application. At the same time, they think the proper Order to be made should be one which should leave it, as far as possible, in the discretion of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut as to what proceedings or what steps should be taken; and their Lordships propose, therefore, to make the Order in this form:—Their Lordships, being of opinion that it is expedient that sufficient security should be taken from the Respondent for the due performance of such Order and decree as Her Majesty may make on this appeal, and that it is competent to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to require such security to be given, or otherwise to provide for the protection and security of the property in question pending this appeal, notwithstanding that execution had issued before this appeal was allowed; and that the Appellant be at liberty to apply to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for such security to be given, or such provision to be made, as she may admit.

By the Order in Council made on the petition, it was ordered, that the Appellant be at liberty to apply to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for the North-Western Provinces for such security to be given, or such provision be made for the protection and security of the property in question pending this appeal as she may be advised. Whereof the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut for the North-Western Provinces of Bengal for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

[203] SHAMA PURSHAD ROY CHOWDERY, and Others.—Appellants: HURRO PURSHAD ROY CHOWDERY, and Another.—Respondents * [March 3, 1865].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal.

Section 16 of Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, declares, "that the Zillah and City Courts are prohibited from entertaining any cause which, from the production of a former decree or the records of the Court, shall appear to have been heard and determined by any former Judge, or any Superintendent of a Court having competent jurisdiction." Held to apply only to a case in which the question to be determined in the suit was the same as had been already heard and decided, and not to a case where new circumstances had intervened and altered the nature and character of the question to be determined [10 Moo. Ind. App. 211]. Money realized under a decree, or judgment, cannot be recovered back in a new suit or action, while such decree of judgment under which it was recovered remains in force, as the original decree, or judgment, must be taken to be subsisting and valid until it has been reversed or superseded by ulterior proceeding [10 Moo. Ind. App. 211, 212].

The Appellants were the sons and heirs of Doorga Purshad Roy Chowdery, who had in his life-[204]-time instituted a suit in the Zillah Court of the Twenty-Four Purgunnahs against the original Respondent, Tara Purshad Roy Chowdery, who died pending the appeal, and was afterwards represented by the present Respondents. The object of that suit was to obtain a refund and recovery from the former Respondent of the sum of Rs. 23,294. 9. 16½, on account of principal and interest and costs; such principal money having been realized by him from Doorga Purshad Roy Chowdery, for interest which accrued on another principal sum, under a decree, dated the 12th of August, 1844, made in a suit instituted in the same Zillah Court. It appeared that this latter decree was contrary both in spirit and in terms to an Order of Her Majesty in Council of the 18th of July, 1819, made subsequently in an appeal (see Doorga Pershad Roy Chowdry v. Tarra Pershad Roy Chowdry, 4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 452), in another suit between the same parties involving substantially the same rights; raising the same questions of law and fact, and dealing with the same principal sum on which the interest claimed and recovered by Tara Purshad Roy Chowdery in the above-mentioned suit had accrued.

The principal questions raised by the present appeal were, first, whether as the sum sought to be recovered by Doorga Purshad Roy Chowdery was obtained by the original Respondent under a decree of the Zillah Court, such decree could be pleaded, under Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 16, as a bar to the suit, notwithstanding the before-mentioned Order in Council; and secondly, whether, independently of that section of the Regulation, the money having been paid under a decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction, he was precluded from recovering in a new suit, so [205] long as the decree under which it was recovered remained in force.

The material facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

At the hearing of the appeal, Mr. Leith appeared for the Appellants, and Mr. W. H. Melvill for the Respondents.

The case of Doorga Pershad Roy Chowdry v. Tarra Pershad Roy Chowdry (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 452), was referred to in the argument of the Appellants; and Ben. Reg. III. sec. 16, of 1793, upon the question of the suit being barred by the previous decree, was referred to and insisted on by the Respondents.

Judgment was delivered by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (March 29, 1865).—The facts of this case, so far as it is necessary to refer to them, lie in a narrow compass.

In the year 1821, Doorga Purshad, claiming to be entitled to the estate of his uncle, instituted a suit against Shama Purshad Nundy, a debtor to the uncle's estate, for a recovery of the sum of Rs. 23,024, principal and interest due upon a Bond. Pending this suit and in the year 1827, Tara Purshad Roy Chowdery, the original Respondent, sued Doorga Purshad for recovery of one-half of the estate of the uncle, to which he (Tara Purshad) claimed to be entitled.

In the year 1829, there was a compromise of the suit instituted by Tara Purshad against Doorga Purshad, under which compromise Tara Purshad became entitled to a six-anna share of the debt due from Shama Purshad Nundy. Subsequently to this [206] compromise, and on the 27th of July, 1829, Doorga Purshad obtained a decree in the Provincial Court against Shama Purshad Nundy for the amount of the principal and interest due upon the Bond. From this decree Shama Purshad Nundy appealed to the Sudder Court, and pending this appeal, and in the year 1831, there was a compromise of this suit also, which was affected by deeds, dated the 16th of May, 1831. The terms of this compromise were, that Shama Purshad should pay Rs. 24,217. 12. 17. at the end of three years, without interest, and that, in default of payment, Doorga Purshad should be at liberty to proceed and realize the amount. This compromise was, it appears, made without the privity of Tara Purshad, and the payment stipulated to be made by Shama Purshad Nundy at the end of the three years was not made by him.

In this state of circumstances, Tara Purshad, in the month of March, 1835, instituted another suit against Doorga Purshad, seeking to recover from him his (Tara Purshad's) six-anna share of Shama Purshad Nundy's Bond debt, and of the interest upon it up to the time of the commencement of the proceedings against Shama Purshad Nundy in the year 1821; and by the plaint in this suit, Tara Purshad reserved to himself the right to bring another suit for his share of the interest on the Bond debt from the last-mentioned date up to the date of the decree of the 27th of July, 1829, which Doorga Purshad had obtained as above mentioned.

This suit was carried through the Courts in India up to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and ultimately, by a decree of that Court, dated the 15th of April, 1841, Doorga Purshad was decreed to pay to Tara [207] Purshad the entire amount of principal and interest for which his suit was brought. From this decree of the Sudder Court, Doorga Purshad appealed to Her Majesty in Council, and upon this appeal being heard before the Judicial Committee in July, 1849 (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 161), the Committee reported to Her Majesty, that the decree of the Sudder Court ought to be reversed, and that it ought to be declared that Doorga Purshad was liable to Tara Purshad for a six-anna share of what he, Doorga Purshad, had received, or might thereafter receive, and of what, if anything, he might at any time after the 16th of May, 1833 (being the expiration of the time limited by the deeds of compromise of the 16th of May, 1831), without his wilful default, have recovered or received from Shama Purshad Nundy, or in respect of the sum of Rs. 24,217. 12. 17., and the interest thereon, payable by Shama Purshad Nundy under the decree of the 27th of July, 1829, and the compromise of the 16th of May, 1831, and that the case ought to be referred back to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, to ascertain, carry out, and enforce the rights and liabilities of the parties as above declared, and that Tara Purshad should be at liberty to apply in the suit of Doorga Purshad against Shama Purshad Nundy for leave to enforce the decree in that suit, as he might be advised, for the recovery of his six-anna share of the Rs. 24,217. 12. 17., and interest, in so far as the same had not been already recovered.

By an Order of Her Majesty in Council, bearing date the 18th of July, 1849, this report was approved, and it was ordered that the decree of the Sudder Court of the 15th of April, 1841, should be, and the [208] same was thereby reversed, and that it be declared and done as in the report more fully set forth and recommended, and that the same be duly and punctually obeyed, complied with, and carried into execution.

In the meantime, pending this appeal to Her Majesty in Council, and on the 3rd of December, 1842, Tara Purshad instituted a further suit against Doorga Purshad to recover the sum of Rs. 4593. 12. 9., the interest upon his six-anna share of the sum secured by the Bond, from the year 1821, when the proceedings against Shama Purshad Nundy were commenced, up to the 27th of July 1829, when the decree against him was made, being the interest for which by the plaint in his original suit he had reserved to himself the right to sue. This suit was heard before the Principal Sudder Ameen on the 11th of August, 1843, and by his decree of that date he dismissed the suit; but, upon an appeal by Tara Purshad to the Judge of the Zillah Court, the decision of the Sudder Ameen was reversed, and Doorga Purshad was ordered to pay to the Respondent the Rs. 4593. 22. 9., with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, from the time of the commencement of the suit, with the costs in both Courts; and upon a special appeal by Doorga Purshad to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, that Court dismissed the appeal with costs. In consequence of these decrees Doorga Purshad was compelled to pay to Tara Purshad the sum of Rs. 11,217. 15. 3., which he accordingly paid as follows:—Rs. 8200. 7. 3. on the 28th of April, 1848, and Rs. 2927. 8. on the 4th of August, 1857.

Several attempts appear to have been made by Doorga Purshad after Her Majesty's Order in Council arrived in India to obtain a review of the [209] decrees made against him in the last-mentioned suit, and to have those decrees considered in connection with Her Majesty's Order in Council, but he failed in these attempts, and thereupon, on the 17th of August, 1857, he instituted against Tara Purshad the suit out of which the appeal before us has arisen. By his plaint in this suit he has sought to recover the sum of Rs. 23,294. 9. 16½., being the amount of the sums paid by him to Tara Purshad, and of the sums which he has paid for his own costs of the proceedings taken against him, with interest on such sums respectively from the respective times of the payment thereof at 12 per cent. per annum. Tara Purshad, by his answer to the plaint, has insisted that the decision of the Judge of the Zillah Court in his favour in the further suit brought by him, having been affirmed on appeal by the Sudder Court, became final, and could not be set aside by a new suit, and he has relied upon section 16, Regulation III. of 1793, as a bar to the suit. On the 29th of June, 1858, the suit was heard before the Principal Sudder Ameen, and was by that Judge dismissed with costs. From this decision Doorga Purshad appealed to the Sudder Court, but that Court, by its decree, dated the 9th of May, 1859, affirmed the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen.

The appeal now before us is from the decree of the Sudder Court of the 9th of May, 1859, and from the decree of the Zillah Court of the 29th of June, 1858. There is no appeal before us from either of the decrees made in the further suit instituted by Tara Purshad against Doorga Purshad, their Lordships having, in consequence of delay on the part of Doorga Purshad, refused an application made by him for leave to appeal [210] from those decrees. Doorga Purshad and Tara Purshad have both died pending this appeal, and the appeal has been revived and is now in force between their representatives, Shama Purshad Roy Chowdery and others, and Hurro Purshad Roy Chowdery and another.

The sole question to be considered upon this appeal is, whether Doorga Purshad was entitled to recover, in the suit instituted by him against Tara Purshad, the sums which had been recovered by Tara Purshad from him under the decrees in the suit which Tara Purshad had instituted against him: and in considering this question, it must be assumed that at the times when those decrees were made, Tara Purshad was rightfully entitled to recover the sums which were payable under them, there not being, as has been mentioned, any appeal from those decrees. Tara Purshad insisted in the Courts in India, and his representatives have insisted in the argument before us, that Doorga Purshad was not entitled to recover these sums for two reasons: first, that his right to recover them is precluded by section 16, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793; and, secondly, that, independently of that provision in the Regulation, money which had been paid under a decree or judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction cannot be recovered in a new suit or action, so long as the decree or judgment under which it has been recovered is subsisting and in force. Upon the first of these points their Lordships have felt but little doubt. Section 16, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, is in these terms:—"The Zillah and City Courts are prohibited from entertaining any cause which, from the production of a former decree or the records of the Court, shall [211] appear to have been heard and determined by any former Judge, or any Superintendent of a Court having competent jurisdiction. If any doubt should arise respecting the competency of the former jurisdiction, the Judges are to report the circumstances to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and wait the instructions of that Court." Their Lordships think that this provision applies only to cases in which the question to be determined in the cause is the same question as has been already heard and determined, and not to cases like the present in which new circumstances have intervened, and altered the nature and character of the question to be determined. The intent of the resolution, as it seems to their Lordships, is only to prevent the re-trial of the same question; and it is obvious that there is an essential difference between the question whether Tara Purshad was entitled to recover against Doorga Purshad before the Order of Her Majesty in Council was pronounced, and the question whether, after that Order was pronounced, he was entitled to hold the money which he had previously recovered.

Upon the second point their Lordships have felt more difficulty. There is no doubt that, according to the law of this country—and their Lordships see no reason for holding that it is otherwise in India—money recovered under a decree or judgment cannot be recovered back in a fresh suit or action whilst the decree or judgment under which it was recovered remains in force: but this rule of law rests, as their Lordships apprehend, upon this ground, that the original decree or judgment must be taken to be subsisting and valid until it has been reversed or superseded by some ulterior proceeding. If it has been [212] so reversed or superseded, the money recovered under it ought certainly to be refunded, and, as their Lordships conceive, is recoverable either by summary process, or by a new suit or action. The true question, therefore, in such cases is, whether the decree or judgment under which the money was originally recovered has been reversed or superseded; and applying this test to the present case, their Lordships are of opinion, that the decrees obtained by Tara Purshad against Doorga Purshad were superseded by the Order of Her Majesty in Council pronounced in the year 1849. It was plainly intended by that Order that all the rights and liabilities of the parties should be dealt with under it, and it would be in contravention of the Order to permit the decrees obtained by Tara Purshad pending the appeal on which it was made to interfere with this purpose. Moreover, the decrees now under appeal rest on precisely the same cause of suit as the original decree which was reversed by the Order of Her Majesty in Council. The plaint in the case on which the original decree was recovered describes the interest recovered by the decrees under appeal as part of the same cause of suit, separated only for the convenience of Tara Purshad, and the decrees under appeal, therefore, were mere subordinate and dependent decrees, and their Lordships do not think that these decrees can be held to have remained in force when the decree on which they were dependent had been reversed.

That the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut has not, as their Lordships think it might have done, dealt with the decrees now under appeal as falling within the direction given to that Court by Her Majesty's Order in Council, to ascertain, carry out, and enforce the [213] rights and liabilities of the parties, does not, in their Lordships' opinion, vary the case. This provision in Her Majesty's Order in Council gave power to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to deal summarily with the rights and liabilities of the parties, but it could not, in their Lordships' opinion, take away any rights which the law would give to Doorga Purshad independently of that power. For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion, that the decrees appealed from ought to be reversed, and that the sums of Rs. 8200. 7. 3. and Rs. 2927. 8. paid under them ought, so far as the assets of Tara Purshad will extend, to be repaid by the now Respondents to the Appellant, with interest at 12 per cent. from the respective times when such sums were respectively paid, and that the now Respondents ought also, so far as Tara Purshad's assets will extend, to pay the costs of this appeal; but under the circumstances of the case, and having regard to the delay on the part of Doorga Purshad, their Lordships do not think that his representatives are entitled to recover the costs incurred by him in the course of the proceedings taken against him by Tara Purshad. Their Lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend Her Majesty to make an Order upon this appeal to the effect which we have mentioned.

[214] MUSSUMUT CHUNDRABULLEE DEBIA,—Appellant; LUCKHEA DEBIA CHOWDRAIN,—Respondent.^{*} [June 19, 20, 1865].

By a Pottah, in the nature of a lease in perpetuity, granted by an ancestor of A., in the year 1796, to the ancestor of B. of a piece of land, B. and his heirs were to enjoy a house built thereon, in consideration of setting up an idol in the house, without payment of rent. Upwards of sixty years after the date of this grant, during which period the idol remained and its worship uninterruptedly continued, no rent having been paid by the grantee or his heirs, A. without any demand for rent, or bringing a suit for assessment of the property, brought a suit against B. to recover six years' arrears of rent for the house, at the rate fixed by Ben. Reg. XIX. of 1793, sec. 10. Held, reversing the decree of the Sudder Court, that B., and those under whom she claimed, having been in undisturbed possession, and the cause of action having arisen sixty years before the institution of the suit, such suit was barred by cl. 3, sec. 3, of Ben. Reg. II. of 1805 [10 Moo. Ind. App. 217].

Held further, that while that clause takes away the cognizance by any Court in Bengal of a suit, if the cause of action should have arisen sixty years before the institution of the suit, it distinguishes between the effect of the twelve years' limitation and that of sixty years, by precluding all inquiry into any original defect in the title under which the possession for the latter period obtain, and made it, in effect, unavailing to show that the possession of A. commenced under a grant made null and void by the Regulation of 1793.

Whether the twelve years' limitation provided by the Ben. Reg. II. sec. 3, cl. 1. of 1805, can be held applicable to such a suit. Quære?

Semble. That to maintain such an action, a demand for arrears of rent should have been preceded by a suit for assessment of rent under Ben. Reg. XIX. of 1793, sec. 10.

The facts and circumstances of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of their Lordships:

The appeal was heard ex parte, the Respondent not appearing.

[215] The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant, argued.

First, that the grantor had power to alienate any portion of his estate, Ben. Reg. I. of 1793, sec. 9; and that the Portah conveying the house, under which title the Appellant claimed, was expressly sanctioned by Ben. Reg. XLIV. of 1793, sees. 6 and 8.

Secondly, that the Courts below had wrongly applied the provisions of Ben. Reg. XIX. of 1793, sec. 10, to the case; and Thirdly, that the suit was barred by acquiescence, as well as by the rules of limitation, Ben. Regs. III. of 1793, sec. 14, and II. of 1805, sec. 3.

Their Lordships' judgment having been reserved, was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir John T. Coleridge (Dec. 1, 1865). This was an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal, affirming a decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen of the Civil Court of Mymensing, which last had reversed a decree of the Sudder Ameen of the last-named Court in favour of the Appellant. The Respondent has not appeared, and this appeal has been heard ex parte.

The original suit was brought by the Respondent to recover arrears of rent for six years and nine months preceding its commencement, and the following may be taken to be the facts of the case:—The Appellant and those under whom she claims had been in peaceable and undisturbed possession of the property for more than sixty years; it is in the town of Nusseerabad, and within and parcel of a four-annas share of the Zemindary of Pergunnah Allapsing, of [216] which the Respondent, as mother and guardian of her son, a minor, is the proprietor in possession. The Appellant claims under a grant from the ancestor of the Respondent, which purports to have been made for the setting up an idol, and concludes thus—"Having set up the said idol in the said house, you will enjoy the same without paying rent through sons and grandsons. For this purpose I have given you this Bromuttur Pottro." The date of this instrument corresponds with the 10th of February, 1796 A.D. The idol has remained, and its worship has been continued uninterruptedly from that time. The Respondent's plaint, which was not filed until the 15th of April, 1857, was preceded by no demand of rent, nor any suit for the assessment of it; but the rent sued for is stated to be "in accordance with the rate of rent obtaining in lodging-houses at this place of Nusseerabad": this rate being fixed by the Ben. Reg. XIX. of 1793, sec. 10; on which, indeed, the Respondent's case entirely depends.

These are all the facts, and it sees clear that if the original grant has not been annulled by any Regulation, or if the possession has become unimpeachable by reason of the lapse of time, either of the twelve years or of the sixty years prescribed by the Bengal Regulations; or if, at all events, it was under the circumstances necessary that this action should have been preceded by a suit for assessment of the rent, or a demand of rent ascertained in some way or other; the original suit could not be maintained, and the two later decrees must be reversed. They were impeached by the Appellant on all these grounds. Their Lordships, however, do not find it necessary in this case to give any opinion upon the first or third of these [217] points, or upon the question whether, under the circumstances of this case, the twelve years' limitation prescribed by the Regulations ought to be held applicable to it. They have reason to believe that questions of some importance, and possibly of some difficulty, have been raised, and that some cases which were not cited at the Bar have been decided in the Courts in India, bearing more or less directly on some, at least, of these points, and they think it would neither be prudent nor safe for them, more especially in a case which has been argued on one side only, to give any opinion which might affect these questions. Moreover, it is obvious that to decide this case upon the last of the grounds on which the Appellant relied, might only lead to renewed litigation. Their Lordships, therefore, abstain from giving any opinion whatever upon any of these points.

It may be assumed, for the purpose of argument, but for that purpose only, and without the expression of any opinion by their Lordships, that all these points ought to be decided in favour of the Respondent: but they are of opinion that the Appellant was entitled to have the suit dismissed upon the ground of there having been peaceable possession by her and by those under whom she claims for sixty years before the suit was commenced, and of the suit being, therefore, barred by the early part of the 3rd clause of the Ben. Reg. II. of 1805.

The first and second clause, and the second branch of the third clause, of this Regulation have reference to the twelve years' limitation which was previously in force, explaining and qualifying that limitation: and as their Lordships do not, as has been already said, rest their judgment on this limitation, [218] it is unnecessary to comment on these parts of the Regulation: but the first branch of this third clause provides that "nothing in the preceding clause, or in any part of the existing Regulations, shall be held to authorize the cognizance of any suit whatever in any Court of Justice, if the cause of action shall have arisen sixty years before the institution of the suit: nor shall any plea on the part of the Plaintiff for the non-prosecution of his claim of right during a period of sixty years after the origin of his alleged cause of action, nor any original defect of title on the part of the possessor of the property claimed, after the lapse of such period, be deemed a sufficient ground for taking judicial cognizance of any suit so preferred." This branch of the clause, therefore, in its very comprehensive language, embraces every then existing Regulation by which any Court in Bengal was authorized to take cognizance of any suit whatever: it, in effect, takes away that authorization if the cause of action shall have arisen sixty years before the institution of the suit: it distinguishes between the effect of the twelve years' limitation and that of sixty, by precluding all inquiry into any original defect in the title under which the possession for the latter period commenced: it makes it, in effect, in cases in which the section applies, unavailing to show that the possession of the Appellant commenced under a grant made null and void by the Regulation of 1793.

The question then is, what is the cause of action in the present case, and when did it arise? In terms the suit is brought to recover rent for the last six or seven years, and the non-payment of that rent is, no doubt, in one sense, the cause of action.

The suit, indeed, may in some sense be likened to [219] what is of daily occurrence, the action to recover the later items only of a long account, which have become due within six years, although the Statute of limitations has barred the demand for the earlier items. The distinction, however, between such an action and the present suit, is obvious: the items of an account are independent of each other: each represents a distinct contract or a distinct debt. But the right to recover rent for the last six or seven years, depends on a possession founded on a grant avoided by the Regulation, which possession has been one and entire in character through the whole sixty years.

It is the case of the Plaintiff in the Court below, that by reason of the character of the grant and the operation of the Regulation, his ancestor might have determined the possession in the first year of its existence, or claimed rent at the end of that year. If, in spite of length of possession, an action for use and occupation could be maintained, so long as a Plaintiff could show a good title in himself and a bad one in the occupier, of what avail would any Statute of limitations be? A man might be barred in an action directly brought to recover the possession, such as ejectment, and yet not be barred when he sued from year to year, for use and occupation, for a compensation for the fruits of the land: because in this the occupation would be referable to the sufferance and permission of the real owner, and so be a good consideration for an implied promise to pay what it was worth. But this clearly could not be: and so here, if no action could be maintained directly to recover the possession of the land, none can be brought to recover the rent, which is the compensation for the [220] occupation—that occupation having been always of one and the same character; in fact, rent free.

Their Lordships being of this opinion, will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that this suit was barred by the sixty years' possession of the Appellant, and those under whom she claims, and, therefore, that the original judgment of the Sudder Ameen dismissing it ought to be affirmed, and the two later judgments reversed, and the costs of all the proceedings below, with those of this appeal, be paid by the Respondent.

SREENANTH BHUTTACHARJEE.—Appellant: RAMCOMUL GUNGOPADYA, GOBIND CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR and Others.—Respondents * [June 20, 21, 1865].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Bengal.

By section 2 of Act, No. XIX. of 1843, it is enacted, that “every deed of sale, or gift of lands, houses, or other real property, a memorial of which has been or shall be duly registered according to law, shall, provided its authenticity be established to the satisfaction of the Court, invalidate any other deed of sale or gift for the same property which may not have been registered, and whether such second or other deed shall have been executed prior or subsequent to the registered deed—and that [from the 1st day of May, 1843] every deed of mortgage on land, houses, and other real property, as well as certificates of the discharge of such incumbrances, a memorial of which has been or shall be duly registered according to law, and provided its authenticity be established to the satisfaction of the Court, shall be satisfied in preference to any other mortgage on the same property which may not have been registered, and whether such second or other mortgage shall have been executed prior or subsequent to the registered mortgage, any knowledge or notice of any such unregistered deed or certificate alleged to be had by any party to such registered deed or certificate notwithstanding.” Held:—

First, that the words in the latter part of the section, “any knowledge or notice of any such unregistered deed or certificate alleged to be had by any party to such registered deed or certificate notwithstanding” applied not only to deeds and certificates of mortgage, but also to deeds of sale or gift [10 Moo. Ind. App. 227]; and

Secondly, that the proviso, that “its authenticity be established to the satisfaction of the Court” pointed out merely the exclusion of a fraudulent deed from the benefit of the Act, as it was not intended that a deed which was tainted by fraud, although in other respects genuine, should be placed on the same footing as a bona fide deed [10 Moo. Ind. App. 228].

A registered deed cannot be deprived of the priority given by Act, No. XIX. 1843, unless it be proved that there was fraud on the part of the grantee.

The Appellant in this appeal brought a suit, in the nature of an action of ejectment, in the Zillah Court of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs against the [221] Respondents to recover possession of 28½ mouzahs, being a moiety of the Zemindary,

Pergunnah Haveleeshur, with mesne profits of the villages, then in the possession of the Respondent, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, as registered owner. The Zemindary had been conveyed to him by the Respondent, Ramcomul Gungopadya, a former mortgagee, who had acquired the proprietary right of the Zemindary under a foreclosure proceeding and suit for possession.

The question in the suit was one of title. The Appellant claimed the moiety of the Zemindary, under a Kabala, or Bill of Sale, dated the 27th of March, 1854, made by one of the Respondents, named Taraprosono Mookerjee, who, it was insisted by the Appellant, had previously purchased the moiety of the Zemindary from Ramcomul Gungopadya, and that a deed had been executed by him conveying to Taraprosono Mookerjee the moiety in consideration of certain pecuniary transactions subsisting between them in relation to Ramcomul Gungopadya's mortgage. The defence of [222] the Respondent, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, to the Appellant's claim was, that he was entitled to the whole Zemindary under a deed of conveyance in the English form, dated the 5th of April, 1854, executed by Ramcomul Gungopadya for a good consideration, which deed, as well as a deed of release of even date from Taraprosono Mookerjee, for the moneys advanced by him in respect of Ramcomul Gungopadya's mortgage, were registered on the 20th of April, 1854, in the proper office of the Registrar of deeds of the Zillah of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, previous to the registration of the alleged Kabala, set up by the Appellant.

By sec. 2 of Act, No. XIX. of 1843 (see section set out, post [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 226), preference is given to a registered deed, over one, although of an earlier date, subsequently registered under the provisions of that Act.

When the cause came before the Principal Sudder Ameen (Baboo Tarucknath Sein), he dismissed the suit, on the ground, that the Appellant's title could not be maintained, as the deeds, including the Kabala, on which he founded his claim, were, in his opinion, forgeries, and upheld the title of the Respondent, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar. The Appellant appealed from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlat at Calcutta. The decree of that Court (which consisted of Messrs. Raikes, Trevor and Loch), was to the effect, that there was no pecuniary consideration for the alleged conveyance from Ramcomul Gungopadya to Taraprosono Mookerjee, and in the absence of such consideration, the title of the Respondent, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar could not be affected by that conveyance, and accordingly the appeal was dismissed with costs. Hence the present appeal.

[223] Mr. Holthouse, Q.C., and Mr. Cave, for the Appellant, contended, first, that Ramcomul Gungopadya's title being undisputed, the Bill of Sale made by him to Taraprosono Mookerjee, and the conveyance afterwards executed by the latter in the Appellant's favour, being genuine instruments for valuable consideration, passed the moiety of the mouzahs in suit to the Appellant.

Secondly, that the conveyance executed by Taraprosono Mookerjee in favour of the Respondent, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, was fraudulently concocted for the purpose of defeating the Appellant's claim, and, therefore, was not entitled under the Act, No. XIX. of 1843, secs. 2 and 3, by reason of its earlier registration, to be preferred to the prior deed of sale executed by Taraprosono Mookerjee in favour of the Appellant.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, appeared for the Respondent, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, but were not called upon to address their Lordships.

Judgment having been reserved, was now pronounced by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (July 20, 1865).—In disposing of this appeal their Lordships do not think it necessary to enter fully into the details of the case. The view they take of it will be sufficiently explained by a mere general outline of the facts. Ramcomul Gungopadya was originally mortgagee of the entirety of the Zemindary, Pergunnah Haveleeshur. He subsequently acquired the full proprietary right to and possession of the Zemindary by a foreclosure [224] suit, and suit for possession consequent thereon, and after he had thus acquired the proprietary right in the Zemindary he applied for the mutation of names in the Collectorate, and was there registered as sole proprietor of the whole Zemindary. The Appellant, Sreenanth Bhuttacharjee, alleges that Ramcomul Gungopadya before he had acquired the proprietary right in the Zemindary by an Ikrar, or agreement for sale, dated the 20th of December, 1852, agreed with the Respondent, Taraprosno Mookerjee, that in the event of his acquiring the proprietary right, he would transfer a moiety of the Zemindary to Taraprosno Mookerjee, and that after he had acquired the proprietary right, he, by a Kabala, or deed of sale, dated the 31st of July, 1853, transferred the moiety of the Zemindary to Taraprosno Mookerjee accordingly. The moiety of the Zemindary thus transferred to Taraprosno Mookerjee was, as the Appellant alleges, afterwards conveyed to him by deed, bearing date the 27th of March, 1851; but this deed was not registered until the 2nd of May, 1854. In the meantime, and on the 5th of April, 1854, Ramcomul Gungopadya, by a deed of that date, in consideration of the sum of Rs. 90,000, conveyed the whole Zemindary to Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, and by a deed of even date, Taraprosno Mookerjee, in consideration of the sum of Rs. 15,000, also conveyed all his interest in the Zemindary to Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, and on the 20th of April, 1854, both these deeds were duly registered.

After the execution of these deeds, Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar had possession of the whole Zemindary, and he was in possession of it when the suit out of which this appeal has arisen, was instituted.

This suit, which is in the nature of an ejectment [225] suit, was instituted by the Appellant against Ramcomul Gungopadya, Gobind Chunder Mozoomda, and Taraprosno Mookerjee, and several other persons, for recovering the moiety of the Zemindary alleged to have been conveyed to the Appellant in manner above mentioned. The plaint in the suit alleges, that Ramcomul Gungopadya, through fraudulent motives, had disposed of the whole Zemindary (including the moiety previously sold by him to Taraprosno Mookerjee) to Gobind Chunder Sein in the fictitious name of Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar, under a Kabala, dated the 4th of April, 1854, for consideration of Rs. 90,000, but the plaint contains no allegation whatever of any fraud on the part of Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar.

Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar by his answer wholly denies the title set up by the Appellant, and rests his case on the conveyance to him by Ramcomul Gungopadya. He sets up no title under Taraprosno Mookerjee, and, on the contrary, he says, that Taraprosno Mookerjee had no right or interest in the Zemindary, but it appears, both by the answer and throughout the proceedings in the suit, that Taraprosno Mookerjee had under his alleged Ikrar and Kabala set up claims to the property, and the answer, in effect, treats the release from him as obtained for the purpose of putting an end to those claims. There is a great deal of evidence in the suit, with reference for the most part, to the alleged Ikrar and Kabala set up by the Appellant; but on the hearing of the cause before the Principal Sudder Ameen, he dismissed the suit, and upon appeal this decree was affirmed by the Sudder Court. The appeal before us is from these decrees.

[226] The judgments, both of the Principal Sudder Ameen and of the Sudder Court, appear to have proceeded upon a full and careful examination of the facts of the case; but their Lordships, as they have intimated, do not find it necessary to enter upon this examination.

It appears that by the Act, No. XIX. of 1843, it is provided, "that from the first day of May last past, every deed of sale, or gift of lands, houses, or other real property, a memorial of which has been or shall be duly registered according to law, shall, provided its authenticity be established to the satisfaction of the Court, invalidate any other deed of sale or gift for the same property which may not have been registered, and whether such second or other deed shall have been executed prior or subsequent to the registered deed—and that from the said day every deed of mortgage on land, houses, and other real property, as well as certificates of the discharge of such incumbrances, a memorial of which has been or shall be duly registered according to law, and provided its authenticity be established to the satisfaction of the Court, shall be satisfied in preference to any other mortgage on the same property which may not have been registered, and whether such second or other mortgage shall have been executed prior or subsequent to the registered mortgage, any knowledge or notice of any such unregistered deed or certificate alleged to be had by any party to such registered deed or certificate notwithstanding."

Their Lordships are of opinion, that this case may well be decided, and ought to be decided, upon the provisions of this Act.

Two questions arise upon the Act: first, whether [227] the words at the close of the enactment, "any knowledge or notice of any such unregistered deed or certificate alleged to be had by any party to such unregistered deed or certificate notwithstanding," are to be construed as referring only to the mortgages and certificates mentioned in that part of the enactment which immediately precedes these words, or are to be taken to extend also to the deeds of sale or gift which are mentioned in the earlier part of the enactment; and, secondly, what meaning is to be attributed to the words "provided its authenticity be established to the satisfaction of the Court," which are contained in the enactment. As to the first question, their Lordships are of opinion, that upon the true construction of the Act, the words first above mentioned apply not only to deeds and certificates of mortgage, but also to deeds of sale or gift. This enactment, although divided into two branches, in consequence of the different effect which is given to it as to deeds of sale and of mortgage, was plainly intended to be a general enactment. The words we are considering are words of reference, and the terms used being general and comprehensive, their Lordships see no reason for confining their operation to one branch of the enactment rather than extending it to both. Had it been intended that they should be so confined there would have been no difficulty in expressing that intention. It would be difficult to find any reason why, in the case of a mortgage, priority should be given to a registered deed over an unregistered deed, notwithstanding knowledge or notice of the unregistered deed by the registered mortgagee, but in the case of a sale the priority of an unregistered deed over a registered deed should be retained, in cases of knowledge or [228] notice, by the registered vendee or donee. The too common practice in India of setting up forged and fraudulent deeds, and the security against this practice which is afforded by registration, are quite sufficient to account for this enactment extending both to sales and mortgages, and the policy of such enactments is not unknown in other countries. The Irish Registration Acts afford an instance of it.

Then as to the second question. The proviso is, that the authenticity of the deed be established to the satisfaction of the Court. The word "authenticity" would seem, according to its natural meaning, to point merely at the exclusion of a forged deed from the benefit of the Act; but their Lordships think that it could not be intended by the Act that a deed which was tainted by fraud, although in other respects genuine, should be placed on the same footing as an honest and bona fide deed. They are not disposed so to construe the Act, but they think that at all events a registered deed cannot be deprived of the priority given by the Act, unless it be both alleged and proved that there was fraud on the part of the grantee, and in this case no fraud is alleged, and certainly none is proved, on the part of Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar. It would be going much too far to impute fraud to a purchaser upon the mere ground that he had bought up a possible claim, and so far as their Lordships can find, there is nothing beyond this affecting Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar either in point of allegation or of proof. Of course it has not escaped their Lordships' attention that there is an allegation in the plaint which suggests collusion between Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar and Taraprosono Mookerjee, but their Lordships see no proof of this. Upon the whole, [229] therefore, they are of opinion that Gobind Chunder Mozoomdar's deed being first registered, must prevail over the subsequently registered deed of the Appellant, and they must, therefore, without entering further into the case, humbly recommend Her Majesty to dismiss this appeal, and with costs.

MURTUNJOY CHUCKERBUTTY. —Appellant: JOHN COCKRANE Official Assignee of the estate of Messrs. HICKEY, BAILEY, and Co., insolvents. Respondent * [June 23 and 24, 1865].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adaulut at Calcutta.

A manufacturer of silks in Bengal employed a firm at Calcutta as Factors for the sale of his goods on commission. Generally the shipments and consignments to England were in the name of the Principal, but as the market was depressed at Calcutta, the Factors on several occasions shipped a portion of the goods to England, consigning them in their own names. There was a loss on the sales in England of the goods so consigned: Held:—there being no peculiar custom of trade existing in Calcutta to qualify the general mercantile law of England, in respect to Principal and Factor: and in the absence of evidence of any special instructions by the Principal, that such consignments by the Factors was within the scope of their general discretion, and the loss was properly charged on account of the principal [10 Moo. Ind. App. 242-245].

By an agreement between Principal and Agents, 10 per cent. was to be allowed as commission. The Sudder Court, under Act. No. XXXII. of 1839, allowed 12 per cent. per annum from the date of the suit, on the amount found due to the Agents: such rate of interest disallowed on appeal, as that Act does not apply to an agreement between parties regulating the amount of interest [10 Moo. Ind. App. 251].

Where a partial alteration was made by the appellate Court in the decree of the Court below, as to the rate of interest awarded, but in other respects the decree was affirmed, both parties were directed to pay their own costs of appeal [10 Moo. Ind. App. 251].

This suit was brought by the Respondent in the Zillah Court of Moorshedabad, to recover from the [230] Appellant the balance of a mercantile account stated to be due to the insolvent firm of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., for principal and interest at the time of their insolvency, amounting to Rs. 54,784. 4a. 9p. to which sum interest was added, calculated partly at 10 and partly at 12 per cent. per annum, during the subsequent period and up to the 31st of August, 1856, making the alleged debt Rs. 1,10,938. 4a. 6p.; but as the amount of interest more than doubled the amount of the principal money (which excess could not be recovered against the Appellant by a rule of the Courts in India), the Respondent relinquished a sum of Rs. 10,938 4a. 6p. from the amount alleged to be due as interest, and laid the amount sought to be recovered at Rs. 1,00,000, and interest thereon to the day of payment.

The facts were these:—

The Appellant was in and previous to the year 1840 a dealer and manufacturer of raw silk and silk piece goods, called "Corahs," at Junghypore, in the Presidency of Bengal, and in the latter year employed the firm of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., then carrying on business in Calcutta as Brokers, to act as his Agents, in receiving from him, from time to time, consignments of his goods and selling them on commission. The dealings between the parties continued up to a short period of the firm's being declared insolvent, which took place on the 17th of February, 1848.

Out of the above consignments shipments were made under the express authority of the Appellant by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., first to Messrs. Price, Griffiths, and Co., and afterwards to Van Notten and Co., as consignees in England for sale, during the years 1840, 1841, 1842, 1843, and 1845. The in-[231]-voices of those shipments were invariably made out by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., as directed, in the same form, stating that the goods therein mentioned were shipped by Hickey, Bailey, and Co. to London, for sale on account and risk of the Appellant: his name and manufactures being well known both in the Calcutta and London markets; and his goods, by reason of the superiority of his manufacture, being sought after and bearing the highest price in those markets. The accounts, sales, and letters of advice respecting these shipments were made out and written by the consignees in England, in the name of the Appellant, to whom they were accordingly dispatched, and by whom they were received in India.

The Appellant, in the months of January, February, and March, 1846, had made considerable consignments of silk goods for sale on his account to Hickey, Bailey, and Co.

It appeared that, on account of the Calcutta market being depressed and unfavourable, certain goods remained in hand in the month of April, and could not be advantageously sold in Calcutta, and the Appellant gave permission to Hickey, Bailey, and Co. to ship the same for sale in England, as had been previously done.

The Appellant afterwards received a letter bearing date the 13th of April, 1846, from Hickey, Bailey, and Co., which contained the following passage:—"Our market continues worse every day. After having failed in attempting to sell your silk, we have, according to your request and instructions, shipped the whole on your account to London, the particulars of which will be forwarded to you in due course."

The Appellant insisted in the Court below, that he had not in the instructions given by him to Hickey, [232] Bailey, and Co. given any direction to alter or vary the established usage as regarded the shipments of his goods, which had been previously always made in his name, and that the goods last mentioned had been shipped on Hickey, Bailey, and Co.'s own account; and, in consequence, he disputed his liability in respect of such shipments.

The account sales of these shipments were made out, by the consignees in England, in the name, and on the account, of Hickey, Bailey, and Co.

The first information as to these shipments given to the Appellant, was by a letter sent to him by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., dated the 5th of August, 1847, and invoices sent with it.

By the decree of the Zillah Court (Mr. A. Pigou, presiding Officiating Judge) it was ordered that the Appellant should pay the sum of Rs. 1,00,000, with interest at 12 per cent. Upon appeal from this decision to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta, that Court (consisting of Messrs. Trevor, Bailey, and Steer) decreed to the Respondent the principal sum of Rs. 54,784 4a. 9p., minus the differences between 10 per cent. on Rs. 89,584 and the rate of 12 per cent. calculated thereon in the account made up to April, 1847, the previous accounts showing the rate agreed to between the parties to be only 10 per cent. per annum, but the Court, under the Act, No. XXXII. of 1839, gave interest upon the principal sum from the date of the institution of the suit to the date of realization at the rate of 12 per cent.

On the appeal from this decree to the Privy Council, the principal point turned upon the accounts, which raised the question, whether the claim of the Respondent could be sustained in accordance with the mer-[233]-cantile custom and usage of Calcutta and the mode of dealing between the Appellant and the late firm of Hickey, Bailey, and Co. The material evidence upon this point is stated in their Lordships' judgment.

It was contended on appeal by the Appellant, first, that goods were delivered to the late insolvent firm for sale on commission on behalf of the Appellant, but that Hickey, Bailey, and Co. had consigned them to England, in their own names and at their own risk, and that the Respondent, as Official assignee, had failed to discharge that firm from the obligation of accounting for those goods and for the proceeds of the sale thereof in the usual manner as between Principal and Agents in taking the accounts; and secondly, that the decree of the Sudder Dewanny Court ought not to have decreed interest on the consolidated amount of principal and interest from the date the suit was brought, nor at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, under the Act, No. XXXII. of 1839, when the rate agreed between the parties was 10 per cent.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant; and Sir Fitz Roy Kelly, Q.C., and Mr. Macpherson, for the Respondent.

Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (July 20, 1865).—The Appellant in this case is the owner of silk filatures, and a dealer in silk of Junghypore, a district in Bengal. The Respondent is the Official assignee of an insolvent firm that formerly carried [234] in business in Calcutta, under the style of Hickey, Bailey, and Co.

That firm from the year 1840 up to the end of 1847 acted as the Factors and Agents of the Appellant; selling some of the goods consigned to them by him in Calcutta, and shipping others to London for sale there; and the following seems to have been the course of dealing between them:—The Appellant was in the habit of drawing Hickey, Bailey, and Co., against the goods consigned to them, and they accepted and paid his drafts, charging him in account with the amount of them. If they sold the goods in Calcutta, they rendered the account sales to him, and credited him with the proceeds. Against the goods shipped to London they drew Bills in sterling money upon the consignees; but credited the Appellant in account with the proceeds of those Bills in rupees at the rate of exchange at which they were sold in Calcutta; and on receiving the account sales from London, they either gave him further credit for the profit, or debited him with the loss on each shipment, according to the final result of the transaction. The account current so kept was balanced on the 30th of April, in each year, and, from time to time, rendered to the Appellant. From the year 1840 up to a period which, as found by the Courts below, we may take to have been some time in 1845, the consignments to London were shipped by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., to the consignees “for sale on account and risk of Murtunjoy Chuckerbutty.” Examples of invoices appear in the record. About the year 1845, some change took place in the constitution of the firm of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., and either contemporaneously with, or shortly after that event, the shipments on account of the Appellant were made in [235] a different form; most of the invoices stating the goods to be shipped by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., and consigned to the London house for sale “on account of the concerned;” and one or two stating them to be consigned for sale on account of Hickey, Bailey, and Co. Examples of the first of these two classes of invoices appear in the record. All the latter invoices however continued to specify the mark or brand by which the Appellant’s silks were known in the market. It is upon the variation in the form of the consignments made in and subsequently to 1845 from that of the consignments made before that year, that the principal question on this appeal is raised.

The disputes between the Appellants and Hickey, Bailey, and Co. began in 1847, the year so disastrous to commerce in India. The letters of the 27th of November, 1845, and the 21st of February, 1846, show that from a date as early as the latter part of 1845, the silk market, both in Calcutta and in London, was in a state of great depression. On the 13th of April, 1846, Messrs. Hickey, Bailey, and Co. wrote to the Appellant: “Our market continues worse every day. After having failed in attempting to sell your silk, we have, according to your request and instructions, shipped the whole on your account to London, the particulars of which will be forwarded to you in due course.” And accordingly their letter of the 23rd of December, 1846, contains this passage: “We also inclose invoices of 64 bales silk, and 900 pieces of your good corahs shipped on your account to London; the sums drawn against these shipments, as per memorandum at foot, viz.: Rs. 54,816. 12a. 6p. have been carried to your credit under due dates.”

[236] It is not difficult from this memorandum, and by means of the quantities of silk, and the dates and amounts of the Bills there specified, to identify the shipments so advised with the shipments of 7 bales per Oriental, and 8 bales per Tartar, to Magniac Jardine, and Co., the shipment of 13 bales per Kelso, to S. Phillips and Co., the shipment of 18 bales per Essex, to H. J. Johnston and Co., the shipment of 18 bales per Cressy, to Cockerell and Co., and the shipment of 4 cases of corahs, also per Cressy, to Thorburn and Co., which are respectively mentioned in the accounts. The losses on these shipments are amongst those his liability to which the Appellant disputes; and many, if not all, of them must have entered into the accounts which were the subject of the correspondence that will be next mentioned.

In August, 1847, Messrs. Hickey, Bailey, and Co. wrote to the Appellant their letter of the 5th of that month. The most important passage in it is the first paragraph, which is in these words: “We beg to wait upon you with the following:—A statement of your account current exhibiting on the 30th of April last a balance in our favour of Co.’s Rs. 13,171. 3. 7., and a continuation of the same in open account to date showing a balance against you of about Rs. 31,882. 6. 5. Four account sales from Messrs. Magniac, Jardine, and Co., Samuel Phillips and Co., and Cockerell and Co., of London, comprising 69 bales of your silk, and three account sales comprising 51 bales of theirs." This letter also expresses an unwillingness in the then state of the markets to receive any further consignments "drawn against;" [237] and presses the Appellant to place the house in funds either by remittances or goods.

The Appellant's answer to this communication was dated the 12th of August, 1847. After professing himself confounded by the letter of the 5th, he says: "The cost of the goods I consigned to you was Rs. 5000 or 8000 more than I drew on you, and I believed you owed me that sum at least, but in your letter you make me your debtor more than Rs. 31,000. I am ashamed to hear this. Your old house several years has sent silk and corahs to England on my account, and the London houses have ever sent account sales, etc., for every transaction in my name, and I have these accounts in my hand. Your new house, I don't know how, has taken a new manner of business, and all the account sales sent to me now are copies signed in Calcutta; this does not satisfy me at all, and, therefore, I want the London account sales as formerly. There are many particulars I want to know in these sales, because I see in your copies several sales on account of the concerned. Until I have the particulars I will not examine the account current, and I request you will send them to me as quick as possible."

In reply, Hickey, Bailey, and Co., on the 28th of August, 1847, sent a letter, in which they forwarded, though under a kind of protest, the original accounts demanded; complained of the tone of the Appellant's letter to them; and again pressed for payment of the balance due to them.

There is no evidence of any further correspondence between the parties until October, 1847. On the 11th of that month, Hickey, Bailey, and Co. wrote a letter to the Appellant, which is not in evidence. [238] From the references to it in the subsequent correspondence, we may infer that it contained an account corresponding more or less closely with that mentioned in the record as No. 1.

In answer to it the Appellant wrote the letter of the 25th of October, and in which he for the first time put forward distinctly the case on which he now relies. He says, "I am very anxious to settle my two years' accounts with you. I hereby send you the copy of the abstract of your letter dated the 11th of October, 1846, for your inspection. In your opinion my goods created a good name in the London markets, so relying on your statement I desired you to ship a quantity of my silk, but you in contravention to your practice shipped them in your own name instead of mine, and, therefore, owing to my name being suppressed, I hold you responsible for the loss. It is very easy to settle accounts. I will only debit you with the invoice cost of the goods shipped by you to London; likewise, I will debit you with amount of the account sales sent by you with interest. You may also, according to former practice, debit in my name the amount I received from you with interest, and also costs."

The reply of Hickey, Bailey, and Co. to this is dated the 30th of October. After explaining the letter of the 11th of October, 1847, they say, "Regarding the shipments, we must beg to observe that the invoices of your property have been uniformly worded according to the practice followed in Calcutta, 'on account of the concerned,' under your well-known filature mark, and not in our name as you pretend, which, however, would make no difference in the result of the operations. You were fully made aware [239] of those shipments by our letter of the 23rd of December, 1846, etc., and, therefore, cannot at this late hour, because the result has been a loss, pretend to have no personal interest, and decline all responsibility in shipments made on your account, and to which you have till now made no objections, you having on the contrary, in many of your letters, directed us to ship your goods on your own account, and not to sell them in Calcutta, evidently because you expected a more profitable realization of them by so doing. We, therefore, beg to hand you again a statement of your account closed 30th of April last, showing a balance in our favour of Company's Rs. 22,312. 9. 6., and a continuation of the same in open account, showing a balance against you up to date of Company's Rs. 48,547. 1. 0. This account, you will see, has been corrected, owing to a mistake in crediting you with a draft for Rs. 10,000, against a shipment which had nothing to do with your account." The right to make this correction is also a material question on this appeal.

The Appellant replied to this letter by that of the 18th of November. The following are the material passages in it: "I am informed of the particulars from the contents of your letter dated the 30th of October, which reached me at a time when I was busily engaged in preparing your accounts, and consequently could not reply to it. I am now sending you the account for your inspection, bearing a balance of Rs. 1390. 12. 1. in my favour, which please let me have. The points treated by you in your letter may be true in your opinion, but in my opinion they are improper, for my goods were unjustly shipped to England. Notwithstanding this I have forwarded [240] Bills to you, and debited you with the cost price of them. I have credited you with the amount you paid to me, and entries have been made regarding your commission and discount according to the former practice."

Messrs. Hickey, Bailey, and Co. stopped payment early in January, and were formally adjudged insolvents on the 17th of February, 1848. In their schedule the claim against the Appellant was entered as "disputed." The Respondent afterwards became the Official assignee of this insolvent estate, and some correspondence appears to have passed between him and the Appellant touching the disputed claim on the latter in June and July, 1849. He continued to insist on his view of his rights, and, instead of admitting anything to be due from him to the estate of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., to contend that the sum of Rs. 1390. 12. 1. was due to him on the balance of the account as made out by him.

In July, 1857, after a delay not very satisfactorily accounted for, on the ground of the poverty of the estate and the complexity of the accounts, the Respondent, under the authority of the Insolvent Court, commenced an action in the Zillah Court of Moorshedabad against the Appellant for the recovery of Rs. 1,00,000, the balance alleged to be due on this disputed account. The plaint showed that the balance claimed to be due at the date of the insolvency, with the subsequent interest, amounted to Rs. 1,10,938 and a fraction; but relinquished all in excess of the Rs. 1,00,000, in pursuance of a rule which obtained in the Courts of the East India Company, and forbade a Plaintiff to recover more than double the amount of his principal debt.

[241] The judgment of the Zillah Court, which is dated the 2nd of February, 1859, decreed the whole amount claimed to the Respondent, with interest at the rate of 12 per centum per annum from date of suit to date of payment.

On appeal, the Sudder Dewanny Court by its judgment, dated the 24th of February, 1862, confirmed this judgment on all points except the calculation of interest. It held that the sum claimed as principal money and the balance due to the insolvent firm in February, 1848, being Rs. 51,784. 9., should be corrected by the deduction of the difference between 12 and 10 per cent. interest on the account between the 30th of April, 1846, and the 30th of April, 1847; it refused to allow the Respondent any interest on the sum so ascertained during the period in which he had delayed to bring his suit, but gave him interest on it from the date of the commencement of the suit to the date of payment, at the rate of 12 per centum per annum.

From these decrees the present appeal is brought; and the substantial questions to be determined upon it (some minor points that were raised on the pleadings have been given up in the Courts below or here), seem to be reduced to the following, viz:—

First, whether the Appellant is properly chargeable with the balance of the account between him and the late firm of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., taken on the principle on which this account has been taken, or whether he is now entitled to have that account taken on the principle asserted in his letters of the 25th of October and 18th of November, 1847, viz., that of treating all the later shipments to England as made by Hickey, Bailey, and Co. at their own risk, and of [242] debiting them with the prime cost, or other assumed value of the goods in Calcutta at the dates of the shipments?

Second, whether, assuming the shipments to have been made at the risk of the Appellant, it is proper, under the circumstances, to charge him with the amounts of the re-drafts from London?

Third, whether he is entitled to any, and what relief in respect of the item of Rs.

10,000, withdrawn by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., from the amount as mentioned in their letter of the 30th of October, 1847?

Fourth, whether the interest on the balance due by him has been correctly calculated?

The first question involves the inquiry, whether Hickey, Bailey, and Co., when they made the consignments of the Appellant's goods in the form in which they are shown to have made them subsequently to the year 1845, were guilty of any breach of the duty which either the general law, particular custom, or special contract between them and their Principal, imposed upon them as Factors. In the Court below evidence was given to show what are the general powers of Factors in Calcutta who are employed to ship goods for sale in England on account of their Principal. Their Lordships apprehend that this evidence was adduced not so much for the purpose of establishing that any peculiar custom of trade obtained in the port of Calcutta, as for that of showing what was the general law; the country Courts of India not being very conversant with questions of Mercantile law, and not recognizing the law of England as the lex fori. But, however that may be, their Lordships are of opinion, that the evidence altogether fails to show that any particular usage or custom qualifying [243] the Mercantile law of England, as between Principal and Factor, prevails at Calcutta. It is, therefore, by the general Mercantile law that the powers and duties of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., in making their consignments of the Appellant's goods, must be determined.

Again, their Lordships see no ground for dissenting from the exposition of the law which is contained in the careful judgment of the Sudder Court. They are of opinion, that Hickey, Bailey, and Co., as Factors, having an interest by reason of their advances in the Appellant's goods, were justified in shipping those goods for sale either "on account of those concerned," or "on account of themselves," unless their general authority was controlled by instructions from their Principal, or by contract. Of positive instructions or of express contract there is no proof. The existence of either, if to be inferred at all, is only to be inferred from the evidence of the course of dealing before 1845.

Again, their Lordships are of opinion, that even if there were nothing to set against the course of dealing so proved, the inference from it that the general discretion of the Factors in respect of all future consignments had been controlled, would hardly be safe or legitimate. But, in truth, the prior course of dealing is not the only fact from which their Lordships have to draw their conclusion on the point now under consideration. The letter of the 23rd of December, 1846, proves that invoices of the consignments of that year were then sent to the Appellant. All those invoices are not produced; but it is impossible to escape the conclusion that they must have shown in what form the consignments were made; since the losses on the shipments [244] to which they relate are unquestionably some of those which the Appellant, on the ground of the improper form of the consignment, is now seeking to throw on the estate of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., and he does not pretend that the invoices sent to him were not counterparts of the invoices sent to England. Nevertheless, on the receipt of that letter he made no complaint respecting the form of the consignments.

Again, when these transactions were known to have resulted in heavy losses, and he wrote this letter of the 12th of August, 1847, his chief complaint was that in the absence of the original account sales, he had not the proper evidence of what had been done with his goods in England; and it was not until October, 1847, that his present case was distinctly made. The correspondence thus tends strongly to negative the existence of instructions, contract, or understanding inconsistent with the acts of Hickey, Bailey, and Co. Their Lordships, therefore, think that the alleged breach of duty on the part of the Factors has not been established, and that as between them and the Appellant he was chargeable with the losses on all the shipments to England. The foundation of his case having thus failed, it is unnecessary to inquire whether, if it had been established, he would have been entitled to the particular relief which he claims. Their Lordships, however, observe, that in many important particulars, this case, if the Agent's breach of instructions had been proved, would have been distinguishable from that of Bertram v. Godfrey (1 Knapp's P.C. Cases, 381). There it was proved that the Agents who in breach of their instructions had neglected to [245] sell when the funds were at 85 per cent. and might have sold at that price; and consequently, the facts both gave the measure of the damages sustained, and afforded the means of compelling the Agents to put their Principal in the position in which he would have stood had they observed his instructions. Here it is quite certain what (if any) proportion of the loss is attributable to the form of the consignment. Nor is it easy to see upon what principle Hickey, Bailey, and Co. could be charged with the cost or invoice price of the goods; since it follows from the letter of the 13th of April, 1846, both that the Appellant had authorized the shipment of them for sale in England; and they must have been sold at a heavy loss, if sold at that time in Calcutta.

The next question is, whether the Appellant has been properly charged in account with the re-drafts. It is stated in the judgment of the Sudder Court, that no question had been raised regarding the good faith of these entries. They must, therefore, be taken to represent correctly the difference between the net proceeds of the Appellants goods and the amounts of the Bills drawn against them by Hickey, Bailey, and Co. Had Hickey, Bailey, and Co. remained solvent and paid the re-drafts, the propriety of these charges against the Appellant could not have been questioned. For he had already received credit in account for the sums for which Hickey, Bailey, and Co.'s Bills on London had been sold; and, therefore, to charge him with the re-drafts was only tantamount to writing back the excess of credit which he had received in anticipation of the realization of the proceeds of his goods. The question raised, however, is, whether Hickey, [246] Bailey, and Co., having failed, and having presumably paid, at most, a dividend on these re-drafts, they are entitled to charge the whole amount of them against the Appellant. The answer to this question depends on the further question, whether upon or after the insolvency of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., the consignees in England had any right of resort to the Appellant for the recovery of the difference between the sums realized by the sale of the goods and the amount of their acceptances against them; or the unpaid portion of such deficiency. If they had no such remedy, the Appellant, as the account stands, has received credit for all to which he is entitled, viz., the net proceeds of his goods; whereas, if he were to retain credit for the amounts for which the Bills on London were sold, without submitting to be debited with the re-drafts, he would charge the estate of Hickey, Bailey, and Co. with more than the net proceeds of the goods. On the other hand, if he remained liable to the consignees for the losses on the goods or for any part of such losses, his objection to a mode of stating the amount, which would have the effect of making him pay, or leaving him answerable for such losses, twice over, would be well founded.

It appears to their Lordships that in these transactions there was not that privity of contract between the Appellant and the consignees in England, which would render him liable for the sums represented by the re-drafts in question.

This is not the ordinary case of a contract made by an Agent for an undisclosed Principal, on which the contractee on discovering the Principal may at his election sue either Principal or Agent.

[247] The contract on which the liability, in respect of which the re-drafts were drawn, arose, was not a simple consignment of goods for sale by an agent on account of an undisclosed Principal; it was a contract of pledge by Factors having an interest in the goods pledged. Hickey, Bailey, and Co., being entrusted with the possession of the goods, and having advanced upon them, drew the Bills on London in their own names; they and not the Principal were liable as drawers on those Bills; and they probably sold the Bills with the shipping documents in the market. Had the Bills not been accepted by the consignees, the holders, though pledges, by means of the Bills of lading, of the goods, could have had no remedy for any deficiency against the Appellant. The acceptance of the Bills by the consignees, and the delivery of the shipping documents to them, made them the pledges, but did not alter the character of the transactions, which was one whereby Hickey, Bailey, and Co. had pledged the goods for the payment of Bills on which they, and not the Appellant, were liable as drawers for an amount exceeding the value of the goods. The re-drafts are for that excess. There seems on such a transaction to be no privity of contract between the consignees and the undisclosed Principal. How can such a privity be imported into it by the fact that, according to the course of dealing between Hickey, Bailey, and Co. and the Appellant, the latter received credit on account for the sums for which the Bills on London were sold, subject to the final adjustment of the accounts of the different consignments?

Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion, that the Appellant has been properly charged with the re-drafts.

[248] We have next to consider the disputed item of Rs. 10,000. In the account, No. 1, the Appellant is credited with this sum under date the 13th of April, 1846, as the proceeds of a draft of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., on Gougor and Stewart, of London, against sixteen bales of raw silk, shipped on Appellant's account per Orient; and under date, March 18th, he is on the other side of the same account charged with Rs. 541. 12. 6., as commission and shipping charges on the same consignment. It has already been stated that by their letter of the 30th of October, 1847, Hickey, Bailey, and Co. advised the Appellant that this shipment had been erroneously treated as made on his account; that he had in fact nothing to do with it; and that they had, accordingly, corrected the account by striking out the credit of Rs. 10,000.

It seems that, in the first instance, they omitted to strike out as they ought, on this view of the case, to have done, the charge of Rs. 541. 12. 6.; but this omission was afterwards set right by the Respondent. In the plaint and subsequent proceedings this shipment and the credit attached to it are stated generally and loosely to have been those "of another Merchant"; and the only case thus made by the Appellant on this point, was to the effect that no sufficient reasons had been assigned for withdrawing from the account a sum with which he had been once credited; and that the Respondent's looseness of statement concerning the transactions was an argument for holding that the deduction of the sum in question had been made fraudulently. On the trial in the Zillah Court, Mr. Morinet, the former book-keeper of Hickey, Bailey, and Co., was examined as to this item. His evidence was to this effect, [249] "The silk did belong to the Defendant originally, but was shipped by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., on their own account, they having purchased it, and rendered the account sales to the Defendant." No question was put to him by way of cross-examination on this statement, although he was cross-examined by the Appellant's Agents as to another part of his evidence. The contest in both the Courts below apparently continued to be confined, as before, to the propriety and bona fides of the alteration in the accounts. Their Lordships see no grounds for disturbing the conclusion of both the Courts below upon this point. They accept Morinet's statements as the true account of the transaction. He was not cross-examined upon it: there seems to have been no suggestion in the Courts below that the Appellant had not received credit for the proceeds of these bales of silk as sold in Calcutta. There is an item in the accounts which are in the record which seems to represent those proceeds; and the fact would probably appear even more clearly if we had the Bengalee account made out by the Appellant on the principle asserted by him which was before the Courts below. It is difficult to conceive that he would allow the account to be finally taken against him without seeing that in one way or other every bale of silk which was consigned by him to Hickey, Bailey, and Co. was accounted for.

The evidence of Morinet, however, suggests another question, which, although it has not been dealt with in the Courts below, their Lordships have been unwilling to exclude from their consideration. That question is, whether the transaction as described by Mr. Morinet is not one which the Appellant may impeach as a fraudulent purchase by an Agent on [250] his own account of his Principal's goods? In an ordinary case it might fairly be objected that this point was not taken upon the pleadings. The answer to that in the present case is, of course, that the Respondent, by speaking of the transaction as one of "another Merchant," has misled the Defendant, and thrown considerable suspicion on the Bona fides of his own case. On the other hand, it is to be observed that Morinet, if cross-examined, might have cleared up the transaction, and have shown that the purchase by Hickey, Bailey, and Co. was known to and sanctioned by the Appellant. Again: it was open to the Appellant, if he were interested in so doing, to raise the point now under consideration in the Indian Courts, where he was represented by an eminent English barrister, to whom the equity on which it is based must be familiar. That he failed to insist on this equity, is a strong argument that it was not for his interest to do so. He could only have set aside this purchase by Hickey, Bailey, and Co., on the terms of writing back the sum for which he had received credit as the proceeds of the sale to them, and by taking to the shipment to England, with its loss or profit as the case might be. And there seems to be no reason why this particular shipment of sixteen bales should have escaped the common fate which on the evidence we must take to have befallen the other consignments of silk which were shipped from Calcutta about that time, and have realized a profit, instead of resulting in heavy loss. It may be added, that the point is not distinctly taken in the Appellant's case. On the whole, their Lordships see no sufficient ground for re-opening this account in respect of the item of Rs. 10,000.

[251] The only remaining question is that of the interest to be allowed. The Sudder Court, in the exercise of the discretion given to it by Act. No. XXXII. of 1839, has given interest from the date of the commencement of the suit, at the rate of 12 per centum per annum. There was evidence that the account current between Hickey, Bailey, and Co. and the Appellant bore interest at the rate of 10 per centum per annum only; and on that ground the Sudder Court reduced the interest allowed by the Zillah Judge before the commencement of the suit. Their Lordships are of opinion, that the same consideration should have determined the rate of interest to be allowed from the date of suit, and that the amount of this should also be calculated at 10 per centum per annum.

The order, therefore, which their Lordships propose humbly to recommend to Her Majesty as proper to be made on this appeal is, that the interest allowed from the date of suit to the date of payment be reduced by the difference between 12 per centum and 10 per centum per annum, and that in other respects the decree of the Sudder Court be affirmed. But having regard to this alteration in the amount decreed, and to the other circumstances of the case, they will also recommend that each party do bear his own costs of this appeal.

On appeal from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oude.

Lex loci of the Province of Oude.

The principles of law, as well as the rules of procedure of the Punjab Code of 1854, were introduced into Oude in 1856, on its annexation to the British Crown, to be adopted as the basis of the administration of the law in that province, and to be applied so far as they appeared to the Judicial Commissioners appointed for the administration of justice there not to be unsuited to the circumstances of the country, except so far, as they were founded upon local custom, varying the general law, whether Hindoo or Mahomedan, when the Code was not to be applied to Oude.

The Punjab Code of 1854, cl. 10, sec. VI., declares that:—"By the Hindoo and Mahomedan law, the dower of a married woman, if not entirely paid up at the time of marriage, is claimable by her at any subsequent time, and especially in the event of a divorce. Among Mahomedans it is usual, as a safeguard against capricious divorces, to stipulate for an amount of dower far beyond the means of the bridegroom to pay. Such contract, if enforced by a Court, would ruin a Defendant who has divorced his wife, without reflecting on the liability to which he was subject. Still, although the full amount need not be decreed, yet, in the event of a divorce without a valid cause, heavy damages will be awarded to the wife in proportion to the means of the husband"; and the 11th section declares, that in the event of the husband's death "the dower is treated as a debt, and takes precedence of the claims of heirs, but not of other debts; it stands on the same footing with them. In this case, the Court would possess the modifying power of clause (10), and award to the widow a fair sum, with reference to the assets of the estate and the circumstances of the heirs."

A Mahomedan of the Soonee sect, domiciled in Oude, and a member of the Royal family there, on his marriage, by a deed executed in the year 1838, settled a crore of rupees by way of dower. This dower was not demanded during the lifetime of the husband, but at his death, which event took place after the annexation of Oude, in 1856, the widow claimed the whole amount, although it would exhaust the entire property of the settler, and totally exclude his heirs from succeeding to any part of his estate. The Judicial Commissioners of Oude, applied the provisions of the Punjab Code to the case; and held, that according to that Code the deed was to be construed to mean, not the absolute sum settled for dower, which was from the position of the settlor an extravagant dowry, but an adequate provision for the wife; and directed the estate of the husband to be divided in moieties between the widow and the husband's heirs. Upon appeal, such decision affirmed by the Judicial Committee, who held.

First, that the Commissioners were right in applying the Punjab Code to the case [10 Moo. Ind. App. 277, 278]; and Secondly, that the Commissioners, under that Code, properly exercised their discretion in making an equitable division of the estate of the husband between the widow and the heirs [10 Moo. Ind. App. 277, 278].

This appeal was brought from three several Orders or decrees of the Deputy Commissioner of the Lucknow Civil Court, and the Judicial Commissioner of Oude disallowing a claim of the Appellant for payment of dower amounting to a crore of rupees out of the estate of her deceased husband, and directing the estate to be divided in certain shares amongst the Appellant and Respondents.

[253] The Appellant was the widow of Mirza Secunder Hushmut, a brother of the late King of Oude, and formerly a General in his service. The Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, was the son, the Respondent, Nowab Mirza, an adopted son, and the Respondents, Zuman Ara Begum and Rufaatoonissa Begum, the daughters of the deceased. The late Royal family of Oude, and the parties to this appeal, were Mahomedans.

On the dethronement of the King of Oude, his brother, the late General Mirza Secunder Hushmut, proceeded to England, where he afterwards died, leaving the Appellant and Respondents surviving [254] him. The deceased General was at the time of his death entitled to immovable property situate in Oude, and to promissory notes of the Government of India for Rs. 120,000, and other movable property to a large amount.

When he proceeded to England, the Respondents, Mirza Jehan Kudr and Nowab Mirza, minors, were left at Lucknow in the care of General Outram, then in charge of the Province of Oude.

On the death of their father, they applied to the Judicial Commissioner of Oude for a division of the property of the deceased General, and for the relinquishment to them of the immovable property of the deceased, alleged to be in the possession of the Appellant. The Judicial Commissioner remitted the case to Mr. Perkins, the Assistant-Commissioner at Lucknow, to institute inquiries on the subject.

After a preliminary inquiry, the Assistant-Commissioner, being of opinion that the legitimacy of the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, was in dispute, referred him to his remedy by a civil suit: but on appeal to the Judicial Commissioner that Officer directed the case to be reported to himself.

On the 22nd of November, the case was brought before the Commissioner's Deputy for trial, when arbitrators and an umpire were appointed by the parties to dispose of the case.

The arbitrators and umpire having been directed by the Deputy Commissioner to send their opinions separately, the Appellant's arbitrator, on the 11th of December, 1858, forwarded his Award, which was as follows: "It is evident from the proceedings that the dispute is regarding notes valued Rs. 230,000 belonging to General Sahib, jewels [255] valued at about 5 lacs, and landed property also valued about 5 lacs. The remaining property is in London. Now, the Mooktar of the Defendant states that of the above-mentioned notes, the General gave notes valued Rs. 110,000, which are deposited in the Treasury to Tajdar Bohoo (the Appellant). Of the other notes the Mooktar declared his ignorance; while the Mooktars of the Plaintiffs state that the remaining notes claimed are deposited in the Government Treasury. But the Mooktars give no detail of the jewels, and say that the Plaintiffs being minors know nothing about them; neither do they produce any satisfactory evidence. No one can part with the landed and immovable property, which has been saved from demolition. The other claims against each other deserve no consideration, because the Mooktar of Mulkah Do Alum Nowab Tajdar Bohoo, disputes the legitimate descent of the son of the deceased General. But Meer Wajid Ali, Trustee of Mirza Jehan Kudr and others, produced copy of an Order (the original of which is alleged to have been filed in the Judicial Commissioner's Office), addressed by Wajid Ali Shah to Mirza Jehan Kudr, in proof of the legitimacy of Mirza Jehan Kudr, and a letter from Mahomed Mirza, who accompanied General Sahib to London. Meer Wajid Ali then deposed, that in his journey to London, General Sahib had by his slave girl, Ameer Buksh, two daughters, of whom one is dead, but the other is still alive. But these points have not been established under the Mahomedan law; while the objections urged by the Mooktar of Mulkah Do Alum Nowab Tajdar Bohoo, being unsupported by any evidence of refusal from the General, deserve no consideration. In like manner, [256] the statement which Meer Wajid Ali makes, that Mulkah Do Alum Nowab Tajdar Bohoo had given up her claim to the dower, and to prove which statement he has produced a muhzur or document signed by the Begums or wives of the King, is contradicted by the Mooktar of Nowab Tajdar Bohoo on the ground of their being subject to the orders of Meer Wajid Ali. Now, I also do not consider that statement of Meer Wajid Ali as deserving of credit, because Mulkah Do Alum Nowab Tajdar Bohoo has still in her possession the dower deed for one crore of rupees, attested by the Moojtulids and the relations of General Sahib. Had Nowab Tajdar Bohoo, after she had lived together with her husband for a long time, relinquished her claim at the time of her husband's departure to Calcutta, the respectable citizens of Lucknow (as there was no interdiction with regard to its publicity) would have been acquainted with it, especially those who had attested the deed of dower, and then the objections urged by the Monkter of Mulkah Do Alum Nowab Tajdar Bohoo would have been useless. Under these circumstances I find it difficult to decide the case under the Mahomedan law; and, concurring with Mooeenood-dowlah Bahadoor, I consider it expedient to make some provision for the children of General Sahib, both those who are in Lucknow and those who are in London, or some other place; I, therefore, adjudge that the notes for Rs. 110,000, which, as alleged by the Mooktar of the Defendant, were given to her by the General when he was about to set out for Calcutta, and which are deposited in the Government Treasury, should entirely be made over to the Defendant; that the remaining notes, valued Rs. 120,000, claimed by [257] the Plaintiffs, be made over to them as traced out by them; that the landed property situated in Lucknow, and the goods which may be received from London, be equally divided among the children of General Sahib and Nowab Tajdar Bohoo; that in future neither party may bring forward any claim against the other; and that with the view of preventing dispute in future, Government should bind both parties by an agreement that neither party may molest the other."

The Umpire also forwarded his decision in accordance with the Award of the Appellant's Arbitrator, as did the Arbitrator for the two Respondents.

On the 26th of January, 1859, the Awards were taken into consideration by the Assistant-Commissioner, when he recorded his concurrence in the opinion of the Arbitrators and Umpire, but as they had not given a detail of the shares of the parties in the estate of the deceased General, he directed the Arbitrators to specify the shares of the several claimants.

The Umpire reported on the 31st of January, 1859, as follows:—"That of the notes for Rs. 120,000, allotted to the Plaintiffs, one third, or Rs. 40,000, should be given to the minor daughter, which would suffice for the maintenance of her mother and her marriage expenses; the remaining two thirds, or Rs. 80,000, should be made over to the Mirza Jehan Kudr. As Nowab Mirza is not descended from the General, and is only an adopted son, he can claim no share under the Mahomedan law. But the General had a great regard for his maintenance and education, and beside this, Nowab Mirza is extremely poor. I would, therefore, allot to him one eighth, or Rs. 10,000, out of the two thirds, or Rs. 80,000. I would like-[258]-wise propose, that until the Plaintiffs attain to the age of majority, all the money should remain in deposit in the Government Treasury and payments should be made to them for their daily expenses as required. Of the landed property, the garden of Dwarka Dass cannot be divided; but I would suggest that it should be given out in farm, and the proceeds divided equally between Nowab Tajdar Bohoo and the descendants of General Sahib. The remaining houses, which may be released by Government, should be estimated by an Officer appointed by the Court, and divided equally."

The two first Respondents were satisfied with the Award, but the Appellant objected on the grounds, amongst others, that it was not proved that the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, was the legitimate son of the deceased General; that her claim for dower should be satisfied in the first instance; and that she should be allowed to retain possession of the whole of the deceased's estate to satisfy her dower, which estate was less than the amount settled by the deed of dower.

On the 7th of February, 1859, the Assistant-Commissioner finally adopted the Award, and directed a certificate of administration to issue in favour of the two Respondents, and the Deputy-Commissioner concurred in this decision.

From these proceedings the Appellant preferred an appeal to the Commissioner, who after hearing the case dismissed the appeal, and directed the Orders of the Assistant-Commissioner and the Deputy-Commissioner to be upheld, but reserved to the Appellant liberty to institute a suit to establish her claim.

Accordingly, on the 8th of April, 1859, the Appellant filed a regular suit, and by her plaint claimed [259] one crore of rupees on account of her dower, for which she submitted that the whole of her late husband's estate was liable.

The Respondents, Mirza Jehan Kudr and Nowab Mirza, were made Defendants, and by their answer alleged, that the case had been disposed of by arbitration, and that the Award was a bar to the suit, in which the claim for dower was not proved, for when the deceased General was going to England, the Appellant relinquished her claim to dower before witnesses, but that a deed of relinquishment could not be executed at that time; that the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, was the son of the General, and the Respondent, Nowab Mirza, an adopted son; that the mother of Mirza Jehan Kudr, was Nowab Hushmut Muhil Sahiba, whose claim to her dower was for fifty lacs of rupees, besides her claim to jewels and ornaments valued at Rs. 500,000 which the General, when going to London, left in charge of the Appellant.

The Appellant's deed of dower was filed, by which a crore of rupees of the current coin of Lucknow was fixed as the dower.

The Respondents then filed a petition, stating that the deed of dower was not genuine, but a forged one, and could not, under the Mahomedan law and usage of the country, be considered a trustworthy document.

Evidence was taken respecting the execution of the deed of dower and the right of the Appellant to have her dower satisfied in priority to any claim of inheritance. It was proved that the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, was the son, and the Respondent, Nowab Mirza the adopted son, and the other Respon-[260]-dents the daughters of the deceased General, Mirza Secunder Hushmut, and that the Appellant had not relinquished any claim to dower, and the opinion of the Mahomedan law officers and the Mujtahid, or Chief Priest, was taken as to the question of dower.

The case was heard on the 25th of August, 1859, before the Deputy-Commissioner

Carnegy and the Assistant-Commissioner Elliott, in the Lucknow District Court, when those Judicial Officers decided that the Appellant as the widow, and the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr as the son, and Zuman Ara Begum and Rifaatoonissa Begum as the daughters of the deceased General, were the heirs of his estate, and that the Respondent, Nowab Mirza, as the adopted son of the deceased, should be recommended for a pension. That the special claims of the Respondents should be disallowed; that the deed of dowry was genuine; that the dowry was to be considered as a debt, and took precedence of claims of inheritance; but that by the Punjab Code the Court was at liberty to give instead of the dowry, a sum proportioned to the estate, and that after setting apart a sum sufficient for the maintenance of the other heirs, the remainder of the property should be given to the Appellant in lieu of her dowry. The Court cancelled the Order of the Summary Court, and allotted a monthly pension of Rs. 400 to the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, of Rs. 150 to each of the Respondents, Zuman Ara Begum and Rifaatoonissa Begum, and Rs. 40 to the other Respondent, Nowab Mirza.

The Appellant appealed from this decree to the Commissioner and Superintendent of Lucknow, objecting thereto, on the ground that the case had not been decided as regarded her claim to dower in accord-[261]-ance with Mahomedan law, and insisted that she was entitled to the whole estate of her deceased husband in satisfaction of her dower, and that the Respondents were not his lawful children.

Further inquiries were instituted by Mr. Campbell, the Judicial Commissioner of Oude, and questions put to the Registrar of the Sudder Dewanny Courts of the Punjab, and at Agra, Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, to ascertain the practice of those Courts in dealing with claims for dower, requesting that the Judges of those Courts would inform him, whether a Mahomedan deed of dower assigning to the wife an exorbitant sum far beyond the husband's means (the money not being paid or vested), was to be construed literally, or held liable to modification under an equitable construction whether it had been settled that dowers of different wives come upon the estate in order of date, one taking precedence of the other, or pari passu: and whether they precede, rank with, or follow bona fide debts for consideration as against the assets of an estate. The replies to those questions showed that much doubt and uncertainty prevailed on the subject.

The Commissioner and Superintendent of the Lucknow division, Mr. S. A. Abbott, on the 2nd of December, 1859, delivered judgment. The material part of which was in these terms:—"The Futwa has been received from Calcutta, and there can be no doubt but that in point of Mahomedan law, the Appellant is entitled to the whole estate within the stipulated amount of her dower. I regard these dowers as a very great evil. There is no doubt that large sums are specified in these dower deeds, with a view to preventing separation on trivial occasions. [262] Large sums are in these dowers specified which have no existence; no deposits are made or Trustees appointed; they are generally merely a wife's security for the good behaviour of her husband. By the Mahomedan law, however, there can be no doubt but that they take precedence of all claims of heirs, and must be satisfied before any claims of the sort can be admitted. They rank with debts, and would be paid in proportion to assets available. The Punjab Code makes a deviation from this, and leaves it in equity and justice to make some provision for the heirs. This is undoubtedly a most humane and just provision. It is also supported by a case which occurred in Lucknow, and we may fully assume it to be a lex loci, for there is the very best authority for it in the decision of the Mijtehudoollussur in the case of Murramoolnissa v. Ruheemolnissa Ameer Begum Shumsoolnissa, Ingent-olla, and Tuffal Alle, before Mr. Martin, Deputy-Commissioner, on the 14th of April, 1857, in which this High priest decided that a brother of deceased should get one-fifth share in the estate before satisfying the dower. In Oude we are not bound to law, but to equity and justice; and I think the arrangement proposed by the Deputy-Commissioner for providing for the members of this family is most just and reasonable. I consequently dismiss the appeal, with costs, and uphold the order of the Lower Court."

From this decree the Appellant appealed to the Judicial Commissioner of Oude. On the 23rd of March, 1860, the Judicial Commissioner, Mr. G. Campbell, decided that after the debts due from the deceased General were discharged out of his estate, the remainder of his estate should be divided, and be apportioned one moiety to the Appellant as her [263] absolute property in respect of her dower under the deed, and the other half to his heirs, the Respondents.

The Appellant applied to the Judicial Commissioner for a review of this judgment, and the Respondent, Mirza Jehan Kudr, put in an answer to her application, asserting that the judgment of the Judicial Commissioner ought to be sustained, as it was in accordance with the award of the Arbitrators, and further that the Court was not bound to give effect to the deed of dower. On the 28th of May, 1860, Mr. E. C. Bailey, Officiating Judicial Commissioner, rejected the application for review.

The Appellant then presented a petition to the Judicial Commissioner of Oude for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, but the Judicial Commissioner being of opinion that he had no power to admit an appeal to Her Majesty in Council (see 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 274, and Salik Ram v. Azim Ali Beg. ib. 270), an application was made to Her Majesty in Council to admit this appeal, and the same was granted.

The appeal now came on for hearing.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer,) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—This case is one of the greatest importance to the whole of the Mahomedan population in Oude. It involves the question whether the lex loci of Oude, the Mahomedan law, is to be superseded by the introduction of the Punjab Code, as between Mahomedan subjects, by determining their rights, at the option or discretion of the Judge of a fanciful equity of his own, instead of the known and admitted rule and principles of Mahomedan law.

[264] Our contention is, that the Kingdom of Oude being a Mahomedan country, and the Mahomedan law the lex loci at the time when it was annexed to the British dominions, the Judicial Officers appointed ought to have administered that law, and that the Government had no power to import into Oude a Code made for another Province in which the Mahomedan law is not in force, until such law was formally abrogated, and some other law substituted by competent authority. Now, it appears that the Governor-General of India in Council, on the annexation of Oude, and the establishment of Courts of Justice to be presided over by Judicial Officers, declared by a State Paper to Major-General Outram, dated the 4th of February, 1856, par. 45 (Parl. Pap. relating to Oude, 1856, p. 267), to the effect, that the lex loci of that Province should be observed and administered in such Courts; but such law, which was the Mahomedan law, was not applied in this case, although the parties were Mahomedans. The Kabeenamah, or deed of dower, sued on by the Appellant, was made in consideration of marriage while Oude was still a Mahomedan Kingdom; and so, even if, after the annexation by the British Crown, a new law had been introduced by competent authority, and substituted for the lex loci, which we submit it was not, it would have been unjust to the Appellant to give a retrospective effect to such new law, so as to deprive her of her rights as a Mahomedan widow, or so as to alter or limit the effect and operation of the deed under the lex loci, or Mahomedan law.

The opinions of the Judges at Agra and elsewhere, or other Officers in the Punjab, or any rule in the Code of that Province opposed to the [265] rules or principles of Mahomedan law, ought not to have any weight, and should not have influenced the decisions of the Judicial Officers in Oude in administering the law of that country, in a case like the present, where the parties were domiciled Mahomedans of that Province. Indeed, it was clearly established by the futwas of learned Mahomedan lawyers, and in fact acknowledged by the decrees appealed from, that the right of a Mahomedan wife to deen mohur, secured to her by deed on the celebration of her marriage, is declared by Mahomedan law to be paramount to the claims of the heirs of the husband, and equal to the rights of his creditors. Considering the high rank of the bridegroom, a member of the Royal family of Oude, and heir apparent to the Throne, the amount of dower, a crore of rupees, was not excessive. Macnaghten's "Prin. and Prec. of Moohummudan Law," pp. 287, 291; Ameer-oon Nissa v. Moorad-oon Nissa (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 211). Gholam Husun Ali v. Zeinub Beebee (1 Ben. S.D.A. Rep. 48); Mussumaut Banoo Beebee v. Fukherooddeen Hosein (2 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 180); Sahib Jan Khatoon v. Diamut Beebee (3 Ben. S.D.A. Rep. 12); Ranee Buksh Beebee v. Nadir Beebee (3 Ben. S.D.A. Rep. 61); Mussumat Hoosèineer Begum v. Mussumat Oomdah Begum (3 S.D.A. Rep. N.W.P. 52); and, therefore, the Kebunamah of the Appellant ought to have been given effect to on the death of her husband, and enforced with respect of the whole amount of dower thereby secured against his estate, to the exclusion of the Respondents, even if they had proved themselves his heirs.

But another fatal objection exists; the Respondents utterly failed to prove their relationship to the deceased husband of the Appellant, as heirs according to Mahomedan law; neither was it proved that there was any other heir of the deceased except the Appellant as widow; and she was, therefore, under her deed of dower, and as heir, entitled to the whole estate of the deceased, subject only to the payment of creditors, if any.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Ayrton, for the Respondents. It cannot be disputed that the late kingdom of Oude is a conquered country. It was occupied by the British army, and by proclamation declared vested in the British Crown, which constituted a complete act of sovereignty. Parl. Papers relating to Oude, 1856, pp. 237, 255, 291. That being so, it is a cardinal principle of the law of nations, that the conquering power has a perfect right to alter the law of the conquered country. [The Lord Justice Turner: The old law remains in force till altered.] Yes. Here the Government of India in the Despatch of the 4th of February, 1856, par. 45, exercised the power of Conquerors in extending to Oude the provisions of the Punjab Code. Parl. papers relating to Oude, p. 267, and directed that the law to be administered by the Judicial officers in Oude should be the Punjab Code of 1854, except in certain cases of local usage. That Code has been acted upon in other cases in regarding questions of Mahomedan law.

By the Punjab Code of 1854, cl. 10, sec. 6, it is enacted, that as by the Hindoo law the dower of a married woman, if not entirely paid up at the time of marriage, is claimable by her at any subsequent time; among Mahomedans it is usual, as a safeguard against capricious divorcees, to stipulate for an amount of dower far beyond the means of the bridegroom to pay, that as such contract if enforced [267] by a Court would ruin a Defendant, damages should be awarded to the wife in proportion to the means of the husband; and by sec. 11 of the same Code, in the event of the husband's death, the dower is to be treated as a debt, and take precedence of heirs, but not of other debts, and referring to the modifying powers of cl. 10, the Court is directed to award the widow a fair sum in reference to the assets of the estate and the circumstances of the heirs. Now, in no sense can the introduction of this Code affect this case, as this Code is similar to the Mahomedan law which prevailed in the Kingdom of Oude at the time of its annexation. According to the custom of Mahomedans in India, deeds like that under which the Appellant claimed are only nominal and illusory, and never intended to be enforced. Dower by the Mahomedan law is given as a safeguard to prevent a husband from capriciously divorcing his wife. Here the husband was a minor, and there are no Trustees to the deed as in an English marriage settlement. We admit it may be enforced after the husband's death, but the Court, having regard to the circumstances of the husband's estate, would only decree, what in equity would be a fair and reasonable sum; Omduton Nisa Begum v. Mirza Asud Ali (1 Ben. S.D.A. Rep. 276); Macnaghten's "Princ. and Pree. of Moohummudan Law," p. 274. If the Appellant's argument is carried out, a husband could so endow his wife as to defeat his creditors and his heirs. Here the sum settled, a crore of rupees, is beyond the means of the settler, and whether governed by the Mahomedan law or the Punjab Code, such a dower could not be enforced to the full amount.

The Respondents are the heirs of the deceased, and [268] entitled by law and equity to the share of his estate allotted to them by the decree of the Judicial Commissioner.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (March 29, 1865).—This is an appeal by the widow of the late General Sahib against certain decisions which have been pronounced by the Judicial Commissioners in Oude on a claim preferred by her for dower against the estate of her late husband.

The marriage took place about the year 1838 of our era, and by the settlement made upon it, to which the father of the bridegroom was a party, the wife's dower was fixed at a crore of rupees, a sum equal to £1,000,000 sterling.

The father of the bridegroom was a son of the King of Oude, and at that time heir-apparent to the Throne.

General Salib came over to England after the overthrow of the Oude dynasty, and died here.

The Royal family of Oude were all Mahomedans.

The General left a son, an adopted son, and two daughters surviving him. These persons claimed to be coheirs with his widow to his property.

The widow claimed a right to have the whole amount secured by the deed as her dower treated as a debt due from her husband's estate, and paid pari passu with the debts of other creditors, and she disputed the title of the other claimants as coheirs.

After some attempts to settle the matter by arbitration, which proved abortive, a suit was instituted, in order to determine the rights of the parties.

In the course of these proceedings an inquiry was directed with respect to the property which the General [269] had left at his death, and in the result it appeared that it amounted in all to about five lacs of rupees. The claim of the Appellant alone in respect of her dower amounted to a crore, or 100 lacs, exclusive of other debts, which are represented to be of very trifling amount.

The effect, therefore, of allowing the Appellant's claim would be, to a great extent, to defeat the claims of the other creditors, and to sweep away the whole property from the heirs.

If such, however, be her legal rights, no Court of Justice can refuse to give effect to them on the ground of any inconvenience or hardship which may result from allowing them.

The case came first before two Assistant Commissioners in the Lucknow District Court in August, 1859; then on appeal before Colonel Abbott, the Commissioner Superintendent of the Lucknow division, on the 2nd of December, 1859; and, lastly, before Mr. Campbell, the Judicial Commissioner of Oude, on the 23rd of March, 1860. All these gentlemen were of opinion, that the claim of the Appellant could not be allowed to its full extent, but must be modified with reference to the assets of the husband and the circumstances of his family; but they differed in some degree as to the mode in which, in the exercise of their discretion, the division between the widow and the other heirs should be made. By the last order, that of Mr. Campbell, made on the 23rd of March, 1860, it was directed that the debts of the General should be first paid; that one-half of the remaining property should be paid to the widow, and the other half to the other heirs; but this decision was not to affect a sum of Rs. 110,000 in Com-[270]-pany's paper in the name of the Appellant, which was to be retained by her, as her absolute property. From this and the preceding orders the present appeal has been brought.

Great trouble appears to have been taken by the Commissioners to ascertain the general Mahomedan law upon the subject, and opinions were obtained from the Courts of the several Provinces of India, particularly with reference to the question whether, when extravagant sums far beyond the means of the bridegroom to satisfy were provided by settlement as dower, such sums were to be treated as bona fide debts to be paid pari passu with other debts on the death of the husband, though they might sweep away the whole property from the heirs, or whether they were to be treated as securities for an adequate provision for the wife. The reports from the different Provinces were not uniform—some being in favour of treating the sum fixed as an absolute debt; others in favour of a modification of the demand with reference to what might be considered the proper dower of the wife.

It is not necessary, in the opinion of their Lordships to decide the general question, because, whatever the general law may be, the mode in which contracts of this description are to be treated in Oude has been settled by specific Regulations issued by competent authority, in the manner which we are about to state.

We take the facts as to the origin of these Regulations from a letter dated the 4th of February, 1856, from the Secretary-General of the Indian Government, containing instructions for the Government of Oude, addressed to Major-General Outram, who was appointed Chief Commissioner of the affairs of this Province.

[271] The facts as appearing in this letter are these: in the year 1847-8 a few rules for Civil judicature were drawn out by the Indian Government for the guidance of the officers employed in the Cis-and-Trans-Satlej States. These rules were in 1849 extended to the Punjab, and it was left to the Officers charged with the local administration, laying upon these the foundation of the judicial system, to improve, amend, and elaborate them as practical experience might suggest.

These rules thus amended were in 1854 reduced into a printed form, and circulated amongst the Judges of the Punjab. They are entitled "Abstract Principles of Law, circulated for the guidance of Officers employed in the Administration of Civil Justice in the Punjab." To which is appended a proposed form of procedure.

This Code, as its title imports, contains a statement first, of the principles of law to be adopted by the Judges; and second, of the rules of procedure to be followed. It lays down the ordinary rules of Mahomedan and Hindoo law on the principal subjects which were likely to come before the Courts, and both in the rules of law and forms of procedure, introduces some alterations into the laws prevailing in the older Provinces.

This Code thus introduced into the Punjab had, in the opinion of the Government, been found to work well.

In February, 1856, the King of Oude was deposed by the Indian Government, and the whole administration, civil and military, of the Kingdom was assumed by its officers under its authority. To provide for the administration of justice, a number of Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners were appointed to act for different Districts into which the [272] country was to be divided, and the general rules to be observed in the administration of justice, as well as in the ordering of the Province in other respects, are laid down in the letter to which we have referred.

The intention to assimilate, as far as possible, the Government of Oude to that of the Punjab appears in several passages of the letter. In paragraph 21 it is said,—"It has been already intimated to you that the administration of Oude is to be conducted as nearly as possible in conformity with the system which has been introduced into the Punjab."

After explaining the advantages which had arisen in that Province from the introduction of the new Code, and observing that the Kingdom of Oude resembled very closely in its population, language, creeds, and customs the North-West Provinces, the letter proceeds, "There is, therefore, every reason to believe, and good to doubt, that the system of administration as modified for the Punjab, and divested of all those forms and technicalities which delay justice and are specially distasteful to a people unaccustomed to technical litigation, will be acceptable to the people of Oude, and more completely suited to the Province itself than it was to the Punjab, where, nevertheless, its success is undeniable."

After dealing with financial and some other matters, the letter, in paragraph 43, proceeds to give instructions for the administration of civil justice, with respect to which, it observes that very material assistance is derived from the results of experience acquired in the Punjab.

Then follow the paragraphs on which the question as to the introduction of these rules into Oude, mainly depends.

[273] The 44th section, after giving the history of those rules which we have already read, proceeds thus:—"These rules now, for the most part, guide the proceedings of the Judicial Courts in the Punjab, and they have been found so well fitted to the requirements of a new Province and a simple people, so easy in their application, so acceptable to the population, no less than to the officers themselves, and so beneficial in their results, that the Governor-General in Council advises that they should be made the ground-work of the civil judicial system in Oude. Several printed copies of these 'Rules' will shortly be furnished to you for distribution."

"45. There appears to be no reason whatever for supposing that the Rules of procedure will not be as applicable to the Civil Courts in Oude as to those in the Punjab, and there can be no objection to their immediate introduction. It is believed also the 'Principles of Law' will be found sufficient, in the first instance, to guide the Judicial Officers in dealing with the various questions which will come before them in this branch of their duty. But it will not escape your observation that, in the preparation of the rules under notice, much attention has been given to the lex loci, and that, especially in matters relating to inheritance, marriage, divorce, and adultery, adoption, Wills, legacies, and partition, as well as in all commercial transactions, a due regard to local usage has been enjoined. It cannot, of course, be supposed that the lex loci, or local custom, in Provinces differing so widely as the Punjab and Oude is in all, or even in many, respects identical, and it follows that those provisions of the 'Rules' which rest on [274] the lex loci in the Punjab cannot, with any propriety or without risk of injurious failure, be extended to the Province of Oude."

It appears to their Lordships that the effect of these clauses is, that the principles of law as well as the rules of procedure laid down in the Punjab Code are to be adopted as the basis of the administration of justice in Oude, and to be applied as far as they may appear to the Commissioners to be not unsuited to the circumstances of the country; but that, as far as they are founded upon local customs, varying the general law, whether Hindoo or Mahomedan, they are not to be applied to Oude, where the local customs would probably differ from those of the Punjab.

The 46th section is in these words:—"While, then, the Governor-General in Council directs your attention to this collection of principles of law, as calculated to afford material assistance in the absence of any better or more appropriate Treatise, he refrains from requiring the strict observance of them, until it can be ascertained how far they are applicable to the peculiarities of the Province and the customs of its people. With this end in view, his Lordship in Council desires me to suggest that all the Commissioners and district Officers, and the most experienced of the Assistants, should be required to study the 'Principles of Law' in their daily application to the business brought before the Civil Courts, and, after the lapse of a twelvemonth or more, as may be hereafter determined, to report to the Judicial Commissioner the opinions which they may have formed of the applicability of the 'Rules of Law' to the [275] people of Oude, and to offer, at the same time, any remarks and suggestions which may have occurred to them. It may, perhaps, be advisable also to invite the opinions and observations of a few of the Native Extra Assistants, whose past career and official knowledge, and more immediate contact with the people, may have qualified them to form a judgment on those points which touch upon native customs, and to give sound advice. On receipt of all these reports, it will be the duty of the Judicial Commissioner to study the suggestions which they contain, and to recast the Collection of Rules of law. It is not anticipated that the Rules of Procedure will call for much, if any alteration, but it will rest with the Judicial Commissioner to give his consideration to these also at the same time, and to introduce such modifications as may appear advisable, provided they do not tend to introduce those complications and technicalities, the removal of which is the main as it is the most acceptable feature of the system successfully followed in the Punjab."

This section is perfectly consistent with those which precede, and shows that the rules were to be generally acted upon, though strict obedience to them was not required, until it had been ascertained how far they were applicable to the peculiarities of the Province and the customs of its people. With this view, its application is to be carefully watched by those who administer it, who, after a certain period, are to make a report upon the subject, with any suggestions which may occur to them for amending it.

The Indian Mutiny which broke out in the following year probably prevented any report being made by the Commissioner, in compliance with the [276] directions of the 46th section, as early as was there contemplated; but, after the restoration of the British authority, we find in the official report of the administration of the Province of Oude for the year 1859-60, that the Punjab Code is stated to be the basis of the Civil Law of the country, and allusion is made to some modifications which have been introduced in it, but it does not appear that any such modification related to the subject now in controversy.

On the whole, their Lordships entertain no doubt that the Articles of the Punjab Code generally were in force at the time of the date of these Orders, the first of which was made on the 25th of August, 1859, and the last on the 23rd of March, 1860.

Then on what grounds is the application of these rules to be excluded from the present case? If they are to be excluded, it must be on the ground that there is some lex loci, of special custom, in Oude by which the law of dower in that country differs from the general Mahomedan law. But no such custom is pretended. The argument for the Appellant rests entirely on the general Mahomedan law.

The next question is, do the rules of the Punjab Code warrant a departure from the strict law, if law it be, by which in all cases a sum fixed as dower is to be enforced as an absolute debt? Upon this question no doubt can be entertained. They provide for a modification of the dower mentioned in a marriage-contract both in the case of a divorce and of the death of her husband.

The 10th clause, section VI., is in these words:—"By the Hindoo and Mahomedan law, the dower of a married woman, if not entirely paid up at the time of marriage, is claimable by her at any subse-[277]-quent time, and especially in the event of a divorce. Among Mahomedans it is usual, as a safeguard against capricious divorces, to stipulate for an amount of dower far beyond the means of the bridegroom to pay. Such contract, if enforced by a Court, would ruin a Defendant who had divorced his wife without reflecting on the liability to which he was subject. Still, although the full amount need not be decreed, yet, in the event of a divorce without a valid cause, heavy damages will be awarded to the wife in proportion to the means of the husband."

The 11th section provides for the event of the husband's death:—"At the husband's death, the dower is treated as a debt, and takes precedence of the claims of heirs, but not of other debts; it stands on the same footing with them. In this case, the Court would possess the modifying power of Clause 8, and award to the widow a fair sum, with reference to the assets of the estate and the circumstances of the heirs." The reference to clause 8 is either a mistake or a misprint for clause 10.

It appears by the proceedings in this case, that these rules have been and are acted upon in the Punjab in dealing with cases of dower, and, by the orders to which we have referred, they have been extended to Oude.

It was suggested that this was only to apply to future contracts, and not to contracts previously made. But their Lordships think it clear, that these sections provide for the mode in which all contracts of this description which might come before the Courts were to be treated. Upon the whole, their Lordships are of opinion, that the Commissioners were bound to apply the provisions of this Code to the case before [278] them, and were at liberty to exercise a discretion in the division of the property in dispute between the widow and the heirs. As to the manner in which the discretion should be exercised, the Commissioner whose judgment is appealed from must be more capable of forming a correct judgment than their Lordships can be.

It may be proper to notice an objection which was taken, that in one of the Orders appealed from, a provision was made out of the estate for an adopted son, though it was admitted by the Commissioner making the Order, that such son was not properly one of the heirs. But this will be corrected by the decision of Mr. Campbell, which directs the division to be amongst the coheirs other than the Appellant; and at all events, it is a matter which relates to a fund in which she has no interest.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the Order of Mr. Campbell of the 23rd of March, 1860; but as the case is one of novelty and some difficulty, they will not give any costs.

[279] MUSSUMAT BHOOBUM MOYEE DEBIA.—Appellant: RAM KISHORE ACHARJ CHOWDHRY and CHUNDRABULLEE DEBIA.—Respondents * [March 6, 7, and 9, 1865].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Calcutta.

In the year 1811, G. being childless, executed a deed of Onoomuttee puttro (i.e. of permission), by which he gave power to his wife, C., to adopt a son. He afterwards had a son B., by his wife, C. In 1819, two years after his son's birth, and while he was living, G. executed the following instrument:— "This is an Onoomuttee puttro to the following purport—Prior to the birth of a male child from your womb, I executed in your favour an Onoomuttee puttro on the subject of your receiving an adopted son. Subsequently, by the will of God, you have given birth to a male child. Still, having regard to the future, I have again given you permission. If, which God forbid, the male child of your body be non-existent, then you will adopt a son from my race or from a different race, for the purpose of performing mine or your Sradh and other rites, and for the Sheba of the gods, and for the succession to the zemindary and other property, on which, if the adopted son be non-existent, which God forbid, then you shall, according to your pleasure, on failure of one, adopt other sons in succession, to avoid the extinction of the pinda; that dattaka son shall be entitled to perform your and my Sradh, etc., and of our ancestors." B., on coming of age, succeeded to the ancestral and other estate of his father who had died. On B.'s death, childless, his widow succeeded as heir to her deceased husband, taking a vested estate in the whole of his estate. Some time after B.'s death, C., his mother, exercised the power given her by the instrument of 1819, by adopting a son to G. The Sudder Dewanny Court held, first, that the above instrument was of the nature of a testamentary disposition, and secondly, upon its construction, that it created a limitation on failure of male issue of the Testator, in the lifetime of his wife, to the son to be adopted by her as a persona designata. Upon appeal, such decree reversed, the Judicial Committee holding:—

First, that the instrument was simply a permission to adopt a son, as in the absence of any devise it could not be considered as of a testamentary character [10 Moo. Ind. App. 309].

Secondly, that although a testamentary power of disposition by Hindoos in the Presidency of Bengal has been established by the decisions of the Courts, yet the nature and extent of such power, so far as relates to limitations in tail male, or executory devises, is not to be regulated or governed by any analogy to the law of England, which law applies to the wants of a state of society widely different from that which prevail among Hindoos in India [10 Moo. Ind. App. 308, 309].

Thirdly, that as an adopted son by the Hindoo law takes by inheritance, and not by devise, and as by that law, in the case of inheritance, the person to succeed must be the heir of the full owner, B., the son was the last full owner, and his wife succeeded at his death as his heir to her widow's estate [10 Moo. Ind. App. 311]; and Fourthly, consequently, that the adoption by C. under the Onoomuttee puttro, was void, as the power was capable of execution [10 Moo. Ind. App. 307].

Whether, by the Hindoo law, G. could have restricted the interest of his son B. in his ancestral and other estate to a life interest, or could have limited it over, if his son B. left no issue male, or such issue male had failed, to an adopted son of his own.—Quare?

The questions in this appeal were, first, whether the first Respondent, Ram Kishore, the adopted son of the late Gour Kishore Acharj Chowdhry, by his wife, Chundrabullee Debia, the other Respondent, was, as such, entitled to the ancestral and other estates of [280] Gour Kishore under the terms of an Onoomuttee puttro, a deed of permission to adopt, given by him to his wife, which instrument the Respondents contended, was, in effect, a testamentary disposition, constituting Ram Kishore, as such adopted son, sole heir; and secondly, whether an adoption by the Appellant, under an alleged deed of permission given by her husband Bhowanee Kishore, the son of Gour Kishore, was established.

Gour Kishore Acharj Chowdhry, a Hindoo and Brahmin by caste, was the Zemindar of four annas share of Pergunnah, Allaj Singh, in the Zillah of Mymensingh, in the Presidency of Bengal, and in the month of Magh, 1215 (February, 1808), having then no son, he executed a deed of permission in favour of his wife, the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, to adopt a son to him.

Afterwards, and on the 22nd Poos, 1224 (December, 1817), the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia gave birth to a son, named Bhowanee Kishore.

[281] Notwithstanding the birth of Bhowanee Kishore, his father, Gour Kishore, executed a fresh deed of permission in favour of his wife, Chundrabullee Debia, on the 25th Kartick, 1226 (9th of November, 1819), which was as follows:—"This is an Onoomuttee puttro, to the following purport:—Prior to the birth of a male child from your womb, I had executed in your favour an Onoomuttee puttro on the subject of your receiving an adopted son. Subsequently, by the will of God, you have given birth to a male child. Still, having regard to the future, I have again given you permission. If, which God forbid, the male child of your body be non-existent, then you will adopt a son from my race (Gotra), or from a different race (Gotra) for the purpose of performing mine and your Sradh and other rites, and for the Sheba (service) of the gods and for the succession to the Zemindary and other property; on which, if the adopted son be non-existent, which God forbid, then you shall, according to your pleasure, on the failure of one, adopt other sons in succession, to avoid the extinction of the pinda (funeral cake or offering); that dattaka (adopted) son shall be entitled to perform your and my Sradh, etc., and that of our ancestors, and also to succeed to the property. To this end I execute this Onoomuttee Puttro." The original and compared copy of this deed of permission were registered on the 12th November, 1819, by that Registrar of deeds under Ben. Reg. XX. of 1812.

Gour Kishore died in 1821, leaving his wife, the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, and his son, Bhowanee Kishore, him surviving.

In consequence of the minority of Bhowanee Kishore, the Zemindary, and other property came under the surveillance of the Court of Wards; and on the 28th of [282] November, 1821, that Court passed an Order appointing the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, guardian of Bhowanee Kishore, during his minority.

Bhowanee Kishore, after attaining his majority, was put in possession of the Zemindary, and married the Appellant and died, without issue, on the 14th Bhadro, 1247 (28th of August, 1840).

At his death, the Appellant brought forward an instrument, alleged to be a Will executed by Bhowanee Kishore, authorizing her to adopt a son for him, but no steps were taken by the Appellant with a view to the adoption of a son under the provisions of this instrument until the month of November, 1843, when, disputes having arisen between the Appellant and the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, both of whom were in receipt of the income of the estate, the Appellant notified her intention to take in adoption one Rajendro Kishore, an intention which, as she alleged, she subsequently, in the month of December, 1843, carried out by adopting him in due form.

The Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, afterwards, in the month of Bysack, 1251 (April—May, 1844), proposed to the father and mother of the Respondent, Ram Kishore, that he should be given to her, in adoption, in conformity with the deed of permission of the 25th Kartick, 1226; and under the provisions of another Onoomuttee puttro, dated 15th Bysack, 1251) given by the father of the first-named Respondent to his wife, and a dan puttro (deed of gift in adoption) and a grohen puttro (deed of acceptance), both dated the 31st Bysack, 1251, the arrangements as to the adoption were laid down, and such adoption was afterwards completed.

Upon this adoption, the first-named Respondent, under the terms of the deed of 25th Kartick, 1226, [283] claimed to be entitled to inherit the whole of the property of Gour Kishore; but the Appellant, Bhoobun Moyee, and the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia still continued to hold the property.

In consequence, a plaint was filed in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Mymensingh, on the 14th of August, 1851, on behalf of Ram Kishore, as the adopted son of Gour Kishore, by Goluck Kishore, his elder brother, as his next friend, against the Appellant, Bhoobun Moyee, for herself, and as guardian of the alleged adopted son, Rajendro Kishore, and Chundrabullee Debia, and two others, named Anund Moyee and Jugodumba, to obtain possession and recover the mesne proceeds of the Zemindary and other property, moveable and immoveable, held by the Defendants. The statements in the plaint were, in substance, that Gour Kishore granted to his wife, Chundrabullee Debia, the deed of permission, in the nature of a Will, dated 25th Kartick, 1226. That Gour Kishore died in Assin, 1228, leaving real and personal property as specified in a schedule to the plaint annexed. That under the management by the Court of Wards during the minority of Bhowanee Kishore, certain Zemindaries and other property specified in the schedule were purchased out of accumulated profits. That Bhowanee Kishore was in a state of insensibility on the 10th Bhadro, 1247, and continued in that state until his death on the 14th Bhadro. That Ram Kishore was duly adopted by Chundrabullee Debia, in accordance with the deed of permission of the 25th Kartick, 1226, and the proper ceremonies were duly performed. That Ram Kishore, upon such adoption, became the sole proprietor of all the estates and property specified in [284] the schedule. That after the death of Bhowanee Kishore, divers persons in collusion with Bhoobun Moyee, fabricated a deed of permission, purporting to be signed by Bhowanee Kishore and to bear date the 12th Bhadro, 1247. That such deed of permission was drawn in such terms as to render objections to the authenticity or validity thereof improbable on the part of Chundrabullee Debia and Anund Moyee and Jugodumba; and it was admitted that such deed of permission set up by Bhoobun Moyee was a forged and fabricated document.

The Appellant, by her answer to the plaint, after setting forth certain pleas in bar of the suit, in substance, pleaded, that no weight could be attached to the averments in the plaint as to the deed of permission given to Chundrabullee Debia by Gour Kishore, as Bhowanee Kishore, upon attaining his majority, became entitled to an absolute interest in the property which descended to him from Gour Kishore. That Gour Kishore could not have given a valid deed of permission to adopt in the lifetime of Bhowanee Kishore, and further, that the deed of permission given could not operate as a Will. That Bhowanee Kishore actually executed a deed of permission in favour of the Appellant on the 12th Bhadro, 1247, at which time he was well in health and in the full enjoyment of his faculties. That the genuineness of that deed of permission was established by the acts of the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, in conjunction with the Appellant, in conformity therewith, and by certain statements alleged to have been made by Chundrabullee Debia: that the son adopted by the Appellant on the 20th Aughran, 1250, agreeably to such deed of permission, was the rightful proprietor of the entire [285] property; that Ram Kishore was not taken in adoption by the Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, under any arrangement with, or with the consent of his father; and that in consequence of impurity attaching to the mother of Ram Kishore after the death of her husband, Ram Kishore could not have been given and received in adoption; and, lastly, that Ram Kishore, in consequence of his age, could not have been adopted in conformity with the Hindoo law.

The Respondent, Chundrabullee Debia, by her answer, alleged statements to the effect, that the adoption of Ram Kishore had been duly effected by her in exercise of the power given to her by the deed of permission of the 26th Kartick, 1226, and that no deed of permission was ever executed by her son, Bhowanee Kishore, in the Appellant's favour, and that she had been fraudulently induced to act, or appear to act, in conformity with the fabricated deed of permission to adopt relied on by the Appellant.

As soon as the first Respondent came of age, he was substituted as Plaintiff in the stead of Goluck Kishore.

Evidence was entered into. As respected the genuineness of the Oomuttie puttro, of the 25th Kartick, 1226, the evidence given consisted of a certified copy from the Register Office of the copy of the original deed, which was filed in that office on the 28th Kartick, 1226, three days after the date of the deed, which was produced on behalf of the first Respondent, together with certified copies of two Vakalutnamahs executed by Gour Kishore and Chundrabullee Debia respectively, authorizing the Vakeels to attend for the purpose of the registration of the deed. The original deed of permission was called for by the Court from Chundrabullee Debia, [286] but was not produced. As soon as the first Respondent took upon himself the conduct of the suit, he applied to the Court for an Order calling upon Chundrabullee Debia to produce the original deed, but the principal Sudder Ameen declined to accede to that application. The three persons who were present at the time of the execution of the deed by Gour Kishore, deposed to the fact of such execution. As respected the fact of the adoption of the first Respondent by Chundrabullee Debia, under the power given to her by the deed of permission of 25th Kartick, 1226, evidence was given of his adoption, and that the ceremonies usual in a case of Hindoo adoption were duly performed in the case of his adoption. In opposition to this evidence in support of the fact of the adoption, the Appellant filed a copy of an Urzee of a testamentary character, purporting to be signed by Gokool Kishore, and to bear date the 28th Bysack, 1251, by which one Sheebnarain was appointed executor and guardian of the first-named Respondent, until he attained his majority; but to prove that this Urzee was a forgery, a certified copy of a petition of Sheebnarain, dated the 12th Jeyt, 1251, was produced, in which the Urzee was stated to have been prepared by the Appellant, and to be a forgery, and also by the deposition of Sheebnarain, who was examined as a witness. The Appellant also endeavoured to establish as a fact that, on the 31st Bysack, 1251, the first Respondent was too old to be taken in adoption, in accordance with the Hindoo law, and that consequently, the adoption at that time was invalid; but she failed to prove that the Respondent was older than he stated himself to be, or to show that the adoption was invalid, even if the Re-[287]-spondent were as old as alleged. The Appellant also objected that, on the 31st Bysack, 1251, Hurro Soondree, the first Respondent's mother, was under impurity, in consequence of the recent death of her husband, Gokool Kishore, and that, in accordance with the opinion of Pundits, she was incapacitated from giving the first-named Respondent in adoption, on that day.

As respected the alleged forgery of the deed of permission by Bhowanee Kishore relied upon by the Appellant, it appeared that the document was never registered, and the non-registration was not satisfactorily accounted for by the Appellant. From the evidence of witnesses called on behalf of the first-named Respondent, it appeared that the document was fabricated under the instrumentality of one Rughoo Dutt, who was in the service of the Appellant; that after a rough draft had been made, a copy was made upon a stamped paper of the value of Rs. 70; that in consequence of some mistakes in this copy, another copy was made upon a fresh stamped paper of the same value, and that after attempts to obtain the signatures of respectable persons as witnesses to the deed, Rughoo Dutt and his accomplices were obliged to be satisfied with the attestations of persons of the lowest class. In addition to the witnesses who deposed to these facts from personal knowledge, there were also many persons called on behalf of the first-named Respondent, who deposed to the forgery of the document having been a matter of general notoriety in the neighbourhood. Rughoo Dutt was not called by Appellant as a witness.

Witnesses who were in the service of Bhowanee Kishore, and in daily attendance upon him during the illness which terminated his death, deposed on behalf of the first-named Respondent, that Bhowanee Kishore [288] returned from hunting in a state of high fever, and that he was insensible for the four days preceeding his death, and consequently incompetent to give instructions for or to execute any document. Witnesses were called by the Appellant to rebut these allegations. Some of them deposed that Bhowanee Kishore was quite well at the time of the execution of the alleged deed in contradiction to the language of the deed itself.

which stated that he was ill. It was also proved that at the time of Blowanee Kishore's illness and death, at Mooktagachia, there were many of his relatives residing near that place, and that they and neighbouring Zemindars visited him daily until he died, but no relative, or friend, or medical attendant was present at the time when the Appellant's witnesses stated that the alleged deed was executed by Blowanee Kishore.

In opposition to the facts so established, the Appellant endeavoured to support the validity of the deed mainly upon the ground of Chundrabullee Debia's acquiescence in or non-objection to the provisions of that document, and in order to show the early assent of Chundrabullee Debia to the deed, the Appellant produced a copy of a written statement purporting to be signed by Chundrabullee Debia on the 26th of September, 1840.

The suit came on for hearing before the Principal Sudder Court Ameen (Syud Ahmad Buksh), in the month of April, 1855, and on the 20th of that month, that Judge passed a decree dismissing the suit with costs. The reasons for the decree stated in his judgment were, first:—that inasmuch as the original deed of permission of 26th Kartick, 1226, had not been filed, neither the authenticated copy from the Registry office, nor the duplicate copy filed with the original at the time of registration, [289] which had been called for him from the Registry office, were admissible as evidence; secondly, that the Onoomuttee puttro executed by Gokul Kishore, and the grohen puttro and dan puttro as to the first Respondent, were not proved; and, thirdly, that, although there was no necessity to enter into an investigation as to the validity of the deed of permission set up by the Appellant, the opinion which he had formed was that it had been satisfactorily proved by the evidence of the witnesses thereto; that it had been recognized by Chundrabullee Debia, who, by her acts and conduct, had established the validity thereof; and that there was a strong presumption in favour of its genuineness.

The first-named Respondent appealed from this decree to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

The appeal came on for hearing on the 30th of January, 1858, before Messrs. Colvin, Sconce, and Trevor, three of the Judges of that Court, and a decree on that date was passed dismissing the appeal with costs.

Separate judgments were delivered by the three Judges. Mr. Colvin, in his judgment, held that it was unnecessary to go into the question of the execution of the different deeds relied on until the disposal of certain preliminary questions, stated by the Court as follows:—"Even supposing Gour Kishore to have given to Chundrabullee Debia the authority to adopt, asserted by the Appellant, could he by Hindoo law thereby precluded the exercise afterwards of the power of adoption by his son, Blowanee Kishore, and did the terms of the deed alleged to have been executed by Gour Kishore show that such was his intention?" And accordingly the arguments on the hearing of the appeal and the several judgments of the three [290] Judges, were confirmed to the questions thus stated by the Court.

As the decree of the 30th of January, 1858, was founded upon judgments which assumed that which was the chief point in dispute between the parties—viz., the validity of the deed of permission set up by the Appellant; the first Respondent moved for a review of that decree; and a review was admitted by Mr. Sconce, who expressed his reasons for such admission in his judgment in the following terms:—"My judgment was originally given on the presumption that the Onoomuttee puttro set up by Bloobun Moyee, widow of Blowanee Kishore, and the adoption of the Defendant under it, were legally valid; and being satisfied from the cause shown by the Plaintiff's Counsel, that they should have an opportunity of taking the opinion of the Court upon that matter, I admitted the re-entertainment of the appeal, that the issues not before gone into might be adjudicated upon."

The hearing of this review took place on the 7th of March, 1859, in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, before Messrs. Sconce, Trevor, and Colvin, and separate judgments were on that day delivered by those Judges.

Messrs. Sconce and Trevor in their judgments held, in effect, first, that the fact of the execution of the deed of permission of 25th Kartick, 1226, by Gour Kishore was proved, and that, although the original deed had not been produced, yet under the circumstances, such secondary evidence as had been adduced on behalf of the first Respondent was admissible, and established the validity and terms of the deed: secondly, that Chundrabullee Debia had power under the deed of 25th Kartick, 1226, to adopt a son as heir of Gour Kishore, in the event of Bhowa-[291]-nee Kishore dying without issue, or without having taken steps with a view to his being represented by a legally-adopted son: thirdly, that the adoption of the Respondent as the son of Gour Kishore was such an adoption as was authorized by the deed of 25th Kartick, 1226, and that the adoption was valid according to Hindoo law: fourthly, that the alleged deed of permission set up by the Appellant was not executed by Bhowanee Kishore, but was a forgery: and lastly, that the acts of Chundrabullee Debia, in conformity with that forged deed of permission, could not prejudice or affect the rights of the first Respondent as the legally-adopted son of Gour Kishore.

With respect to the affect of the deed of permission to adopt being of a testamentary character, the following judgment was pronounced by Mr. Trevor on that point. "Having declared the deed propounded by a Plaintiff to be a genuine deed, the next point is as to its legal significance. It has been contended on the part of the Plaintiff by the Advocate General, that the deed of permission is in the nature of a testamentary instrument, or writing, by which an estate of the nature of a fee simple conditional, that is, upon condition that he had issue, was given to Bhowanee Kishore: that in the event of his having issue, the estate then became absolute: but that in the event of his having no issue, he was limited to a life interest in the property, and a future estate, in the nature of an executory devise, is created in favour of a son to be adopted by Gour Kishore's wife, Chundrabullee Debia. On the part of Defendant it was contended by Mr. Money that limited estates in land are unknown to this country, and are inconsistent with its revenue system: that as no Statute de donis here exists, or has ever existed, all estates created are in their nature absolute: [292] that consequently, under the law, Bhowanee Kishore's estate was a fee simple absolute: and on his death, after having succeeded to his father's estate, it descended first to his son, either natural or adopted, and afterwards to his heirs under Hindoo law: that, moreover, the words of the deed are sufficient to pass absolutely the estate, and under the principle laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Howe v. Byns (10 Cl. and Fin. pp. 508—533), as to personal property, which is identical with the rule which should be followed as to reality, it is impossible to give to a party a right to a thing out and out: to give an absolute interest in that thing, and then afterwards to restrict that absolute gift by limitation over: that consequently, under the deed of permission, admitting it to be genuine, the Plaintiff takes nothing. The estate to be taken under Gour Kishore's deed must be determined with reference to Hindoo law, and not to the general law of this country. It is consequently only necessary for me to mark that there is not the slightest ground for the position taken up by the Counsel for the Respondent, to the effect that limitations of estates are unknown to and are illegal according to the laws of this country. So far from this being the case, there being no Statutory enactment forbidding the same, it is competent to any one to limit and restrict future interests in land in any way that whim or ingenuity may suggest, though probably the exact terms used in the very learned work (Fearn on Contingent Remainders) to which we have been referred, may not be resorted to: and under the Hindoo law, limited or restricted estates are of daily occurrence. It is true that the hypothecation which Government has on every estate as security for its revenue, may have a tendency to check such dispositions, unless they [293] arise by operation of laws: as on the occurrence of an arrear caused by a party with a limited interest, if it be not paid by parties with either a vested or contingent interest in the property, the estate is brought to sale, and by such sale all future interest would be defeated. But the existence of this rule, however it may have a tendency to check the exercise of it, is not inconsistent with the power itself of limiting estates which undoubtedly exists both under the general law of the country and under Hindoo law. Looking, then, on the deed of Gour Kishore by the light of Hindoo law, it appears to me that it is a testamentary disposition of his property, by which he devised it absolutely to his son, Bhowanee Kishore, and his heirs general, subject to a power of appointment by the widow, to be exercised in the event of his son, Bhowanee Kishore, dying without leaving a son either natural or adopted, or to be adopted, him surviving. This estate in the son was absolute, and permitted alienations which it could hardly have done were it only a fee simple conditional. Whatever interest, however, the heirs general of Bhowanee Kishore may have held under it, was subject to be destroyed by the exercise by the widow of the power of appointment when the executory devise in favour of the party so appointed would arise and displace it. By this means the direct succession to Gour Kishore and the performance of the necessary obsequial rites are effectively attained. Whatever objection might arise to such a disposition in other parts of India from the doctrine that the inchoate right of the son to property is from his birth, none such can arise in Bengal, where the above doctrine is not recognized, where, whilst the father lives and is free from defect, the sons have no right at all, and where by the power of making testamentary [294] disposition, the father, if so minded, can will away, even to a stranger, the whole of his ancestral property. It has been objected by the Respondent to the exercise of the power of adoption by the widow of Gour Kishore, that as Bhowanee Kishore had married, and had succeeded to the property, his widow had, by virtue of her marriage, a vested right in the property, and that any act done in derogation of that vested right, could not be upheld. I find no authority for this doctrine in Hindoo law books. If the power of appointment can be exercised in derogation of the right of other heirs of the son, it can be exercised in derogation of that of the widow: and the fact of the son of Bhowanee Kishore having reached his majority and succeeded to the estates is, in a case like the present, where the object of the Testator is to perpetuate direct heirship, of itself deserving, it appears to me, of no lengthened consideration. Of the soundness of the principle laid down in the case of Hoare v. Byng, cited by the Counsel of the Respondent, and its applicability to this country, as well as to England, when circumstances rightly call for its application, there can be no doubt. As, however, it appears to me that the terms of the deed executed by Gour Kishore a power of appointment, in certain circumstances, remains in the widow, Chundrabullee Debia, it is not applicable to the present case."

Mr. Colvin, the other Judge, differed in opinion from Messrs. Sounce and Trevor in some material points, and in his judgment, held, in effect, first, that there was no doubt that Gour Kishore did execute the deed of permission of the 25th Kartick, 1226, and that it was never revoked by him; secondly, that if no more were involved in the case than which of the [295] two adoption alleged was the most trustworthy, that of the first Respondent was to be preferred as the best supported by evidence; thirdly, that the intention of the deed of the 25th Kartick, 1226, was only to give power to Chundrabullee Debia to adopt a son in the event of Bhowanee Kishore dying in the lifetime of his father, Gour Kishore; fourthly, that Chundrabullee Debia had no authority to curtail the Appellant's enjoyment of the estate in succession to her husband, Bhowanee Kishore; and fifthly, that as there was no legal power in Chundrabullee Debia to adopt the first Respondent when she did, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

In conformity with the judgments of the majority of the Judges, a decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut was passed on the 7th of March, 1859, in favour of the first Respondent, with costs of suit, and with wassilat from the commencement of the suit, and interest thereon up to the date of realization.

Before this decree was made, Rajendro Kishore, the adopted son of the Appellant, attained his majority and died, when the Appellant, as the widow of Bhowanee Kishore, and mother of Koylas Kishore, a minor, whom she alleged she had adopted on Rajendro Kishore's death, applied for leave to appeal to England.

The petition, together with the papers of the case, were brought up before Mr. Samuells, one of the Judges of the Court, on the 6th of June, 1859, and his proceeding of that date was recorded as follows:—The papers of this case have been laid before me in order that I might determine whether the fact of Bhoobun Moyee, who originally defends the suit as mother and guardian of Rajendro Kishore, having now preferred an appeal to the Privy Council as mother and guardian of another adopted son, Koylas [296] Kishore, can in any way affect his right of appeal. It appears that Rajendro Kishore appeared in Court during the pendency of the suit, and alleging that he was of age, was allowed to plead. After the case was heard, but before the judgment was pronounced, he died. This circumstance was brought to the Court's notice at the time, but it did not appear to have been considered necessary to refer to it in the decision which was then given, and which turns entirely on the validity of the deed of adoption set up by Bhoobun Moyee. It seems that Bhoobun Moyee, who was appealed to the Privy Council against the decision which declared her deed invalid, has again asserted her right under that deed, by adoption of another son, named Koylas Kishore. As she claims to adopt under the deed of permission, and the validity of the deed is the chief point at issue, the appeal must go forward, and any questions which may arise out of the death of the first adopted son, will be decided by the Lords of the Privy Council. It is, of course, understood that the appeal goes on without prejudice to the rights of the Respondent, who protests against the recognition of the second adopted son, and denies the right of the widow to make any such adoption.

On the 3rd of January 1860, an Order was made by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, admitting the appeal of the Appellant as widow of the late Bhowanee Kishore, and mother of Koylas Kishore, a minor.

Before the last-mentioned Order was made, the Appellant applied for a review of the decree of the 7th of March, 1859, and stated several objections to that decree, and upon the hearing of that application on the 14th of January, 1860, before Mr. Trevor, a review was admitted for the determination of one of the points raised by the objections. The views of Mr. [297] Trevor in admitting such review, are stated as follows:—"It remains then to consider the sixth objection to the Court's ruling, which is, that even if the deed of permission executed by Gour Kishore be a testamentary disposition of his own and the ancestral property, yet that disposition cannot extend to property admittedly purchased on behalf of Bhowanee Kishore from the profits of the ancestral properties, while they were under the charge of the Court of Wards during his minority, and which can, in no sense, be considered as property covered by the Will of Gour Kishore. This point was not mentioned by the Vakeels of either side when the case was last before the Court, and it consequently escaped the notice of the Court; but on adverting to the plaint and to the schedules annexed thereto, it is clear that the property claimed by the Plaintiff is divided by him into two classes, the first including ancestral property, and the second properties purchased from the profits of the ancestral estates whilst they were in charge of the Court of Wards, during Bhowanee Kishore's minority. As the minor, during his lifetime, was absolute owner of the estates which, on his death without a son, either natural or adopted, were made by the Will of his father, Gour Kishore, subject to the power of appointment by his father's widow, Chundrabullee Debia, it seems to me that there can be no question that the widow of Bhowanee Kishore is entitled to retain possession of those properties which were purchased while the ancestral estates were under the Court of Wards during the minority of her husband, and from the profits of those estates belonging to her husband in the hands of the Court of Wards, and for the determination of this point alone I admit a review of the judgment of this Court."

[298] The hearing of the review took place on the 19th of April, 1860, before Messrs. Raikes, Trevor, and Loch, three of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and a unanimous judgment of the Court was then pronounced. Such judgment, after stating reasons arising from the construction to be put upon the deed of the 25th Kartick, 1226, and from Hindoo law, for holding that the first Respondent did not take under the terms of that deed the whole of the property possessed by or in the enjoyment of Bhowanee Kishore at the time of his death, but only the property which had descended from Gour Kishore, and was in the possession or enjoyment of Bhowanee Kishore, concluded as follows:—"Under the view of the case expressed above, we consider that the Plaintiff is only entitled under the testamentary disposition of Gour Kishore, to the property which descended from that individual, and that Bhoobun Moyee, the Defendant in the Lower Court, and the Petitioner before this, is entitled to retain possession of all the estates mentioned in the schedule filed by the Plaintiff as having been acquired by the Defendant's husband, Bhowanee Kishore, during the time the estates were under the Court of Wards during his minority. We, therefore, in variation of the decision of the Court of the 7th of March, 1859, decree to the Plaintiff only those properties which are mentioned in the schedule at the end of the plaint as being ancestral property, and formerly in possession of Gour Kishore, with mesne profits, to be ascertained in execution from the date of suit, and interest on the amount so ascertained, from the commencement of the year following that on which the wassilat accrues, up to the date of realization, and we dismiss his claim to the properties purchased from the profits of the estates of Bhowanee [299] Kishore while they were in the hands of the Court of Wards during his minority. The costs of both Courts will be borne by the parties in proportion to the amount decreed or dismissed."

From this decree, so far as it negated the right of the first-named Respondent to the properties purchased from the profits of the estates of Bhowanee Kishore, while they were in the hands of the Court of Wards, that Respondent preferred an appeal to Her Majesty in Council. The present Appellant also lodged a petition of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, in which she claimed as widow of the late Bhowanee Kishore, and mother and heiress, according to Hindoo law, of Rajendro Kishore, the adopted son and heir-at-law of the former; and such petition submitted that the decree on review of the 7th of March, 1850 (except so far as the same had been reversed and altered by the decree on review of the 19th of April, 1860), should be reversed, and that the previous decrees of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and of the Principal Sudder Ameen, be affirmed.

The appeal and cross were heard together. It was arranged that the Appellant should open first.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—If the adoption by the Appellant is not established, she, as widow of Bhowanee Kishore and heiress of her husband is entitled to his estate; but as the Plaintiff, as the next friend of the first Respondent, sued in his character of adopted son of the late Gour Kishore, and alleged that such adoption had been made by Chundrabullee Debia, his widow, he was bound to prove strictly his case, which, we submit, he failed [300] to do. He failed to produce the original Onoomuttee puttro, which was alleged to contain the authority for such adoption, and upon which and its due execution, the Plaintiffs alleged adoption and consequent title and right to sue were entirely founded. A copy of the deed was improperly admitted by the Court below without proof of the execution of the original, or of its loss or destruction which was requisite to entitle it to be let in as secondary evidence. Syud Abbas Alli Khan v. Yadeen Ramy Reddy (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 156), Ben. Regs. XX. of 1812, sec. 2, cl. 5, XXXVI. of 1793, sec. III. and Act No. XIX. of 1853.

Then with respect to the alleged adoption of the first Respondent by Chundrabullee Debia, we contend, that such adoption was invalid, both with reference to the rules and requirements of Hindoo law, and according to the opinion of Mr. Colvin, the dissentient Judge, to the proper interpretation of the deed of permission to adopt, having regard to the circumstances under which, and the particular time, that the alleged power was exercised by Chundrabullee Debia; but the most important objection is, that Mr. Trevor, one of the Judges, of the Court below, has wrongly imported principles of the English law relating to executory devises, in construing this permissive deed to adopt into an executory devise; nothing of the kind being known to the Hindoo law. No instance can be found in the Hindoo authorities of an adoption being good under such a devise, as this is improperly called by the Court below, where the son has attained full age and married. The deed purports to give the widow permission to adopt. It is not a power in the sense of the English law. No authority to support it can be found in the Hindoo law. W. H. Macnaghten's [301] "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 66. It is only in default of male issue that adoption is allowed. Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 78 [2nd Edit.]. It is true that two of the Judges of the Court below concurred in opinion that the Respondent, Ram Kishore's, adoption was good, and not affected by the question of ceremonial impurity, and that although being 12 or 13 years of age as we allege at the time, and tonsure had been performed, he was not above the legal age for adoption, being a Brahmin by caste; yet the important question arises, whether as such adopted son of the late Gour Kishore, the father of the Appellant's husband, Bhowanee Kishore, who survived his father twenty-three years, and left the Appellant his childless widow, and as such, his admitted heiress by the Hindoo law, could displace and supersede the Appellant as such heir in the possession of the estates which devolved on her husband as an absolute estate of inheritance. We submit that such a power of appointment, if exercised by a mother, was invalid, if the son left a widow, as her vested rights, Strange's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 134, would be defeated by its exercise. An adopted son takes as a posthumous son. W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," Vol. I. ch. vi. p. 70; Gunga Mya v. Kishen Kishore Chowdhry (3 Ben. S.D.A. Rep. 128). After-born sons' rights are declared in the Daya-Bhaga, ch. vii., secs. 11 and 12. Another ground of invalidity of such adoption is, that by Hindoo law, a second adoption, the first son being alive, is illegal. Rungama v. Atchema (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 1); 1 W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindu Law," p. 70. Bhowanee Kishore succeeded to the ancestral estate and property by operation of law, as his father's sole heir, and not under any devise or be-[302]-quest from him, and the estate and property being in him, as admitted by the decree, as an absolute estate of inheritance, vested, on his death, in the Appellant, as his widow and heiress, therefore her title and interest therein could not be displaced or divested by the act of Chundrabullee Debia subsequently adopting a son, so as to vest the estate and property in such son as heir-at-law, not of the Appellant's deceased husband, but of his father, whose interest in the same ceased and determined on his death.

Although we were not bound to do so, in consequence of the Plaintiff's failure in proof of his title, yet we submit that the Appellant satisfactorily proved the execution of the deed containing the authority of her deceased husband to adopt a son or sons to him, under which instrument she adopted Rajendro Kishore, according to the requirements of the Hindoo law, as decreed by the Principal Sudder Ameen, and after his death, Koylas Kishore.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Respondent, Ram Kishore.

It was satisfactorily proved that Gour Kishore executed the deed of permission to adopt, dated the 25th Kartick, 1226, and in pursuance of such deed, Chundrabullee Debia adopted the first Respondent, who thereby became entitled to the estates in dispute. This deed was sufficiently proved by an authenticated copy from the Registrar's Book. The case of Syud Abbas Alli Khan v. Yadrem Rama Reddy (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 156) does not apply. There was no proof of the original deed in that case, and the fragments produced evidently bore marks of being fabricated. Here the duplicate deed coming out of the proper place of [303] custody, the Registry of deeds, was properly received in evidence, Ben. Regs. XXXVI. of 1793, sec. III.; and XX. of 1812, sec. II. cl. 5.

Such deed of permission to adopt was of a testamentary character, and good by Hindoo Law, F. Macnaghten's "Cons. on Hindoo Law," p. 168, and as a Will is recognized in Bengal, with the English law of limitations engrafted on the Hindoo law, Sonatum Bysack v. Sreemully Juggutsoondue Dossee (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, pp. 66, 78), it operated as an executory devise, and was sufficient to prevent Bhowanee Kishore executing an instrument which would have the effect of defeating the disposition of Gour Kishore under such deed of permission. The objection to the validity of Ram Kishore's adoption is unfounded: first, he was of proper age, F. Macnaghten's "Cons. on Hindoo Law," pp. 142-3-6; 1 W. H. Macnaghten's "Hindoo Law," p. 71; secondly, a widow can adopt a son to her deceased husband, 1 Strange's "Hindu Law," p. 79. The Mitachara, ch. i. sec. xi. p. 1. The consequence of adoption is that the adopted son becomes an alien from his family. The adopted son cannot be deprived of his adopted father's estate. But we contend, that the instrument giving permission to adopt, which the Appellant alleges to have been executed by Bhowanee Kishore, is palpably a forgery, and that no valid or legal adoption could have taken place in pursuance of such instrument. [Lord Kingsdown.—Their Lordships have arrived at the conclusion that the alleged Will, or deed of adoption, relied upon by the Appellant, is a forgery, so you may relieve yourself of that part of the case.] Even if the forged deed was genuine, the claim of the Appellant to her widow's rights was negatived by the [304] alleged adoption of Koylas Kishore on Rajendro Kishore's death.

Their Lordships' judgment, having been reserved, was now pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Kingsdown (May 26, 1865).—The appeal in this case arises out of a suit brought by the Respondent, Ram Kishore, to recover certain estates in Bengal, which were claimed by and were in the possession of the Appellant and of Rajendro Kishore, whom she alleged to be her adopted son.

The facts, so far as they are necessary to make our judgment intelligible, are these:—

Gour Kishore Acharj, being the owner of considerable estates in Bengal, died in the year 1821. He left surviving him a widow named Chundrabullee Debia and an only son named Bhowanee Kishore.

At the time of his father's death, Bhowanee Kishore, who succeeded as his heir, was about four years of age. He attained, however, his majority, and married the Appellant, Bhoobun Debia. He died in the month of August, 1840, being then about twenty-four years old. He left no issue, and Bhoobun Debia, his widow, became the heir of his property, as well ancestral as of other estates which had been purchased with his own money during his life.

Immediately upon the death of Bhowanee Kishore, an instrument was set up, as being his Will, by Chundrabullee Debia, his mother, and Bhoobun Debia, his widow. By this instrument, power to adopt a son was given to Bhoobun Debia, and until such adoption was made, the income of the estates was given to Chundrabullee Debia and Bhoobun Debia.

Under this alleged Will, these two ladies took possession of the estates of Bhowanee Kishore, and [305] remained in the enjoyment of them for nearly four years.

In December, 1843, Bhoobun Debia professed to exercise the power alleged to have been given to her by the instrument already referred to, and adopted a boy called Rajendro Kishore.

Upon this, a quarrel appears to have arisen between Chundrabullee Debia and Bhoobun Debia, and Chundrabullee Debia alleged that the supposed Will of Bhowanee Debia, under which she had so long been in the enjoyment of half his property, was a forgery, and had not been made till after his death, and that Bhoobun had no power of adoption. She further set up an instrument called an Onoomuttee puttro, or deed of permission, by which she alleged that a power to adopt a son had been given to her by her husband, Gour Kishore, in his lifetime, and which power, in the events which had happened, she claimed a right to exercise.

She accordingly adopted, or professed to adopt, the Respondent, Ram Kishore, as the son of Gour Kishore, her late husband.

Bhoobun Debia, on behalf of Rajendro Kishore, her adopted son, having obtained possession of all the property of Bhowanee Kishore, the suit in which the present appeal was brought, was instituted in 1852, in the Zillah Court of Mymensing, by a next friend of Ram Kishore, on his behalf, against Bhoobun Debia and Rajendro Kishore, and certain other persons, the Plaintiff claiming, as the adopted son of Gour Kishore, the whole property, ancestral and acquired, of Bhowanee Kishore. To this suit Chundrabullee Debia was made a Defendant, instead of suing as a Plaintiff, on behalf of her son; that course being adopted probably with a view to avoid any prejudice [306] which might arise from the inconsistency of her previous conduct with the title now set up for her son.

When the case came before the Sudder Ameen, he was of opinion that the Plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and that if such title failed, it was unnecessary to decide upon the case of the Defendants.

He was of opinion that the Plaintiff had failed to prove his title, and he, therefore, dismissed the suit, expressing at the same time a strong opinion in favour of the Defendant's adoption.

He awarded the costs of the suit to the Defendants, with the exception of Chundrabullee Debia, whom he held to be really the promoter of the suit.

From this decision there was an appeal to the Sudder Dewanny of Calcutta. The case was heard upon several different occasions. Finally, the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the adoption of Rajendro Kishore was invalid, and that the Will of Bhowanee Kishore, purporting to create the power of adoption, was a forgery. They were equally unanimous in holding that the Onoomuttee puttro of Gour Kishore was a genuine and valid instrument, and that if the power to adopt continued at the time when Chundrabullee Debia professed to execute it, there had been a valid adoption. One of the Judges was of opinion that the power was gone, and that the adoption was invalid. The other two were of opinion that the power existed at the time of the adoption, and a decree was made, therefore, in favour of the Plaintiff as to the ancestral property of Bhowanee Debia, but not as to his self-acquired property; and the costs of the parties were ordered "to be borne by them in proportion to the amount of the property decreed or dismissed."

[307] The case now comes before us on appeal by Bhobun Debia, as representing her own rights and the rights of a son, whom she had adopted in lieu of Rajendro Kishore, who is dead, and on a cross-appeal by Ram Kishore, complaining that the decree in his favour ought to have included the self-acquired property as well as the ancestral property of Bhowanee Kishore.

On the hearing of these appeals, we expressed a clear opinion, without calling on the Respondent's Counsel, that the Court below was right in holding that the alleged Will of Bhowanee was a forgery. The evidence is irresistible that it was contrived by the different members of the family after his death, in order to give effect to an arrangement which they considered would be for the common benefit. This being so, and no power of adoption having been proved or alleged to have been given by parol, the adoption of Rajendro Kishore and of the son now substituted for him, must of course be held in this suit to be invalid.

The next question is, as to the validity of the adoption of Ram Kishore. We see no reason to dissent from the opinion of the Court below upon the facts of the case, viz., that the Onoomuttee puttro of Gour Kishore is a genuine instrument, and that, supposing the powers given by it to have been in force when the adoption under it took place, the adoption was good; but we think it unnecessary to examine into the genuineness of this instrument, as we are of opinion that at the time when Chundrabullee Debia professed to exercise it, the power was incapable of execution.

It will be necessary to go into this part of the case with some minuteness.

[308] It appears that some years before the birth of Bhowanee, and in the year 1811 of our era, Gour Kishore being then childless, and anxious, as Hindoos generally are, to provide a son by adoption, if he should have no natural-born son, executed an Onoo-muttee puttro on the 30th of March, 1811, by which he gave power of adoption to Chundrabullee, his wife.

In 1819, two years after the birth of Bhowanee, he executed the instrument on which the present question depends, which is in these words. [His Lordship read the deed, ante, p. 281.]

The first question which arises is as to the construction of this instrument. It seems to have been considered by the two Judges of the Sudder Court, who decided in favour of the Respondent (certainly by one of them), that the document was to be regarded as a Will, and as containing a limitation, on failure of male issue of the Testator in the lifetime of Chundrabullee Debia, of the estate of the Testator, to a son to be adopted by Chundrabullee Debia, as a persona designata; and one of the Judges, in a very elaborate argument, refers to Mr. Fearn's celebrated treatise on Contingent Remainders, in order to show that such a devise by the English law would be valid. There is no doubt that by the decision of Courts of Justice, the testamentary power of disposition by Hindoos has been established within the Presidency of Bengal; but it would be to apply a very false and mischievous principle if it were held that the nature and extent of such power can be governed by any analogy to the law of England. Our system is one of the most artificial character, founded in a great degree on feudal rules, regulated by Acts of Parliament, and adjusted by a long course of judicial determinations to the wants of state of a society differing as far as possible from that which prevails amongst Hindoos in India.

But their Lordships are quite satisfied that there is in this case no room for the application of any such doctrines. The instrument before us is merely what it purports to be, a deed of permission to adopt; it is not of a testamentary character, it was registered as a deed in the lifetime of the maker; it contains no word of devise, nor was it the intention of the maker that it should contain any disposition of his estate, except so far as such disposition might result from the adoption of a son under it. He mentions the objects which induced him to make the deed—religious motives, the perpetuation of his family, and the succession to his property; but it was by the adoption, and only by the adoption, that those objects were to be secured, and only to the extent in which the adoption could secure them.

The main ground of the decision in the Court below appears, therefore, to fail, and this instrument must be construed, and its effect must be determined, in just the same way as if it had been made in one of the Provinces of India, in which the power of testamentary disposition is not recognized.

How, then, is the deed to be construed when we regard it merely as a deed of permission to adopt? What is the intention to be collected from it, and how far will the law permit such intention to be effected? It must be admitted that it contemplates the possibility of more than one adoption; that it shows a strong desire on the part of the maker for the continuance of a person to perform his funeral rites, and to succeed to his property; and that it does not in express terms assign any limits to the period within which the adoption may be made. But it is plain that some [310] limits must be assigned. It might well have been that Bhowanee had left a son, natural born or adopted, and that such son had died himself, leaving a son, and that such son had attained his majority in the lifetime of Chundrabullee Debia. It could hardly have been intended that after the lapse of several successive heirs a son should be adopted to the great-grandfather of the last taker, when all the spiritual purposes of a son, according to the largest construction of them, would have been satisfied.

But whatever may have been the intention, would the law allow it to be effected? We rather understand the Judges below to have been of opinion that if Bhowanee Kishore had left a son, or if a son had been lawfully adopted to him by his wife under a power legally conferred upon her, the power of adoption given to Chundrabullee Kishore would have been at an end.

But it is difficult to see what reasons could be assigned for such a result which would not equally apply to the case before us.

In this case, Bhowanee Kishore had lived to an age which enabled him to perform—and it is to be presumed that he had performed—all the religious services which a son could perform for a father. He had succeeded to the ancestral property as heir; he had full power of disposition over it; he might have alienated it; he might have adopted a son to succeed to it if he had no male issue of his body. He could have defeated every intention which his father entertained with respect to the property.

On the death of Bhowanee Kishore, his wife succeeded as heir to him, and would have equally succeeded in that character in exclusion of his brothers, if he had had any. She took a vested estate, as his widow, in the whole of his property. It would be singular if a [311] brother of Bhowanee Kishore, made such by adoption, could take from his widow the whole of his property, when a natural-born brother could have taken no part. If Ram Kishore is to take any of the ancestral property, he must take all he takes by substitution for the natural-born son, and not jointly with him.

Whether under his testamentary power of disposition Gour Kishore could have restricted the interest of Bhowanee Kishore in his estate to a life interest, or could have limited it over (if his son left no issue male, or such issue male failed) to an adopted son of his own, it is not necessary to consider; it is sufficient to say that he has neither done or attempted to do this. The question is, whether the estate of his son being unlimited, and that son having married and left a widow his heir, and that heir having acquired a vested estate in her husband's property as widow, a new heir can be substituted by adoption who is to defeat that estate, and take as an adopted son what a legitimate son of Gour Kishore would not have taken.

This seems contrary to all reason and to all the principles of Hindoo law, as far as we can collect them.

It must be recollected that the adopted son, as such, takes by inheritance and not by devise. Now, the rule of Hindoo law is, that in the case of inheritance, the person to succeed must be the heir of the last full owner. In this case, Bhowanee Kishore was the last full owner, and his wife succeeds, as his heir, to a widow's estate. On her death, the person to succeed will again be the heir at that time of Bhowanee Kishore.

If Bhowanee Kishore had died unmarried, his mother, Chundrabullee Debia, would have been his heir, and the question of adoption would have stood on quite different grounds. By exercising the power [312] of adoption, she would have divested no estate but her own, and this would have brought the case within the ordinary rule; but no case has been produced, no decision has been cited from the Text-books, and no principle has been stated to show that by the mere gift of a power of adoption to a widow, the estate of the heir of a deceased son vested in possession, can be defeated and divested.

The only case referred to in the argument before us, or in the judgment below, as tending in that direction, is that of Luckinarain Tagori, reported by Sir F. Macnaghten, "Cons on Hindu Law," p. 168; but it is incontestable that in that case the disposition depended wholly on the testamentary power. The authority to adopt was only subsidiary to the disposition of the property. The Will of Luckinarain Tagori is set forth in full in No. 5, p. 9, of the Appendix to Sir F. Macnaghten's work. It is termed a Will; it appoints an Executor; it disposes of the whole estate; gives various legacies; gives the residue to the child of which his youngest wife was pregnant, whether a son or a daughter, in which latter case it would obviously break the legal order of succession; and directs that at that child's death the adoption of a son shall take place. We have already said that we express no opinion as to the power of Gour Kishore to have made the disposition now insisted on by the Appellant by devise of his estates, but we find no such devise in the instrument which he has executed.

An additional difficulty in holding the estate of the widow of Blowance Kishore to be divested may, perhaps, be found in the doctrine of Hindoo law, that the husband and wife are one, and that as long as the wife survives, one-half of the husband survives; but it is not necessary to press this objection.

[313] Upon the whole, we must humbly report to Her Majesty our opinion on the original appeal that the Plaintiff's suit ought to be dismissed; but, inasmuch as the main expense of it has been occasioned by the Appellant setting up a state of facts which has turned out to be untrue, and disputing the facts alleged by the Respondents, which have been established, we think that no costs should be awarded to either party of the suit or of the original appeal. The cross-appeal is wholly groundless, and we must advise that it be dismissed with costs.

The several Orders and decrees complained of, so far as they are inconsistent with the above recommendations, must be reversed.

MUTUSAWMY JAGAVERA YETTAPA NAIKER,—Appellant: VENCATASWARA YETTIA,—Respondent * [Nov. 27, 1865].

On appeal from the High Court at Madras.

Special leave to appeal granted, notwithstanding that no application had been made for such leave to the Court below: upon the allegation, that though the amount decreed was much under the appealable value, the original demand being necessarily limited by the jurisdiction of the Court in which the suit was originally instituted, yet the subject matter at issue exceed in value the appealable amount.

This was a petition for leave to appeal from a decree of the High Court at Madras, dated the 3rd [314] of January, 1865, which affirmed a decree of the Civil Court of Tinnevely of the 31st of March, 1864, awarding to the Plaintiff (the Respondent), as the illegitimate son of the Appellant's eldest brother, a former Zemindar of Yettiapooram, an annual maintenance of Rs. 2500 from the villages forming the private property of the present Zemindar's family. The Defendant (the present Appellant) disputed the Plaintiff's claim, alleging that he was not the illegitimate son of the late Zemindar, that his mother was a dancing woman (wearing Botter on her neck) attached to a Pagoda at Kalugumalia, situate within the Zemindary; this Botter being different from Tally (nuptial mark), worn by married women among Hindoos, and he insisted that she was a Dasee, or woman of caste, cohabiting with several men.

It appeared that the suit was originally instituted by the Respondent in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Tinnevely, praying that a decree might be passed, awarding to him and his heirs, on account of their maintenance, Rs. 8400 per annum, to be paid from the income of the Zemindary. That Court, on the 11th of November, 1863, dismissed the suit with costs, whereupon the Respondent appealed to the Civil Court of Tinnevely, which reversed that decision and decreed to the Respondent an annual sum of Rs. 2500 for maintenance, being the largest sum that Court had jurisdiction to award, which decree was affirmed on appeal by the High Court at Madras. The present Petitioner, the Zemindar of Yettiapooram, applied to that Court for a review of the decree of the 3rd of January, 1865, which application was rejected with costs.

No application was made by the Petitioner to the High Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in [315] Council, inasmuch as he was advised that, the judgment being only for Rs. 2500 (though the real value of the annuity was much beyond that sum, and exceeded Rs. 10,000, the appealable value), applications for leave to appeal had, under similar circumstances, been refused both by the Sudder and High Court, on the ground that those Courts were bound by the actual amount of the judgment. The Petitioner, therefore, now applied direct to Her Majesty in Council for special leave to appeal, stating various points of law involved in the suit, which affected the caste, or status, of the parties; he, moreover, urged that the suit having been originally brought in the Court of the Sudder Ameen, which Court was prohibited from entertaining any suit where the sum at issue exceeded Rs. 2500, he was precluded from availing himself of important evidence in that Court, or bringing the same before the High Court, and submitting to that Court many questions of fact and law affecting both the status and claim of the Plaintiff, and from bringing the same ultimately on appeal before Her Majesty in Council; and he insisted, that it was worthy of the gravest consideration, whether a Plaintiff by instituting a suit in an inferior Court for a sum below the appealable value, Rs. 10,000, to Her Majesty in Council, when the amount at issue was really of much greater value, as in this case, should by such means be enabled to exclude an appeal against a judgment of the High Court, if the case should be carried there.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), with whom was Mr. W. W. Jackson, for the Petitioner.—This is a very important application. The circum-[316]stances disclosed in the petition show abundant grounds for the allowance of the indulgence we ask for. The question at issue involves important points of law, affecting not only the interests of the parties claiming and disputing the right to the annuity sued for, but questions of caste and status of the utmost importance in India. In the case of Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 103), though the amount was under the appealable value, this Court gave special leave to appeal on the ground that an important point of law was involved. It did not there appear that any application for leave to appeal had been made to the Court below, the Supreme Court at Calcutta. In the cases of Maharajah Sutteeschunder Roy v. Guneschunder (Ib. 164), Gooroopersad Khoond v. Juggutchunder (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 166), the principles upon which the Courts in India are to estimate the appealable value prescribed by the Order in Council of the 10th of April, 1838, were distinctly stated by this Court; in both these cases it was held that where interest was by the decree to be added to the principal sum decreed, and the aggregate amount exceeded Rs. 10,000, the case was within the appealable value, and leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council was given. But that course could not be followed in this case, because there was nothing to add to the decree which would raise it to the appealable value. In the case of Sree Mutty Ranee Surnomoyee v. Maharajah Sutteeschunder Roy (Ib. 165), an estate, the subject of the suit, was charged with a fixed annual quit-rent of Rs. 64, with the Sudder Court decreed with a declaration of the right of the Plaintiff to an enhanced rent of Rs. 822. 13a. It was held by the Court that the value of the subject-[317]matter in suit, in the circumstances, ought to be estimated as amounting to Rs. 10,000; and upon special petition leave was given to appeal. That is exactly our case. The annuity charged by the decree of the High Court upon our Zemindary, though of the annual value only of Rs. 2500, is, in the aggregate, of far greater value than Rs. 10,000, the appealable value under the Order in Council. There is another consideration which ought, we apprehend, to entitle us to the indulgence asked for. The suit was originally instituted in the Court of the Sudder Ameen; the jurisdiction of that Court is limited by Mad. Reg. III. of 1833, sec. 4, to suits under Rs. 2500. The appeal from that Court, is to the Sudder, now the High Court, but the sum claimed and decreed being under the appealable value from that Court, no appeal can be granted by the High Court to Her Majesty in Council, and thus, though the aggregate amount at issue is far above the appealable value, the suit being really of the value of an annuity of Rs. 2500, yet by suing but for one year's annuity, and in a Court not having jurisdiction above the sum of Rs. 2500, the Defendant in the Court below is ultimately precluded from bringing an appeal to Her Majesty in Council, though the decision against him involves not only an amount exceeding in value the requisite sum, but concludes questions of title and law which cannot be satisfactorily raised before the inferior Court or brought before the High Court.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. C. P. Phillips, opposed the application.

There are no grounds for this application. The question before the Courts below was one of fact and [318]not of law; and the only question that can be brought here, if this appeal is allowed, is a question of fact upon the evidence. The facts lie in a very narrow compass, taking them even from the statement for the petition. The Respondent, the Defendant in the original suit, is the Zemindar of Yettiapooram, inheriting immediately from his brother Venkataswara, the last Zemindar. In 1854 the Petitioner's mother brought a suit in the Court of the Sudder Ameen of Tinnevely against the Respondents, on behalf of her son, to recover possession of a village, part of the Zemindary, which she claimed as a gift from Kumura, a previous Zemindar. This gift was, however, declared void for want of registration, and her claim was defeated. In September, 1863, the Petitioner brought the present suit against the Respondent for an allowance of Rs. 8400 for maintenance. The defence pleaded was that already stated, and the only issue raised was as to the status of the Petitioner's mother and his paternity. No other issue was stated or applied for, and upon that issue the suit was dismissed. On the appeal to the Sudder Court the Petitioner raised no objection to the issues, but adduced further evidence of his claim, and no fresh point was raised or insisted on, as was open to him before that Court. The High Court, when the appeal came before them, proceeded on the same grounds. There is, therefore, no pretence for saying that there are important questions of law which could not be raised in the Courts below, and can be determined here. If there had been any decision by the Court of the Sudder Ameen contrary to law or usage, it might, and, for aught we know, was brought before the High Court, under the provisions of the Code of 1859, art. viii. ch. x. sec. [319]372-5. Then, with regard to the sum at issue not being of sufficient value to allow of an application to the High Court for leave to appeal, if the Petitioner is right in his calculation, it was much above Rs. 10,000, and at least the fact of such value ought to have been brought before the High Court, and an application made to that Court for leave to appeal, the omission to make which, under the circumstances, is fatal to this application. The observations regarding the institution of the suit in the Court of the Sudder Ameen cannot prevail to the prejudice of the Respondent. The Court of the Sudder Ameen was the proper and only Court in which the claim could be made in the first instance, and it is no ground for applying for liberty to appeal here that that Court, which is limited by law to claims of a certain amount, took cognizance, as it was bound to do, of this claim, and rejected it.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford. Their Lordships have had considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion in this case. They consider, under the peculiar circumstances, that leave to appeal ought to be given. They have no doubt that substantial questions of law are involved in the case, and therefore, upon that ground, if there were no other, their Lordships might be disposed to come immediately to a conclusion in favour of the application now made to them. But the great difficulty of the case arises from the rule with regard to the necessity of applying to the High Court in India before coming here for leave to appeal. Some years ago various petitions came before their Lordships asking for leave to appeal where that preliminary form of applying to the Court [320] below had not been pursued, upon the ground that the Sudder Court had expressed an opinion with regard to the mode of estimating the value of the subject of dispute, confining the parties to the actual sum claimed, and intimating that they would certainly adhere to such estimate; applications were, therefore, made direct to Her Majesty in Council, the Petitioners alleging that they were precluded from applying to the Court below, because in such circumstances that Court would certainly consider the subject-matter under the appealable value of Rs. 10,000.

In the case of Maharajah Sutteeschunder Roy v. Guneschunder, that was cited from 8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 164, which was a judgment given by Lord Justice Turner, upon several applications similar to that now before us, their Lordships gave leave to appeal, but they stated that it must be understood in similar circumstances that application ought always to be made to the Court below, and that that Court was bound to give leave to appeal in cases in which the specified amount of Rs. 10,000 could be reached, though only as it there appeared by the addition of interest subsequent to the decree; and it was essential that such an application should be made to the Court below before coming here. Since those decisions, and very recently, an application was made to this Court for leave to appeal, where there had been no previous application to the Sudder Court below, and their Lordships expressed very strongly their determination to adhere to the rule so laid down by them, and not to grant leave to appeal in future, unless there had been such previous application made to the Court in India, and they refused that application. That decision would of course be binding upon their [321] Lordships now, and would compel them to say on the present application that, as there had been no application for leave to appeal to the High Court, therefore the Petitioner's application to this Court ought not to be entertained, and no leave given to appeal. But there are very peculiar circumstances in this case. The suit was instituted in the Sudder Ameen's Court, which has no jurisdiction in any demand above Rs. 2500. Supposing that, upon the face of the plaint, it appeared the demand was really beyond the value of Rs. 2500, it was competent to the Defendant to have pleaded to the jurisdiction of the Court; but no such course was taken, and a decision having been given, and an appeal made to the High Court, both parties proceed on the footing and upon the admission that the sum in dispute is under Rs. 10,000, the appealable amount to Her Majesty in Council.

Supposing, therefore, that an application had been made to the High Court for leave to appeal, it would not have been competent to the parties, in this state of circumstances, to turn round and say the value was above Rs. 10,000; and if not so, the High Court would have no power to give leave to appeal.

Therefore, under these very peculiar circumstances, which distinguish this case from those which have been previously determined, their Lordships grant leave to appeal here, reserving of course to the Respondent liberty to apply upon the subject of costs, in case the appeal should not be prosecuted.

[As to special leave to appeal, see note to Retemeyer v. Obermuller, 1837, 2 Moo. P.C. 125. For subsequent proceedings see 12 Moo. Ind. App. 203.]

[322] NAWAB SIDHEE NUZUR ALLY KHAN. Appellant; RAJAH
OOJOODHYARAM KHAN. Respondent * [Nov. 28, 1865].

On appeal from the High Court of Bengal.

Application to stay proceedings in a cause in which an appeal from an Order in the nature of an interlocutory Order is pending before Her Majesty in Council, ought satisfactorily to show that a serious injury will be the result to the party applying, unless the delay asked for be granted, and that the party applying has come promptly to make the application.

Where, therefore, an Appellant from an Order of the High Court of Judicature which remitted a cause, appealed to that Court from the Zillah Court, back for the trial of issues framed in accordance with the provisions of Act No. 8, of 1859, s. 139, having failed in obtaining an Order from the High Court to stay proceedings in the Zillah Court, pending the appeal, but not having appealed from that decision; presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council praying that all proceedings in the remanded suit might be stayed till the appending appeal had been heard; the Judicial Committee, without determining the question of their right to interfere in such circumstances, held that the Petitioner had not shown any such injury, or used such expedition as entitled him to ask for a stay of proceedings.

Quære, whether, where an Order has been made by the Superior Court below refusing to stay proceedings, and such Order is not specially appealed from, the Judicial Committee have any authority to interfere, though an appeal is pending before them from a previous Order of the Superior Court made in the same suit, remitting the cause back to the inferior Court before which it is pending.

This was an application to stay proceedings in a suit instituted in the Zillah Court of Midnapore, in which an appeal had been interposed from an interlocutory Order, to the Sudder Court (afterwards the [323] High Court of Judicature) at Fort William, Bengal, and that Court, after a hearing and rehearing, remanded back to the Zillah for trial on the merits.

The circumstances as they were stated in the petition of the Appellant, were these: On the 30th of May, 1860, a plaint was filed in the Civil Court of Zillah, Midnapore, by the Respondent against the Appellant and others to recover possession as mortgagor of certain Pergunnahs, therein specified, charging the Appellant and other Defendants with fraud and collusion in obtaining possession of the Pergunnahs, and for the sum of Rs. 2,27,000, the alleged mesne profits.

The Defendants put in answers to the plaint, and on the 10th of November, 1860, the cause came before the Zillah Judge, who framed issues of law and fact in pursuance of the provisions of s. 139, Act No. 8, of 1859. On the 19th of November, 1860, the first hearing of the suit took place before the same Judge, who gave judgment on the issues directed, in favour of the Appellants, and dismissed the plaint.

The Respondent appealed from this judgment to the Sudder Court at Calcutta, and on the 1st of June, 1863, the High Court, having been substituted for the Sudder Court, reversed the judgment of the Zillah Court at Midnapore and remanded the suit back to that Court for trial upon the merits.

The Appellant applied for and obtained a re-hearing by the High Courts, which, on the 12th of January, 1864, affirmed its previous judgment and decree: whereupon the Appellant petitioned for and obtained leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council from such decree and judgment. The Appellant, in his petition to the High Court for leave to appeal against the before-mentioned decree and judgment, [324] prayed that until his appeal (for leave to present which he was then petitioning) should be heard, or decided, or until the further Order of the High Court, all further proceedings in the High Court and in the Zillah Court of Midnapore should be stayed ; and on the 16th of June obtained an order nisi calling on the Respondent to show cause why the hearing of the suit under the aforesaid order of remand should not be postponed, pending the result of the appeal to Her Majesty in Council, which Order, on cause being shown, was discharged on the 25th of August, 1865. No appeal was asked for or interposed from this Order of dismissal, but the Appellant, believing, as he stated in his petition, that he would be put to great trouble and inconvenience, and would be forced to incur great expense in and about obtaining the evidence, which he had been advised and believed, would be necessary to give on his behalf at the trial, and being advised and believing that the determination by the trial of the issues in fact raised in the suit would be wholly immaterial as regarded the result of the suit, if he succeeded in his appeal to Her Majesty in Council, which he had been advised and believed he should do, and believed that the trial of the remanded suit would be proceeded within the Zillah Court, pending the hearing of his appeal, presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council, praying that an early day might be appointed for the hearing of the appeal, and that all proceedings in the remanded suit might be stayed until the pending appeal should have been heard and decided.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer) with whom was Mr. A. Stevenson, now moved to stay proceedings.

It is necessary to state shortly the facts of this case. [325] The suit is one for possession by redemption of certain mortgaged Pergunnahs which have been sold at a sale purporting to have been a revenue sale, which, as we say, by reason of collusion and fraud, was a fictitious sale. We claim to redeem these Pergunnahs, and for an account of mesne profits. The sale is alleged to have been for Government arrears of revenue, which we say were purposely allowed to fall in arrear, and the sale, instead of being a public, was, by the fraud and collusion of the parties, really a private one. It was urged against us that we were barred by the Ben. Regulation of Limitations, III. of 1793, sec. 14 ; but as we allege fraud and collusion, we claim exemption from that Regulation, and insist on our right to come in under cls. 1, 3, sec. 3, Reg. II. of 1805, which allows sixty years to bring an action. The issues directed by the Zillah Judge go directly to these points, and if determined on the appeal in our favour, will dispose of the case ; that, therefore, is a reason sufficient to induce this Court to stay the proceedings below. The issues of fact, moreover, if found against us at the trial, would, on the points there stated, exclude us from any benefit we may derive from a decision in our favour on the appeal. We only ask that the trial may be postponed till the appeal has been heard ; we are ready to proceed with the appeal immediately.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, opposed.

This is an unprecedented application. It is quite irregular for the other side to go into the facts or merits of the case. Neither is this Court, nor are we ourselves, sufficiently informed of the facts to come to any conclusion. We know nothing of the merits, and this Court has no materials before it to enable [326] your Lordships to say on what grounds you could order a stay of the proceedings. What claim has the Appellant to such an indulgence ? The decree of foreclosure which is now sought indirectly to impeach was pronounced so long ago as on the 16th of November, 1852, there was no appeal from that judgment, and the present proceedings are long subsequent. Even admitting the dates as stated by the Appellant in his petition, the final judgment on the rehearing was pronounced on the 12th of January, 1864, and though appealed, the appeal was not prosecuted ; nor was the Order nisi which is now sought to be incorporated as part of the proceedings applied for, or obtained before June in the same year ; there has been no diligence, therefore, if that could be urged as a ground for granting this application. But the consequences to the Respondent, if the proceedings are stayed, may be more unjust and injurious. Evidence both oral and documentary may be lost, witnesses may die, and all the other casualties that impede a cause may intervene. There is, moreover a fatal objection, as we apprehend, to the application. It is an appeal against an Order of the High Court which discharged the Order nisi of the 16th of June, 1864, from which no appeal was either asked for or asserted. The only appeal pending in this Court is from the decree of the 1st of June, 1863, confirmed by the judgment of the 12th of January, 1861, and we submit that independent of the want of merits, this Court has no jurisdiction to review an order not appealed from.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—Their Lordships have not entered into the consideration of the merits of this case, nor will they [327] decide any question with regard to the right or authority which they may have to interfere by ordering a stay of proceedings in the circumstances of these cases: but they decide upon this petition entirely upon these grounds: that any application for a stay of proceedings must be founded upon two points, which are essential to sustain the application: first, that a serious injury will be the result to the party applying unless the stay of proceedings is granted, and secondly, that the party has come promptly to make the application for delay.

Now, with regard to any suggested injury which may arise to the Petitioner in case the delay asked for is not granted, there is no ground whatever for supposing that any such injury will be sustained. All that he can allege is, that he may be put to costs upon the trial of these issues of facts remitted to the Zillah Court, supposing ultimately the decision of their Lordships on the appeal now pending in this Court should be in his favour, upon the questions of law which it is said are raised therein. But the answer to that objection, if it be one, is, that if the Petitioner is put to costs improperly, those costs will ultimately fall on the Respondent; while, on the other hand, the situation in which the Respondent would be placed, if their Lordships were to grant this application, must be considered, because there might be very great danger of his losing evidence, parol and documentary, if the delay asked for were granted. Therefore, with respect to any supposed injury which would arise from the cause being allowed to take its course, and the issues of fact allowed to be tried in due form in the Zillah Court of Midnapore, there is no pretence for saying that any such injury will arise.

[328] Then, has the Petitioner come promptly with his application? which is another essential requisite of an application for delay or for a stay of proceedings in any case.

The appeal to the High Court of Judicature was decided finally on the 12th of January, 1861: and on the 10th of February, 1861, there was a petition for leave to appeal, and no application to stay proceedings made till the month of June, 1865. The delay was endeavoured to be accounted for from the Respondent having objected to the leave to appeal, on the ground that the six months ought to be dated from the date of the original decree, and not from the order on review: but that really appears to their Lordships to be no explanation at all, at least no satisfactory explanation of the delay which has taken place, of sixteen or eighteen months before this application to stay proceedings is made.

Under these circumstances, there being no proof of any serious injury which would be sustained by the Petitioner, by their Lordships, supposing they have the power to interfere, not interfering to stay the proceedings, and on the other hand, the Petitioner not having come, as rightly and properly he ought to have done, promptly with this application to stay the proceedings below, their Lordships think this petition ought to be dismissed, and with costs (see upon this point, Rajah Perludh Sein v. Baboo Bhoodoo Singh, 10 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 78).

[329] MAHARANEE INDERJEET KOOAR,—Appellant; MUSSUMATH ISMUDH KOONWUR and SOONNETT KOONWUR,—Respondents * [Nov. 30, Dec. 1, 1865].

By a Razinamah executed in the year 1824, a compromise of a suit was entered into, whereby the respective rights of A. and B. in their father's (C.'s) real and personal estate were declared. C. was entitled to a tax levied on Pilgrims resorting to a Temple situate on his estate. This tax was abolished by Government in the year 1840, and a perpetual annual money payment awarded by the Government to C. as compensation. On the death of C. a partition of his estate was made between A. and B., by assigning to each certain Mehals according to their supposed value, in respect of their proportions of the shares provided by the Razinamah of 1824. This partition did not include the compensation for the pilgrim tax. Government in dealing with the annual compensation money deducted the amount from the jumma paid by A. and B. for the Mehals, which led to disputes as to the value of the Mehals so taxed and apportioned between A. and B. Held (1), that the annual compensation-tax was to be treated as part of the assets of C., and to be received by A. and B., in the proportions agreed to by the Razinamah [10 Moo. Ind. App. 332, 333]; and (2), that the mode of remission by Government from the jumma, in respect of the Mehals, by the appropriation of the compensation-money, did not affect the rights of the parties [10 Moo. Ind. App. 337].

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

As the Respondents did not appear, the appeal was heard ex parte, and was argued by Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellant.

[330] Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—This is an appeal from four decrees of the Sudder Court of Calcutta, reversing four decrees of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Zillah Behar in favour of Maharajah Hetnarain Singh, whose widow and heiress is the Appellant. The Respondents are the widows and heiresses of the late Modnarain Singh, who was the brother of Hetnarain Singh, and the Plaintiff in one and Defendant in three of the suits in which the decrees now under appeal were made.

The four suits involved the same question, which is shortly and accurately stated in the Appellant's case as follows:—

“Whether Hetnarain Singh and Modnarain Singh were entitled to the annual sum of Rs. 17,212 9a. 5p., in the proportions of 9-16ths and 7-16ths respectively, in accordance with the contention of Hetnarain Singh, or in the proportions of the amounts of Sudder jumma payable by them respectively on account of the nineteen Mehals in the pleadings mentioned in accordance with the contention of Modnarain Singh.”

The two brothers were sons of the Maharajah Mitterjeet Singh, who died on the 3rd of October, 1840. During the lifetime of the Maharajah an agreement was entered into for a division of the property between his two sons after his death. The particulars of this agreement are stated in a former suit between the brothers, which was brought by appeal before their Lordships and is reported in Moore's Ind. App. Cases, Vol. 7, p. 312, to this effect:—“Family dissensions having arisen during the lifetime of Mitterjeet Singh, certain proceedings [331] were instituted, and on the appeal to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut in a suit in which Mitterjeet Singh and the Appellant and Respondent were parties, a compromise was entered into and a Razinamah and Iknarnamah, dated the 7th of February, 1824, was filed by Mitterjeet Singh, which instrument was to the effect, that the real and personal estates held by him after his death were to be divided between the Appellant and the Respondent. The former was to take a 9 annas share and the latter a 7 annas share. Partition deeds of the same tenor were also filed, and on the 4th of March, 1824, the Sudder Court decreed that the parties should act up to the terms entered into by them in the above-mentioned instruments."

The Maharajah was entitled to a tax levied upon Pilgrims resorting to the Temple at Gya. This tax was abolished by the Government in the month of January, 1840, and a compensation was awarded to the Maharajah in lieu of it in the shape of a perpetual annual payment of Rs. 17,212, 9a. 5p. The grant of this compensation was the subject of a Government letter of the 16th January, 1840, which, unfortunately, is not printed in the proceedings.

On the death of the Maharajah, his property, whether moveable or immoveable had to be divided between the sons according to the proportions of ninesixteenths and seven-sixteenths, settled by the agreement and decree of 1824. And the compensation tax, as part of that property, was divisible in these proportions. His immoveable property, which was very extensive, consisted partly of nineteen Mehals which were held by him in severalty, and partly of Mehals which he held conjointly with other persons.

Disputes arose between his sons immediately [332] after his death. The Commissioner of the District intervened and induced them to make a partition of the immoveable property. Under his advice, and with his approbation, deeds of partition were executed on the 30th of December, 1840, and that which was executed by Modnarain specifies the different villages which fell to the lot of Hetnarain and Modnarain respectively; and also the sums which each, as between him and his brother, was bound to pay in respect of the Sudder jumma, or Government revenue. The partition, however, was not made upon the principal of dividing each Mehal, with the burthen of the public revenue assessed thereon, in the proper proportions, but of assigning certain villages and parcels according to their real or supposed value to each share, so as to give to Hetnarain nine-sixteenths in value, and to Modnarain seven-sixteenths in value of the whole immoveable property. In consequence of this mode of division, in six out of the nineteen Mehals which had been held by Mitterjeet Singh in severalty, Modnarain took more than a nine annas share (his share in some of them being absolutely much larger than that of his brother), with the liability of having to pay a corresponding share of the public revenue assessed on those Mehals. This deed of partition, which was confined to immoveable property, made no mention of the compensation for the Pilgrims' tax; and the jumma, or revenue, stated therein to be chargeable on the different Mehals, and to be apportioned between the brothers as therein mentioned, was the full amount of jumma assessed upon them under the perpetual Settlement. It follows, then, that as far as this partition went, the compensation [333] for the Pilgrims' tax was not included therein, and presumably continued to be part of the assets of Mitterjeet Singh divisible between his sons in the proportion of nine to seven annas.

In Mitterjeet Singh's lifetime the payment of this annuity would have been very simple; he had annually to pay a very large sum (upwards of three lacs of Rupees) for Government revenue, and would naturally have retained the Rs. 17,212 by way of deduction or set-off. It would seem, however, that in his life-time, or very shortly after his death, the Revenue authorities of the District entertained the notion of putting, in some way or other, this payment against the Sudder jumma, in respect of the nineteen Mehals held by him in severalty, distributing the whole sum of Rs. 17,212 amongst the different Mehals according to the jumma assessed upon them respectively. This appears from the letter of the Accountant of the Revenue department, which purports to be in answer to a letter from the Collector of the 22nd October, 1840, which is not in evidence. The Accountant's letter is dated the 26th December, 1840, and is in these terms: "I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 344 of the 22nd October last, and with reference to the seventh paragraph thereof, I beg to acquaint you that on examining the items rateably distributed by you among the several Mehals in your statement, trifling errors have been discovered to exist in almost every item. I accordingly transmit herewith a copy of your statement with an additional column added to it, showing the calculations made in this office, agreeably to which you will have the goodness to allow the remissions in favour of the several Mehals. I have [334] used the term remissions, though, as far as the course of entry is concerned, with the settlement with the Rajah will render necessary, no remissions in account will appear; for the compensation in question to the Rajah's heirs you will be pleased to recollect will have to be charged under the head of sayer compensation, subordinate to pensions, the charge being balanced by a distinct credit per contra to land revenue (the estates being in your District Towjee). This course of entry you will observe will prevent you from exhibiting the transaction in account as a 'remission.'"

By a proceeding, dated the 23rd of March, 1841, the Collector directed that effect should be given to the letter of the Accountant, and that the Rs. 17,212. 9a. 5p., should be credited on the 1st of April of the current, and of every future year, to the Mouzahs of each lot, as was specified in the letter of the Accountant, that is, on the list of Mehals annexed to it; but it appears that in April, 1841, and again on the 31st of March, 1842, a warrant was written for the whole sum of Rs. 17,212. 9a. 5p., and this settlement of accounts was, therefore, in the nature of a set-off of one independent demand against another, and did not imply the permanent remission or deduction of part of the jumma originally assessed on the several Mehals.

On the 6th of June, 1842, the Secretary of the Government wrote to the Accountant that the remission of the Rs. 17,212. 9a. 5p. was to be adjusted by reduction of the jumma. The letter is in the following terms:—"With reference to the communication made to your office from this department under date the 16th of January, 1840, I am directed to inform you that the Honourable the Deputy-Governor [335] of Bengal has this day been pleased to determine that the remission granted to Rajah Mitterjeet Singh shall be adjusted by a reduction of the Sudder jummas of the estates, recorded in his name on the Behar Collector's Towjee." And a letter to this effect, of the date of 14th of June, 1842, was sent to the Collector of Behar. Whether that Court was right in this statement, their Lordships, not having the letter of the 16th of January before them, are unable to determine.

This order of June, 1842, for adjusting the remission by a reduction of the jumma, apparently rendered a change in the mode of stating the accounts necessary: but, in fact, no alteration was made in them down to the year 1850. This appears from a letter to the Collector of Behar of the 17th of September, 1850. Part of that letter is in these terms: "As regards the mode of adjusting the remission still observed by you, I beg to remark that instructions from this office based upon the orders of Government of the 6th of June, 1842, were, under date the 14th idem, issued to you, wherein you were requested to account for the remission by a reduction of the Sudder jumma of the estates recorded in the name of Rajah Mitterjeet Singh on the Towjee of your District, which instructions apparently set aside those contained in letter, No. 426 of the 26th December, 1840. It would seem that after this communication the Government accounts were kept in accordance with the Government letter of the 6th of June, 1842, which is obviously treated as having introduced a mode of accounting for the compensation for the Pilgrims' tax differing from that established by the Accountant's letter of the 26th of [336] December, 1840, in that it proceeded less upon the principle of set-off, and more directly upon that of remission of revenue. Assuming, however, that the order so to deal with the compensation was within the competence of Government, as a direction to their Officers for the more convenient mode of keeping their accounts, or otherwise, how could that affect the rights of Hetnarain Singh and Modnarain Singh, inter se?

The Government might keep their accounts in any manner they pleased, but the Rs. 17,212, would still continue to be the property of the brothers in the settled proportions, unless they acquiesced in the course adopted by the Government, and acted upon it in such a way as to indicate a fresh agreement between them. Now, there is no evidence that Hetnarain Singh ever assented to this arrangement, or that he ever agreed to alter the proportions in which the property was originally divided. On the contrary, on the 15th of April, 1843 (and no action can have been taken on the letter of June, 1842, until the 1st of April, 1843), he presented a petition to the Collector, in which he complained of his being called upon to pay a larger sum than was due from him for the jumma, and praying relief. That petition was rejected. He then appealed to the Commissioner, and the Commissioner, in refusing to interfere said: "It appears that the Malikanah allowance has been rateably credited to the revenue of the Mehals of both the parties. If there is a diminution in their respective shares as opposed to the fixed allotment of share, let them adjust the differences among themselves: Government has nothing to do with this. The Collector is to communicate this to both the parties."

[337] Accordingly, from the date of this order until the commencement of these suits in 1853, Hetnarain Singh continued to assert his right to nine-sixteenths of the Rs. 17,212. Ja. 5p., by retaining so far as he could, out of the sums which under the partition he was bound to pay as his share of the jumma assessed in the different Mehals, his proportion of the remission allowed in respect of each particular Mahal. The suit of Modnarain Singh is brought to recover the sums which, according to his contention, were in this manner improperly retained by Hetnarain Singh in satisfaction of his full proportion of the remissions allowed in respect of three of the Mehals, whilst the three suits of Hetnarain Singh are for the recovery from Modnarain Singh of the differences between the sums actually returned by him, and his full nine-sixteenths of the remissions allowed in respect of three other Mehals. The deed of partition, as has already been shown, made no alteration in the original rights of the parties, and the observations of the Principal Sudder Ameen in this respect are perfectly correct. It is to be observed also that Modnarain Singh, in his plaint filed on the 8th of April, 1853, as to the three Mehals of which Hetnarain Singh had received his nine-sixteenths, does not found himself upon any new agreement between them, but upon the authority of the Government order of June, 1842. The ground upon which the Sudder Court proceeded in overruling the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen in the Appellant's favour was, that the parties were aware that the remission of the jumma had been made, and that there was a deduction from certain specified Mehals, and that the amount of remission from each of these Mehals had been ascertained and [338] determined, and that it was, therefore, a reasonable inference from the silence of the deed of partition on the subject, that the parties believed and were willing, that the amount of remission on each state, should be apportioned to the amount of Jumma, for which each of the contracting parties was responsible. There is, however, not the slightest proof that when the deed of partition was in preparation (the consent to an amicable adjustment in which it resulted having been given on the 24th December, 1840), or even at the time of the execution of the instrument on the 30th of December, 1840, the parties were aware of the mode in which the Government accounts had at that time been made out. The letter of the Revenue Accountant of the 26th of December, 1840, can hardly have reached the Collectorate of Behar before the 30th of December, and the proceeding of the Deputy-Collector shows that that letter was not taken into consideration by him until the 4th of January, 1841, and that no final orders were passed thereon until the 23rd of March, 1841. But even if the parties at the time when the deeds of partition were executed, had known of the letter of the 26th of December, 1840, they would have had no notice of the determination on the part of the Government to settle the account by way of reduction or remission of jumma. The arrangement was effected by the letter of Government of the 6th of June, 1842, and it is treated throughout the proceedings as differing materially from that contemplated in the letter of December, 1840. It is in the letter of 1842 that Modnarain Singh in his plaint founds his claim, and the sums which he sought to recover were those retained by Hetnarain Singh after the date of it.

[339] The Sudder Court puts the case of the sale for arrears of revenue of one of the lots on which a reduction of jumma had been allowed, and the danger of the Government revenue suffering from a doubt, whether the parties would consider themselves obliged to give up so much of a remission which they now enjoy, or would expect the Government to submit to the loss of revenue, consequent on treating the jumma on the Mahal as permanently reduced by the amount of the remission now allowed. But it is difficult to understand how, because in a supposable case the Government may be thrown into a state of uncertainty with respect to the mode of dealing with the reduction, this can have any influence on the rights of the parties between themselves.

Their Lordships are of opinion, that the view of the case taken by the Sudder Court cannot be adopted, but that the Rs. 17,212, was divisible between the brothers in the proportion of nine-sixteenths and seven-sixteenths, and that, in whatever mode the Government may think proper to deal with this sum with reference to the jumma, the rights of the parties cannot be affected without their consent, but will continue to be adjusted according to the proportions originally established.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly recommend Her Majesty to reverse the decrees of the Sudder Court in all the four suits, and to affirm the decrees of the Sudder Ameen in all those suits, with costs of the Court below and here.

[340] ALEXANDER JOHN FORBES,—Appellant; AMEEROONISSA BEGUM,—Respondent * [Dec. 7, 8, 9, 1865].

On Appeal from the High Court at Calcutta.

The law under the Bengal Regulations, and practice of the native Courts, in foreclosure proceedings, reviewed and considered.

Anterior to the year 1806, the rights of a holder of a Bye-bil-wuffa (Conditional sale), were enforceable according to the strict terms of the agreement. It was then necessary to pay the amount when due. By Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, a modification of this strict rule of the rights given to the holder of such a contract was introduced. The 7th section gives the Mortgagor a right of redemption within one year after an application by the Mortgagee to the Court under the 8th section of that Regulation. After such an application the Mortgagor must either pay or tender the money lent, or the balance then due, if any part of the principal has been discharged, and if the Mortgagee has not been in possession, any interests that may be due, or he must make a deposit pursuant to Ben. Reg. I. of 1798, sec. 2.

The general effect of these Regulations is, that if anything be due on the Mortgage, and the Mortgagor make no deposit, or an insufficient one, the right of redemption is gone at the expiration of the year of grace. But the title of the Mortgagee is not completed, he must bring a suit to recover possession, if he is out of possession, or obtain a declaration by the Court of his title if he is in possession, and in that suit the Mortgagor may contest the validity of the Conditional sale, or the regularity of the proceedings taken under Regulation XVII. of 1806, in order to make it absolute, or he may prove that nothing is due, or that the deposit is sufficient to cover what is due; but the issue, so far as the right of redemption is concerned, will be whether anything remained due to the Mortgagee at the end of the year of grace, and if so, whether the necessary deposit had been made. If that is found against the Mortgagor, the right of redemption is gone [10 Moo. Ind. App. 350, 351].

Held, upon the construction of sec. 11, Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793, that the production of accounts by a Mortgagee in possession seeking to foreclose cannot be called for when there is neither plea nor proof that the usufruct had liquidated the principal and interest, and where no deposit had been made to cover the balance admitted to be due.

The necessity for a Mortgagee in possession to produce his accounts arises:—

First, when the Mortgagor has deposited the principal money, leaving the question of interests to be settled by an adjustment of the account.

Secondly, when the Mortgagor has deposited all that he admits, or alleges, to be due; and,

Thirdly, when he pleads and undertakes to prove, that the whole of the principal and interests has been liquidated by the usufruct of the mortgaged premises.

It is not necessary to appeal from an Interlocutory Order which does not dispose of the cause. Such order can be impeached on appeal from the final decree [10 Moo. Ind. App. 359, 360].

This was a suit brought by the Appellant, a Mortgagee, for possession of a Talook and other real estates, which had been mortgaged to him by deeds of absolute sale and defeazance, constituting a Bye-bil-wuffa, or Conditional sale in the nature of a mortgage. The acting Judge of the Court of Zillah Purneah dismissed the suit, on the ground that the Mortgagee had failed to file and swear to accounts of his gross receipts [341] from the estates mortgaged and also of his expenditure for the management of it, while he was in possession as Mortgagee, and had the usufruct of the mortgaged estates according to the provisions of Ben. Regs. XV. of 1793, sec. 11, and I. of 1793, sec. 3; and that consequently the Court could not adjust the accounts between the parties and ascertain whether the mortgage loan and interests had or had not been liquidated from the rents and profits received by the Mortgagee within the prescribed time limited by the Bengal Regulations. The High Court at Calcutta affirmed this decree. Hence the present appeal.

The principal question raised by the appeal was, whether the proceedings taken by the Appellant under Ben. Regs. XV. of 1793, and XVII. of 1806, for the purpose of foreclosing the mortgage were regular.

In the Courts in India the Appellant contended that [342] he was not obliged to produce such account, first, because the lands mortgaged to him were not in his possession, but in that of his son, under a lease from the Mortgagor and a Kabooleat (counter lease) bearing even date with the mortgage deeds executed by the latter, and secondly, because he had only received as Mortgagee, under an assignment from the Mortgagor, the rent agreed to be paid by his son under the Kabooleat, in liquidation of interest, and that he had complied with the requirements of the Regulations by filing an account of the amounts received by him, from time to time, in respect of such rent.

The Bengal Regulations bearing upon these points are these:

By section XI. of Reg. XV. of 1793, it is enacted, that "For the adjustment of the accounts, in the cases of mortgages specified in section 10, where the Mortgagee shall have had the usufruct of the mortgaged property, the Mortgagee is to be required to deliver in the accounts of his gross receipts from the property mortgaged, and also of his expenditures for the management or preservation of it. The Mortgagee is to swear, or (if he be of the description of persons whom the Courts are empowered to exempt from taking oaths) to subscribe, a solemn declaration, that the accounts which he may deliver in are true and authentic. The Mortgagor is to be permitted to examine the accounts, and, after hearing any objections he may have to offer, or any evidence that either party may have to adduce respecting them, the Court is to adjust the account."

Section III. of Reg. I., 1798, enacts that, "In all instances wherein the lender on a Bye-bil-wuffa, or [343] similar Conditional sale, may have been put in possession of the land, and an adjustment of accounts may consequently become necessary between him and the borrower, the lender is to account to the borrower for the proceeds of the estate whilst in his possession, on the principles prescribed with regard to mortgages and interest in Regulation XV., 1793, as far as the same may be applicable to the nature of the case. But such part of section X. of the above Regulation, as directs that the mortgages therein referred to, are to be considered as cancelled and redeemed, whenever the principal sum, with the simple interests due upon it, shall have been realized from the usufruct of the mortgaged property, or otherwise liquidated by the Mortgagee, being inapplicable to the Conditional sales referred to in this Regulation, it is hereby declared not to apply thereto."

The course to be pursued with a view to the redemption or foreclosure of mortgages and Conditional sales is prescribed by Regulation XVII. of 1806, sec. 7. In addition to the provisions made in the Provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares, by Regulations I., 1798, and in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces by Regulation XXXIV., 1803, for the redemption of mortgages and Conditional sales of land, under deeds of Bye-bil-wuffa, Kutubaleh, or any similar designation, it is thereby provided, "that when the Mortgagee may have obtained possession of the land, on execution of the mortgage deed, or at any time before a final foreclosure of the mortgage, the payment or established tender of the sum lent under any such deed or mortgage and Conditional sale, or of the balance due if any part of the principal amount shall have been discharged; or when the Mortgagee may not [344] have been put in possession of the mortgaged property, the payment or established tender of the principal sum lent, with any interest due thereupon, shall entitle the mortgagor and owner of such property, or his legal representative, to the redemption of his property before the mortgage is finally foreclosed in the manner provided for by the following section; that is to say, at any time within one year (Bengal, Fusily, or Willaity, according to the era current where the mortgage may take place) from and after the application of the Mortgagee to the Zillah or City Court of Dewanny Adawlut for foreclosing the mortgage and rendering the sale conclusive in conformity with section 8, of this Regulation. Provided that such payment or tender be clearly proved to have been made to the lender and Mortgagee or his legal representative; or that the amount due deposited within the time above specified, in the Dewanny Adawlut of the Zillah or City in which the mortgaged property may be situated, as allowed for the security of the borrower and Mortgagor in such cases, by section 2, Regulation I., 1798, and section 12, Regulation XXXIV., 1803, the whole provisions contained in which sections, as applied therein to the stipulated period of redemption, are declared to be equally applicable to the extended period of one year, granted for an equitable right of redemption by this Regulation."

The Section VIII. of the same Regulation enacts, "Whenever the receiver or holder of a deed of mortgage and conditional sale, such as is described in the preamble and preceding sections of this Regulation, may be desirous of foreclosing the mortgage and rendering the sale conclusive on the expiration of the stipulated period, or at any time subsequent [345] before the sum lent is repaid, he shall (after demanding payment from the borrower or his representative) apply for that purpose by a written petition, to be presented by himself, or by one of the authorized Vakeels of the Court to the Judge of the Zillah or City in which the mortgaged land or other property may be situated. The Judge, on receiving such written application, shall cause the Mortgagor or his legal representative to be furnished, as soon as possible, with a copy of it; and shall at the same time notify to him, by a Perwannah under his seal and official signature, that if he shall not redeem the property mortgaged in the manner provided for by the foregoing section, within one year from the date of the notification, the mortgage will be finally foreclosed and the conditional sale will become conclusive."

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. W. H. Melvill, for the Appellant, contended, first, that as the mortgage had been foreclosed, and the sale to the Appellant had become absolute prior to the institution of the suit, the Appellant was entitled, as of course, to a decree for possession of the mortgaged estates; and secondly, that, under Ben. Reg. I. of 1793, sec. 3, it was not necessary for him as mortgagee to produce an account to entitle him to a decree for possession after foreclosure had taken place, under Ben. Reg. XVII. of 1806, secs. 1, 7, and 8.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Respondent, submitted, first, that the decree appealed from was [346] right, and that the Appellant was properly declared by the decree of the Zillah Judge to have been in possession and enjoyment of the usufruct of the lands mortgaged to him, and secondly, that he had failed to file attested accounts of his gross receipts and expenditure as mortgagee in possession, as required by Ben. Reg. XV. of 1793, secs. 2, 8, 9, 10.

As to the necessity of appealing from an interlocutory decree, which it was insisted could be opened on appeal from the final decree, Maharajah Moheshur Sing v. The Bengal Government (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 283; and see upon this point Jones v. Gough, 3 Moore's P.C. Cases, N.S., p. 12, where the cases on this point are collected) was cited.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir James W. Colvile (Feb. 1, 1866).—On the 13th of March, 1850, Shah Ally Reza, the late husband of the present Respondent, executed an instrument which, upon the face of it, purported to be an absolute Bill of sale of the Talook and lands therein described to the Appellant, in consideration of the sum of Rs. 39,500. On the same day the Appellant executed to Shah Ally Reza an Ikrah, or agreement, importing that on payment of the sum of Rs. 39,500 with interest at 12 per centum per annum on the 13th of March, 1851, the sale should be void; but that in the event of the seller's not paying the principal and interest according to his engagement, the Ikrah was to [347] be null and void, and the purchaser (the Appellant) was to become the absolute proprietor of the property.

The effect of these two instruments was simply to secure the repayment of the sums lent by the Appellant to Shah Ally Reza with interest on the day named, by means of that kind of mortgage which is known in India as Bye-bil-wuffa, or Conditional sale.

The transaction between the parties, however, included something more. On the 12th of March, the day before the date of the Bill of sale, Shah Ally Reza had granted a lease of the mortgaged premises for three years ostensibly to Mr. Alexander Demetrius Forbes, the son of the Appellant, and had taken the corresponding Kabooleat from him.

The latter shows that the lessee had bound himself, after paying the Government revenue and other charges on the lands, to pay to the lessor by way of rent for the Bengali year 1258, the sum of Rs. 2000; for the year 1259, Rs. 2332 9a. 6p.; and for the year 1260, Rs. 2399. 2a. 6p.

And, it appears on the face of the Ikrah, that Shah Ally Reza had given an order to the lessee to pay by instalments out of this rent to the Appellant the sum of Rs. 2101, in part satisfaction of Rs. 4740, which would become due on the 13th of March, 1851, for one year's interest on the Rs. 39,500.

It has been proved as a fact, and is not now disputed, that the grant of this beneficial lease was, what is called in India, a Benamee transaction; that though taken in the name of his son, it was really a lease to the Appellant, who under colour of it obtained possession of the mortgaged premises.

In April, 1851, the time fixed for the repayment of the mortgage money having expired, the Appellant [348] commenced the proceedings which must be taken in order to foreclose a mortgage of this kind, and make the Conditional sale absolute.

And the question on this appeal is, whether these proceedings have been effectual, or whether his suit has been properly dismissed by the decree of the Zillah Judge, confirmed by that of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

So many points touching the regularity of these proceedings have been raised at the Bar that it is desirable before going further to state what, in their Lordships' apprehension, the law of foreclosure as established by the Regulations and the practice of the Courts in Bengal, is.

Up to the year 1806, the rights of the holder of a Bye-bil-wuffa were enforceable according to the strict terms of the contract. It was necessary for the Mortgagee, if he wished to save his estate from forfeiture, to tender the amount due, or to pay it into Court, pursuant to the provisions of Regulation I. of 1798, within the stipulated period for the repayment of the loan.

Regulation XVII. of 1806, first introduced a modification of the strict rights given by the contract analogous to, though by no means identical with, that which Courts of Equity have long imposed on mortgages in this country. The 7th section of that Regulation extended the period within which the Mortgagor might redeem, to any time within one year from and after the application of the Mortgagee to the Zillah Court under the following section; the 8th, which provides that a Mortgagee desirous of foreclosing the mortgage and rendering the sale conclusive on the expiration of the stipulated period, or [349] at any time subsequent before the sum lent was repaid, should, after demanding payment from the borrower, or his representatives, apply for that purpose by a written petition to the Zillah Judge, who should cause the Mortgagor to be furnished with a copy of the application, and notify to him that if he did not redeem the property in the manner provided by the preceding section, within one year from the date of the notification, the mortgage would be finally foreclosed, and the Conditional sale made absolute.

Hence, when these proceedings have been had, it becomes incumbent on the Mortgagor to take within the year the steps towards redemption which are prescribed by the 7th section.

Within that period he must either pay or tender (and the proof of such payment or tender will lie on him) the sum lent, or the balance due if any part of the principal has been discharged, and also in the case in which the Mortgagee has not been put into possession of the mortgaged property, any interest that may be due; or (and this is the alternative commonly adopted) he must make a deposit pursuant to section 2 of Regulation I. of 1798.

The enactment, of which the object was to relieve Mortgagors seeking to redeem, from the difficulties of proving a tender, by enabling them to pay the proper amount into Court, thus prescribes what the deposit is to be. "When the lender has not obtained possession of the lands, the deposit is to be the principal sum lent, with the stipulated interest thereon; but if the lender has held possession of the land, the principal sum borrowed only need be deposited, leaving the interest to be settled on an adjustment of the lender's receipts and disbursements during the period he has [350] been in possession." In either of these cases the deposit preserves to the borrower his full right of redemption and entitles him to immediate possession of the land, if it is in the possession of the lender, subject to the adjustment of the accounts. A third case is then provided for as follows:—"If the borrower in any case shall deposit a less sum than above required, alleging that the sum so deposited is the total amount due to the lender for principal and interest, after deducting the proceeds of the lands in his possession, or otherwise, such deposit shall be received, and notice given to the lender as above directed; and if the amount so deposited be admitted by the lender, or be established on investigation, to be the total amount due to him, the right of redemption shall be considered to have been fully preserved to the borrower, who will not, however, in such cases be entitled to the recovery of the lands, until it be admitted or established that he has paid the full amount due from him." The 3rd section prescribes the manner in which the lender is to account in those cases in which an account shall be necessary.

The general effect of these Regulations is, that if anything be due on the mortgage and the Mortgagor makes an insufficient deposit, and a fortiori if he makes no deposit at all, the right of redemption is gone at the expiration of the year of grace. The title of the Mortgagee, however, is not even then complete. It was ruled by the Circular Order of the 22nd of July, 1813, No. 37, and has ever since been settled law, that the functions of the Judge under Regulation XVII. of 1806, sec. 8, are purely ministerial, and that a Mortgagee, after having done all that this Regulation requires to be done in order to foreclose [351] the mortgage and make the Conditional sale absolute, must bring a regular suit to recover possession if he is out of possession, or to obtain a declaration of his absolute title if he is in possession.

In that suit the Mortgagor may contest on any sufficient grounds the validity of the conditional sale, or the regularity of the proceedings taken under the Regulation in order to make it absolute. He may also allege and prove, if he can, that nothing is due, or that the deposit (if any) which he has made is sufficient to cover what is due; but the issue in so far as the right of redemption is concerned, will be whether anything at the end of the year of grace remained due to the Mortgagee, and if so, whether the necessary deposit had been then made. If that be found against the Mortgagor the right of redemption is gone.

It has been stated that the Appellant commenced his proceedings to foreclose under Regulation XVII. of 1806, the 5th April, 1851.

On the 31st of August, 1852, the Principal Sudder Ameen of the Zillah, in whose Court these proceedings had been had, made an Order which, after stating all that had taken place, including the claims of certain third parties, concluded thus:—"Forasmuch as the term of one year has expired from the date of the issue of notice, and the Mortgagor has not deposited the amount of the mortgage, and that the plea of the before-mentioned third parties is not cognizable in this miscellaneous case, therefore, considering that Regulation XVII. of 1806, has been complied with, it is ordered that this suit be decided, and that the papers of the case be forwarded to the Judge's Court."

Upon this, on the 28th of January, 1853, the [352] Appellant commenced this suit in order to complete his title under the foreclosure. Treating, however, the lease to his son as a subsisting lease to that person, and himself as out of possession, he asked to have possession decreed to him, together with mesne profits from the 13th of March, 1851, calculated upon the rent reserved by the lease.

The answer of Shah Ally Reza, after raising a question touching the sufficiency of the stamp, which it is not necessary to consider here, alleged by way of defence, that the Appellant before filing his petition for foreclosure in the Zillah Court had not made the demand required by law; and after stating the circumstances under which the lease was granted, insisted that by virtue thereof the Appellant had fraudulently held possession of the mortgaged property in his son's name. And in order to show what was the value of this possession, the answer contains a passage which after stating the gross revenue of the various portions of the mortgaged property, amounting in all to Rs. 9601 7a. 2p., and the charges thereon amounting in all to Rs. 3931 9a. 4p., proceeds thus, "There remains Rs. 5666 13a. 10p., as annual profits. Out of this amount, deducting Rs. 4740 as interests due on the principal, the remaining sum of Rs. 926 13a. 10p. must have been annually received by the Plaintiff on account of the said amount of principal." The answer also insisted, that the Appellant was bound to render an account in conformity with sections 10 and 11 of Regulation XV. of 1793, and that the Bye-bil-wuffa had been vitiated by the fact of his having realized the whole of the interest as well as a portion of the principal from the profits of the mortgaged property; and that the Appellant was bound to render [353] an account in order that the Court might be satisfied how much was due, and from whom.

The material issues settled by the Judge were: - First, whether the Plaintiff had performed the conditions prescribed by section 8 of Regulation XVII. of 1806, and was entitled to possession. Secondly, whether Plaintiff was or was not in possession. Thirdly, whether the claim for mesne profits was correct. Fourthly, whether the receipt by Plaintiff of interest on the purchase money invalidated the Bye-bil-wuffa.

The cause was tried by Mr. Loch, the Civil Judge of Purneah, on the 18th of December, 1854.

The principal point contested on the first issue was, whether there had been a sufficient demand, and this issue was found in the Plaintiff's favour. On the third and the last issues the Judge found that the lease was, in fact, taken by the Plaintiff, who must be taken to have been, under colour of it, in possession of the mortgaged property: but that, inasmuch as it was not attempted to show that the collections realized by the Plaintiff covered the principal and interest of the debt, and it was, in fact, admitted that when the notice under section 8 of Regulation XVII. of 1806 was filed, a balance was due, and that there was nothing to show that the Defendant had paid any part of it, the Bye-bil-wuffa was not invalidated, and that the Plaintiff was then absolutely entitled to the property. On the fourth issue he found, erroneously and inconsistently with his finding on the question of possession, that the claim for mesne profits was correct. The decree was for possession with the mesne profits claimed.

The Defendant, Shah Ally Reza, appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut. That Court by its Order, [354] dated the 22nd of January, 1857, held that the Civil Judge of Purneah had been wrong in decreeing wassilat, or mesne profits; and further, that as the Appellant had been found to have been in possession, he was bound, before he was entitled to have his Conditional sale made absolute, to render accounts, and to show that the loan had not been liquidated with interest from the usufruct of the property, and it remanded the case, in order that the Judge might call upon the Plaintiff for his accounts, and then, with reference to the above remarks, decide the case according to the results shown by them.

The case went back, the Plaintiff produced accounts, in which he charged himself, not with the gross collections, but with the rents reserved by the lease. The then Acting Judge (Mr. Brodhurst) held, that the accounts were insufficient, and that the proper accounts not having been produced he was precluded from deciding as to the balance due to the Plaintiff, and accordingly by his decree, dated the 29th of March, 1859, dismissed the suit.

Against this decree the Appellant appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, but that Court by its Order of the 21st of April, 1862, dismissed the appeal with costs; refusing to remand the cause again, in order to give the Appellant an opportunity of producing the proper accounts.

He afterwards applied for a review of judgment on affidavits directed to show that he had tendered the proper accounts in the Court below, but this application was also rejected with costs, on the 21st of January, 1863.

The present appeal is from the decrees dismissing the suit.

[355] The learned Counsel for the Respondent in the course of their able argument maintain the propriety of this dismissal upon various grounds, of which some do and some do not directly arise upon the decrees now under appeal. And it seems convenient to consider the latter in the first instance.

Mr. Rolt insisted, that inasmuch as it had been conclusively found that the Appellant was in possession of the mortgaged premises, and the plaint was, nevertheless, for possession and mesne profits; the form of the suit was of itself a sufficient ground for its dismissal. Such, however, was not the view taken in the Courts below. If it be granted that this point is raised, and it is not very clearly raised by the answer, it does not appear to have been among the grounds of the Respondent's appeal from Mr. Loch's decree, which, though not set out in extenso in the record, are noticed by the Sudder Court in its judgment of the 22nd of January, 1857. The objection, if made, was certainly not treated as a valid one by the Sudder Court; which did not dismiss the suit, but remanded it for re-trial on the production of the account. That remand implied that the Appellant might succeed. The real object of the suit is to perfect his title as absolute owner of the property; and their Lordships do not see why he should not have that relief, if he be otherwise entitled to it; because, under an erroneous view of the effect of the lease, he has asked for it by his plaint in a somewhat different form, and with something to which he is not entitled.

It was also urged that the Bye-bil-wuffa, the Ikrar, the lease, and the Kabooleat must be taken together as one transaction; that the effect of the two latter so qualified that of the two former, that the mortgage [356] must be taken to have been in its inception, one for the term of three years, and that until the expiration of the term the Appellant was not at liberty to take any step towards foreclosure. Their Lordships have to observe that this was not one of the issues in the cause, and that the point is not even raised on the pleadings, nor do they think that this defence could have been successfully raised. The Respondent cannot both repudiate the obligations of the lease and claim the benefit of it. That transaction has been held, and properly held, not to effect that for which it was probably designed, viz., to save the Appellant from the liabilities, whilst it gave him the advantages of a Mortgagee in possession. Still less can it be taken to do what it was never meant to do, viz., modify the terms of the Conditional sale.

It was further urged, that the proceedings in the Sudder Ameen's Court under section 8 of Regulation XVII. of 1806 were irregular, both by reason of the insufficiency of the demand, and the non-production of the accounts in the course of those proceedings. One of the issues in the cause when it was before Mr. Loch, was, whether the Plaintiff had performed the conditions prescribed by the Regulations, and that issue was found in his favour. As far as appears from the printed record, the Respondent did not appeal from that finding. He had undoubtedly raised in the Zillah Court the question whether there had been a sufficient demand, and the fact had been found against him. He had not taken the point that the accounts ought to have been produced in the preliminary proceedings. Their Lordships are disposed to think that upon the true construction of the Regulations, and of the Circular Order, it is not [357] necessary either that the demand should be for the specific sum ultimately ascertained to be due, or that the accounts of a Mortgagee in possession should be produced in these preliminary proceedings, in which they cannot be investigated.

The questions which really arise upon the decrees under appeal, and on which the determination of this appeal depends, are these:—

First, whether the Sudder Court was right in requiring the Appellant to produce his accounts, and in remanding the cause for re-trial on the production of those accounts by the Order of the 22nd of January, 1857.

Secondly, whether if it were wrong in so remanding the cause, the Appellant is not now bound by that decree, against which he did not appeal.

Thirdly, whether the Zillah Judge and the Sudder Court were right in dismissing the suit, because the Appellant had not produced the proper accounts, or whether they ought to have given him further time for so doing.

Their Lordships, considering the first question independently of the authority of decided cases, are of opinion that, upon the true construction of these Regulations, there was no necessity for calling for the production of the accounts, and, consequently, that the order for the remand was wrong. The issue upon which the determination of the cause depended, and upon which even by the Order of remand it was made to depend, was whether the loan had been liquidated, with interest, from the usufruct of the property. Now, not only was there no allegation on the pleadings, or issue raised in the cause, to the effect that the loan had been thus liquidated, but [358] there was an express admission on the face of the Defendant's answer that even on his mode of stating the account, the principal sum of Rs. 39,000 had, when the foreclosure proceedings were commenced, and when he ought to have made the requisite deposit, been reduced by no more than Rs. 927. It was therefore clear, upon the face of the proceedings, that the question to be tried could be answered only in one way, and that in favour of the Appellant. And the Order of remand can be supported only on the principle that, in all cases, it is imperative upon a Mortgagee who has been in possession to produce his accounts. For this position their Lordships can find no grounds in the Regulations. The words of the 3rd section of Regulation I. of 1798, from which (if at all) an inflexible obligation to produce the accounts must be inferred, are, "In all instances wherein the lender on the Bye-bil-wuffa may have been put in possession of the land, and an adjustment of accounts may consequently become necessary between him and the borrower, the lender is to account," etc. Two conditions are expressed, the possession of the Mortgagee, and the necessity of an account. And a comparison of this with the preceding section, and with Regulation XVII. of 1806, shows that that necessity arises, and need only arise, first, when the Mortgagor has deposited the principal, leaving the question of interest to be settled on an adjustment of the account; secondly, when he has deposited all that he admits or alleges to be due; thirdly, when he pleads, and undertakes to prove, that the whole of the principal and interest has been liquidated by the usufruct of the property.

It remains to be seen whether the proposition that [359] the Mortgagee, who has been in possession, must in all cases produce his accounts, has been conclusively established by the authority of decided cases.

The cases cited by the Sudder Court in its judgment, and now relied on by the Respondent, are reported in the decisions of the Sudder Dewany Adawlut of Bengal for 1852, pp. 678 and 1063. The transactions out of which these cases arose were not mortgages by way of Conditional sale, but mortgages of a different character, and governed by different rules. Neither authority, therefore, seems to touch the point now under consideration. On the other hand, in a more recent case, which is reported amongst the decisions of the same Court for 1859, at p. 492, the Court held that there being no averment in the answers that the Plaintiff had paid himself by the usufruct of the property, the objection that the Mortgagee had not produced his accounts could not be entertained on the appeal.

The question, therefore, cannot be said to have been concluded against the Appellant by authority; and their Lordships have already intimated their opinion, that upon principle the obligation to produce the accounts should depend on the circumstances of the case and the nature of the issues raised.

Upon the question whether the Appellant is so bound by the Order of the 22nd of January, 1857, against which he did not appeal, that he cannot impeach the correctness of the remand, their Lordships have to observe that the Order was an interlocutory one; that it did not purport to dispose of the cause; and consequently, that upon the principle laid down by this Committee in the case of Maharajah Moheshur Sing v. The Bengal Government (7 Moore's Ind. App. [360] Cases, p. 283), upon which their Lordships have very recently acted in a case from Oude (Sheonath v. Ramnath, post [10 Moo. Ind. App.], 413), the Appellant is not now precluded from insisting that the remand for the production of the accounts was erroneous; or that the cause should have been decided in his favour, notwithstanding the non-production of the accounts. In truth, the learned Judges of the Sudder Court, by their judgment of the 21st of April, 1862, treated the latter point as still open to the Appellant, although, upon grounds which appear to their Lordships to be unsatisfactory, they determined it against him.

The view which their Lordships had taken of the questions already considered renders it unnecessary to determine whether the Appellant ought to have been allowed further time, or a second opportunity for the production of the accounts required from him. Their Lordships will only say upon this point that the affidavit filed by him on the application for a review are, when contrasted with his grounds of appeal, extremely unsatisfactory, and that he appears to have done little to entitle him to the indulgence of the Court.

They are, therefore, not prepared to say, that if the production of the accounts required had been necessary, those delivered were sufficient; or that in that case there would have been any such improper exercise of the discretion of the Court below as their Lordships would have interfered with. But they think that the error of the Court below was in the dismissal of the suit, on the assumption that the production of any accounts was necessary in a case in which there was neither plea nor proof that the usufruct had liquidated [361] principal and interest, and no deposit had been made to cover the balance admitted to be due.

Their Lordships, on the whole case, are of opinion, that this appeal should be allowed, and they will humbly recommend Her Majesty to reverse the decrees appealed against, and also the order of remand of the 22nd of January, 1857, and to vary the decree of the 18th of December, 1854, by declaring that the Appellant was entitled to the possession of the mortgaged premises as absolute owner, by virtue of the Conditional sale which had been duly made absolute, but was not entitled to a decree for any mesne profits. Their Lordships think that the Appellant is entitled to the costs of this appeal, and also to all costs of the suit below, up to and including the costs of the Order of the 22nd of January, 1857.

Considering that he might have appealed against that order, and that his conduct in the subsequent proceedings in the Court below has not been satisfactory, their Lordships are not disposed to recommend that he should have the costs of those proceedings against the opposite party. He will of course be entitled to a refund of the costs (if any) which have been paid by him under any of the decrees reversed.

[362] SHAH MUKHUN LALL, GUNGADEEN and BOODHOO JEE, Appellants:
NAWAB IMTIAZOOD DOWLAH and HAJEE ALI,—Respondents * [Dec. 14, 16, 1865].

On appeal from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner at Oude.

The Limitation of suits Act, No. XIV., of 1859, sec. I. cl. 9, limits the right to recover money lent, or interest, to three years, from the time when the debt became due, unless there is a written engagement to pay the money lent or interest. By section XXIV. of that Act, it is provided that such Act should not take effect in non-Regulation Provinces, until it shall be extended thereto by public notification by the Governor-General in Council, and when extended, all suits within such Province which shall be pending at the date of such notification, or shall be instituted within the period of two years from the date thereof, shall be tried and determined as if the Act had not been passed. This Act was not extended to the Province of Oude until July, 1860. In a suit brought in January, 1862, to recover a balance of money lent with interest, the last advance of which was made more than three years before the commencement of the suit, it was held by the Courts in Oude to operate as a bar to the suit. Upon appeal, such finding reversed, as it fell within the exception provided by that section, and was to be determined as if the Act had not been passed.

A letter written by a debtor in answer to a demand for payment of a debt and interest, in which he promised to pay the debt by instalments, and begging to be let off payment of interest, is an ample acknowledgment within section IV. of the Limitation of suits Act, No. XIV., of 1859, to take the case out of the operation of that Act.

The appeal in this case was brought from a decree of the Judicial Commissioner of Oude, which dis-[363]-missed an appeal brought by the Appellants against a decree of the Judge of the Civil Court of Lucknow, by which decree, in effect, he was nonsuited in an action instituted by the Appellants to recover a balance of Rs. 11,278. 3a. 0p., for principal and interest due from the Respondent, Nawab Imtiazood Dowlah, on account of loans of money made to him through the other Respondent, Hajee Ali.

These two decrees were based on the provisions of Act No. XIV. of 1859, entitled an "Act to provide for the Limitation of suits," sec. I., cls. 9 and 10, which are as follows:—"9. To suits brought to recover money lent or interest, or for the breach of any contract, the period of three years from the time when the debt became due or when the breach of contract in respect of which the suit is brought first took place, unless there is a written engagement to pay the money lent or interest, or a contract in writing signed by the party to be bound thereby or by his duly authorized agent," "10. To suits brought to recover money lent or interest, or for the breach of any contract in cases in which there is a written engagement or contract, and in which such engagement or contract could have been registered by virtue of any law or regulation in force at the time and place of the execution thereof, the period of three years from the time when the debt became due or when the breach of contract in respect of which the action is brought first took place, unless such engagement or contract shall have been registered within six months from the date thereof."

The same Act, in section IV., provides for a revival of the right to sue, by an acknowledgment in writing, as follows:—"If in respect of any legacy or debt, the [364] person who, but for the law of limitation, would be liable to pay the same shall have admitted that such debt or legacy, or any part thereof is due by an acknowledgment in writing signed by him, a new period of limitation, according to the nature of the original liability, shall be computed from the date of such admission: Provided, that if more than one person be liable, none of them shall become chargeable by reason only of a written acknowledgment signed by another of them."

And section XXIV. provides, that the act "shall not take effect in any non-Regulation Province until it shall have been extended thereto by public notification by the Governor-General in Council, and that whenever it shall be so extended, all suits within such Province which shall be pending at the date of such notification, or shall be instituted within the period of two years from the date thereof, shall be tried and determined as if this Act had not been passed."

The debt was denied by the first Respondent, but both decrees were in favour of the Appellants on the merits, and they proceeded entirely on the provisions of the above Act of Limitation of suits, deciding, in effect, that the suit of these Appellants to recover the debt was barred by effluxion of time; and that there was not a sufficient acknowledgment to revive the right to sue.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The first Appellant in, and previous to, the year 1852, carried on business at Lucknow, in the Province of Oude, as a Banker and Merchant, using the names of the other two Appellants, his sons, Gungadeen and Boodhoo Jee, as the name of his firm. The first Respondent was also an inhabitant of Lucknow, [365] and he as well as his ancestors before him had pecuniary transactions with the Appellant. Previous to the year 1852 he went to Calcutta in attendance upon the King of Oude, and there remained, leaving his wives and the greater number of his domestic servants behind him in his residence at Lucknow.

On his departure from Oude, the first Respondent appointed the other Respondent, Hajee Ali, his Mockhter, to manage during his absence his pecuniary affairs in Lucknow, and in particular he was authorized to receive and remit the first Respondent's salary, pay for the maintenance of his wives and servants, and for that purpose to borrow money from the first Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lall's firm, when required.

It appeared that the allowance made by the first Respondent for the maintenance of his wives and servants was at this time Rs. 500 per mensem, and that the Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lall, being desirous of reducing the amount, wrote to the former asking for his sanction to make the monthly payment Rs. 150.

To this communication the first Respondent wrote a reply in a letter, bearing his seal, and dated the 22nd Shabun, 1272 Hijree, corresponding with the month of May, 1855, c.e., in which, after referring to this proposal, he stated, that he was himself unable to make a greater reduction than to one-half the original sum—viz., to Rs. 250 per mensem—as he considered they would not be able to manage their expenses on a smaller sum; but he at the same time wrote as follows:—"You and Mirza Hajee Ali Beg are at [366] liberty to make any reduction you can," and then added, "I wish you will pay monthly whatever sum you fix upon." The Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lall, acted upon this request, and continued to make advances through the Respondent Hajee Ali.

The Appellants subsequently delivered their account to the first Respondent, through their Gomashita, at the same time demanding payment; and he acknowledged the account by a letter written from Calcutta, dated the 20th Suffer, 1277 Hijree (September, 1860). It was neither signed nor sealed, but bore on the envelope the following words:—"To Shah Mukhun Lall from Imtiazood Dowlah Bahadoor," and in referring to the account received by him, he lamented the revolution in Oude as having ruined him, but mentioned his salary as being still enjoyed by him, and then expressly engaged to pay the debt due to the Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lall.

It appeared that only two of the promised instalments, in respect of the debt, were ever paid, and that these amount only to the sum of Rs. 1700, for which credit had been duly given in account.

The Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lall, having been unable to obtain any further payment, brought a suit in the Lucknow Civil Court, on the 13th January, 1862, at first in his own name alone, against the first Respondent as Defendant, to recover the balance remaining due (after crediting the above payments), viz., Rs. 11,278. 3a. 0p. The plaintiff stated the principal facts before mentioned, and, amongst others, the settlement of accounts, the balance then struck, and the amounts subsequently advanced, and by the plaint he charged that the moneys were received [367] through the Hajee Ali, as the Defendant's agent, and that it was due from the latter, but remained unpaid, notwithstanding repeated demands.

A summons was served upon the first Respondent, who wrote a letter to the Court, bearing his seal, in which he acknowledged such service, but stated that he had been in Calcutta seven years, and represented that he had no occasion to borrow money from the Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lal, whose person he stated he did not even know.

On the 6th of June, 1862, proceedings were had by the Civil Judge of Lucknow, when the letters and other documentary proofs of the Plaintiff were produced. An Order was then made by the Judge, to the effect, that the Plaintiff should amend his plaint by adding to the record the names of his two sons (the Co-Appellants) as parties Plaintiffs, because the business had been carried on in their names, and that the Respondent, Hajee Ali, should be made a Defendant, as the first Respondent had transacted his business through him.

The issues settled and recorded by the Judge were as follows:—First. Limitation. Secondly, whether Hajee Ali had the requisite powers from the Defendant to contract debts? Thirdly, whether the letters produced by the Plaintiff as those of the Defendant were really letters by the Defendant, and whether they amounted to an acknowledgment of the present claim? And, fourth, to what amount, principal and interest, the Plaintiffs were entitled?

The Civil Judge also sent a letter to the agent of the Governor-General with the King of Oude, in Calcutta, enclosing written interrogatories to be put [368] and answered by the Defendant, the first Respondent, on oath; and directing that his large seal, as well as his signature, should be attached to his answers when taken down in writing. The Judge also forwarded with the interrogatories the letter of the first Respondent, dated the 5th Zehy, in the Hijree year 1272, corresponding with the Christian year 1855, and above particularly mentioned in order that the same might be put before him and examined too.

A supplemental plaint was filed on the 16th of June, 1862, in order to carry out the last-mentioned Order as to parties; and the Respondent, Hajee Ali, was duly served with a summons as a Defendant in the suit.

On the 29th of July, 1862, another proceeding in the suit was had and recorded by the Civil Judge, when the interrogatories, with the answers of the Nawab, were filed. In these answers he denied that he had ever any money transactions with the Plaintiffs, or that he ever permitted any one to have such transactions; and he stated that he never heard before of such transactions, but he admitted that the Respondent, Hajee Ali, was his Karindah (agent), although he denied that he ever wrote "to Sahjee," or to the Appellant, Shah Mukhun Lall, to advance money to him on his account, and then swore that he was not aware that money was so advanced, and that nothing was due to Plaintiffs for either principal or interest. To an interrogatory, asking whether the last-mentioned letter (at the time of his examination shown to him) was his letter bearing his seal, he answered as follows:—"The seal is mine, but not the letter. Hajee Ali, my Karindah, had the charge of my [369] seal when I was in Lucknow, but when I came to Calcutta I brought my seal with me. I gave away some blank pieces of paper impressed with my seal to be used when required. The sign 'Sawd' attached to the end of the letter is not my signature." The Respondent, Hajee Ali, was examined as a witness. He proved the payment of the moneys through himself, the execution of his Mooktearnamah, and the authenticity of several of the letters and documents above-mentioned, of the first Respondent; and as to the last-mentioned letter, denied by the latter as aforesaid, he said it is Defendant's, and was given (to Plaintiffs) through himself, and that he had received it through the Nawab's friend, Fuzul Ali. He also produced and proved two additional letters addressed to himself, and bearing the first Respondent's signature.

Among the letters put in evidence were the following:—Translation of a letter (B) to the address of Sahjee in these terms:—"Dear Sir,—After compliments, I beg to inform you that I have received the account through your Gomashah, Lalla Shah Soonder, and become acquainted with its contents. But, dear Sahjee! it is known to the world how we have been ruined; and you also are well aware of my circumstances, that no private property has been left to me, and I am obliged to manage my expenses (out of my salary which is allowed to me) the best way I can.

"A friendly intercourse and money transactions have been carried on between you and me for a long time, and there never took place any disagreement of any kind, and even now, please God, no difference will arise. I am every way willing to pay off your [370] money, and have no objection on that head. But I wish you will, under present circumstances, receive from me the principal due to you by instalments; my means do not enable me to pay you the interest, and I will not be able to pay it. I have no hesitation or objection to pay you the principal sum. I shall suffer inconvenience, but, please God, I will pay you your debt by instalments; but I certainly demur to pay the interest, because I do not know how to pay it. Under such circumstances, it becomes you also to give up your claim to interest, because you and I having been on friendly terms for a long time, it is nothing but proper that you should show me such consideration. After the revolution that has taken place in our affairs, may God enable me to pay off your principal debt! I will consider myself very fortunate, and thank God if I succeed in liquidating it.

"D/20th Suffer, 1277 Hijree.

"Postscript.—Having stated above that I am ready to pay you by instalments, I take this opportunity to let you know that I can arrange to liquidate your debt by monthly instalments of Rs. 200 each, to be paid to you, please God, monthly, through your agent, when I receive my allowance from the British Government."

Translation of a letter (D.) to the address of Shah Mukhun Lall:—"Dear Sir,—After compliments, I beg to inform you that before this I wrote to you that I could pay the principal by instalments, but that you would excuse me for the interest, but you have not yet sent me any satisfactory answer. I therefore write to you again that a friendly communication and money dealings have existed between you and me for a long time, and that no disagree-[371]-ment ever arose, nor did I make any objection in my dealings with you. I did whatever you told me. But my objection to pay you the interest now arises from my being involved in ruined circumstances, which is known to the world, and even you yourself are well aware that I have been robbed of all the private property I had, and that nothing is left to me. My salary was stopped for a long time: but as it is now allowed, I am ready to pay off your principal without any hesitation, although I shall suffer much inconvenience even by paying your principal, because God knows how I manage my expenses in so small a sum. Hence, under the present state of affairs, when times have been so much changed, it is nothing but proper that you should have a regard to the friendly intercourse which has subsisted for a long time between you and me, and not demand the interest. You should show me some consideration, and receive the principal due to you by instalments. Pray do not withhold your kindness in this respect, and under present circumstances consider it a booty if you have your principal debt liquidated. I am unable to pay the interest, and can by no means pay it. Otherwise I would have made no objection to discharge the interest, and would have paid it. You should send me an early answer."

Translation of a letter (F.) to the address of Shahjee:—"Dear Sir,—I wrote to you frequently asking you to return me the whole of my bonds, and to have one drawn in lieu of them; that I can pay you interest at the rate of 8 annas per cent; that you should make up your account and have one bond executed for the aggregate sum, and that you should receive payment from me by monthly instalments of [372] Rs. 200, each, and I told the same to your agent; but I am surprised to find that neither you have written to me anything on the subject up to this time, nor has your agent given me any answer.

"I am, therefore, under the necessity of writing to you again, and request you will send all my papers, consisting of bonds, etc., which you have in your possession, to your agent here, who may return them to me and have one bond executed in lieu of all of them. I also wish that your agent may be allowed to receive from me the instalments of Rs. 200 a month promised by me, which I am ready to pay. Please send me, without any hesitation, an immediate and complete reply as soon as you receive this letter."

By the decree of the Civil Judge at Lucknow (Mr. E. G. Fraser), the suit was dismissed. His judgment, dated the 29th of July, 1862, was as follows:—"That the Defendant was largely indebted to Plaintiff, through his old Karindah, Hajee Ali, there can be no doubt, and there is much perjury on that score in the Defendant's deposition taken by commission in Calcutta. But therein he makes important admissions, such as that Hajee Ali was really his Karindah, had his seal, and moreover used to be entrusted with carte blanche, bearing impressions of the seal made by Defendant. In different papers, bearing his acknowledged seal, he alludes to the debt; in one he authorizes Hajee Ali to treat with Plaintiff for advances, and proposes that £4000 be paid to him, and in one he binds himself to Hajee Ali, his factor, to liquidate all Plaintiff's claim. All this is sufficient to prove the falsity of the Nawab's deposition on oath. But none of the papers alluded to constitute a written acknowledgment, such as will [373] bar limitation, being all much above three years old. The letters B and F, alleged to be from Defendant, and sent from Calcutta, are written within the term of three years, but they prove nothing; neither of them contains seal or mark to prove that they came from Defendant; indeed, do not mention his name. A cover of one is referred to, to show that one of these letters was covered by it. But it merely mentions Defendant; is evidently not in his hand, and there is nothing to connect him with it. We can go into no inferences in such a matter, or, instead of inferring that he caused the unsigned and unsealed letter to be sent, we might infer that Plaintiff had got his own Calcutta agent to send it by way of supplying what would be inferred evidence. Bearing on this point, I would remark that it is alleged that Plaintiff held a Bond which is said to have been lost; but a mem. K, certifying to the fact that such a Bond was given, is produced by Plaintiff, as written by Hajee Ali, on the same day as the missing Bond, such a certificate, given in addition to a Bond, and saved while the Bond is lost, is a curious substitution for a Bond. It professes to be a mere mem. unwitnessed, and signed by the agent. This, at the best, cannot have the same weight as if a formal Bond, signed by the Defendant, had been produced. But even such a Bond produced, unless duly witnessed, would be out of date, because even to it only a three year's run would be allowed. The mem. in question is marked K, and states that all previous vouchers were then reduced to a single Bond, the one lost. Now, there was admittedly no other Bond executed by Defendant, or on his account, and under his seal, after that date. Yet the letter F, with its envelope, [374] on which Plaintiff relies to save limitation, proposes that all previous Bonds be reduced to a single one. This had already been done, if K be authentic and true; and in this case the letter F is open to suspicion of being a mere manoeuvre to support the plaint, or if it really came from Defendant, then the story of K, and the missing Bond, would seem to be apocryphal. Either way, it shows how improper it would be to rest on such papers as Plaintiff relies on to cure the legal defect of this case. As I can find no sufficient ground to recognize any part of Plaintiff's claim as taken out of the Act of Limitation, the several transactions being of older date than three years, and unsupported by any Bond, and without any such voucher or written admission as would give the case the benefit of a six years' term of cognizance, I feel obliged to dismiss the suit, with costs."

The Appellants appealed to the Judicial Commissioner of Oude.

The hearing of the appeal took place on the 26th of March, 1863, before Mr. G. Couper, the Judicial Commissioner, when by a decree of that date he dismissed the appeal, delivering the following judgment:—"The question to be decided in this case is simply whether the Appellants hold any reliable Bond binding on the Respondents of later date than three years. The only two notes which fall within the period are B. and F. The original letter A. contains no promise to pay; B. is unsigned and unsealed, and it is obvious that it will never do to admit such a document in evidence against the alleged writer. F., too, is not sealed; but the Judge is mistaken in saying that it does not even mention the Nawab's name. At all events, there is his name now on the [375] note. I perceive, moreover, that the Judge says that the Bond K. states that all previous vouchers were then reduced to a single Bond—the lost one. I cannot find any statement in K. All that is said in K. is, that on a certain day accounts were struck, and a balance of Rs. 7003 appeared against Nawab Imtiazood Dowlah. The witness, Hajee Ali, however, states that all the sums due to the Plaintiff are included in one Bond up to the date of 1st Shaban, 1273; and that is sufficient to support the Judge's argument that F. is probably not genuine, seeing that it prefers the same request—viz., that all former Bonds be brought in, and a new one executed. Before me, the Appellant's Vakeel pleaded that the period of limitation should be calculated from the date of the payment of the last instalment of the debt, which, according to his account books, took place on the 14th of June, 1859; but a period of limitation cannot now be renewed by a payment, unless it be made at a time specifically conditioned. The Appellants must take the consequences of not having had recourse to the ordinary legal precautions for the protection of their interests. It is impossible to admit his claim on the strength of unsealed and unsigned papers, or on the entry of the payment of an instalment in his account books, and the appeal, therefore, must be dismissed."

The present appeal was from this decree.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellants.—First, there has been a miscarriage of justice. The Judicial Commissioners in the Court below were entirely wrong in supposing that the Limitation of suits Act, No. XIV., of 1859, applied at all to the case. [376] The last section of that Act expressly provides, that it is not to take effect in a non-Regulation Province like Oude, until, first, a notification has been issued by the Governor-General entrusting its operations to such non-Regulation Province, and secondly, when so extended, it further provides, that all suits within such Province which should be pending at the date of the notification, or should have been instituted within a period of two years after the date thereof, should be tried as if the Act had not been passed. Here the suit was instituted in January, 1862, therefore it falls within the exception provided by the Act, and the question of limitation must be governed by the law as it existed before the passing of that Act. This construction with respect to the question of limitation was so decided by this Tribunal in Saligram v. Mirza Azim Ali Beg (ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 114) upon the operation of the Circular Order, No. 104, of 1860, issued by the Judicial Commissioners of Oude, which introduced the rule of three years' limitation to simple interests debts and six years to registered Bonds.

Secondly, even if the limitation of three years by the Circular Order, No. 104, of 1860, applied, the case was taken out of operation of the rule. There has been a revival of the right to sue. The Respondent, Nawab Intiazood Dowlah, the debtor, by an acknowledgment in writing, in the letter F. signed by him, as required by sec. 4 of Act No. XIV., of 1859, admitted that the debt for which the suit was brought was due. Therefore, the period of limitation of three years, computed from such admission, had not expired when the suit was commenced. In that letter he distinctly recognizes the debt, and he promises to pay it by instalments [377] of Rs. 200 a month, and so again in the letters B. and D. he acknowledges the debt. The case falls within the rule laid down by Baron Parke in Tippets v. Heane (1 Crom. Mee. and Ros. 253), that in order to take a case out of the Statute of Limitations by a part payment, it must appear that the payment was made on account of a debt for which the action was brought, and that it was made as a part payment of a greater debt, which was the case here.

Lastly, we were debarred from giving evidence to prove these letters. The lower Court appears to have thought that letter F. should have had the seal of the first Respondent, and he stopped the case. The appeal Court, under section 55 of the Code, could have called for further evidence. Upon all principles of justice the case ought to be remitted to the Court below to admit further evidence.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. T. D. Archibald, for the first Respondent.—The real points are, first, upon the genuineness of the three letters B. D. and F. put in evidence, and secondly, if they are genuine, whether there is any acknowledgment to take the case out of the operation of the rule of limitation of suits, under Act No. XIV., of 1859, or by the Punjab Code, introduced by the Circular Order, No. 104, of 1860.

First, there is not sufficient evidence to prove that Nawab Intiazood Dowlah was ever liable at all in respect of the claim in question, but even if the debt was proved, the right to recover was barred by Act No. XIV., of 1859, for the Limitation of suits, as held by the Court below.

[378] Secondly, the objection of the Appellants' Counsel urged here for the first time that the case is taken out of the operation of that Act, by an acknowledgment in writing by the Nawab, as provided by sec. 4 of Act No. XIV. of 1859, cannot now be entertained. It should have been pleaded. Here, however, the letters relied on were not proved to be in the Nawab's handwriting, nor do they, if proved, make a sufficient acknowledgment of the debt to take it out of the Act, by analogy to the English cases on the Statute of Limitations. Lord Tenterden's Act, 9th Geo. IV. c. 14, sec. 1, requires an "acknowledgment in writing" to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. I., c. 16. In this case the same construction should be put on the word "admission" in the fourth section of the Limitation of suits Act as "acknowledgment" in the English Statute. The "admission" there mentioned must show an inference to pay on request. That principle is correctly laid down in Tanner v. Smart (6 Bar. and Cr. 603). The case of Hart v. Prendergast (14 Mee and Wels. 741), is similar to the present. There a letter in answer to an application for the payment of a debt, was in these words, "I will not fail to meet Mr. H. on fair terms, and have now a hope that before perhaps a week from this date I shall have it in my power to pay him, at all events, a portion of the debt, when we shall settle about the liquidation of the balance;" but the Court held that it was not sufficient to defeat a plea of the Statute of Limitations.

If the Appellants felt aggrieved by the refusal to hear further evidence, they should have appealed from such refusal, and not now at the last moment raise such an objection.

[379] Judgment was delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.—The printed cases both of the Appellant and Respondent assume that the question upon the appeal is to be governed by the new law of limitation in the Act, No. XIV. of 1859. But the last section of that Act provides that the Act "shall not take effect in any non-Regulation Province (to which class Oude belongs) until it shall be extended thereto by public notification by the Governor-General in Council, and that whenever it shall be so extended, all suits within such Province which shall be pending at the date of such notification, or shall be instituted within the period of two years from the date thereof, shall be tried and determined as if this Act had not been passed." In the recent case from Oude, Saligram v. Mirza Azim Ali Beg. (10 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 114.) it appeared that the Act, No. XIV. of 1859, was not extended to Oude till July, 1860. As this suit was commenced on the 13th January, 1862, it falls within the exception, and must be determined as if the Act had not been passed.

In the case just referred to, in which the question arose what law of limitation was to be applied, it appeared that since the annexation of the Province of Oude various rules of limitation had prevailed. That in 1857, suits of the nature of the present one were subject to a limitation of six years, and to the general provisions of the Punjab Code. That in March, 1859, these rules had been modified by a Circular Order, No. 51, which had afterwards been repealed by another Circular Order, No. 104, dated the 4th July, [380] 1860. And their Lordships held that the case before them was to be governed by the last-mentioned Order. Upon the authority of that decision it appears that this case must fall within the 10th of the rules then promulgated under that Order. This declares the period of limitation to be three years "in all suits for money lent for no definite period or for interest thereon, unless there is a written engagement, and where Registry offices existed at the time such engagement was registered and signed by the party to be bound thereby, or by his duly authorized agent."

The rules which were promulgated under this Circular Order were modifications of the Punjab Code which previously existed, and, therefore, it may be necessary in this case to resort to that Code for the purpose of determining the time from which the period of limitation is to be calculated, or the circumstances which will take a particular case out of the operation of the limitation. Having ascertained the law to be applied to this case, we proceed to consider the question to be decided.

The suit was instituted by the Appellant, carrying on business as a Merchant at Lucknow, to recover a balance of Rs. 11,278. 3a. 0p., principal moneys and interest alleged to be due from the first named Respondent, on account of advances made to him for the maintenance of his family, through his agent, the other Respondent, Hajee Ali.

The plaint was filed on the 13th of January, 1862, and the last advance was in 1858, consequently more than three years before the commencement of the suit.

Issues were settled by the Judge, the first of them being limitation, and the case was ultimately decided [381] upon the question, whether the Plaintiff had given sufficient evidence of an admission of the debt by the Respondent to prevent the application of the period of limitation to his claim.

In order to prove such an admission, the Plaintiff produced three letters marked respectively B., D., and F., Letter B. appearing by its own date, and the other two letters by the post-marks upon their envelopes, to have been written in the year 1860. The letter F. purports to be signed by the Nawab, but has no seal. The other two letters have neither signature nor seal, but the envelope D. appears to have been "dispatched by Imtiazood, Dowlah Bahadoor from Khizzirpore in Calcutta." Letter F. is stated to have been filed with the plaint, but no attempt was made to prove that it was signed by the Nawab. No other evidence was given of the letters B. and D., except by Hajee Ali, who was called by the Plaintiff, and said "B. came to the Plaintiff, not through me, D. ditto." This was perhaps scarcely sufficient to admit them to proof, but the Judge received them, and then the question arose whether being admitted they did not carry with them internal evidence of their genuineness. There can be no doubt, that when the Nawab left Lucknow his family remained behind, and would require to be maintained during his absence. Hajee Ali was appointed his Agent by a Mookhtarnamah sealed with his seal, in which it is contemplated that money would be borrowed from the Appellant's firm, and Hajee Ali besides this authority was armed with blank pieces of paper impressed with the Nawab's seal, to be used when required. It is not pretended that the family were maintained out of the funds of the Nawab, and no other source of supply was ever [382] suggested, except that which was derived from the Appellant. Under these circumstances the debt to the Appellant was incurred. His claim is for nothing else than advances made to meet the wants of the Nawab's family, with interest upon these advances. The Nawab was examined upon interrogatories. He denied all knowledge of the Appellant. Asserted that he never had himself, nor permitted any one to have, any money transactions with him. That he was not aware that money had been advanced by the Appellant, and that nothing was due to him for principal or interest. It is impossible not to agree with the observations of the Civil Judge (ante, p. 372) upon these answers of the Nawab. "That Defendant was largely indebted to Plaintiff through his old Karindah, Hajee Ali, there can be no doubt, and there is much perjury on that score in the Defendant's deposition."

But if the Respondent was indebted to the Appellant through his agent, is it at all credible that he should have been ignorant of the fact, and that knowing that his own funds had not been applied to the maintenance of his family, he should never have had the curiosity to inquire from what source the supplies were drawn? It is clear that he must have known that he was indebted to the Appellant for the means of support of his family, and it is most improbable that when the debt had grown to a large amount, and his own affairs had suffered considerably from the annexation of the province of Oude, no communication should have taken place between him and his creditor. Assuming the probability, in this state of things, that something would have passed between [383] them, it will be found that the letters in question are precisely those which might have been expected to be written under the circumstances. They are in the following terms: [His Lordship read the letters B. D. and F., ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], pp. 369-371, and proceeded.]

Assuming, then, the genuineness of these letters to be thus established, the question arises whether they contain a sufficient admission of the debt to prevent the application of the period of limitation to the Appellant's suit. As the Judges below seemed to regard the letter F. as probably not genuine, and some suspicion may rest upon it, it will be better to confine the consideration of this question to the letters B. and D. Their Lordships entertain no doubt that if the question were to be tried by the rules of English law before Lord Tenterden's Act, these letters offering to pay the principal money by instalments, and praying to be excused from the payment of the interest, would be an ample acknowledgment to take the case out of the Statute of limitations, and they are not aware of anything in the Punjab Code which would lead to a different construction. The Judges in the Courts below dealt with the questions rather summarily, and disposed of the case without affording the Appellant an opportunity of supplying any deficiency which they found in this proof. But if they proceeded upon the Act for the limitation of suits, No. XIV. of 1859, and both the Civil Judge and the Judicial Commissioner thought that letter F. was out of the question, their conclusion was right, because letters B. and D. being without signature, there was no acknowledgment in writing signed by the party to be charged. But that Act not being applicable, and an admission of the debt being all that was requisite to [384] save the limitation, even if letter F. were put aside, the letters B. and D. being before the Judges, they ought to have considered them and determined whether they were sufficient to prevent the Plaintiff's remedy being barred. To this consideration their minds were never applied, and in dealing with another point which arose in the case, there seems to have been a miscarriage. It was proved by Hajee Ali that the Nawab's brother, Hadee Ali Khan, paid the Appellant Rs. 1700, in two sums, after he became agent. The Civil Judge appears to have entirely overlooked this fact. But the Judicial Commissioner, dealing with the argument that the period of limitation should be calculated from the last of these payments, which was made on the 14th of July, 1859, observed (ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], 275) that "a period of limitation cannot now be renewed by a payment unless it be made at a time specifically conditioned." It is difficult to understand to what Code the Judicial Commissioner was referring when he made this observation. In the Act, No. XIV. of 1859, there seems to be no provision giving effect to a payment on account, or partial satisfaction. The Punjab Code, Part II., section 1, clause 6, limits suits to a certain time after the cause of action shall have arisen, unless (amongst other things) the complainant has "obtained an admission or partial satisfaction of his demand from the opposite party."

But from clause 7 it appears, that it is not every part payment which will amount to "a partial satisfaction of demand" within the meaning of the rule. It must be a payment according to a regular and continuous course of dealing, "something tantamount to a running account." It was this qualification which [385] the Judicial Commissioner probably had in his mind when he made the observation;

but if he meant to apply this Code, and had turned to the words of it, he probably would have thought that the payments made by the Defendant's agent upon an account, continued monthly for several months, ought to be regarded as tantamount (at least) to a running account, if not itself correctly described as a running account.

The case has not been properly dealt with, nor fully and sufficiently considered in the Courts below, and, in their Lordships' opinion, it ought to be submitted to further and more careful investigation. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that the decrees be reversed, and the cases remitted to the Court below for trial of the issues between the parties.

[386] KAMALA NAICKEN,—Appellant; PITCHACOOTTY CHETTY.

Respondent * [Dec. 1, 2, and 4, 1865].

On appeal from the High Court at Madras.

A., the lessee for a term of a Zemindary, brought a suit against B., the lessor, to prevent B. interfering with his possession, which he had under the lease granted to him by B. in consideration of certain pecuniary advances made by him to B. The relief sought was in effect an injunction to restrain B. from collecting the revenue of the Zemindary. The defence set up by B. in his answer was, in substance, that the lease was an executory contract, and, being without consideration, could not be enforced; and was moreover void for maintenance, by reason of a subsequent agreement for the advance of a sum of money to carry on a suit, which agreement had not been carried out. The Judge of the Civil Court adopted this view, and held the lease void. The High Court of Madras on appeal treated the case as a suit for specific performance, and decreed execution of the lease. Upon appeal the Judicial Committee sustained the decree as to possession under the lease; but as it appeared from the evidence questionable, whether the transaction in respect of the lease did not really operate only as a loan, and as a right to redeem might exist, the affirmance was made with a declaration, that it was to be without prejudice to the claim (if any) of B. to which he might be entitled, and to any question which might be raised as to the amount actually advanced by A. to B.

The appeal in this case was brought by Kamala Naicken, the Zemindar of Annaya Naickanur, the Defendant in a suit instituted by the Respondent against him in the Civil Court of Madura: which suit sought relief in the nature of an injunction to prevent the Appellant, as lessor, from interfering with the possession and enjoyment of the [387] profits of that Zemindary. The Respondent claimed under a lease, dated the 17th of September, 1851, of the Zemindary for the term of ten years. By the decree of the Civil Court, Mr. Cotton, the Civil Judge, held, first, that the lease had been cancelled by a subsequent agreement executed by the Respondent on the 25th of November, 1851, and secondly, that as the transaction, as between the Appellant and Respondent, was, in his opinion, of the nature of maintenance and savoured of champerty, the lease was not a legal or valid instrument, the provisions of which could be enforced either in law or equity. Upon appeal this decree was reversed by the High Court at Madras (consisting of the Chief Justice, Sir Colley Harman Scotland, and Mr. Justice Strange), and by that Court's decree it was declared, that the Respondent was entitled to specific performance of the lease and to the possession and enjoyment of the Zemindary, under the terms of the lease. The present appeal was from this decree.

The case of the Appellant was, that as the agreement of the 25th November, 1851, was proved, and the Respondent having failed to pay the money therein mentioned, the lease under the circumstances became forfeited and void; and, therefore, that the decree of the High Court was unjust in decreeing specific performance of the lease. On the other hand, the Respondent insisted that the lease was valid and the agreement a fabricated document, and submitted, that the objections of champerty and maintenance, even if raised upon the pleadings, were not sustainable.

The substance of the pleadings and evidence appear sufficiently in their Lordships' judgment.

[388] The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), Mr. W. H. Melvill, and Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the Appellant; and Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. W. W. Mackeson, for the Respondent.

Their Lordships' judgment was pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford (Dec. 21, 1865).—The original suit out of which this Appeal arises was instituted in the Civil Court by the Respondent, for the purpose of obtaining undisturbed possession of a lease of the Zemindary granted to him by the Appellant, the Zemindar.

The lease, which is dated the 17th of September, 1851, recites that the Appellant had leased out to the Respondent the whole of the Zemindary for a period of ten years from Fusli, 1267 (answering to the year 1857, A.D.), and had fixed the amount of lease at Rs. 19,000 per annum. It then directs that out of the Rs. 19,000 the lessee should pay the pesh kist of the Zemindary, at Rs. 13,961. 8a. 6p., and certain other expenses, amounting in the whole to Rs. 16,469. 8a. 6p., and that out of the amount to be realized during the ten years at Rs. 2530. 7a. 6p., after deducting the Rs. 16,469. 8a. 6p., Rs. 3000, which the lessor states "I have up to this day borrowed from you under the Bonds executed to you by me and its interest," should be paid (for this is clearly what was intended, although the sentence is not complete); and it then proceeds thus: "that if I can afford to pay the same before the lease of the Zemindary shall take effect in Fusli, 1267, you should receive the principal and interest; that I should also pay the [389] said amount if demanded by you; that even if the said debt may be thus discharged, still you would, without any objection whatever, enjoy the lease of the said Zemindary for the said ten years, in consideration of the assistance you have done to me; that as you have at my request agreed to lend me Rs. 18,000, in order to discharge my debts, and you should, after getting possession of the said Zemindary, lend me Rs. 5000, in Fusli, 1267, Rs. 5000 in the following Fusli, and Rs. 5000 in the next following Fusli; and should credit for these sums, and the said sum of Rs. 3000 (in the event of it not being paid before the lease takes effect), the aforesaid annual residue Rs. 2530. 7a. 6p.; that in the event of my not requiring the said loan, you should deduct the said sum of Rs. 3000 and its interest from the amount to be realized by you for the debt at Rs. 2530 per annum, and pay me the remainder annually." The Appellant, on the same day, executed two Bonds to the Respondent, one for Rs. 2000 and the other for Rs. 1000. The Bond for Rs. 2000 is in these terms, "To meet the cost of suit now instituted by me, and the demand of Ramakrishna Setti by means of precept, etc., I have up to this date borrowed of you the sum of Rs. 2000. For this sum of Rs. 2000 and the interest thereon, at 1 per cent. per mensem, I have rented out to you my Zemindary for a term of ten years from Fusli, 1267, and executed a lease specifying the amount of the rent to be Rs. 2530. 7a. 6p. per year: therefore you should credit this rent amount towards the principal and interest in question. If you require the said principal and interest before the said Zemindary is put in your possession in Fusli, 1267, I shall pay them, and I [390] shall also discharge the said debt if I could get coin. Although the debt may be discharged as aforesaid, yet there is no objection whatever in your enjoying the lease, of the said Zemindary, under the terms of the lease, for a term of ten years from Fusli, 1267." The Bond for Rs. 1000 recites the execution of the bond for Rs. 2000, and in all other respects is exactly similar. In addition to these securities the Appellant on the same day (the 17th of September, 1851), issued an order to the inhabitants of the villages in his Zemindary, reciting the lease to the Respondent from Fusli, 1267, to Fusli, 1276, directing them "to continue to pay during the said Fusli to the said Settiar (the Respondent), or his agents, all sorts of revenue, and place themselves under his orders."

Upon the arrival of the term at which the Respondent became entitled under the lease to the possession of the revenue of the Zemindary, he sent the above order of the Appellant to the inhabitants of the villages, but found that the Appellant had issued a counter order, directing them to send to himself the collections and accounts.

The Respondent thereupon instituted his suit in the Civil Court of Madura, praying for a decree adjudging the Defendant not to interfere with and prevent his enjoyment of all the incomes of the Zemindary.

The Plaintiff in his plaint recites that having obliged the Defendant by lending him Rs. 3000 on the 17th of September, 1851, in relief of the distress which he had been subject to, he has leased out to him the whole of his Zemindary, and then sets out the stipulations in the lease, and after stating the [391] takid or order to the inhabitants of the villages of the same date, he alleges that he had sent a copy of the Defendant's takid with his own takid to the villagers who had admitted them, but that Defendant had sent a counter order, and had thus prevented him from holding according to the terms of the lease, and he prays for a decree in the terms above mentioned.

The Defendant by his answer alleges that the Plaintiff, a Merchant, has, with a view of defrauding the Defendant and getting the agreement in question from him by holding out to him hopes of pecuniary and other assistance, executed separate documents to the Defendant's men, and having thus gained them over and caused them to persuade the Defendant, had thus fraudulently obtained the agreement in question.

That the sum of Rs. 3000, which is said to have been advanced to the Defendant by the Plaintiff for the agreement in question was never paid. That the Plaintiff has entirely omitted to mention in his plaint the stipulations of the documents passed respecting the same, and the documents passed in pursuance thereof in regard to certain other transactions, as also the stipulation of these documents by which the Plaintiff is bound to do certain acts.

The Plaintiff in his replication denies that the lease was obtained by holding out any hopes to the Defendant, or by executing any documents to the Defendant's men as alleged in the answer. And as to the Rs. 3000 not having been paid, he states that the Defendant has not only executed a Bond for the sum of Rs. 3000 which is said in the plaint to have been lent to him by the Plaintiff, but has also acknowledged his (Defendant's) receipts of the same in the said lease.

And lastly, the Defendant by his rejoinder states "that about seven years ago the Plaintiff, with a view of obtaining a lease of the Defendant's Zemindary, and breaking his friendship with Mr. Fondclair, who had obtained an Izaradar and had held dealings with him at the time, caused the Defendant to institute a suit against that gentleman, and held out to him hopes of pecuniary assistance for that suit, for the precept to which the Defendant was then liable, and other necessary expenses. That the Plaintiff has also caused the Defendant's men and friends (whom he gained over) to persuade the Defendant, and having thus obtained the lease has executed separate agreements to them, giving them certain shares in the said lease as follows, viz., one eighth share for the Defendant's manager, Muttaya Pillai, in the name of his younger brother Mayandiya Pillai; one thirty-second share for his Rayasani (Clerk), Subbramaniya Pillai, in the name of his brother-in-law, Sankaralingum Pillai; five thirty-second shares for his friend Varadaya Naikar; and five thirty-second shares for Kalayar Kovil Chellama Ayar, a friend of both the parties, in the name of his son, Aiyairayar. These particulars came to the Defendant's notice lately. That the Plaintiff obtained two Bonds from the Defendant (on the date of the said document) for the sum of Rs. 3000, which he required at the time, but paid him only Rs. 500 at the time. With the aid of this money, the Defendant instituted a suit against the said gentleman in No. 4 of 1851, on the file of this Court of Rs. 23,000. The Plaintiff has subsequently paid to the Defendant only Rs. 52 on one occasion, and Rs. 500 on another occasion, and has executed to him an agreement of the 25th of November, 1851, to the effect that if he should fail to pay the rest of the amount within five days, he would return the lease and bond, and receive back the amount advanced by him. The Plaintiff, who failed to pay the money within the said time, having been demanded about the same, has stated in the presence of certain mediators that he would, according to his younger brother's advice, return the said lease, etc., and that the said sum of Rs. 1000 and odd should be paid back. Accordingly, the said amount was ready, and the Plaintiff was searched for, but he could not be found. The Plaintiff having failed to give any pecuniary assistance according to his positive promise and concealed himself, the Defendant was obliged to pay Rs. 1000 and odd for Madura Ramakristna Chetti's precept through Mr. Fondelair, and to withdraw the said suit No. 1; and the Defendants' grove of tamarind trees and karamal (tanks), which can yield Rs. 5000 per annum, were sold at auction."

From the singularly loose and inexact character of the pleadings, it is scarcely possible to discover what were the precise questions intended to be raised between the parties, and no copy of the issues is to be found amongst the printed proceedings.

It is clear, however, that two of the main questions of fact to be tried were:

First, whether the lease of 17th of September, 1851, was obtained by undue influence; and, secondly, whether the document of the 25th of November, 1851, was a genuine document.

Another question arose as to the payment of the [394] Rs. 3000 by the Plaintiff to the Defendant, which although not decisive of the suit, has yet an important bearing upon the genuineness of the document upon which the case principally, if not altogether, depended. The Plaintiff rested the proof of his case entirely upon the lease of the 17th of September, 1851, and the two Bonds of the same date executed by the Defendant, in which the advance of the Rs. 3000 before their execution is distinctly admitted, and also upon the order to the inhabitants to pay to the lessee or his agents, after the commencement of the lease, the whole revenue of the Zemindary.

The Defendant, in support of the allegation in his rejoinder, produced a document, dated the 25th of November, 1851, and purporting to be attested by three witnesses, and to have been engrossed by one Appavaiyar, of Madura. And he called five witnesses to prove its execution. Of these, two were the persons whose names appeared as attesting witnesses, the third name being that of a person who was proved to have been dead several years, and another was Appavaiyar, the alleged writer of the document. All these five witnesses swore to the execution of it by the Plaintiff in their presence. In addition to this evidence, four of the witnesses stated in almost the same words, that "the Plaintiff did not act up to the conditions of the agreement. That as soon as the term of the agreement had expired, the Defendant sent for the Plaintiff and asked him to receive back the money and return the lease and the Bonds. That the Plaintiff said in a week he would send for and return the documents and receive back the money."

Upon the case thus presented the Civil Judge of [395] Madura dismissed the suit on the ground that the alleged lease was an executory contract, and being without consideration could not be enforced, and also that the transaction was void for maintenance.

Upon appeal to the High Court of Judicature the objections taken by the Civil Judge were overruled, and the case remanded to him to be disposed of upon its merits generally. It is perhaps unnecessary to consider the objections upon which the Civil Judge originally disposed of the case. They were very slightly alluded to in the argument before their Lordships, and are not entitled to any weight. On the return of the case to the Civil Judge, he decided upon the merits in favour of the Appellant. He thought there was no cause to question the truth of the evidence and genuineness of the document of the 25th of November, 1851, that the lease of the Zemindary was cancelled by it, and he, therefore, decreed that the Plaintiff's suit be dismissed. Upon appeal the High Court of Judicature reversed this decree, and gave judgment that the Plaintiff was entitled to specific performance of the lease, and to the possession and enjoyment of the Zemindary under the terms of such lease.

Before proceeding to examine the grounds of this decree, their Lordships cannot refrain from animadverting upon the inaccurate and inartificial character of the pleadings in this case.

The Plaintiff's right of action depended entirely upon the lease, which entitled him to possession of the Zemindary; and if that possession had been usurped by the Zemindar, the Plaintiff ought to have brought ejectment. The prayer of his plaint seems rather to be for an injunction to restrain the Zemindar [396] from collecting the revenue of his Zemindary, against the terms of his own authority to the Plaintiff. But the High Court of Judicature appear to treat the suit as one for specific performance, which it could not be if, according to their opinion, the lease was not an executory contract. It is most desirable that such laxity of pleading should be discountenanced, as it imposes additional difficulties in the decision of a case like the present, where the utmost precision and accuracy were necessary in order to bring the parties to distinct issues.

It is evident that the whole case ultimately resolved itself into the proof of the genuineness of the document of the 25th of November, 1851.

This question is involved in considerable difficulty. On the one side there is the positive testimony of five witnesses, who swear to the execution of the document; and on the other, there is negative evidence of the strongest character arising from the great improbability of its ever having been executed. It must, however, be borne in mind that the onus of displacing the Plaintiff's case rested upon the Defendant, and in support of his appeal he ought to be able to show that the evidence he produced was so unsuspicious and satisfactory that the High Court of Judicature were not justified in making a decree against him.

The Plaintiff's evidence merely consisted of the lease of the 17th of September, 1851, and of the contemporaneous Bonds, and the authority from the Zemindar for the collection of the revenue. The Defendant rested his defence on three grounds:—first, that the lease was fraudulently obtained by the Plaintiff by means of bribing the Defendant's servants [397] and friends to exert their influence to persuade him to grant it; secondly, that the whole of the Rs. 3000, the consideration for the lease, was not paid, but only Rs. 1052, by three payments; and, thirdly, the agreement of the 25th of November, 1851, by which the Plaintiff agreed to return the lease if he did not make payment of the residue of the Rs. 3000, within five days, which he failed to do.

With respect to the allegation of the improper and fraudulent mode in which the Plaintiff obtained the lease, it is unnecessary to say more than that the Civil Judge thought it was not supported by the evidence.

The question as to whether the whole of the Rs. 3000, was advanced requires a little more consideration. The Plaintiff relied entirely upon the estoppel arising from the statement of the advance of that sum in the lease and the Bonds.

The Defendant proved that the Plaintiff paid only Rs. 500 on the date of the execution of the Bonds, and that when the agreement of the 25th of November, 1851, was executed, a further sum of Rs. 500, was paid. If the genuineness of the agreement of the 25th of November, 1851, was established, it expressly states that Rs. 1052 only had been paid. It is difficult to reconcile the mode in which the Plaintiff conducted his suit with the idea that he had really paid the Rs. 3000 to the Defendant. He is a Merchant at Madura, keeping Books, as a matter of course, in which all his transactions would be entered. He might have presented himself as a witness, have proved the advance of the Rs. 3000, and have vouched the entries in his Books in support of his evidence. This course of proceeding would not only [398] have established the honesty of his case, but have gone very far to show that the agreement of the 25th of November, 1851, with its statement of the advance of only Rs. 1052, could not have been signed by him.

But notwithstanding the prejudice which arises to the Plaintiff's case from his not appearing as a witness to facts peculiarly within his knowledge, and especially to disprove his signature to the document of the 25th of November, 1851, that document is still exposed to all the improbabilities which surround it on every side. The Defendant's case represents the Plaintiff as so anxious to procure the lease in question that he bribed the Defendant's servants and friends to assist him in his endeavour to obtain it; and yet, succeeding in his object, as having agreed a little more than two months afterwards to surrender the right which he had acquired by such improper means, upon non-payment of a sum of Rs. 1948, within five days, and as having been unable to raise such a comparatively small sum to save this valuable interest from forfeiture.

It is a circumstance worthy of remark that the lease was registered immediately after its execution, but the alleged document of the 25th of November, 1851, was never registered at all. Now, although it might not have been one which it was absolutely necessary to register, yet when a lease was recorded which so seriously affected the interests of the Zemindar, it might have been expected that an instrument which five days after its execution had actually put an end to the lessee's right to the lease, would have been placed upon the register as a matter of ordinary prudence and precaution.

[399] One circumstance of improbability suggested by the High Court of Judicature must be dismissed as having arisen from a misapprehension of the facts. They say, "The lease in issue was on a stamp, the instrument to cancel it is on unstamped paper; and it is highly improbable that the precautions taken in this respect to fortify the lease should not have been adopted to strengthen and place as far as possible beyond question an instrument obtained to make void the lease, if such instrument were genuine." The fact, however, is, that both the lease and the instrument were originally without stamps, and upon both the penalty was paid for stamping them to render them admissible in evidence.

But a further improbability arises from the circumstance that after the Defendant had obtained this instrument, and the terms of it had not been complied with, he allowed the lease on the Bonds to remain in the Plaintiff's possession for upwards of six years without any attempt to obtain them from him, except what he states in his rejoinder, "That the money he was to pay back was ready, and the Plaintiff was searched for and could not be found." There is no evidence of this alleged fact, and it is highly improbable that the Plaintiff, who was carrying on business at Madura, should have eluded the Defendant's search during so many years. But if he was thus continually endeavouring to escape the fulfilment of his undertaking, it is the more extraordinary that the Defendant should not have instituted a suit against him to compel him to deliver up the lease and the Bonds upon payment back of the money he had received, and which alleges that he was ready to pay.

[400] But all these improbabilities are as nothing, in comparison with that which arises from the conduct of the Defendant in the present suit. The object of this suit is to obtain a decree to enable the Plaintiff to collect all the revenue of the Zemindary, to which he claimed to be entitled under the lease granted to him by the Defendant.

If the Defendant's case founded upon the document in question was a true one, he had a short and conclusive answer to the Plaintiff, and it is not unfair to presume that it would at once have been brought forward. It is not pretended that there is any distinct allusion to such a document in the Defendant's answer, but certain vague and doubtful expressions are relied upon, as showing that it must have been in existence at this time, although not specifically mentioned. But if this were the case it is most unaccountable, that the Defendant should have left this complete answer to the Plaintiff's case to the last stage of his pleadings, and even then have introduced it almost incidentally as part of a narrative of the transactions between them.

One other circumstance may be mentioned as prejudicial to the notion of this being a genuine document. The Defendant himself put in evidence a Bond, dated the 1st of September, 1856, executed by Mutta Pillai to the Plaintiff for the payment of a sum of Rs. 250, within ten months, from the profits derived from one eighth share of the Zemindary, and from the income of his own lands. The lease of the Zemindary was to commence in 1857, and Mutta Pillai would then be put in possession of his share. Mutta Pillai was the manager of the Defendant, and it is hardly possible to believe that if the [401] document in question had ever been executed, it should have been unknown to him, and that he should have been dealing with an interest in 1856 which had ceased to exist in 1851.

All these strong improbabilities the Defendant had to overcome before he could fairly expect that reliance would be placed upon witnesses, however numerous, to the execution of a document upon which his own conduct had thrown so much suspicion. All the facts were within his own knowledge, and yet he did not tender himself as a witness to strengthen the evidence which both from the station of the witnesses produced by him, and from the general character of their testimony, is extremely untrustworthy. No satisfactory explanation was even attempted of any of the extraordinary circumstances accompanying and following the supposed agreement, and the effect of them is not to be weakened, much less avoided, by the observation of the Civil Judge, that "there is no accounting for a native's acts."

Their Lordships think that the High Court of Judicature were warranted in their conclusion, that "upon consideration of all the circumstances affecting the credibility of the witnesses and the whole of the evidence, together with the probabilities and improbabilities of the case, the document had not been proved to be a genuine and binding instrument."

In adopting this view their Lordships are anxious to preserve to the Appellant all the rights which arose to the Zemindar out of his dealings with the Respondent. Although the Respondent may be entitled to possession under the lease, yet it may be at least questionable whether the transaction did not [402] operate merely as a security for the money advanced, and agreed to be advanced, and whether the Zemindar would not have been entitled to redeem. Again, the unwillingness of the Respondent to appear as a witness, knowing that it was not only asserted that he had not advanced the full sum agreed upon, but also that he was charged with imposition and fraud, makes it extremely doubtful whether the Zemindar ever received the whole amount of Rs. 3000. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the decree of the High Court of Judicature in favour of the Respondent for possession of the Zemindary under the terms of the lease be affirmed with costs, but with a declaration that it is to be without prejudice to the claim for redemption (if any) to which the Appellant may be entitled, and to any question which may be raised as to the amount actually advanced to the Zemindar by the Respondent.

[403] PRANKISHEN PAUL CHOWDRY,—Appellant: MOTHOORAMOHUN PAUL CHOWDRY,—Respondent * [Dec. 15, 1865].

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Calcutta.

An adult brother, a member of a joint undivided Hindu family, in consequence of disputes, separated from the family. As no regular partition of the estate was made, the lands remained undivided, and each member took his share of the rents. After a short separation, the brother returned to the family, and it was by a deed of Unghoputtur, or settlement, agreed that the acquisitions made by the elder brother during the separation should go into the joint funds. During the separation the elder brother purchased a Putnee Talook. Held, that the reunion of the Brother to the family remitted him to his former status, as a member of a joint Hindoo family, and that he was entitled to share in the purchase, as it must be presumed to have been made out of the funds of the joint estate.

The presumption of Hindoo law is, that property not shown to be separate is joint, and the onus probandi lies on the party claiming it as separately acquired [10 Moo. Ind. App. 411, 412].

The parties to this appeal constituted a joint undivided Hindoo family. The suit was brought by the Appellant in the Zillah Court at Nuhdea against his brother, Nobokishen Paul, deceased, and now represented by his son, the Respondent, to recover, after crediting the Defendant with certain moneys paid, a balance of Rs. 8244. 8a., together with interest thereon, making together the aggregate sum of Rs. 16,489 alleged to be owing from him, in respect of the moiety of the purchase money of a Putnee Talook; after an account taken of the reception of the rents [404] of the family property in which it was alleged the Appellant and Nobokishen Paul Chowdry held equal undivided moieties.

The Respondent's defence was, that the Putnee Talook had been purchased out of the joint family acquisitions; and upon that issue the case was tried by the Principal Sudder Ameen. The suit was dismissed by that Court, as well as by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to which an appeal was made, and from whose judgment the present appeal was brought.

The question turned upon the effect of the evidence adduced. The general facts, as well as such parts of the evidence essential to the comprehension of the case, will be found in the judgment of their Lordships.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant, contended, that the case made by the evidence was, that the purchase of the Putnee Talooks in question was made by the Appellant, and that the Respondent was a sub-purchaser of a moiety from the Appellant: thereupon he became liable for the payment of one moiety of the purchase money, and that though the Defendant pleaded that the purchase money was paid by the Appellant out of their joint moneys, and, therefore, nothing was due from him in respect of the sub-purchase, yet he had failed to establish such fact by evidence, and they insisted that the Respondent was estopped from entering into evidence on that point by a deed of Ungshoputtur, or settlement, of the 28th of July, 1848, made between the Appellant and the Respondent's father.

[405] The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. W. H. Melvill, appeared for the Respondent, but were not called upon by their Lordships, whose judgment was delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir James W. Colvile. — Their Lordships are of opinion that no ground has been shown for disturbing either of the decisions below, and, therefore, they do not think it necessary to call upon the Respondent's Counsel.

The case turns almost entirely upon the construction to be given to the deed of Ungshobodhareet Puttur. That deed not only defines the rights and obligations of the parties, but it contains a narrative of the facts of the case upon which we can rely, as it is a statement in which both parties joined, at a time when there was apparently no difference between them.

It appears, then, from that deed, that this was a joint Hindoo family, consisting of the Appellant, and the Respondent, and a younger brother of the half blood, who was a minor, and is since deceased. They were, in all respects, a joint and undivided family. In the year 1854 B.E., there were disputes between the adult brothers, and they separated, but there was no regular partition of the estate. The effect of the separation was that the lands remained undivided, but each brother, being no longer a member of a joint Hindoo family, took his share of the rents.

It appears from other parts of the Record, and although it is not very distinctly stated in the deed, [406] it would almost follow from the nature of the case, that the younger brother had then a large claim against the elder brother, who had been the manager of the estate, in respect of the rents and profits received previous to the partition. That is stated distinctly in the judgment of the Sudder Court, where the Judges say, "We find that the Plaintiff's Pleader admits that up to 1253 his client, as elder brother, made all the collections, and held all the joint funds of the family. That although a separation took place in 1253, and the Plaintiff was bound to give a full and honest account of his management, no such accounts were ever rendered for the satisfaction of the brother Defendant."

The separation of the two brothers continued for little more than eleven months: they then agreed to come together again, and this deed was executed. The deed states that, during that period, the elder brother had entered into a treaty for the purchase of the Putnee Talook, the price of which is the subject of the present contention: and further, that the youngest brother having died, and his mother having taken his share by inheritance, Prankishen Paul Chowdry had purchased that share from her, subject to an annual payment of Rs. 1200.

On the reunion of the two brothers, which of itself remitted them to their former status as members of a joint Hindoo family, it was expressly agreed that those acquisitions which the elder brother had made whilst the separation continued, should all go into the joint fund, and the deed provides the terms upon which that should be done.

Now, the material parts of the deed with respect [407] to these transactions are these: first, there is a recital "that I, Prankishen Paul Chowdry, by contracting loans, negotiated to take in Putnee Turruff Munsebpore and Dhee Rajapore, benamee in the name of my relative, Sunboodchunder Singh, inhabitant of Dowlutgunge, and advanced the byana, or earnest money." Then it states, "Afterwards a settlement was effected between us brothers, and again the entire property came into our ijmaltee possession, as it had been before, and the Putnee, etc., that had been recently purchased also came under the ijmaltee settlement, and of the balance of the consideration or purchase money of the aforesaid Munsebpore, etc., taking no putnee, some was paid by us two from our private funds and some portion by loans raised in bonds given by us respectively, and by granting durputnee pottahs, and we obtained a Pottah of the said Putnee, and both brothers remained in ijmaltee possession, having taken from the aforesaid Singh an ikra or acknowledgement of the benahee; at present we two brothers have brought under ijmaltee the entire hereditary and acquired property, and that which has been recently acquired as putnee, and all real and personal property, have made this condition and settlement that from hence the whole is to remain ijmaltee, and that such property of the share of Ramkishen Paul as I, Prankishen Paul, had purchased and held under a perpetual Pottah was likewise to become ijmaltee and held by us in possession in equal shares, and that we two brothers will pay the profits of the said property to our step-mother, and that whenever we, or our heirs, share and take the aforesaid and other property, we, or our heirs in such case, shall equally share and take our said deceased half brother's property, and not [408] more, and the shares of the same shall never be more or less."

In short, it is expressly provided that the entire property, whether ancestral, or then acquired, or thereafter to be acquired, is to be joint, and enjoyed in equal moieties. Then follow certain directions for the management of this joint estate, including provisions for giving the elder brother a larger share in such management, all of which are immaterial to the present case.

Then follows that which appears to their Lordships to be one of the most important provisions in the deed. It is to this effect, "All the money that has been borrowed on our joint Bonds, and that which I, Prankishen Paul, had borrowed during the time of our separation, on bonds given in my own name, and which said money has been paid as the consideration or purchase money for the putnee of Turruff Munsebpore and Debee Rajapoor, shall all be accounted as our ijmaltee debt, and the said ijmaltee debt shall be liquidated by us out of the profits of the ijmaltee property." As their Lordships understand that stipulation, it provided that whatever Prankishen Paul had borrowed on Bonds given in his name, or whatever the two had borrowed on their joint security, in order to provide the consideration money paid for the purchase of these two Putnees, should be a charge on the joint estate, and should be liquidated out of the joint property; but they can find in that no provision whatever for the repayment, out of the joint property, to the elder brother, of any funds which he might have advanced, or might have alleged that he had advanced, on the same amount, out of his private money. The deed is, upon that [409] point, entirely silent, and, as one of their Lordships observed in the course of the argument, it would be a strange thing to infer from this silence an implied promise to pay the sum sought to be recovered in this suit.

Then follow provisions to which we shall afterwards refer, providing for the event of a subsequent disagreement between the parties, and a second partition, and then comes this stipulation:—"No party shall make any claim hereafter upon the other on account of any cash having reference to the former ijmaltee period, that is, for the time anterior to the year 1254, B.S. I, Prankishen Paul, have no claim upon you, Nobokishen Paul, on account of the price of the real and personal property of Ramkishen Paul's share, for which I had obtained a perpetual Pottah, and which I had obtained in the way of a purchase, and whatever writings have been executed and given by me to our step-mother, we both shall be bound to comply with the conditions thereof." Now, those last words show that although Prankishen Paul may have paid out of the money which he had collected formerly, or out of private resources, or in any way, for the share of his half brother, yet he throws all that into the joint concern, and there is no claim to be made upon the younger brother in respect of that acquisition. That is express. Again, there is, no doubt, a general covenant or agreement that no claim shall be made upon him in respect of any moneys for which he may have been accountable in respect of those earlier collections. And Mr. Leith relies upon that as an answer to that portion of the Respondent's case which rests upon the assumption that the moneys which are in dispute [410] came out of these former collections, and were applied by Prankishen Paul to the purchase of the Putnee Talooks. But it seems to their Lordships that the whole deed must be taken together, and as one general compromise; and if they are right in their construction of the former clause, that there was no provision made for the payment, or the adjustment of the price of the Putnees, except in so far as it consisted of borrowed money, which was to be paid out of the assets of the joint estate; then, when they find afterwards an agreement that there shall be no account in respect of the former collections, the two must be taken together, and must be construed to import that whilst, on the other hand, the elder brother makes no claim in respect of any moneys which he may have applied in that way, so, on the other hand, the younger brother says, I will make no claim for any monies ultra that, and I will treat the whole account as settled and closed by this arrangement.

Therefore, upon this deed if it stood alone, it would be very difficult to say how the present claim could be supported.

We find, however, that the case which the parties contemplated really happened, and that after a short period of reunion they again separated, and the deed of partition, which, though not printed in the record, has been produced to-day and is now before us, was executed. We find in that deed no provision at all for such a claim as this, while we do find a provision for the payment of those debts which, upon the construction which we have put upon the clause, really would fall upon the joint estate. That provision imports, "that the money borrowed under simple [411] and mortgage Bonds is to be liquidated by both in equal portions." Therefore, the subsequent deed of partition seems to be entirely consistent with what was contemplated by the former deed, and does not in any way re-open any of the accounts settled by that deed.

It would, then, as it seems to us, be extremely difficult to support the case made by the Appellant, even supposing that the funds in question were really his private funds. If, indeed, the sums mentioned in the jumma khurruch, which seems to have been used originally to meet the fraudulent claim of the trustee, to hold the Putnee Talooks as his own, if those sums, though described as coming from the private funds of the Appellant, had been alleged and proved by him in this suit to have been money actually borrowed on Bond or otherwise, and had been so brought within the stipulation of the deed, the case would have been very different. But no such issue was raised by the Appellant.

The issue of fact upon which the parties went to trial was raised by the other side, and, as ultimately settled, was this, "whether it was true that the Plaintiff had, out of his own funds, paid the sum of Rs. 20,120, or that the said amount had formed a part of the ijmalee funds of the two parties." The Appellant gave no evidence on this issue: the Respondent examined four witnesses upon it, and it was found in his favour. Their Lordships have no doubt of the propriety of that finding. It is not even alleged upon these proceedings, that the parties originally had any separate property; the presumption of Hindoo law in such cases is, that property not shown to be separate is joint; and it is an [412] admitted fact that the Appellant was long in the management of the joint estate, had received the collections from it, and was accountable for them to his younger brother. And if the moneys employed in the purchase of the Talooks formed part of those so drawn from the joint estate, it follows that the Respondent on the reunion was entitled, upon the general principles of Hindoo law, and independently of the express provisions of the deed, to share in them, as acquisitions made by the use of the joint funds.

Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that the decrees of the Courts below were right; and they have no difficulty in determining humbly to recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

[413] SHEONATH, alias BURAY KAKA, Appellant: RAMNATH, alias CHOTAY KARA,—Respondent * [Nov. 28, 1865].

On appeal from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oude.

No power is vested in the Court of the Civil Judge at Lucknow, under the provisions of secs. 312 and 314 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act, No. VIII, of 1859), which is in force in Oude, to refer the decision of any issue raised in a suit to Arbitrators nominated by the Court against the protest of one of the parties [10 Moo. Ind. App. 423-426].

An Award, founded on such a reference, held on Appeal, not binding on a Defendant and set aside, as the parties must either name the Arbitrators, or consent to the nomination of them by the Court.

A party is not bound to appeal from every interlocutory Order which is a step in the procedure that leads to a final decree. It is open on appeal from such final decree to question an interlocutory Order [10 Moo. Ind. App. 423].

In this case the suit was instituted by the Respondent against the Appellant in the Court of the Civil Judge at Lucknow. The parties were cousins, natives of Lucknow, jointly interested in certain ancestral [414] estates. They also carried on business in co-partnership as Bankers and Merchants. The business in which they were engaged was carried on by them in three Kothees, or Firms, styled Hurjus Roy and Gungaram, and two other names. Disputes arose between them, and to a certain extent, a partition of the joint property was made, leaving open the debts due to the Firms up to the date of the partition. Farighkluutees, or mutual releases, were executed upon that footing. Notwithstanding this partition, the disputes between the parties relative to their rights continued, and after an ineffectual attempt to settle these disputes by a reference to Arbitrators, which was never carried into effect, the Respondent instituted the present suit against the Appellant. By the plaint, a general account and partition was prayed for, on the allegation that no account had been settled between the parties, and that the releases given on the execution of the before-mentioned arrangement were not operative, as no partition had taken place.

The suit went through its various stages: but as the material question on appeal was narrowed to a single point, namely, whether it was competent to the Court under the Civil Procedure Act, which is in force in Oude, to refer one of the questions at issue to Arbitrators nominated by the Court, against the protest of the Defendant, it is not necessary further to state the proceedings, which are fully detailed in their Lordships' judgment.

The Civil Procedure Act of the Legislative Council of India, No. VIII, of 1859, entitled "An Act for simplifying the Procedure of the Courts of Civil Judicature not established by Royal Charter," secs. 312 and 314, upon which this question was decided, provide as follows:—

[415] By section 312, it is enacted, that "If the parties to a suit are desirous that the matters in difference between them in the suit, or any of such matters, shall be referred to the final decision of one or more Arbitrator or Arbitrators, they may apply to the Court at any time before final judgment for an order of reference," and Section 314, declares that "the Arbitrator or Arbitrators shall be nominated by the parties in such manner as may be agreed upon between them. If the parties cannot agree with respect to the nomination of the Arbitrator or Arbitrators, or if the person or persons nominated by them shall refuse to accept the arbitration, and the parties are desirous that the nomination shall be made by the Court, the Court shall appoint the Arbitrator or Arbitrators."

The Respondent put in no appearance to the appeal, which was, consequently, heard ex parte.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant. As the Appellant refused to agree to the persons nominated by the Judge of the Civil Court as Arbitrators, upon an issue referred to them, the Award is not binding on him. The Arbitrators were, in the absence of the Appellant's consent, never legally appointed, so as to enable them to act as Arbitrators; Code of Civil Procedure, Act, No. VIII, of 1859, secs. 312, 314. The Award, therefore, must be set aside and the case remitted to the Court below.

Judgment was reserved and now delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir James W. Colvile (Dec. 22, 1865). The Appellant and Respondent are first cousins, [416] and natives of Lucknow, and were formerly jointly interested in certain ancestral property, and in the business of three Kothees, or Firms, the styles of which were Hurjus Roy and Gungaram, Gungaram and Juggurnath, Sheonath and Ramnath. Each appears to have been also possessed of separate property.

In 1859 they made a partition, as far as they then could, of their joint property; and on the 16th of September of that year they interchanged Farighkhuttees, or instruments of mutual release, of which that executed by the Respondent, after stating that the two parties were jointly interested in the before-mentioned firms, and had settled the accounts of them amicably, and had made an equal division of the entire ancestral property, moveable and immoveable, cash, promissory notes, etc.; and after formally abandoning all claims on account of the said firms against the Appellant and his heirs,—contained this passage, "But I have a claim to an equal share of such moneys as may be realized on account of debts due to these Firms on this date, and I also hold myself liable for a moiety of such sums as may be due by these Firms up to this date."

In 1861 there was a dispute, the precise nature of which is not disclosed, between the cousins respecting the division of the paternal estate, and the debts due to or by the Firm of Sheonath and Ramnath; and they agreed to refer the matters in dispute to the arbitration of five persons, named Hyder Hosein Khan, Meer Wajid Ali, Mr. Jacob Johannes, Sah Mukhun Lall, and Girdharee Lall. A written agreement to this effect was executed by each on the 8th of May, 1861; but the Appellant afterwards drew back from his agreement, and refused to have it registered; and [417] nothing came of this attempt to settle the dispute by arbitration.

In September, 1861, the Respondent, Ramnath, instituted this suit against the Appellant. The plaintiff sought a general account and partition: it alleged that no account had ever been settled between the parties; it mentioned the execution of the Farighkhuttees, but alleged that there had been no partition, as stated in them; that the partition was intended to take effect after a settlement of accounts, when the Farighkhuttees were to have been registered; and that, in the meantime, they had remained with the Appellant as incomplete instruments. It referred, also, to the agreement for a reference to arbitration, but only as evidence that the whole property still remained undivided.

The cause was tried by the Civil Judge of Lucknow (Mr. E. G. Fraser), with the assistance of a jury, and his decree, founded on the findings of the jury, established that there had been an actual partition and division of the joint property; that the Farighkhuttees had been executed on the footing of it, without taint of fraud, and that the Respondent had failed to prove that he had any interest in a fourth Firm which the Appellant carried on under the style of Ramnath Rughonath. It also decided against the Respondent a question in the suit touching the profits made by the Appellant by means of sale and purchase of Government notes during the rebellion.

The Respondent appealed against this decision to Mr. Campbell, then the Judicial Commissioner, who by his Order of the 15th of May, 1862, affirmed it on all the points raised by the appeal. His judgment, however, contained these passages: "But it seems [418] clear that there is one account between the parties still quite unadjusted, viz., the division of the outstandings, which was left open at the time of the division of assets. I think it would be proper that a sum in satisfaction of all claims on this account should be awarded to Plaintiff, so as to settle the matter, and I remit the case to the Judge to decide that point. If possible, a decision should be obtained from the arbitrators previously appointed by the parties." And again, "There was something very considerable to be settled that still remains to be settled, and I trust that, in accordance with my Order, the Judge will manage, by a successful arbitration, to give the Plaintiff a fair equivalent for his share in the outstandings of the three firms."

The effect, therefore, of this Order was conclusively to limit the claim of the Respondent to his share in the outstandings of the three Firms; and to direct, or at all events to suggest, that that claim should be enforced not by taking the accounts upon the footing of the Farighkhuttees in the regular way; but by giving him a lump sum as the value of his interest therein, and that such value should be fixed by the Award of the Arbitrators to whom the parties had formerly proposed to refer their disputes.

The cause being thus remitted to the Civil Judge, that officer, on the 7th of June, 1862, made an Order, whereby he referred to four out of the five Arbitrators formerly named (the fifth, Girdharee Lall, having left Lucknow) the decision of the following questions: first, what accounts remained unadjusted between the parties; second, what amount of outstandings remained then unrealized and undivided; third, what amount should be given to the [419] Plaintiff (the Respondent) as an equitable acquittance of his share therein. He directed the Arbitrators to file their award within two days, and empowered them, should they be equally divided in opinion, to elect an umpire.

The Appellant did not acquiesce in this Order. On the 10th of June, 1862, he petitioned the Judicial Commissioner against it. In his petition he stated, that he had no objection to the Order of the appellate Court referring the question of joint but divisible debt to arbitration, but that he objected, on the grounds therein stated, to the Arbitrators to whom the Civil Judge had referred the case, and requested that other Arbitrators might be selected by the parties, and that his case be referred to them. The Order of the Judicial Commissioner on this petition was in these words: "It is in the Judge's discretion to employ the Arbitrators formerly named by the parties, or to arrange new ones if he can. I do not think it possible that a complicated account can be settled by a jury."

The Appellant being thus referred back to the Civil Judge, presented on the 13th of June a petition to that Officer, in which he reiterated his objections to the Arbitrators named, and begged the Judge, as authorized by the Judicial Commissioner, to dismiss them, and to order "other Arbitrators to be named, composed of such parties as I and the Plaintiff may select." This application was on the 23rd of June, 1862, rejected by the Judge, who gave the following reasons for his decision: "I see no reason to change. I acted on the Judicial Commissioner's Order, and transferred the case to the old Punches. If their work, when it comes in, prove open to suspicion, or [420] is anywise unsatisfactory, I shall not decide upon it, but I think it desirable to have the fullest light they can throw on the matter. If they are partisans, and go in favour of Plaintiff unduly, they will still have to show grounds. If they go against the Plaintiff, whose friends they are said to be, it will be all the more satisfactory to the Defendant." Against this last Order the Appellant appealed by petition dated the 25th of June, 1862, to the Judicial Commissioner, whose order thereon was in these words, "I will not interfere in this stage."

The Appellant afterwards, and before any Award was made, presented two further petitions to the Civil Judge. The first of them is dated the 22nd of July, the other the 19th of August, 1862. In these, after referring to his ineffectual protests against the nomination of the particular Arbitrators, and to the determination of the Judge not to change them unless they proved themselves partial and unfair, he objected to their mode of proceedings. And in the last petition, he expressly asked that their Award might be set aside, and that new Arbitrators might be appointed in their stead, by which means justice might be done him.

The Arbitrators filed an Award about the 20th of August, 1862, on which day it was returned to them by the Judge for amendment as to its form. It was filed in its amended form on the 25th of that month. Its effect was, that the amount which the Respondent could fairly claim from the Appellant in respect of the outstandings was Rs. 66,090, besides one moiety of a judgment debt which had been recovered in the Civil Court of Cawnpore, and was described as the "Rusdhan decree."

[421] On the 4th of September, the Award was discussed before the Civil Judge. He overruled the Appellant's objections to it; observed that it did not include the sums due to the firms on mortgage, and that the question to what the Plaintiff was entitled in respect of these must be referred back to the Arbitrators. His decree was to this effect: "I accept the decision of the Arbitrators, awarding Rs. 66,090 to the Plaintiff as equivalent for all outstandings except the mortgages, and half of the Rusdhan decree."

Against this decree the Appellant, on the 16th of October, 1862, appealed to the Judicial Commissioner. The Order passed by him on the following day was in these words: "Case is not completed; appeal will be heard when the whole is complete."

On the 20th of December, 1862, the Arbitrators, to whom a fifth (Ihtimamood Dowlah) seems to have been added, made their Award in respect of the mortgages. The effect of it was, that a further sum of Rs. 15,000, should be paid on this account to the Respondent by the Appellant.

On the 22nd of December, 1862, the Civil Judge adopted this finding in spite of the Appellant's objections, and ordered that he should within three months make good this sum, as well as those which by the decree of the 4th of September, he had been ordered to pay.

The Appellant appealed also against this decree to the Judicial Commissioner. His petition of appeal, which is dated the 16th of March, 1863, states, amongst other things, that the Arbitrators had been challenged by him both in the Lower Court and in the Judicial Commissioner's Court. This appeal, and that against the decree of the 4th of September, [422] 1862, of which the consideration had been postponed, was brought before Mr. Cooper, who had then become Judicial Commissioner, in the place of Mr. Campbell, and he, on the 3rd of July, 1863, upheld the Awards of the Arbitrators, and affirmed both the decrees of the Civil Judge.

Against this decision the present appeal is brought.

Their Lordships will assume, and such is, in fact, their opinion upon the facts before them, that if the questions which the Arbitrators have determined were properly referred to them, no sufficient grounds for impeaching their Award have been established. It has, however, been strongly urged at the Bar that it was not competent to the Judicial Commissioner, except with the consent of both parties, to vary, as he did vary by his Order of the 15th of May, 1862, the rights of the parties under the Farighkhuttees, and to impose on the Appellant the obligation of purchasing the Respondent's interest in the outstandings on a rough estimate of its value. Another objection to the proceedings—and it is that on which the petition of appeal chiefly insists—is that the nomination of the particular Arbitrators by the Judge, without the consent and against the repeated protests of the Appellant, was altogether irregular, and that their Award is, therefore, not binding upon him.

Their Lordships do not deny the force of the arguments addressed to them on the first point, but they are nevertheless of opinion, that the determination of this appeal must depend upon the validity of the second objection; because if the nomination of the Arbitrators were regular, there is evidence in the petition of the 10th of June, and in other parts [423] of the proceedings, that the Appellant accepted the issue proposed by the Judicial Commissioner, and was willing that the accounts between him and the Respondent should be settled on that principle and by arbitration.

That both points are open to the Appellant, although he has in terms appealed only against the final decision of the Civil Judge and the confirmation of it by the Judicial Commissioner, is, we think, established by the case of Maharajah Moheshur Sing v. The Bengal Government (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 302) (see also Forbes v. Ameroonissa Begum, ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], pp. 340, 346). The appeal is, in effect, to set aside an Award which the Appellant contends is not binding upon him. And in order to do this he was not bound to appeal against every Interlocutory order which was a step in the procedure that led up to the Award.

Was it, then, competent to the Judge to refer the decision of this question to Arbitrators selected by him against the will and in spite of the repeated remonstrances of the Appellant? When the suit was commenced, the powers and procedure of the Courts in Oude were still regulated by the Rules and Ordinances which had been passed by the Governor-General in Council in order to provide for the administration of justice in that Province on its first annexation? These were substantially the same as those which had previously been in force in the Punjab, and were known as the Punjab Code. But on the 6th of August, 1861, the Governor-General in Council, by a notification issued under the 385th section of Act, No. VIII. of 1859, extended to the Province of Oude the provisions of that Act [424] (which is generally known as the Code of Civil Procedure), subject to certain exceptions and provisions as from the 1st of January, 1862. The exceptions are only five in number; they are modifications of the 3rd, 17th, 111th, 172nd, and 205th sections of the Act, and none of them have any bearing on the questions raised by this appeal. At the date, therefore, of the Judicial Commissioner's Order of the 15th of May, 1862, the Code of Civil Procedure had thus been extended to and was in force in Oude.

The 388th section of that Code provides that from and after the time when this Act shall come into operation "in any part of the British territories in India, the procedure of the Civil Courts in such part of the said territories shall be regulated by this Act, and except as otherwise provided by this Act, by no other law or Regulation." The only exception as to suits pending at the time when the Act shall come into operation is contained in the preceding section, and is in these words: "If in any suit pending at the time when this Act shall come into operation, it shall appear to the Court that the application of any provision of this Act would deprive any party to the suit of any right in reference to the procedure of the suit, whether of appeal or otherwise, which, but for the passing of this Act, would have belonged to him, the Court shall proceed according to the law in force before this Act takes effect." There is no expression upon the face of the proceedings of an intention on the part of the Judges below to suspend or modify the operation of Act, No. VIII. of 1859, by virtue of the provisions last quoted, or otherwise. Nor is it easy to see how the compulsory reference to arbitration which is here [425] complained of could have been brought within the definition of a right belonging to the opposite party. Moreover, that party himself, in the proceeding, appealed to certain sections of the Act as establishing the finality of the Award, thereby admitting that the reference was to be taken as made under the new procedure. Any larger powers, therefore, which the Judicial Commissioner and his subordinate may have possessed under the Punjab Code must be held to have been suspended on the 15th of May, 1862; and the only question is whether the subsequent proceedings were authorized by the Code of Civil Procedure.

The 312th section of the Act provides, that if the parties to a suit are desirous that the matters in difference between them in the suit, or any of such matters, shall be referred to the joint decision of one or more Arbitrator or Arbitrators, they may apply to the Court at any time before final judgment for an order of reference. The 314th section provides, that the Arbitrator or Arbitrators shall be nominated by the parties in such manner as may be agreed upon between them. If the parties cannot agree with respect to the nomination of the Arbitrator or Arbitrators, or if the person or persons nominated by them shall refuse to accept the arbitration, and the parties are desirous that the nomination shall be made by the Court, the Court shall appoint the Arbitrator or Arbitrators.

These sections clearly import that the parties must either name the Arbitrators or consent to the nomination of them by the Court. They are the only provisions which bear upon the subject; and it follows that the Code gives no authority to the Court to force upon a reluctant party the decision of any [426] question in the cause by Arbitrators selected at its discretion. It may be observed that the Punjab Code, Part II., sec. 2, cl. 15, seems to require, as might be expected, equally with the Code of Civil Procedure, the consent of the parties to a reference to, and the appointment of Arbitrators.

Their Lordships need hardly observe, that if the appointment of the Arbitrators in this case was irregular, the irregularity was in no degree cured by the fact that they were four out of five persons to whom the Appellant had on a former occasion agreed to refer the matters then in dispute between him and the Respondent. That agreement to refer had proved abortive: the Respondent's suit was not brought to enforce it, but for the determination of the rights of the parties by the Court; and the question referred to the Arbitrators was an entirely new question, suggested by the Judicial Commissioner.

Again, the appeal having been heard ex parte, their Lordships have felt bound to consider, whether this case could be brought within the principle of those authorities, which establish that a defect in the nomination of Arbitrators, may be cured by the waiver implied from the act of the party in going in before them, and taking his chance of a favourable decision. Their Lordships are, however, of opinion that the Appellant cannot be held to have forfeited in this manner his right to question the validity of these awards. From what has been already stated, it appears that his protests and appeals were frequent, and were repeatedly rejected as inadmissible by the Judges. Whatever part he took in the proceedings before the Arbitrators, he must be deemed to have taken under a continuing protest, and in self-defence.

[427] Their Lordships, therefore, however much they regret the necessity of re-opening this litigation, feel bound to allow the present appeal.

It is not improbable that the decrees impeached give no more to the Respondent than upon a proper adjustment of the accounts will be found to be his due. But this result has been reached by referring a question which involves a compromise of the strict legal rights of the parties, to Arbitrators who were not duly authorized to determine it. The consent of the Appellant was essential both to the form of the issue, and the constitution of the Tribunal that was to decide it. It was wholly wanting to the one; if given at all to the other, it was, at most, a qualified consent.

The only remaining question is, with what directions this cause should be remitted to the Courts below? It will, of course, be open to the Judge, if both parties consent, to refer the question suggested by the Order of the 15th of May, 1862, or any other question directed to the ascertainment of their respective rights in the outstandings, to Arbitrators duly appointed under the Act, No. VIII. of 1859. But if the parties do not consent to any such mode of settling their disputes, it will be the duty of the Judge to adjust the accounts still unsettled between them in the regular way, by taking an account of the debts which were due to and from the three Firms at the date of the Farighkhuttees, and of what has been received and paid in respect thereof, and by whom; and by inquiring whether any and which of the debts due to or from the said firms, remain outstanding and unpaid respectively, and by ascertaining what, upon the result of these accounts, is [428] due from either and which of the parties to the other of them. Act, No. VIII. of 1859, sec. 92, seems to give to the Court the power of appointing a Receiver if one should be necessary.

Their Lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend Her Majesty to reverse the decree of the Judicial Commissioner of the 3rd of July, 1863, and that of the Civil Court of Lucknow of the 4th of September, 1862, and to remit the cause to the Judge, with directions to wind up the outstanding concerns of the three Firms pursuant to the Farighkhuttees, unless the parties shall consent to any other mode of determining their rights in these outstandings. Their Lordships think that the Appellant is entitled to the costs of this appeal, and also to the costs of the Order of the 15th of May, 1862, and of the proceedings following upon it.

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Madras.

In a suit which involved a disputed question of fact as to an alleged adoption and the due execution of a Will, the Court in India disregarding other evidence, relied solely upon the evidence of a witness examined at the instance of the Court itself. The effect of the evidence of this witness was to show that at the time of the adoption and execution of the Will, the alleged Testator was in a dying state, and, although at times roused to consciousness, was, from his enfeebled mind, incapable of understanding the acts he was represented to have performed: the Court below, however, upon the evidence of this witness, as to his testamentary capacity, corroborated, as it thought, by a letter of the widow of the alleged Testator, recognizing the adoption, and by her acquiescing in the performance of certain funeral rights of her deceased husband by the supposed adopted son, pronounced both the adoption and the Will to be valid. Upon appeal, held, that although as a general rule, in a question of fact, the Judicial Committee were unwilling to disturb the judgment of the Court below, yet that as it was the duty of the appellate Court to weigh the evidence and probabilities, and form an independent judgment, and taking into consideration the evidence regarding the state and capacity of the alleged adopter and Testator, they were of opinion, that the evidence relied upon was so unsatisfactory, that neither of the decrees of the Courts below could be supported, and reversed the same with costs.

The appeal in this case was brought from a decree of the Sudder Court at Madras, which Court affirmed a decree of the Civil Court of Cuddalore, in a suit instituted by the first Respondent, as guardian of the [430] second Respondent, a Minor, the alleged adopted son of one Balakristnama Naiker, deceased, against the Appellant, the widow of Balakristnama Naiker, and other Defendants, to recover the estate of Balakristnama Naiker in the possession of the Defendants. An alleged Will of Balakristnama Naiker was also set up, which instrument, after reciting the adoption, and appointment of guardians to the second Respondent during his minority, purported to bequeath one-fourth of his estate to the Appellant, his widow. The fact of the adoption and execution of the Will were both denied by the Appellant. Witnesses were examined on both sides, whose evidence as to the adoption and execution of the Will was so unsatisfactory, that the Judge of the Civil Court of Cuddalore called an independent witness, not named by either party, and upon whose individual testimony, in addition to an arzee sent to the Collector of the District informing him of the adoption, and alleged to have been signed by the Appellant, who lived in seclusion, the day after her husband's death, the Courts in India pronounced both the adoption and Will valid. Hence the present appeal.

The general facts of the case, and the effect and weight of the evidence, is stated in their Lordships' judgment.

The appeal was heard ex parte.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and Mr. Pontifex, for the Appellants.

The consideration of their Lordships' judgment was adjourned, and now pronounced by

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford (Dec. 22, 1865).—After stating the nature of the appeal, his Lordship proceeded as follows:—

The claim to the property is founded on an alleged [431] adoption of the infant, Virasami Naiker, by Balakristnama Naiker on the day of his death, on which day it is alleged, that he also executed a Will, by which he appointed the Respondent, Sashachalla Naiker, the uncle of the infant, and Devanavaga Naiker, the father of his wife (the Appellant), the guardians of his adopted son, and "to manage all the affairs," till his adopted son came of age.

The alleged adoption took place at 7 o'clock, and the Will was made about 9 o'clock, in the evening of the 30th of July, 1849. Although there was no necessary connection between these two acts, as the adoption might be good and the Will invalid, yet it is difficult to separate the different transactions of the day from each other, or to view them in any other light than as different parts of one arrangement.

On the part of the Appellant both the adoption and the Will are disputed, the first by denying that it ever took place, and both upon the ground that Balakristnama Naiker was on the day in question utterly incompetent to perform either of the acts imputed to him.

The acts which are said to have constituted the adoption are described by all the witnesses in almost the same words (no unusual circumstance with Indian witnesses), but there is no reason to suspect that these acts were not performed; and the mere factum of the Will appears to be sufficiently established by the evidence

There was no proof that application had been previously made to the natural parents of Virasami to give their child in adoption, nor was it shown that Balakristnama Naiker had ever contemplated the adoption of this boy before the day in question.

[432] The acts were performed without much preparation, and without many of the accustomed ceremonies, but it was admitted in argument that they were not essential, and that enough was done (if there were no other objection but the absence of these ceremonies) to constitute a legal adoption.

The case was heard ex parte before their Lordships, but in the Civil Court in India it was strongly pressed against the Appellant in support of the validity of the adoption, that she was a consenting party to it, performing her part in the ceremony, and afterwards showing by unequivocal acts her entire acquiescence in what had been done. These acts were—allowing the boy to perform the funeral rites as an adopted son, and the day after the adoption putting her mark to an arzee addressed to the Collector of Southern Arcot, stating the adoption and the performance of the funeral rites by the adopted son, and praying for the transfer into his name of her late husband's property.

With respect to the arzee, the Appellant, who was examined as a witness in the suit, positively denied that she ever put her mark to it, and asserted that it was a fraudulent imposition upon her; and, as to the performance of the funeral rites, it was alleged on her behalf that they were not performed by Virasami as an adopted son, but as her agent, she being unable by the custom of her caste to go out and perform them herself.

The evidence in support of the arzee is not of the most satisfactory description. Devanayaga, the Appellant's father, by whom it is said to have been prepared, and who wrote her name before she put her mark to it, was not produced, although he was in the [433] list of witnesses delivered in by the Plaintiff. The reason for not examining him is stated in a memorandum presented to the Court by the Plaintiff, "that he suspected Devanayaga Ayangar was associating with the adverse parties."

With respect to the performance of the funeral rites considerable doubt at least arises upon the testimony of the Purohit, or family Priest, whether they were really performed by the boy as an adopted son.

But assuming both these acts to be satisfactorily established, and also the participation of the Appellant in the proceedings of the 30th of July, 1849, all this will not sustain the validity of the adoption, unless it clearly appears that the act itself was performed under such circumstances as would render it perfectly legal.

The concurrence of the widow, and the various acts of acquiescence attributed to her, would be important if they were brought to bear upon a question which depended upon the preponderance of evidence; but if the facts are once ascertained, presumptions arising from conduct cannot establish a right which the facts themselves disprove. The Appellant is a Hindo female. So long as she is acting without the guidance of a disinterested adviser her acquiescence in an alleged adoption or Will ought not to prejudice her. In such a case as the present it was hardly to be expected that she would be capable of distinguishing between an adoption in fact, and a legal adoption, or between a Will in fact, and a valid Will. The acts attributed to her are really no confirmation of the Respondents' case, as every one of them upon [434] which reliance is placed might equally have been done with respect to a legal or an avoidable adoption.

The question, therefore, will be, not whether certain acts were done which if unobjectionable in other respects would have constituted adoption, but whether the alleged adopting father was of sufficient capacity at the time to understand the nature and object of those acts, and voluntarily gave an intelligent consent to their performance.

On this question, upon which the validity of the adoption and of the Will depends, many witnesses were called on both sides. It is unnecessary to examine the evidence, or to weigh one set of witnesses against the other, because the Judge who tried the cause in the Court below declined to decide the case upon their conflicting testimony, but himself directed an additional witness to be examined, and taking the facts deposed to by him as to the bodily and mental state of Balakristnama Naiker at the time of performing the acts in question, made them the foundation of his judgment. Can it be said that he rightly exercised his judicial function in the appreciation of those facts, and in the correct application of the law to them? What is the description given by Kandoji Rao, the Court witness, as he is called, of the state of Balakristnama Naiker on the day in question? That of a dying man, almost continually insensible, though occasionally roused to consciousness by loud tones, or by pungent applications to his nostrils, but almost immediately afterwards relapsing into a state of insensibility, and when momentarily conscious, with his mind quite inert and instantly fatigued upon the slightest exertion.

How is it possible that a person in such a condition [435] could be capable of any act requiring judgment and reflection, especially one to which no antecedent circumstances appear to have led, and for which the enfeebled and scarcely conscious mind was unprepared. In such a state as that described, even if the mind were passively awake to the suggestions made to it, it would naturally cling to repose, and yield, for the sake of it, to any external suggestion. Viewing the adoption and the Will together, they present every appearance of a concerted family arrangement. As an adopted child passes into a new family, his natural relations become, as it were, strangers, and the association of the boy's natural uncle with the father of the adopting mother for which the Will provides, must be regarded as a contemporaneous and concurrent act with the adoption. If the law were to countenance acts of this description, performed at such a time and under such circumstances, without the clearest and most cogent evidence to establish their validity, relations and managers would be encouraged to advance their own private notions of what might be advisable to be done for the good of the family, and to ascribe acts to a dying man in which he would have been the merely passive instrument to prolong their own gain and authority.

If this question had come originally before their Lordships and not by way of appeal, they would have had no difficulty in deciding that Balakristnama Naiker was on the day in question quite incompetent to perform the adoption, or any other act requiring the exercise of the powers of judgment and reflection.

They have, however, to deal with the case under the influence of two previous decisions at variance with their own views. But the concurrence of opinion of [436] two Courts in India, even upon a mere question of fact, has not upon previous occasions prevented their Lordships acting upon their own independent judgment. In the case of Rungama v. Atchama (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 1), upon a disputed question of adoption, the Provincial Court and the Sudder Court on appeal, held that the evidence was not sufficient to establish the fact of adoption: but their decision was reversed by this Committee. Precisely the same state of things occurred in Huradkun Mookurjia v. Muthoranath Mookurjia (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 414), and with the same result. And in Mudhoo Soodun Sundial v. Suroop Chunder Sirkar Chowdry (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 431), Dr. Lushington in delivering the judgment of their Lordships, says in p. 433, "Both the Courts below have decided against the validity of the instrument; a fact which, considering the advantages the Judges in India generally possess, of forming a correct opinion of the probability of the transaction, and in some cases of the credit due to the witnesses, affords a strong presumption in favour of the correctness of their decisions, but does not, and ought not to relieve this, the Court of last resort, from the duty of examining the whole evidence, and forming for itself an opinion upon the whole case."

This case is something different from a mere question of fact. The matters questioned, an adoption and a Will, involve both the factum of each and the capacity of the alleged adopting father and Testator. Each of these acts interferes with and displaces previously existing rights, inchoate or presumptive. A Judge who decides in favour of a disputed adoption or Will in a case of questioned capacity of a dying [437] man, must apply his mind not simply to the act of adoption in fact, or to the execution in fact of a Will, but he must be careful to see that the jealous requisitions of the law as to the proof of acts of persons done in extremis are fully complied with. Now, in this case the Judge, not satisfied with the evidence brought before him, selected a witness to assist him with his judgment. There was no careful weighing of the evidence on both sides, but his decision was founded upon the single testimony of this witness. The Sudder Court say, "Little need be added to the arguments on which the Civil Judge has founded his decision," and they add nothing. They, therefore, adopt the conclusions at which the Civil Judge arrived, based not upon a review of the whole of the evidence, but upon a witness chosen by himself, whose testimony in the opinion of their Lordships does not warrant the judgment which he has pronounced. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that the decrees appealed from be reversed, with costs.

[438] MAHARAJAH RAJUNDUR KISHWUR SING, BAHADOOR,—Appellant;
SHEOPURSUN MISSER,—Respondent * [Feb. 7 and 8, 1866].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal.

A summary suit was brought by A. against B., to recover arrears of rent of certain Mouzahs alleged to be held by B. under a Lease and Kabooleat. The defence by B. to the suit was a denial that the latter instrument had been executed by him, and he set up a title to the Mouzahs as being Bhakee Birt tenure. The Deputy Collector before whom the suit was tried, doubted the execution of the Kabooleat by B., and dismissed the suit. A. then brought a regular suit against B., seeking, first, to establish his proprietary title to the Mouzahs as Zemindar; secondly, to set aside the summary award; and thirdly, to recover arrears of rent under the lease and Kabooleat, when B. raised the same defence as in the summary suit. The Sudder Court nonsuited A., and dismissed the suit for multifariousness and misjoinder. Such decree reversed on appeal by the Judicial Committee as, by the rules of pleading in India, a claim for rent in arrear, and to remove doubts in A.'s title as Zemindar to lease to B., as raised by the defence, is not objectionable on the ground of multifariousness, but can be included in one plaint.

The Appellant in this case by his suit claimed, first, possession of certain Mouzahs, as forming part of his Zemindary; secondly, to set aside a summary award which upheld the Respondent's right under an alleged Bhakee Birt tenure; and thirdly, to recover arrears of rent under a lease and Kabooleat, alleged by him to have been granted to the Respondent of the Mouzahs in question. The Sudder Court, in effect, reversing the decree of the Zillah Court, declined to adjudicate the case upon the issues raised as to the title [439] of the Appellant as Zemindar to the Mouzahs, on the ground of the multifariousness and misjoinder of claims in the plaint. Hence the present appeal.

As the judgment upon appeal was confined to a question of pleading, it is only necessary to give a brief outline of the facts.

It appeared from the statements in the Appellant's case that the entirety of Pergunnahs, Majhona and Sumraom, comprising the Zemindary of the Appellant, were permanently settled by the Government, under Ben. Reg. I., of 1793, in the years 1790-1, without specification of Mouzahs, and only by Tuppahs, with the grandfather of the Appellant, Maharajah Beer Kishwur Singh. That the Mouzahs in question, ten in number, were included within two of the settled Tuppahs, viz., Tuppah, Chigwun Butsurra and Tuppah, Manpore, situate in Pergunnah Majhona. The Maharajah died in possession of the entirety of the Zemindary, which ultimately descended to the Appellant.

It further appeared, that since the permanent settlement in 1790-1, the Mouzahs in question, had been let to different tenants, at varying jummas, sometimes jointly with other lands, and sometimes separately. That from the year 1223 [Fusly,

* Present: Members of the Judicial Committee,—The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford, the Right Hon. Sir James William Colville, and the Right Hon. Sir Edward Vaughan Williams. Assessor,—The Right Hon. Sir Lawrence Peel.

1815-1816 C.E.] to 1819 C.E., the Mouzahs were let to Nanouh Ram Misser, the father of the Respondent, afterwards to other persons, and further, that in the year 1850, the Appellant's ancestor, Maharajah Nawul Kishwur Singh, had granted to the Respondent a lease of the Mouzahs for five years, at a jumma of Rs. 2305 13a. 6p., delivering to him a Pottah, and taking from him a Kabooleat, or counterpart, of such lease.

[440] The rent secured by the lease and Kabooleat falling into arrear, the late Maharajah in 1853 instituted a summary suit against the Respondent in the Deputy Collector's Court of Chumparun, to recover the arrears due. The Respondent by his answer denied that he was lessee of the Mouzahs, or had taken any lease, or executed a Kabooleat, and set up a title to the Mouzahs as having for a long time been ancestral, and purchased as Blakee Birt by his ancestors; that his ancestors and himself had been in possession of the Mouzahs, paying the revenue, according to the rent-roll fixed in Fusli, 1197, yearly, to the Maharajah, in consequence of its being joint at the settlement of the lands in 1198, Fusli (1790-1), and that the Maharajah had no right to diminish or enhance the registered jumma. This was denied by the Maharajah, but the Deputy Collector being of opinion, that the execution of the Kabooleat was doubtful, dismissed the summary suit.

In consequence the Maharajah brought a regular suit in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen, for the District of Sarun, against the Respondent.

In the plaint the claim was laid at Rs. 68,036 7a., the value of the lands in dispute and balance of rent due for the years 1260 and 1261 Fusli (1852-3; 1853-4 C.E.). The plaint stated, that the Plaintiff sued for possession of the Mouzahs, his hereditary property, amounting in extent to 2587 beggahs of land, and valued at Rs. 64,700, the price of the land at issue, at the rate of Co.'s Rs. 25 per biggah, and to recover Rs. 1030 9½a. arrears of rent for 1260 Fusly, for which a summary suit was pending, and Rs. 2305 13a. 2p., the rent for 1261 Fusly, inserted [441] in the Kabooleat, dated 5th of the month of Assin, 1258 Fusly, making an aggregate claim of Co.'s Rs. 68,036 7a.; by the annulment of a summary award of the Deputy Collector of the District of Chumparun, dated the 29th of the month of May, 1854, and by the cancellation of a letter affirming the Blakee Birt, dated the 17th of the month of Assar, 1232 Fusly, and alleged by the Defendant to have been granted by Maharajah Anund Kishwur Singh to Nanouh Ram Misser, the father of the Defendant. The principal facts above stated were set forth in the plaint, and, amongst others, that the Mouzahs in question were a part of the Plaintiff's settled ancestral Zemindary, and had been let on lease or farm to divers persons, and, among others, to the Respondent, and previously to his father, since deceased. The plaint also stated that litigation had occurred in 1228 Fusly (1820-1 C.E.), between the late Maharajah Anund Kishwur Singh and the father of the Respondent, and pleaded and insisted on the disclaimer made therein, on the 18th of September, 1824, and which then became and thereafter remained matter of record, of the Blakee Birt tenure and title set up by the father of the Respondent, and also on the judgment of the Magistrate, dated the 16th of February, 1825, founded on that disclaimer; and the plaint charged and insisted that a letter and four acquittances said to bear the seal of the late Maharajah, and relied upon in the summary suit by the Respondent, in order to avoid the effect of such disclaimer, were forgeries; and in corroboration the plaint referred to the previous legal proceedings brought against the Respondent for rent, and by him [442] against the Ryots, in which he was described as "farmer" merely, and also to the fact that no mention was made therein respectively, or otherwise at all, of the pretended Blakee Birt tenure, letter, or acquittances aforesaid respectively, since the disclaimer, and the judgment of the Magistrate. The plaint, after pointing out that the finding of the Deputy Collector, on the comparison of seals merely, in favour of the authenticity of the alleged letter and acquittances, was erroneous, and not founded on any sufficient proof, concluded by insisting that the proprietary right and possession of the Maharajah and of his ancestors with respect to the Mouzahs in question, and the absence of any interest of the Defendant in them, were manifest; nevertheless, owing to the Deputy Collector having passed an Order for the dismissal of the claim for rent, it had become necessary to prefer a claim for possession by the annulment of the award, and to recover the rent, and prayed that the summary award, and the letter of Blakee Birt pleaded by the Defendant, might be annulled, and that possession of the Mouzahs, and the claim for rent, with interest hereafter, and Putnee mesne proceeds, with interest to the day of possession, be granted from the Defendant.

The Respondent by his answer, after taking several technical objections to the suit and to form of the plaint, stated that the Mouzahs came into possession of his father at different periods, as Blakee Birt at a jumma, or rent of Rs. 1901, the revenue fixed, as it was alleged, at the settlement of 1197 Fusly. The answer then admitted the legal proceedings had taken place in 1228 Fusly, between Maharajah Anund Kishwur [443] Singh and the Respondent's father, and the filing of the disclaimer by the father, which he accounted for as being given under coercion and pressure. The answer denied the execution of the Kabooleat by the Respondent, and then referred to and relied on the award or decree in the summary suit brought on that instrument for rent.

Issues were recorded by the Principal Sudder Ameen, the principal being, first, whether there was a misjoinder of claims, and secondly, as to the alleged tenure of Blakee Birt.

Both parties went into evidence to establish their respective claims, and the hearing of the suit took place on the 3rd of May, 1856, before the Principal Sudder Ameen (Mirza Mahomed Saduk Khan) of the District of Sarun, when a decree was made in favour of the Plaintiff. In that Judgment all the technical objections pleaded in bar were set aside, and it was therein stated, that the suit had originated agreeably to the reasons stated in the plaint, on account of the plea of Blakee Birt having been set up on the part of the Defendant in the summary suit; that in fact, the Kabooleat and summary suit were for nine Mouzahs, but, inasmuch as the plea of Blakee Birt referred to eleven Mouzahs, and one out of these was not under litigation, for this reason, the claim was for ten Mouzahs. That these facts were all manifest from the plaint and replication, and that there was no flaw in this case; and passing over some other technical points, it was declared, that there was no misjoinder of claims, because the principal claim was for possession by the annulment of the Blakee Birt, and the claim for rent had been connected with it like mesne [444] proceeds; that, till 1261, which was within the term of the lease pleaded by the Plaintiff, the claim was under the designation of rent, and subsequent to that the application was for mesne proceeds till the recovery of possession; and that, therefore, there was no joinder of contradictory claims. The decree then decided against the Kabooleat of the Defendant, filed by the Plaintiff, stating that it was not proved to the satisfaction of the Court; and that its genuineness could not be relied upon, because it had been executed upon plain paper, and attested by two of the subordinates of the Plaintiff; that when the jumma contained in a Kabooleat was high, that is, above Rs. 2000, and there has been a contention with the Defendant on a former occasion, its execution in this manner was surprising, and that in such a case it was necessary that the Kabooleat should have been executed upon stamp paper and registered, and ordered that the case be decreed with a modification, that the Plaintiff be put in possession of the Mouzahs in question and recover from the Defendant the mesne proceeds thereof, from that day's date till recovery of possession, whatever might be ascertained at the execution of the decree, with costs proportionate to the amount proved, and interest according to practice; that the costs of the Plaintiff for the amount unproved be charged to the Plaintiff, and that the costs of the Defendant be borne by himself.

The Defendant appealed against this decree to the late Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal. The principal ground of appeal was, that by reason of the claim being multifarious, the Plaintiff ought to have been nonsuited. A cross appeal was also brought by [445] the Appellant against so much of the last-mentioned decree as declared that the Kabooleat was not proved to have been executed.

The hearing of both appeals came on before the late Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the Courts consisting of Messrs. B. J. Colvin, A. Sconce, and D. J. Money, on the 31st of July, 1858, when a decree was pronounced, reversing the decree of the Principal Sudder Ameen, and dismissing, or nonsuiting, the Plaintiff's suit. The judgment of the Sudder Court stated, that the Plaintiff's Pleaders contend, that the Kabooleat said to have been executed by the Defendant on the 5th Assin, 1858, was a reciprocal contract, binding by its terms on both parties; that this contract being repudiated by the one party, could not be binding on the other: that the Defendant, rejecting the Kabooleat, relied upon an earlier title, and that this earlier title being opposed to the Plaintiff's right as Zemindar, he was competent to sue to set it aside; that the averment that the Defendant was a farmer for five years, created by the will of the Zemindar, was a simple and limited issue; but if that issue was not substantiated, it appeared to the Court that it would be unjust to the Defendant to put him to the disadvantage of opposing his ejection from the villages upon grounds incompatible with the ground which Plaintiff chose as his cause of action. And, lastly, the Court considered the Kabooleat of 5th Assin, 1258, not to be substantiated; and that it would be improper to proceed to adjudicate upon issues which could arise only from circumstances foreign to the claim founded upon that document. The decree accordingly dismissed the Plaintiff's suit, so far as it concerned the validity of the Kabooleat; but did not adjudicate any issue as to the Defendant's [446] right of occupancy of the villages, or to his alleged Bhakee Birt tenure, declaring that on those points the decision would have the effect of a nonsuit.

The present appeal was from this decree.

No appearance having been put in by the Respondent, the appeal was heard ex parte.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant.—This decree is most unsatisfactory. The Court below refused to decide upon the merits, upon a technical ground of pleading, which we submit cannot be sustained. There was, we submit, no such misjoinder of claims as justified the Court in non-suiting the Appellant. The Court, having regard to the pleadings and circumstances of the case, ought not to have refused to adjudicate the issues raised as to the Respondent's right of occupancy of the Mouzahs in question, under the alleged Bhakee Birt tenure set up by him, and as to the effect of the summary decision of the Deputy Collector establishing the same. [Sir Lawrence Peel: The Sudder Court seems to forget the rights of the Plaintiff, and to treat the defences of the Defendant as the cause of the Plaintiff's action.] The primary object of the suit was to obtain a reversal of that summary award, and to have it decreed and declared that such Bhakee Birt tenure did not exist, and then on the assumption that such a tenure did not exist, as ancillary thereto, and on his right as Zemindar and proprietor of the Mouzahs, to obtain in the alternative, either a decree for the rent due during the time the Respondent was in possession under the lease and Kabooleat, or a decree for possession, in the event of his denial of such a lease.

[447] Upon the merits we contend that from the frame of the answer, the onus probandi was on the Respondent to prove the Bhakee Birt tenure, relied upon by him, which he failed to do; while, on the contrary, the Appellant established his preliminary title, and that the Mouzahs were held by the Respondent's father, himself and others, as ordinary lessees, at varying rents, and not under any fixed tenure, as he set up in his defence.

Judgment having been reserved, was now delivered by

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford (Feb. 10, 1866).—This is an appeal from a decision of the late Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal, which reversed a decision of the Zillah Court in favour of the Appellant, the Plaintiff in the suit. The decision of the Sudder Court proceeded solely on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action in the Plaintiff's suit. That objection had been raised in, and overruled by, the Court below. It is necessary for the due consideration of this objection to ascertain carefully what are the causes of action which are stated in the plaint. The plaint states them with sufficient precision in the first paragraph. It alleges that the Plaintiff sues, not summarily, but in due form, for possession of certain Mouzahs which it describes by names and boundaries, and which it alleges to be his hereditary property; and also to cover certain arrears of rent, amounting to Rs. 1030. 9½ for 1260, Fusly, for which a summary suit was pending; and Rs. 2305. 13a. 2p., the rent for 1261, Fusly, inserted in the Kabooleat, dated the 5th of the month of Assin, 1258, Fusly, by the annulment of a summary award of the Deputy [448] Collector of the District of Chumparun, dated the 29th of May, 1854, and by the cancellation of a letter affirming the Bhakee Birt tenure, dated the 17th of the month Assin, 1232. This specification of the causes of suit is accompanied with statements of the falseness of the claim to the Blakee Birt tenure, of the danger which the Plaintiff apprehends to his proprietary title from the summary decision above mentioned, that its annulment is impossible without a regular suit, and he concludes the paragraph by stating that he sues, therefore, for the reversal of the summary award, the confirmation of his proprietary interest and possession, and the refutation of the allegations of the Defendant respecting the Blakee Birt tenure.

The case, then, as alleged in the plaint, if the plaint be regular, must be brought within the principles stated in Mr. Macpherson's Book on "Civil Procedure," page 111 [3rd Ed.], where he says, "A plaint may have an appearance of doubleness when it prays, not only for possession, but that the transactions upon which the Defendants are supposed to found their title may be set aside; but the latter prayer is merely subsidiary to, and, in fact, forms part of, the former, because possession cannot be given without first removing the existing impediments." This question is distinct from any that relates merely to defect of proof or error in law, in a Plaintiff's view of his case in the whole or part, that may warrant a dismissal at the hearing wholly or in part. The question here relates to unity of title, and connection and dependence between the claims of the Plaintiff. In this suit the Plaintiff's title is one: it is his proprietary right as Zemindar. We must look to the Plaintiff's admitted title as Zemindar and to the in-[449]-terference with such title by an established tenure of this kind, to learn what is meant by the term "possession." The Mouzalis are part of the Plaintiff's Zemindary; the Plaintiff is the assessed proprietor under the Decennial Settlement. The Defendant claims that which would, if established, be a dependent tenure, the Zemindar being his immediate superior in the holding. It is not a Ryotwary tenure at all, and no question as to Ryot's title to occupancy can arise in this dispute. All the distinct portions of the Plaintiff's claim flow from, support, and have relation to and connection with his proprietary title, which prima facie entitles him to the collections. The farming lease supports it, the rent payable under that lease supports it, and the removal of the adverse title would confirm it.

If this tenure be not interposed between the Zemindar and the cultivators, the ordinary relation between him and them exists; but if it be interposed, the Zemindar's general proprietary title to the collections is gone, and in lieu of it he is simply entitled to some jumma from the mesne proprietors. It is obvious, then, that the assertion of such a title is a serious prejudice to a Zemindar, and may materially interfere with his successful management of his Zemindary. Such an intermediate tenure cuts off the possession, that is, the Zemindar's title to the rents and profits immediately derived from the cultivators.

In this sense, the term "possession" is used in this plaint. Now, this injury, supposing the claim to the Blakee Birt tenure to be groundless, is not the less a wrong requiring a remedy, when it is put forward by one in possession under a title to an inferior right, derived from the Zemindar: as, for instance, by a farmer [450] of a portion of the Zemindary. If such a claim were preferred by a person having such an interest, it would certainly be competent to the Zemindar, if the claim amounted to a repudiation or worked a forfeiture of the existing interest, to sue for the restoration of possession, and the quieting of the claim also; because the limitation of his demand to that of possession would keep alive an adverse claim, and would also multiply suits.

A Zemindar, or landlord, may waive a forfeiture, and may treat a tenancy or interest as continuing which his tenant repudiates, or in respect of which he has incurred a forfeiture. Consequently, the mere inclusion of a claim for rent in a suit of this character cannot make the suit multifarious, unless it could be treated as multifarious if it insisted on the repudiation or forfeiture.

If the Blakee Birt tenure be valid, the Plaintiff has no title to possession in the sense in which he uses that term. He might have a right to rent for a time on the footing of contract, or estoppel even from a Birt tenant, if the latter accepted a lease, but that would rest on special grounds, and would not flow from his general proprietary title. Until this claim to a Birt tenure, therefore, be removed, the Plaintiff cannot have the "possession" which he seeks, since, in some way or other, the Defendant stands between the Plaintiff, as owner of the prima facie proprietary right and the cultivators. Had the Defendant admitted the tenancy under the Kaboolat, the Plaintiff's title to the rent would have been established, but that admission, unless qualified, would also have removed those impediments to the Plaintiff's proprietary title which he desires to have removed; but [451] as the Defendant repudiates that tenancy altogether, he, at least when the Plaintiff fails to prove it, cannot urge it against the Plaintiff's title. See in the case of Rajah Oodit Parkash Singh v. Martindell (4 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 451), Lord Kingsdown's judgment in affirmance of the general principle.

This lease being removed (the Plaintiff having failed to prove it, and the Defendant renouncing it), what bar is there to the assertion of the proprietary right to the collections, unless the Birt tenure interpose one! On that bar the Defendant does rely, and unless it be removed, the Plaintiff can scarcely expect to lease or otherwise manage his Zemindary with effect. It is an impediment in the way of his possession, which the suit is instituted to remove. The reasons alleged in the Sudder Ameen's Court for overruling the objection seem to be unsatisfactory; for as the title to mesne profits supposes a wrong, and the title to rent proceeds in contract, the union of such causes of action would be contrary to principle. But as these Courts have the divided jurisdiction of a Court of Law and a Court of Equity substantially united in one Court, a claim for rent in arrear, and a claim to remove clouds on the title to demise raised by the tenant, seem to be unobjectionable, and no authority was cited to support the objection. In truth the claim to rent under the farming lease supports the proprietary title.

No inconvenience can result from the inclusion of these subjects in one suit, since the defence to the claim for rent in fact raised them all, and they were dealt with without confusion or difficulty.

Their Lordships think, therefore, that the Sudder Court should have heard the appeal upon the merits. [452] Their Lordships ought, upon general principles, to give now the decision which the Sudder Court should have given; but a difficulty has been interposed in the Court of the Sudder Ameen, which renders a decision on the Birt tenure impossible by this Board. The question of this Birt tenure has not been adjudicated upon in the Court below. The Sudder Ameen should have allowed the Defendant to get his documents stamped, and, if necessary, should have adjourned the hearing for that purpose. The Court, however, excluded them from evidence, as unstamped, and as documents which were inadmissible unless stamped. The Plaintiff ought not in any way to be prejudiced by this neglect of the Defendant, and to allow the Defendant to reargue these questions as to the Birt tenure in another suit would be a serious injustice and wrong to the Plaintiff. The proper course, then, to be adopted is to reverse the decisions of the Sudder Court and of the Sudder Ameen, and to remand the cause to the lower Court, not for the purpose of taking further evidence, or of hearing the cause on fresh materials other than the stamped documents, but to enable the Defendant to get the instruments stamped. The inferior Court should then decide on the evidence already taken in the cause, and on those documents, if stamped, with reference to all the issues raised on the cause, give a complete decision on them all. Their Lordships will forbear from expressing any opinion upon the validity of the Birt tenure, on the evidence in its present imperfect state; but they think it proper to observe that if the Birt tenure be displaced, that displacement will tend considerably to fortify the Plaintiff's proof of the Kabooleat; for the Defendant's possession [453] would then have no apparent title, unless one derived from a lease from the Zemindar, the sole proprietor; no person (on that hypothesis) intervening between the cultivators and the proprietary title of Zemindar.

This Order for remanding the cause to be thus reheard, will entitle the Plaintiff to have the matter of his appeal to the Sudder on the Kabooleat reopened. It is in favour of his appeal so far as to subject the decision against the Kabooleat to review upon the reconsideration of the whole case upon the merits. The consideration of a case upon evidence can seldom be satisfactory, unless all the presumptions for and against a claim arising on all the evidence offered, or on proofs withheld, on the course of pleading, and tardy production of important portions of a claim, or defence, be viewed in connection with the oral or documentary proof which per se might suffice to establish it. This caution is more particularly necessary in India, where fabrication of seals and documents is so common and so skilfully conducted.

Their Lordships will recommend to Her Majesty that the decrees of the Sudder

Court, and of the Sudder Ameen be reversed; that the Appellant should have the costs of the appeal; that the cause be remanded to the High Court, with directions to send the cause back to the Zillah Court for re-trial, on the issue of the existence of the Birt tenure, giving the Respondent an opportunity of having the unstamped documents stamped, if he shall be so advised, but making him liable for the costs of the first trial, which his omission to have those documents stamped has made abortive.

[454] LALLA BUNSEEDHUR.—Appellant: KOONWUR BINDESEREE DUTT SINGH, and after his death, MUSSUMAT GUNAISH KOER,—Respondent * [Feb. 5 and 7, 1866].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of the North West Provinces at Agra.

In 1850, the guardian of a Minor (his stepmother) by an Ikrarnamah, among other things, charged the Minor's ancestral estate with the payment of Rs. 27,000 in favour of L., the amount of his alleged claim against the estate, respecting which an appeal was then pending, but to which estate he was himself a debtor, undertaking at the same time to prosecute certain claims against M., L. agreeing to advance money for that purpose, and to resist certain claims brought by M. against the Minor's estate. In February, 1851, M. having obtained judgment against the estate for Rs. 26,986, and taken out execution thereon, the estate was advertised for sale on the 20th of that month. To prevent the sale, L. advanced the amount of the judgment debt, and on the 19th of that month commenced a suit against the guardian in which he claimed the Rs. 26,986, the amount advanced by him, and the Rs. 27,000 agreed to be paid him by the Ikrarnamah, and the further sum of Rs. 1351, alleged to have been paid by him for the proceedings against M., making together Rs. 55,341. On the following day the guardian filed a confession of judgment admitting the debt, hypothecating the Minor's estate, and undertaking to pay the same by instalments, with the exception of the Rs. 27,000, at six per cent. interest. The instalments not being paid, L. in 1853, took out execution on the judgment, and under the execution put up the estate for sale, and became the purchaser himself. On the Minor attaining his majority, he brought a suit to set aside the sale, impeaching the transaction as fraudulent and collusive obtained by L. from his late guardian. The Courts in India set aside the sale upon the ground of fraud, and decreed the restitution of the estate, with mesne profits and damages, subject to the repayment, by way of reduction, of the Rs. 26,986 at five per cent. Upon appeal, such decree affirmed by the Judicial Committee, first, on the ground that the transaction was fraudulent and collusive, and prejudicial to the estate of the Minor: there being no evidence to show the necessity for the guardian obtaining the pecuniary assistance sought, or to justify her submitting to L.'s extraordinary terms contained in the Ikrarnamah, by allowing, without consideration, his doubtful claim against the Minor's estate, to which he really was a debtor himself; and secondly, that L., who set up the charge, had failed to relieve himself of the burden which the Hindoo law cast upon him of showing that he had, at least, good ground for supposing that the transaction was for the benefit of the Minor's estate.

In setting aside the Ikrarnamah and sale, interest was allowed L. on the Rs. 26,000, advanced by him, at the rate of six per cent. contracted for in that instrument, in lieu of five per cent. awarded by the Sudder Court.

Such a modification of the decree of the Court below, held not sufficient to deprive the Respondent of costs of appeal.

* Present: Members of the Judicial Committee.—The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford, the Right Hon. Sir James William Colvile, and the Right Hon. Sir Edward Vaughan Williams. Assessor,—The Right Hon. Sir Lawrence Peel.

The case of Ali Hossain v. Badel Khan (19th of May, 1863, S.D.A., N.W.P.), where it was held, that there is no difference to be made between the innocent purchaser and one tainted with fraud, which had brought about an execution sale observed upon and dissented from.

The suit out of which the present appeal arose was instituted by the late Koonwur Bindseree Dutt Singh deceased, and afterwards represented by the Respondent, [455] against the Appellant and Goolab Koonwur, his step-mother, who had acted as his guardian during some part of his minority. The object of the suit was to recover a Talook, and other ancestral property, purchased by the Appellant at a judicial sale under a decree, which it was alleged had been fraudulently procured by him through collusion with Goolab Koonwur, in a suit brought by him in which she had allowed judgment to go by default; the suit having been originally instituted under an Ikarnamah, or deed of agreement, executed by her as guardian to the Respondent, charging the Minor's estate.

The adverse title set up by the Appellant was thus derived. Sheodutt Singh, the Respondent's father, died on the 3rd of July, 1849. He had had, in his lifetime, pecuniary dealings with one Seetaram Singh, the Appellant's father, and these had involved him in a long course of litigation with the Appellant. For advances to carry on that litigation, or otherwise, he had become largely indebted to one Mohun Lall. At [456] the time of his death his son (the Respondent) was but four years old; and his step-mother, Goolab Koonwur, became his guardian.

In February, 1850, a negotiation took place between her and the Appellant, which resulted in her executing to him on the 17th of that month, an Ikarnamah, or deed of agreement. By that instrument she, amongst other things, charged the Minor's estate with the payment of a sum of Rs. 27,000 to the Appellant, and undertook to prosecute certain claims against Mohun Lall; the Appellant undertaking to advance money on certain terms for that purpose, as also for the purpose of resisting the claims which Mohun Lall was prosecuting against the Minor's estate.

In February, 1851, Mohun Lall having obtained judgment against the estate for Rs. 26,986. 15a. 4p., and taken out execution thereon, had advertised the estate for sale, on the 20th of that month. It was alleged that to prevent this sale, the Appellant advanced the amount of the judgment debt; and, on the 19th of February, commenced a suit against Goolab Koonwur, as the guardian of the Respondent, in which he claimed, as due to him from the estate, the amount of that advance, the sum of Rs. 27,000, which was stipulated by the Ikhar to be paid to him; and a further sum of Rs. 1354. 1a. 9p., alleged to have been advanced for the purposes of the proceedings against Mohun Lall, making, in all, the sum of Rs. 55,341. 1a. 1p. On the following day the guardian, as Defendant, filed a confession of judgment, admitting the whole amount claimed to be due; undertaking to pay it by annual instalments of Rs. 7000; reciting the Ikhar and the advance of the Rs. 26,986. 15a. 9p.; hypothecating the Minor's estate [457] as a security for the whole amount admitted to be due; and providing that in the event of any failure in the payment of the annual instalments, the Appellant should be at liberty to take out execution against the hypothecated property for the whole amount of his judgment debt with interest. It was stipulated, however, that the Rs. 27,000 should bear no interest, and that the rate of interest on the rest of the debt should be six per cent.

The instalments were not paid; and, in 1853, the Appellant took out execution on the judgment confessed for the sum of Rs. 70,168. 7a. 11p., put up the property for sale under that execution, and on the 20th of June, 1853, purchased it himself for Rs. 51,635. In consequence, however, of a mortgage on the Talook, which was held by Mohun Lall, which gave rise to a protracted litigation, he did not obtain possession of that portion of the property purchased until the year 1860.

The Respondent attained his majority in December, 1860, and commenced this suit on the 22nd of July, 1861. By his plaint he impeached as invalid and collusive the Ikhar, the cognovit or judgment by confession, and the execution sale, as being collusively obtained from his guardian.

The principal Sudder Ameen (Moulvee Mohumud U'bdoola Khan), of Zillah Allahabad, made a decree in the Respondent's favour on the 11th of November, 1861, awarding him possession of the estate sued for, with Rs. 36,470. 11a. 6p. for mesne profits and damages, out allowing the Appellant to set off against this sum the sum of Rs. 28,418. 3a. 10p., which was compounded of the before-mentioned items of Rs. 26,986. 15a. 4p. and Rs. 1351. 1a. 9p. On [458] appeal, the Sudder Court at Agra consisting of Messrs. Roberts and Batten, by its decree of the 20th of July, 1863, generally affirmed this decree, but reduced the damages awarded by an allowance of five per cent. for the cost of collection and management, and by the sum paid for income tax; and also reduced the reduction or set-off allowance to the Appellant by the item of Rs. 1351. 1a. 9p. And by its decree of the 31st May, 1864, made on an application for review of judgment, the same Court modified its own decree by allowing the Appellant interest on the principal sum of Rs. 26,986. 15a. 4p., which was to be deducted by him, at the rate of five per cent.

The appeal was from this decree.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Pontifex, for the Appellant.—The circumstances in which Goolab Koonwur, as guardian of the Minor, was placed at the time of execution in the Appellant's favour of the Ikrarnamah of the 17th of February, 1850, were such as to render it a proper act on her part. She acted under the advice of those who were interested in the preservation of the ancestral property of the Minor. It is clear that the estate would have been sold on the 20th of February, 1851, if the Appellant had not advanced the Rs. 26,986. Such a charge made by a Manager for the benefit of the Minor's estate is good by the Hindoo law. Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussumat Bahadur Munraj Koonwuree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 393) and authorities there cited (ib. 407). There was no evidence to show [459] fraud and collusion between Goolab Koonwur and the Appellant in the transaction, or that the same was prejudicial to the Minor's estate. We submit, therefore, that the auction sale to him was a regular and valid sale which cannot be annulled or set aside, and that he is entitled to possession under the sale. [Lord Chelmsford: You get a cognovit for Rs. 54,000 on an advance of Rs. 26,986, borrowed according to your argument to save the estate, but under that cognovit or confession of judgment, you force a sale yourself and actually buy in the Minor's estate. Can that stand?] The sale was by public auction under a decree of Court whereby the payment of the Rs. 26,986, advanced to save the estate, was decreed. If the transaction as to the Ikrarnamah fails, yet the Appellant was a purchaser at an execution sale and a decree holder. His rights were similar to a stranger purchasing, Ali Hossein v. Badel Khan (19th May, 1863, S.D.A., N.W.P.). At all events the execution sale was good to the extent of Rs. 26,986, and the decree appealed from, if correct, so far as possession was awarded to the Respondent, does not place the Appellant in the position in which, in equity, he is entitled to be placed, Brooklehurst v. Jessop (7 Sim. 438). Both Courts in India held that this particular sum, part of the amount awarded to the Appellant by the decree under which the auction sale took place, was actually advanced by the Appellant to Goolab Koonwur as guardian of the Minor and registered proprietor of his property, and if the decree had been confined to that sum, the sale of the estate would properly have taken place in execution thereof. Lastly, the Court below was wrong, [460] in allowing only five per cent. interest. The Sudder Court has no discretion to alter the rate of interest allowed in India, namely twelve per cent.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.) and Mr. Leith for the Respondent.—There was no legal contract between the step-mother, the Appellant and the Minor as would in equity bind the Minor's estate. The evidence shows the whole transaction tainted with fraud. [Lord Chelmsford: We are satisfied on that point; you will confine yourself to the question, whether interest ought not to have been allowed by the Court at the rate of twelve per cent.] No specific amount of interest was agreed to. The amount of interest is in the discretion of the Court. Here the Ikrarnamah and the whole transaction was collusive and fraudulent. In Lindsay v. The Oriental Bank at Colombo (13 Moore's P.C. Cases, 426) a wrong-doer was disallowed his advances, though for business purposes of a firm.

Their Lordships reserved judgment, which was now pronounced by

The Right Hon. Sir James W. Colvile (Feb. 26, 1866).—After stating the above facts his Lordship proceeded:—

"The first and principal question that arises upon it is whether the Ikrar of the 17th of February, 1850, which was executed by his guardian during his minority, is binding upon the Respondent.

In dealing with this question we have no difficulty about the ratio decidendi, since it is admitted that the principles which govern it have been authorita-[461]-tively laid down in the case of Hunoomanpersaud Pandey v. Mussumat Babooe Munraj Koonweree (6 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, p. 423). It is there said, "The power of the Manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, is, under the Hindoo law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in a case of need, or for the benefit of the estate. The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded." And again, p. 424, "The lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself, as well as he can, with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the Manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate." It follows, from the passages above cited, and from the rest of this judgment, that he who sets up a charge upon a Minor's estate, created in his favour by the guardian, is bound to show, at least, that when the charge was so created, there were reasonable grounds for believing that the transaction was for the benefit of the estate.

The learned Counsel for the Appellant have not ventured to contend that the stipulations of the instrument, to which these principles have now to be applied, were, upon the face of them, beneficial to the Respondent's estate. Their arguments have been directed to show that the whole transaction might be justified by a consideration of the circumstances in which the parties stood, and of the nature of the litigation in which Sheodutt Singh had in his lifetime been engaged. It becomes necessary, therefore, to review, as briefly as may be, the very tedious and intricate history of that litigation.

[462] In 1828, Seetaram Singh, the father of the Appellant, had lent, or agreed to lend, Rs. 29,500 to Sheodutt Singh, on a mortgage of the ancestral Talook now in dispute. The Talook consisted of twenty-nine villages, and the mortgage was to be a usufructuary mortgage by way of a lease for ten years of the whole Talook. Before this arrangement was completed, it appeared that the two other persons, named Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal, claimed to be prior mortgagees of part of the Talook.

It was at first settled between Sheodutt Singh and his mortgagees, that Seetaram Singh should apply part of the Rs. 29,500 in paying off Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal; but it was ultimately arranged between those two persons and Seetaram that the three should be jointly interested in the mortgage; the share of Seetaram being taken to be Rs. 17,700, and that of the other two Rs. 11,800. The instrument of the 27th of May, 1828, by which this so-called partnership was effected, provided, that if it should be deemed advisable thereafter to dissolve the partnership, the property should be divided and held separately in the proportions above specified.

They entered into possession of the mortgaged property in June, 1828, and in 1831 dissolved their so-called partnership; thereupon Bishun Dayal and Baijnauth became mortgagees in possession of twelve, and Seetaram became, or ought to have become, mortgagee in possession of the remaining seventeen villages of the Talook.

We say "or ought to have become," because it appears, from the subsequent proceedings, that he never was in possession of five of these villages; they having been transferred by Sheodutt Singh [463] prior to the mortgage to his wives and two other persons.

Seetaram carried on his general business in partnership with one Sheosuhai; and on the dissolution of their partnership, and a consequent division of its assets, this mortgage fell to the share of Sheosuhai. He was never, however, recognized as mortgagee by Sheodutt Singh, nor was his name recorded as mortgagee until after June, 1838, when the period of ten years, during which the possession of the mortgagee was to continue, expired. Sheosuhai and the other parties then in possession of the mortgaged premises, retained possession after June, 1838; they allowed the Government revenue to fall into arrear, in consequence of which the estate was attached, and let in farm, for six years, to one Ilahee Buksh, whose security, Torab Ali, acquired by assignment the whole of the interest, as mortgagee

(if any) of Sheosuhai, and also the mortgage rights of Baijnauth. Those of Bishun Dayal became vested in some other parties.

Torab Ali instituted proceedings on the mortgage securities against Sheodutt Singh, claiming the balance alleged to be due on them; but these proceedings, though successful in the Court of first instance, were ultimately dismissed by the Sudder Court, apparently on the ground that the mortgage debt had been satisfied by the perception of rents during the possession under the ten years' lease.

In this state of things, and on the 17th of June, 1842, Sheodutt Singh brought the first suit of which we have any mention against the Appellant and his brother, since deceased, as the sons and representatives of Seetaram Singh, and against all the other persons [464] who in the course of the transactions lastly above stated had become interested in the mortgage securities or had been in possession of the mortgaged premises. The object of the suit was to recover possession of the property, on the double ground that the principal and interest of the mortgage debt had been liquidated by the collections, and that the period for which the property had been mortgaged had expired; and it also claimed a large sum for the mesne profits of the four years during which it was alleged possession had been wrongfully retained.

It is unnecessary to consider very minutely the merits of this suit, because a final decree had been made in it before February, 1850, when the widow of Sheodutt executed to Bunseedhur the Ikramnamah in question. It is sufficient to state that although the plaint expressly stated that the principal and interest of the mortgage debt had been liquidated by the collections, the Appellant did not dispute that fact. His defence was simply that by reason of the assignments to Sheosuhai by his father Seetaram, he had ceased to have either interest or liability in the matter.

The course of the suit was as follows:—On the 26th of June, 1843, the Principal Sudder Ameen decreed in favour of the Plaintiffs for redemption and possession of the estate after the expiration of the farm, but nonsuited the claim for mesne profits and damages. On a remand from the Sudder Court, the same officer, by a decree, dated the 28th of November, 1843, made the Appellant and his brother, as co-heirs of Seetaram, liable jointly with Sheosuhai in the sum of Rs. 16,570. 7a. 9p., as mesne profits for the year 1246, but dismissed the claim for [465] damages for the years 1247, 1248, and 1249 B.S. It should also be mentioned that he expressly found in his judgment that the mortgage debt had been discharged. There was an appeal from this second decision, and the Sudder Court by its original decree on that appeal held, that the Appellant, as the then sole heir and representative of Seetaram (his brother having died), was solely liable to the Plaintiffs for the mesne profits and damages due to him; and that the sum awarded by the Principal Sudder Ameen ought to be increased by the mesne profits for the years 1247, 1248, and 1249. Their decree seems to have proceeded on the ground that Seetaram and his estate were primarily liable to the mortgagor for the nondelivery of the possession when it ought to have been redelivered; and were accountable for the mesne profits of the whole estate, notwithstanding the transfer to Baijnauth, Bishun Dayal, Sheosuhai, and others.

The Appellant applied for and obtained a review of this decree on the grounds that he was improperly charged with the mesne profits of the twelve villages held in possession by Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal; that he was improperly charged with the profits of the five villages of which, by reason of their assignment to Sheodutt's wives and others, Seetaram was never in possession; and that he was improperly charged with a certain amount under the head of Sayer. And he again raised the question that the effect of the transfer to Sheosuhai was to determine the liability of Seetaram for the profits of any part of the estate. The majority of the Court decided against the Appellant on the last point, and in his favour on the three others; and the final decree was [466] against him for the sum of Rs. 14,865. 10a., being the amount of the profits claimed in respect of the twelve villages of which Seetaram was unquestionably in possession after the dissolution of the so-called partnership between him and Baijnauth and Bishun Dayal. This final decree was dated the 1st of March, 1846. The Appellant satisfied this judgment by payments into the Court to the amount of Rs. 26,211. 12a. 9p.; and these moneys were afterwards paid out through the Mookhtar of Sheodutt Singh, and are those or some of those which in the third clause of the Ikrarnamah are alleged to have found their way into the hands of Mohun Lall.

The Appellant, having thus satisfied this decree, instituted in the year 1847 a suit against Sheodutt Singh. His claim was founded on the wrong done to Setaram by reason of his not getting possession of the five villages assigned to the wives of Sheodutt Singh, and was for the profits of those villages during the ten years of the mortgage lease. The gross amount claimed was Rs. 27,129. 6a. 6p. principal, and an equal sum for interest. The proceedings in this suit are not amongst the documents in the Appendix, and for the facts we are referred to the short report of the case in the fourth volume of the Sudder decisions for the North-Western Provinces (1849), p. 60.

From that, it appears that the Principal Sudder Ameen, on the 31st of December, 1847, decreed in favour of the Appellant upon the ground, certainly erroneous, that he had been made to pay the profits of these villages; but he awarded him only so much of the profits as fell within the period of twelve years prior to the institution of the suit: treating [467] the rest of the claim as barred by the Regulation of Limitation. The Sudder Court on appeal reversed this decree, and by its decree of the 26th of March, 1849, dismissed the Appellant's suit altogether. The reasons for the judgment are not very clearly expressed; but the Court seems to have been of opinion, that if Seetaram had any claim for damages in respect of the failure to give him possession of these villages, he should have sued during the currency of the lease; and that at all events his representative (the Appellant) could not then maintain that action. The Appellant obtained leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against this decree: and his appeal was pending in 1850 when the Ikrarnamah was signed.

In the meantime, and in 1848, Sheodutt Singh had brought his suit against the Appellant for the profits of the Talook during the years of the farming lease which were not covered by the former suit, and had obtained a judgment for the sum of Rs. 7480. 4a. 9p., which is the subject of the fourth clause of the Ikrarnamah. He had also commenced a third suit against the Appellant in the name of his son, the Respondent, in respect of property derived by the Respondent from his mother. That suit was undecided on the 3rd of July, 1849, when Sheodutt Singh died.

Hence at the date of the Ikrarnamah the position of the Appellant and the Respondent's guardian with reference to the antecedent litigation was this. The Appellant had been decreed to pay and had paid Rs. 26,211. 12a. 9p., in respect of the final decree of 1816. By the decree of 1848 he had been found liable to pay, but had not paid, Rs. 7480. 4a. 9p., with (probably) interest and costs. Another suit was pending against him, but had not been decided. On [468] the other hand, he had brought a suit to enforce a claim for upwards of Rs. 50,000 against the estate of Sheodutt Singh. But this claim had been only partially decreed in his favour by the Zillah Court, had been wholly dismissed by the Sudder Court, and was the subject of an appeal to England.

This being the position of the parties, what were the provisions of the Ikrarnamah which the guardian was induced to sign? The first clause, after stating that the Appellant had been unjustly made to suffer the losses which he had sustained, by reason of Sheodutt Singh's first suit, partly in order to compensate him for such losses, and partly in order to induce him to abandon the appeal in his own suit, made the estate liable to pay him Rs. 27,000, without interest. This clause was obviously against the Minor's interest, in so far as it reopened the questions closed by the final decree of the 1st of March, 1846: admitted the injustice of the claim on which it was founded: and gave compensation to the Appellant for the loss which it had inflicted upon him. It is contended, however, that the success of the appeal was so probable, and the consequences of that success were so serious, that the guardian was justified in spending Rs. 27,000 to avert that danger from the estate. This is the point which has been most laboured at the Bar, but their Lordships can find in the facts before them no reasonable grounds for such a conclusion. In the course of their ingenious argument, the learned Counsel for the Appellant were almost constrained to admit that the particular action was misconceived, inasmuch as it was brought to recover the mesne profits of certain villages of which ex concessis the Defendant had not been in possession. They were further obliged to admit that under Reg. XXXIV. of 1803, the interest [469] of the holder of a usufructuary mortgage in the property would cease on the liquidation of the usufruct of the principal and interest of his debt; and consequently that in any action founded on the breach of the agreement, express or implied, to give possession of the five villages, it was essential to allege and prove that, by reason of the nondelivery of such possession, something still remained due on the mortgage.

Their Lordships have extreme difficulty in seeing how such a suit could have been maintained by the Appellant; since in the first suit of Sheodutt Singh against him it had been alleged and proved as a fact, that the mortgage debt had been fully discharged; and he, instead of taking issue on that allegation, had sought to escape liability by showing that by reason of Seetaram's assignment to Sheosulhai he had no interest whatever in the mortgage. But assuming that he might have maintained such a suit, they have to observe that it would have been founded on a cause of action different from that on which the suit actually brought proceeded; and that it is not to be supposed that if the appeal had come here, this Committee would have taken the unprecedented course, suggested by Mr. Pontifex, of reversing a decree that had dismissed a suit improperly conceived, and of remanding the cause in order that it might be moulded into a suit of an entirely different character. To their Lordships it appears that the appeal occasioned no such danger to the Minor's estate; and that there are no grounds for saying that the stipulations of the first clause, so favourable to the Appellant, were for the benefit of the Minor, or could have been reasonably supposed to be so.

[470] The third clause appears to their Lordships to be of the same character. No plausible reasons have been assigned why the guardian should embark in an expensive litigation in order to recover back from Mohun Lall sums for which he would necessarily have to account in the general account then open, and unsettled between him and the estate; or why, in consideration of advances for the purposes of that litigation, she should agree to divide with the Appellant moneys which, if recovered, would belong to the Minor's estate. The latter objection affects also the seventh clause.

There is a conflict of evidence concerning the alleged payment of the sum of Rs. 7480. 1a. 9p. mentioned in the fourth clause. The oral evidence to negative the payment is undoubtedly very loose and unsatisfactory, and the Gomastah of the Appellant has given some evidence of the fact of payment, which he corroborated by the production of an entry in the Appellant's Books. On the other hand, it is remarkable that the Appellant, though examined as a witness on other points, did not depose to this payment; and the circumstance that the claim in respect of which this sum had been decreed was of precisely the same character with those which the first clause of the document had pronounced to be unjust tends to justify the conclusion of the Courts below, that this clause was under colour of an admission of a payment that was never made,—the release of a judgment debt to the prejudice of a Minor's estate. Their Lordships do not think it is necessary to decide the question whether this payment was really made. If it was not made, the clause, no doubt, affords another strong argument against the validity of the [471] Ikrar; but if it was made, it would not in any degree cure the other defects of that instrument, which would have to be considered as if this clause were not inserted in it. The fifth clause seems to imply the abandonment of the suit pending at the date of Sheodutt Singh's death. It was, therefore, also to the prejudice of the estate.

If the above-stated view of the particular clauses of the Ikrar be correct, the only ground on which the instrument can be supported is, that the transaction, as a whole, was for the benefit of the estate, because the necessity for obtaining the pecuniary assistance of the Appellant was so urgent that the guardian was justified in submitting to the extraordinary and usurious terms on which it was to be given. There is no proof of such a necessity; and it might be sufficient for the purposes of this appeal to say that, in their Lordships' judgment, the Appellant has wholly failed to relieve himself of the burden which the law casts upon him of showing that he had good grounds for supposing that this transaction was for the benefit of the estate.

Their Lordships, however, are disposed to go further, and to say that the Courts below were warranted in imputing the character of fraudulent contrivance to this transaction.

The negotiation out of which it sprang was one between a Purdah woman acting as the guardian and manager of an infant's estate, and a keen man of business, at that time a debtor to the estate. She is induced to sign an instrument which transforms the debtor into a creditor, and heavily burdens her ward's property without consideration, except the merely colourable one of the abandonment of the appeal, and [472] the promise of future advances for the purposes of litigation, of which a portion, at least, was neither necessary nor prudent: of litigation which, if unsuccessful, would be ruinous to the estate, and, if successful, was to result in a division of spoils absolutely incompatible with her duty as guardian. It is not shown that, in coming to this agreement, she had the assistance of proper or independent advisers. On the other hand, it is not shown affirmatively by what practice (if any) upon her ignorance or her fears she may have been induced to execute the document. She may or she may not have been fully informed as to what she was doing. But whether she was herself defrauded, or whether she acted in collusion with the Appellant, the transaction was in either case a fraud upon the Respondent.

It has, however, been strongly urged that this finding of the invalidity of the Ikrar is not fatal to the title of the Appellant as purchaser at the execution sale. It has been contended that his rights are identical with those which a stranger purchasing at the same sale would have had; that the execution was good, at least, to the extent of the Rs. 26,987 advanced to save the property from sale at the suit of Mohun Lall; and that the rights of the Respondent against the Appellant, taking them at their highest, are limited to the recovery of the difference between the last-mentioned sum and the price bid at the execution sale. Another argument in favour of this conclusion was, that the Respondent had not really been injured by the sale of his ancestral property under this execution, because he would equally have lost it if it had been sold at the suit of Mohun Lall.

As to the latter argument, it seems sufficient to [473] observe that we have to deal with the rights of the parties in the events that have happened, not in those that might have happened; that the salvation of the property by other means from the sale at Mohun Lall's suit was not absolutely impossible; and that, in any case, an execution for Rs. 26,987 is less formidable than one for upwards of Rs. 70,000. Again, it is to be observed that if the Respondent has been wronged by the sale of his property at the suit of the Appellant, the relief suggested falls very far short of an adequate remedy for that wrong. The property of which he has been deprived was ancestral; and the feeling on the subject of ancestral property is so strong in those Provinces, that the policy of allowing it to be taken in execution and sold under judicial sales has been seriously questioned. And even if no account is to be taken of that feeling, it is notorious that landed property when sold under an execution, rarely, if ever, realizes its full value. It follows, therefore, that to restore the property to the Respondent on the terms of paying to the Appellant what may be justly due to him is far more equitable than the proposed limitation of his remedy to the surplus proceeds of the sale; and the only question is whether the sale has interposed an effectual bar to the application of the more appropriate equity.

Their Lordships concur with the learned Judges of the Sudder Court in dissenting from the authority of the case which is stated to have been decided in 1847 by two out of three of the then Judges of the Sudder Court of the North-Western Provinces. The proposition that no difference is to be made between an innocent purchaser and one tainted by the fraud [474] which has brought about the execution sale seems to them to be wholly untenable. The question is, in the former case, which of two innocent parties shall suffer; in the latter, whether he who has wronged the other party shall be allowed to enjoy the fruits of his wrong-doing. A Court exercising equitable jurisdiction may withhold its hand in the one case, and yet set aside the sale with or without terms in the other.

In the present case, the judgment by cognovit, the execution, and the sale are all tainted with the fraud which entered into the original transaction, the execution of the Ikrar. All are parts of the contrivance by which the Respondent has been deprived of his property, and the Appellant has acquired it. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that both the Courts below were right in decreeing that possession of the property should be restored to the Respondent. In considering on what terms this should be done, their Lordships concur with the Sudder Court in thinking that the only principal sum for which the Appellant was entitled to receive credit was the Rs. 26,987. That he had no title to the Rs. 27,000 follows obviously from what has been already said. Nor has he, in their Lordships' opinion, shown any better title to the Rs. 1354. That sum had been advanced for costs for the litigation in which he involved the guardian under the 3rd clause of the Ikrar. Of that litigation, if it had been successful, he would have had half the fruits. It was unsuccessful. He cannot be allowed to carry on this kind of speculation at the risk and cost of an infant's estate.

[475] The only remaining point—and it is one on which their Lordships have felt some difficulty—is the rate of interest to be allowed on the Rs. 26,987. The Attorney-General has insisted that it was a favour to the Appellant, in the circumstances, to give him any interest at all on that sum; that the rate was in the discretion of the Court below; and that their Lordships should not interfere with that discretion. On the other side, it has been argued that the rate ought to be twelve per cent., such being the current rate of interest, and that which the judgment debt of Mohun Lall would naturally have carried. The contention below on the hearing of the application for a review was, that the rate should be six per cent., or the contract rate, as shown by the confession of judgment. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the third course is that which should be adopted. If interest was to be allowed at all—and they think the Court below was right in allowing it—the rate should be fixed according to some principle, not according to the arbitrary discretion of the Judges. On the other hand, the Appellant has no right to complain if he receives interest at the rate for which he stipulated when he made the advance. It may be true that he would not have advanced his money on terms so favourable to the estate if he had not had in view the corrupt advantages for which he had stipulated in the Ikrar. But there is no reason why the Court, because it will not let him reap the benefit of those improper stipulations, should make a new contract for him in respect of this particular advance.

On the whole, then, their Lordships will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the decree of the Sudder Court be modified by the allowance of interest on the [476] Rs. 26,987, at the rate of six per cent. instead of that of five per cent. per annum, but that in all other respects that decree be affirmed with costs. They do not think that so slight a modification ought to deprive the Respondents of the costs of this appeal.

TARAKANT BANNERJEE.—Appellant; PUDDOMONEY DOSSEE, RASMONEY DOSSEE, and others,—Respondents * [Feb. 12, 1866]

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut of Bengal.

In 1814 a litigation commenced between a Zemindar and his tenants, called the Moonshees, by reason of the Zemindar dispossessing them of lands held under a jote tenure. A decree was made in favour of the Moonshees, when the Zemindar assessed the jote lands at a rent. The rent fell into arrear, and under a decree the jote lands were, in 1836, sold in satisfaction of arrears and purchased by J. The decree purchaser was put in possession in 1839. There was another suit pending between the Moonshees and their mortgagee, in which a question arose whether these jote lands were included in the mortgage, which was decided in favour of the Mortgagee in 1841, but J., the then jote tenant, was no party to that suit, and continued in possession of his jote lands. Disputes arose between the mortgagee and J., the jote tenant, and by an Order of the Sudder Court made in 1845, the jote lands were ordered to be put in possession of the mortgagee. In 1856 a suit was brought by J.'s representative to set aside that Order and to recover possession of the jote lands. The Courts in India held that there had been adverse possession from 1841, and that the suit was barred by Ben. Reg., III. of 1793, sec. 14. Upon appeal held: that as J., the jote tenant, was not a party to the suit, under which the decree was made in 1841, the decree was not binding on him or those deriving title through him, and that the suit was not barred by effluxion of time by the Regulation, as the cause of action only arose in 1845.

It is the practice of the Courts in India not to give possession under a judicial sale by removing one who is in possession under an apparent bona fide title. As a debtor can only assert his title to possession by a suit, so a decree-holder who derives his title through him must assert his title by a regular suit [10 Moo. Ind. App. 483].

The practice of including in the transcript record prepared and printed in India, under the Order in Council, 13th June, 1853, voluminous accounts and receipts, unnecessary to the question at issue, condemned [10 Moo. Ind. App. 489].

Directions given in taxing costs to disallow all expenses occasioned by the insertion in the transcript of such unnecessary matters.

This appeal was brought from a decree of the late Sudder Dewanny Court of Bengal, affirming a decision of the principal Sudder Ameen of the Zillah [477] Court at Dacca, which dismissed the Appellant's suit, on the ground that the cause of action had arisen twelve years before the suit was brought, and, therefore, barred by sec. 14 of the Ben. Reg. of Limitation of Suits, III. of 1793.

That suit was brought on the 28th of August, 1856, to recover possession of 1384 beegahs and 14 cottahs of land, described as jote (tenants' land) set out by fixed boundary, situate in Mouzahs, Narainpoor, Khoondkarkandee, Gooneerkandee, and Kuddumpoor; together with a dwelling-house and mesne profits; and also to annul or reverse a summary Order of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, made in a miscellaneous, or summary suit, bearing date the 18th of November, 1845.

The decree of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, appealed from proceeded on the assumption first, that the possession of the lands and house in question by one of the Respondents, Rasmoney Dossee, the principal Defendant, was an adverse possession for a period of more than twelve years before the suit was brought; and that, therefore, the same was barred by effluxion of time under Ben. Reg., III. of 1793, [478] sec. 14; and secondly, that the fraud and collusion which had been pleaded and charged by the Appellant against her and the other Defendants, had not been proved, so as to entitle the Appellant to have a period of four years deducted from the twelve years in calculating the period of limitation.

The decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen proceeded upon the construction of the same section of the Regulations of Limitations of Suits, and dismissed the Appellant's suit; but that Judge assumed an adverse possession from a still earlier date than that fixed on by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, and in that respect the decree was set aside and reversed by the appellate Court.

The question raised in the suit and on appeal was confined to this point, whether the 1384 beegahs and 14 cottahs were, as contended for by the Appellant, included in and belonged to the jote lands, of which the jote jumma (tenant rent) had been purchased at a judicial sale on the 10th of June, 1836, by the Appellant; or whether they were, as insisted by the Defendants, included in and belonged to a Muskoree Talook called Ooturnarainpoor, paying revenue direct to Government, purchased by one Rajchunder Rae, deceased, the late husband of Rasmoney Dossee, at a judicial sale under a decree made in a suit brought against Reazooddeen and others, to enforce a Kutkubala, or deed of conditional sale, alleged to have been executed by them in favour of Rajchunder Rae.

The material facts of the case appear in the judgment of their Lordships.

As no appearance was put in for the Respondents, the appeal was heard ex parte.

[479] The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant. The two decrees of the Sudder Court and the Sudder Ameen, dismissing the Appellant's suit as barred by Ben. Reg. of Limitation, III. of 1793, sec. 14, were erroneous. That section prohibits the Court from hearing or determining the merits of a suit if the cause of action shall have arisen twelve years before any suit shall have been commenced on account of it. The present suit was commenced within twelve years from the true date of the cause of action, therefore, that Regulation is no bar to the suit.

It was established that, previous to that suit having been brought, two other suits had been commenced, on account of the same cause of action, and had been regularly carried on by those through whom the Appellant immediately derived title to the lands in question. Each of those suits was commenced long before the expiration of the twelve years' limitation, but even if the two other suits had not been brought, the Appellant was within the saving clause or exception in the above section, as he established that he directly preferred his claim, within the twelve years, for the matter in dispute to a Court of competent jurisdiction to try the demand. He had intervened in the suits in accordance with the prescribed forms of procedure. Upon the question of limitation, Doorgapersaud Roy Chowdry v. Tarapersaud Roy Chowdry (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 308), Mussumut Chundrabullee Debia v. Luckhee Debia Chowdrain (Ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 214) and Rajah Enayet Hossein v. Sagud Ahmed Reza (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 238) were referred to. The charge of collusion and fraud we admit cannot be sustained.

[480] The consideration of the judgment was adjourned, and now pronounced by

The Right Hon. the Lord Justice Turner (Feb. 26, 1866).—The suit of the Plaintiff was instituted on the 28th of August, 1856. It was brought to recover 1384 beegahs, and 14 cottahs of land, described as "jote," set out by fixed boundaries, and situate in certain Mouzahs or Kismuts called respectively Narainpore, Khoondkarkandee, Goonerkandee, and Kuddunipoor: and also to reverse a summary Order of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, bearing date the 18th of November, 1845, made in a miscellaneous or summary suit in that Court. The Zillah Court dismissed the suit of the Plaintiff on two grounds,—first, that it was barred by the law of limitation, and secondly, that the matter had been decided adversely to the Plaintiff's claim in a former suit, by which the Court adjudged him to be bound. The Sudder Court, on appeal by the present Appellant, decided the case against him on the law of limitation only, and expressed no opinion on any other point. The decision of the Sudder Court on the law of limitation proceeded on a different ground from that on which the Lower Court had founded its decree, dating possession under the adverse title from a time later than that which the Zillah Court had fixed for its commencement. The Appellant reckoned the time of his dispossession from the 18th of November, 1845, the date of the decree for the reversal of which his suit is brought. If he is right in this view of the subject, his suit was brought in time. The Sudder Court carried the adverse possession back to an earlier Order of the Court, bearing date the 11th of April, 1844, and counting the time [481] of adverse possession from that last date, it held the suit to be barred by effluxion of time. The Zillah Court, in their judgment, had carried the time still further back to the year 1841, considering that the Plaintiff's dispossession was effected by possession having, as the Court considered, been at that time delivered to the Plaintiff in another suit, to which we shall presently refer, by one Ramgottee Rae, the Ameen delegated by the Court to execute the decree in that suit. The case is somewhat complicated by reason of the long continuance of litigation between different parties, and the conflict of claims in two different concurrent suits. It is necessary, therefore, to state the nature of this litigation and the titles of the Appellant and of the principal original Respondent, Rasmoney Dossee, in order to clear the subject of possession from some confusion in which it has become involved.

The jote tenure is a dependent tenure within and part of a Zemindary, called Pergunnah, Taleehate, Ameerbad. In the month of February in the year 1814, a litigation commenced between the Zemindar and three persons named Reazooddeen Mahomed, Fysooddeen Mahomed, and Mahomed Cossim, termed the Moonshees (a description which for the sake of brevity it will be convenient to adopt). The Moonshees complained that they had been dispossessed by the Zemindar of their jote tenure, including the lands claimed in this suit: the Zemindar denied that inclusion, and claimed them as part of his Zemindary. At this time the Moonshees were possessed of a Talook called Ooturnarainpore, paying revenue direct to Government: and throughout their litigation with the Zemindar, during their claim to the one property and concurrent possession of the other, they insisted that these lands were included in their jote tenure, [482] and made no claim to them as included in the Talook: proof of this inclusion in the Talook would have been a complete answer to the claim of the Zemindar, and would have freed them from dependence on his title and the risks attendant on a subordinate tenure.

The Moonshees succeeded in that litigation, and the decree in their suit declared the lands to be part of the jote tenure, and limited the Zemindar's claim to a title to assess them for rent. The Zemindar appealed against this decree, which was, however, affirmed, and Byrubchunder Bannerjee, an Ameen, was ordered to give possession of the lands to the Moonshees. This was done in conformity to the decree, and possession was given in the usual way by the Ameen, by taking Kabooleats from the cultivators, and by fixing bamboos to mark the boundaries. The Ameen's report to this effect was in evidence before the Court. There is no evidence of any subsequent disclaimer on the part of the Moonshees of this tenure so pleaded, proved and adjudged, nor of any attempt to withdraw any part of the lands from the jote tenure, on the ground of mistake or otherwise, and to ascribe them to the Talook title before the time of the judicial sale which is now about to be stated. The rent of the jote tenure fell into arrear, the Zemindar sued the Moonshees for rent, recovered in the suit, and caused the jote tenure to be sold in satisfaction of the debt due under this decree. This sale took place on the 10th of June, 1836, and one Juggutchunder Rae was the purchaser. The Appellant's title is derived from him under two intervening private sales, one by Juggutchunder Rae to one Ramdhone Sircar, and the other by the sons and heirs of Ramdhone Sircar to the Appellant. By this purchase, Juggutchunder Rae obtained the right, title, and [483] interest of the Moonshees in the jote tenure. He became, by force of this purchase, in the same relation to the Zemindar in which the Moonshees before stood. As against the Moonshees themselves and the Zemindar, the title of the purchaser was that which the Moonshees had had adjudged to them in their suit against the Zemindar. The possession given to the purchaser was co-extensive with that given to the Moonshees, and it was in strict conformity to the law which obtains in those Courts. The tenants were properly directed to attorn, and properly attorned to that title. It is important to keep this origin of the possession clearly in view.

The Moonshees appear to have disputed at that time, the title of the auction purchaser to have these lands included in his purchase; they claimed them then as included in their Talook. It is the practice of those Courts, and it is one perfectly consistent with reason and justice, not to give possession under a judicial sale by removing the possession of one who is in possession under an apparent bona fide title. If the debtor can assert his title to possession by suit only, the new owner of his title can have no higher claim. The Court, therefore, leaves the purchaser to assert his title by regular suit. In this case, however, the Moonshees, the debtors under the decree, were themselves in possession. The decree was for rent of the jote tenure: the Zemindar caused the tenure, including these lands, to be put up to sale: the Moonshees, in claiming these lands, had pleaded this tenure, and it was adjudged in their favour by a suit which bound both them and the Zemindar. The suit for rent was against them as jote tenants, for rent due under that very tenure, and the demand included [484] the rent of these lands: consequently, the Court which directed the execution of the decree was perfectly justified in acting on their own pleaded, and by them admitted title, and putting the decree purchaser in possession. This was done in the regular mode, by taking Kabooleats, except as to one small part, as to which, however, possession was also given, and the purchaser was thus put in complete possession of these lands under the jote tenure. This appears from the report of the Ameen, dated the 7th of August, 1839. Unless this possession was changed at some intermediate period between the 5th of August, 1839, the date of the delivery of the possession above stated, and the 18th of November, 1845, the date of the Order of the Sudder Court which is sought to be reversed, the objection that the suit is barred by limitation of time is groundless. If that possession was displaced, in fact, it would be unimportant whether the disturbance took place in a suit to which the purchaser was a stranger, or in one to which he was a party, the possession being alike adverse on either supposition. In considering this question, it is not necessary to state minutely all the intermediate steps before the delivery of possession by the Ameen, Ramgottee, on which the Zillah Court relied. That Ameen was acting in the execution of a decree in another suit which had been pending between the Moonshees and their mortgagee of their Talook. A dispute had arisen between them of this nature: the mortgagors had mortgaged the Talook, but, as they contended, excepting these lands from it, as to which they were carrying on a litigation with the purchaser of the jote tenure. The mortgagee, on the other hand, insisted that these lands were included [485] in the mortgage. The suit was decided in favour of the mortgagee, and, as between him and the Moonshees these disputed lands were adjudged to be within the Talook; but as the jote tenant was not a party to that suit, the decision in it did not bind him. The mortgagee obtained execution of that decree, and it was under this proceeding the Zillah Court considered that the Appellant was dispossessed, and the possession given to the mortgagee in the year 1841. The proceedings and the decree, however, are not in evidence in this appeal. In the execution of that decree a conflict arose between the purchaser of the jote tenure and the mortgagee, as decree-holder, each party claiming the same lands, but the jote tenant being in possession.

If this title of the mortgagee could be successfully asserted against the purchaser of the jote tenure, it could be asserted legally in no other mode than by a regular suit instituted for that purpose, for such a possession as that of the jote tenant could not be changed merely in proceedings to execute a decree. This appears to have been entirely overlooked, both by the Ameen Ramgottee Rae, and by the Zillah Court in the consideration of his acts. It appears that the Ameen did, in effect, attempt to disturb the possession of the jote tenant, and that he took fresh Kaboo-leats, from the cultivators who had before attorned to the jote tenant under the direction of the Court. The Court, however, on the complaint of the jote tenant, set that matter right, and directed, in substance, the cancellation of the new Kaboo-leats. The legal effect of this Order of the Court was, to set up the original Kaboo-leats, and to restore or confirm the jote tenant's possession. Now, there is not only no evidence of [486] any subsequent change of possession before the decree of the Sudder Court of the 18th of November, 1845, pronounced by Mr. Reid, but the very language of that judgment conflicts with such a supposition, for by that judgment, which was adverse to the jote tenant, the possession was ordered to be restored by him to the Talookdars. It is plain that there is no error in the language of the judgment; it is language perfectly consistent with the Order of the Court directing the second set of Kaboo-leats to be brought in, and it is also consistent with the course of practice in executing decrees. It is plain, therefore, that both Courts have fallen into error on the point of possession, and that the Appellant is perfectly correct in maintaining that he was dispossessed only by virtue of the decision which he seeks to reverse. The act of the Court which directs the cultivators to attorn is, of course, not designed to expose them to risk of forfeiture: their simple obedience to the act of the Court, in pursuance of the mode in which it executes a decree, could not be attended with that consequence; and when the Court corrected its error, it meant to restore, and did in law restore, the old possession. As their Lordships think that the possession was not, in fact, disturbed until within the period of twelve years from the institution of this suit, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether the claim would have been kept alive through the whole time by the litigation as to the execution of the decree.

The other point on which the Zillah Court decided against the Appellant was, that the matter was already adjudged in a suit by which he was bound. It has been stated that the original purchaser at the auction sale of the jote tenure, sold to one Ramdhone Sircar. [487] Before this sale, he had instituted proceedings against the decree-holders under the title of the Talook. Ramdhone Sircar purchased, therefore, Pendente lite. He applied to be substituted in the suit, in lieu of Juggutchunder Rae, which application was granted. This litigation terminated in the Zillah Court in favour of Ramdhone Sircar, the jote tenant. From that decision Rasmoney Dossee appealed. On her appeal the Sudder Court reversed that decision. This was the decree of Mr. Reid of the 18th of November, 1845, which this suit seeks to set aside.

On this, Ramdhone Sircar instituted a regular suit against Rasmoney Dossee and others, claiming, in substance, the same relief which is sought by this suit. Pending that suit, Ramdhone Sircar died, and his three sons, Mohemachunder Sircar, Anundchunder Sircar, and Greeschunder Sircar, were substituted in his place on the record. Pending this litigation, the present Appellant purchased the jote tenure from the sons of Ramdhone Sircar. He applied in his turn to be substituted on the record and to conduct the suit. One of the sons, however denied the purchase, and the Court refused the application. In a few days afterwards, the cause was decreed for the Defendants. It is alleged that the actual Plaintiffs conducted their case negligently, if not collusively. On the argument before their Lordships, the Attorney-General abandoned the case of fraud, but contended that the Plaintiff was not barred by this decision; that he was not a party to the suit; and that his application to intervene in it having been refused, it would be unjust and inconsistent to hold him bound by the decree; that the decision followed so promptly on the refusal to allow him to intervene, that he could not reasonably be [488] expected in the interval either to appeal against the order refusing him leave to intervene, or to institute a suit as supplemental to the one in which he sought to intervene. Their Lordships concur in this view of the subject. As the law allows a party interested to intervene in the suit, that right should not be rigorously dealt with. There is much danger in India of secret collusion. Their Lordships think that the Defendants who obtained their decree so shortly after the above refusal, in the absence of the party really interested in contesting the matter with them, should not be permitted to prevail by this objection.

The cause has not been decided in either Court on the principal point—whether the lands formed part of the jote tenure or of the Talook. Their Lordships are unfortunately unable to decide this appeal finally by reason of this defect. The Courts below, in appealable cases, by forbearing from deciding on all the issues joined, not infrequently oblige this Committee to recommend that a cause be remanded which might otherwise be finally decided on appeal. This is certainly a serious evil to the parties litigant, as it may involve the expense of a second appeal as well as that of another hearing below. It is much to be desired, therefore, that in appealable cases the Courts below should, as far as may be practicable, pronounce their opinions on all the important points. In the present case, the merits not having been entered into in the Courts below, their Lordships find themselves unable to dispose of the suit; and as they do not agree in the opinion either of the Sudder or of the Zillah Court, they will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the decisions of both Courts should be reversed, and that the High Court at Calcutta should [489] remand the cause for hearing in the Zillah Court on the issues on the merits other than the issues already decided in this Court on appeal.

Their Lordships will further recommend that the costs of the appeal be paid to the Appellant, and that it be referred to the Registrar of this Court to tax the costs of the appeal, with directions to disallow all such costs and expenses as may have been unnecessarily occasioned by the inclusion in the transcript sent from India of matters which he shall consider to have been improperly introduced therein, and that any taxation which may be had in India be regulated by the course which the Registrar of this Court may adopt.

Their Lordships have observed with regret the frequent inclusion of voluminous papers, accounts, and receipts in the transcripts printed in India, and sent over in that form to the Registry of the Privy Council, an evil which appears to be on the increase; and their Lordships trust that the attention of the Courts in India from which appeals lie to Her Majesty, will be directed to the subject, with a view to provide a remedy for a very serious evil (a).

On Appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, North-West Provinces, Agra.

D., one of five brothers, constituting an undivided Hindoo family, but having no ancestral estate, acquired personal property with which, with the aid of his brothers, he established and carried on a banking business at five different places. Such circumstances, under the general principles of Hindoo law, held to constitute a joint family property in which the brothers were entitled to share [10 Moo. Ind. App. 505-507].

The burthen of proof that such was only an ordinary partnership, and not a jointly acquired family property, lies on the party claiming it to have been separately acquired.

Ordinary co-partnership property is not subject to the rule of Hindoo Law, which excludes a widow from the succession at her husband's death to a share of the joint property of an undivided family.

The Sudder Court having established that the family was joint and the property undivided, awarded a gross sum out of the estate, calculated to make the widow of one of the brothers a monthly payment for maintenance. Held that although a Court of Equity in this country would have set apart a certain sum to a separate account during the lifetime of the widow, yet from the want of machinery in the Native Courts in India, such practise could not be carried out [10 Moo. Ind. App. 509].

Where a Defendant refused to render accounts, and there was evidence of spoliation of the banking books, the Court charged him with the principal sum for which he was accountable, with interest at 12 per cent per mensem in lieu of the profits he failed to account for.

These appeals arose out of a suit instituted by the Appellant, Rampershad Tewarry, who was one of five brothers, against his brothers' representatives in [491] the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen, which suit was afterwards transferred to the Civil Court at Agra, to enforce his claim as a member of a joint undivided Hindoo family, to a fourth share of the joint estate in five several Banking firms respectively established in the Agra, Jhoosee, Ghazeepore, Benares and Mirzapore; also to set aside a deed of partition and a deed of gift whereby the Respondent, Mussumat Thookra, purported to give the share awarded to her under a deed of partition to one of her husband's brothers' sons named Sheochurn Doss.

Sheodut Tewarry, the ancestor of the parties, was a Priest, and had five sons, named Gunga Pershad, Moona Loll, Radakishen, Deenanath, and the Appellant, Rampershad. Sheodut had no ancestral estate. Deenanath, from capital acquired by him, established the five Banking firms, taking his four brothers into the business, and accumulated a large fortune. The family continued undivided, but in 1848 the Appellant, Rampershad, separated from the joint firms and conducted the Mirzapore Banking branch alone. In 1850, Deenanath died, leaving a childless widow, the Respondent, Mussumat Thookra. By a deed of partition, dated the [492] 23rd of February, 1825, the estate of Deenanath was divided into four parts and apportioned between the brothers, Gunga Pershad, Moona Loll and Radakishen, or their representatives, and the Respondent, Mussumat Thookra, who was allowed her husband's share to the exclusion of the Appellant, Rampershad, on the ground of his separation from the other members of the family in the year 1848. This share was afterwards given by a deed of gift dated the 7th of September, 1855, by the Respondent, Mussumat Thookra, in favour of Sheochurn Doss.

(a) The transcript record (which was printed in India, under the order in Council of the 13th June, 1853, sec. III.), contained upwards of 1000 pages, a great portion of which consisted of accounts and receipts.

The nature of the pleadings and effect of the evidence is sufficiently set forth in the judgment. The Appellant, it appeared, had refused to account for the receipts and disbursements of the Mirzapore branch of the Banking firm he was in possession of, and, as alleged, had tampered with and altered the Books of that firm.

The case of the Appellant was, first, that the Banking business had been established and the capital thereof acquired, not by the five brothers, but by their father, Sheodut Tewarry, or from his ancestral estate, and that by the Hindoo law, on the death of Deenanath, without issue, the surviving brothers, or their representatives, succeeded to his share, to the exclusion of his widow, who had no interest in his estate beyond maintenance; and secondly, that a deed of partition, in 1843, relied upon by the Respondents was fraudulent. On the other hand the Respondent, Mussumat Thookra, the widow of Deenanath, contended that her husband was the founder of the business, that he had associated his brothers only as ordinary partners, that the firm had not been established with ancestral capital, there having been [493] in fact none, and, therefore, that she, as a childless widow, was entitled to her husband's full share of the profits in the business. The case of the other Respondents was, that in the year 1852, a division of the estate of Deenanath had been made between his widow and the representatives of Deenanath's brothers, which excluded the Appellant, Rampershad, he having separated from the Banking firm four years before Deenanath's death. The Sudder Court at Agra, consisting of Messrs. R. B. Morgan and M. R. Gubbins, two of the Judges of that Court, by a decree, dated the 9th of June, 1860, held that Sheodut, having died without leaving any capital, and that there was no ancestral estate, the whole capital having been acquired solely by Deenanath, who had associated the names of his brothers with his own in the several firms from natural affection; and that being a joint family, the widow was entitled only to maintenance, which was fixed by the Court at Rs. 150 per mensem, and not to any share of her husband's estate, which the Court held belonged to the brothers equally; and it was ordered that the Respondent, Sheochurn Doss, should pay only a portion of the claim made, by reason of the Appellant having received a considerable sum more than he was entitled when he separated from his brothers, for which the Court charged him with twelve per cent interest. The other Respondents were exonerated from the Appellant's claim.

From this decree Rampershad brought the present appeal, and Sheochurn Doss and Mussumat Thookra cross appeals. These appeals were, upon petition, ordered by the Judicial Committee to be consolidated and heard together.

[494] The consolidated appeals were argued by Mr. Rolt, (Q.C.), and Mr. Leith, for Rampershad Tewarry. The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. Cave, for Sheochurn Doss. Mr. Piffard, for Mussumat Thookra, and Mr. J. Anderson, Q.C., and Mr. W. Downing Bruce, for the Respondents, Mussumat Sudao, Buldeo Doss, Bhyronpershad, and Mussumat Bilassa.

The points mainly insisted upon by the Appellant in support of the appeal are stated and commented upon in the judgment.

As to the presumption of Hindoo law, with respect to the five brothers constituting in the Banking business an undivided Hindoo family, or merely a copartnership, there being no ancestral funds and the brothers living apart at the different Banking firms and also the effect of the separation in the year 1848. The Mitacshara (by Colbrooke), ch. II. sec. IV. pp. 346, 8, Elberling's Treatise on Inheritance, Gift, etc., by Mahomedan and Hindoo Law, p. 79, Katama Natchier v. The Rajah of Shivagunga (9 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 543, 610), were referred to.

On the assumption of the Banking firms being only a copartnership; then as to the right of the widow to one-fourth share, Dayabhaga, ch. XI. sec. I. p. 158, W. H. Macnaghten's Princ. of "Hindu Law," Vol. I. p. 47, or in the alternative of the family being united, her title to maintenance only. W. H. Macnaghten's Princ. of "Hindu law," Vol. I. p. 19, and ib. Vol. II. p. 21, were cited; also that the onus probandi [495] that her husband's property was separately acquired, Prankishen Paul Chowdry v. Mothooramohun Paul Chowdry (ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 403); Dhurm Pandey v. Mussumat Shama Soondri Dibiah (3 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 229).

And, as to the refusal to give in the accounts, and the alleged spoliation of the Books of the Mirzapore firm by the Appellant, Rampershad's, it was submitted that the charge made by the Sudder Court in taking the accounts of the assets of the family, in deduction of that Appellant's claim, at the rate of twelve per cent. for the principal sum he was accountable, was, in the circumstances, correct, referring to Gray v. Haig (20 Beav. 219); Wardour v. Berisford (1 Vern. 452).

The consideration of their Lordships' judgment was reserved, and now pronounced by

The Right Hon. Sir James W. Colvile (March 17, 1866).—The suit out of which these appeals have arisen was brought by Rampershad Tewarry to enforce his claims against the other members of a joint and undivided Hindoo family. The common ancestor of the Plaintiff and the Defendants was one Sheodut Tewarry, who lived at Jhoosee, a village on the Ganges, opposite to Allahabad, and exercised there the functions of a Purohit, or Priest. He died in 1802, and is not shown to have left any property except the house, such as it was, in which he lived, and the Hugg Purohittai, or Priests' fees, the right to which seems to have been hereditary. He left five sons, Gungapershad, Moona Loll, Radakishen, Deenanath, and the Plaintiff, Rampershad.

Radakishen died in 1840, leaving three sons, Buldeo [496] Doss, Bhyronpershad, and Seetulpershad, all of whom were Defendants below; but Seetulpershad has since died, leaving three infant sons, who are represented on the record by Mussumat Bailassa, their mother and guardian.

Gungapershad died in 1846, leaving three sons, Sheochurn Doss or Loll Tewarry, the principal Defendant below and Respondent here; Bheekum Singh, a Defendant below, who has since died without issue; and Bhugwan Doss.

Deenanath died in 1850 or 1851, without issue, but leaving a widow, Mussumat Thookra, one of the Respondents and a cross Appellant.

Moona Loll, who survived Deenanath, is dead; but there is some confusion as to the date of his death. From the partition deed of the 23rd of February, 1852, which is afterwards referred to, we should infer that he was dead at that date. From other parts of the record, it would appear that he was alive in April, 1857, and died between that month and June, 1858. Whenever he died, he left an only son, Sheopershad, a Defendant below, who has since died, leaving two sons, the Respondents, Soorujpershad and Ramnath.

The evidence concerning the precise history of the family after the death of Sheodut is conflicting and will be afterwards considered. It is, however, undisputed that for a considerable period between the years 1818 and 1848, the five brothers or their children carried on a flourishing Banking business, on some terms of partnership or joint interest, under five different firms. Of these, one was established at Jhoosee, the ancestral seat of the family, under the style of "Moona Loll and Gungapershad;" another at Agra, under the style of "Radhakishen and Deenanath;" a third at Benares, under the style of "Gungapershad [497] and Rampershad;" a fourth at Ghazepoor, under the style of "Rampershad and Sheochurn Doss;" and the fifth at Mirzapoor, also under the style of "Rampershad and Sheochurn Doss."

The Mirzapoor firm was under the management of the Plaintiff, Rampershad; and it is alleged by the Defendants, though not admitted by the Plaintiff, that about the year 1848 he separated himself from the rest of the family, appropriating to himself the assets and property of that firm. That about that time he was on bad terms with the others members of the family, and ceased to render the accounts of the Mirzapoor to the Jhoosee firm according to the course of business theretofore subsisting, seems to be pretty certain; but there is no proof of a formal separation or dissolution of partnership at that date.

On the 23rd of February, 1852, the adult members of the family other than Rampershad, viz., Sheopershad, as representing Moona Loll; Sheochurn, for himself and as guardian of his infant brothers, as representing Gungapershad; Baldeo Doss, for himself and as guardian of his infant brothers as representing Rada-kishen; and Mussumat Thookra, as representing her husband Deenanath, executed a deed of partition, which stated that the five brothers had been associated in partnership in trade and banking since 1874 Sumbut (corresponding with A.D. 1818); that the five before-mentioned Banking firms had been established; that in 1904 Sumbut (1848) Rampershad, who was at Mirzapoor, having taken as his share Rs. 1,16,197. 10a. in cash and houses situate at Mirzapoor, had separated himself and ceased rendering accounts and correspondence in regard to the property in his possession; and that [498] similarly, he having no concern with the firms of Agra, Jhosee, Ghazee-poor, and Benares, the undersigned being the partners of those firms, with a view to obviate future disputes and contests, had examined the accounts of the firms and the property appertaining thereto, and found in cash Rs. 503,118. 8a., which they had amicably divided into four equal shares, each share amounting to Rs. 125,996. 4a., and had separated themselves. The deed then provided for the future division of some outstandings, which were to be held jointly until realization; and for the division of certain boats, and the warehouses and shops there mentioned, but stated that the houses situated at Jhosee were to remain in the joint possession of the four parties. The effect of this instrument was to exclude Rampershad from any participation in the property which was the subject of the partition, and to give a fourth share to Mussumat Thookra as the widow and representative of Deenanath. This fourth share she afterwards, by an instrument dated the 7th of September, 1855, assigned to Sheochurn Doss.

The suit was commenced on the 4th of January, 1856, in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen, whence it was transferred to the Civil Court of Agra. The plaint claimed a one-fourth share of the property therein specified, giving credit for Rs. 1,16,197. 10a., the assets of the firm of Mirzapoor in Plaintiff's possession; and to set aside the deed of partition of the 23rd of February, 1852, and the deed of gift of the 7th of September, 1855.

It may be necessary to examine the pleadings more particularly hereafter, for the purpose of considering the weight of certain arguments which were addressed [499] to their Lordships on the hearing of these appeals. At present it is sufficient to say, that the material questions in the cause were, whether the property of which a share was claimed, and in particular the property of the Banking firms, was the joint and undivided property of the family; and consequently, whether, by the Hindoo law, as it obtains in the North-Western Provinces, the Defendant, Mussumat Thookra, was incapable of taking a share of it; and further, whether, by his conduct in 1848, the Plaintiff had effectually separated himself from the rest of the family, and had conclusively bound himself to take the assets of the Mirzapoor firm in full satisfaction of his share and interest in the joint concerns.

The Civil Judge of Agra, by an Order of the 7th of March, 1857, referred these questions, as well as various questions of account, together with the partnership Books, to two native Assessors or Commissioners; and upon their report of the 15th of March, as well as upon his own view of the evidence taken before him, he, by his decree of the 28th of March, 1857, determined both the before-mentioned questions in favour of the Plaintiff, and awarded to him, in full satisfaction of his claims up to the date of the decree, the sum of Rs. 1,37,508. 5a., with subsequent interest to the date of realization, and costs. For this amount all the Defendants were made liable.

Against this decree there were four appeals to the Sudder Court. Two of them, viz., those of Mussumat Thookra and Sheochurn Doss, went to the merits of the suit. Of the other two, one was presented by Sheopershad as representing the interest of Moona Loll, and by the guardian of Blugwan Doss, the infant son of Gungapershad; and the other was presented by the sons and representatives of Rada-[500]-kishen. Both of them were confined to the point that the Appellants were improperly made liable for any part of the sum decreed to the Plaintiff; since, upon his mode of taking the accounts, they would be entitled to more than they had received under the partition deed of the 23rd of February, 1852.

The Sudder Court dealt with the merits of the case upon the appeal of Sheochurn Doss. Before doing this, however, and on reading the papers in all the appeals, they made an Order on the 9th of May, 1860, whereby they referred the case to two native Commissioners (being the same persons who had acted in that capacity in the Court below) for inquiry and report upon three new points. The first was, what were the profits of the Mirzapoor firm during the four years between 1904 Sumbut and 1908 Sumbut, i.e., between 1848 and 1852. The second involved certain disputed items in the accounts. The third was the amount of maintenance to be allowed to Mussumat Thookra, should it be ultimately determined that she was not entitled to a share of the property in dispute.

On the 21st of May, 1860, the Commissioners reported that the account of profits rendered by the Plaintiff under the first head of inquiry was incorrect, and begged that either the Plaintiff's Pleaders should be required to furnish a proper account within a given time, or that they (the Commissioners) should be allowed to submit a report on the two other points.

On the 22nd of May the Court gave the Plaintiff one week within which he was to file correct accounts. On the 29th of May the Commissioners made their report, which was to the effect that for want of proper accounts furnished by the Plaintiff they were unable to report on the profits realized by the Mirzapoor [501] firm; reporting on the disputed items of account; and finding that Rs. 125 per mensem was a proper sum to be allowed for the maintenance of Mussumat Thookra. On the 4th of June the Plaintiff presented a petition to the Court objecting to this report. On the 5th of June the Court, after hearing the verbal assertions of the Commissioners and the Pleaders of the parties, passed an Order that the case should be adjourned, the Commissioners dismissed, and the petition of the Plaintiff objecting to the report placed with the record.

By its decree of the 9th of June, 1860, the Court disposed of the appeal of Sheochurn Doss. They concurred with the Court below in holding that the property in dispute was joint and undivided; that Mussumat Thookra, as the widow of one of the co-sharers, was not entitled to take a share in it; and that the Plaintiff had not forfeited his rights as a co-sharer by separating himself from the rest of the family in 1848. They held, however, that Mussumat Thookra was entitled to maintenance according to the scale proposed by the Commissioners, and that Rs. 15,000 must be set aside out of the divisible assets to provide for it. They further reduced the divisible assets by the amount of certain bad and irrecoverable debts and other items pursuant to the finding of the Commissioners. And inasmuch as the Plaintiff had failed to account for the profits of the Mirzapoor firm between the years 1848 and 1852, they charged him with interest on the principal sum for which he was accountable at 12 per cent. The amount was Rs. 55,280. The effect of this decree was to reduce the sum presently payable to the Plaintiff to Rs. 17,478. 12a. 9p., for which, having regard to the shares taken by him and by the other [502] parties under the deeds of 1852 and 1855, they held Sheochurn Doss to be solely liable.

Pro forma Orders giving effect to this decree were passed on the same day upon the other three appeals.

The Plaintiff has appealed against these decrees to Her Majesty in Council. He submits that they should be affirmed in so far as they affirm the decree of the Zillah Court, and ought to be set aside, reversed, or varied, in so far as they vary or differ from that decree. The particular relief which he has claimed at the bar will be more conveniently noticed thereafter.

Sheochurn Doss has presented a cross appeal against the decrees below. He insists that they are unjust and erroneous in so far as they affirm the decree of the Zillah Court, and that the Plaintiff's suit ought to have been dismissed with costs. He further submits that, if the decree of the Sudder Court against him was substantially right in other respects, it was erroneous in making him solely responsible for the sum decreed to the Plaintiff.

Mussumat Thookra has also presented a cross appeal. Her appeal is not distinguishable from that of Sheochurn Doss, except that she does not quarrel with that part of the decree which makes him solely responsible for the amount (if any) payable to the Plaintiff; and on the other hand insists that if the decree impeached was substantially right, positive directions should have been given and provision made for the payment of the maintenance to which she was found entitled.

In dealing with these appeals, we shall first consider whether both the Courts below were right in holding that the property in question was the joint and undivided property of the five brothers; and [503] in deducing as a consequence from that finding, that the Plaintiff, notwithstanding his acts and conduct in 1848, was in 1852, the date up to which the accounts have been taken, entitled to one-fourth share of it.

The case of the Defendants and cross Appellants upon the first of the points is that the partnership property was in no degree acquired by the use of ancestral property; that Deenanath left his native village to seek his fortunes some years after his father's death with nothing but his brass lotah, or drinking vessel; that he took service with one Peeroo Mull, a native Banker at Agra; that whilst in that service he realized a small capital by means of some private adventures; that with the capital so acquired and its accretions he established first the Agra and afterwards the other firms; that he associated with himself, from motives of family affection, first Radhakishen and Moona Loll, and afterwards the other two brothers; employing them in the business rather as dependants than as partners on an equal footing with himself; and that the property of the different firms, if not wholly the separate and self-acquired property of Deenanath, was nevertheless partnership property, to be dealt with according to the rules which regulate mercantile partnerships between strangers and was not subject to the rule of Hindoo law which excludes a widow from the succession to her husband's share of the joint property of an undivided family. If this contention be well founded, the Plaintiff was entitled to at most a fifth share in the partnership assets, and when he brought his suit had received even more than his due in the assets of the Mirzapoor firm.

[504] Before dealing with the evidence upon the question now under consideration, it may be well to notice the arguments of the Attorney-General to the effect that the pleadings of the Plaintiff are in fact inconsistent with the case on which he now relies, and tend to confirm that of the Defendants. To show that the Plaintiff did not sue as one of the co-sharers of a joint and undivided family, but as an ordinary partner, he relied on the phrase "The claim is brought in virtue of right of copartnership" at the commencement of the plaint, and the use of the word "partnership" in other parts of the pleadings; and also on the circumstance that the Plaintiff claimed only one-fourth part of Deenanath's share, whereas the Hindoo law of succession, which he was supposed to invoke, would have given him one-half of that share; inasmuch as by that law nephews cannot take by representation in competition with the surviving brothers of a deceased co-sharer.

Assuming the latter proposition to be correct, which their Lordships consider it to be, it may show only that the Plaintiff has to some extent mistaken his rights, and claimed less than he might have claimed. The presumption arising from this misstatement of his rights as co-sharer in an undivided Hindoo estate, is by no means conclusive. It may be outweighed by the proof that the property was in part joint, which the conduct of the family, and the mode in which they kept their accounts, afford. And it may be observed that the claim made is also inconsistent with the hypothesis of a partnership governed by the rules which regulate the rights of mercantile partners as such inter se. Nor is it possible to read the whole plaint without seeing that the ground on which the claim to any portion of [505] Deenanath's share rests is the rule of law which excludes the widow from the succession to a share in a joint and undivided Hindoo estate, and limits her rights to maintenance. Upon the argument founded on the word "copartnership," their Lordships have to observe that the pleadings before them have been translated from those in the native language; that the word is ambiguous; that the phrase "is brought in virtue of right of copartnership" covers the whole claim, which includes the Huqq Purohittai, admitted to be ancestral property and no part of the assets of the mercantile firms. Looking to the whole scope of the pleadings, their Lordships have no doubt that the Plaintiff's claim was really based upon his alleged rights as a co-sharer, in a joint and undivided Hindoo estate, and that, as such, it was sufficiently well pleaded.

Upon the facts it must be admitted that the evidence falls far short of proof that the ancestral property contributed in any material degree to the acquisition of the funds employed in trade which formed the bulk of the property in dispute. The family was, however, an undivided family, and there was a nucleus of ancestral property. It may be further admitted that Deenanath laid the foundation of the future fortune of the family. But there is no proof that he kept as separate, or treated as separate, property that which he acquired at Agra. On the other hand, it is shown that many years before his death he associated his brothers with himself as partners, and that thenceforward they carried on business together, each contributing by his exertions to the increase of the common stock. The partition deed of the 23rd of February, 1852, itself [506] negatives the hypothesis that he employed his brothers as servants or dependants, since under that instrument they share as partners and take an equal share with his widow and assumed representative. There is nothing prima facie improbable in the hypothesis that he brought his earlier gains voluntarily into the common stock, making them the capital on which he and his brothers were to trade. All future gains being made by their joint exertions would, according to the general principle of Hindoo law, be the joint property of the family whilst undivided, and be partible as such on a partition. There is no proof of any special contract (and the proof of such lay on the Defendants) which impressed the character of partnership as distinguished from joint or separate property, in the Hindoo sense of these terms, upon the property in question. In this state of things we have not only the judgments of the two Courts below in favour of the Plaintiff upon this question, but we have also the finding of the two native Assessors to whom it was expressly referred, founded on the pregnant evidence afforded by the Books and accounts of the family. These persons are shown, by later proceedings in the cause, to have had no undue bias in favour of the Plaintiff, and they brought to the examination of the matters referred to them that intimate knowledge of native usages to which a European rarely, if ever, attains. Their Lordships cannot adopt the construction which the Attorney-General would have them put on the Assessors' report of the 15th of March, 1857. They believe the first finding in that report to be that the property was joint in the Hindoo sense of the term. And they see no sufficient grounds for dissenting [507] from that conclusion, or from that to which the Assessors and the Courts below also came, upon the question whether the Plaintiff had effectually separated himself from the rest of the family in 1848.

This being so, the remaining questions for determination, with the exception of one touching the provision for Mussumat Thookra's maintenance, are those which arise upon the Plaintiff's appeal, and involve the consideration of the deductions made by the Sudder Court from the amount awarded to him by the Zillah Court.

That it was right to call upon the Plaintiff to bring into the account the profits made by the Mirzapoor firm between the years 1848 and 1852, appears to their Lordships to be too clear for argument. It is, however, insisted that the Court has improperly visited his failure to produce the accounts required, by charging him with interest on the principal sum for which he was accountable at the rate of 12 per cent.; that they ought to have given him further time to produce his accounts; and that the cause ought to be sent back to India, in order that the account of profits may be now taken. Their Lordships have to observe that the time to be allowed was a matter for the discretion of the Court; that the account was presumably one which the Plaintiff, as a Merchant and Banker, ought to have been able to produce at short notice; that the time actually allowed was not unreasonably short; that in the circumstances it was competent to the Court to charge the Plaintiff with interest in lieu of the profits for which he had failed to account; and that the rate of interest was only that which he himself claimed on the sums due to him. The Defendants are willing to accept the [508] interest in lieu of the profit, and their Lordships can see no ground for sending the cause back upon this point at the instance of the Plaintiff. The sum of Rs. 14,316. 2a. 6p., mentioned in the examination of the Commissioners of the 28th of March, 1857, was obviously one item of profit appearing in the Books; not the measure of the profits of the Mirzapoor firm for the whole of the four years in question. The other items of account which the Plaintiff disputes, and on which he asks to have the cause sent back for further trial, have all been investigated by the native assessors or commissioners. These were persons peculiarly conversant with native accounts; they appear to have been examined on their report in open Court on the 5th of June, 1860; and the Judges of the Sudder Court expressly state that, after going over the several items with the Commissioners, they entirely concurred in their opinion. To remit a cause to India, for the purpose of reopening accounts so taken is obviously a course which their Lordships would not be justified in adopting, unless they had a clear conviction that there had been a miscarriage of justice. They have no such conviction in the present case. It may be true that the Commissioners have not required evidence dehors the Books; but the Plaintiff, as a member of the joint family and a partner in the several firms, was prima facie bound by the entries in the books. If he impeached them, it lay on him to falsify them.

Their Lordships do not think that the amount of maintenance decreed to Mussumat Thookra is excessive. It is, however, objected by her that positive directions should have been given, and provision made for the payment of her maintenance. And the [509] Plaintiff, on his side, complains that he is by the decree deprived of his right to claim a share of the principal sum deducted to meet this claim of maintenance on the death of Mussumat Thookra.

A Court of Equity in this country, if administering the whole estate, would no doubt have carried over the sum set apart for this purpose to a separate account; would have directed that the annual income should be paid to Mussumat Thookra during her life; and that the parties who had a reversionary interest in the principal should be at liberty to apply concerning it on her death. The Country Courts in India have, however, no machinery which enables them to take any such course. Nor was the suit one for the general administration of the estate. It was, in form, a suit to obtain present payment of the balance which the Plaintiff alleged to be due to him on the proper division of the property and adjustment of the accounts. The course, therefore, which the Court took was to deduct from the gross amount of divisible assets the sum of Rs. 15,000, which at 10 per cent would produce the annual sum of Rs. 1500, and to leave it as residue undivided in the hands of Sheochurn Doss, in which it was found, subject to the obligation of paying the maintenance. Sheochurn Doss and Mussumat Thookra being co-Defendants, and there being no proof of the precise terms and conditions on which he had made over to him the share which she took under the deed of the 23rd of February, 1852, the Court was hardly in a condition to make more precise provision for the payment of her maintenance by him. Nor is it expedient that their Lordships should now make any Order on that subject. Again, if the Sudder Court had simply deducted the [510] Rs. 15,000, as so much undivided residue, without saying anything about the Plaintiff's future rights, their Lordships, considering the form of this suit, would have doubted whether he had any grounds for impeaching the decree on this point. The judgment, however, says, "We decide that the best mode of settling her claim will be to deduct from the total divisible assets the sum of Rs. 15,000, the proceeds of which shall be devoted to Thookra's maintenance, and in respect to which the Plaintiff is declared to possess no right." These last words are certainly calculated to embarrass the Plaintiff, or his representatives, in asserting the right, which they seem to possess, to claim a share of this sum when the purpose for which it has been deducted from the divisible assets, the maintenance of Mussumat Thookra, has been satisfied. Their Lordships, therefore, propose to add to the decree a declaration, that it is to be without prejudice to the right of the Plaintiff, or of his representatives, to claim on the death of Mussumat Thookra, such share as he or they may be entitled to in the sum of Rs. 15,000, retained to provide for her maintenance.

Their Lordships, however, do not think that this slight modification of the decree ought to affect the costs of the appeal. And the Order which they will humbly recommend Her Majesty to make is, that the cross appeals of Sheochurn Doss and Mussumat Thookra be both dismissed with costs; and that, on the appeal of the Plaintiff, the decree in No. 62 be varied by the addition of the declaration above mentioned; that in other respects the decrees appealed against be affirmed; and that the Appellant, Rampershad, do pay the costs of his appeal.

[511] JOWALA BUKSH, son of MEETA RAM. —Appellant: DHARUM SINGH, alias IMDAD ULEE KHAN; MUSSUMAT BAJAH KOONWUR and Others.—Respondents * [Feb. 13, 14, 1866].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, North-Western Provinces, Agra.

It is essential that a Claimant seeking to oust a party in possession of an estate, should establish his own right to the estate, and not rely upon the failure of the title impeached [10 Moo. Ind. App. 528].

A decree of the Sudder Court held, that although the title set up by the Plaintiff might be wholly bad, yet that a party Defendant with whom the Plaintiff had by a deed of Solunamah, or compromise, agreed to divide the estate, was entitled and on that ground decreed possession. Such decree reversed on appeal, as the effect of the decree would be (1) to defeat the Defendant's possessory title without giving him an opportunity of contesting the title of the party by whom he is turned out of possession, and (2) as it was a violation of legal principles which protect possession, and of justice which regulate the joinder of parties and the union of titles to sue in one suit.

Act, No. XIII. of 1848, is limited to Awards made by Collectors under Ben. Regs. VII. of 1822, IX. of 1825, and IX. of 1833, which gives to the Revenue authorities judicial power to determine questions of possession, and the right of appeal from such Award is subjected to three years' limitation.

The general rule, that the possession of one member of a joint Hindoo family is the possession of all other members, does not apply where the party claiming has been clearly excluded from the family. In such a case the possession is adverse, and under the general law of limitation the time will run from such adverse possession.

Whether, a Hindoo family, though converted to Mahomedanism, but conforming for several generations to Hindoo customs and usages, can, by virtue of the retention of Hindoo customs and usages, set up for itself a special and customary law of inheritance. Quære?

Abraham v. Abraham (9 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 199) distinguished from such a case [10 Moo. Ind. App. 537].

The suit out of which this appeal arose, was instituted by Aram Singh, alias Ushruff Ulee, since deceased, and one of the Respondents, Kalal Singh, [512] alias Gholam Ulee, the sons of one Loll Singh, caste "Thakoor Burh Gugar," a race descended from the Rajpoot tribe of Hindoos, on the banks of the Doab, who had been converted to Mahomedanism: against the Appellant and Mussumat Soondur, widow of Meeta Ram, to obtain a declaration of their hereditary right to succeed to the Talogga of Ourungabad Kaseer, consisting of eight Mouzahs situate in the Boolundshuhur District, in the North-Western Provinces: and also to cancel and set aside a deed of sale, dated the 17th of October, 1842, executed by the late Thookranee Maha Kooer, also called Mussumat Maha Kooer, the widow of Tara Singh, in favour of Meeta Ram, the Appellant's father, and to recover mesne profits in respect of the Talogga.

The circumstances which gave rise to the appeal were as follows:—

Roop Singh, alias Pahulwan Ulee Khan, the common ancestor, was Zemindar of Ourungabad, and died in the year 1753. He had issue three sons, Looft Ulee Khan, alias Tara Singh, Mokund Singh, and Mohun Singh, who alone had issue a son, named Loll Singh. He also died, leaving two sons, the Plaintiff, Aram Singh, and Golol Singh.

The Appellant's case was, that Mohun Singh was the issue of a concubine, and that Loll Singh the issue of a female musician, and, consequently, that the descent of Aram Singh and Golol Singh from Pahulwan Ulee Khan was not legitimate.

[513] On the death of Tara Singh without issue, in 1805, his widow, Thookranee Maha Kooer, became proprietress of the Ourungabad estate, and also of the Chukatlul estate, of which Roop Singh had been also Zemindar, but which estate was not in issue in this appeal, in the room of her husband, with whom a settlement for the Government revenue was made.

In consequence of the Government revenue having fallen into arrear, and Thookranee Maha Kooer being in debt to other parties, the estates were in 1811 placed under the Court of Wards, and managers appointed, who remained in possession till the year 1833, when a settlement was made with Thookranee Maha Kooer, as sole and absolute proprietor of the estate, for twelve years, from 1833 to 1844 inclusive.

In the year 1842, Thookranee Maha Kooer sold the Ourungabad estate to Meeta Ram, the father of the Appellant, for Rs. 30,000, and executed a deed of sale, dated the 17th of October, 1842, which was registered on the 24th of February, 1843, and the purchaser's name recorded as, Zemindar, Lumbadar, and Malguzar, of the estate.

It appeared that shortly after the execution of the deed of sale, and before the name of Meeta Ram was recorded, notices were issued for objections; and as certain objectors appeared (one of whom was Aram Singh), the recording of the purchaser's name was postponed in order that inquiries might be made. The objections raised were, in the main, that Thookranee Maha Kooer was not of sound mind, and that the sale was fraudulent; the Thookranee not having been aware what she was doing. After making inquiries, the Collector declared that Thookranee Maha Kooer was of sound mind, and had sold [514] the property voluntarily, and that there was no objection to the mutation of names.

In August, 1844, Meeta Ram died, leaving the Appellant, and a widow, Mussumat Soondur Kooer, when objections were for the first time raised by Thookranee Maha Kooer, that the estate was under the Court of Wards at the time of the sale, and that the transfer of the property had been procured by fraud. These objections were overruled, and the Appellant's name registered as Lumbadar.

Thookranee Maha Kooer died in the year 1853.

On the 14th of August, 1854, Aram Singh and Golol Singh, claiming as heirs and representatives of their father, Loll Singh, and grandfather, Mohun Singh, brought a suit in the Civil Court of Meerut, for possession of the estate of Ourungabad, by cancelment of the deed of sale, dated the 17th of October, 1842, alleging, first, that they were co-sharers with Thookranee Maha Kooer; and secondly, that the estate had been obtained by fraud without payment of any consideration money, and further, that it was at the time of sale, under the Court of Wards, and for recovery of mesne profits.

The Defendants, the Appellant and Mussumat Soondur Kooer, by their answer, denied that the Plaintiffs were ever co-sharers with Thookranee Maha Kooer, and alleged that their claim was barred by the Regulation of limitations of suits, and further alleged, that the Plaintiffs were not the legitimate descendants of the common ancestor, Pahulwan Ulee Khan: that the estate was not under the Court of Wards at the time of the sale, and that the sale to Meeta Ram was genuine.

Afterwards, a supplemental plaint was filed to the [515] effect: that one Mussumat Rutta Kooer's name was registered in regard to the Chukathul Estate, as successor of Thookranee Maha Kooer, and that as the points in dispute with respect to the Chukathul and Ourungabad estates were identical, by reason that both estates were the ancestral property of Pahulwan Ulee Khan, it was necessary that Mussumat Rutta Kooer should be made a Defendant. The Appellant objected to the supplemental plaint, denying that the suits had the same foundation, and stating that there was no necessity for making Mussumat Rutta Kooer a Defendant. But she was admitted as a Defendant, and put in her answer.

The principal issues were, first, was the estate in suit the ancestral property of Pahulwan Ulee Khan, and were the Plaintiffs his real heirs, and up to the time of the sale did Loll Singh, father of Plaintiffs, and Mohun Singh, his father, continue in possession, as proprietors along with Thookranee Maha Kooer, who was the daughter-in-law of the common ancestor, or not? and at that time did the estate, in consequence of the disqualification of Thookranee and the father of the Plaintiffs, come under the Court of Wards, or was it under the sole agency and management of the ancestor of Defendants, and Meeta Ram, purchaser? Secondly, was the Thookranee at the time of the sale deranged in mind, and was the deed of sale fraudulently altered by collusion of the vendee with the agents of the vendor? And was the payment of Rs. 30,000 consideration money entered, as it stated, and the deed executed on payment of the consideration money, with the consent of the vendor and vendee: and was the estate of Chukathul, and its decree of the same form and nature as in this suit, or how? and thirdly, were the [516] Plaintiffs on the death of Thookrance declared to be her heirs, and after the sale were they prepared to object and to institute a suit?

After taking evidence as to his ancestor being converted to Mahomedanism by force, and the family following Hindoo usages and customs, Sheikh Monim Ulee Khan, the Principal Sudder Ameen of Meerut, by a decree bearing date the 29th of August, 1856, dismissed the suit. In the judgment of the Court, the Sudder Ameen referred to the suit, No. 17 of 1856, to which the Appellant was not a party respecting the estate of Chukathul, which had also belonged to Pahulwan Ulee Khan, and concluded as follows:—"That suit, by the Orders of the Sudder Court, was again brought into this Court, and after investigation this day, in consequence of want of proof of right and dispossession of the Plaintiffs, and their ancestors for a long time, was dismissed, and the Plaintiffs being considered not to be the heirs of Pahulwan Ulee Khan, or of Mussumat Maha Kooer, deceased, were held to be entire strangers, and not having any concern with the estate; and in their petition, on which an Order was passed on the 27th of November, 1855, the Plaintiffs have clearly stated that the nature of the dispute in both suits is identical. Therefore their having no right and possession is proved in this suit also. On this account the genuineness or otherwise of the deed of sale cannot now be inquired into in a suit brought by these Plaintiffs. It is the fault of the Plaintiffs, who although they did not hold possession of the Chukathul estate, too hastily making themselves out to be the heirs of the deceased female, set about suing for the cancelment of the sale, and thus burdened themselves with costs also."

[517] The Plaintiffs appealed to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut at Agra against this decision, and that Court, by a decree, dated the 24th December, 1861, reversed the decision of the Principal Sudder Ameen, and decreed, that the Appellant and Mussumat Soondur Kooer should be dispossessed, and that the Plaintiffs and the Defendant, Mussumat Rutta Kooer, should be put in possession of the estate of Ourungabad, agreeably to the stipulations of a certain Solunamah or deed of compromise entered into between them, by which they agreed to divide the estate: the matter of mesne profits for the past and future to be settled at the time of execution of decree under s. 197, Act No. VIII. of 1859. In giving judgment, the Sudder Court, consisting of Messrs. Gubbins, Lean, and Ross, entered more fully into the merits than the Principal Sudder Ameen, and decided that the estate was under the Court of Wards at the time of the sale, and that the deed of the 17th of October, 1842, was consequently illegal; that the proof of the receipt of the purchase-money was untrustworthy, and that the deed in question had been procured by fraud, because a certain deed relating to the Chukathul estate, and made in favour of one Nittianund (to which deed neither the Appellant nor his father, Meeta Ram, the purchaser of the Ourungabad estate, was a party), had been declared fraudulent. The Sudder Court did not deal with the main questions raised in the suit, whether the Plaintiffs or their father ever had any title to the estate as claimed by the Plaintiff, and whether such title was barred by the Regulations of Limitation; but decided the appeal on the ground that, in the opinion of the Court, the sale was not bona fide, and the suit had [518] been commenced by Aram Singh within twelve years after the date of the deed of sale. Hence the present appeal.

After the admission of the appeal Aram Singh died, when the appeal was revived and his representatives made co-Respondents. Mussumat Rutta Kooer did not appear.

Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Almaric Rumsey, for the Appellant; and Mr. Leith, for the Respondents Dharum Singh, and Mussumat Rajah Koonwur.

The principal points argued on the appeal were:—

First, upon the question, whether the Hindoo or Mahomedan law governed the succession, after the conversion of the family to Mahomedanism, and the effect of the evidence of the observance of Hindoo usages and customs by the family after being so converted. Abraham v. Abraham (9 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 199), and the Lex loci Act, No. XXI. of 1850, were referred to.

Second, on the assumption of the Mahomedan law applying, that the onus to establish illegitimacy was on the Respondent, Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan v.

Shurfoon Nissa Begum (8 Ibid. 136), and that by such law a widow would only be entitled to two-thirds of her husband's estate: Mussummat Soobhane v. Bhetun alias Shah Azamally (1 Ben. Sud. Dew. Rep. 346), were relied on.

Third, on the other hand, if the case was to be regulated by the Hindoo law, it was insisted by the Respondents that the sale was bad, as a Hindoo widow had only a qualified estate, namely, a right to be [519] maintained, without power of sale. The Collector of Masulipatam v. Caraly Venkata Narrainapah (8 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 550); W. H. Macnaghten's "Prince of Hindu Law," Vol. II. p. 211.

Fourth, whether, having regard to the long adverse possession of Thookranee Maha Kooer, and to the date of the deed of sale by her to Meeta Ram, the suit was not barred (1) by the general Regulations of Limitation of suits after twelve years. Ben. Regs. III. of 1793, sec. 14; II. of 1803, sec. 18; II. of 1805, sec. 3, cl. 1, Maharajah Koonwur Bahoo Nitastur Singh v. Baboo Nand Loll Singh (8 Ibid. 199); Doorgapershaud Roy Choudry v. Tarapersaud Roy Choudry (Ibid. 308), were relied upon; (2), as to effect of possession given by the Collector under Reg. VII. of 1822, Syed Kasim Ali Khan v. Bhageeruttee Singh (1st Augt. 1848, Dec. N.W. Prov. 275); and (3), as to the limitation by lapse of time after Award made by revenue authorities, Act No. XIII. sec. 3 of 1848, was relied on.

The consideration of the case was adjourned, and their Lordships' judgment now pronounced by

The Right Hon. Sir Edward V. Williams (June 18, 1866).—This is an appeal from a decree of the Sudder Court of the North-Western Provinces, reversing a decree which the Principal Sudder Ameen of Meerut had made in the Appellant's favour, by dismissing the suit against him.

That suit was brought by Aram Singh (who is since deceased, but is represented on the record by the four first Respondents) and the Respondent, [520] Golol Singh, to recover from the Appellant possession of the Talook, of Ourungabad Kaseer, in the district of Bolundshuhur, with mesne profits; and to cancel and invalidate a deed of sale of that Talook, which was executed on the 17th of October, 1842, by Mussumat Maha Kooer, wife of Tara Singh, in favour of the Appellant's father, Meeta Ram.

The Appellant was in possession of the property claimed under the following title:—The Ourungabad estate, and also another estate called Chukathul which was situate in the Collectorate of Allyghur, formerly belonged to one Roop Singh, otherwise called Pahulwan Ulee Khan, who died A.D. 1753. He was by extraction a Gujar, a race of Hindoos common in the Doab, of which Professor Wilson says in his Dictionary, "They profess to descend from Rajpoot fathers by women of inferior castes." Rook Singh, however, became a convert to the Mahomedan faith, and thenceforth adopted the Mussulman alias of Pahulwan Ulee Khan; and the custom of bearing both a Hindoo and a Mussulman name seems to have been continued in his family. He left a son, Lootf Ulee Khan, otherwise Tara Singh, who succeeded him in the enjoyment of his property, and died without issue in 1805. He was succeeded by his widow, Thookranee Maha Kooer, who became, as the Appellant contends, sole and absolute proprietor of both Talooks, and, as such, enjoyed them for many years. In 1842 she sold the Ourungabad estate to Meeta Ram (the father of the Appellant) for Rs. 30,000, and executed to him the Bill of sale of the 17th of October, 1842, which the Plaintiffs in this suit seek to have set aside. This document was registered [521] on the 23rd of February, 1843; and certain proceedings were had before the Collector of Bolundshuhur, which resulted in Meeta Ram being recorded, in the month of December, 1843, in the Books of that Collectorate as "Zemindar, Lumbaradar, and Malguzar" of the whole of this Talook, with the exception of one village. Meeta Ram died in August, 1844, and on an application by his son, the Appellant, for a mutation of names, the Thookranee raised some objections to the validity of the deed executed by her. These, after inquiry, were overruled by the Collector, and his decision was confirmed by the Commissioner on the 21st of February, 1845. From that time, and at least up to the date of the decree under appeal, the Appellant was the registered proprietor of the Ourungabad estate, and in actual possession of it. Thookranee Maha Kooer died on the 8th of September, 1853; and the suit was instituted on the 14th of August, 1854.

The case made by the plaint, in opposition to the Appellant's title, was to this effect:—

The Ourungabad and Chukathul Talooks were both the ancestral property of Pahulwan Ulee Khan, who is termed "the great ancestor" of the Plaintiffs. He had three sons, Mohun Singh, Tara Singh, and Mokund Singh. The two latter died without issue, but Mohun, the youngest, left a son, Loll Singh, who was the father of the Plaintiffs. The first settlement of the estates after they came, by the conquest of the Provinces in which they lie, under British rule, was made in 1213 Fuslee (1806), when the only surviving representatives of the great ancestor were Loll Singh and Thookranee Maha Kooer, the wife of Tara Singh, who, by mutual consent, lived together [522] in partnership. A summary settlement was made in 1216 Fuslee (A.D. 1809), with the assent of Loll Singh, with the Thookranee; but in the following year some arrears of revenue having then accrued, another inquiry was made as to the proprietorship of the estates, and both the Thookranee and Loll Singh having been declared disqualified, both Talooks were, by an Order of the 9th of April, 1811, placed under the management of the Court of Wards. Gunga Ram, the father of Meeta Ram, was at one time manager of both Talooks under the Court of Wards, and was, in 1825, succeeded by Meeta Ram, who was afterwards dismissed for misconduct from the management of Chukathul, but continued in that of Ourungabad, which had been transferred to the Collectorate of Bolundshuhur. The plaint then gives the subsequent history of the Chukathul estate. It alleges that Meeta Ram caused a document, dated the 21st of June, 1840, and purporting to be a deed of sale of that property by Thookranee Maha Kooer to his nephew Nittianund, for the pretended consideration of Rs. 50,000, to be fabricated; and on the 1st of March, 1842, obtained a fraudulent and collusive decree founded on that instrument. It shows that these transactions were afterwards impeached and set aside by a decree of the Civil Court of 26th of January, 1849, affirmed by one of the Sudder Court of the 19th of February, 1851; whereupon "the proprietary right reverted to its former status." These decrees proceeded chiefly on the ground that the estate at the date of the alleged sale was under the management of the Court of Wards, and that the disqualified proprietor had, therefore, no power of alienation. The plaint then alleges that the same objections [523] applied to the sale of the Ourungabad estate to Meeta Ram in October, 1842, that estate being also under the management of the Court of Wards. It insists that "under these circumstances the deed of sale executed by one unqualified proprietor, notwithstanding the existence of the other heirs of the great ancestor, cannot be held to be legal." It also charges that the transaction was fraudulent, and that not a single portion of the alleged consideration money was ever paid.

The plaint having been filed, the Plaintiffs were met by the difficulty occasioned by a third claim of title. Thookranee Maha Kooer had been registered as the sole owner of both the Chukathul and Ourungabad estates. After the sale of the former to Nittianund had been set aside, she had again been recognized by the Revenue authorities as the sole owner of that estate; and when she died the question arose, who was entitled to succeed as her heir. The Collector of Allyghur determined this question in favour of the plaintiffs; but his decision was overruled by the Government, which treating, apparently, the possession of the Thookranee as that of a sole and absolute proprietor, and the succession as governed by the Mahomedan law, determined that one Mussumat Rutta Kooer was, as her niece, entitled to succeed to her; and accordingly placed or continued the estate under the management of the Court of Wards for the benefit of that lady. The Plaintiffs, or rather Aram Singh alone, had brought a suit to contest the title of Mussumat Rutta Kooer to the Chukathul estate; and feeling that her title as alleged heiress of the Thookranee might embarrass them in this suit for the recovery of Ourungabad, [524] they applied for and obtained leave to file a supplemental plaint, in order to make her a Defendant to this suit also. This supplemental plaint thus stated the title of the Plaintiffs:—"During the lifetime of Tara Singh, Loll Singh, the Plaintiff's father, was entitled to one half of the ancestral property; and after the death of Tara Singh, his wife, Mussumat Maha Kooer, was entitled to only one-fourth of the estate; but in consequence of her being the elder relative, her name was registered in the Collector's office by mutual consent, and the said Thookraanee, and the Plaintiff's father, and after his death, the Plaintiffs lived together in partnership, and appropriated the produce. The registration of the name of one of the members of the family was sufficient for all the members of the family. The principal Plaintiffs being Hindoos of the Rajpoot tribe, the Mahomedan Pentateuch is not observed in their family: besides this, they are called by Hindoo names." And again, "The fourth share held by Thookraanee Maha Kooer in the estate of Tara Singh, does not descend by custom to Mussumat Rutta Kooer. In accordance with the usage prevailing in their family, and by heritage, the Plaintiffs are the owners of the entire estate."

The defences set up by the answer of the Appellant, and of his mother, who was joined with him as a Defendant, are reducible to the following heads: first, that the Thookraanee having been in sole possession of the property up to the date of the sale to Meeta Ram, to the exclusion of the plaintiffs and their father, their suit was barred by Regs. II. of 1803, sec. 18, and II. of 1805, sec. 3, the general Regulations of Limitation; secondly, that the claim of Loll Singh [525] and of the Plaintiffs having been rejected by the Revenue authorities in 1838 and 1843, the present suit was barred by Act. No. XIII. of 1848, without reference to the other Regulations of Limitation; thirdly, that the Plaintiffs' grandfather, Mohun Singh, and their father, Loll Singh, were both illegitimate, the former being the son of a slave girl; the latter, of a female minstrel; fourthly, that Loll Singh was never in joint possession and enjoyment of the property with the Thookraanee; that the revenue settlements were made with her alone; and that she was, in fact, sole proprietor of the estate, and registered as such, not as one of several co-shares; fifthly, that the Ourungabad estate, at the time of the sale to Meeta Ram, was no longer under the management of the Court of Wards, and sixthly, that there was no fraud in that transaction, and that the purchase-money was really paid.

There is a good deal of other matter in the answer, but it is more in the nature of evidence pleaded in support of one or other of the above allegations, than of matter raising other and distinct issues.

The Replication insisted that the Plaintiffs and their father possessed and enjoyed the property jointly with the Thookraanee; that the registration in the name of the latter afforded no conclusive presumption against that joint possession; and that these facts were both an answer to the plea of the Regulations of Limitation, and gave the Plaintiffs a present title to the property. It sought to explain the revenue settlements with the Thookraanee by saying that they were made with her as the elder relative or member of the family. And it met the plea of Act. No. XIII. of 1848 by saying, that the present suit was not brought for re-[526]versal of the settlement and Orders under the provisions of Regulations VII. of 1822, IX. of 1825, and IX. of 1833, but for reversal of the sale to Meeta Ram within the period of twelve years.

The other pleadings are not of importance. It may be mentioned, however, that those between the Plaintiffs and Rutta Kooer raised more distinctly the question, whether the succession to this property from the great ancestor and from the Thookraanee, was to be governed by the Hindoo or by the Mahomedan law of inheritance; the Plaintiffs insisting on the application of the former.

It has been mentioned that Aram Singh had brought a suit against Mussumat Ratta Kooer for the recovery of the Chukathul estate. The issues raised in that suit were necessarily almost identical with those raised in this suit between the Plaintiffs and Rutta Kooer. And in so far as they involved the questions of the legitimacy of the Plaintiffs' father and grandfather, the nature of the interest which Thookraanee Maha Kooer had in both the Talooks in her lifetime, and the heirship to her, they were also similar to the issues to be tried between the Plaintiffs and the Appellant. This being so, the suit for Talook, Chukathul was by Order of the Sudder Court, transferred from the Civil Court of Allyghur to that of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Meerut, in which the suit for Ourungabad was pending. Both causes were heard together, and the evidence, common to both, was taken in both. On the 29th of August, 1856, the Principal Sudder Ameen, by separate judgments, dismissed both suits. His conclusions upon the issues common to both were stated at length in the judgment in the Chukathul case. He found that neither the [257] father nor the grandfather of the Plaintiffs was legitimate; that neither the Plaintiffs nor their father had been joint in estate with Thookraanee Maha Kooer; and that, by reason of her long and adverse possession, the claim was barred by lapse of time. He also held that the succession to the Thookranee was determinable by the Mahomedan, and not by the Hindoo law, and that accordingly Mussumat Rutta Kooer was her heir and representative. And having thus found the Plaintiffs to be the heirs neither of Pahulwan Ulee Khan, nor of Thookranee Maha Kooer, "but to be entire strangers, not having any concern with the estate," he deemed it unnecessary to inquire into the genuineness or otherwise of the deed of sale of the 17th of October, 1842.

Aram Singh and his brother appealed to the Sudder Court against both these decisions. Pending these appeals a compromise was entered into between Aram Singh and Golol Singh on the one part, and Mussumat Maha Kooer on the other; the effect of which was that they were to divide the Chukathul estate, and the Ourungabad estate if it could be recovered, in certain proportions; and a decree was made by consent, in the Chukathul suit, on the 5th of December, 1861, giving effect to this compromise. The Sudder Court, on the 25th of December, 1861, heard the appeal in this suit; and on that occasion, after adverting to the compromise, and without coming to any conclusion concerning the Plaintiffs' title, it proceeded to consider whether the deed of the 17th of October, 1842, was illegal and without consideration. It determined this question against the Appellant, mainly on the ground that at the date of the deed, Talook, Ourungabad, like Talook, Chukathul, [528] was under the Court of Wards. But it also held that the payment of the consideration was not proved, and that the relation of Meeta Ram to the Thookranee, and his antecedents, afforded certain presumptions of fraud. It accordingly decreed possession of the property, with mesne profits, to the Plaintiffs and Musmat Rutta Kooer, in the terms of the deed of compromise; meeting the objection made by the Appellant's Vakeel that it lay on the Plaintiffs first to prove their title, by referring to the compromise and to the decree passed thereon in the former suit, and by observing that "it would indeed be but an idle and unprofitable prolongation of litigation to dismiss the suit of Aram Singh only to enable Mussumat Rutta Kooer to sue the Appellant for that which she was willing to share with Aram Singh."

Their Lordships are of opinion that this decree of the Sudder Court cannot be supported. The Appellant was in possession of the estate. He and his father had held continual possession of it from December, 1843, if not from October, 1842. His own possession of it had been unquestioned since February, 1845, when he was recorded as the proprietor of it. It was essential, therefore, for any party seeking to oust him from that possession to show a better title to the estate, i.e., a title which would give the claimant a right to the estate failing the title impeached. The judgment of the Sudder Court assumes that the title set up by the Plaintiffs may be wholly bad; but it says, if they are not entitled to recover the estate on showing that the Appellant's title is bad, Mussumat Rutta Kooer would be so entitled; and as they have agreed to divide the spoils with her, it matters not on which title the property is recovered. The title of Mussumat [529] Rutta Kooer could not be tried between her and the Appellant in this suit. The effect, therefore, of the judgment is to defeat the Appellant's possessory title, without giving him an opportunity of contesting the title of the party by whom he is turned out of possession. Their Lordships cannot give their sanction to this course of proceeding, which appears to them to be in violation of the legal principles which protect possession, as well as of the substantial principles of justice which regulate the joinder of parties and union of titles to sue in one suit. The decision, in effect, sustains an union of titles indirectly, which could not have been directly advanced in union against the Appellant's possession. It is difficult to estimate the full weight of the grave dangers to which so irregular a course might expose possession. They conceive that the first question which the Sudder Court ought to have decided, and which must now be decided on this appeal, is, whether the Plaintiffs have shown any title to this property.

In the determination of this question, the first material issue of fact to be considered is, whether, as the Plaintiffs allege, Loll Singh, and afterwards the Plaintiffs themselves, were in the possession and enjoyment of the property jointly with Thookranee Maha Kooer, or whether her admitted possession was in exclusion of them. Upon the determination of this issue depend not only a material link in the title laid, but also the application of the Law of Limitation to the case, and various presumptions that have an important bearing on the solution of other questions raised in the cause, particularly that of the legitimacy of the Plaintiffs' line of descent.

That the Thookranee was in her time the sole [530] recorded proprietor of the Talooks is incontestable. This, in an ordinary case, might be a circumstance of little moment; because it has been ruled, and is consistent with reason, that one member of a joint Hindoo family may be so recorded on behalf of the family. But in the present case arises the question, why the name in which the property was recorded should be that of the female rather than that of the male member of the family, particularly when, upon the application of the ordinary Hindoo law to the facts as stated by the Plaintiffs, that male member (Loll Singh) would, upon his uncle's death, have been entitled to the whole estate, and the female member (the Thookranee) would have had only a right to maintenance. It is no satisfactory answer to this question that this was done because the Thookranee was the elder member of the family: for it appears on the evidence that she was, in fact, younger in years than Loll Singh, and whether young or old, she was equally excluded by the Hindoo law from the inheritance to her husband's share in joint and ancestral property.

This recognition of her, therefore, as apparently sole proprietor, raises a presumption against the case of joint possession and enjoyment set up by the Plaintiffs.

Again, the broad facts deducible from the documentary evidence, so far from rebutting, positively confirm this presumption. The first settlement of both Talooks was made after inquiring into the title with the Thookranee in 1809. Two years afterwards, the revenue being in arrear, both Talooks were placed under the Court of Wards as "the estate of the widow of Tara Singh." In the proceeding of the Collector [531] of the 10th April, 1811, by which this was done, there is no mention of Loll Singh. The assumption of the estate by the Court of Wards would have been irregular under sec. 4 of Reg. LII. of 1803, if there had been then any co-proprietor not disqualified under sec. 3 of that Regulation. That Loll Singh was disqualified, by mental incapacity or otherwise, under that section, or had been declared to be so, there is not the slightest proof. The only foundation for the suggestion that he had been declared disqualified seems to be a loose statement in the Deputy Collector's letter of the 2nd of March, 1811, which, assuming Loll Singh, to be the heir of the Thookranee, says, that he is not qualified (and as such he could not be qualified) to have a settlement made with him.

Again, though Talook Chukathul remained under the custody of the Court of Wards, Talook Ourungabad was released from that custody some time about the year 1833. In 1833 a new settlement of Ourungabad was made with the Thookranee. In the Collector's proceedings it is stated that she then claimed the entire Zemindary, and asserted that there was no co-sharer of the estate who could call for division. A similar statement appears in the proceedings of the Collector of the 5th of September, 1836, which extended the settlement. A further extension of the settlement took place in 1839.

In 1837 we have evidence of his exclusion from Loll Singh himself. In December of that year, and again in April, 1838, he presented petitions to the Collector of Allyghur, praying for an investigation of his right as a co-sharer in Chukathul: treating the Thookranee as in possession, and himself as poor, destitute, and excluded by her. On the 10th of July, [532] 1838, a proceeding was had before the Collector. In this it is distinctly stated that neither the Claimant nor his father, Mohun Singh, were ever in possession of the estate. The illegitimacy of the Loll Singh's descent was also a point distinctly raised by the Thookranee on this occasion. The result was that the claim was dismissed, and Loll Singh referred to the Civil Court for the assertion of his alleged rights. In September, 1841, he applied to the Principal Sudder Ameen for leave to sue in forma pauperis for a moiety of both the Chukathul and the Ourungabad estates. His right to sue in forma pauperis was contested by the Thookranee, who, in her petition to the Court, repeats her objections to his title, as well as the grounds on which she sought to dispauper him. Nothing came of the suit, if it was really instituted, and Loll Singh died in 1842.

Again, the proceedings of the Collector of the 9th of December, 1843, on the application of Meeta Ram to be recorded as purchaser and Lumberdar of Ourungabard, on which occasion Aram Singh and others appeared as objectors, is also inconsistent with the theory that the Plaintiffs were from the time of Loll Singh's death to the date of the sale in the possession and enjoyment of the property as co-sharers with the Thookranee. On the application for the mutation of names in 1846, they did not even appear as objectors, leaving the contest to the Thookranee, who resisted it in the character of sole proprietor.

The petition of Aram Singh touching his under-tenure is also consistent with the theory that Mohun Singh, Loll Singh, and the Plaintiffs were treated as illegitimate relations and dependants of the family. It is inconsistent with the theory that they were ever [533] admitted to the rights of co-sharers in a joint ancestral estate. The proceedings also, which resulted in setting aside the sale of Chukathul, and are so strongly relied upon for another purpose, are destructive of this part of the Respondents' case. These proceedings were instituted by and with the authority of the Court of Wards, the Collector, on the part of Government, being a party; and the result of them was to replace the Court of Wards in possession of the estate on behalf of the Thookranee. Yet, as has been shown above, the possession of the Court of Wards would have been wholly irregular, had Aram Singh and his brother then been co-sharers in that estate. The Plaintiffs, therefore, have upon the evidence wholly failed to prove that they or their immediate ancestors were in possession or enjoyment of this property as co-sharers at any time during the tenure of Thookranee Maha Kooer, or indeed at any time since the death of "the great ancestor," in 1753.

The Counsel for the Respondents, when pressed by this difficulty, had recourse to a theory that the property was in the nature of an impartible Raj, and was, therefore, held by the elder to the exclusion of the junior branch of the family. But, to say nothing of the absence of any evidence of the existence of this supposed tenure, and of its inconsistency with the title set up by Loll Singh in 1837, and now pleaded by the Plaintiffs in this suit, it is obvious that though the theory might explain the enjoyment of the property by Tara Singh in exclusion of Mohun Singh, and afterwards of Loll Singh, it would afford no explanation whatever of its enjoyment by Thookranee Maha Kooer in exclusion of Loll Singh and his sons. For, by the Hindoo law, Loll Singh, if [534] the legitimate male heir of the great ancestor, would have taken the Raj on the death of his uncle, Tara Singh, to the exclusion of the widow, the property being assumed to be ancestral, and the family undivided. In the case of Katama Natchier v. The Rajah of Shivagunga (9 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 543), it was admitted that this would have been the course of descent according to the Miraasharā, if the property had been ancestral. The reason why in that case this Committee, overruling the decision of the Court below founded on the opinion of the Madras Pundits, preferred the title of the daughter to that of the nephew of the last possessor, was, that the Shivagunga Raj was the separate acquisition of the deceased, and, therefore, passed according to the Canon which regulates the descent of separate property, and not according to that which determines the succession to the joint or ancestral property of an undivided family.

The facts relating to the possession of the property having now been determined, it may be convenient next to dispose of the questions arising under the different Regulations of Limitation which were so much debated at the Bar. Their Lordships are of opinion that no ground has been shown for the application to this suit of the statutory bar of three years under Act, No. XIII. of 1848. The operation of that Act is limited to Awards made by the Collectors under the Regulations VII. of 1822, IX. of 1825, and IX. of 1833, which gave to the revenue authorities judicial power to determine certain questions of possession and other matters, with a right of appeal to the regular Courts against their Awards. That right of appeal is by the Act of 1848 subjected to [535] the three years' limitation. But the order for the mutation of names in the Register of 1843, to which alone it is important to apply the three years' bar, does not seem to be an Award of the same nature with those contemplated by the Act. Nor, in their Lordships' opinion, could the Award of the Collector conclude any of the questions of title, as distinguished from possession, which are raised in this suit. These, therefore, can only be affected by the general law of Limitation. The applicability of that law to the present case depends very much upon the nature of the title on which the plaintiffs are to be taken to rely. If they are to be taken to sue as the heirs of Thookraanee Maha Kooer, to set aside a conveyance obtained from her by fraud, their right of action accrued at the date of the conveyance, and their suit was just within even the twelve years' limitation. If they are to be taken to sue as the next heirs of her husband, to set aside a conveyance which, whether fraudulent or not, she, considered as a Hindoo widow, was incompetent to execute, their right of action accrued at the date of her death, and this suit was a fortiori within the legal period of twelve years. But, in so far as their title was adverse to that of Thookraanee Maha Kooer—and it is difficult to treat the title laid as not being of that nature—the facts proved touching her possession show that the claim is obnoxious to the objection that it is barred by lapse of time. The general rule, that the possession of one member of a joint Hindoo family is the possession of all, does not apply where the Claimant has been clearly excluded. In the latter case the possession is adverse, and time will run. The cases of Muhpal Singh v. Gyadutt, 1854, and Bunsedhur and [536] another v. Choddumnee Loll, 1852, in the decisions of the Sudder Court of Agra for those years respectively, are instances of the general rule, and of the exception.

It is unnecessary, however, to invoke the Regulations of Limitation if the Plaintiffs have failed, as their Lordships think they have failed, to establish the legitimacy of either Mohun Singh, or Loll Singh. That is an objection fatal to their title, in whatever character they are taken to sue. It has been seen that the illegitimacy of these persons was alleged by the Thookraanee certainly as early as 1837. Oral testimony of it, whatever that may be worth, has been given by the Appellant in this suit. The Plaintiffs have given no evidence of the legitimacy of their ancestors. They seem to rest on certain vague statements and admissions in the earlier Revenue proceedings, to the effect that Loll Singh was the grandson of the great ancestor, and the heir of the Thookraanee. The presumption of their illegitimacy is almost irresistible. There is nothing to show why, if they were legitimate, Mohun Singh, and, after his death, Loll Singh, did not share the property with Tara Singh; or why, on Tara Singh's death, Loll Singh did not succeed to it. On the other hand, the devolution of the property and the facts proved concerning their exclusion, and the sole possession of the Thookraanee in succession to her husband, are consistent with the hypothesis that they were legitimate; and, as illegitimate connections of and dependants on the family, received, by means of their under-tenure or otherwise, support and maintenance, and were to a certain extent recognized as relations.

The case has hitherto been treated upon the [537] assumption, which the Plaintiffs seem to have made part of their case, that this family, though converted to Mahomedanism, is to be taken as still conforming to the Hindoo laws and usages; and that, consequently, the questions of title raised in this cause are to be governed by Hindoo law. Their Lordships, however, are far from admitting the correctness of that assumption.

This case is distinguishable from that of Abraham v. Abraham (9 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 199). There the parties were native Christians, not having, as such, any law of inheritance defined by Statute; and in the absence of one, this Committee applied the law by which, as the evidence proved, the particular family intended to be governed. But the written law of India has prescribed broadly that in questions of succession and inheritance the Hindoo law is to be applied to Hindoos, and the Mahomedan law to Mahomedans; and in the judgment delivered by Lord Kingsdown, in Abraham v. Abraham, p. 243, it is said that "this rule must be understood to refer to Hindoos and Mahomedans, not by birth merely, but by religion also." The two cases in W. H. Macnaghten's "Princ. of Hindu Law," Vol. II. pp. 131, 132, which deal with the case of converts from the Hindoo to the Mahomedan faith, and rule that the heirs according to Hindoo law will take all the Property which the deceased had at the time of his conversion, are also authorities for the proposition that the devolution of his subsequently acquired property is to be governed by the Mahomedan law. Here there is nothing to show conclusively when or how the property was acquired by "the great ancestor." There was no [538] conflict, as in the cases just referred to, between Hindoos and Mahomedans touching the succession to him. Whatever he had is admitted to have passed to his descendants, of whom all, like himself, were Mahomedans; and it seems to be contrary to principle that, as between them, the succession should be governed by any but Mahomedan law. Whether it is competent for a family converted from the Hindoo to the Mahomedan faith to retain for several generations Hindoo usages and customs, and by virtue of that retention to set up for itself a special and customary law of inheritance, is a question which, so far as their Lordships are aware, has never been decided. It is not absolutely necessary for the determination of this appeal to decide that question in the negative, and their Lordships abstain from doing so. They must, however, observe, that to control the general law, if, indeed, the Mahomedan law admits of such control, much stronger proof of special usage would be required than has been given in this case.

The title advanced by the Respondents, the Plaintiffs in this suit, is that of Hindoo heirs claiming under a Hindoo title, and it is not necessary, therefore, for their Lordships to give any opinion upon the question how the case would have stood if the Plaintiffs' title had been vested upon the Mahomedan law; but as this view of the case was put forward by the Respondents' Counsel, in the course of his argument, their Lordships may observe that it does not seem to them that the Plaintiffs' case would have stood any better under the Mahomedan than under the Hindoo law, for, according to Mahomedan [539] law, Mohun Singh, if legitimate within the wide sense allowed by that law to the term, would have taken an equal share with Tara Singh in the inheritance of "the great ancestor," and Loll Singh, if legitimate, would have succeeded to his father's share, and would also, on Tara Singh's death, have come in as "residuary" for a portion of his uncle's share; and the proved exclusion of Mohun Singh and of Loll Singh would raise as strong a presumption of their spurious birth as has been already shown to prevail against the Plaintiffs' title, as rested upon the Hindoo law.

The Plaintiffs having thus failed to establish a title to the property, their Lordships do not think it would be right to express a judicial opinion upon the validity of the sale to Meeta Ram. They will only observe that the principal ground on which that transaction was impeached by the Sudder Court entirely fails; Mr. Leith having fairly admitted that on the evidence the Ourungabad estate must be taken to have been released by the Court of Wards long before the date of the sale. It may also be doubted whether sufficient weight was given to the proceedings before the Collector in 1843 and 1845. The transaction is not impeached as a purchase obtained by undue influence for inadequate consideration, but as one by which the property was obtained, under colour of a fictitious sale, for no consideration at all. It seems improbable that so gross a fraud should have escaped detection on either of the two local investigations referred to.

Their Lordships' decision, however, is to be taken to proceed wholly on the Plaintiffs' failure to prove a title to the property; and the Order which they will [540] humbly recommend Her Majesty to make is, that the appeal be allowed; that the decree of the Sudder Court be reversed; that the decree of the Zillah Court, dismissing the Plaintiffs' suit, do stand; and that the costs of this appeal be paid by the Respondents.

NAWAB SIDHEE NUZUR ALLY KHAN,—Appellant: RAJAH OJODHYARAM KHAN,—Respondent * [Feb. 17, 19, and 26, 1866].

On appeal from the High Court of Judicature at Fort William, in Bengal.

A decree of foreclosure made in 1847 by the Supreme Court at Calcutta was irregularly obtained. The mortgagees sold the mortgaged estate to A., who, in execution of the decree of foreclosure, which he had also purchased, dispossessed the mortgagor. The Mortgagor in 1848 filed a Bill in the Supreme Court to set aside the foreclosure decree, and to redeem the mortgaged estate. A. was a party to that suit, but, pendente lite, having wilfully suffered the estate to fall into arrears of Government revenue, entered into an agreement with M., whereby it was agreed that M. should bid for the estate when sold by auction at a sum less than its actual value. At the Government sale M. purchased the estate Benanee, and it was subsequently assigned to other alienees, Benanee. At the time of the sale to M., the suit for redemption by the mortgagor was pending, and the Court afterwards set aside the decree of foreclosure, and thereby made the estate in the possession of A., under his title from the mortgagees, subject to the equity of redemption of the mortgagor. A plaint in the nature of a supplemental suit was filed in 1860 by the Mortgagor in the Court of the District where the estate was situate, for possession consequent upon redemption, charging generally the whole transaction as between the Mortgagees, the purchaser, and subsequent alienees, to have been collusive and fraudulent. The Defendant denied collusion or fraud, and pleaded in bar: first, the Act No. I. of 1845, sec. 24, requiring the suit to be brought within one year of the Government sale; secondly, the general law of Limitations, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14, the suit not having been brought within twelve years from the time when the cause of action accrued. Held by the Judicial Committee:—

First, that the decree of the Supreme Court, setting aside the foreclosure, placed the possession of A. upon the footing of a Mortgagee in possession, and that from that time his title and his possession were in privity with the mortgage title, and no longer constituted such an adverse possession as could be pleaded in bar to the suit, under Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14.

Second, that as there had been a fraudulent sale, under Act No. I. of 1845, by A., the Mortgagees' representative in possession, that Act did not apply so as to defeat the Mortgagor's equity of redemption, and that the sale was to be considered as a private sale, and impressed a trust on the estate which passed under it.

Held further, that as there was a fraudulent agreement between the Mortgagees' representative in possession and the purchaser at the Government sale, both were estopped as against the Mortgagor, from relying upon the illegality of their contract [10 Moo. Ind. App. 558].

The effect of a foreclosure decree in the Supreme Court in a mortgage suit between Hindoos is equivalent to a decree establishing proprietary right in the Courts in the Mofussil in a similar suit.

By the procedure of the Courts in India, the Courts are bound to proceed according to the facts alleged in the plaint, and not to refuse to try issues of fact upon the merits, on the ground of the legal effect of the facts alleged in the plaint [10 Moo. Ind. App. 552, 553].

This was an appeal from two decrees of the High Court of Bengal, bearing date respectively the 1st of January, 1863, and the 12th of January, 1864, made [541] by Mr. Justice Bayley and Mr. Justice Campbell, in a divisional branch of that Court.

The last of these decrees, which was made on a review of the former, affirmed it, with some slight variation, which it is unnecessary to specify. The first decree reversed the decision of the Zillah Court of Midnapore made in a suit in which the present Respondent was the sole Plaintiff for redemption and possession brought by him as Mortgagor against the several Defendants, who were, firstly, the representatives of the original Mortgagees, Aushootosh Deb and Promothonauth Deb, respectively; secondly, the Receiver of the estate of Promothonauth Deb; thirdly, the Executors of one John Compton Abbott, [542] deceased; fourthly, one Alexander M'Arthur; fifthly, the Nawab Nazim; sixthly, the Executrix of a deceased Mahomedan servant of the Nawab Nazim; and lastly, the Appellant. The connection of these parties respectively with the redemption suit of the Plaintiff will more particularly appear hereafter.

The decision of the Judge of the Zillah Court dismissed the suit of the Plaintiff, the now Respondent, with costs, upon certain objections on points of law which, in the opinion of the Judge of that Court, interposed a bar to the further prosecution of the suit. The Plaintiff was not permitted to go into proof of his case on the merits. From this decision the Plaintiff appealed to the High Court; and that Court, differing in opinion from the Court below on the legal points upon which it had proceeded, reversed the decision and remanded the suit for trial. The present appeal was brought from that decision.

The suit in the Zillah Court was brought for redemption and possession consequent on redemption of certain valuable estates, particularly described in the plaint, constituting the Plaintiff's ancestral Zemindary. The title asserted was, that of a Mortgagor seeking to redeem, against Mortgagees represented by their representatives in estate, and against subsequent alienees of the Zemindary taking subsequently to the Mortgagees, and, as the Plaintiff contended, taking derivatively from them, and subject to his title to redeem.

On of the points was, whether the plaint sufficiently connected the present Appellant, whom it stated to be in possession of the property, with that mortgage title originally in the Mortgagees, the Debs, so as to show a prima facie case for including him in this redemption suit.

[543] The suit was stated by the Respondent to be supplemental, in its nature and object, to the one in the Supreme Court for redemption of the same property, brought by the same Plaintiff against the two Debs originally, and by amendment against John Compton Abbott. It was further urged by the Respondent, that as some of the Defendants against whom relief was asked in this suit, viz., the parties above enumerated after Alexander M'Arthur, were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the Plaintiff had sued in the Zillah Court of Midnapore by reason of that defect alone.

The Plaintiff, as the eldest son, was the head of a Hindoo family of distinction. A litigation had arisen between him and other members of his family, and to provide funds he had become a borrower from the Debs. Their advances were secured by mortgages taken at different times, one of which was stated to have been a Bengalee mortgage; the nature of the others did not appear. The Mortgagor and the Mortgagees were Hindoos. The Mortgagees obtained on the 25th May, 1847, a decree of foreclosure in the Supreme Court against the Mortgagor. This decree was irregularly obtained, and was subsequently set aside. Whilst this decree for foreclosure was in force, viz., on the 10th of June, 1847, the Debs sold the Zemindary to John Compton Abbott. He, after his purchase, in execution of the decree of foreclosure, which he had also purchased, dispossessed the Plaintiff. It did not appear that the Mortgagees had been in possession. The contrary was to be inferred. The possession was first acquired whilst the foreclosure decree was in force, by Abbott as owner, and not in privity with the mortgage title.

[544] The effect of a foreclosure decree in the Supreme Court in a mortgage suit between Hindoos, is equivalent to a decree establishing proprietary right, in the Company's Courts, on similar suits on the like instruments.

On the 2nd of February, 1848, the Plaintiff filed his Bill of Complaint on the equity side of the Supreme Court, to set aside this foreclosure decree, and to redeem the Zemindary. The Bill was originally filed against the Debs only; but on its appearing, by their answer, that they had sold to Abbott, he was made a party to the suit. After he was made a party, and on the 15th of April, 1848, he entered into an agreement with M'Arthur, which agreement was filed with the plaint, in the suit in appeal. This agreement, after reciting that Abbott was well seized of or otherwise entitled to the Zemindary, that the same was in arrear for revenue, and was advertised for sale of arrears of revenue, proceeded to stipulate as between these two persons, that M'Arthur should purchase the Zemindary for the sum of three lacs, in case the estate did not sell for more at the revenue sale; that he would pay to the Government, if he should be declared the purchaser, the sum for which the estate might be sold; and that he would, within a certain time after he should be declared the purchaser, and have obtained the usual certificate of title, pay to Abbott the difference between three lacs and the sum for which the estate should have been sold. At this time the suit of the Plaintiff in the Supreme Court for setting aside the foreclosure decree, and for redemption, was pending. The Court, by its decree, dated the 16th of November, 1852, set aside the decree of foreclosure, and thereby [545] made the Zemindary in the possession of Abbott, under his title from the Debs, subject to the right of redemption by the Plaintiff. This right was expressly declared by the judgment in the following passage:—"We think, therefore, that there must be some decree for redemption against Abbott, who, if the objections arising upon the form of the record be answered (which objections the Court had overruled), can stand upon no better footing than the Debs, whose title he purchased."

The effect of this judgment was to place the possession of Abbott upon the footing of that of a Mortgagee in possession, and from that time his above declared title and his possession were in privity with the mortgage title, and no longer constituted an adverse possession. By the reversal of the irregular foreclosure decree, the Mortgagor was restored to his original and legal relation to the mortgage title.

After Abbott had been made a party to the redemption suit, Promothonauth Deb, one of the Defendants, died, and the suit was revived, and other parties were made Defendants by a Bill of revivor and supplement. The personal representatives of Promothonauth Deb were made parties, together with M'Arthur and one George Lindsay Young, and the Nawab Nazim and the representatives of Sauduck Ally Khan, out of the jurisdiction of the Court, were also named as Defendants. These parties were stated to have been introduced as Defendants in consequence of some discovery which had been obtained by the answers previously put in. The agreement, however, between Abbott and M'Arthur previously mentioned, of the 15th of April, 1848, was then unknown to the Plaintiff, and the new Defendants [546] were made parties upon allegations that at the sale for the arrears of revenue referred to in the agreement, M'Arthur had purchased Benamee for Abbott and the Debs, and that they had sold to Sauduck Ally Khan, who had purchased Benamee for the Nawab Nazim. It would swell the narrative of the facts of the case which preceded the present suit to an unnecessary length, if the precedent litigation were followed minutely through all its stages. It will suffice to state that Sauduck Ally Khan and the Nawab Nazim did not appear to the Bill, and that, upon M'Arthur's answer coming in, and it appearing by it that he had conveyed to Sauduck Ally Khan, Benamee, for the Nawab Nazim, he was dismissed from the suit, and a decree for redemption was made against the other parties who had appeared in the suit. This decree bore date the 16th of November, 1852.

That decree, together with the agreement of the 15th of April, 1848, and another document, were annexed by the Plaintiff to his plaint in the suit under appeal. The decree declared that the "Plaintiff, as between himself and the Defendant in those suits, was entitled to redeem the mortgaged premises in the Bill mentioned, notwithstanding the said final foreclosure Order." The title to redeem was declared as to all the mortgaged premises, and not simply as to those which could be recovered in that suit, though the decree bound those only who were parties to the suit at the time when it was pronounced, and at that time M'Arthur had ceased to be a party to the suit. In a subsequent part of the decree it was ordered "that the Master should inquire and state to the Court what portions of the mortgaged premises had been sold since the same came into the [547] possession of John Compton Abbott for arrears of Government revenue, or otherwise, and to whom the same respectively had been sold: and if he should find that any had been so sold, he was to take an account of all moneys which had been received by or come into the hands of the Defendant, John Compton Abbott, or any person or persons by his Order or for his use in respect of the purchase money arising from such sales, or of the surplus proceeds of such Government sales, if any, or which, but for his or their wilful default, might have been received." This portion of the decree furnished one of the grounds on which the Judge of the Zillah Court proceeded in his dismissal of the Plaintiff's suit.

The decree also directed certain inquiries in the Master's office; and in the due prosecution of those inquiries, M'Arthur was subsequently, on the 17th of August, 1854, examined before the Master. This examination first disclosed to the Plaintiff the existence and contents of the agreement between M'Arthur and Abbott of the 15th of April, 1848. M'Arthur's examination further disclosed that there was an agreement between him and Abbott, that the latter should suffer the revenue to fall into arrear, in order that the estate might be sold for arrears of revenue; and further, that he, Abbott, should not bid for the estate. M'Arthur explained that his reason for wishing Abbott not to bid was to prevent its going above the three lacs.

This discovery led to the institution of the present suit. The plaint in this suit was filed on the 30th of May, 1860. In the plaint it was stated that possession was given to M'Arthur under the certificate of title, consequent on the sale for arrears of revenue, on the 1st of June, 1848. The plaint was for posses-[548]-sion consequent upon redemption. The relation to this suit of the several parties who are above mentioned to have been made Defendants to it, sufficiently appears by what has been already stated, except that the Defendant, Sidhee Nuzur Ally Khan, the Appellant, was described as in possession, collusively with the Nawab Nazim. The plaintiff in his plaint alleged, with respect to all the parties whose interest arose upon and after the sale for arrears of revenue, that is from the Nawab Nazim inclusively down to and including the present Appellant, that they took fraudulently and collusively. It was objected for the Appellant, that the plaint did not connect him with that charge of fraud and collusion, but the following words in the plaint, viz.: "the collusive, fraudulent, and fictitious auction sale like a private sale" evidently referred to that sale which the Plaintiff treated as the fraudulently interposed bar to his redemption, viz., that at which M'Arthur was declared the purchaser; for in a subsequent part of the plaint that sale and agreement between M'Arthur and Abbott, of the 15th of April, 1848, were referred to, and the words, "and the subsequent transfers," following on the words "the collusive, fraudulent, and fictitious auction sale like a private sale," plainly meant, as the sense imports, all those transfers between the parties whom the Plaintiff made, in person or by representation, Defendants, by derivation of title from the Nawab Nazim, and the words, "being declared collusive," imported that the Plaintiff ought by his suit to have them so declared. The repetition of the words "private sale," and the more formal conclusion, viz., "As the said sale took place in the mode described above, so it cannot be viewed in the light of a sale for arrears [549] of revenue, but is to be treated as a private one," clearly marked on what legal ground, whether sound or unsound, the Plaintiff meant to found his title to redeem as against those of the Defendants whom his former decree in the Supreme Court did not reach. Their Lordships, therefore, were of opinion that there was sufficient allegation in the plaint to connect the Appellant with the charge of fraud and collusion.

The Plaintiff swore to the truth of his plaint. The answers of the Defendants were taken. That of the Appellant, in the second and third articles, relied on the pendency of the suit in the Supreme Court, and on the Plaintiff's right not being established there. In the fourth article he relied on the special law of Limitation, sec. 24, Act, No. I. of 1845, and insisted that as the suit was not brought within one year, the sale could not be set aside. In the sixth he relied on the general Law of Limitation, sec. 14, Ben. Reg. III. of 1793. In the seventh he denied collusion. The answer of the Nawab Nazim raised the same questions on the law of limitation of suits. He objected further, in his third article, that the Government should have been made a Defendant, the suit being to set aside the revenue sale. He denied the charges of fraud and collusion, and insisted that if the Plaintiff had been wronged he had his claim for damages against Abbott and others.

The Plaintiff's Vakeel was examined by the Court as to the meaning of the Plaint and the nature of the fraud charged. That examination did not carry the matter further than the plaint itself.

The first and second issues were on the law of Limitation, as above stated. The third related to the Government not being a party, the suit being to [550] reverse the sale. The fourth was on the effect of the pendency of the suit in the Supreme Court. The fifth related to the form of the plaint.

The Zillah Judge decided against the Plaintiff on the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth issues; the defect of form to which the fifth issue related, he declared to be amendable; but as he considered the suit to be barred on the other grounds of the limitation law, and the nature of the decree in the Supreme Court, he made no amendment.

The High Court, on appeal, decided that the suit was not brought to set aside the revenue sale; that it was not barred by effluxion of time; that the pendency of the suit in the Supreme Court, at the time of the institution of the above suit (afterwards in the High Court, which had been substituted for the Supreme Court), and the decree given in that suit, were no bar to the prosecution of the claim.

The Court further considered that M'Arthur and Abbott could not allege their own wrong, and that a trust might be fixed on the estate of M'Arthur in favour of the Appellant without disturbing the Government sale; and with this declaration of the law they remanded the cause for trial. The present appeal was brought from this decree (see case, ante [10 Moo. Ind. App.], p. 322, on the application to stay proceedings in the Court below, pending the appeal to England).

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.), and Mr. A. K. Stephenson, for the Appellant, and Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Leith, for the Respondent.

It was argued:—

First, upon the pleadings (1) that plaint con-[551]-tained no distinct charge of fraud against the Appellant or the other Defendants, and was, therefore, bad, under Ben. Reg. II. of 1805, sec. 3, and Act, No. VIII. of 1859, sec. 26; and (2) that he could not be called upon to defend his title and possession on any general allegation of fraud as contained in the plaint, so as to connect him with the Mortgagees, the Debs, and entitle the Respondent to make him a party to the redemption suit.

Second, as to the operation of the Regulations of Limitations as a bar to the suit, that (1), if the statement in the plaint was correct, that the Respondent was dispossessed from the 3rd of October to the 5th of November, 1847; and if that was to be taken as the date of the accruing of the cause of action, more than twelve years had elapsed, or (2) if the cause of action accrued on the 30th of May, 1848, when the certificate of sale was granted to the Defendant, M'Arthur, as the auction purchaser of the Respondent's property, twelve years had equally elapsed, and, therefore, that the suit was barred by Ben. Reg. III. of 1793, sec. 14, Rajah Enayet Hossien v. Sayud Ahmud Reza (7 Moore's Ind. App. Cases, 238) was referred to on this point.

Third, it was insisted that on the correct interpretation of the provisions of Act, No. I. of 1845, relating to sales by auction for arrears of revenue, that Act was intended, not only for protection of the revenue, but to give security to titles to purchasers at such auctions; and to protect the holder of a title obtained at such auction, or his assignee, from having their titles questioned in a Court of Justice, except under the circumstances mentioned in the 24th section, or, that, at all events, the Mortgagor was bound to make good [552] to the purchaser, a stranger, the purchase money. Hope v. Liddell (21 Beav. 183), Rorke v. Errington (7 H.L. Cases, 617), Power v. Reeves (10 H.L. Cases, 645), North v. Ansell (2 P. Will. 618), The Bishop of Winchester v. Paine (11 Ves. 194).

Fourth, that even if there was fraud on the Mortgagor committed by Abbott and M'Arthur, in procuring a sale by auction for arrears of revenue designedly incurred, and that the sale was a secret sale, the remedy was, under Act, No. I. of 1845, by a personal action for damages, and not for the relief sought by the plaint.

Judgment was reserved, and now delivered by

The Right Hon. Sir Edward V. Williams (March 17, 1866).—After stating the above facts, his Lordship proceeded as follows:—

Before entering upon the particular questions raised by this appeal, it may be right to observe, that the Courts in India, in disposing of the case, were bound to proceed, as the High Court appears to have proceeded, upon the facts alleged by the plaint, and upon the assumption of the truth of those facts. When a Plaintiff, on certain alleged facts, asks relief, and is unable to obtain a trial of the facts, and a hearing on the facts that he may establish, by reason of the conclusions of law which the Judge forms on the case in its then condition, justice requires that the Court should proceed upon the Plaintiff's allegations. The case must be determined as if it had arisen on a demurrer to a pleading or to evidence where such [553] procedure exists. Courts cannot be justified in refusing to allow cases to go to proof upon any other assumption than that the facts alleged are capable of proof, and are proved. This assumption of the truth of the facts alleged must, however, be limited to the consideration of the legal effect of the facts alleged upon the bars raised against the trial of those facts, and their Lordships, therefore, abstain from expressing any opinion upon the points urged at the Bar, which do not arise out of the Plaintiff's pleadings and documentary proofs, or which, if they arise, are not necessary to the decision of this appeal. Observations were made by Mr. Leith upon the omissions in, and nature of, the answers put in by the Defendants to the Respondent's plaint; but their Lordships, for the above reasons, do not think it right to refer to those observations. The answers can only be looked at for the purpose of ascertaining whether they raise the legal bars insisted on. Throughout the following observations their Lordships must be understood to proceed upon a hypothetical case of fraud, and to express no opinion on its truth or probability.

The first bar to the Plaintiff's claim set up by the Appellant was that of limitation of suit by effluxion of time. The first period of limitation insisted on by the Appellant was that under Act, No. I. of 1845, sec. 24. That objection necessarily supposed the suit to be brought to set aside the revenue sale; this remedy, however, the suit did not seek, but, relying on the agreement of the 15th of April, 1848, antecedent to the sale, the Plaintiff claimed a right, as it were, to confess and avoid that sale, by imposing a trust on the estate which passed under it. The question, therefore, as to this period of limitation is, whether the Plaintiff is well founded in claiming the right thus claimed by him, in effect whether the Plaintiff can treat the auction sale, as against those Defendants who rely on it, as a private sale. Before dealing with this point, however, it will be convenient to consider the other period of limitation on which the Appellant relies as a bar, the general law of limitation of twelve years. As to this, it is sufficient to observe that on the allegations in the plaint that bar cannot be set up: for the title and possession of the Defendants against whom the redemption is prayed by this suit, is expressly alleged to be founded on fraud. This period of limitation, therefore, may be laid out of the case; and we come then to what has appeared to their Lordships to be the real question in the case (the question to which we have above referred), whether the Plaintiff can, in point of law, insist, notwithstanding the auction sale for arrears of revenue, that as against him, that sale ought to be viewed as a private sale. The title to redeem in this suit as against the parties subsequent to Abbott is rested on that ground, and the case which the Plaintiff alleges by his plaint, and by the documentary proof appended to it, is one of fraud between Abbott and M'Arthur, to deprive him of his title to redeem the Zemindary, by means of a secret purchase of it between them for three lacs of Rupees, including a fraudulent devise of a sale by auction for arrears of revenue, such arrears to be designedly incurred. By that agreement Abbott would become directly interested that the estate should sell for a low price, since the proceeds would be subject to the Mortgagors' claim, and the lower the price obtained at the auction sale, the larger the share would be which Abbott [555] would take of the three lacs. Parties to a secret fraud intend it to be secret, and the price realized at the auction sale would alone be known. These facts and conclusions are directly taken and derived from the plaint, and the agreement of the 15th of April annexed to it, and from M'Arthur's examination before the Supreme Court, which are all parts of the Plaintiff's proofs.

If these facts cannot be displaced, the agreement was undoubtedly a gross fraud on the Mortgagor, committed by both the actors in it, viz., Abbott and M'Arthur. But it was argued that even if this case were true, the remedy under the Act I. of 1845 was for damages only. This argument was in conformity to the opinion of the Zillah Judge. But it is to be observed that this argument assumes the very question under discussion, which is, whether the Act extends to the present case. Mr. Justice Bayley thought that the Act was not designed to protect a fraudulent purchaser. He put his decision on the ground that a man is not allowed by law to take advantage of his own wrong; and he treated the case of such a purchaser as beyond the protection intended to be given by the Act to purchasers under an auction sale.

No authority founded on the decisions of the late Company's Courts was referred to by the Judges of the High Court, and none such has been quoted before their Lordships on the argument of this appeal. The case is, however, not altogether new in India. The question was considered in the decision of the Supreme Court in the cause so often referred to, to which this suit is alleged to be supplemental. Mr. Justice Colvile, in that judgment, whilst he declares a Government sale for arrears of revenue to give a title against all the world, with certain excep-[556]-tions, engrafts on that general rule this exception, that a fraudulent purchase at such auction sale by a Mortgagee will not defeat the equity of redemption. The subject is treated in Mr. Arthur Macpherson's Book on Mortgages, at p. 91, who there quotes a prior decision, Kelsall v. Freeman, of the Supreme Court to the same effect. The author, now a Judge of the High Court at Calcutta, expresses a similar opinion, and as his book is one well known and frequently consulted in India, the decision under review cannot be regarded as unsettling a previously settled state of the law, and as raising for the first time an exception to the general protection which this legislative title affords to purchasers. In support of this view we may refer to other authorities. In the celebrated opinion of C. J. De Grey in the House of Lords, in The Duchess of Kingston's case (Howell's State Trials, Vol. 20, p. 544), he says, "But if it was a direct and decisive sentence upon the point, and, as it stands, to be admitted as conclusive evidence upon the Court, and not to be impeached from within; yet, like all other acts of the highest judicial authority, it is impeachable from without; although it is not permitted to show that the Court was mistaken, it may be shown that they were misled." "Fraud," his Lordship proceeds to state, "is an extrinsic, collateral act, which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of justice. Lord Coke says, it avoids all judicial acts, Ecclesiastical or Temporal." The Chief Justice then proceeds to state that fines and recoveries may be avoided for covin by strangers, and gives other illustrations of the same principle. The case of Collins v. Blanton (2 Wils. 341) is an authority [557] to show, if any were needed, that a Court will strip off all disguises from a case of fraud, and look at the transaction as it really is. In addition to these authorities, it may be observed that the principle embodying this distinction pervades the law. Under sales in market overt, the purchaser acquired a title against all the world; but this protection did not extend to a fraudulent buyer who knew that the seller had no real authority to sell. If the thief who sold in market overt purchased the article, the defrauded owner could then assert his title against such reacquisition. See Viner's Abr. tit. "Market Overt," A 1. In Bacon's Abr. tit. "Fraud," p. 768 (Gwillim and Dodd's edition), it is said, "If goods are sold in market overt by covin between two, on purpose to bar him that has right, this shall not bar him thereof. 2 Inst. 713, Cro. Eliz. 86." The same principle applies to Bills of Exchange and other negotiable instruments, made or which become payable to bearer, and pass by delivery.

Again, a title by estoppel is a well-known title. The doctrine that a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong, as used and applied by Mr. Justice Bayley to this title to redeem, is a correct application of that doctrine, if the facts support him. Assuming, as we must, the agreement to be proved, was this sale, as between Abbott and M'Arthur, really meant to be a sale under the Revenue laws for arrears of revenue, or was it a device—part of the machinery, as it were—to effect a fraud? Under a private conveyance, in the state of the title and of these parties, the estate, if conveyed by Abbott to M'Arthur, would have been redeemable by the Plaintiff. If the sale were intended to have been a real sale under the Re-[558]-venue laws, what would have been Abbott's interest? His estate would have been extinguished, and all that he would have been entitled to would have been a Mortgagee's interest in the surplus of the money realized by the sale over the arrears. Would a real vendor seek to reduce that surplus? The price was a fixed sum of three lacs; the parties contemplated a sale under that sum by the auction proceeding; and it may be well to repeat that it was Abbott's interest to cause, as far as he could cause it, that the auction price should be low, since, though the auction sale was public, his agreement was not known to the Mortgagor. What, then, if the sale were to be real, could be the consideration which M'Arthur was to receive for the excess of the three lacs over the auction price? The estate would have passed to him for the lesser sum. This suffices to show that, as between them, the sale was meant to be under the terms of the agreement in the case that has happened, which was a case contemplated by Abbott at least. These parties, therefore, are estopped or precluded by their acts from setting up, as against a third person, the Mortgagor, the object of their fraud, and a stranger to the agreement, the illegality of the agreement itself. The Plaintiff is entitled to say, this agreement is the real contract. Two cases decided by the House of Lords upon the effect of the Sale of Encumbered Estates Act for Ireland, Rorke v. Errington (7 H.L. Cases, 617), and Power v. Reeves (10 H.L. Cases, 645), were referred to by the Appellant's Counsel, in support of the Appellant's case, but it is sufficient to say that these were not cases of a fraudulent use of the provisions of an Act of Parliament for effecting a fraudulent purpose. They do [559] not appear to their Lordships in any way to affect the present case.

The various questions that have been put in the course of the argument, of notice, of knowledge, of purchase by an innocent principal through a fraudulent agent, need not here be answered. They do not arise on the facts before us. Those facts may not be the real facts. Any opinion expressed upon these points would be not merely an obiter dictum, it would be by anticipation an opinion hazarded on supposed facts, and evidence, if the cause be still untried, might be made to fit them.

This decision proceeds entirely upon the ground that, as between these parties, the sale must now be considered as a private sale. The decision has no application to interests derived under a real auction sale. The opinion of their Lordships upon this point disposes of the first bar of limitation by effluxion of time under Act, No. I. of 1845.

The questions remaining for consideration are, whether the pendency of the suit in the Supreme Court, or the nature of the decree, or any acting under that decree, present a bar to the prosecution of the suit, which the decree under appeal has remanded for trial on the facts. The mere pendency of the suit cannot operate as a bar, since the suit in the Zillah Court was intended to be simply in furtherance of and supplemental to it. The nature of the decree requires more consideration. Had that decree been one which could have been modified or varied by further proceedings in the Supreme Court itself, in the nature of a supplemental suit on the new matter discovered since the decree, the objection might have been tenable; but the law of the Court is otherwise. [560] Had the Nawab and the parties Defendants subsequent to him been subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the relief which is now sought to be obtained against them in the Zillah Court might have been prosecuted by a further suit, in the nature of a supplemental suit, properly constituted in the Supreme Court. The decree, as to the account and the inquiries directed as to alienated lands, might upon the new facts have been varied there, and the same relief may be obtained in this suit. The Defendant in possession is charged in substance as assignee of the mortgage, and in that character redemption is prayed against him. The relief is subject to the same conditions and equities which would have attached to it in the Supreme Court.

It would be unjust to exclude the relief by reason of mere personal exemption from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. To rely on this bar would be to plead an impediment against a suit instituted to remove it. The direction to inquire as to the alienated lands, and the relief consequent on that inquiry, are introduced for the benefit of the Mortgagor, in case the pledge should turn out to be irrecoverable through the fault of the pledgee. Such relief in this case is in the nature of compensation for a wrong. If it be subsequently discovered that the pledge can be restored or recovered, the Mortgagor may waive that benefit, and prosecute his right as to the thing itself. Lastly, with reference to the dealing under the decree, it is to be observed, that the mere prosecution of an inquiry, especially under a mistaken impression, would not raise a case of election, or amount to a waiver of a tort. This is all that the facts alleged disclose. They disclose [561] that, at the time of the decree, the estate was supposed to be irrecoverable, and that the Court, in directing the inquiries which it directed, acted on that impression. They do not disclose what has been done in the way of satisfaction under the decree. The case alleged in this suit is one of fraudulent misdealing with property pledged. The case of Hope v. Liddell (21 Beav. 183), quoted by the Attorney-General, was not a case of fraud. The observations of Lord St Leonards, quoted by the Master of the Rolls, relate to a bona fide purchaser for value, and to the proper mode of working out his equity against that of a Plaintiff whose property has been alienated by mistake.

The facts in the case of Hope v. Liddell differ widely from the alleged facts in the case under appeal: and the grounds on which that decision proceeded do not exist in this case, as it now appears. In the case of Hope v. Liddell, the original Testator, Dr. Spencer, devised the lands in dispute to one Thompson, a Trustee, on certain trusts. Thompson devised all his estates by general words, to his sister, Grace Thompson. This devise was erroneously supposed to pass the trust estate, which really went by descent to the heir-at-law of the Trustee. One of the cestui que trusts contracted to sell the estate to the Defendant, Liddell. The sale was perfectly bona vide on both sides. The price was adequate, and was paid. It was paid by the purchaser into the hand of the cestui que trusts by the direction of the supposed Trustee, Grace Thompson. The purchaser was by the trust deed not required to see to the application of the purchase money. The Court said, that if Grace [562] Thompson had really been the devisee in trust, as she was supposed by all to be, the transaction could not have been impeached. The defect was the want of the legal estate. On the second question in the cause, the Court found that the children, the objects of the trust, had, with full knowledge of all the circumstances and of their rights, taken the purchase money in lieu of the land. In this case, however, at the time of the decree in the Supreme Court, it was supposed that the land was gone irredeemably. In that state of belief there could have been no matters between which to choose. Afterwards, when it was discovered that the auction sale had been contrived under the agreement of the 15th of April 1848, a new state of facts appeared. The matters between which to elect would then have been the land, and the full price the three lacs, not simply the auction price. Nothing appears further on the alleged facts, except that the inquiry before the Master went on; but that it might well do, subject to final correction and due adjustment. There is no ground, therefore, for applying the decision of Hope v. Liddell as an authority to govern this case in the present state of the facts.

The same cause which has induced their Lordships to refrain, in the earlier part of this judgment, from expressing an opinion upon the law applicable to an unascertained state of facts, operates also here to induce reserve. Distinctions may exist between claims of this nature, founded on actual fraud by a combination between several wrong-doers, all liable to make satisfaction up to one, complete satisfaction for the injury done, between whom there may be, inter se, no right to contribution, and remedies founded on [563] contract, or converted by the choice of the sufferer into claims ex contractu; but, for the reasons already given, this subject cannot now be pursued further. Their Lordships will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

[Approved Byjnath Lall v. Ramoodeen Chowdry, 1873-74, L.R. 1 Ind. App. 106.]

MUDHUN MOHUN DOSS, agent of the firm of DWARKA DOSS and MUDHOBUN DOSS,—Appellant; GOKUL DOSS,—Respondent * [Feb. 27 and March 1, 1866].

On appeal from the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, North-West Provinces, Agra.

In an action of tort, the Plaintiff is not precluded from recovering ordinary damages by reason of his failing to prove the special damages laid, unless the special damage is the gist of the action.

Though a Plaintiff after a wrongful distress may have received permission to use his own property, he is neither bound to accept the permission so accorded to him, nor if he does accept it, will he lose his right of action. In such case he is entitled, at least, to a judgment for nominal damages.

On appeal, the appellate Court was of opinion, that there was evidence from which the Court below ought to have awarded damages in respect of losses sustained by an illegal attachment. As the whole evidence was before the appellate Court, it was held that there was no necessity to remit the case to India for re-trial, and the Judicial Committee accordingly assessed the damages from the materials before them.

The Plaintiff claimed as damages a larger sum than the appellate Court awarded.

No costs were given on the appeal. Held, following the practice of the Courts in India, that as the Plaintiff recovered a less amount than he laid in his plaint, his costs in the Court below were to be apportioned to the amount recovered, and not to the sum claimed.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

The suit was brought for a wrongful distress, and [564] the question was, whether the Appellant was entitled to any, and what amount of damages for loss of or damage to certain indigo cakes and stumps in a Factory belonging to Dwarka Doss, for whom the Appellant acted as Agent, in consequence of the illegal execution of a warrant of attachment, issued by the Respondent, under a decree in a suit brought against third parties; which warrant was subsequently by an Order of the Zillah Court of Mirzapore, set aside, and the attachment withdrawn.

The suit was instituted in the Civil Court of Mirzapore, and the Sudder Ameen of that Court (Moulvi Khoorshyd Ali Khan), by his judgment, dismissed the suit, on the ground that the claim of the Appellant on account of the damage of the indigo plants and stumps was unfounded; that with respect to the indigo cakes, that though it was probable that some trifling loss was sustained owing to the warehouse being locked up, yet that the loss was occasioned by the Appellant resisting the attachment; and further, that eight maunds of indigo had not been attached. The Sudder Court at Agra (present, Messrs. E. W. Wylly and J. Lean) affirmed that judgment. Hence this appeal.

The appeal was argued by The Attorney-General (Sir R. Palmer, Q.C.) and Mr. Leith, for the Appellant; and Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Pontifex, for the Respondent.

For the Appellant it was insisted, that the attachment and seizure were illegal, and had been on that ground withdrawn by a Court of competent authority; that the amount, therefore, claimed as damages, or at [565] least some damages, ought to have been awarded by the Court, first, for the deterioration of the manufactured articles; second, for loss of profits by reason of locking up the warehouse; and third, for the loss of materials, independently of any proof of special damages thereby sustained, Bayliss v. Fisher (7 Bingh. 153), and that such rule is adopted by the Courts in India, Manir Ud Din v. Jai Sankar Sandial (5 Ben. Sud. Dew. Ad. Rep. 229), Munneooddeen Darogah v. Hurree Pershad Mundul (6 Ben. Sud. Dew. Ad. Rep. 39); Mussumat Sidhisree Debea v. Wise (7 Ben. Sud. Dew. Ad. Rep. 136).

On the other hand, the Respondent denied that any damages had been sustained by the Appellant by the attachment and seizure, or if there had been any, that it was confined to the eight maunds of indigo.

Their Lordships' judgment having been reserved, was now pronounced by Sir James W. Colville (March 17, 1866).—This suit was brought to recover the damages alleged to have been sustained by the nominal Plaintiff's employer, Dwarka Doss, in consequence of an attachment made at the instance of the Respondent as the holder of a decree.

Dwarka Doss and the Respondent had conflicting claims upon an indigo Factory lying between the villages of Putteetah and Sirswabur, called in the record sometimes by the one and sometimes by the other name. This Factory, with three others, belonged to two persons, named Chunder Churun and Esserchund Neoghy.

At the beginning of the year 1856 the Neoghys were indebted to Mussumat Ooman Soondree, the [566] wife of Tara Pershun Bagjee, in the sum of Rs. 17,761, partly for moneys advanced by her, and partly for moneys advanced by Dwarka Doss on her husband's guarantee, for the purpose of carrying on the Factories; and those advances were secured by certain instruments of mortgage, dated the 20th of January, 1852, the 18th of April, 1853, and the 1st of January, 1856. These securities embraced the block of all the Factories, and their crops at least for the year 1856-7.

On the 1st of January, 1856, Mussumat Ooman Soondree, by an instrument called a deed of re-mortgage, assigned all her interest in the Factories, under the before-mentioned securities, to Dwarka Doss, in order to secure the sum of Rs. 9761, being the balance then due in respect of his former advances, together with the future advances to be made by him for carrying on the Factories. And it was thereby provided that he should take the Factories under his control and management during the year 1263 Fuslee, or 1856-7; thereby giving him the first charge or lien on the crop.

It does not very clearly appear whether under this stipulation he took possession of the Factories; or, if he did so, how long he continued in possession. But on the 7th of July, 1859, he obtained a decree in the Civil Court of Benares against Mussamat Ooman Soondree and the Neoghys, for the sum of Rs. 23,672, as then due to him upon his mortgage; and on the 15th of the same month he and the Neoghys filed in Court a petition embodying the terms of a compromise into which they had entered. The effect of this was that Dwarka Doss was to suspend the execution which he had taken out under the decree for Rs. 23,672; [567] was to advance further sums for manufacturing indigo from the stumps then on the ground; and was to have the disposal of all the indigo manufactured. The works were to be superintended by one Balgobind Doss Seith, whom the Neoghys had nominated as their Agent for that purpose. The rights of Dwarka Doss, under the execution for any balance that might remain to him after the sale of indigo, were expressly reserved to him both against the Factories and against all the Defendants to his suit. This arrangement was carried out by placing a servant or Agent of Dwarka Doss in charge of the Factories.

On the day on which this instrument of compromise was filed in the Benares Court (the 15th of July, 1859), the Respondent obtained a decree in the Court of the Principal Sudder Ameen of Mirzapoor against the Neoghys for the sum of Rs. 764, alleged to be due to him upon a mortgage of the Putteetah Factory, dated in Phagon Budee 1st Sumbur 1911 (being some time in A.D. 1855). Dwarka Doss intervened in this suit as an objector, insisting that the Factory had been attached for money due to him, and that the claim was fraudulent. But the Principal Sudder Ameen held that the objection could not be tried in that suit, and was no bar to the making of the usual decree in a suit based upon a simple mortgage-bond. He accordingly passed the ordinary decree against the Defendants (the Neoghys) and the mortgaged property for the sum found due.

The Respondent took out execution on this decree for Rs. 878 10a. He first obtained an Order for the attachment of both the Putteetah Factory and another Factory known as the Soorma Factory, with the appurtenances of each, and of fifty maunds of indigo alleged [568] to be at the former, and of thirty maunds of indigo, or thereabouts, alleged to be at the latter Factory.

But on the 17th of September he made a further application to the Court, wherein he expressed his desire to abandon the execution against the Soorma Factory, and submitted a more detailed list of the property at the Putteetah Factory. He limited also the quantity of indigo to be attached at his suit to eight maunds. The Order of the Court was that the attachment should be limited to the property comprised in this last list.

On the 23rd of September, the Ameen, accompanied by two servants of the Respondent, who went to point out the property, proceeded to attach the Factory and other property detailed in the application of the 17th of September. He made an actual entry upon the lands, and took an inventory of the property attached. He could not, however, complete the attachment of the eight maunds of indigo by actual seizure. These were part of a much larger quantity kept in a storehouse, which was under lock and key; and the servants of Dwarka Doss refused to give him access to the storehouse, or to remove this lock. In these circumstances he put his own lock also upon the door, and retired, leaving two Peons in charge of the property attached.

The Appellant, having heard of the applications for the attachment, had on the 22nd of September applied to stay it. But as the Dusserah holidays, during which the Courts are closed for some weeks, began on the 24th, this application was ordered to stand over until after the vacation; and the same cause prevented any further application touching the actual attachment.

[569] In October the Ameen, armed with a Magistrate's Order, and accompanied by a Blacksmith, went to the storehouse for the purpose of breaking Dwarka Doss's lock, but appears to have desisted on the threat of the people in charge of the Factory to quit the premises if the lock was broken, and to leave him responsible for all the indigo there.

On the 5th of November, these circumstances having been brought to the notice of the Principal Sudder Ameen, he passed an Order to the effect that if the Defendants to the Respondent's suit, or their Agents, should fail to appear in Court within a week, and substantiate their objection to the opening of their lock, it should be broken, and the eight maunds of indigo be forcibly attached.

On the same day he required the Respondent, as the decree-holder, to answer the Appellant's objection of the 22nd of September within four days.

On the 25th of November, the Ameen having in the meantime received no Order to suspend the attachment of the indigo, proceeded, under the Order of the 5th of November, to remove the lock, attached eight maunds of indigo pointed out to him by a servant of the Respondent; and made two inventories, one of the eight maunds of indigo attached, the other of the property found in the storehouse, which was not attached. Owing, however, to some difficulty about weighing the indigo, all this property remained in the storehouse, apparently under the lock of the Ameen, or in charge of his Peons, until the 8th of December, when the eight maunds were finally weighed and removed to a separate place, and all the other contents of the storehouse were left at the disposal of Dwarka Doss's people.

[570] On the 12th of December the Ameen submitted to the Court a further report of his proceedings, and stated that he had, according to the Respondent's request, attached no property belonging to the Factory except the eight maunds of indigo. The objection filed by the Appellant on the 22nd of September appears to have been thenceforward confined to these; and it was finally disposed of by an Order of the 3rd of January, 1860, which, on the ground of the preferential claim of Dwarka Doss, directed the release of the eight maunds of indigo from attachment.

Some difficulty in carrying out this Order was occasioned by the refusal of Dwarka Doss's Agents to receive back this indigo, except on terms with which the Ameen would not comply; but ultimately the eight maunds, and whatever else had been under attachment, were, by Order of the Court, left at the disposal of those who were in possession and charge of the Factory; and the Peons were withdrawn from the premises on the 28th of February, 1860.

Upon this statement of admitted facts, it appears clear to their Lordships that Dwarka Doss had, by reason of the attachment of the 23rd of September, 1859, and subsequent proceedings, sustained an injury, for which he was entitled to claim substantial damages. The attachment was wrongful and irregular. The right of the Respondent, under his decree, was to sell the Factory pledged to him, subject to the rights of Dwarka Doss under his prior mortgage. He had no right to invade or disturb the possession of the prior Mortgagee by placing Peons upon the property, in order to attach the Factory as a step towards the judicial sale. Under the procedure, as it existed before 1859, this could not have been done. The [571] attachment must have been constructive. But under the new Code of procedure, which had come into force on the 1st of July, 1859, the proper course was to issue and publish a written notice under the 235th and 239th sections of Act, No. VIII. of 1859. For the actual seizure of the eight maunds of indigo, to which the execution was ultimately reduced, there was even less justification. The manufactured indigo was not included in the Respondent's mortgage. And that it was not part of the general property in the possession of the Neoghys, that Dwarka Doss had or claimed a lien upon it, the Respondent had had ample notice in his own suit, wherein Dwarka Doss had intervened as objector, and by the proceedings of the 12th of May, 1859, touching a distress for rent which has been put in evidence in the cause. And the manner in which this wrongful attachment was carried out, the placing by the Ameen of his lock upon the door, subjected Dwarka Doss to the additional wrong of having the contents of the godown, to which ultra the eight maunds of indigo the Respondent made no claim, taken out of his control and dominion from the 23rd of September until the 8th of December. It is idle to say that his people ought in the first instance to have given the Ameen access to the godown, and delivered the eight maunds of indigo, or that they ought to have acted according to the directions of the Ameen concerning the use of the two locks, supposing those directions to have been given to the Peons. The case cited by Mr.

Leith from Bingham's Reports, shows that in this country a Plaintiff, in an action for a trespass of very similar character, may, without proving special damage, recover substantial damages. Nor can it [572] be said that in this case there is no evidence of the malicious character which the Plaintiff imputes to the trespass.

The plaint in this case was filed on the 25th of February, 1860. The damages claimed were all in the nature of special damages, and consisted of three items, viz., Rs. 14,000, "on account of loss of 70 maunds of indigo at Rs. 200 per maund"; Rs. 5545, on account of indigo which it was alleged Dwarka Doss was prevented from manufacturing from indigo plants; and Rs. 2250, on account of indigo which it was alleged he was prevented from manufacturing from indigo stumps.

Both the Courts below have found, and their Lordships can see in the evidence no sufficient grounds for disputing the justice of that finding, that the Plaintiff has failed to establish any claim to damages in respect of indigo which, but for the wrongful attachment, might have been manufactured from either plants or stumps. The evidence shows pretty clearly that there had been no indigo plant to be manufactured, and leaves it more than doubtful whether all the stumps had not been converted into indigo before the 23rd of September; and whether, if any had then remained to be used in the manufacture of indigo, the attachment would have prevented them from being so used. The two last items of damage may, therefore, be dismissed from consideration.

The claim, however, to recover damages for loss on account of the manufactured indigo, was disposed of by the Courts below in a different way. The Principal Sudder Ameen held that, though the Plaintiff did probably, as stated by the European indigo Factors, sustain some trifling loss, owing to the storehouse [573] having remained locked up, this was due "to the refusal of his Agent to unlock the door on the Ameen's application, and that this resistance of a legal process on their part, joined with a disposition to break the peace, caused the loss to the Plaintiff." And the Sudder Court considered that no good proof had been furnished that the Plaintiff's Agents were ever prevented from having free access to the godown, for the purpose of turning and drying the indigo cakes; but that, on the other hand, the Plaintiff, instead of entering his objections in a legitimate way to the attachment of the property, did, through his Agents, contumaciously obstruct the Ameen employed to distrain. The learned Judges seem to rest the first of their conclusions partly on the ground that the Plaintiff ought not to have kept his lock on the godown; partly on the evidence given by the Ameen of his instructions to the Peons to open his lock, whenever the Plaintiff's people opened theirs.

Their Lordships think that neither Court has assigned grounds which warrant the conclusion at which both have arrived. They have already expressed their opinion that the attachment was wrongful. The proposition that a man whose possession was wrongfully invaded ought to have given effect to that invasion, because it was made under colour of legal process, by removing the lock of his own storehouse, appears to them to be untenable. The argument that the Plaintiff ought to have entered his objection in a legitimate way is met by the facts that he had already entered an objection to the execution, and that, by reason of the closing of the Court during the Dusserah vacation, he could neither follow up that objection nor make any further objection to [574] the acts of the Ameen until the holidays were over. Again, the case of Bayliss v. Fisher (7 Bingh., 153), already referred to, shows that even if the instructions said to have been given by the Ameen to the Peons were really given (as to which there is a conflict of evidence), the Plaintiff was neither bound to accept the permission to use his own property so accorded to him; nor, if he had accepted it, would have lost his right of action. It appears, therefore, to their Lordships that the Plaintiff's suit has been improperly dismissed with costs, and that he was, at the very least, entitled to a judgment for nominal damages. If it be important in India to check any tendency to resist the execution of legal process, it is hardly less important to maintain the principle that they who misuse legal process are responsible for the consequences of that misuse.

It has been argued for the Respondent that the suit was properly dismissed, inasmuch as the Appellant was by the form of his plaint limited to the three heads of special damage therein laid, and, having failed to prove any such special damage, was precluded from recovering general damages for the trespass.

Their Lordships, however, are of opinion, that there was evidence in the action on which the Courts below might have awarded some damages on account of the loss sustained in respect of the manufactured indigo. Nor are they prepared to allow that if this had not been the case, the Plaintiff could have recovered nothing. The plaint might have been more accurately drawn, but, substantially, it seeks damages generally, as consequent on the wrongful attachment of the Factory. The principle ordinarily applied to actions of tort is, that the Plaintiff is never precluded from [575] recovering ordinary damages by reason of his failing to prove the special damage he has laid, unless the special damage is the gist of the action. Thus in an action of slander for words actionable per se, when the Plaintiff lays special damages, and fails to prove it, he is nevertheless entitled to such damages as the jury think right to give him. It would be otherwise if the words were not actionable per se. In the present case the gist of the action is not the special damage, but the unlawful attachment; and the Plaintiff would not have been precluded from recovering ordinary damages for that actionable wrong, even if he had wholly failed to prove the special damage laid.

Taking this view of the case, their Lordships feel that it is not desirable to remit the cause for the assessment of damages in India, since no case has been made for taking fresh evidence, and the Judge below would have only those materials for a Judgment which are now before their Lordships.

They have, therefore, determined to take the course which was taken by this Committee in the case of Le Breton v. Ennis (4 Moore's P.C. Cases, 323), and to assess the damages themselves. It must be confessed that the Appellant has not given the best evidence that he could have given on this point. He might have proved for what the indigo had been sold, and for what it might have been sold if it had not been damaged, and had been sold at the proper time. Weighing, however, all the circumstances of the case, their Lordships feel justified in assessing the damages at Rs. 500.

Their Lordships have felt some difficulty about the costs of the Courts below, and those of this appeal. The costs of an action in India, particularly the [576] stamp duties payable on the proceedings, depend a good deal on the value of the thing claimed. It is accordingly the practice of the Courts in India, when a Plaintiff has recovered less than he has claimed, to apportion the costs in the proportion which the amount recovered bears to that which was claimed. In the present case there are strong indications of a bad feeling between the parties, which, if it prompted the original attachment, has probably, on the other hand, induced the Appellant to swell his demand beyond all reasonable bounds. The evidence affords no grounds for a claim for damages amounting to the appealable sum of Rs. 10,000; and the amount actually recovered falls far short of that sum. Yet, unless the claim had been thus unduly magnified, the Appellant could not have appealed to Her Majesty.

In these circumstances, their Lordships think they must direct the costs below to be apportioned according to the ordinary course of the Courts below, and that they ought not to give to either party the costs of this appeal. In making the apportionment, the Appellant will, of course, receive credit for any costs which he may have paid under the decrees reversed.

The Order, therefore, which their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to make is, that the decrees both of the Sudder Court and of the Civil Court of Mirzapore be reversed; that the Appellant be declared entitled to recover damages to the amount of Rs. 500; that the cause be sent back to the Sudder Court, with directions to enter judgment for the Plaintiff for that sum, and to deal with the costs in both the Courts below according to the practice of those Courts in like cases, and that each party do bear his own costs of this appeal.
